REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Ninth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. Parent.

GERMAN REPARATIONS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On the orders of the day of May 10, 1929, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) called my attention to a press despatch from Paris stating that the plan for revision of German reparations under consideration by the experts' committee would leave Great Britain nothing for the dominions or for arrears of interest on debt and that the British delegation would be practically certain to reject that phase of the proposals which would reduce the German payments to the dominions to zero. He requested that I lay on the table a statement showing the terms upon which the present payments are made, the arrears, if any, which exist, and the amount received to date together with any information regarding the suggested new arrangement. I accordingly now table a brief statement.

PELEE ISLAND—FLOOD CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): I would like to draw the attention of the government to a most alarming situation which exists in Essex county. I have under my hand a lengthy telegram apprising me that the Minister of Public Works had been informed that 7,000 acres or almost the total area of Pelee island is threatened with flood owing to the unprecedented high water in lake Erie; that a further rise in level or a storm may break the banks, and that private efforts are unable to cope with the situation. The people are asking for immediate attention and consideration on the part of the government, and they suggest in the wire that if a dry land dredge is on the ground promptly to raise the inner embankment the situation may be saved. They are asking for immediate action. The Public Works department have been communicated with and I would be glad if the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would assure us of immediate action.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If the hon. member, as I understand, has communicated with the Department of Public Works, I feel sure the department will do whatever may lie within its power and scope.

FISH TRAPS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I should like permission to ask a question of the Prime Minister. In order to make the question intelligible, I would need to state very briefly the facts upon which the question is based. It will not take me more than two minutes to do so, and it will expedite the business of the house, because otherwise I would feel justified in moving the adjournment of the house to discuss the matter.

There has just finished its sitting in British Columbia a commission which has been considering the advisability of allowing the use of fish traps in northern British Columbia waters. All the fishermen, or to be accurate, 99 per cent of the fishermen in British Columbia generally, irrespective of their location, are bitterly opposed to fish traps as well as to the commission, and I think I am safe in saying that 90 per cent of the population in the vicinity affected, that is, Prince Rupert, irrespective of their occupations, are also bitterly opposed to both propositions. I said that they were against the commission. The reason for that is two-fold. First, they think it is uncalled for, the matter having been already decided, and, second, they object to a commission consisting of only one man. While he is a man of undoubted repute and integrity, they are afraid that in a matter of such importance, the personal views of one commissioner might affect his report. I now come to the question, or rather, the request that I wish to make of the Prime Minister. To be quite definite, I have put it in writing and it is this: whether, before adopting any policy of again allowing the use of fish traps in northern British Columbia waters, he would refer the matter to the house by resolution or otherwise, so that it could be fully discussed.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In reply to my hon. friend I should like to say that I am only one member of the government, and I should like to have an opportunity to confer with my colleagues on the matter, and give my hon. friend a reply later.

REGULATION OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC

PAPERS RELATING TO CONVENTION BETWEEN UNITED KINGDOM AND UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) whether he can give us any information as to when the correspondence in regard to the convention of 1924 between Great Britain and the United States will be laid before the house. I have seen published in the press what purported to be partial extracts from that correspondence, and I thought that perhaps it had already been officially published in whole or in part so that one could have access to it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not know whether my hon. friend was in the house yesterday when I referred to this matter. I then tabled the correspondence between Great Britain and Canada with reference to the treaty, and I mentioned at the time that the British government had advised us that they regarded the correspondence between the United States and Great Britain as largely confidential. I might say to the hon. member that when that communication was received we drew the attention of the British government to the very fact he has just mentioned, namely, that there had been press reports which would indicate that much of the correspondence had not been regarded as confidential but was already published. Having drawn the attention of the British government to that fact we hope that possibly they may be able to meet my hon. friend's wishes in the matter of having that portion of the corespondence tabled as well, but the decision must rest with the British government.

Mr. CAHAN: In the communications which passed between the Hon. Mr. Massey, representing the Canadian government, and the Secretary of State of the United States, certain quotations were made from the correspondence which had taken place. I wonder if we could have laid on the table of the house the parts of the correspondence which contain those quotations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be very pleased to supplement the despatch which we have already sent with an exact quotation of what my hon. friend has just said.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. CANTLEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Some time ago I asked for information of the Department of National Revenue as follows:

What were the sums refunded by way of 99 per cent rebate of duty on imported coal used by iron and steel makers and/or other industries in each province of Canada during each year since these rebates came into force?

The answer I got to that question was that there was no record kept of the amount of drawback paid by provinces, but I was given the total amount of the refunds in each year from 1908 to 1928. That did not comply with my request. I then asked the question:

1. What persons or corporations, during the year 1928, received refunds by way of 99 per cent rebate of duty on foreign coal imported for use of iron or steel makers, and what was the amount of refund in each case?

2. What persons or corporations, during the year 1928, received refunds by way of 99 per cent rebate of duty on foreign coal imported for use of other than iron and steel manufacturers, and what was the amount of refund in each case?

To that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) replied:

1 and 2. It is contrary to the practice of the Department of Customs and Excise to give information which would disclose the business of an individual concern.

My reply to that is that a proper reply to my question would not have disclosed the business of any individual concern, because I was dealing with provinces. However, in order to make it undoubtedly possible for the department to give the information I sought, without disclosing anything that should not be disclosed, I put the question in another way:

1. Of the total amount of $1,060,096.16 reported on page 2121 of Hansard of April 29, as refunded to importers of coal during the year 1928, what was the amount refunded on coal used in the production or manufacture of iron and/or steel in each of the several provinces of Canada?

An answer to that question certainly would not disclose the private business of any concern. I also asked:

2. What was the amount so refunded on account of coal imported and used in connection with metallurgical processes other than the production of iron or steel in each of the provinces of Canada?

To the first part of my question the answer was:

1. $662,986.28.

That amount referred to the whole of Canada. The information was not given by provinces, which is what I asked for. The answer to part 2 of my question was:

For metallurgical processes other than iron or steel, nil.

I doubt if that answer is correct, although I am not quite sure. The department also gave by way of information in reply to my second question which figures I did not ask for, as follows:

For production of coke, $383,072.96.

That was not a matter of any interest to me at the time. The third part of my question read:

3. What was the amount so refunded on account of coal imported and used in connection with the production or refining of salt in each of the several provinces of Canada?

To that I received the answer:

3. $14,036.92.

And this note is added:

To give fuller details would disclose the business of individual concerns which is contrary to the practice of the Department of National Revenue.

I state emphatically that it would not. In the province of Ontario, for instance, there are two large concerns, and to give the information I asked for would not disclose the business of either one or the other, because I grouped them all together. I would also point out to the minister and to the house that in the case of bounties paid on iron and steel while the Bounty Act was in force, a statement was given each year, if I am not mistaken, of the amount of bounty paid to the different concerns coming under the act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is no question of privilege so far. I would ask the hon. gentleman to state his point as briefly as possible, or to put his question on the order paper.

Mr. CANTLEY: I have put my point, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to tell the Minister of National Revenue that I want and expect to get a definite answer to my question giving me the information asked for and to which I believe I am entitled.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue): Just a word in reply to my hon. friend. I want to assure him that there is absolutely no disposition whatever to withhold from him or anybody else any information that may properly be given out by the department. The statement that was made in connection with one of the answers that my hon. friend quoted that it was contrary to the practice of the department to give out information that might disclose the business of any individual concern was given entirely in good faith. In the opinion of my hon. friend the information he asked for would not disclose the business of any private concern, but in the opinion of the Commissioner of Customs the opposite was the case, and I think I am obliged to take the opinion of the executive officer of that branch of the department.

My hon. friend also questions whether one of the answers given is correct. I think that is hardly a fair statement for him to make. I have every reason to believe that when a question is answered by the department it is answered honestly and sincerely.

Perhaps one way out of the difficulty would be for my hon. friend to go to the department, where he might possibly be given access to the figures without betraying any information which it is the practice of the department to treat as confidential. That perhaps might be better than making a demand in the way in which he did.

Mr. CANTLEY: If I can get the information by applying to the department, I shall be very glad to do so. So far as the information wrongly given, or possibly wrongly given, is concerned, I still think that there was an error on the part of the officer of the department.

Mr. EULER: That might very well be cleared up if my hon. friend would visit the department.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT

RESIGNATION OF INSPECTOR R. W. TUFTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): In the absence of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) I wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to a despatch which appears in the Halifax Herald of May 9th last, from Wolfville, reading as follows:

> "Intolerable political interference, which was such as to hamper effort to deal with major offences against the Migratory Birds Convention Act, based on agreement with United States," was given to-night by R. W. Tufts, inspector in the maritime district, for his resignation which has been forwarded to Ottawa. No answer has been received from the capital as yet as to the course which will be followed there.
> "Recently my work has been hampered by intolerable political interference in my efforts to suppress some of the major offences against the Migratory Birds Convention Act. In these circumstances I felt obliged to tender my resignation, conditions being such as to seriously hamper my work in the protection of our wild life."

I ask the Prime Minister if it is the policy of this government to allow political interference in prosecuting offences under the Migratory Birds Act.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Not only is it the policy of the government not to permit the continuance of political interference in these cases, but it is the government's policy not to permit political interference in any case.

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, further in connection with the question asked by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn), may I inquire of the Prime Minister, in view of the statement made by Mr. Tufts, as to the cause of his resigning being political interference—a statement, by the way, which appears in both the Halifax Chronicle and the Halifax Herald—if he will have the department which is responsible, the Department of the Interior, table all correspondence in connection with Mr. Tufts' resignation.

Mr. DUFF: I am not guilty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps the hon. member would put a motion on the order paper. I am sure that it will be granted.

Mr. ERNST: It is a matter reflecting on the government.

Mr. BENNETT: We will get the papers when the estimates are up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure it will be granted.

NEW WESTMINSTER PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): On the orders of the day yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), regarding a return which was ordered on May 14, 1928. On page 2433 of Hansard he is reported as making the following statement:

> I will look into the matter, and if the return is ready, I shall be pleased to lay it on the table. But may I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that I do not think he has the right to criticize me, because, under the rules, a motion for a return drops after the session is over. If the motion has not been renewed this session, my hon. friend cannot get the papers as of right, although I will give them to him.

When I differed with his statement of the rule, he said:

> Yes, I am correct, I will show my hon. friend Bourinot, Beauchesne and all the other authorities. I was reading them yesterday.

My hon. leader (Mr. Bennett) also differed with the Minister of Justice. I now ask the minister if he has looked through the authorities. I would refer him to standing order 81, which reads as follows:

> A prorogation of the house shall not have the effect of nullifying an order or address of the house for returns or papers, but all papers and returns ordered at one session of the house, if not complied with during the session, shall be brought down during the following session, without renewal of the order.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate my hon. friend on having been right. Obviously he wanted it to be made public that he was right. I may say I was right in principle; that was the former rule, because every decision of the house drops when the session is over, but the practice has been established in recent years so that these orders have not to be renewed. I shall be pleased indeed to give these papers to my hon. friend, and again I congratulate him on having been right this time.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The minister was right two years ago, but he is not up to date.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): That has been the rule of the house for many years.

MOTOR AND PLEASURE BOATS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I desire to ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Cardin) when I may expect to hear from him in regard to rescinding the order in council imposing a tax on motor boats and canoes on the Muskoka lakes.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, I am considering the representations made to me from different sources, and expect to be in a position to give a final decision in the course of a few days.

NOVA SCOTIA—COAT OF ARMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. A. BLACK (Halifax): May I ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) whether he has had any correspondence with the premier of Nova Scotia with regard to the coat of arms of that province? If so, would he be good enough to lay the correspondence on the table?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I do not recollect any such correspondence. There may have been an exchange of letters directly with the department. I will look into the matter.

IMPERIAL CABLE MERGER

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 213, to authorize consent to the sale of certain cable and wireless telegraph undertakings established under the Pacific Cable Acts, 1901 to 1924 (Imp.), and the West Indian Islands (Telegraph) Act, 1924 (Imp).

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, before this motion is carried, I think in fairness to the house the Postmaster General ought to make a complete statement, giving full particulars with regard to the whole bill. Until now the house has very little information with regard to the question. I have been anxiously awaiting a statement from the minister.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, this bill was before the house last week, and both the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and myself went into the question as fully as possible; we gave the house all the information we could. If there is any further detailed information required, I think it ought to be given when the bill is in committee of the whole house.

Mr. HEAPS: If I may ask a question now of the minister, will he give us some enlightenment before the bill receives second reading?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are on the second reading now.

Mr. HEAPS: Unfortunately the house has not any information worth while on which it can give judgment whether this bill ought to receive second reading or not. About the end of February I had a question on the order paper asking for the production of all documents and correspondence pertaining to this question. On the second day of May, nine weeks afterwards, the papers were tabled, but there was very little in them. I have before me now the correspondence tabled and I find a report of the conference held last year in London, England, and three letters. These letters afford very little information to the house. I find one communication dated November 10 and a telegram from our Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs in Great Britain as follows:

Ottawa, November 10, 1927.

All circumstances make it clear that it is urgently necessary to give immediate consideration to commercial position of the Pacific cable as requested in our cables of July 30 and August 16 on which no action has yet been taken.

There is absolutely nothing in any of this correspondence to show the nature of the communications sent by the Canadian government on those dates—the summer of 1927. Further, it is stated:

Canadian government therefore proposes that a committee be set up in London comprising representatives of the four interested governments to consider and report on whole commercial position of cable and question of broader policy as to future management, and particularly as to how cable and wireless systems can work together for their common advantage. Representatives on this committee should be invited to make concrete suggestions as to how cable might best be operated in future. Immediate appointment desirable as cable is losing money daily due to wireless competition and whole question becoming very serious one for all governments concerned.

In this paragraph it is intimated that the cable was losing money daily. From the information I have, however it appears that in the year 1927-28 the cable actually made a profit, after paying all depreciation and allowing for interest charges, of about $100,000. I have not the exact figures by me, but I can get them. The communication proceeds:

We appreciate force of considerations as to appointment of chairman and advisability of visiting cable stations to report as to what economies can be effected but believe essential first to deal with broader questions of policy, particularly as recommendations of policy committee if set up might involve change in entire organization of Pacific cable board. Canadian government therefore of opinion appointment of permanent chairman should be deferred until report of policy committee received which should be at latest before end of this year.

Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Having read this communication, I will now give the next one, dated Ottawa, December 15, 1927, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs and addressed to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs in London.

Telegram, code, secret.
Your secret telegram 8th December—

This refers to a telegram or cablegram received from the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs in London, but there is nothing in the correspondence to show what are its contents. Evidently the whole trouble in this connection arose after the competition began between a government-owned and a privately-owned utility. The government-owned utility was giving such hot competition to the other that it was necessary for a conference to be called, and that conference resulted ultimately in a privately-owned utility, which was losing money, taking over the publicly-owned utility which was a huge success.

—competition between beam wireless and cables. Government of Canada agrees that special conference be held in London as soon as possible to deal with situation but requests that terms of reference allow of representatives sending for such British cable and wirelss bodies as they may wish and receiving from them such solutions of the existing problems as they may care to submit. Government of Canada nominates Sir Campbell Stuart as its representative on such conference board and will send a member of the Postmaster General's staff as adviser.

Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I want to ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) who recommended to the government the name of Sir Campbell Stuart, because it will be shown before this debate has concluded that this gentleman was an interested party in the whole matter and was not a fit and proper person to represent the government at such a conference. There is one other communication, and this is all that the government have submitted. This communication is dated the 4th day of January, 1928, and is as follows:

Sir Campbell Stuart, C.B.E.,
Hyde Park Hotel,
Knightsbridge,
London, S.W. 1, England.

Dear Sir Campbell: I enclose papers re the Pacific cable as the minister will bring them before council to-morrow. We have sent a copy on to Mr. Gaboury also—he is in Montreal prior to sailing on the "Montrose" from St. John on the 6th. Should there be any change at council, or anything to add, we will cable you—in code, if necessary, using the code which Mr. Brown left with us when here last summer.

Yours sincerely,
Assistant Deputy Postmaster General.

It does not appear where the communication was from or even who signed it. However, I should like to know who Mr. Brown is. Can the Postmaster General inform the house who this gentleman is? This is rather important, because it is evident that in the summer of 1927 a Mr. Brown—I have no idea who he is—was in Canada and left certain codes to be used if necessary. I have tried to find out who he is. I find in one of the documents before me the name of Mr. Brown, but I am not inclined to think it is the same gentleman referred to in this correspondence. I am anxious to have some information on this point, and I think the house would appreciate it if the Postmaster General would say at this stage who this Mr. Brown happens to be, to whom reference is made in the communication of January 4, 1928.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does not my hon. friend think that such questions might be more properly asked and answered in the committee stage? If the Postmaster General replies now the hon. gentleman will not be able to speak again.

Mr. HEAPS: I appreciate the point the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) makes, but had the Postmaster General given any information to the house touching the question it might put a different complexion on the whole situation. But we have no information from the minister touching one of the largest problems before parliament this session. After a minister has introduced a bill which has received its first reading the house has a right, when it is moved that the bill be read the second time, to expect a statement regarding the whole matter; hon. members are entitled to some information for their enlightenment. Now I should like to have this information before the second reading takes place, and I do not think I am asking anything unreasonable from the Postmaster General. Here we are confronted with a short bill of two clauses and are given not a word of explanation. This is important legislation, and at least we should have information in the form of an appendix. The matter has been before the house on and off for some weeks, but as yet we are completely in the dark regarding the whole transaction.

There is also in this correspondence a letter dated December 22, in the nature of a Pacific cable policy. Immediately after this was despatched the whole question was completely changed, and the terms of reference to the committee, as shown in the report of 1928, are altogether different from those indicated in the correspondence tabled in the house on May 2. In this report the terms of reference are:

> We were appointed:—
> To examine the situation which has arisen as a result of the competition of the beam wireless with the cable services, to report thereon and to make recommendations with a view to a common policy being adopted by the various governments concerned.

We know now what that common policy was; it was a policy to take the government-owned beam system, which was paying, and the government-owned Pacific cable system, which was also paying its way, and hand them over to a private corporation. We find further that certain memoranda were submitted to the conference—on behalf of whom? Nothing was submitted by the Dominion government at all, and in fact there is nothing in the report submitted to the house which shows what was recommended by the Canadian government. We only know that the report is signed on behalf of the Dominion government, and possibly the Postmaster General may be able to give us further information before the bill is finally put through. Apparently they were in such indecent haste to get through with this conference that although the Australian representative was on his way to London the investigating committee, including a Canadian representative, refused to wait until he arrived and had an opportunity to present his views. Apparently there is some reason why we cannot get all this correspondence tabled here; there is some reason for all this secrecy. Is it because the whole transaction cannot bear the light of day? I am just beginning to wonder whether or not that is the reason.

On page 7 of the report I find the following:

> On the 25th October, 1926, the Anglo-Canadian beam service was opened, the operation being undertaken in Great Britain by the Post Office and in Canada by the Canadian Marconi Company. The rates remained the same by cable and by wireless. The long-wave service previously operated in Great Britain by the Marconi Company was terminated on the same date.

Here is a rather interesting feature in connection with this submission. In all other countries in which the beam wireless service was in operation there was a reduction in rates by one third; that is, the rates to Australia were reduced from two shillings six pence to one shilling eight pence by beam wireless; the rates to South Africa were reduced from 2 shillings to one shilling four pence and the rates to India were reduced from one shilling eight pence to one shilling one pence. Canada was the only country having beam wireless communication where no reduction was made as a result of that service. What was the reason? It was because the government of this country, or one of the departments of the government, handed over the operation of this beam wireless service to the Canadian Marconi Company, a private corporation, although there was no reason why the Post Office Department or the Department of Marine and Fisheries should not have controlled that service in Canada. Perhaps it would be interesting, Mr. Speaker, if I quoted section 18 of the report which is as follows:

> Before the opening of the beam services, the cables were working with a large margin of annual surplus, and there is evidence that the introduction of cheaper rates has already led to an appreciable increase in the total volume of telegraph traffic. But in spite of this it has been represented to us that the cable undertakings affected by the wireless rate reductions and the Indo-European land-line service have been brought to a serious position by the two-fold reduction in their receipts resulting from the operation of the lower rates introduced as a means of countering beam competition and also from the loss of a considerable volume of traffic to the beam services. It should, however, be observed with regard to the Canadian service, where wireless and cable rates are the same, that no crisis has at present arisen.

This report, which was signed by all the representatives at that conference, stated that no crisis had arisen in regard to the service, then why was it that in 1927 the Canadian government was so anxious to get rid of this Pacific cable and other methods of communication with the other parts of the empire? I cannot reconcile this section of the report with the action of the government as shown by the one or two letters I have had the opportunity to peruse.

I have only forty minutes at my disposal; I know I will have the opportunity of going into some of these questions when we are in committee, but just here I would like to mention some of the companies represented at this conference in London:

The Eastern Associated Telegraph Companies.
The Indo-European Telegraph Company.
The Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company.
The Canadian Marconi Company.
The Wireless Telegraph Company of South Africa.
The Indian Radio Telegraph Company.

No representative appeared on behalf of the government of Canada to put forth the views and present the attitude of this country; our only information on this question is what we can obtain from the correspondence which has been tabled and from the report which is dated July, 1928. However I would like to read one or two sentences from a speech made in the British House of Commons in connection with this question. I have already referred on another occasion to the fact that the Labour party in Great Britain who opposed a similar measure very strenuously in the British House of Commons have stated in a pamphlet which they have broadcast throughout Great Britain that if they are returned to office they will repudiate this contract and will not be bound in any way by the actions of the Baldwin government. I will now quote one or two paragraphs of a speech delivered by Mr. Walter Baker, the member for East Bristol in the British House of Commons, in order to show this house the widespread ramifications of this trust which is now in control of these communications.

I will now come to some of the big people engaged in this business. The biggest and most important of these people is the firm of Lazard Brothers, a world-famed firm of financiers, who I believe have an excellent reputation. I have already referred to the fact that Lazard Brothers, whose managing director is Sir Robert Kindersley, purchased the shares of the Canadian Marconi Company. They appointed two of its three trustees, who are through the Cushion Trust, Limited, substantially interested in the Marconi Wireless Company.

Again, and this is of particular interest to Canada:

I was always very much mystified with the attitude of The Times on this question. One is tempted to regard The Times as a national newspaper, although it is perfectly obvious that on frequent occasions it is nothing but a Tory hack. Yesterday I came across a very interesting piece of information. I found that the Hon. R. H. Brand, one of the directors, of The Times, is also a director of Messrs. Lazard Brothers. Another director is Sir Campbell Stuart, who is a member of the imperial wireless conference which is settling the whole thing. I think that is a curious combination, because it includes a member of Lazard Brothers, a member of a great organ of public opinion, and a member of the communicating body. Nevertheless, I go on hoping that from The Times I shall get the truth.

You will notice that Mr. Baker referred to Hon. R. H. Brand, one of the directors of The Times, who was also a director of Lazard Brothers. In this report which has been submitted by the government as the report of the conference of 1928 I find that one of the gentlemen who gave evidence before this committee on behalf of the Canadian Marconi Company was Hon. R. H. Brand, evidently the same gentleman. This goes to show the interlocking character of this whole business. I am sorry to have to repeat what has been said on this question in the British House of Commons, but we should have had all the correspondence tabled here so that we would have been able to form our own conclusions. I quote as follows:

The person of most interest to me in all this business is Mr. Szarvasy, who first came under our notice in 1926, when he appeared in court in connection with a reduction of the Marconi Wireless Company's capital. From 1910 he was no more than a shareholder in this country, so far as is known, but from 1912 he became a substitute director for Baron Springer, of Vienna, and he was a member of the board of the British, Foreign and Colonial Corporation, of which he is to-day the managing director and chairman. When Lord Rothermere formed his Daily Mail Trust, the British, Foreign and Colonial Corporation, through Mr. Szarvasy, issued a mortgage debenture for £9,000,000, when Mr. Szarvasy joined the board of the Daily Mail Trust, thus making one more link in the chain. Mr. Szarvasy is a director of the Dunlop Rubber Company. In April, 1922, he joined the directorate of the Danube Navigation Company, Limited, and he also became a director of the Guardian Assurance Company Limited, and of Martin's Bank Limited. He is also one of the three members of the committee of directors of the Hydro-Electric Securities Corporation of Quebec, along with the late Alfred Loewenstein, of Brussels, and Albert Pam, of J. H. Schroeder and Company. The Hydro-Electric Securities Corporation belongs to the group of interests which control the power used by the Canadian Marconi Company Limited. Baron Springer is still a member of the Anglo-International Bank Limited, which incorporates the business of the old Anglo-Austrian Bank and the British Trade Corporation. Mr. Szarvasy is the chairman of the Anglo-French Banking Corporation, which was formed a few weeks ago with Lord Derby as its president.

There have been one or two recent appointments to the board of the Marconi Company which are worthy of notice. There is Sir Charles Coupar Barrie, who is associated on the directorate of the Danube Navigation Company with Mr. Szarvasy. Sir Coupar Barrie is interesting to me as a member of the Post Office Advisory Council. It is an excellent idea to have gentlemen of this type advising the state as to its best interests. The second addition is that of Mr. F. R. S. Balfour, who was associated on the Guardian Assurance Company with Mr. Szarvasy. Mr. Balfour appears as a member of the Bank of Montreal and the Bank of Montreal in France. This is interesting because. Canadian finance plays an important part in these matters.

When an imperial-owned cable service is transferred to a group of international financiers the house is entitled to all the information at the disposal of the government. It is not enough for the minister in charge to say that this is a secret matter. He has given us three documents which might be secret in their character, but those documents refer to certain other papers which it is important we should have so that in the consideration of this question every hon. member may have the benefit of all information available. The additional documents should be tabled.

Reference was made in those documents to a Mr. Brown, and I would like to know who that gentleman is. He must have been an intermediary of some character during the negotiations of the summer of 1927 between the Post Office Department and the other interests involved.

I strenuously object to the government handing over a government-owned utility which was beginning to show surpluses in its operation after years of deficits. I object to the manner in which this transfer was carried out as, from what I can learn from the documents, it is almost an accomplished fact and the operation of these wireless communications is now in the hands of international financiers. I believe the government has made a bad bargain. The Minister of Justice the other day referred to the fact that we were getting rid of a liability. I do not think the minister was correct in making that statement because the fact is that although money was lost for a considerable period, during the years 1927 and 1928 economies were effected which enabled a considerable surplus to be shown. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, the beam service was handed over to private interests at a time when the government was losing money in the operation of the cable service between the Pacific coast and Australia. I do not know whether it was the Post Office Department or the Department of Marine and Fisheries, but some department issued a license and entered into an agreement with a private company to operate the beam service between this country and Australia. Has there ever been a more absurd or less business-like transaction than that? The government handed over this service to a private corporation to compete with the government in the operation of a utility which had been operated at a loss, but which might under the circumstances have been operated with great success. According to section 18 of the report, the gentlemen who were appointed to inquire into this matter claimed that no crisis had arisen.

I would ask the Postmaster General to refer this matter to one of the standing committees of the house. If that were done the gentlemen who were present in an advisory capacity at the conferences, such as Mr. Edwards of the Department of Marine and Fisheries and Mr. Gaboury of the Post Office Department, could appear before the committee and state the full details of the situation. Evidently the Postmaster General is not in a position at the present time to give the information to the house which the house has a right to expect, and I am going to ask the Postmaster General to refer this matter to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines instead of referring it to the committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee on the bill, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Power to consent to sale.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the Postmaster General tell us who Mr. Brown is?

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot see that there is very much importance attached to the name of Mr. Brown; I do not know who the gentleman is but I will endeavour to find out.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the Postmaster General allow this to stand until he obtains that information?

Mr. LAPOINTE: What has Mr. Brown to do with this bill?

Mr. HEAPS: He has a great deal to do with it.

Mr. VENIOT: He is not connected with the department at all.

Mr. HEAPS: All the more reason why we should know who he is.

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. member has any suspicions he had better express them.

Mr. HEAPS: The information appears in the correspondence that a Mr. Brown was in Canada during 1927. He was in negotiation with certain officials of the government, and

I will again read certain portions of the correspondence which might explain why I want to know who Mr. Brown is. The following appears in the correspondence:

Should there be any change at council, or anything to add, we will cable you—in code, if necessary, using the code which Mr. Brown left with us when here last summer.

I think it is quite evident that Mr. Brown is an important personage. He evidently carried in his possession certain secret codes which he handed over to some official of the Post Office Department. It goes without saying that he must have been acting for some other party. If Mr. Brown acted as an intermediary between the Canadian government and some other party, I want to know who Mr. Brown is and whom he was acting for. Surely that is not an unreasonable question.

Mr. VENIOT: The only person that I or the department had any transaction with in connection with this matter was the representative of Canada on the cable board in London, Sir Campbell Stuart. I know of nobody else.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think any hon. member will claim that I am asking for anything unreasonable. The Postmaster General has said that all the conferences he had were with Sir Campbell Stuart. I take that as being correct; I would not for a moment doubt the statement made by the Postmaster General. But this is a communication from the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General. Evidently he had been in touch with Mr. Brown. Has the house not a right to know whom the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General was negotiating with on such an important question. Why is the house to be denied an answer to my question?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my hon. friend state what Mr. Brown seems to be doing? What is the purport of all this?

Mr. HEAPS: I am sorry that I have not made myself clear to the Minister of Justice. Mr. Brown left in this country some secret codes to be used in case of necessity between this government and other parties interested. I claim that a gentleman who comes to this country and who evidently is in negotiation with the highest officials of the Post Office Department—

Mr. LAPOINTE: The negotiations took place at a conference in London. Was Mr. Brown there? Who is he?

Mr. HEAPS: This makes it all the more confusing and all the more necessary that we should know who Mr. Brown is.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is his first name?

Mr. HEAPS: There is no initial given. This letter is signed by the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General.

Mr. STEVENS: Who is now present.

Mr. VENIOT: I think I have discovered the mysterious Mr. Brown. There was a Mr. Brown engaged in financial arrangements for carrying on the business of the old Pacific board as between companies interested and ourselves, but he had absolutely nothing whatever to do with any negotiations carried on for this merger. That is one Mr. Brown.

Mr. STEVENS: What was his first name?

Mr. VENIOT: I forget the Christian name of the first Mr. Brown, but I have a second Mr. Brown. He is Mr. F. J. Brown, C.B., C.B.E., who is a director and who is among the list of witnesses called at the conference in London in connection with this merger. He was called by the board of trustees, if I may use that term, of the Pacific cable board when they were investigating the condition of affairs in connection with that cable prior to the suggestion of a merger. Those are the only two Browns.

Mr. HEAPS: The Mr. Brown whose name I have here represented the Indo-European Telegraph Company.

Mr. VENIOT: This Mr. F. J. Brown is the man who represents the Indo-European Telegraph Company.

Mr. HEAPS: I understand from the Postmaster General that the other Brown was a gentleman who was here in the summer of 1927 in a financial capacity. I want to know whom he represented, what financial institution if any he represented?

Mr. VENIOT: All the information I have is that he was an accountant of the Pacific cable board, but had nothing whatever to do with the merger.

Mr. HEAPS: The Postmaster General stated a moment or two ago that this Mr. Brown was interested in the financial aspects of the whole question, or he used words to that effect. Am I to understand that he represents the Pacific cable board or another board?

Mr. VENIOT: Which Mr. Brown does my hon. friend mean?

Mr. HEAPS: Not the Brown in that report, not the Brown that gave evidence, but the Brown in this letter of the 4th January. The minister need not try to confuse the matter. It is very simple.

Mr. VENIOT: I am trying to give the hon. gentleman the information, but he has placed on my shoulders a heavy task in distinguishing one Mr. Brown from the other. I have told the hon. gentleman and the committee that the first Mr. Brown, of 1927, had absolutely nothing whatever to do with the merger that has been carried on of the Pacific cable and these other interests. Surely that ought to be satisfactory. As to Mr. F. J. Brown, I am informed that he was connected with the old Pacific cable.

Mr. HEAPS: Whom was he connected with at the time this letter was written by the assistant deputy?

Mr. VENIOT: I have not a copy of the letter from which the hon. member has been reading. Will he let me have it?

Mr. HEAPS: The department of which the Postmaster General is the head has duplicated all the correspondence to make it look as though something were being given to the house. I will send it over.

Mr. NEILL: While Mr. Brown is being paged, might I ask a question of the Minister of Justice? Does he consider section one good law? It says: that the governor in council—that means the government—can sell certain things "in the manner specified in the said act," the said act being the Imperial Telegraphs Act which is named, "and upon the terms set out in the said report," the report being the report of some conference. The report of the conference is not an annex to the bill; neither is the imperial act. I have sent for the imperial act and I have the report that it is not in the library, so that I do not know whether the conference report is an annex to it or not. So far as I know, it is not. Therefore we are committing ourselves to giving the government power to do a very important thing on the terms of an invisible report of a conference. Fifty years from now, when this comes to be interpreted, that report may not be in existence or not available. This is a very important matter. The members of the house do not seem to appreciate the point of view expressed by the hon. member for North Winnipeg. Does the Minister of Justice not think we should have as an appendix to the act or embodied in the act, the actual terms upon which this important transaction is taking place?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand both the report and the imperial act have been laid on the table. I agree that perhaps it would be more convenient if the act had been printed as an annex to this bill. I do not, however, think it is essential that this should be done.

Mr. NEILL: We can find the imperial act at any time and it will be in existence for all time. But the report, which is simply a blue book of the Canadian government, may be here to-day and undiscoverable to-morrow; it may be like this Mr. Brown. I submit that it ought to be embodied in the act or be an annex to it. This act is nothing at all; it is simply a permission to the government to go out and sell something to the world at large. It is limited only by the terms of the imperial act and by the terms of this conference. There is a report somewhere. We do not have it. It is not in the act and it should be an annex to the act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If it be a mistake, the mistake was also made in the Imperial parliament, because the imperial act also refers to and is really based upon that report.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not often that I find myself so wholly in accord with the hon member for Comox-Alberni, but in this instance I do incline to the belief, although it might mean a little extra printing, that it would be desirable to put upon the statute books as an annex the authority upon which the legislation proceeds. I think the Minister of Justice will agree that the point is rather well taken.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think it would be better, but as my hon. friend knows, there was some urgency in introducing this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree, and it was because of that that I hesitated to say anything at all about it, but I apprehend that the government has intimated that it will execute this agreement in any event. I think the hon. member for Argenteuil made it perfectly clear the other day that the government, if one might say so without offence, cannot do anything else. The other partners having concluded to dispose of the assets of the enterprise in a certain manner, this partner in a general way has also to do it. I can see no other way out of it myself. But inasmuch as the urgency has passed for the moment, inasmuch as the government has intimated, I assume, that it proposes to do in good faith whatever may be necessary to give effect to the arrangement arrived at by the partners who own the undertaking, I think it would not be too difficult to add as a schedule to the act the report. I think the suggestion is certainly a sound one. It is one which in times past I have urged upon legislatures and parliaments, so that anyone who picks up legislation for the purpose of ascertaining what it means shall be able without reference to any other document to find out exactly what was done and why. Might we not, without delaying the legislation, add as an annex to it such further documents as would enable the causes operating in the mind of this parliament in arriving at the conclusion it did to be stated in the legislation itself?

While I am on my feet, I must say that I think the inquiry made by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) as to who Mr. Brown is is an entirely pertinent one.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Supose my hon. friend the Postmaster General moves that the two documents should be annexed to the bill. We could do that now.

Mr. VENIOT: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BENNETT: Probably one should be schedule "A" and the other schedule "B", because one is a report and the other is a statute. The imperial act should probably be schedule "A" and the report schedule "B".

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no objection to that.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not want to be factious or captious, but I think when the hon. member for North Winnipeg asked who Mr. Brown was, in view of the correspondence and what it indicates, he was not going beyond his rights. It seems to me that when any member of parliament in connection with legislation of this kind finds correspondence indicating that a gentleman by a certain name has undertaken to play a very considerable part in connection with certain financial transactions, the minister in charge of the bill should be in a position to indicate who the gentleman is and why he comes into the transaction. Surely the department must have known who Mr. Brown was, or else Mr. Brown would not have left the secret code. It does occur to me that a member of parliament, if he were making a just and proper inquiry in order that he might be informed in relation to the matter, might properly expect the minister in charge to indicate who Mr. Brown was.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He got his answer, unless we are to produce Mr. Brown as schedule "C".

Mr. BENNETT: That is not quite good enough.

Mr. NEILL: The Canadian terminus of the Pacific cable is in the district I represent, at a place called Bamfield. I would like to know if these employees of the board who entered the service somewhat as if they were entering the government service with the prospect of continuity of service, pension, and so forth, will in the transfer have their rights as to continuity of service, salary, and pension safeguarded.

Mr. VENIOT: That is to be found in the agreement which will be signed by the contracting parties. I have a skeleton of the agreement here.

Mr. NEILL: Is the agreement to be embodied as an appendix to the bill?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. NEILL: How am I to find out if the interests of these employees are being safeguarded?

Mr. VENIOT: While I have not got the details at hand at the present moment, I can let my hon. friend have all those details.

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps the Postmaster General would say whether steps have been taken to look fully after their rights.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: In what manner is that provision being made? Let us have the details.

Mr. VENIOT: The agreement provides that the company shall take over the existing staff of the board subject to and in accordance with the provisions set out in the second schedule thereof.

Mr. NEILL: Could not the agreement be laid on the table?

Mr. HEAPS: Why not table the other correspondence?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The agreement is not published yet.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think it should be tabled until all the parties have signed.

Mr. GEARY: Who are the parties to the agreement and what is it all about?

Mr. STEVENS: The chairman was just about to call section 1 carried, but if these schedules are to be added, section 1 will have to be amended by adding after the words "chapter 7" the words "as set forth in schedule A attached hereto," and by adding after the word "report" the words "schedule B." I understand that it would require one of the ministers of the crown to move this amendment.

Mr. HEAPS: I would suggest that the minister report progress so that all the information desired by the committee can be made available when the bill is taken up again. In the meantime perhaps he would find out who Mr. Brown is.

Mr. VENIOT: I have already given the information touching Mr. Brown.

Mr. HEAPS: No.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot see what other information I can give. I have already stated that Mr. Brown was connected with the Pacific cable board, that he was an officer of that board. I might add that when he came to Canada he accompanied Sir Campbell Stuart, and while on this side they visited and inspected the West Indies cable system.

Mr. HEAPS: When was that?

Mr. VENIOT: That was long before the merger was contemplated.

Mr. HEAPS: This was early in 1927, I presume?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, there was no merger contemplated at that time or even suggested.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know whether the minister intends proceeding further just now with the bill. When Mr. Brown came to this country with Sir Campbell Stuart in the spring or summer of 1927, I should like to know whom he represented. He was one of the men behind the scenes of whom very little was heard subsequently. However, when he returned to England, he left a secret code in case it might be necessary for the Post Office Department to communicate with him. I think under those circumstances he assumed a position of importance. He evidently had a good deal to do with shaping the policy of the government. I do not know whether he was an Englishman, a Frenchman or what. We should like to be informed where he came from and what he is engaged in at the present time.

Mr. VENIOT: The only information I have before me is that Mr. Brown lives in London, England. He came here from London. So far as the secret code is concerned, my assistant deputy informs me that, while no merger was contemplated, at the time, there were communications with Sir Campbell Stuart, the representative of Canada on the cable board in London, and this code was so arranged that whatever passed between our representative and the department here would be secret. That is the information I get from the gentleman who apparently signed this with the title of "Assistant Deputy Postmaster General."

Mr. STEVENS: Whom did Mr. Brown represent? That is the point.

Mr. VENIOT: I am told when he came over here he acted as Sir Campbell Stuart's secretary and returned with him to London.

Mr. STEVENS: Have you his initials?

Mr. VENIOT: No, we have not.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the minister know if this Mr. Brown is in any way connected with financial institutions that are interested in private cable corporations?

Mr. VENIOT: No, I do not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I move, in order to give effect to the suggestion of my hon. friend from Vancouver:

That the words "as set forth in schedule A hereto" be added after the words "chapter 7" in the fourth line of section 1; and the words "as set forth in schedule B hereto" be added after the word "report" at the end of section 1.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. HEAPS: Before the amendment carries, I should like to know who recommended to the department the name of Sir Campbell Stuart to act for Canada?

Mr. VENIOT: As I remember, it was done by order in council.

Mr. HEAPS: How did his name come to the government?

Mr. LAPOINTE: He has represented Canada on the Pacific board for years, and naturally was the man who should be appointed in a commission of this kind.

Mr. VENIOT: I know he was a member of that board when I took charge of the department. I had an interview with him before he left for London.

Mr. HEAPS: Did the government at any time receive a report from Sir Campbell Stuart making any recommendation with respect to: what should be the policy in regard to the Pacific cables?

Mr. VENIOT: We did receive a recommendation based on the investigation held. He was a member of the investigating committee and the recommendation is contained in the report.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there any objection to tabling the report Sir Campbell Stuart made to the government?

Mr. VENIOT: We have no objection to raise to what he recommended to us.

Mr. HEAPS: No, I am asking if there is any objection to tabling the report which Sir Campbell Stuart made to the Dominion government as to his ideas on this subject.

Mr. VENIOT: The only report we have that I know of is the report of this commission which has been laid on the table, and of which I believe the hon. gentleman has a copy. We certainly did not take objection to any of the recommendations made in that report.

Mr. HEAPS: But did not Sir Campbell Stuart make any recommendations to the government? Or did he just simply sign the report and submit it to the government? I think it is customary in a case of this character where so much is involved that the gentleman representing the Dominion government should make a separate report to his government as to what his attitude was on the question.

Mr. VENIOT: No, there is nothing that I have other than what was contained in the correspondence laid on the table. There is some correspondence in connection with the one matter of the merger, which the home government will not allow us to make public yet, nor will the other contracting parties. Apart from that, I have laid everything on the table.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister available for the house a statement showing the receipts and expenditures of the Pacific cable board including the receipts and expenditures for the last two years?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, I think we have.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister give it to the house?

Mr. VENIOT: I have not got it with me. I did not think the question would arise, otherwise I would have had it on hand. Certainly I think the report given with the details it contains, which have been submitted to the house, would be sufficient in that respect. If the hon. gentleman is determined to delay the passage of the bill by his insistent demand, I will endeavour to see what I can do to obtain the information.

Mr. HEAPS: I think it is only fair. There is no particular hurry for this bill.

Mr. VENIOT: There is an absolute rush.

Mr. HEAPS: That is rather surprising, Mr. Chairman. A couple of weeks ago we had no idea this bill was to be introduced. Members of the house were not even to be consulted in the matter. To-day we are asked to pass a bill regarding which the Postmaster General himself has not the particulars. I ask for the information because there has been a difference of opinion between the Minister of Justice and myself regarding certain financial matters pertaining to the Pacific cable board. The minister stated that the last year or so the cable board was losing money.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: I may be permitted to read this extract from the British Hansard of November 21, 1928. It is from a speech by Mr. Baker. He says:

> My information is that although the traffic receipts on the Pacific cables for 1927-28 were down by £80,000 as compared with the previous year, that is about 17 per cent, the expenditure was reduced by about £32,000, and despite the drop in receipts, which was mainly in the cheaper traffic, the surplus available for division between the governments was £42,100, after devoting £77,544 to the payment of interest and repayment of capital and placing £10,000 to reserve account.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is what I said. If my hon. friend reads my remarks of the other day he will find that those are exactly the figures I gave. As a matter of fact, from 1903 to 1916 there was a period of deficit, and the share which the government of Canada had to pay on those deficits amounted to $900,000. From 1916 the period of surpluses began. And they were to some extent large surpluses—so much so that at one time the board decided to duplicate its cable from the Fiji islands to British Columbia, against the protests of the Canadian government, who pointed out that wireless would be a strong factor in competition as against the cable. The result has shown this to have been the fact, and since 1927, since the beam has been put into operation, the profits have dwindled. May I say to my hon. friend at once that he is wrong when he says that it is the Canadian Marconi Wireless who are responsible for this; it is the big main wireless between England and Australia, which has been a great factor in the competition. That wireless is owned at one end by the British government and at the other end by the Amalgamated Wireless, the majority of the shares in which are owned by the Australian government. The Canadian Wireless came afterwards; and surely my hon. friend does not object to there being a wireless in Canada and from Canada.

The profits in 1926-27 were £100,000, but the following year, 1927-28, as my hon. friend has read from the British Hansard, the profits had come down to £42,000, and for 1928-29 zero is anticipated owing to the decrease in business.

I do not see why there should be such objection on the part of my hon. friend to this bill. After all, Canada entered the scheme by way of contributing to imperial intercommunication; it was done at a time when it was necessary, not so much in the Canadian interests, because our share, so far as the sending of cables was concerned, was very small in comparison with communication between England, Australia and New Zealand; but the Canadian government years ago undertook to contribute to imperial intercommunication. We paid a large amount of money as our contribution thereto, and happily, from 1916 until two or three years ago, it proved a more profitable investment, so that we ceased to pay towards deficits. But when the beam wireless was put into operation it became manifest that there would be a reversion to the former condition and that the Canadian government would have to pay every year a certain sum towards the deficits which it was admitted would ensue from the competition of the wireless. We have everything that was contemplated when we undertook to pay our share towards imperial intercommunication, and to-day the companies remain British; it has been seen to that they shall be under British control at all times.

Mr. NEILL: Is there control of rates?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Rates are controlled through an advisory committee on which Canada is being represented. More than that, on the board of directors of the merger there will be two representatives to be selected by the Imperial government. In short, we have everything without paying anything, and we are getting back $700,000 of the $900,000 which we paid during the period of deficits. And the other governments of the empire have agreed to that; they have passed legislation to that effect. We are interested only to a certain extent We were interested in the payment of deficits in this proportion: Canada 5, England 5, Australia 6 and New Zealand 2; 5/18 was our share. All others agreed to this scheme. We are going to enjoy every benefit that may come to us because of cable and wireless facilities and we do not pay anything. Why should we object to the scheme?

Mr. HEAPS: I wish I could be as enthusiastic about the proposal as the Minister of Justice is. The control which the government have in this whole matter is more apparent than real. As a matter of fact, the two representatives who, the minister says, are to be nominated by the British government, may sit only with the consent of the new company that is being formed, and if these two representatives whom the British government may appoint do not meet with the approval of the new company they will have no right to sit on the board. Moreover, what control can two representatives exercise on a board of this kind comprising thirteen, especially when the two must be nominated subject to the approval of that board? I say, therefore, that the control is not very real.

As regards rates, there is little control. According to the statements that have been made there is some arrangement whereby rates are not to be increased for a certain time, but there is nothing about reducing the rates; not at all. Personally I cannot see very much in the argument of the minister. It is true that there were deficits for a number of years until 1916. But just at the moment when they are showing a surplus it is decided to sell out. When all the pioneer work has been done, when the years of struggle have been passed which have been spent in making the Pacific cable board a success, then they sell out.

There is another point which the minister never touched, and that is that the government themselves issued a license to a private company—I do not know just what it is called—to operate a beam system between this country and Australia in competition with our own cable system. If there is to be a loss, as the minister has pointed out—if as he says a loss on the cable system is inevitable—is there any reason why this government could not own and operate a beam wireless between this country and Australia? What is to prevent it? Nothing, except the question of policy. The beam wireless, I would point out, is a huge success from every point of view. It can transmit messages at two-thirds of the rates charged by the cable companies, and at the same time it makes for greater efficiency; furthermore, it shows a large surplus over operation expenses. If this is the case, was there any reason why in 1926 a license should have been issued or permission given by the government to a private concern to operate a beam wireless between this country and Australia?

Mr. LAPOINTE: At that time the beam wireless was in operation between England and Australia quite independently of any license given the Canadian Marconi.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, and operated by the British Post Office.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is where the profits went.

Mr. HEAPS: They got the profits and not the private company; and now it is proposed to hand the enterprise and profits over to a private corporation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There was no private company operating between England and Australia, at least not with regard to the beam wireless.

Mr. HEAPS: There was a private company operating the cables, although a large amount of the stock was owned by the Australian government. The beam system, of course, was operated by the British Post Office Department; they were getting the profits and the private companies were losing money, so the companies said that unless some arrangement was made, they would be forced out of business, and they threatened the British government that they might have to sell out to American interests. That threat worked with the British government and apparently it has worked with the government here as well.

My friend the Minister of Justice says the system is entirely under British control, but I would venture to assert that this cable merger is at least one-third under foreign control at present. I do not think there can be any dispute as to that in view of the interlocking directorates which I discussed this afternoon. There are people of foreign extraction—whether or not they are British subjects I do not know—connected with this cable merger; American interests are interlocked with it and consequently I do not believe the idea that it is entirely under British control is entirely in accordance with the facts.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is one of the conditions of the whole transaction, that British control shall be guaranteed.

Mr. HEAPS: Control may only mean 51 per cent of the total stock, a majority control rather than an absolute control.

Mr. LAPOINTE: More than that, there is a provision that in a time of emergency the government will be able to take over the whole system.

Mr. HEAPS: Does not the minister think that in view of what is involved in this question and in view of the importance of these communications in time of emergency, we should have had all this information before us in order at least to form an intelligent opinion? I may be wrong in some of the facts I stated but surely we can expect nothing else when no information is presented to the house.

Mr. NEILL: I have studied this question to quite an extent, and as far as I know the statement made by the Minister of Justice is substantially correct. We may be assured that the British government will take care to ensure British control of this system; we may leave that to the British government, and I certainly understood that to be the arrangement. The fatal mistake was made when this Pacific cable board, under the direction of some gentleman in England quite unadapted to the position, to put it mildly, embarked on the project of duplicating the cable against the firm opposition of the Canadian government and of the then Postmaster General, Hon. Charles Murphy. Had his views prevailed at that time there is no doubt that we would not be in this position at present. At the very time when money was becoming available for distribution to the shareholders, so to speak, or the different portions of the British Empire, the board embarked upon this duplication of the cable in spite of the fact impressed upon them by the Canadian government that the beam system was just coming into operation, and certainly should have been tried out first. The result is that we have this white elephant on our hands, and I think the arrangement made by the different governments concerned is a good arrangement. The hon. member for North Winnipeg says there was a profit last year. That is so, but it was a diminishing profit; the full effect of the competition of beam wireless has not been felt as yet.

Then there is another element which would affect the situation further in future with regard to the competition of beam wireless. At present in the transmission of messages by beam wireless there is a condition called fading; at certain periods of the day which cannot be foreseen reception fades out entirely. The beam wireless people accept messages for Australia at the rate which would prevail if all the traffic were handled by the beam system; when this fading commences, in order to keep up their record for rapid delivery they turn over their business to the cable board at the full cable rate for the period of the fading. As a result the cable board makes a profit and the beam wireless company loses heavily on that particular business, because they must pay the full cable rate although they only receive the reduced wireless rate on the whole business. There is no question but that with the advance of science it will be only a short time before this fading will be overcome, and when that is accomplished the position of the cable board financially would be very poor indeed. So, if the Canadian government comes out of the business financially as well as the Minister of Justice says will be the case, with the protection of rates guaranteed by the British government, I think the best we can do is to accept the situation and the bill as it is presented here.

There are features about the whole proceeding which I know are not as satisfactory as they should be; there have been suggestions that some of the competing companies had too much to do with the negotiations, but at any rate this whole business was arranged with the consent of the British government and the other dominions, who presumably knew what they were doing, so I think our best plan is to accept the situation and let the bill go through.

Mr. HEAPS: I asked for some information from the Postmaster General in reference to the financial standing of the Pacific cable board, and I wonder if he has that information available as yet?

Mr. VENIOT: I am told that quite a bit of work is necessary in order to secure this information and that it will take some time to complete. Would the hon. gentleman be satisfied to allow this bill to go through on my undertaking to produce the information later? It will take more than a day to obtain what he desires, because we will have to go over all the traffic accounts and everything submitted to the department, and that will mean a good deal of work.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not wish to hold up the bill but I do think we should have had all this information some time ago in order to allow us to discuss this question more intelligently. However, perhaps the Postmaster General can tell me something about the contract entered into between the government and the company operating the beam system between Canada and Australia?

Mr. VENIOT: That information will have to come from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, as far as I know.

Mr. HEAPS: Was a license issued by the Department of Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. VENIOT: I believe that is the only department with authority to issue such licenses, but I do not know whether or not such a license was issued.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill as amended reported.

Amendments read the first and second times and concurred in.

Mr. VENIOT moved the third reading of the bill.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I did not wish to interrupt the discussion when the bill was in committee, but I deem it advisable to place on record the reason why our government has been anxious to proceed with the measure and not occasion delay through waiting to bring down some of the further information which has been requested. As my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) knows, the sale of the Pacific cable is a matter which concerns the British government, the Australian government, the New Zealand government and the Canadian government; all these governments met together through their representatives and concluded the arrangement which is now before this house. The British government naturally was anxious to conclude this transaction before its present term of office was up, and the reason we have been handicapped in the matter of securing much of the data is because it is only within the last day or two that the business has been finally concluded. The parliament in Great Britain has been dissolved and it is unknown just what government may be in office after the next general election. The present administration is anxious that this transaction should be completed before that particular unknown period is reached. If we were to delay our consent to the agreement, we might be assuming the responsibility of upsetting a transaction which three other governments have already approved of and assented to, and which we believe to be in the interest of Canada. There would be, too, the possibility of returning to the position we were in a year or two ago when instead of assets to the government's credit we were confronted with increasing liabilities.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the third time and passed.

WESTERN POSTAL EMPLOYEES

READJUSTMENT OF SALARIES OF THOSE DISMISSED AND REEMPLOYED

The house resumed from May 6 consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Veniot—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide for the readjustment of the salaries of certain postal employees in western Canada who were dismissed in 1919 and subsequently re-employed, to give them the benefit of salary they would have received had they re-entered the service in the class equivalent to the one they were in when dismissed, and of subsequent salary revisions, and to make provision whereby certain former employees not now in the said service shall be eligible for reappointment as vacancies occur.

Mr. VENIOT: When this resolution was before the committee certain interpretations were placed upon it, and those interpretations, if correct, did not meet with the views I had expressed to the house in connection with this matter. Since that time the matter has received considerable attention and I propose to move the following amendment:

That the proposed resolution be amended by striking out all the words after "them" in the third line thereof, and substituting the following:

"payment as from the date of their reemployment for services actually performed at the rates of remuneration paid to other employees for similar services."

The amendment would then read:

Resolved that it is expedient to provide for the readjustment of the salaries of certain postal employees in western Canada who were dismissed in 1919 and subsequently reemployed to give them payment as from the date of their reemployment for services actually performed at the rates of remuneration paid to other employees for similar services.

If the legislation proposed by this resolution is enacted it is our purpose to work out a system in order to determine what would be coming to each employee who had gone out on strike and then returned. It is my intention that the Civil Service Commission be requested to appoint a man to work in conjunction with an official of the Post Office department, perhaps the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General, to arrive at the amounts, if any, which would be due to the different persons whose names apear on the list of ninety-six submitted to the house.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Veniot thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 252, respecting certain employees of the postal or railway mail service of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 7, to amend the Civil Service Act (Private Secretaries).

Mr. STEVENS: Explain.

Mr. RINFRET: The amendments proposed by the senate are purely technical. Section 60, subsection 1 of the act reads as follows:

Any person may be appointed by a minister of the crown or other member of the government to be his private secretary,

[Mr. Veniot.]

In the amendment submitted at the beginning of the session, which was passed by the house, the following words appeared, "and in the event of the minister" without stating "or other member of the government," and the amendment proposed by the senate makes subsection 2 of the section agree with subsection 1.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): This bill was called to my attention by certain of the civil servants of Ottawa. Under the Civil Service Act an employee expects promotion from year to year, and it seems to me that if private secretaries are taken into the service when the ministers leave and employed as chief clerks they would be preventing the promotion of those under them. We should have some information from the minister as to what hardship is likely to be imposed upon those already in the service.

Mr. RINFRET: The house has already approved of the principle of this bill, and I think on a previous occasion I made an observation on the very point the hon. member now raises. If a minister takes from the service one who is to be employed as his secretary, and that person remains as his secretary for three or four years, in the meanwhile the work of the department must be done and naturally the positions will be filled. I have explained before that it does not matter very much to the civil service whether you employ a man already in the service or one from outside. If this bill carries, it means only that when a minister retires his secretary becomes a member of the civil service. If the minister had taken a person from the service instead of from outside, that person would go back into the service just the same. It will be for the commission and the department, of course, to adjust the situation, but it is expected that this will not occur very frequently.

Mr. STEVENS: Very few cases.

Mr. RINFRET: It will apply to only a few cases. I think the house was unanimous in approving the bill, and I desire to repeat that the amendment made by the senate does not add a single individual to the scope of the bill, but merely provides for a clearer wording of it.

Mr. SPENCER: Has there been any opposition to this bill from the organized civil service?

Mr. RINFRET: None has come to my notice.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFUNDING OF MATURING OBLIGATIONS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting the Canadian National Railways to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations, and to issue substituted securities therefor guaranteed by the Dominion as to principal and interest, but not exceeding $18,000,000, the aggregate face value of the original securities.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not rising to voice any objections to providing ample finances for the Canadian National Railways. The resolution however, affords an opportunity of my presenting to the committee some facts which I think the committee ought to have in mind in dealing with this and other similar resolutions. It will be noted that another resolution on the order paper provides for $50,000,000 for Montreal terminals, and there are perhaps half a dozen or more other bills providing for the purchase of certain railway lines. We also have before us the estimates of the railway department, calling for a capital expenditure of $53,000,000 and so on. I want simply to bring to the attention of the committee and of the house the commitments of the next year or thereabouts in connection with this great undertaking.

Before addressing myself to that technical phase of my remarks, may I observe that we have recently, in the special committee on national railways and shipping, given considerable study to the position of the national railways and listneed to most elaborate reports from the president and his officers—and I may interpolate that the president and his staff undoubtedly came before that committee exceedingly well equipped to give to the committee the fullest information. But the study of this information, the consideration of the various phases of the undertaking, impressed most of us, I think, with the gigantic character of it. Perhaps we are prone to pass over a little too lightly many of the commitments that come before the house. It might be advisable just to call attention to the fact that the Canadian National Railways, as reorganized and brought into their present combined or composite condition, constitute a system that is larger than the Canadian Pacific system as regards mileage. It is a tremendous undertaking. As the net revenues increase, we naturally congratulate ourselves. During the last several years there has been a tendency on both sides of the house—I am speaking particularly for this side—to give to the government, and to the minister who asks, on behalf of the railway, for appropriations, a pretty generous response. I note, for instance, that the minister will come before parliament, present a very heavy item and indicate that this has had the consideration of the management, who recommend it. These recommendations have been received with favour and have been given every consideration, and I think the minister would be one of the first to state that we have given every reasonable consideration to his presentations of that character. But as they come sometimes in this form of individual items, we are prone to forget the magnitude not only of the undertaking in its physical state but of the many obligations that we are incurring from time to time. I wish to give to the committee—and what I shall say now will apply as well to resolution No. 32 for the $50,000,000 for the Montreal terminals—a picture of some of the country's commitments to the railway for the immediate future.

There is a carry-over from last year of $40,000,000 of capital expenditure which was provided for by the Canadian National Railways by borrowing from the banks, I think last October, for a period of six months, and this was renewed on April 15 for a further period of six months. To provide for the capital expenditures for 1929 a further sum of $100,000,000 is required. I am just giving the general outline of the figures.

Mr. DUNNING: Including refunding, of course.

Mr. STEVENS: Not in the $100,000,000. I will give the items of that in a moment. This, together with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and the West Indies service, another $2,000,000, makes a total of about $145,000,000. In order that I may not be thought to be giving these figures recklessly, let me quote from the evidence of Sir Henry Thornton before the special committee. I am reading from page 117 of that committee's records:

Sir Henry Thornton: I can tell you what our total requirements are, item by item.

Hon. Mr. Stevens: Then let us have them.

Sir Henry Thornton: The Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway, $2,500,000; Quebec, Montreal and Southern, $6,000,000; Inverness Railway and Coal Company, $375,000; Quebec, Oriental and Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railway, $3,500,000; The Kent Northern Railway, $60,000; 1927-1930 branch line program, $1,500,000; new branch lines now before parliament, approximately, $1,500,000; 1929 budget, $53,750,000; Manitoba Northern Railway, $7,000,000; loan account, Central Vermont bonds, $8,609,000; temporary borrowings from bank, $40,000,000; new equipment, $18,000,000; all of which make a total of $142,794,000.

There is included in the $53,000,000 certain requirements which I shall not analyse at the moment. To the figures already given there must be added approximately $1,000,000 for the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and approximately $1,000,000 for the West Indies service, or $2,000,000, bringing the total to $145,000,000, which will have to be provided for this year by some form of financing.

But that is not the whole story. There is accruing due by June of next year, within about a year from now—we must bear in mind that approximately half of this year has now passed, and that the railway operates on the calendar year, not the fiscal year—the following securities:

4½ per cent 5 year gold bonds, Canadian National, February 15, 1930	$18,000,000
4 per cent consolidated debenture bonds, Canadian Northern, June 30, 1930 (Manitoba guaranteed)	10,785,000
4 per cent Ontario division bonds, Canadian Northern, June 30, 1930	5,700,000
4½ per cent Ontario division bonds, Canadian Northern, June 30, 1930	61,000
4 per cent first mortgage debenture stock, Canadian Northern, June 30, 1930	2,860,000
4½ per cent Prince Albert branch bonds, Canadian Northern, unguaranteed, June 30, 1930	300,000

There must be added to that a further sum, namely, the $10,000,000 estimated as being required in connection with the $50,000,000 vote for the Montreal terminals. That $10,000,000 may not be required for the balance of this year, but within one year at least it may reasonably be estimated as required. That, together with the $142,000,000 previously given, brings the figures up to the enormous total of $192,000,000.

But by June next one-half of the railway year will have expired, and provision will have to be made in the early part of next session, as provision has already been made this session, for the current year's capital expenditures. Estimated on the basis of the railway expenditures for the past few years, that will amount to another $35,000,000, which will have to be authorized by parliament like the sum we have in the estimates to-day. That would bring the total up to $227,000,000 which we might properly say the Canadian National railways must raise or finance for the year from now until June, 1930. That is an enormous sum of money, Mr. Chairman. These funds will be raised by guaranteed bonds; that is, the railway will issue its securities which will be guaranteed by the government. It is true that part of this sum may be raised in the way this $40,000,000 is being carried at the moment, by borrowing from the banks, but that is only temporary financing. Sir Henry Thornton indicated that it was his intention to take care of that $40,000,000 temporarily borrowed from the banks as early as could reasonably be done. So we may say that the Canadian National railways must go into the money markets during the next twelve months for the enormous sum of $227,000,000. They will do that, of course, with the assistance of the Minister of Finance; that is, the Minister of Finance, acting for the government, will guarantee the bonds of the railway.

But we find that the Minister of Finance has also some obligations maturing. I checked these figures up with the Finance department this morning and I find that during this year there is accruing due in August next a 5½ per cent bond loan of $60,000,000; in February next, 4½ per cent securities amounting to $20,000,000, and in the latter part of next year, 4 per cent bonds, three-year treasury notes, amounting to $45,000,000. Part of that $45,000,000 comes due beyond June, 1930, but it will have to be provided for. There is an additional $125,000,000 which must be raised. A substantial portion of this amount the Minister of Finance in his budget speech indicated he expected to retire out of consolidated fund surplus. We have then facing the financial experts of the country the raising of these two enormous figures, $227,000,000 for railway purposes, and $125,000,000 of the country's obligations, making a total of $352,000,000. I would just in passing indicate that this $352,000,000 amounts to more than the whole national debt of Canada in the pre-war period.

Where is this money coming from? We look to the New York market for the raising of this money; there is no doubt of that. I understand that some indication has been given that possibly we might look to London for part of this financing. I am bringing this to the attention of the committee and of parliament not for the purpose of reflecting in any way on the Canadian National Railways, but with this idea: When the railway committee are studying, as they will study several of these resolutions and bills—not this one but some of the others—which will obligate this country to the expenditure of large sums of money for the purchase of small railways in different sections of the country, and when they come to examine the Montreal terminals bill, which will require an expenditure of $50,000,000, I suggest that they consider at that time the total obligations of the national railways for the next twelve months period.

May I be permitted, not that I want to digress and discuss another resolution, but merely to make this picture complete, to refer to the Montreal terminals? I am not referring to that project with the suggestion that the work in Montreal should not be proceeded with, because I want to postulate this at once. Montreal undoubtedly must have additional terminal facilities at the earliest possible moment, because the present terminals in Montreal are a disgrace to the railways. Let us bear in mind that the Canadian Northern terminals in Montreal represent a capital obligation—for which this country has assumed full responsibility, and will undoubtedly pay —of $18,000,000; I refer to the Canadian Northern mountain tunnel terminal, which will become part of the main terminal. It is proposed this year to authorize a further expenditure for the Montreal terminals of $50,000,000. I think any thoughtful member will agree with me when I say that when you enter upon a scheme estimated to cost, say, $50,000,000, you may reasonably expect that ultimately the project will cost much more than that sum. I think that all who have discussed it agree with that statement. So I suggest that with the $18,000,000 in the tunnel terminal, with the proposed $50,000,000, which would make $68,000,000, we may anticipate the cost of the Montreal terminals to reach the enormous sum of approximately $80,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. friend. I think he would be well within the mark in making that statement, if he included the cost of the present old Grand Trunk facilities there and the Moreau street property of the old Canadian Northern, which of course were not included in the tunnel scheme. Our total commitment, including the new $50,000,000, would probably be at least $80,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: So we can say between $80,000,000 and $100,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Including what has already been invested.

Mr. STEVENS: Including what is already there.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not saying that the most favourable consideration should not be given to the problem, but I do say if we are to authorize such an enormous expenditure, then the committee that takes hold of this legislation when it leaves the house should give to it the most careful study and be perfectly sure that the most economical form of development has been adopted. I pause just to say this to the minister and to pass it on to the committee for what it may be worth; for it is a different committee from that which considers Canadian National Railway matters—it is the regular standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. In passing I suggest this might have gone to the other committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I would have preferred that course, but it was not possible.

Mr. STEVENS: The other committee has all the information before it. That is why I am anxious to give expression to these views this afternoon. I do not wish in any way to disparage the standing or reputation of Mr. Palmer. I understand the terminals which have been suggested have been planned by the railway engineers, but that their plans have been modified or changed somewhat by Mr. Palmer and now bear his imprimatur as an expert. Mr. Palmer is, as far as I know, an estuarial engineer, that is, an engineer who has made a specialty of that branch of engineering dealing with difficult streams and currents and so forth—a very, very important branch of engineering—but he is not necessarily a city passenger or freight terminal engineer which is a vastly different thing.

Mr. DUNNING: He is.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister indicates that he is. I cannot put my opinion in opposition to that of the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, it is not a matter of the opinion of either of us, but a matter of fact. I shall be glad to give my hon. friend information in respect to the very large railway schemes on which Mr. Palmer has been engaged. I will discuss that on the Montreal terminals resolution.

Mr. STEVENS: The reason I am reciting it now is to get the whole of the picture together. But I submit very great care should be taken—

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: —not necessarily to accept Mr. Palmer's dictum as the final word in this matter. We are going to authorize the expenditure of a huge sum for these terminals, in addition to these enormous obligations of $227,000,000 to which I have referred. It should be further borne in mind when we are considering this matter that a terminal of this character produces very little revenue in itself. Undoubtedly it contributes to facilitating the despatch of business, but the passenger end of it unquestionably will be a total loss, or at least a charge against the freight revenues of the railway system, because the passenger revenue I do not think at the present time any more than about breaks even. So the freight revenues of the Canadian National Railways will have to bear the fixed charges of these enormously expensive terminals. Therefore no plan should be adopted without the most careful scrutiny and study.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: There does arise in my mind a question whether this year we should actually authorize and proceed with the expenditure of money on that terminal, or whether it should not be studied for a further period of a year. The minister will be able to state—if he will just give ear to this as I pass along—whether I am right or wrong, but my information is that the railway traffic engineers and the railway construction engineers made certain plans, and that these plans have been modified or changed by Mr. Palmer. I will not say against their wishes, but leave it at that—they have been changed by him. I would be inclined to trust pretty well the opinion of Canadian engineers who have lived and grown up with Canadian railway traffic rather than that of an outside expert, unless that expert can be shown to have had wider experience in traffic similar to that which would occur in a Canadian terminal.

Mr. DUNNING: I may dispose of that if my hon. friend will permit me. I share with him in appreciation of the qualities of the engineering assistance which the Canadian National system has been able to assemble, and I can say on behalf of those engineers that all of the suggestions which Mr. Palmer made are not only accepted by them, but are enthusiastically supported. Mr. Palmer testifies to the ability which has been displayed in the drafting of these plans. In fact he said to Sir Henry Thornton and myself: "Naturally as a matter of vanity I should like to have evolved a plan which would be described as the 'Palmer plan' but after carefully going into it I am in a position to say that your engineers have taken into account every possible factor. I have only this and that suggestion to make with respect to the detailed working out of the major plan as affecting the Canadian National."

Mr. STEVENS: I am glad to hear that. But let me again emphasize the necessity for great care, because once a plan is adopted, property acquired, and progress in construction made, it will be exceedingly costly and difficult to change or modify such a plan.

Mr. DUNNING: I agree.

Mr. STEVENS: I have already intimated that a terminal of this character is not usually a revenue producing unit; almost invariably it is a load upon the freight revenues of the system. But in a city such as Montreal I believe it would be possible to adopt a plan in the development of which revenues might be produced in the improving of properties and the establishing of business contiguous to the terminal.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: I submit again that the committee of parliament having this in hand should take great care that a survey of that feature be exhausted before any plan is finally adopted.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not my intention to delay the minister or to offer criticism of his predecessor, but merely to present these enormous commitments—which as I have indicated, amount for the railway in the next twelve months to the huge sum of $227,000,000—and to ask parliament, and particularly the committee which from now on will have these various matters before them, to scrutinize with the utmost care the proposals that are made and to see that nothing is passed or adopted that is in any sense unnecessary or may well be put off. Furthermore, parliament and the country should be impressed with the magnitude of this undertaking, which calls for the expenditure of this huge sum, a portion of which of course is for renewals. I had intended to say that, in respect to some of these renewals, securities which at present are unguaranteed will become Canadian government guaranteed securities. For instance, the Prince Albert one; and I am not sure whether this $18,000,000 is at present guaranteed.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: It is guaranteed. And then we have the Manitoba one. It is not guaranteed by the Dominion but it is guaranteed by the Manitoba government, and it amounts to $10,000,000. I presume the Manitoba government's guarantee will now be removed and it will become a direct obligation of this country. The point in regard to that is that all these renewals will now become actual guranteed obligations of this country for which we as a parliament are taking full responsibility.

Had time permitted I might have said a few words on the necessity of hastening the remodelling of the financial structure of the railway system. This, I understand from the minister, cannot be done at present, for certain very good reasons which he gave to the committee. But undoubtedly there exists a very urgent necessity for an early and complete remodelling of this financial structure, so that if possible we can place this great system on a basis where it will take care of itself, at least to a large degree. I wish also to say that in these figures which I have quoted no note is taken of the interest of the public, which amounts to $43,000,000 annually and which at present is taken care of out of surplus operating revenues of the railway; nor is any note taken of interest due to the Dominion government for advances made by it to the railway system. These two items have not been included in my remarks.

I present these views so that we may keep them before us when considering this very important matter of the financing of the national railways.

Mr. DUNNING: I appreciate very much the constructive tenor of the remarks of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) with respect to what is the country's major business enterprise. I shall not offer any observations at this time with respect to the Montreal terminal matter; I propose to go on with it immediately after this resolution is disposed of so that my hon. friend's remarks in that connection may be in the minds of hon. members when the question is before the house.

With respect to the general situation as outlined by my hon. friend, I can find no fault with the figures he presented as having to do with the financial requirements of the National system; I believe, listening to them, that they are approximately correct. He calls attention very properly to the magnitude of the figures and to the responsibility which rests upon the management, upon the minister and upon parliament in connection with an undertaking so huge, involving as it does problems of financing very large in character. Let me say, however, that we might easily go to the opposite extreme in our view of this great institution. These capital commitments would be just as necessary and would be just as large if not larger were these railways to-day owned by the three institutions which formerly owned them. They would be split up, it is true, among the three corporations or institutions; but the requirements would be there, and I am inclined to think that if the management were divided into three, as formerly, in all probability the aggregate financial requirements would be greater than they are to-day when we have the benefits of coordination in management, in operation and in the financing of the undertaking.

My hon. friend is quite right in pointing out that these obligations are not merely corporate obligations as they were in the days of private ownership, but are now really obligations of the Dominion of Canada, by way of direct guarantee, as he indicated; or even if not guaranteed they are in fact obligations of the Dominion; because no one can conceive of the Dominion retaining ownership of the property while repudiating the bonded indebtedness attaching to the property, I appreciate to the full my hon. friend's suggestion that the committees of parliament charged with these matters should go thoroughly, sympathetically and constructively into all proposals made. My experience with the management, going back now as minister, to early in 1926, convinces me that we have in the present management and official personnel of the Canadian National Railways, men who really desire to make this undertaking succeed as an undertaking, and without regard to the fact that they are able to come to parliament for money. When any proposal is put before me requiring parliamentary sanction the railway officers are always anxious to demonstrate to me, and through me to parliament, the intrinsic economic merit of that proposal. With respect to new extensions and things of that sort, it is always the effort of the railway officials to demonstrate that the proposal will earn more than sufficient to pay interest on its cost —more in other words than 5 per cent per annum, and make some provision for capital in addition.

Necessarily in a new country our calculations must admit of the presence of some uncertainties. We are developing new country in many directions. Up to now experience has indicated that this development has been wise from an economic point of view. But necessarily, in commencing it, there must be a willingness to take a certain degree of chance; there is always a certain degree of economic chance in entering upon the development of new country. I am happy to be able to say that so far as one can accurately analyse the results of proposals for extensions from time to time whch have been made by the Canadian National officers, their judgment has been vindicated in the main by results; in fact in most cases, the results of extensions and developments have gone beyond the initial expectation as presented to parliament. That, I think, is fairly well borne out by the increased traffic returns of the system which are apparent practically all along the line, from coast to coast.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Is that basis used in the purchase of new lines?

Mr. DUNNING: In regard to the purchase of new lines, as I shall explain when I come to the individual lines, we are unfortunately linked to the past in many cases; and that linking to the past—the obligations arising out of the past—does occasionally involve that the same standards which would be applied to-day by railway officers in recommending new development cannot be applied to all of the proposals for the acquisition of properties carrying obligations reaching back into the past. I shall be glad to go into them individually when we come to the items.

In the Canadian National system we have possibly the greatest agency under the control of parliament for the material development of the resources of this country. That system must be allowed to grow if this country is to grow, and I feel sure it is not in the mind of any member of this parliament that we should adopt a parsimonious attitude towards the Canadian National in connection with its bona fide extension to meet the growing needs of this country as it develops.

Unfortunately, as my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre mentioned, we have in prospect in various places, notably Montreal at the moment, terminal situations which must be dealt with in order that the railway may adequately function, and which run into large sums of money not in themselves productive of a large earning. A terminal scheme such as that of Montreal or Toronto does not bring large increases in revenue to the railway. It does involve in practically every case economies in operation for the railway, representing savings along that line, but I should be the last to pretend that any terminal scheme in a city the size of Montreal or Toronto can produce economies at all proportionate to the expenditure which is required in order to give to the public the service to which they are entitled. I am sure Sir Henry Thornton would confirm that view. However, the provision of adequate terminal facilities is inseparable from the operation of a great railway property, and I agree with my hon. friend to the fullest extent in his suggestions; in fact I will amplify them a little when we come to the Montreal resolution. As he has suggested the railway committee of the House of Commons should give the closest possible study to the proposals of the Canadian National railways in that regard.

I have a few words to say with respect to the resolution now before the committee, which has to do with the refunding of $18,000,000 of maturing bonds. The $18,000,000 of guaranteed securities in question fall due on February 15, 1930, but in view of the fact that it is uncertain whether a bill could be put through parliament next session in time to meet the situation we are asking for the necessary parliamentary authority now to renew the obligation.

Mr. GEARY: I would suggest to the minister that this is a matter we would like to consider at some length and as it is just six o'clock perhaps he would not proceed with his remarks at the moment.

Mr. DUNNING: I had not expected to finish before six o'clock.

Mr. GEARY: Then perhaps the minister might commence all over again when the committee resumes this evening.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE NIAGARA FALLS MEMORIAL BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. G. H. PETTIT (Welland) moved the third reading of Bill No. 22, to incorporate Niagara Falls Memorial Bridge Company.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, there appears to be a slight mistake in the bill as printed, in that there is a difference between the preamble and the enacting clause. The preamble sets out one location for the bridge while the enacting clause changes that entirely. I think they should be made to agree.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless it is by unanimous consent of the house, the only thing to do would be to ask the house to refer the bill back to the committee of the whole with instructions to alter the preamble so as to make it agree with the amended enacting clause:

Mr. GUTHRIE: Very well.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 94, for the relief of Edyth May Shields.—Mr. Young (Toronto Northeast).

Bill No. 98, for the relief of Marion Ruth Laidman.—Mr. Young (Toronto Northeast).

Bill No. 127, for the relief of Sophia Love. —Mr. Young (Toronto Northeast).

Bill No. 138, for the relief of Harry Freeman Switzer.—Mr. Young (Toronto Northeast).

MARY MELVINA GUERIN

Mr. N. M. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast) moved the third reading of Bill No. 95, for the relief of Mary Melvina Guerin.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the bills on which I gave notice of motion which appears in the votes and proceedings of yesterday. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien):

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but be referred back to the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills for further consideration.

I need not dwell at any length upon the reasons which I think justify the house in sending this bill back to the committee for further consideration. This bill is for the dissolution of a marriage between two Roman Catholics who had married according to the rites of their church. As I pointed out last night—and I insist upon this point—I am not making this appeal to the house from the viewpoint of one church in particular, but I am basing my argument on the principle which I then enunciated. When the two parties concerned in legislation of this nature belong to one religious body, it is unfair to the children of those parties, who are unrepresented in the case, who have no one to place their position before parliament, that their future welfare should be prejudiced. Several divorce bills on previous occasions have been rejected by parliament for the very same reason. As I reminded the house last night, one such bill was rejected by the house not many years ago. Besides, this bill should not pass the house upon the evidence which is before us. The supposed guilt of one of the parties is evidenced by the other party, the petitioner, and the declaration of the petitioner is corroborated only by one other witness, a child of fifteen years of age. This was the daughter of the two parties in the case. She was brought before parliament for the purpose of proving the adultery of the father in order that the mother might obtain a divorce. I claim that that is unmoral and anti-social to an extreme degree. In any case involving a severe penalty to a man or a woman I do not think any court of law would base a verdict upon the testimony of a child placed in that cruel and unnatural position. That ground itself, it seems to me, should be sufficient for referring this bill to the committee, so that the facts supposed to have been proven in this case should be corroborated by some other witness.

The third ground is that there are four children involved in the case. Several hon. members have taken the position, and I think rightly so, that some pronouncement or some investigation should be made by the select standing committee as to the exact status of the law at present with regard to children. If it has been found necessary or opportune to raise the point in a case involving one or two children, surely it is as pertinent when there are four children concerned. This is the only case into which I have looked so far in which such a number of children are involved. The reason which has been presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others with regard to children applies in principle to this case and, as a matter of fact, it applies a fortiori. It is for these reasons that I offer the amendment of which I gave notice and which I moved at the outset of my remarks.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to say a word on the amendment. The other day when this matter came up I voted in favour of the bill passing simply because there are, it seems to me, two issues that are rather confused. One relates to the question of the religion of the people concerned, and it was sugegsted that since both the individuals were Roman Catholics, there ought to be some hesitation in granting a divorce. I understood that to be the argument of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). I could not accept that position. I think we must take the stand in this house that we must deal with these questions on their merits and entirely disregard church affiliations; that if people come to us with petitions for divorce against the will of the church, it is not for us in any way to discipline them by refusing to grant a divorce on that ground.

I was, however, greatly impressed with the argument of the hon. member for Labelle when he spoke about the children. All along I have taken the ground that we ought not to grant these divorces leaving the children unprovided for. I would go so far as to say that I was impressed with the plea that for children to go to an environment entirely different from that in which they were brought up, involves a hardship. That is a matter which deserves very careful consideration. Unfortunately the two questions were interinvolved, and so the other night I had to vote for the passing of the bill. I have not, however, the slightest objection to the bill being held for further consideration; I would be in favour of having that done when there are children—whatever the religion of the people—because, it seems to me that in this a fundamental principle is involved. The reference back is merely for reconsideration in order, if possible, to secure the rights of the children. I shall be very glad to support the amendment.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Just before the motion carries, as seconder of the amendment I should like to make a few observations. I think the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has fully explained the position of the children in regard to their future in their community, both the parents being Roman Catholics, and I do not intend to deal with that phase of the matter. Leaving aside, if you wish, the question of religion, I think hon. members should consider the matter seriously and not allow a divorce to be granted on the testimony of a child fifteen years of age, a child of the parties concerned, who is brought before a committee of senators and whose testimony is the only evidence, outside of that of the interested party, on which a divorce is asked.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Unfortunately, ninety-five per cent of the divorce cases that come before us are ex parte cases; they are uncontested, and we hear only one side of the story. Evidence is usually given first by the petitioner; then that is corroborated by the detective or police agent and, the facts alleged not being opposed, the divorce is granted. This case, as has been pointed out by two hon. gentlemen, is an exceptional one. Outside of the religious aspect, with which this house has nothing to do, there is the fact that four children are involved. These four children should receive some consideration at the hands of the committee, and if the bill is referred back the committee would hesitate before granting a divorce, especially on the evidence that was adduced in this case, namely, that of a child of fifteen years of age who was called upon to testify against her father. I do not think the sentiment of the house or of the Canadian people is in favour of granting a divorce on such evidence. For that reason I am glad of the opportunity to support the amendment which has been presented by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa).

Mr. GEARY: May I ask the mover of the amendment a question? His motion is to refer the matter back to the private bills committee. What can that committee do? Where do we get by sending it back to the private bills committee?

Mr. BOURASSA: Am I allowed to answer, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Mr. BOURASSA: I have adopted this procedure because it seems to be the only one which can bring results. To refer the bill back to the committee of the whole house would simply mean that we would rehash the debate of last night, but I understand that the select standing committee could call for other witnesses; and one of the reasons why I ask that this bill be referred back is, as I have just explained, because I consider that the evidence adduced is not such as would be received in a court of law.

Mr. GEARY: What can be done with regard to the children by referring the matter back to the committee?

Mr. BOURASSA: That applies to several bills; but suppose the committee made a test case in connection with one of these bills where children are involved and called for carefully considered legal opinions from the Department of Justice and perhaps others on the question of whether or not parliament can do anything for the care of the children.

Mr. ADSHEAD: We have such a case before us now.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, and there are others. There is the question of the children, there is the question of evidence, and there is besides the broad question of principle upon which I have touched in my previous remarks on the subject.

Mr. N. M. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast): As the sponsor of this bill perhaps I should say a word or two. The evidence in support of this case has been understated. There is such a thing in law as res ipsa loquitur—the thing speaks for itself. This man had venereal disease, and no one would deny that that is a reason for divorce. As far as the children are concerned, whether this house has jurisdiction or not there is in the province where the petitioner resides jurisdiction to grant the custody of the children, and there are institutions to look after these children if the parents are unable to do so. I do not think it becomes us to give any petitioner coming before this house more relief than is asked for. There is no relief asked for in this case so far as the children are concerned, and I am prepared to take the responsibility of saying that institutions in Ontario will provide sufficient protection for the children either at the behest of or in spite of their parents.

Mr. GEARY: I wonder if the Minister of Justice would be prepared to express to the house his view whether there is any jurisdiction in parliament to make an order in respect to the children.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No. I have already stated in another case that I believe there is none. It is purely a provincial matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But divorce might be refused on account of the position of the children.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Of course parliament has the right to refuse the divorce for that or any other reason.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Bourassa) which was negatived on the following division:

MINERVA ELLIOTT

Mr. N. M. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast) moved the third reading of Bill No. 88, for the relief of Minerva Elliott.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, this is the second bill with respect to which I gave notice of motion. My object in asking for the reference of this bill to the committee is that the evidence be reconsidered. The three witnesses in the case are police agents in the city of Montreal hired by the petitioner or on her behalf. Yesterday I proved conclusively that the testimony of at least one of these witnesses is not acceptable. Here is a police agent living in the city of Montreal, who states, among other things, that he followed the accused party, who left his car in front of the Place Viger station "on Bleury street" —a street half a mile distant from the Place Viger. I pointed out last night that in any court of law where the two parties were represented, or where there was somebody acting in the public interest—the king's proctor in England—immediately the testimony of this witness would be rejected, because it is manifest that either he did not reflect for a moment on his statement or took it for granted that the five judges in the case—I mean the five members of the senate committee—not knowing anything about Montreal, would swallow anything. Here in the evidence is a statement that a car was parked in front of a station which as a matter of fact is situated about a quarter or half a mile distant from the street indicated as that on which the station is. That is one point. Then two other witnesses like himself shadowed the man; they followed him. There is not a tittle of evidence by any of the witnesses that they followed the man into any room or saw through the door or the window, or saw in any way whatever into that room. The whole thing is based simply on presumption. My object in asking to have the bill referred to the committee is to find out whether in that committee there are some rules of evidence. If they have no rules in the committee of the house surely that committee should inquire from the committee of the senate whether that body is governed by some rules of evidence.

Looking through May's Parliamentary Practice, 12th edition, 1917—it is quite recent —I find that in the House of Lords in England there is the following standing order:

> No petition for any bill of divorce shall be presented to this house unless an official copy of the proceedings taken or had in the court having jurisdiction over matrimonial causes at the place of his domicile or residence, or in some other court having jurisdiction in that behalf, at the suit of the party desirous to present such petition, be delivered upon oath at the bar of this house at the same time.

I understood that the object of this rule is to have some kind of evidence taken in a judicial manner in order to enlighten the committee of the House of Lords. Here we have nothing of the kind.

I am informed by people who know that there are now both in Toronto and Montreal, but in Toronto especially—I do not say this in any disparaging sense but simply because most divorce cases come from that city or its surroundings—special agencies who make these cases. The most respectable detective agencies, private agencies, do not wish to have anything more to do with such cases; some of the agents of respectable agencies are not prepared to make cases with as much ease as others do. Now the granting of divorce is becoming the most important business of parliament; parliament is passing more divorce bills every session than all public and other private measures put together; and it seems to me that we have reached the point where we shall either slaughter public business in order, as has been frequently said, to do justice to the parties concerned in these divorce cases, or go on at an increasing rate granting divorces on evidence collected and presented to a committee of the house, under apparently no rules such as obtain in ordinary tribunals, or at least without a sufficient study of the various points of law that may be raised. In these circumstances it is about time, especially in a case where it is obvious that the ordinary rules of evidence have not been observed, that we discovered whether or not we are guided by some definite procedure. In this case it is clear that the testimony of one witness at least is not admissible, and the whole evidence is such that no man could be convicted on the strength of it in any court of law.

Are we going to countenance this? Are we going to discharge our responsibility by merely saying that there is a committee which has taken the proper precaution? The committee has not taken that precaution, and it is precisely because I desire to have the committee reconsider the matter that I suggest that the case be referred back in order to find out whether or not the evidence can be corroborated by genuine witnesses. It is becoming important also to ascertain the standing of these detective agencies who are now making a trade of the manufacture of evidence in divorce cases. Just by way of illustration I may observe, in connection with another case which has now been disposed of, that one of the agents testified, when asked why he had not gone further in the gathering of evidence, that there was not sufficient money in it. He said there was not much money in the case and he was in a hurry. That agent was candid enough to admit that when they are not sufficiently well paid they content themselves with what flimsy evidence they can get hold of, relying probably upon the complacency of parliament to overlook such discrepancies as there may be in the evidence. Are we going to encourage that sort of trade? Is it to be known that parliament is putting a premium on organizations of police such as every civilized country is stamping out and forbidding to operate?

Mr. SPENCER: To what police agencies is my hon. friend referring? Are they city police?

Mr. BOURASSA: In the case of Bill No. 88 the whole evidence is made by three police agents of Montreal.

Mr. SPENCER: Private agents

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, all of them are private—private investigators, private detectives. If my hon. friend will look through some of the records he will see that there are very few policemen—in fact, I have not noticed any this year—of either a municipal or a provincial force giving evidence. They are hired agents, just like some secret agents who are hired to locate smugglers and who receive from the government a share of the fines collected. That may be excused on the ground of public policy in view of the sad necessity of collecting revenue. But is it allowable in civil life? In a so-called civilized country which boasts of having a system of justice and a police so far superior to the system of justice and the police in the country to the south of us, is it allowable that parliament should lend its authority to the carrying on of that sort of trade, which apparently is beyond the control of any public body, municipal, provincial or federal?

My object in asking that the bill be referred back to the committee is to have these questions looked into more carefully. I am sure the members of the committee will be glad to have their attention called to the anomaly; and members of the high court of justice on the other side will also be pleased no doubt to have occasion to put themselves right in the eyes of the people of this country. If they are politically irresponsible, I do not think they are without a sense of moral responsibility. I believe they realize their moral responsibility in this matter and would like to do the right thing. This action would enable them to find out the real status of these police agencies. It would also save them from being imposed upon in the future as they have been heretofore. The committee should call before them witnesses who would testify just as they would before an ordinary court of law. In court such testimony would be brought to the attention of the crown prosecutor and action would be taken for perjury. What has been done in this case, and what will be done? It is to secure that information that I have asked the house to refer this bill back to the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question? Those in favour of the amendment will kindly say aye; those opposed will kindly say nay.

The members having been called in:

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private bills being exhausted the house will now revert to consideration of the resolution concerning the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would draw attention to the fact that the vote already has been called, and must be completed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question has not yet been put. Unless unanimous consent is given to continue the vote rule 15 must apply. I am quite ready to take the division, but it must be by unanimous consent.

Mr. McGIBBON: I raised the same question last night but Your Honour gave a different ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: That was a different question. If there is unanimous consent I am ready to proceed with the division.

Speakman,

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time on division.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private bills being exhausted, the house will revert to consideration of the resolution respecting the Canadian National Railways.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFUNDING OF MATURING OBLIGATIONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution —Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting the Canadian National Railways to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations, and to issue substituted securities therefor guaranteed by the Dominion as to principal and interest, but not exceeding $18,000,000, the aggregate face value of the original securities.

Mr. DUNNING: When the house rose at six o'clock I was explaining the need for the legislation which will be based upon this resolution. Canadian National Railway guaranteed bonds were issued in February of 1925, maturing February 15, 1930, and it is necessary to secure authority at this session of parliament for the refunding of these bonds in case it should not be possible to enact legislation and secure royal assent next session in time to take care of the refunding. I think the committee is aware of the fact that in the case of Canadian Northern debentures, or the debentures of any of the companies comprising the Canadian Northern system, a general authority exists for refunding, but the securities to be dealt with by this legislation are Canadian National securities issued since the consolidation and maturing, as I have stated, in February of next year.

The bill to be based upon this resolution will contain the usual provisions with respect to the issue of Canadian National securities. I believe that is all the information I have to give the committee at the present time.

Mr. CLARK: Earlier in the day the minister was dealing with the capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways for branch lines, terminals and so on. We have another great railway corporation in this country, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which is also necessarily well equipped and which necessarily must make capital expenditures annually. It would be interesting to know whether or not the minister, or any of his officials, has examined the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and made a comparison over a period of years of the capital expenditures of the two companies.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no doubt that such a study as suggested by the hon. member would be of interest, but it would only be of academic rather than of practical value. In the one case we have a putting together in 1923 of three systems which had been allowed to run down during a long period of years. This condition had been brought about by necessities and by circumstances of which we are all aware. On the other hand we have an institution which has had a long continuous period of management efficient in character and prosperous in results, enabling it to keep its property up to a standard far above that of the three privately-owned corporations which were the original proprietors of what is now the Canadian National system. I do not think the upbuilding of the Canadian National system since Sir Henry Thornton took charge could be made comparable in any sense with the history of the Canadian Pacific Railway during the same period. I do not know that I can answer the hon. member any more intelligently than that.

Mr. CLARK: It may have been of academic value a few years ago, or for the first two or three years after the amalgamation of the units which now comprise the Canadian National system, but since that amalgamation an amount of capital has been expended greater than the estimated total cost of the transcontinental railway. It seems to me that the time has come when it should be comparable to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and such a comparison would be of tremendous value to those of us who are not experienced in railway matters but who are responsible to the people for the capital expenditures which are now being made in connection with the Canadian National. If the minister has not done that already I suggest that it be done in future years, as I believe there will be an increasing demand for such a comparative statement.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to produce the information, but in advance of producing it I would say that it is not exactly relevant to the matter now under discussion

Mr. CLARK: This matter was discussed at some length this afternoon.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not believe such a comparison would have a practical value. Let me give one illustration. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has a free choice as to whether or not it will spend large sums of money on terminals in the city of Montreal. The Canadian National system has no choice in the matter; it is absolutely necessary that it spend large sums on terminal facilities in that city, the matter having been neglected in the past by the privately-owned companies now forming part of the system. The hon. member very properly said that for a period of years following Sir Henry Thornton's appointment it was necessary to spend large sums in order to bring the property up to its maximum earning capacity. I am sure there is no doubt in the mind of any member of the special committee that the period of years required gradually to bring the property up to the standard required for efficient and economical operation cannot yet be said to be over. If my memory serves me aright, some criticism was made at the sittings of the special committee during this session as to the delay in bringing the property up to the required standard. I do not think that was the general view of the committee, but individual members requested the management to move faster in that respect, particularly as related to branch lines.

I do not see any reason why the information requested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard should not be brought down. As a matter of fact the information is available now. Each year the Canadian Pacific Railway Company publishes a statement showing the amounts which it proposes to spend on capital account, and these amounts are authorized in due course by the shareholders of the company. From the minutes of the special committee we know the amounts which it is proposed to spend on capital account for the Canadian National system. It is quite easy to make a comparison, but I do urge that such comparisons really lead to nothing but an academic result and do not offer any conclusion of practical value, because it is impossible to take into account relatively the physical necessities of the two systems.

Mr. CLARK: The minister has mentioned the matter of terminals in Montreal. When that question is being considered I suggest that it would be of great interest and of practical value to this house to know how much has been spent on the terminals which are now being used by the Canadian National system in Montreal, and how much has been spent on the terminals now being used by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The condition of the terminals of the Canadian Pacific Railway might be stated also. It will be of great interest to us to know how usefully the money has been spent in the past or how usefully it will be spent in the future. I think the plan of the terminal should be before the committee, as well as full information as to the situation as it applies to the two railway companies.

Mr. DUNNING: I intend to take up the resolution dealing with the Montreal terminals after this one is disposed of. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre introduced this matter this afternoon really as part of a larger picture which he was trying to present, and I would prefer not to enter into a discussion of the details at this moment.

Mr. GEARY: These matters came before the committee and each in its turn was quite fully dealt with. As the minister has just stated, the question was raised whether or not the maintenance of way was being caught up with, as well as the question whether or not the system was paying too much or too little in that regard.

Mr. DUNNING: And equipment also.

Mr. GEARY: And equipment. Every member of the committee had the opportunity of asking questions, and it was very clearly brought out that the Canadian National system does spend money, when it has it to spend, in order to bring its equipment and right of way up to date; but it is often obliged because of lack of funds, particularly from ordinary operating income, to leave matters in a less complete state than it otherwise would. If we could compare the cost of construction of branch lines, which is absolutely new work, we could ascertain whether or not the one company was getting the work done more cheaply than the other. There are problems connected with the Canadian National system which the Canadian Pacific has long ago solved, such as tying up different parts of the system and making expenditures which from the standpoint of operating return did not at the time appear to be warranted, but which subsequent results may have fully justified. I remember one matter which came up in that connection—the ballasting of the track from Montreal to Sarnia. It may be that on that sort of ballast the Canadian National will have to spend more than a competing system in the same territory. I do not see how we can get very much information from a comparison, but from consultation with and cross-questioning of the officials—and officials of all sorts will be before the committee—we can get information as to each item of expenditure as it comes up. It might be for a hotel purchase, for a property purchase in Paris or Toronto. The competing road is doing much the same in the way of building hotels. Whether we are doing much more in building structures than the Canadian Pacific is a matter of some interest, but whether we are building wisely more or fewer hotels than the Canadian Pacific can be judged only from a consideration of the circumstances attaching to each expenditure. I know what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard wants, and if the money that is being spent on similar objects is being spent as advantageously by the Canadian National as by the Canadian Pacific, I think he will be quite satisfied so far as that particular matter goes. My impression at the committee was that the expenditures, so far as they are carried out by contract, are very carefully guarded, and not much fault could be found with the actual expenditure of money provided that the reasons for spending it have been approved.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Will there be opportunities later on to discuss the form of securities to be issued?

Mr. DUNNING: The bill itself will deal with that, and the opportunity will occur on the second reading, and in committee on the bill when the various sections can be dealt with.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 253, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MONTREAL RAILWAY TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may construct and complete terminal stations and facilities and other railway works and improvements at or in the vicinity of the city of Montreal, and the governor in council may guarantee the principal and interest of securities to be issued for these purposes by the company to an amount not exceeding $50,000,000, and the proceeds of any sale, pledge or disposition of the securities shall be deposited to the credit of the Minister of Finance in trust for the company, and released from time to time to the company by the said minister to be applied to expenditures made or indebtedness incurred in connection with the said works.

[Mr. Geary.]

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: I think it would be well for me to make a brief general statement regarding what is contemplated as a result of this resolution, although necessarily, in dealing with a matter so large, as was indicated during the discussion on the last resolution, it will be desirable for the proper committee of the house to go very carefully into the proposal in all its bearings, into all the plans of what is proposed and generally into the manner of dealing with it.

One of the many problems with which the Canadian National railway management has been faced in the development of that system has centred around the city of Montreal, a particularly important railway centre. The problem is not a new one; it has for some years engaged the attention not only of the present management of the national railways, but of previous managements of the constituent parts of the system, as well as the city council and the citizens of Montreal. Prior to the war the Grand Trunk Railway Company, in conjunction with the city and the Board of Railway Commissioners, had made a study of the situation affecting principally the separation of grades between Bonaventure station and Victoria bridge and Turcot, and had developed a plan involving the raising of the tracks of the railway company in this area to a sufficient extent to permit vehicular traffic to pass underneath the railway facilities. This plan involved the construction of a new passenger station upon the site of Bonaventure station. The estimated cost of the project at that time before the war, was $15,300,000, and when the government acquired the Grand Trunk, it was considered as a capital expenditure which would have to be faced in time, the then estimated cost, due to advancing prices, being slightly over $20,000,000.

The Canadian Northern Railway Company, through its subsidiary the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company, broke ground in June, 1912, in connection with the construction of a tunnel entrance to the city. The work was in progress at the time the Canadian Northern railway system was taken over by the Dominion government in 1918, and shortly before the end of the war the tunnel was opened for traffic, the first train being operated into the tunnel station on Lagauchetiere street on October 28, 1918. In connection with the general plan of this Canadian Northern entrance, considerable property was acquired between the tunnel station at Lagauchetiere street and the harbour front for the purpose of extension to the harbour tracks, but because of the financial situation of the Canadian Northern and the evident necessity of coordinating these terminal facilities with those of the Grand Trunk Railway, the acquisition of which was under negotiation by the government in 1918, the completion of this work was halted and the situation remains exactly the same to-day as it did then. During the war and the period immediately after the war, public agitation for improved conditions naturally died down in spite of the fact that grade crossing difficulties and terminal congestion due to the constantly increasing traffic both in the railway terminals and on the city streets crossing the railway tracks, became more and more acute.

When Sir Henry Thornton took charge of the administration of the Canadian National Railways, public agitation for an improvement in the situation had again developed, and steps were initiated to study the situation from the Canadian National point of view. It soon became evident to Sir Henry Thornton and his officers that the expenditure involved in a readjustment of the terminal facilities would be very large, and also that the financial position of the Canadian National at that time would hardly justify the immediate assumption of the capital load involved. Studies were continued with a view to developing the most satisfactory plan from the point of view of the Canadian National Railways. Meanwhile the conditions affecting the operation of the Canadian National Railway traffic at Montreal became so acute because of interference with vehicular traffic at the numerous grade crossings, that it became evident that the problem required to be speedily dealt with. Accordingly, as Minister of Railways, on the advice of the management of the Canadian National, on October 24, 1927, I filed expropriation plans covering property between the tunnel at Lagauchetiere street and the waterfront in the vicinity of Victoria bridge so as to protect the Canadian National against an undue rise in price due to speculative influences in the area which anyone might presume would be the area affected by any possible terminal scheme development. By that time the investigations instituted by Sir Henry Thornton and his advisers had progressed so far as to convince the management of the railway that the site of the tunnel terminal was the most advantageous at which to construct a modern passenger station in which the passenger facilities of the Canadian National railways could be concentrated. It had also become evident to Sir Henry Thornton that the amount of money involved to meet satisfactorily the terminal situation at Montreal was larger even than he had at first anticipated. These views were communicated to me and discussions took place upon the question at that time. In order to make the matter more clear I should point out to the committee that there are at the present time three separate Canadian National stations in the city of Montreal which do not at all directly connect with each other; indeed in one case there is no connection save by going many miles around. That is very inconvenient both for the public and for the operation of the railway.

After discussing the matter on many occasions—and I may say that the management has kept the government through myself, well informed of any developments in that connection—when it became apparent that the problem was so enormous from the point of view of possible financial commitments, while having the utmost faith in the officials of the Canadian National who were particularly charged with the duty of dealing with an engineering enterprise of this character, it was nevertheless thought best both by the government and by the management of the Canadian National railways, and I might add by the engineers of the Canadian National railway staff particularly concerned, to secure if possible some entirely independent outside advice, an outside review, if you will, of all that had been developed in connection with this problem both by the Canadian National engineers and also the eight or nine other proposals which had from time to time been made as tentative solutions of the Montreal terminal problem by various interested parties. In order to obtain this independent advice on the whole terminal question, not only from the standpoint of the Canadian National but also from the standpoint of the interests of the public, the government decided to engage Mr. Frederick Palmer, who was mentioned this afternoon by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre, an eminent British engineer who had previously reported on the Hudson Bay terminals, to review and report on the terminal situation in Montreal.

As to Mr. Palmer's qualifications to deal with railway terminal matters, I may tell my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre that Mr. Palmer's initial engineering experience was in railway work. He has kept up his connection with large railway enterprises from that day until this, and is in fact at the present time still consulting engineer to the government of India in connection with all Indian railway problems. As my hon. friend probably knows, the government of India owns the major part of the Indian railway systems.

Mr. Palmer came to Canada and in due course reviewed the local conditions, physical and traffic, and made a personal study of all the various schemes which had been advanced and to which I referred a moment ago. Eight or nine plans had been advanced by various private interests. The results of the studies which were made by Mr. Palmer have been embodied in his report, dated January 31, 1929, which has been printed and copies of which have been distributed to all Montreal members, and are available also to any member of the house who is interested, and for public distribution. Mr. Palmer in his report states that in his opinion the location development of the Canadian National railway in its studies for a central passenger station is the best which could be thought of not only from the Canadian National standpoint but also from the standpoint of a union terminal to provide for the requirements of both railways should a union terminal be decided upon. That, Mr. Chairman, I believe to be a very important factor, as to whether this proposal of the Canadian National railways would close the door for ever to a union terminal of all the railways in the city of Montreal. Mr. Palmer has studied the situation carefully from that point of view and advances the opinion that the scheme now under consideration, while providing adequately for Canadian National requirements for many years to come, does not close the door to a possible unionizing of all the passenger traffic entering the city of Montreal, should that be decided upon by the parties interested to be in their own best interests and in the interests of the city of Montreal and its people.

Mr. CANTLEY: That will hardly be accepted.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not speaking of its acceptance; I am referring merely to the question whether this scheme closes the door to a possible union in the future. I would regard it as a matter of some importance if we were at this time closing the door to and thus effectually preventing the development of a union terminal should that be desired in Montreal in the future. I am now merely advancing the idea, which is confirmed by Mr. Palmer, that the scheme proposed by the Canadian National does not close the door to a possible union in the future.

Mr. CANTLEY: Not if you have unlimited funds. Anything is possible if you have enough money.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course these things do cost money, but I would not follow my hon. friend so far as to say that unlimited money is required. The economic desirability of creating union facilities would, of course, be carefully studied by all the parties who would be required to spend money, and I have no doubt that none of them, the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific, the Montreal Tramways or the city of Montreal, would be prepared to spend the necessary money unless they were convinced from their own point of view, of the economic desirability of doing so.

Mr. Palmer suggested certain modifications in the Canadian National proposal to permit of a more convenient distribution of passengers to and from the passenger terminal and to avoid the congestion of street traffic in the vicinity. He also suggested the development of improved yard facilities accessible to both railways at the west end of the harbour for the purpose of improving the interchange of traffic between the harbour and the railways—a very important factor in the traffic in and around the city and port of Montreal.

With regard to grade separation—and this I think will illustrate the difficulty of that problem for the average member of the house better than anything else I can say—one of the principal reasons for the complaint on the part of the citizens of Montreal in connection with the Canadian National terminal has been the large number of grade crossings at which there exists an element of danger, and at which delay in the movement of street traffic has been growing. Between Bonaventure station and Victoria bridge and Turcot there are at present 27 grade crossings, some of which are particularly important. Between Moreau street station and the present city limits there are 39 grade crossings. The town of Montreal East and Point aux Trembles contain an additional 9 grade crossings, and on the balance of the line to the east end of the Island at Bout-de-l'Ile, there are, 6 more grade crossings. The total grade crossings are 81. These have always been a source of complaint on the part of the public of Montreal.

Now, as to the importance of the terminal from the railway point of view, I only desire to place on record a very few figures which

I think graphically illustrate the growth in freight traffic of the city and port of Montreal. The tonnage handled into and out of the city of Montreal by the Canadian National railways has increased rapidly, as the following figures will show:

Year	Originated	Terminated	Total
1913	586,000	1,729,000	2,314,000
1924	1,146,000	2,295,000	3,441,000
1925	1,329,000	2,360,000	3,689,000
1926	1,490,000	2,434,000	3,924,000
1927	1,699,000	2,567,000	4,266,000
1928	1,969,000	2,948,000	4,917,000

I would point out that the increase as between 1927 and 1928 is nearly 700,000 tons.

With respect to this proposal to expend $50,000,000, I should explain that the bill to be introduced will provide an expenditure of not more than $10,000,000 in any one year, except with special permission by order in council. It is planned to develop the works during the course of the next seven years. I do not expect, neither does the railway management, that during the current fiscal year it will be possible or desirable to spend up to the $10,000,000 which is provided as the yearly limit. As my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has said, it is difficult in planning works of this magnitude to place any definite limit on what the expenditure will be. My attitude towards engineering estimates for large works is well known. I take a somewhat sceptical view of such estimates. I usually regard it as being necessary to allow a proportion over the forecast made by the engineers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are as bad as the lawyers.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not as bad as the lawyers, but the engineers are in that respect, although in some other respects the profession stands very much higher than the legal profession, particularly with respect to the fees charged to the public. The intention, then, is to submit this bill, based upon the resolution, to the general committee of the house on railways, canals and telegraph lines. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre suggested that he would rather have it referred to the smaller special committee, but of course that committee is appointed by the house only for the specific purpose of dealing with Canadian National railway accounts and estimates, and in any case in a question of this magnitude there is merit in referring it to the larger committee.

I have requested the Canadian National railway officials to provide in the railway committee room full detail maps of the whole proposal, and to bring models which they have prepared, which illustrate graphically what is involved in the entire scheme, and show the city of Montreal and the island of Montreal in miniature. These will enable any member of the committee or of the house to grasp the details in a very short time. When therefore this bill gets before the railway committee I would suggest not only to the members of the committee itself but to all members of the house that they take the opportunity of studying at close range all that is involved in this vast terminal project.

I have only one word more to say. I do hope that when the railway committee is dealing with the matter, if there are interests in the city of Montreal having any constructive views to offer or criticisms of any kind, that they will attend and give the committee the benefit of their advice. As my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has said, this is one of the largest projects in connection with the Canadian National Railway that we have ever entered upon, and I do hope that all phases of it can be fully developed and fully studied before the committee. I hope the critics, if critics there be, will be present and give us the benefit of their views. The officials of the Canadian National Railway system, who have spent years in studying this project, will be present with all plans, details, and models of what is involved. I know the Canadian National Railway management is desirous, and the government also desires, that the right thing be done in embarking upon an enterprise so large as this.

Mr. GEARY: Would the minister think it well, not to speak of the plans in detail at the moment, but to tell the committee something of that part of the scheme which has to do with the development of property in the vicinity of the new terminal? I understand attention has been paid to the development of that part of Montreal, that highways for vehicular and pedestrian traffic have been laid out to suit the station, and I believe there is a plan for utilizing the ground purchased but not required for actual railway purposes for warehouses, factories, shops and that sort of thing. That, I assume, Mr. Palmer would know very little about, but I should like the assurance of the minister that this part of the scheme has been carefully studied. Perhaps he can give us some indication of what the plans lead to in that regard.

Mr. DUNNING: The broad plan in that particular can be much better understood in the committee room from the models and plans than I can convey by any description. But it is planned to utilize to the fullest extent what might be called the surface rights over the terminal property generally. The terminal station which the Canadian National Railways own is situated, as my hon. friend knows, in the heart of Montreal, on property which in value would approximate very closely to the most valuable property in Canada. Now, we are evolving a plan contemplating the complete coverage of the station proper and utilizing the area above that for building, not only for railway purposes but valuable property rights for sale or rental or lease to other parties, such as has been done in the case of one or two of the larger terminals in New York city. The plans also contemplate the creation of entirely new streets over and around the terminal property. Every effort is being made to utilize the property in a manner which will produce the maximum revenue to the Canadian National Railways. I will make a special point when the models and the plans are brought here that this feature is given special attention in the committee room.

Mr. McRAE: I share the hon. minister's uneasiness with regard to engineer's estimates. Perhaps he would tell the committee of the care which has been taken in arriving at this $50,000,000, because, as we all appreciate, it is rather an ambitious program.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like to be able to go further into that. Frankly I had not anticipated going into so much detail at this stage because of the fact, as my hon. friend from North Vancouver will appreciate, that the officers who have been working on this will be available to give reasons for the faith that is in them, or at any rate in their own estimates, and I hope for a full representation of the committee on that occasion. I may say it has always been the practice in the railway committee to welcome any members of the house who are not members of the committee and to permit them to ask questions.

Mr. McGIBBON: There are many other committees meeting at the same time.

Mr. DUNNING: I appreciate that, and I shall endeavour, so far as in my power may lie, to avoid in this case any inconvenience from that cause. I will ask the chairman of the railway committee to endeavour as far as possible to cooperate. In any event, perhaps this would help: It might be arranged to have the plans and models in the railway committee room over a number of days with a Canadian National official present most of the time, so that any member may go in at any time and obtain information. That, I believe, would probably facilitate arriving at an understanding of the whole matter by the membership of the house generally. I shall be glad to arrange that and shall also endeavour to avoid as far as possible anything that will inconvenience hon. members.

Mr. McGIBBON: Very good of the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: No, merely decent.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think the minister is to be congratulated on his method of bringing the matter before the house. He made reference to some area which at one time was under consideration and might have been secured by the Grand Trunk Railway between the Victoria bridge and the Point St. Charles property. How much land was it proposed to secure for the $15,000,000?

Mr. DUNNING: The plan involved in the $15,000,000 scheme was a four track elevated line west from Bonaventure station and the acquisition of a strip of property alongside sufficient to make it possible to erect a four track elevated line and to provide for the necessary grade separations.

Mr. CANTLEY: There may be good reasons for it, but frankly I am surprised at the decision of the management to put the station at the point suggested. I am surprised for several reasons; one is that the climb up from Bonaventure depot or the track levels between the Victoria bridge and the Bonaventure depot will mean surmounting a very considerable elevation. Of that there can be no doubt. I understand that Sir Henry Thornton, the president of the road, makes a strong point of the necessity for having what he calls a through station. I would point out, however, that most of the great railway stations on this continent are not through stations, such, for example, as those of Boston, New York and Philadelphia. These are not through stations, and if you take the old country—London, where there are half a dozen stations, Liverpool and Glasgow—you will find that the same thing applies. There are no through stations in any of these large centres which handle enormously greater numbers of passengers than we can expect to handle for a good many years to come. Surely some other solution of the problem is possible than that the traffic from Montreal coming westward shall go through the tunnel. That means a bottleneck of simply two tracks, one inward and one outward. Is not that correct?

Mr. DUNNING: Only for passenger purposes.

Mr. CANTLEY: Only for passenger purposes; but certainly if this country is going to grow, as the minister believes and as we all believe, this will be a factor of considerable importance in a very short time. Further, in my opinion, it will be impossible to climb up from Bonaventure station or the level of the Bonaventure station tracks except by the erection of a tremendously expensive steel structure; and then we get to a point which I think means congestion from almost every point of view as a terminal. As regards the 27 grade crossings between Victoria bridge and Bonaventure depot—and there are really more than that number—I have long thought that what should have been done by the Grand Trunk, or later on by the Canadian National Railways as soon as they got round to it, was to acquire most or all of the tract of land between the Victoria bridge and the present terminals at Bonaventure station. That would elminate the whole question of grade crossings and give the railway control of all the land at the head of the harbour and connection with the canals coming up this way, with yard standage of great value to the railway.

Mr. DUNNING: That would cost more than the terminal scheme.

Mr. CANTLEY: It might have cost a little more, but the railway would then have an enormous amount of territory for all time to meet the growth of this country for years to come, and we should not be hemmed in, as the present proposal will mean. What we did not need we could have disposed of to very great advantage. These are some of the points that occur to me. I have no doubt they must have been considered by the minister and the officers of the railway, but I hope that when the matter comes before the committee, as the minister suggests, we shall then have some further information with reference to these various points, which I regard as of considerable importance. Frankly, I repeat, I am surprised at the decision reached in regard to this matter.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall not attempt now to go into this detailed criticism my hon. friend offers; I hope he will present it to the officers of the company and get, as I am sure he will get, full information regarding the points he has raised. With respect to the question of gradient, my recollection is that the rail level at Victoria bridge is identical with the rail level at the present tunnel station. There is, it is true, a dip in between, but the problem of dealing with Bonaventure, no matter who may have viewed the situation from Bonaventure west involves a grade separation; all are agreed that a grade separation is necessary, and a grade separation in that area does involve elevated tracks to a considerable extent. However, I will not follow my hon. friend in any detail at this time inasmuch as the committee is the proper place for all these matters to be carefully examined.

Mr. McRAE: In view of the great importance of this work, I would suggest to the minister that the railway committee, and also such members of the house as may see fit to accept his kind invitation to attend the meetings, be given an opportunity to go over the ground and examine the actual layout after they have heard the plans.

Sir EUGENE FISET: By special train.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McRAE: I am not particularly interested in a special train.

Mr. DUNNING: From the applause I hear I take it that some other things will be found for hon. members to do in Montreal in addition to going over the ground. I can assure my hon. friend that the Canadian National Railways will be only too happy to show over the ground any member or members who may wish to go to Montreal. I know that a number of members on both sides have been to Montreal, have visited the offices and seen the plans, and have gone over the ground, and I can assure every other hon. member that he is more than welcome to go and do likewise. The Montreal members who sit behind me and one of them across the way will see to the entertainment of their fellow members.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 254, respecting the construction by the Canadian National Railway Company of certain terminal facilities with grade separation and other works at and in the vicinity of the city of Montreal.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AGREEMENT FOR THE PURCHASE OF ALBERTA RAILWAYS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 71. to incorporate the Northern Alberta Railways Company, and respecting the Canadian National Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. A. D. McRAE (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill I give expression to my own personal views only; I feel that the principle at stake merits a further discussion before going into committee.

The residents of the Peace River district, as I found them last fall, were indifferent as to who should be the purchaser of their transportation system so long as the province of Alberta got out of the railway business. Either of our two great transcontinental railway systems would be satisfactory to them, but they had some doubts as to the joint ownership proposed; they feared that the board of directors which will result from the combination, with all the conflicting hopes and ambitions of their principals—agreements to the contrary notwithstanding—will not make for the rapid development of that new country. They feel certain that in the difference which inevitably will arise the interests of the district will suffer.

I must say that I share their feelings. I can understand our two great railways getting together on joint terminals and perhaps on a main trunk line where density of traffic and cheap ton mileage are the only ends to be considered, but I am sure that a partnership of this kind would not have brought about the present development of the west, which was the work of broad-visioned, courageous men who were in charge of the competing railway companies.

I cannot see that in the joint ownership of the present Alberta railways the interests of our two railway systems are identical. To begin with, it must be apparent even to the blind that the increasing traffic of the Peace River country cannot long continue over the present railway via Edmonton. Some more direct outlet to the coast must be built, the Canadian Pacific Railway cannot possibly continue to carry its half of the Peace River wheat crop via Calgary to the sea. The Canadian National Railways already have a line to the coast within striking distance of Grande Prairie, but that route is not the natural outlet for the larger part of the Peace River district which is north of the Peace river itself.

The economic outlet for this part of the Peace river country is, undoubtedly, by Peace pass, Prince George and Vancouver, and willingly or otherwise that is the outlet which, in the development of that great district, eventually must be constructed.

Why do I say this? Let me give this house a brief description of the country north of the Peace river. Immediately on the west of the Peace river agricultural district, some 150 miles north of Prince George, is the Findlay river mining section, a district already well under development. A few miles east we have a large coal area which Providence has conveniently located at the western door to the Peace river agricultural country, and there is also available nearby, in the Peace River canyon, sufficient water-power to supply cheap power for the entire mining, smelting and refining requirements of that mineral zone. Then, for about 600 miles northeastward to the source of the Mackenzie river, at the northwest end of Great Slave lake, there is a continuous tract of excellent agricultural land.

When we get to the Mackenzie river we are on the doorstep of that now famous precambrian shield which extends across the northern part of the Dominion, the value of which all hon. members fully understand. This shield continues through the Coppermine river mineral reserve to the Arctic, a district which has long promised to be one of the great copper mining areas on the continent. As a matter of fact on the shores of Great Slave lake preparations already are being made for drilling the extensive zinc and lead deposits during the coming summer.

In addition this railway which, we may anticipate, will be joined by a short extension from Peace River Crossing and Edmonton, will meet the Mackenzie river somewhere below Great Slave lake in the vicinity of Fort Providence. When completed it would give a forty-hour rail service from Edmonton to that point as compared with the present infrequent boat journey of eight days down stream and twelve days up stream, and that for a limited time each year. This railway would provide a daily service for twelve months of the year. In fact such a line, by escaping all the boat delays occasioned by ice jams in Great Slave lake, would make it possible to reach the open Mackenzie river six weeks earlier in the spring and leave it two weeks later in the fall, increasing the present season on the Mackenzie from two and a half months to four and a half months, thus opening up a new Arctic region for this country. The present boat season on the Mackenzie is from July 1 to September 15, but when railway connection is established the Mackenzie river season will be from May 15 until early in October. This railway connection would bring into the market via Edmonton the fish of the Great Slave and Great Bear lakes, the Mackenzie river and the Arctic ocean. It would give the mining area to which I have referred a year-round service as against the present limited boat service of two and a half months yearly, under which the country never can develop. Such is the future of this great northern empire when railway facilities are provided.

The unusual attractiveness of this whole railway program is due to the fact that over its entire length from Findlay Forks to Great Slave lake, almost 700 miles, every mile is freight producing and undoubtedly would justify the construction of the line when a definite program for the development of the country is assured.

The Peace pass has been long regarded as the most favourable pass through the Rocky mountains. Undoubtedly there would be some difficulties to contend with in securing acceptable grades; but considering what we have accomplished in that respect already, there need be no fear of eventually not getting the minimum grade necessary for a heavy freight line, which this railway is destined to become, from the Mackenzie river to Vancouver.

From this hurried resumé of the district north of the Peace river, I am sure that hon. members will appreciate that there is ample room for both our national railways in that country. I do not believe that this joint proposal is sound. It savours too much of a combination which I am sure will not work out to the benefit of the district.

What does this partnership of our two competing railways actually mean? Does it go any further than the 60 miles of new branch lines provided for in the purchase agreement? Under schedule B, rights, good for five years, are granted to this new combination—provided they start the construction within two years—of four branch lines, totalling approximately 600 milles. At $40,000 per mile this would work out at about $24,000,000, and parliament would have to vote one-half of this amount, or $12,000,000, if these branches are to be built. If this house or either of the railway companies do not feel inclined, because of financial or other reasons, to go ahead, then the branches cannot be built.

It will be observed that this schedule includes the 60 miles the new company is obliged to build under the purchase agreement, so the necessary start is certain to be made. By passing this bill we are tying up for five years the principal branch lines in the Peace River district without any certainty that the construction essential to its development will be proceeded with. It is no assurance of prompt action to say that in case of differences each railway could build its own branches. That is not practical and, therefore, is not probable.

What about the hauling of freight to the sea over the most economical route regardless of who owns it? This is certainly in the interests of the settlers and residents in the Peace River district, and yet this agreement provides for the interests of the companies but not the district.

Are both the railways equally interested in another route through the mountains to the sea? I do not believe they are. As I have already pointed out, the Canadian National system has a line within striking distance of this district. These, and a thousand other equally contentious questions are sure to come before the board of directors representing both of our rival companies.

What about the Peace River country when this new railway partnership does not agree? Where does the district get off at? Is it to stagnate? These are matters which I think the house should consider before giving effect to this legislation. The success of the industries of this country depends upon the continuance of the present healthy competition between our two national railway systems. They are two separate corporations and should always be considered in that way and be treated alike. The joint ownership of the Peace River railways would be the first serious breakdown in this competitive position.

The people of the west might well take heed lest in the precedent about to be established the interests of our two railway systems may in time become so harmonized that this competition, obtained after a waste of so much effort and money, will become a thing of the past.

When speaking about the future railway development in the Peace River district the hon. Minister of Railways said that public opinion would protect the interests of the residents of that district. I have always looked upon public opinion as being a late cure; sometimes too late, and never farsighted, particularly when the development of a new country is concerned.

I cannot see how hon. members from the prairie provinces can support a bill which puts the new settlers of the Peace River district in a position similar to that from which the farmers of Manitoba freed themselves more than a generation ago. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the merger, even by slow degrees, of our two national transportation systems. I oppose this bill because I consider it a railway combination which is not in the best interests of the Peace River district or of the country as a whole.

Mr. J. C. BRADY (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I hope the house will pardon my saying a few words concerning this bill. There is no doubt that this agreement between the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific Railways for the development of the Alberta railway lines was arrived at after considerable care and thought, but I would remind the house of the discussion which arose in 1925 regarding the Peace River country. At that time an estimate was passed to construct an elevator at the port of Prince Rupert, the terminal of the Canadian National lines. If some of the ministers present this evening can remember what they said at that time they will realize that they expressed the view that the building of this elevator and its functioning in the future would become a part and parcel of the development of the Peace River country. It was definitely connected up with the opening of the shortest route to the Pacific coast.

I am opposed to this bill, not because it will be a benefit to Alberta but on the ground that it will materially interfere with the opening up of the legitimate, natural outlet for the Peace River country. I think that is the most important aspect of this matter. The hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) has summed up very well the difficulties which must be met. The Canadian National Railways should carry out what I consider to be a moral obligation on their part to protect and guard their own line to the port of Prince Rupert.

I do not think it would be advisable at this time for me to say where the outlet from the Peace River should go to, nor do I believe it is possible for anyone to say that. During the past three years we have had many reports from the engineers of both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways. Four passes, Obed, Monkman, Pine and Peace river, were mentioned. I contend that in no instance have we been able definitely to say where the proper economic outlet to the Peace River district should be. It may be known to the Canadian National, or the Canadian Pacific, or to the engineers of both these great railway systems, but I honestly believe that this is where the Canadian National failed. The Peace River country is really a district that the Canadian National should have taken the utmost interest in. What has happened? We must acknowledge facts as we see them. I hope the Minister of Railways will not be offended, but I believe the Canadian National have been negligent in the duty which devolved upon them in not taking over for themselves the development of the Peace River country. The Canadian Pacific entered the field; they sent in their engineers repeatedly, and finally—they were prior to the Canadian National so far as I am aware—they decided that they were going to develop that country. Then it was that the Canadian National entered.

A few weeks ago I asked the minister whether he believed that this agreement would interfere with, retard or hasten the development of an outlet from the Peace River district to the Pacific coast, and he replied that he believed it would facilitate it. I do not believe that it can facilitate the development of the nearest economic route to the Pacific ocean for this reason: Can anyone say that either of these two great railway companies, working on a fifty-fifty basis, can break away from this contract and start in to feed their own lines irrespective of the other? I do not know how this can be done. I believe both railway companies have agreed to a survey along the Pacific Great Eastern. If that survey is satisfactory and if it meets the requirements as regards possibilities of freight, these companies will be obligated to connect up with the Pacific Great Eastern say from Prince George. If that be the case—and it is a possibility—I say to the Minister of Railways: It is futile to think that the Canadian National port of Prince Rupert will benefit in the least degree from that. If Prince George is connected with the Pacific Great Eastern, undoubtedly, geographically the only way whereby freight from the Peace River district will flow in accord with that railway development, will be down that line.

Mr. DUNNING: Down to Vancouver?

Mr. BRADY: Down to Vancouver.

Mr. DUNNING: Over the Pacific Great Eastern?

Mr. BRADY: If the Pacific Great Eastern is found acceptable—and both companies have agreed to make a survey of it—and if it were understood, according to the hon. member for North Vancouver, that from Grand Prairie a line would be built to Prince George, I contend that the Canadian National line to the port of Prince Rupert would be left practically high and dry. I ask the Minister of Railways to consider this seriously. One of two things should be done regarding the national line to the port of Prince Rupert. One is that steps should be taken to connect up their branch lines in Alberta with some point on the Canadian National west of Prince George, so as to ensure that the port of Prince Rupert and the line of the Canadian National will receive a portion of freight developed, or let the Canadian Pacific take over the line. What do we find today? Anybody who has read the wheat records of the past week must realize that a great change has taken place regarding the movement of wheat to the various world ports. We find that the Argentine and Australia are now big competitors with Canada in the matter of wheat. The reason is obvious, namely, that their wheat moves when our wheat is lying in cold storage, in the elevators on the great lakes. The result is that we must turn more and more to the movement of wheat to the Pacific coast. Vancouver has received so far over 80,000,000 bushels of wheat and no doubt she will receive more. The reason is that the port is open for twelve months in the year. The port of Prince Rupert is likewise open for twelve months in the year and it is nearer to the Orient than any other port on the Pacific coast. It is 480 miles nearer to five big ports in the Orient, for instance, Kobe, Shanghai, Tokyo and others. That being the case, the people of Prince Rupert look upon this development in Alberta with very grave fears; they are afraid that it means the holding up of rightful development or a great delay in the matter of bringing a share of the produce from the Peace River district to the port of Prince Rupert. I believe there is plenty of room for Stewart, Prince Rupert and Vancouver to share in this development; I do not believe the grain will flow through one main channel; it will break up and divide into these three channels if the opportunity is afforded. I trust therefore that the Minister of Railways will satisfy us regarding the future of the port of Prince Rupert. We have a large ocean dock there; we have also an elevator that has been closed throughout the year, and I am sorry to say—but this is the place to say these things; after all, it is the only place where a man can determine whether he has facts or not—that I have it on good authority that last season's shipments of wheat destined for the port of Prince Rupert were changed at Jasper and deflected to the port of Vancouver. I should like to know on whose authority or why that deflection took place. There must be a good reason for it and as the port of Prince Rupert is a national creation, the people expect that at least it shall receive some attention in the big development that is going on and will go on in the Peace River country. I do think that some clause should be placed in this bill to assure the people of western Canada that there shall be no interference with any extension which the Canadian National might make towards joining up their own line to the port of Prince Rupert, and I would like the Minister of Railways before this bill is sent to the committee to enlighten us as to what he considers the situation will be should this bill pass. I have read the bill carefully and I find that first of all three conditions must be met, and that practically immediately the bill becomes law. Then there are other conditions which are introduced with the word "may," such as, "The company may construct and operate one hundred and two miles," and so on. In other words, they do not need to enter upon that work at all; they "may" do it. Therefore I think we are entitled to be satisfied that the future of the port of Prince Rupert is not in danger and that that port will not be overlooked.

I would just like to draw attention to another feature. The other evening the minister mentioned that certain existing lines in eastern Canada were to be taken over by the Canadian National at a sum running up to about $10,000,000. We have the great Hudson Bay railway on our hands, and I do not think that anybody in this house or anyone in Canada can say definitely that that great engineering work is going to be a success. These will involve heavy responsibilities financially. The Hudson Bay railway is still a theoretical proposition; there is no guarantee that it will fulfil the requirements, and that it will function in accordance with our expectations. The Peace River development will benefit all Canada.

There is one other thing which I think cannot be denied and that is that the Canadian National has in the port of Prince Rupert a port second to none strategically, and second to none as a port itself, because there is no expense attached to it. It is looked upon by ocean captains as one of the finest harbours on the whole coast of America. Therefore I do not think that I am trespassing upon the time of the house when I request the Minister of Railways to see that the Canadian National safeguard the interests of that port and maintain the line running to Prince Rupert in their own system and make it function, in order to build up the port of Prince Rupert, instead of concentrating the whole movement of grain and all other produce on the line down to the port of Vancouver. I do not think that that is the best think to do either nationally or economically, and I believe there is a moral obligation resting upon this government to see that Prince Rupert will receive the consideration to which it is undoubtedly entitled.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): I must congratulate the province of Alberta on being able to dispose of their railways at so fair and equitable a price. I have on a great many occasions pointed out the necessity for coupling up the Peace River country with the western outlet, and I very much regret that such a provision is not contained in this bill. This bill does not do anything to forward in the slightest degree the connecting up of the Peace River country with the western outlet. I think there should be some indication in this bill that it is the intention of the companies who are acquiring the control of the Edmonton and Dunvegan road to connect up the Peace River country with the western outlet. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) a short time ago seemed rather surprised that anyone would venture the suggestion that the Pacific Great Eastern really could carry the freight of that country to the city of Vancouver.

Mr. DUNNING: No, my hon. friend does me an injustice there.

Mr. FRASER: I am sorry if I do.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I might clear up the point so that my hon. friend could then discuss it. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Brady) was arguing that grain which moved to Prince George over a railway from the north would go to Vancouver over the Pacific Great Eastern rather than to Prince Rupert. I shook my head, because from what I know of the Pacific Great Eastern it would not be economical to haul grain to Vancouver over that road from Prince George, when it could be hauled over our good grades to Prince Rupert. I do not think it would be economical to haul grain from Prince George over the Pacific Great Eastern as compared with shipping it from Prince George to Prince Rupert.

Mr. FRASER: The distance from Prince George to Prince Rupert and from Prince George to Vancouver are the same. Of course under present conditions, with the Pacific Great Eastern uncompleted for eighty miles of its length, it would be impossible to haul grain over that line, but I wish to make it quite plain that it is not by any means an impossibility to haul wheat from the Peace River country over the grades on the Pacific Great Eastern if that road is properly completed. The completion of that road will have to be undertaken before we can discuss the question of hauling grain or anything else over it. As a matter of fact the grades over that line are not as high as those on the Canadian Pacific from Calgary to Vancouver, over which they are hauling wheat to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: I would hope not.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I have just one observation to make, Mr. Speaker. The time is not opportune to engage in a discussion of the advantages to be gained from an extension to the coast from the Peace River district. We have all enthusiastically supported that. Provision is made in this bill particularly for the ratification of the contract between the two railways and the government of Alberta with respect to the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway. Paragraphs 7 and 8 of the agreement provide specifically for certain extensions. One extension consists of 25 miles of railway from Wembley to Hythe; another, of 15 miles from Whitelaw to the Waterhole district. Paragraph 8 of the agreement provides for the construction of not less than 60 miles of additional branch lines, within a period of five years, of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia and Central Canada railways in the Peace River district. Now, my point is that provision could be made, and in my judgment should be made, in the bill to empower these railways, if they consider it expedient or good business, to extend that railway system in conjunction with the branch lines or otherwise, so as to make an outlet from the Peace River district, either at Vancouver or at Prince Rupert, by connecting up with Prince George.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend does not care which way they want to go; he would have parliament give them a free hand to get through provided they went via Prince George?

Mr. LADNER: I understand the railway commission would have something to say as to that; they must give their approval.

Mr. DUNNING: To the route map only.

Mr. LADNER: Is not that the most important thing?

Mr. DUNNING: No, that is a detail.

Mr. LADNER: If the minister would incorporate that empowering clause, the good judgment of the railways in any event would dominate the situation, and parliament would not likely go against the joint judgment of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National railways with respect to the route or the method of extension. I urge upon the minister that by cutting off the extensions as set out in the agreement, without any enabling clauses in the bill itself, is a step which in my judgment makes more difficult the possibility of bringing about a connection between the Peace River district and the coast.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to record in a general way my support of the proposed legislation now before the house. I am not going to say that I am absolutely satisfied with its provisions, I am one of those who have laboured for some time to persuade the government and the Canadian National Railways to act in connection with this matter, both as to the taking over of the Peace river section of the Alberta railways and the construction of a railway out to the Pacific coast. I have declared in Alberta as well as here my disappointment that some provision was not made in connection with the coast outlet. However, to oppose the bill does not, as I see it, get us anywhere nearer a Pacific coast outlet than to allow it to pass; in fact it is just the reverse, in my judgment. I think it has been recognized in all our discussions of this question that one of the chief difficulties in connection with a coast outlet was simply the fact that the Edmonton Dunvegan and the Central Canada Railways which would be part of the system to connect the Peace River country with the Pacific coast, belonged to the province of Alberta, and it was not expected by anyone in that province or outside of it, so far as I know, that Alberta would build a railway through British Columbia to any Pacific coast port.

Now, to oppose this bill, as I understand it, would simply mean that the Canadian Pacific Railway would get the Alberta railways. It may be that some hon. members, as well as certain people outside this house believe that that would ensure the best development of the Peace River country. But I am not convinced of that. I am not insensible to the possible difficulties in connection with the working out of this legislation, that were referred to to-night by the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae); but when it comes to the question of the objection he raised, as I understood him, to the House of Commons, possibly not being ready to vote $12,000,000 to build its share of the 600 miles of branch lines for which this railway company will hold charters in the Peace River country, I think it more likely that parliament would provide that $12,000,000, than that we would carry out the program referred to in the correspondence which was brought down yesterday. I find that on September 20th, 1928, Sir Henry Thornton wired the Minister of Railways as follows:

> Canadian Press announce Canadian Pacific has made independent offer something less than twenty-five million for Alberta Government Railways and receipt of offer acknowledged by Brownlee Montreal urgently suggest and I agree we should announce we propose ask parliamentary authority build line Obed through Grand Prairie northwesterly towards Peace or Pine pass with branch from Sturgeon lake northeasterly towards McLennan and Peace river crossing. Kindly telegraph quickly your views.
> Thornton.

That expenditure would not open up anything like the vast area of new territory that the 600 miles would open up, and yet it would cost, not $12,000,000, but possibly $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, if we are to go by the experience in the province of Alberta, and I think they built their mileage just as cheaply as the Canadian National Railways. If that is the only alternative to joint ownership, I would rather wrestle with the problem of joint ownership of the present railways and the problem of future development in the extending of branch lines, because I do not believe this parliament would be likely to vote money for the duplication practically of the present railway without serving any very large amount of new territory.

During the last three or four years the Peace River country has been very, very anxious to see the Canadian National Railways take over the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway. I find also that the Alberta government was very anxious that the Canadian National Railways should buy the Alberta railways, and two years ago, May 3, 1926, according to sessional paper 226A of 1928, I find an offer by the Premier of Alberta, Mr. Brownlee, to the Minister of Railways, Mr. Dunning, in which he argues for the taking over of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway and the Central Canada Railway at a price just a little over $14,000,000. These figures were submitted, not as a final offer, but as a basis for consideration. I may say that the price agreed to be paid for the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway by the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific must be $20,000,000. Probably I should read one or two paragraphs of this letter:

> Dear Mr. Dunning,
> In submitting, for your consideration, the proposition that the Canadian National Railways—

Mr. DUNNING: What is the date of that, please?

Mr. KENNEDY: May 3, 1926; sessional paper 226A of the session of 1928.

Mr. DUNNING: But the letter is early in 1926.

Mr. KENNEDY: Yes, I am showing just what the Alberta government was trying to do at that time.

In submitting, for your consideration, the proposition that the Canadian National Railways should take over the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway and the Central Canada Railway, I desire to draw your attention to the following:—

1. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, between Wolf Creek and Prince Rupert, was constructed at a very heavy cost as a main artery to serve the country which is tributary to it, and, as this portion of the national railway system is short on traffic, the loss on operation, maintenance, and interest on capital represents a large proportion of the annual deficit on the national railway system. The mileage between the above points is 834.3 and, at $125,000 per mile, which is a fair estimate of the cost at the present time, amounts to $104,287,500 capital investment. If the Peace River territory is not obtained as a feeder for this main artery, it will preclude any possibility of the traffic necessary to provide revenues sufficient to carry the interest on this capital investment.

2. The Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia and Central Canada railways tap the productive portion of the Peace River territory which has been developed up to the present time, and are a valuable addition to any railway system which assumes the responsibility for the future development of that country. These railways were built as colonization lines and, as such, should have received a subsidy from the Dominion government; in fact, 50 miles between Roycroft junction and Grande Prairie on the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia was subsidized to the amount of $6,400 per mile, and $175,000 was paid to assist in the construction of the bridge across Peace river on the Central Canada railway, which sets out clearly the fact that the Dominion government did partially recognize their responsibility in this respect.

Mr. DUNNING: I suggest that the hon. member put the whole letter on Hansard.

Mr. KENNEDY: Very well.

3. The traffic which these lines provide will justify their purchase by the national system, as, under present conditions, the profits on the traffic will almost meet the interest on the capital to be assumed in addition to taking care of the cost of operation and maintenance, and with the future development and settlement of that vast territory will become very valuable to the system as the years go on.

4. The Peace River tract of land in northern British Columbia, which is owned by the crown in the right of the Dominion, contains 3,500,000 acres, 1,200,000 acres of which is reported to be good agricultural land and through which the proposed western outlet for the Peace River would pass; if sold it would provide a large portion of the cost of construction to connect the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia with the national railway at Prince George.

5. For the above reasons it is submitted that the interests of the taxpayers of the Dominion of Canada will be served by obtaining the Peace River territory as a feeder to the Canadian National system.

[Mr. Dunning.]

I have handed you a memorandum showing that a fair valuation of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia and Central Canada railways is approximately $17,472,994.43. Against this, the province has guaranteed debentures totalling $9,420,000, payable in thirty years from the date of issue, and has advanced other sums, from time to time with proper security, totalling $9,388,456.93, making a total claim, as at December 31st, 1925, of approximately $18,808,456.93.

As a basis for consideration, it is suggested that the Dominion government should:

(a) Assume the liability for payment of the said guaranteed bonds, amounting to $9,420,000.

(b) Issue debentures or other security, payable on such terms as may be agreed, for 50 per cent of the amount advanced by the province ($9,388,456.93) as above $4,694,228.47.

I have informed you orally of the nature of the security held by the Royal Bank of Canada, totalling $2,400,000, with accrued interest, and the terms of settlement already suggested. We propose the Dominion government should assume this obligation in addition to the above.

Yours very truly,

J. E. Brownlee.

Minister of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa.

WESTERN POSTAL EMPLOYEES

READJUSTMENT OF SALARIES OF THOSE DISMISSED AND REEMPLOYED

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 252, respecting certain employees of the postal or railway mail service of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair

On section 1—Salaries of certain post office employees who were dismissed and reemployed.

Mr. VENIOT: I might draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the bill is in similar terms to the resolution as amended by the house yesterday, and which was fully discussed the other day. If hon. members will compare section 1 of the bill, which is the only section, with the resolution adopted yesterday, they will find that it is in exact conformity with the resolution as adopted.

Mr. STEVENS: Yesterday when the minister was discussing the resolution upon which this bill is founded, he indicated that there was a certain procedure to be followed. I think he said that an appointee of the Civil Service Commission and an expert of the department would be appointed to check the matter over and to determine the manner in which the terms of the bill should be applied. but I see no such provision in the bill.

Mr. VENIOT: There is no such provision in the bill, because I did not think it necessary to insert it. If, however, the committee regard it as necessary, it will be an easy matter to add a second clause to the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: Speaking for myself, I would say unquestionably that it ought to be in the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know whether my hon. friend was in the house yesterday when the Postmaster General made his statement. He indicated then the method that would be taken to ascertain what remuneration, if any, was due to certain of the employees of the department. As I recall it, an officer of the Post Office department and one from the Civil Service Commission were to cooperate with the postmaster at Winnipeg in making a report to the minister. I do not know whether my hon. friend really feels that that ought to be incorporated as a section of the act. It is purely an administrative matter, and I think that the word of the ministry in a matter of that kind ought to be sufficient; there is no desire on the part of the government to deal with the matter in any unfair way. But to put a purely administrative clause dealing with detail into a bill which merely provides for repaying men what is owing to them seems to me to be loading the bill perhaps unduly.

Mr. STEVENS: May I draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that this bill contains the proviso, "notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act." In other words, so far as this matter is concerned the Civil Service Act is repealed or entirely superseded. We have set up under the Civil Service Act certain machinery to deal with the civil service of Canada, and therefore inasmuch as you are eliminating the Civil Service Act entirely from this matter —by the way, may I interject here this suggestion, that a lot of these men were placed in their positions in the Winnipeg post office without reference to the Civil Service Commission, after they were reemployed in contravention of the terms of the Civil Service Act—

Mr. THORSON: All the appointments were made by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. STEVENS: No sir, the men were put in their positions in contravention of the terms of the Civil Service Act, or without reference to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. THORSON: All the appoinments were made by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is in error.

Mr. VENIOT: The only exception was the age limit.

Mr. STEVENS: I think it will be found that I am absolutely correct in what I am saying. Therefore I contend that this bill should contain a clause setting out the manner in which this extraordinary procedure is to be carried out; because we must admit it is not the ordinary procedure. There should be recognition of the Civil Service Commission and its knowledge of the technique in this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that to be logical I think any reference to the Civil Service Commission should be left out. I agree entirely with him that these men were reemployed notwithstanding the Civil Service Act. When the original resolution was before the house I gathered from what the right hon. leader of the opposition said that the men had been reinstated under an order in council passed by virtue of the War Measures Act, and that that was the reason why the civil service law had been ignored. I have since discovered that the order in council was not passed under the War Measures Act at all, but as a matter of fact it was simply an arbitrary act on the part of the government of the day. Now, all this measure proposes is that where those men have been employed on a certain class of work at a lower rate of wages than is paid to other employees in that class, they shall be paid the difference in remuneration due to them on that score.

Mr. MANION: Should not the right hon. gentleman use the word "reemployed" rather than "reinstated"?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, instead of "reinstated" I should have used the word "reemployed." I gathered from the discussion when the resolution was originally introduced that we were practically in agreement on the question of paying the men the difference between what they are or were actually earning in accordance with the rate of wages the positions carry and what they are or were being paid. The only difference between us was whether that extra payment should be retroactive. The house having passed the resolution and adopted the principle of the bill, the only question which remains is that of the method by which we shall ascertain what is due to the men. The Minister of Justice says it would be difficult to frame a clause setting out this feature which is wholly administrative. Therefore I should hope that hon. gentlemen opposite would accept the Postmaster General's statement to the house as to the method he proposes, with the obligation of course on his part of being responsible to the house for carrying out matters in accordance with that method. I should think this should be sufficient.

Mr. GUTHRIE: May I ask the Prime Minister if the bill as now drawn does provide for retroactive pay? I was not here when the discussion took place on the resolution. I understand from reading the discussion that my hon. leader, who is absent to-day, took the ground that he would not agree to a proposal which provided for retroactive pay. Does the modified proposal provide for retroactive pay?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite right. The only difference between us is that the government maintains that these men where they have actually performed the work should be paid for it at the current rates, whether it relates to the future or to the past. I gathered at the time the measure was under discussion that the leader of the opposition did not wish to go to the length of paying for work done in the past, although it had not been paid for at the current rates. I had rather hoped that in the interval my hon. friends opposite had changed their views. On that point there is still a difference between us.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the Postmaster General kindly say how much money this measure will involve?

Mr. VENIOT: On a previous occasion I said $123,000. Since then I have been able to go into it minutely and I do not think the cost will exceed $100,000. Since the committee sat last we have ascertained that the Winnipeg authorities have an absolutely correct record of all the men reemployed and the positions they were put in and as they graduated—if I may use that term from one class to another, and the difference in the rates of salaries, and so forth. That is why yesterday I suggested that two persons be appointed, one representing the department itself, the administrative end, and the other the Civil Service Commission, and that these two men go to Winnipeg. Then with the information they already had and the information they would get in Winnipeg, they could take the list of 96 men, go over it in detail, and work out each individual case. Under the system there may be some who, having come in later, will not be entitled to anything; there are others who came in at the first and certainly will be entitled to be considered under this bill. It is a matter that will take some time to work out. Working off and on, I think the two gentlemen I have in mind could complete their task in about two months. As I say, they would have to go to Winnipeg, get the balance of the information there and work it out from both ends, from the departmental end here and from the Winnipeg end. By that system it can be done.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has the minister any clear conception as to how this can be worked out? For instance, these men, had they stayed in the service, would have got promotion. Not having stayed in the service, but being reemployed, some of them later got promotion. How are you going to average the graduation between those two promotions? It is absolutely impossible.

Mr. VENIOT: That will have to be worked out from the very first moment the men were taken back, dealing with it year by year and taking into consideration what promotion they were entitled to and got during that time, and also what extra amount of money those promotions brought to them. It will take some considerable time to work out the details.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister does not get my point. Supposing there had been no strike, and these men had stayed in the service, automatically they would have got promotion, would they not.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is one step. Then you reemploy them and they get promotion along another line; how are you going to readjust those two lines?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend, I am afraid, is confusing the present bill with the original resolution. As originally introduced there was all the difficulty my hon. friend sees in making the assessment, if I may use that term, because it would have put the men in the same position they would have been in if they had not gone on strike. All the present bill does is to take into account the work a man is doing or has done in the particular position occupied and if he is being or has been paid less than other men in similar positions, then he shall be given the difference.

Mr. McGIBBON: The Prime Minister does not get my point. How is he going to get at what they would have earned?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not what they would have earned; it is what they have actually earned. For instance, take a man who is a sorter. He is working with a lot of sorters in the office. Let us suppose he is one of the men who went out on strike. When he was reemployed he was reemployed as a postal helper, and he has been receiving the wages of a postal helper, notwithstanding that he has been doing the work of a sorter. All this bill provides is that when that sort of thing happens, or has happened, the man who has been doing a sorter's work shall be paid as though he were entitled to sorter's wages from the time that he was engaged on sorter's work. That is all.

Mr. McGIBBON: That would be all right from the start; but how are you going to decide two or three years afterwards what position he might have been in?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What counts is what he has actually done in that time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There should be added to the bill a clause elaborating the system under which the money is to be distributed. As the bill is drawn now the Civil Service Act has no bearing on it at all; the Civil Service Commission is practically wiped out. There is no one left to administer the fund but the Post Office Department and the Postmaster General. He may do it in any way he sees fit and there is no check whatever on him. There are ninety-six men to be provided for, and with the commission wiped out, as it is by the first clause of the bill, the matter is in the hands of the Postmaster General who may deal with the fund as he sees fit. In my opinion the scheme should be elaborated by a new clause; it is entirely too open at the present time. If the scheme is to be worked out under the supervision of the Post Office Department and the Civil Service Commission, let us so state; but as the matter stands the Civil Service Commission will not be appealed to at all. It will be purely a matter of departmental administration by the Post Office Department.

Mr. ROBB: How does my hon. friend reconcile his position this afternoon with reference to this matter with the attitude he took a few days ago when he urged us to put in a special vote for certain postal workers?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I named the postal worker and the amount in each case, and if that is done here it gets over the difficulty.

Mr. GLEN: I have just had the bill presented to me and so far as I can see it does not affect the principle of the argument which has already taken place on this question not only this session but on the previous occasion as well. There is no doubt, from the terms of the bill, that this legislation involves retroactive payments to these postal workers. In other words, any striker who was reemployed—not reinstated—after the strike had been settled will now be entitled to claim salary for the work he performed from the date of reemployment until the present moment. That is a correct statement. I am opposed to the retroactive character of this bill for the reasons I have already stated. These men went out on a sympathetic strike and according to some they had grievances; but having seen the gravity of the situation in which they placed themselves they were taken back into the service. Now that does not justify any government in paying to them salaries for such services as they were willing and anxious to render at that time; they were reemployed as postal helpers and they went back on that understanding, and on that basis they should still be dealt with.

I do not think there is any great merit in what the leader of the opposition says with respect to the way in which the fund will be dealt with, but I do think that some consideration should be given to the principle involved. I cannot, for one, take the position that civil servants in the class of these workers should have the right to strike and thereby upset the whole business of the country; I should as soon expect the police or the army or the navy to take that attitude and go on strike. And if this bill is passed as it stands a precedent will be established and other public servants will feel entitled to similar treatment under circumstances of a like character. Not long ago I read of the strike that took place in England in 1919 on the part of the policemen, and they certainly were not reinstated in the service; and the same principle applies here. I am opposed to the retroactive principle involved in this bill. If these men wish now to get the seniority to which they are entitled I am willing and anxious that they shall be given it, but the retroactive feature I must oppose.

Section agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AGREEMENT FOR THE PURCHASE OF ALBERTA RAILWAYS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 14, consideration of the motion of Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Railways and Canals) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee on Bill No. 71, to incorporate the Northern Alberta Railways Company, and respecting the Canadian National Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): When the house adjourned last night I was pointing out that the Alberta government had offered the Peace River railway to the Canadian National Railways. I notice that I stated the price offered as $14,000,000; I should have said $16,500,000. This was in 1926. Previous to that time the Canadian Pacific Railway had operated the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia and Central Canada railways under an operating arrangement with the Alberta government. They claim to be losing money on the operation of these railways but the Alberta government declined to enter into a lease for a further period of time with the Canadian Pacific Railway; instead they appointed Mr. Callaghan manager of the railways and made a joint traffic arrangement with the Canadian National Railways. There was a very strong feeling in Peace River and in certain sections of Alberta that the Canadian National Railways should get the preference in connection with the purchase of these railways on condition that the offers were alike, in case offers were received from both the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway for their purchase. A large number of members of the legislature took this view. The Grand Prairie district in Peace River was strongly in favour of the Canadian National, the town of Peace River was favourable to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the district north of Peace River, where I reside myself, was somewhat neutral. The people there thought it was up to the Alberta government to get the best price possible.

So far as I am concerned, I have always favoured the acquisition of these railways by the Canadian National Railways because in the first place I am rather favourable to national ownership as against private ownership of railways; and in the second place the Canadian National was in a much better position geographically through the location of its railways and could give the Peace River such service as the Canadian Pacific Railway could not provide without a large expenditure in extensions westward. The Canadian National Railways could give Peace River entry into Vancouver and Prince Rupert with the construction of from 200 to 500 miles of railway, whereas the Canadian Pacific Railway could not do so without building between 600 and 1,200 miles of railway. I have felt all along that if the Canadian National purchased the Alberta railways they were much more likely to work out a solution of the problem so far as the coast outlet was concerned in the near future than was the Canadian Pacific. Between May 3, 1926, and September 17, 1928, a number of offers were made in connection with these railways. The Premier of Alberta offered the Minister of Railways the Central Canada, the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia and the Pembina railways for about $16,500,000. On November 11, 1927, Mr. Hungerford wrote Mr. Brownlee offering $17,200,000, in round figures, on behalf of the Canadian National Railways, but that offer was turned down by the Alberta government. On November 13, 1927, Mr. Brownlee suggested to the Minister of Railways the possibility of a joint offer, because the Alberta government were not satisfied with the offer of the Canadian National Railways and would not accept it, suggesting that a better offer might result through joint action of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. A joint offer was submitted on January 16, 1928, offering somewhat better terms than had been offered by the Canadian National Railways, but this was still unsatisfactory to the Alberta government. On September 17, 1928, the Canadian Pacific bought the road, including the Alberta Great Waterways, for $25,000,000, and on November 26,

It has been felt in Peace river and the view has been expressed in other parts of the country that between the Canadian National Railways and the government a good opportunity was lost to get hold of the Peace river railways; others have thought the Alberta government somewhat unreasonable in their demands, but I do not believe that to be the case, because the price of the Alberta railways went up steadily after 1926. The reason for that increase is shown in the speech delivered by Hon. V. W. Smith in the Alberta legislature during the last session of that body. He said:

> The first full year of government operation, that of 1927, resulted in a net operating surplus for all the northern railways of $303,786.63, as against an operating deficit of $188,655.34 in the previous year. This was regarded by the government as a very satisfactory outcome of its policy in assuming control of all the northern roads. The results obtained for the year 1928, however, have been even more satisfactory than those of 1927, and it is gratifying for me to be able to announce that the total operating surplus derived from all the northern railways for the year 1928 is $810,209.41.

That represents an improvement in earning of almost $1,000,000 in two years, and that is why the Alberta government held out for a good price. That is also the reason why the Canadian Pacific Railway came back and finally bought the roads, because after all not much more than a sixth of the land lying close to these railways has been developed, and yet during the last year of government operation the income was almost sufficient to pay not only the operating charges but the fixed charges as well.

Yesterday the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) said he did not see how any member from the prairie provinces could support this agreement, because it might put the Peace River country in the position occupied by the three western provinces before the extension west of the Canadian Northern and other railways. At page 2501 of Hansard the hon. member said:

> I cannot see how hon. members from the prairie provinces can support a bill which puts the new settlers of the Peace river district in a position similar to that from which the farmers of Manitoba freed themselves more than a generation ago.

That position has to be stated generally in this way: The Canadian Pacific Railway had control and the settlers could not get what they wanted in the way of extensions or railway service, but after the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern were built that private monopoly was broken up. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if parliament turns down this bill and does not allow the Canadian National Railways to participate in this scheme, we will be putting the Peace River country in exactly the position occupied by the western provinces some twenty or twenty-five years ago. Because of that fact I was very glad to learn that the Canadian National Railways had decided to go in and help develop that country, because I do not believe this parliament would ratify the construction of another line north, duplicating the present road.

What we want this parliament to do is to take care of the development of that country and build a railway west towards the Pacific coast. The Canadian National Railways could give us an outlet to Vancouver and Prince Rupert without any tremendous expenditure, and if someone comes along with a railway from Stewart we will have three separate outlets. Because of these facts I intend to support this bill.

Mr. DUNNING: Who does my hon. friend suggest should pay for that last outlet? He indicated who should pay for the others.

Mr. KENNEDY: I have an idea that the country pays for all railways in the long run, but I believe that any railway economically built from the Peace River country will pay. Then there is the further fact: if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company took over the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia road and had control of the Peace River country, if I were to come back to parliament next year asking for an outlet to the Pacific the government would say, "Go back and talk to the Canadian Pacific Railway." I would not like to be put in that position. No one has promised more definitely to go ahead and deal with this Peace River outlet than has the Prime Minister of Canada. I am not going to quote his statements to-day, but if the Canadian National Railways did not share in this deal to take over the Alberta railways I am afraid we would have almost to let the government out in connection with all its promises. Now, however, we can ask the Minister of Railways to go ahead with the surveys, in cooperation with the other bodies if he wishes, which were promised us here some two years ago after the report of the committee investigating the whole question, and we can ask the Prime Minister and the government to carry out the promises made by the Prime Minister in Edmonton in 1924, when he said this outlet would be built just as soon as it was humanly possible to do so.

As I understand them, the advantages of the joint ownership scheme are about as follows: We will have in the Peace River country, through the cooperation of the railways, an absence of destructive competition in the building of railways. That means that we should be able to keep away from wrong locations and duplication such as we have had in many parts of the prairie provinces. I think it was demonstrated two years ago that by properly laying out the railways in the Peace River country we would have 6,000 economic acres of land to every mile of railway as against 5,000 acres in the prairie provinces. Another advantage is that we will have a one-line haul to every point touched by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railways throughout Canada, and of course we will get away from any private monopoly.

The disadvantage, I suppose, may develop as suggested by the hon. member for North Vancouver last night; it is that the two companies may disagree in other parts of Canada and that such disagreement may be reflected in the development of the Peace River country. In that case, however, having the government interested in the matter, we would expect the government to act as the arbiter and see that justice is done the settlers of that district.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member has not any faith in the government.

Mr. STEVENS: Not very much.

Mr. KENNEDY: Yes I have, but that does not mean that I think they are perfect.

Mr. STEVENS: It gets rather discouraging sometimes.

Mr. KENNEDY: I am willing to support the government any time they are right, but I will criticize them any time I think they are wrong; that is what I was sent here for. If there is any way in which provision for a coast outlet can be included in this bill, then I will be happy to support that provision.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two with reference to the statements which have been made by the members who have a more or less direct interest in the bill now before the house, providing for the joint acquisition, by the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National railways, of the Alberta lines formerly owned by the provincial government. In connection with this whole question of railway facilities for the Peace River district and the provision of a western outlet, I sometimes think that the people of the Peace River district and of northern British Columbia might well be delivered from their friends, because, apparently, their friends in this parliament are unable to agree as to the remedy for the condition which they describe.

Mr. KENNEDY: The minister suggested a way out two years ago. If he will carry out that suggestion I shall be satisfied.

Mr. DUNNING: When the minister suggested that way out he secured the support of my hon. friend only, and I am afraid that that support is not sufficiently strong nor steady nor constant to warrant the government proceeding on the basis of it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Has the government never proceeded without support?

Mr. DUNNING: The member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) in his address of last evening revealed an intimacy with that part of the country dealt with by the provisions of this bill which suggested an entirely new conception of the Peace River railway situation. He insisted that the Pacific outlet should be Vancouver, as against the view of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Brady), who desires that the outlet be Prince Rupert. I am sure that if the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) were to express his views he would prefer an entirely new outlet at Stewart. I am quite sure that the railway authorities of this country—I am speaking now of those responsible for the management of the two great systems—who will be jointly operating this property, will endeavour to decide these questions in the economic interests of the railways as well as in the economic interests of the country to be developed. I am sure that the people of the district concerned will be likely to receive better results from a study made by those men than from the, shall I say, somewhat divergent views of those who sit in this parliament, sincere though they be.

I do not intend to say anything which might be quoted at any time in the future as a commitment or endorsement of the idea that we should build six hundred miles of railway northeasterly from Peace River crossing to Great Slave lake on the Mackenzie river. As most of the members of the house know, I have very great faith in Canada's northland, but I can see sufficient railway construction ahead in what may be described as the present Peace River proposals without embarking at this time in a northeasterly direction towards Great Slave lake. However,

I would say to the hon. member for North Vancouver that I believe I shall live to see the day when there will be a railhead on Great Slave lake tapping the resources of that great northern area, but I think it is decidedly premature to talk about it in connection with the acquisition of these railways, the nearest point of which is six hundred miles distant from Great Slave lake.

The second criticism is that of the acquisition jointly of these lines by the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific Railways. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) has recited, not unfairly, the circumstances leading up to the position in which we are now placed. I do not criticize the government of Alberta, because, as owners of the lines, they had a perfect right to negotiate and to do the best they could. I might, conceivably, criticize the way they carried on those negotiations, but it was their own business, and I acknowledge their right to do it their own way. On the other hand, I hardly think it fair that the Peace River country should be circularized, through the newspapers and otherwise, with statements regarding this government, and its actions with respect to the Peace River railway. Many of these statements have been distinctly contrary to the facts, and I know the hon. member for Peace River would not himself be responsible for the misrepresentations and, in some cases, the absolute falsehoods which have been indulged in, as is illustrated by a copy of the Grande Prairie Herald, which I hold in my hand. The main insinuation is that in some way Sir Henry Thornton was prevented by this government from offering for these railways as much as they were worth to the Canadian National system. In reply to all such insinuations and statements I can only say that Sir Henry Thornton was placed in exactly the same position in connection with the negotiations for the acquisition of these lines as he was in the case of all the other acquisitions, bills for the authorization of which will be before parliament. That is to say, he was given an absolutely free hand to negotiate, in order to reach, if possible, an arrangement which he, as the chief railway executive, could recommend to this government and which would be satisfactory to the vendors in each case. Having reached that point, the next step was to come to the government in order to have the purchase negotiations and tentative arrangements approved. Sir Henry Thornton was at no time prevented, directly or indirectly, by this government from offering for the Alberta railways what in his judgment they were worth to the Canadian National system. I say this to dispose of that point once and for all.

With regard to the criticism as to the joint acquisition, may I say that the suggestion that an offer be made jointly by both the great railways came to me first by a telegram from Premier Brownlee of Alberta. Being disappointed with the last offer made by the Canadian National Railways independently, Premier Brownlee wired me expressing the view that possibly more satisfactory terms could be secured by both railways acting jointly. At that time I did not have much faith in any result coming about from such a step, but in response to his request I got the two railways together and suggested that an examination should be made of the situation from that point of view. The result was a slightly more favourable offer by the two railways jointly than had been made by the Canadian National individually. As the hon. member for Peace River has said, the joint offer was declined and matters rested there for some time until, finally, the Canadian Pacific Railway made a much larger offer, but a proviso was attached to that offer that the Canadian National Railways should be invited to participate on a fifty-fifty basis in the acquisition of the properties if they so desired.

Mr. HEAPS: Was it not the Alberta government which suggested that proviso, and not the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. DUNNING: I am content to allow both interests to claim the credit, or whatever else may be involved in that.

Mr. KENNEDY: As a matter of fact the Canadian Pacific Railway Company suggested that to the government.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member for Peace River is probably in a better position to know that than I am. That proviso was contained in the offer, and as a result of it the Canadian National Railways was given that opportunity. A careful examination was made by Sir Henry and his officers and it was determined by them to recommend to the government that a half interest be taken, and this is provided for by the bill now before the house. What would be the alternative? That is the important reply to the hon. member for Vancouver North. The alternative would be that the Canadian Pacific would themselves own all of these northern Alberta lines; the Edmonton and Dunvegan railway, the Central Canada railway, the Alberta Great Waterways railway would be entirely owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway. My hon. friend from Vancouver North says that that would be all right; that here is plenty of room in that country for another line; that the Canadian National could build through there on its own. As my hon. friend from Peace River has said, for the Canadian National to build in from the natural point from which it would have to build, provided that it were invading the territory, the existing lines being in the possession of the Canadian Pacific, would involve a very large expenditure. If my memory serves me aright, it would involve an expenditure of $14,000,000 to get into that country before a start was made in building branch lines to serve the country and gather the traffic, and from the moment they started building branch lines from their main stem, they would be duplicating in each case for a considerable distance the lines presently existing there.

Canada has a railway history. That railway history is replete with instances of wasteful duplication of railway building. As is well known by the members of the house, I have set my face strongly against wasteful, uneconomical duplication in so far as we can control it in the future, and certainly I cannot see that it will be economical for the people of the Peace river, or the people of Canada generally, to have both companies building into the Peace river district and duplicating the facilities. It is all very well to say that the Canadian Pacific spends its own money, but the Canadian Pacific requires to pay interest on that money out of freight rates paid by the people of Canada. The public must pay, and in that connection I have found the presidents of both railway systems responsive to the argument that so far as possible they shall keep out of each other's way in their extension programs and thus avoid wasteful duplication. There are difficulties of course. Both presidents have active, keen, efficient organizations, each one striving to make the best for itself, and naturally they are competing fairly keenly all along the line. But in spite of that, I think we can say that during the past three years, and in the programs which have been forecast this session for the future, there is a disposition to avoid the economic mistake of wasteful duplication. The alternative, I say, in answer to the criticism of the hon. member for Vancouver North, is that the Canadian Pacific would own these lines and the Canadian National would have to choose whether it would stay out of that area for a considerable time to come or duplicate existing facilities at much greater cost to the country than the passing of this bill would involve.

May I say this with reference to the argument of my hon. friend from Vancouver North that the people of the district will not be well served because of those two corporations uniting and controlling the transportation of the country? I have in mind the fact that the legislature of Alberta, containing the representatives of the people most intimately concerned, has unanimously—I believe I am correct in saying unanimously—endorsed this legislation. The agreement by its terms was required to be submitted to the legislature of Alberta and to the parliament of Canada. So far as I was able to learn how the matter was discussed in the Alberta legislature, there was no opposition on the basis of the argument advanced by my hon. friend from Vancouver North. Had such an argument been advanced strongly by a considerable proportion of the members of the Alberta legislature that injury would be done to their people by such an arrangement, we would have been bound to take cognizance of it in dealing with the bill here. But in view of the fact that the people on the ground and most interested have endorsed this project, I think we can take it for granted that their interests have been fairly well protected in the agreement which has been reached.

As to the further argument that, both railways being represented fifty-fifty on the board of directors, it will mean a deadlock, supposing there is a proposal by one of the partners to build a branch line in a certain direction and the other party does not agree, of course the answer is that there will be nothing binding—

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to a point of order. What particular motion is before the chair, might I ask?

Mr. SPEAKER: Number 11.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: That the Speaker do now leave the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is not debatable.

Mr. DUNNING: We have been debating it since yesterday afternoon, and this is my first intervention in the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is debatable because it is on the orders of the day.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to finish my speech in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would not be debatable if it were not on the orders of the day, under rule 38.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Go on, then.

Mr. DUNNING: The only complaint I have is that three hon. gentlemen who spoke yesterday and to-day were in order, and I am not.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We are anxious to get on.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be just a few minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 38 reads:

The following motions are debatable:—
Every motion (a) standing on the order of proceedings for the day.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not, of course, want to impede my own legislation. But on the other hand, neither do I think it is wise that arguments from three different directions should be advanced in connection with a very important financial and transportation measure without the facts being set forth in reply. I know the house is well disposed to allow this bill to pass along, and I promise not to prevent its progress for many more minutes.

The last point I want to make is the one to which I was referring before the point of order was raised. As regards the argument advanced that branch line construction will be prevented, because of disagreement between the partners, my answer is that there is in the agreement nothing which would prevent either partner from proceeding to build a branch line owned by itself from any point on the joint enterprise. That is the best answer I can make to the argument that the people will not receive branch line service because of disagreement between the two partners. Either partner, after securing a charter from the proper source, which is this parliament, may build a branch line from a point on the jointly owned property if the two partners cannot agree to build a branch line as part of the jointly owned enterprise. This is not provided in the agreement, but it is possible since there is nothing to prevent it, and this parliament has the power to grant charter rights.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Would they be guaranteed running rights over the existing lines?

Mr. DUNNING: The agreement itself, of course, contemplates that. Either party may operate over existing lines. I think that is all that I have to say at this time. I feel sure no one will expect me to make any commitment regarding future construction of a western outlet, I would, however, say in reply to my hon. friend from Peace River in that regard, that the final settlement of the ownership by these two great railway corporations of the Peace River line will ensure a careful and continuous study on their part, from the point of view of their own wellbeing, of what it is best to do with regard to a western outlet.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee on the bill, Mr. Marcil in the chair.

Sections 1 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GRAND MERE—EAST BURRILLS

The house in committee on Bill No. 166, to amend an act respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Grand Mere and East Burrills, in the province of Quebec—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line described in schedule.

Mr. GEARY: I think the minister might give some explanation to the committee as to the largely increased cost in this particular case.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend remembers, of course, the discussion in the railway committee, but the house generally is not aware of that. When the bill was before the house previously, some question was raised, I think by the leader of the opposition, as to whether, in view of the high cost, it would be possible for the Grand Mere-East Burrills project to earn interest upon the outlay; whether it was economically sound. Since then I have had that question carefully investigated, and I find that on the basis of presently existing traffic the economies effected will be equivalent to 7½ per cent upon the total cost, inclusive of the increase provided for in this bill. The section of the railway referred to is one of the busiest sections of the Canadian National system, and the traffic can be expected to increase as time goes on and, consequently, to produce an even greater return upon the investment.

The two causes for the increased cost in this case were the increased cost of right of way and the increased cost of the grading due to a very much larger quantity of material to be moved. Quoting from the engineer's report:

Over one mile in length of the line was through the town of Shawinigan Falls, about in the middle of which provision was made for a yard requiring more than normal width of right of way. Not only did it cost more to buy the right of way through Shawinigan Falls but the whole right of way proved to be over double that figured on. In practically every case a process of law had to be resorted to in order to settle the prices paid. Presumably one reason why excessive prices were asked was because the railway was not wanted by the farmer through whose land it passed as he would get no service additional to what he already had.

The increase in quantities of material required to be moved was due to the nature of the material itself. Generally speaking the overburden on top of the rock which only outcropped in a few places on the line, was a stratum of sandy material about eight or nine feet in depth under which was brown or blue clay. In most cases this lower material was blue clay of a very wet and soft consistency, which when disturbed at all became unstable. This instability in cuttings caused sliding or sloughing-in of the materal into the cuttings, and where embankments were made from it, it slid or squashed out. This condition varied considerably in individual cases. Some of the material was so bad that the embankments could not be made from it, and other material had to be brought from a greater distance to take its place.

A description of the largest and worst cutting will give an example of how this material acted. The cutting in question was located about a mile from the west end of the line and immediately west of a rock tunnel on the line. It was about nine hundred feet in length and at the deepest part was sixty feet in depth. The material was so soft after having been dug with a steam shovel that when dumped out of the cars used for hauling it, it ran like thin porridge and proved utterly worthless for filling material. In fact, substantially all of it was deposited off a few feet of trestle built alongside a gully and it immediatey flowed or moved from this gully until it reached the St. Maurice river about a mile away.

We estimate that by reducing the gradient to one-half the existing gradient and by doubling the load behind a standard locomotive, the economies effected will be sufficient on the basis of existing traffic to pay 7½ per cent on the whole cost of the undertaking.

ROSEDALE SOUTHEASTERLY

The house in committee on Bill No. 168, to amend an act for the construction of a Canadian National railway line, being a joint section from Rosedale southeasterly in the province of Alberta—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Marcil in the chair.

On section 1—Schedule amended.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I explained this bill when it was before the house for second reading. It has since been to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and now returns to be finally dealt with here. There is no change in the amount of money, but there is a change in the method of expenditure on the line.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

QUEBEC ORIENTAL AND ATLANTIC, QUEBEC AND WESTERN RAILWAYS

The house in committee on Bill No. 173, respecting Canadian National Railways and to authorize the acquisition of the Quebec Oriental Railway and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railway—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Laflamme in the chair.

On section 1—Authority to purchase Quebec Oriental and Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railways.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw to the attention of the committee the fact that in November, 1927, an investigation of the Quebec Oriental Railway and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railway, as regards their proposed acquisition by the Dominion government, was held by two reputable officers of the department, who submitted a report. This report is signed by R. C. Henry and another gentleman whose signature I cannot make out, but he describes himself as assistant engineer.

Mr. DUNNING: W. H. McGann.

Mr. STEVENS: I thank the minister for his assistance. I suggest that Mr. McGann improve his signature. In the report certain facts are set forth. It is obvious that these two officers discharged their duty with great care and skill. They review in detail and with great ability all the facts of the case, and they conclude their report with these words—I am quoting paragraph 15—

It does not appear that the acquisition of these lines could ever become profitable to the Dominion government.

That ought, I think, to have influenced the committee and the government and the Canadian National Railways' management in regard to this matter before taking these lines over.

Mr. DUNNING: It did.

Mr. STEVENS: I was not a member of the committee and was unable to attend its sittings and there deal with the matter. So I shall have to take this opportunity of drawing attention to the report. Before referring to a few facts set forth in the report, may I ask the minister if he will be kind enough to tell me whether in the acquisition of this line by the Canadian National Railways they assume the mortgage indebtedness?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: They do not. Will the minister tell me what will become of the mortgage indebtedness?

Mr. DUNNING: The line is in the hands now of trustees for the bondholders, that is, in the hands of its own bondholders, who are of course the holders of the bonds secured by mortgage. They must give a complete discharge. All the negotiations which have been undertaken have been between the management, Sir Henry Thornton personally, and the trustee for the bondholders, Sir William Plender, of a firm of chartered accountants in London, England.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I understand we are purchasing this line from the trustee of the bondholders?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: The first and second bondholders?

Mr. DUNNING: The whole business.

Mr. STEVENS: Is that fact set forth in the bill; if so, just where? I am asking for information.

Mr. DUNNING: In sections 2 and 3.

Mr. STEVENS: The report to which I refer shows that this railway has received in cash subsidies and in lands, which were sold for a certain figure, $3,750,000, of which the Dominion government contributed about $1,800,000. In other words, we—the Dominion and the provincial government of Quebec—have already put into these lines $3,750,000. We are proposing now to pay $3,500,000 for them, which will discharge the bonded obligations of $3,750,000. These are just rough figures. I notice that in this report the two experts to whom I have referred state:

> The estimated cost of reproduction, less depreciation, arrived at by using present day prices, is $7,000,000.

I do not think the committee should be misled into the opinion that it is worth $7,000,000. That is, physically to reproduce the line in first class shape would cost $7,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: No, not in first class shape; in the condition in which it now is.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, to reproduce it.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. DUNNING: In its present condition. My hon. friend said "in first class shape". That is hardly correct.

Mr. STEVENS: The reproduction value.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: That would be the physical value of the property, not having in mind the earning value.

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Mr. STEVENS: They say the scrap value of the railways is estimated at $530,000. There is a vast difference between the two.

Mr. DUNNING: Always is.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, always is. But it might be well to keep in mind this—that these railways, in spite of the receipt of cash subsidies amounting to $3,750,000, have been unable to pay their operating and overhead expenses, and this to such a degree that the bondholders are willing to sell. I have already referred to the advice of the experts who say that it does not appear that the acquisition of these lines could ever become profitable to the Dominion, and notwithstanding this the National Railways are acquiring the property. In the face of the financial obligations to which reference was made yesterday, I submit to the minister that this is a very questionable action on the part of the National Railways and, in the light of this report, disposes us to scrutinize with greater care than we have done in the past the suggestions of the railway. I say that with regret, because I have said to the minister on two or three occasions, and said it gladly, that we have been reposing tremendous confidence in the management of the National Railways in any recommendations they make. But I cannot reconcile—

Mr. DUNNING: I do hope my hon. friend will turn the searchlight with equal force on each one of the succeeding bills which have to do with purchases. I think it is proper and right that he should.

Mr. STEVENS: I am picking this bill out because I know that there is an adverse report, and if there are adverse reports in regard to the others the fact ought to be disclosed.

Mr. DUNNING: I will discuss the word "adverse" later.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite willing to leave it at that. But let me repeat what I was saying. We have received the recommendations of the management of the Canadian National Railways with a great deal of favour in this house in recent years, and I should like to voice this opinion, that the National Railways management must be very careful in recommending a purchase of this character in the teeth of a report of the nature to which I have referred. I submit to the minister that there are features of this purchase, disclosed in this report, which make me very doubtful indeed of the wisdom of proceeding with the purchase.

Mr. MARCIL: I am glad the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has discussed this bill. This is an undertaking which dates back many years. I will not go over the history of it because I do not wish to delay the house. But I may observe that in 1882 Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Railways while Sir Hector Langevin was chief of the province of Quebec, and the latter advocated and obtained the authority of parliament for the construction of a branch line of the Intercolonial railway from Matapedia towards Gaspé along the north shore of the baie de Chaleur. Parliament acquiesced in the proposal and the undertaking was commenced by the Dominion government as the construction of a branch line of the Intercolonial. The first twenty miles were accordingly built under contracts given by the Department of Railways. Unfortunately, about the same time the legislature of Quebec had incorporated a local company called the Baie de Chaleur Railway Company, with which was connected Mr. Robitaille, a former representative of Bonaventure in this house, Mr. Riopelle, another member of this house and a former representative of that county, and Mr. C. N. Armstrong, a noted promoter in the province of Quebec. These gentlemen induced the Dominion government to give up the undertaking and to hand it over to the local company known as the Baie de Chaleur Railway Company and composed of those whom I have named. The misfortunes of the people of Gaspé and Bonaventure commenced from that time in 1884. The people there had witnessed, and had contributed to, the construction of the Intercolonial railway which runs through the Matapedia valley in my constituency and crosses the river Matapedia into New Brunswick and the maritime provinces. They who had contributed their share to the construction of this railway, linking up Quebec with the maritime provinces, were left to one side and this undertaking of the local company was carried on purely through subsidies granted by the Dominion government and by the legislature of Quebec. So long as the subsidies lasted the undertaking was carried on as best it could be, with the help of the municipalities and of the farmers, who gave right of way without compensation. As a matter of fact many of those farmers are unpaid to this day. When I had the honour of being elected for that constituency in 1900 I found the railway stranded at Caplin, eighty miles from Matapedia, the railway subsidies exhausted, and the road not operated for six months of the year during the winter. I therefore undertook to secure the consent and approbation of the parliament of Canada to extend railway facilities to the people of that peninsula who were among the oldest settlers of Canada, descendants of people who settled when Jacques Cartier discovered Canada. I sought to give them some of the benefits which we had been providing for the rest of the country in a matter of railway accommodation. The hon. the Speaker (Mr. Lemieux) and myself have witnessed during thirty-two sessions the construction of continental and branch line railways all over Canada and now we merely ask for approval for one simple proposal, namely, that this branch line, running 200 miles from Matapedia to Gaspé, connecting with the Intercolonial railway, and receiving all its business from the Canadian National Railways—it can do business with no other railway—be utilized as a branch line, as it was intended to be regarded the day it was constructed. With the aid of subsidies voted in 1901 the line was extended to Paspebiac, one hundred miles from Matapedia. His Honour the Speaker had the distinction at that time of being the representative of probably the only constituency in Canada without a mile of railway, and naturally he undertook to bring about the extension of that line as originally planned by those great leaders of public opinion, Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Hector Langevin, and later by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He endeavoured to have it extended to Gaspé. The charter was passed, the usual subsidies were voted, and in addition a subsidy of $250,000 was granted by the house towards the construction of numerous iron and steel bridges across the river emptying into baie de Chaleur. An English company undertook to build the railway and completed the work in 1911, when it had reached Gaspé. Shortly after that, in 1914, this house passed what was known as the Branch Lines Act, a measure which authorized the government of Canada to acquire every branch line of 200 miles connecting with the Canadian Government Railways, at that time largely the Intercolonial railway. They took over a dozen lines in the maritime provinces and in Quebec, but this railway was left to one side. In 1914 the war came on, and that was put forward as an excuse for doing nothing. Nor was anything done until 1921, when the Liberal party returned to office and the argument was again taken up by the people of these two counties asking that this railway should form part and parcel of the Canadian National Railways and be given the same treatment as had been meted out to others throughout the country.

Now I am speaking not for one party but for the whole population of that district; I am representing the views of all political parties, religions and creeds. And I am glad to know that I am speaking also on behalf of the Conservative party, because two years ago, on the 2nd of August, 1926, the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, who then undertook the campaign which led him to his defeat in the month of September, opened that campaign in my constituency at Carleton.

Mr. STEVENS: That was the cause of the defeat?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes. He was accompanied by Mr. Patenaude, his first lieutenant in Quebec and they were ferried across from Bathurst in New Brunswick by Mr. Angus McLean in a tug, landing at Carleton. Fortunately a correspondent of the Canadian Press accompanied Mr. Meighen on that occasion and reported his remarks which are to be found in the Montreal Gazette of August 2, 1926, and I desire merely to quote that part of his address referring to this railway situation. He congratulated the people on the progress they had made in that hard country, where they have long winter seasons and large families to keep up, and after referring to the fact that from these two constituencies 1,200 boys were sent to the front during the war, he went on to state:

> One could not help realizing that there might be indeed a gratifying development if there could be found a method of extending to this district, as yet relatively thinly populated, something of the help which the Dominion has been able to give to other parts of the Dominion. I know that your resources are many and precious. You have splendid timber resources. You have mineral resources. Your agricultural resources are as yet only tapped. It will be impossible that these will progress as you expect, unless something is done to help with the transportation of your commodities. . . . . I am quite aware that there are difficulties in the way. I never could be convinced that it is not going to mean considerable outlay over a considerable time. But I intend to give sympathetic consideration to this question. I am going, as it were, to put my head into it. I hope to say to the people of this province—I promise I will say to them whenever I occupy the post of Prime Minister by the verdict of the people—that whatever is done for any part of the Dominion, the same measure of generosity, the same measure of justice will be given to the province of Quebec and to every part of the province of Quebec.

Some days later he appointed my opponent, Doctor Paquet, as Minister of Health and Soldier's Civil Re-establishment, notwithstanding his campaign at that time which had become notorious. On August 23 Doctor Paquet was sworn in to this portfolio as a member of the Meighen administration, and stated publicly that if within two years this railway situation was not settled and the railway linked up with the Canadian National Railways, he would retire from the House of Commons and resign his portfolio.

Matters went along until 1923, when the Speaker of this house, acting for his constituency and for my own, called upon the government to have this situation investigated by the railway commission. On that occasion I had the honour of accompanying the commission as far as Gaspé; they were accompanied by their entire staff and spent about three days investigating the situation. In their report is included a statement by Judge McKeown, who spoke on behalf of the commission, confirming the statement made some years previously by Hon. F. B. Carvell when he was chairman of the commission. On July 21, 1920, Mr. Carvell said:

> It is, therefore, quite evident that this road is in very much the same position as the branch lines in New Brunswick, excepting that, in my opinion, it goes through a better country as a rule than do the New Brunswick roads. There are more people to patronize it, more business to be done, the road-bed is in better condition, and it offers a better guarantee of business than any of the other branch lines with which we have been dealing during the past three years.

Mr. STEVENS: What year was that?

Mr. MARCIL: July 21, 1920; Mr. Carvell went there to investigate certain matters in connection with the operation and service given by the road. Mr. McKeown subsequently reported on the situation and came to the same conclusion, that these railways should be taken over by the Canadian National system. The proposal made by the company at that time was that the road be taken over at a price of $4,000,000. Judge McKeown thought the price not unreasonable but did not consider the time opportune to proceed with the proposition. However, he agreed with the findings of Mr. Carvell that the country was entitled to better service than it had been receiving.

In 1923 the Bishop of Gaspé, His Lordship Monsignor Ross, who was appointed Bishop of Gaspé some six years ago, at our suggestion called a huge meeting of the people of both constituencies to discuss this situation with Sir Henry Thornton and his staff. That was late in the season and the available halls were not sufficiently large to accommodate the crowd, so His Lordship permitted the use of the largest church in the peninsula. The meeting took place between Sir Henry Thornton, the bishop and representatives of the county and both constituencies; there were present English and French, Tories and Grits, and this matter was threshed out for about three hours. Sir Henry Thornton was impressed with what had been said and he stated that he hoped the time was not far distant when he would be called upon to operate these roads. He also confirmed what Judge McKeown had said in 1925 with regard to the successful operation of the important industries located on these railways, which were hampered by the fact that they were unable to get a satisfactory through service either for freight or for passenger traffic, which unity of operation and control could secure. That result was necessary to the development of that part of the country, no matter how it might be attained.

At present our people are in this position: They have to pay freight on the Atlantic, Quebec and Western railway; they have to pay freight on the Quebec Oriental railway, and then their products must be transferred to the Canadian National railway to reach other parts of Canada. There is a large pulp mill in Chandler, and when I accompanied Judge McKeown on his investigation we were told that if a through rate to Chicago could be secured the production of the pulp mill would be doubled. That is just one instance. Now we have mining developments in that country; we have farming and we are hundreds of miles away from the closest market. We cannot get our products to market under the rates which are available to people on the other side of the bay, who are on the main line. We ask merely for the same treatment as is given to other parts of the country. If the Canadian National Railways desire to overcome the deficit east of Levis they can do so only by developing that part of the country through which these lines run. The Gaspé peninsula has an area of 10,000 square miles, the size of a couple of ordinary European kingdoms, and the surface of that territory has been hardly scratched. We have a population of about 60,000 law abiding people, but I am sorry to say that the young men have been compelled to leave these constituencies for the United States or other parts of Canada in order to secure a livelihood. Our industries all have gone, one after the other; the wood is being rafted across to Bathurst, where it is manufactured by the Bathurst Lumber Company. The same thing has happened at New Richmond and Nouvelle; the wood is taken to Dalhousie, Campbellton and other points in New Brunswick where they have the advantage of through rates and where they are able to do business on a fair basis. We merely ask that we be given the same advantages, and we are quite convinced that this parliament will not refuse us.

If I had the time I could read many resolutions which have been adopted by the board of trade of the city of Quebec and by other associations asking that the condition be remedied and stating that the time has now come when this railway should be taken over. In nearly every case where we authorize branch lines in the west the cost runs about $35,000 per mile; we are securing this railway for $17,500 per mile, which is exactly 50 per cent of the capital which has been invested. When this matter was being discussed in the railway committee Sir Henry Thornton was heard, as well as other officers of the railway, and it might not be amiss to quote from what Sir Henry Thornton said on that occasion. A question was put in the committee as to the possibilities of return. I have had the honour of voting for many railways in this country and the question as to whether a railroad would or would not pay has never been brought up. The questions have always been as to whether it would increase the population or whether it would serve the population already in the country.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. MARCIL: I am going to quote from Sir Henry's remarks in the railway committee.

Mr. GARDINER: Recently?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes, when this bill was under consideration. Sir Henry Thornton said:

> There are two aspects to this situation. First, the purchase price of the railway as compared with the immediate returns; secondly, the prospects of the railway as an earner in hands which will indicate that an effort will be made to secure the assistance of the people of the Gaspé peninsula in creating traffic and development. That is a situation which always confronts the Canadian National Railway, as a state-owned property, in this sense, that it stands in a somewhat different relationship to the various communities which it serves than does a purely privately-owned company, in that it must give greater regard to the assistance of communities in their development.

Now, the principle which underlies the purchase of this property is not much different from the principle we have followed in building branch lines throughout the west for development purposes.

Mr. GEARY: Is the hon. member quoting Sir Henry Thornton?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes. Sir Henry continues:

It happened that in this case the railway is already built. In the west the railways were not built, but we were pledged to embark upon new construction, but the underlying principle in each case is to give to each one of the communities a service which offers prospective traffic and an opportunity for the community to develop. As I said, in this case we are purchasing a railway already built, in the west we are building new railways; the principle is naturally pretty much the same.

The hon. member who has just put a question to me was present in the committee and cross-questioned Sir Henry pretty thoroughly with regard to this matter. That deals with the economic aspect of the question, with which, not being an engineer, I am not familiar. But there is another portion of Sir Henry's remarks which I would like to quote, as follows:

The purchase price is $3,500,000, which was arrived at after negotiations with the trustees, and represents the cost of reproduction now less depreciation less subsidies paid. The Gaspé railways were exploited by Alfred M. Carpenter, at one time proprietor of the Charing Cross bank—

That is an error, as Mr. Carpenter never operated the railway. Sir Henry continues:

—which became bankrupt a great many years ago, and the property has since been operated by trustees for the bond holders.

That briefly represents the historical and physical conditions, and I can say that the negotiations were carried on by myself with Sir William Plender, a well known chartered accountant in London, England, who represents the trustees.

After some negotiations with him, it was agreed to purchase the property for $3,500,000, subject to the approval of parliament. That represents 50 cents on the dollar invested.

This territory has, for a long time, suffered from inadequate transportation facilities and, for that reason, has been unable to participate in the development which has taken place elsewhere in Canada. The population is an exceedingly thrifty, hardworking population, of the best of our French stock.

It was felt that if the railway fell into hands which would foster development in the peninsula, lend its efforts with the people of the peninsula for development purposes, coupled with the possibilities of a large tourist traffic, that a considerable impetus would be given to development in the Gaspé peninsula, and it was for those reasons that it was thought desirable by the Canadian National Railways to take over the line.

As my time is limited I will not be able to go into this matter much further. The hon. member for Vancouver mentioned a report which was made by the Canadian National railway officials, the last paragraph of which reads as follows:

It does not appear that the acquisition of the Quebec Oriental Railway by the Canadian government could ever become profitable.

There is only one railway official of that opinion, and no matter how important the opinion may be it is merely an opinion and it deals with the future. I have been in the house for thirty-two years and I have heard many false prophecies made by very outstanding men. I was up in the press gallery when it was predicted that the Canadian Pacific Railway would never pay for the grease used in its operation. That prediction was made by some very eminent men, and many other false prophecies have been made in the house.

The Gaspé peninsula has an area of 10,000 square miles. It contains abundant lumber, minerals and other natural products—mines are being developed now for the production of zinc and lead—as well as abundant fisheries. It has a magnificent harbour which is the closest in North America to Liverpool, being only four days' sail from Gaspé. This harbour was large enough to shelter in 1914 the thirty-three warships and transports carrying the first contingent to England, and to have had in 1866 the honour of sheltering the convoy of His Royal Highness Prince Edward, afterwards King Edward VII. The people of this Gaspé peninsula have contributed their mite to the upbuilding of Canada. They are prepared to continue to do their share in the future, and are asking only for fair treatment at the hands of parliament. I know the hon. member for Vancouver and his colleagues on the other side would be acting in accordance with the wishes of their political friends in those two constituencies if they would give consideration to this bill. We are simply asking that justice be done. The demand is not unreasonable and I hope there will be no further trouble and that the bill will be adopted. The manner in which these people have been treated has not been a credit to Canada, and I hope the house will allow the bill to pass.

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in reference to this bill. I happen to know the Gaspé peninsula and the railway in question. I wish to repeat in the House of Commons what I said in the railway committee, namely, that I support the taking over of this railway. Why? This is a section of the country which is most attractive, contains a fine population and, I believe, has a future. But in any case it is a large section which is not adequately served at the present time and I think, on the policy that we have been carrying out elsewhere throughout the Dominion, it is time that we gave a fairly good service to Gaspé. I have taken an interest in this area and the people there have waited patiently a long time. Therefore I have pleasure in supporting the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: When this bill was before the railway committee we secured a good deal of information in regard to the history of the railway. The hon. member for Bonaventure just a few minutes ago gave the committee some information which is evidently a transcript of the address that Sir Henry Thornton delivered before the committee. I want to call attention to a very peculiar incident that occurred in the committee at that time. There is a record made by the reporters of the proceedings in connection with this bill in the railway committee. We have never before had any of the business of the railway committee recorded by the reporters this session or for many sessions past; but in view of the fact that Mr. Speaker and the hon. member for Bonaventure were very much interested in the acquisition of this line by the Canadian National Railways, no doubt Mr. Speaker took the opportunity of seeing to it that the reporters were present for the purpose of taking down the speeches delivered by Mr. Speaker and the hon. member for Bonaventure. That, of course, is not allowed to the ordinary member of the house; but, Mr. Speaker, being in a privileged position, took advantage of his privileges on this occasion. I want to protest against anything of that description being carried on. There is no question in my mind that Mr. Speaker and the hon. member for Bonaventure will have these speeches printed and broadcast. I do not know whether this will be done at the expense of the public or not, but the country will have to pay for the reporting staff in any case. These two hon. gentlemen will broadcast these speeches in their constituencies, naturally, for their own benefit. I merely make this statement that I object to anything of that description being carried on where certain members have privileges which other members do not secure. It is not fair.

Coming to the question of this railway, from the evidence given before the committee I am satisfied that it will be probably twenty years before this railway pays back a dollar of the capitalization. I am not opposing the acquisition of this railway because I recognize the fact that we have in Canada many sore spots for the healing of which we must make provision such as we are doing by this bill. In the interests of the people of Canada as a whole and of confederation, the house must stretch its conscience sometimes in that regard.

There is another point that I want to bring before the committee, and it is this. If I understand the matter correctly, neither the Intercolonial nor the Transcontinental railway is included in the present capitalization of the Canadian National Railways; the Canadian National is not responsible for the capitalization of either of those two lines. Some two years ago we passed the Maritime Freight Rates Act for the purpose of taking care of the Canadian National in the maritime section, and also for the purpose of reducing freight rates to the extent of 20 per cent of the rates in force at that particular time. I opposed that proposal then because I thought it was poor economics, but in view of the fact that the house finally passed the legislation, I accept that as the best judgment of the house and I am quite willing to support the principle now. But as regards this railway and the next three which are on the order paper, not one of them will be a paying proposition. We cannot hope that for some time to come these four lines will pay even the actual running expenses.

Mr. POWER: How soon does my hon. friend expect the Hudson Bay railway to pay?

Mr. GARDINER: The Hudson Bay railway will, I hope, pay its way within five years, but let me point out to my hon. friend that it is in a very similar position to these and I will explain my position in regard to it a little later on. A moment ago I stated that I do not believe these four lines, taking them as a whole, will pay their way for many years to come. That means that the country will have to pay the losses incurred by the Canadian National Railways under the Maritime Freight Rates Act in connection with these four railways. But, as I stated before, I maintain that these districts are sore spots, and if this house can heal those sore spots, it is our duty to do so.

Another point of importance is that under this legislation the capitalization of these lines will be charged up against the Canadian National and I protest against that procedure. If you are going to buy these railways, then buy them out of moneys provided by the treasury of the country. It is not fair to load up our national system with a number of deadhead railways and then expect the national system to make enough money to pay the interest charges on the capital invested. In view of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, and in view of the fact that the Intercolonial railway and the Transcontinental railway are not charged up against the capitalization of the Canadian National, it is only fair that we should place these four railways on the same basis and relieve the Canadian National of the amount of their capitalization.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is surely not clear there. The Maritime Freight Rates Act does just what he suggests should be done.

Mr. GARDINER: But not so far as capitalization is concerned. The capitalization will be charged up against the Canadian National system.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister please explain the matter then?

Mr. DUNNING: The interest upon the capital invested is a fixed charge which is taken into consideration in determining the payments to be made under the Maritime Freight Rates Act for the deficits incurred under the act.

Mr. GARDINER: It takes care of the deficits.

Mr. DUNNING: Of the interest on the capital.

Mr. GARDINER: If that is so, I am glad indeed to hear it, and so far as I am concerned, as long as these lines are not charged up against the capitalization of the Canadian National, I have no objection to the house taking this attitude towards these four lines, that, as I stated before, they are to all intents and purposes national problems which we have to solve, and so heal these sore spots.

Mr. STEVENS: Before we leave that point, may I ask the minister whether what he says is correct? How is it that this line is included in those recited by Sir Henry Thornton as being part of the provision for capital expenditure next year? On page 117 of the report of the special committee, Sir Henry Thornton is reported as saying, enumerating certain things all of which I shall not read:

The Quebec, Oriental and Atlantic, Quebec Western Railway, $3,500,000.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend evidently did not understand my answer to the hon. member for Acadia. Certainly the money requires to be raised to pay for these railways which we are now discussing, but the interest charge on that money from year to year becomes a fixed charge on a railway included within the area covered by the Maritime Freight Rates Act and, therefore, the interest charge upon the capital is not an ordinary charge upon the system as a whole but becomes a part of the deficit under the Maritime Freight Rates Act if a deficit exists from year to year.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand from the minister that the interest charges will become part and parcel of any deficit which will occur under the operation of the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the original capital necessary to take over these lines be charged against the Canadian National railway system? Will it become part of their capital account? That is the point.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not quite sure what my hon. friend has in mind. What I was anxious to provide was that the system as a whole should not be prejudiced nor placed in a more difficult position because parliament in its wisdom, or lack of it, out of its desire to heal these sore spots to which my hon. friend referred, decided to do a certain thing. So far as that phase of it is concerned, the Maritime Freight Rates Act undoubtedly covers the point because the interest charge is part of the fixed charge and becomes part of the deficit which is made up annually by a vote of this parliament. So far as the whole capital structure of the Canadian National railways is concerned, most certainly all sums represented by actual physical assets are included therein, and I do not think that there can be any exception taken to that.

With reference to the criticisms, my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre made a perfectly understandable criticism on the basis of an economic report made in connection with this line by the Director of Economics who is now Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals and one of the engineers of the Canadian National railway system. I would point out to my hon. friend in that connection that economic surveys, of which this was merely one, were made in connection with all of the lines with which we are dealing in the various bills before the house, and my hon. friend will find the particular comment to which he made reference in the reports on others of these lines as well as the one presently under discussion.

As I said yesterday in connection with these matters, we are linked with the past, and we are dealing with these matters because we are linked with the past, and because the past carries with it certain obligations. My hon. friend from Bonaventure has indicated to us some of the obligations which are involved in connection with the lines now under discussion and I am very glad, I may say, to be able to propose to parliament the carrying out of at least one of the pledges made by the Conservative party at the last election. If I can help in that particular, I am very glad to do so.

Mr. MANION: The minister apparently forgets that the county turned down the proposition.

Mr. DUNNING: I think my hon. friend should say that the county declined the bribe.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is scarcely fair. From the reading of the document by the hon. member for Bonaventure it would appear that Mr. Meighen, who was then the leader of the party, stated that the matter would be given sympathetic consideration. He made no pledge, and my hon. friend knows that.

Mr. DUNNING: But his candidate in that constituency, one of his ministers, a member of the Privy Council of Canada, speaking with all the authority attached to his cabinet position, said: If this road is not taken over in two years, I will have to resign.

Mr. STEVENS: He did not resign.

Mr. DUNNING: He never got the opportunity.

Mr. MANION: Since the minister used the word "bribe," does he consider this a bribe at the present time?

Mr. DUNNING: No, and I regret having used that word, although I used it only in a good-humoured sense. It is quite proper for a political party to give indications to the electorate with regard to any policy which it proposes to put into effect. I regret having used the word. It is not usual for me to use language like that. It is rather more characteristic of some hon. gentlemen I see on the other side.

Mr. MANION: Of whom, for example?

Mr. DUNNING: "A political bribe" is not infrequently used by hon. gentlemen opposite in argument.

Mr. GEARY: Suppose we get on with the discussion.

Mr. DUNNING: I have only this to say, particularly to my hon. friend from Acadia. I think it would be fair in dealing with a matter of this kind to imagine the condition of the Gaspé peninsula without a railway at all. It is easy to conceive of it as a similar area in western Canada, and I venture to say that my hon. friend from Acadia, with those around him, would be one of the first to support a proposal to build a line into such an area containing the resources and population which this area contains. Looked at from that point of view, we are getting a line of railway which conservatively is worth as much as a new branch line.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. DUNNING: Physically, yes. My hon. friends cannot at one time use the report of the experts when they desire to criticize, and then refuse to accept that same report in regard to intrinsic values. At any rate, we are getting this property at $17,500 per mile. Will any of my hon. friends stand up and say that we could build a branch line of the lowest standard for anything like $17,500 per mile?

Mr. GARDINER: That is not the point at issue. The point is whether these lines will pay or not. We expect that a branch line in western Canada will pay and the railway companies say that they will not build unless they can see profits ahead. That is the attitude that Sir Henry Thornton takes in regard to a number of branch lines in western Canada right now.

Mr. DUNNING: If we would only put ourselves in the position of thinking of this great peninsula without any railway at all, I know that my hon. friend would be one of those who would argue that a railway into an area possessing such resources and such population would pay, and I would honour him for it. I am adopting the position that if there were no railway there, then this parliament would undoubtedly be willing to authorize the construction of one, and to build one would cost twice as much as we are spending to buy the one already there. I am not in a position to say that this railway will pay, but I have sufficient faith in the Canadian National organization to know that they can bring about quite an improvement in the traffic returns of that railway by applying to the development of the peninsula which it serves the power of a great organization both in the development of trade, in the development of tourist traffic, and in the development of manufactures.

It is difficult, Mr. Chairman, to deal with these old matters. When the provinces of Canada met with the Dominion government in Ottawa, province after province raised these railway problems, not from the point of view of their economic soundness as proper acquisitions for the Canadian National railway or the Dominion government, but from the point of view of their historical connection and the obligations in a Dominion sense attaching to them. The Dominion government undertook as a matter of policy that the Canadian National management should be asked to look into these various situations and, if possible, to negotiate ways of dealing with them. May I point out to the committee that if the Gaspé railway had happened to be owned by Mackenzie and Mann in 1918 instead of by the poor shareholders of the defunct Charing Cross bank, it would to-day have been a part of the national system, and there would not have been a word of complaint about it, but because the owners happened to be the poor shareholders of the defunct Charing Cross bank instead of Mackenzie and Mann, this railway was left outside.

Mr. EVANS: Does the minister think that Mackenzie and Mann would ever have constructed that road?

Mr. DUNNING: Mackenzie and Mann constructed many a railroad through less promising territory than the Gaspé peninsula, and my hon. friend can think of some instances himself if he will reflect for a moment or two. The point is, after all, we have these railway sore spots. They have been there for years. The file in the Department of Railways and Canals relating to the Gaspé peninsula is a foot thick and goes back pretty well to confederation. The ministers of railways back as far as Sir Charles Tupper helped to promote it, and I think we are doing a good thing for Canada, and we are not harming the Canadian National system in the slightest degree by including these lines within the terms of the Maritime Rates Act.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know whether the minister intended it or not, but I am afraid he did put me in a wrong light. The minister knows very well that I did not object to the buying of this railway.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite so.

Mr. GARDINER: I thought possibly some of his remarks might carry the implication that I objected to its purchase.

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all.

Mr. GARDINER: I said I supported the purchase on general principles for the benefit of Canada. I have nothing further to say so long as the Canadian National system is protected.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. GEARY: Mr. Chairman, as a member of the railway committee which had this bill under consideration, I feel that having considered it very carefully, with practically all the information now submitted to the house before that committee, I must follow the course I then pursued, that is, approve this bill. But I think the Minister of Railways cannot contend for a moment that this is a good business buy. The railway will not pay within any reasonable time that we can anticipate. It is a more or less decrepit railway, old fashioned in its weight of rails, in its bridges, trestles, structures, and equipment.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the weight of rail?

Mr. GEARY: Sixty pounds to the yard, whereas they are now putting in one hundred pound rails.

Mr. DUNNING: Not on branch lines.

Mr. GEARY: From eighty to one hundred pounds. However that may be, the cost of reproduction to-day is the cost of the physical reproduction, less depreciation accrued over the years since the lines were first put in place. But that does not take into account the conditions I have referred to, the inadequate, obsolescent—or whatever you may call it—condition of the railway to say nothing of its not having been kept in proper repair. Sir Henry Thornton says it will cost $147,000 to patch the railway up so that it may take care of the present traffic.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is very close as to the amount, but my understanding of Sir Henry Thornton's statement is that it would require that sum to bring the railway up to normal branch line standard.

Mr. GEARY: We need not quarrel about that. It is simply bringing up to branch line standard a railway that does not handle a great deal of traffic anyway. I do not think it is any use for the minister to attempt to take any comfort in the reflection that we are building branch lines in the western provinces that may not pay on their actual construction cost. Those branch lines fit into the system as a whole and contribute to the general traffic. I do not think we can get very far by comparing this acquisition with a new branch line constructed in the western provinces. But I think the minister is on sound ground when he says there is some obligation on us to take this road over viewing it from this other angle, that we should not forget the frank statement of the railway officials concerned, that in buying the road we are relieving the English bondholders to some extent of an obligation which this country was under to them for financing the railway. This factor had a good deal of influence on my judgment. Now, there has been in times past a lot of criticism on the part of English investors of Canadian financial methods, and it is not thought by Sir Henry Thornton, and I judge by the minister and others associated with him, to be advisable to incur any more of such criticism. There is no doubt that if we sat tight on this proposition and let the bondholders come to us, we could squeeze them down to a lower figure. But I am not complaining of the action of the railway officials in giving what under all the circumstances is a fair figure. I do not think it is the part of this government to wait for the road to drop into our basket for practically no consideration at all. To my mind those two considerations are preeminent. One, that we have an obligation to these people. There is no good reason why we should leave the Gaspé peninsula out of our calculations. That obligation I think we should fulfil. The other consideration I have already adverted to, namely, the impression to be left upon English investors in regard to money which they have bona fide placed in a railway enterprise in Canada.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I think there is no doubt in our minds that we are buying as a matter of business what is a very bad business proposition, and certainly my vote was not influenced in committee at all by the supposition that we are getting a money making property. I think, as an hon. member expressed it, it is about one of the worst things we have ever been obliged to do, but we have to do it. That expresses the opinion of many members in regard to this matter. I find no fault with the government for yielding to pressure, if it can be called pressure, for the reasons I have outlined, but I cannot say they are justified in their action by any consideration of the dollars and cents involved in the transaction.

Mr. MARCIL: Since the reports of the experts of the Canadian National Railways was made I have received a letter from Mr. J. S. Gordon, general manager of these two railways, giving the returns for last year. Let me quote from his letter:

> Our revenue for 1928 for the two railways was $609,240 with expenses of $548,910, leaving a net operating revenue of $60,330. Of course this balance of $60,330 is debited with such items as hire of equipment, taxes, etc., but in railway accounting, these items are regarded as non-operating expenses.

Mr. Gordon states that within the last twelve months considerable development has taken place in the Gaspé peninsula. The Madawaska Corporation has gone in there and erected a mill which employs hundreds of men. They have leased a mill at Restigouche, and they have cut during the past winter 50,000,000 feet of lumber. So the traffic will increase with this steady development.

Mr. GEARY: Everybody will be pleased if that works out.

Mr. MARCIL: In the centre of the peninsula, near Grand Cascapedia, there is a zinc and lead mine which has been declared by the geological survey here to be the equal of the Jobson deposits in Missouri, one of the richest of the kind in North America. For these reasons, and for the still greater reason that these people are entitled to fair treatment on a equal basis with all parts of Canada, I again urge that the house pass this bill.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): What is the relation between the fixed charges and the maritime freight rates? Why should those fixed charges be added to the maritime freight rates?

Mr. DUNNING: Under the terms of the Maritime Freight Rates Act the deficit on all of the roads within that region are paid by a vote of this parliament to the Canadian National Railways. Now, the deficits are arrived at by taking the revenues and deducting them from the expenses including the fixed charges. The fixed charges in the area covered by the Maritime Freight Rates Act including interest on the bonds outstanding —as for instance, in connection with the Halifax and Southwestern railway—in fact interest on the outstanding bonds of any of the lines which are now part of the Canadian National system in that area is taken into account. If my memory serves me aright, there is no interest involved in connection with any portion of the Intercolonial railway, but there are interest charges connected with parts of privately owned systems which come into the area in question. I mentioned the Halifax and Southwestern as an instance of what I mean in that regard. This line and each one of the others which will come before the committee shortly will have fixed charges attaching to them. I do not claim that these roads, at least immediately, will be profitable to the Canadian National. By the terms of the Maritime Freight Rates Act this country as a whole bears the interest charge on the capital. The Canadian National Railways administer the property under the terms of the maritime rates act.

Mr. STEVENS: Will not the minister admit that the interest on capital expenditure we are now authorizing amounting to some $3,500,000 will be simply carried in the Canadian National accounts, with the large interest charged on its total indebtedness to the government? It will not be segregated in any way.

Mr. DUNNING: It will be segregated in the accounts in accordance with the terms of the maritime rates act. That is to say, the Canadian National will receive from the Finance department, under the vote which is made each year under the maritime rates act, an amount equivalent to interest charge on the bonds against this particular property and against all other properties in the maritime rates area.

Mr. STEVENS: Paid out of a vote of the government.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): My understanding is that the Duncan report was in favour of a 20 per cent reduction in freight rates in certain areas in the maritime provinces. That reduction was made and became chargeable to the Dominion treasury. If that is right I cannot see the relation between that and interest on capital charge.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not referring to the Duncan report, which is not legislation.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): I know.

Mr. DUNNING: The legislation is the maritime rates act.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Based on the report.

Mr. DUNNING: It carries out the Duncan report. In placing that legislation before the house I carefully explained just the feature of it which is now under discussion. It was well understood and in succeeding sessions has been the subject of discussion when the estimates relating to it have arisen. The recommendation of the Duncan report in that connection is familiar to hon. members. It is provided that the cost of this relief shall be definitely borne by the Dominion government, who will make the necessary reimbursement to the Canadian National Railways without impairing the financial results of the operations of the system.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the 20 per cent reduction.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. But there is somewhere—I cannot lay my finger on it at the moment—a reference to the machinery for working out the problem in the area in question.

Mr. STEVENS: It does not apply to this interest.

ST. JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY

The house in committee on Bill No. 174, respecting Canadian National Railways and to authorize the acquisition of the Saint John and Quebec Railway—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Authority to purchase St. John and Quebec Railway.

Mr. MacLAREN: When the Transcontinental was built it was run diagonally across the province of New Brunswick, terminating at Moncton, which is an inland town. The Transcontinental therefore gave no direct access to the sea—an indirect access, it is true, but not the shortest nor nearly the shortest route that could be selected. Consequently the province of New Brunswick felt that the Transcontinental did not afford a sufficiently direct outlet to the sea for transportation and therefore proceeded to have constructed this railway which is called the St. John and Quebec Railway. It was built down to the valley of the St. John river, a valley very well known to the country as fertile for both fruit and grain. This railway was partly built in 1914, when the war broke out; then difficulties arose. The government did not wish to proceed with any railway construction beyond what was absolutely essential, and work on this line ceased. The original idea was that the railway should run from St. John and join the Transcontinental at Grand Falls, but this involved the construction of two bridges and at the request of the Dominion government the plan was modified and resulted in the construction of a railway from Centreville to Westfield, so that while the railway is called the St. John and Quebec railway it does not touch either St. John or Quebec; it is suspended between the two, as it were.

Mr. VENIOT: Like Mahomet's coffin.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is the present situation, but it will be changed in future if the government follow this idea. I would like hon. members of the house, including my hon. friend the leader of the group to my left, to look at this not as a deadend railway but as one with a promising future.

Mr. DUNNING: How soon?

Mr. MacLAREN: Just as soon as the government decides to carry out this program by extending the railway eighteen miles further into St. John and on to Grand Falls. Then we will have transcontinental transshipments of grain to the port of St. John, which is a very large item. The minister need not shake his head.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not shake my head; I merely looked surprised.

Mr. MacLAREN: I will not delay the house except to say that this was the original idea, and I believe it will persist. The faith of the whole province was behind the construction of this railway; they considered that the plans were based on solid ground, and I am of the same opinion. It was because of the war and at the request of the Dominion government that the railway was not completed, but it is still active; it passes through numerous towns and a great deal of construction will not be required to finish the work. When that is done the government can send grain over its own lines by a shorter route than is available to-day. This bill will afford relief to the province of New Brunswick because it will enable the Canadian National Railways to take over a line which the province has not felt able to complete.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

REGULATION OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA TABLED

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to table the correspondence between the governments of the United States and Canada with respect to the clearance of vessels carrying shipments of liquor to United States ports. This includes the report of the anti-smuggling conference held in Ottawa in January of this year.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

GOLD SHIPMENTS TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. Has the Minister of Finance refused to permit the banks to ship gold to the United States?
2. If so, under what authority?
3. Would it take sixty million dollars to bring the Canadian exchange back to parity?
4. Is there sixty million dollars in gold in the central gold reserve?
5. Why did the department change its form of statement of "Circulation and Specie" as of the date of December 31st, 1928?
6. Was the reserve ratio 55.3 or 28.4 as of March 31, 1929?
7. Can Dominion notes including "legals" be redeemed in gold?
8. If not, are we then on a gold basis?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. No.
2. Answered by 1.
3. To determine any definite amount is impossible, as exchange rates vary according to demand and supply, the extent of which is not known in advance by any financial institution.
4. The Dominion treasury holds $61,600,304 in gold; the banks have $16,630,866 of gold in the central gold reserves and, according to last bank statement, hold in addition in their own vaults in Canada, some $40,000,000 in gold.
5. The change was one of arrangement only to show separately notes issued under the Dominion Notes Act against gold reserves and notes issued under other authority against securities. In practice, notes outstanding against securities under the Finance Act are not utilized as a call for gold.
6. The ratio of gold to notes issued against gold deposits was 55.3 per cent at March 31st, 1929.
7. Yes.
8. Answered by 7.

WESTERN POSTAL EMPLOYEES

READJUSTMENT OF SALARIES OF THOSE DISMISSED AND REEMPLOYED

On the order being called for the third reading of Bill No. 252, respecting certain employees of the postal or railway mail service of Canada—Hon. P. J. Veniot (Postmaster General):

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): When this matter was under discussion in the house certain information was to be furnished to me in order that I might be able to ascertain exactly what amount of money was involved. That information the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) now tells me became available only to-day, and I should like an opportunity to study the effect of this measure upon the employees in question before the motion for the third reading is put. Might I ask that the bill stand until to-morrow?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): Yes. Stand.

WAYS AND MEANS

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved concurrence in the resolutions adopted in the committee of ways and means respecting the War Revenue Act.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have to move an amendment to the motion, as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following added thereto:

the said resolution be resubmitted to the commitee of the whole with instructions to amend the same by striking out section 4 thereof.

Section 4 of the resolution deals with the tax imposed on the transfer of mining and other shares. This tax was originally enacted in 1920. It was essentially a war measure. As matters now stand, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has indicated that he has a very substantial surplus. This tax in its operation is unjust, inequitable and unfair. In addition it is a tax that is essentially imposed upon provincial resources. The Dominion succeeds in obtaining an income tax from provincial companies operating in the development of the resources of the provinces, and this tax imposed upon the transfer of shares is a form of taxation that in my opinion should be left wholly available to the provinces. It should not be a tax resorted to by the Dominion at all. It is double taxation. It imposes a tax on industry; it retards development; it is unjust and inequitable in its operation, as indicated by many hon. members of this house; it is a tax which I think cannot be defended. It is for that reason, sir, that without making any extended address to the house at this time I move this amendment at the first available opportunity, before the resolution is finally adopted by the house.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite right in saying the tax was first introduced under the special War Revenue Act assented to on July 1, 1920. It was amended in 1922. It is well that the house and the country should understand at once what my hon. friend is proposing by this amendment. I imagine there has never been a time within recent years when there was so much speculating on the stock exchanges throughout the country as there has been during the past year. I submit there is a general feeling all over the Dominion that the national treasury might very well profit somewhat by this speculation. If a man is disposed to take a gamble on the market and risk his money, is it not reasonable to suppose that he might at least put a little of it in the national treasury to take care of the obligations of the country? My hon. friend now proposes to wipe out this tax entirely because a few people have objected to a certain readjustment of the taxation on the transfer of mining shares. Well, the revenue from this source is only a penny's worth compared with the revenue we get from these special taxes. Although there has been so much speculating on some of the stock exchanges where they deal largely in these mining shares, the revenue we have been getting from the business is very small, and the revenue we will receive under the revised taxation will be comparatively very small.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason we want to wipe it out.

Mr. ROBB: On transfers of shares and bonds of every kind, good, bad and indifferent, the total revenue received in 1926-27 was $282,576.50. We improved considerably on that in 1927-28, when we received $615,354. Where did these taxes come from? They did not come from the province of British Columbia, where there is a great mining area, because the records show that in 1926-27 all we received from the Vancouver stock exchange was $1,672.32. In 1927-28 we received from the same source $7,263.44. What did we get from the Toronto Standard mining exchange? In 1926-27 we received $47,393.01.

Mr. MANION: But the Toronto mining exchange deals in British Columbia shares too.

Mr. ROBB: Possibly. Does that make it any better?

Mr. MANION: No, but the minister said he did not get much from British Columbia.

Mr. ROBB: Well, let us add the two together. All we received was $47,393 from the Toronto Standard exchange and $1,672.32 from the Vancouver stock exchange for 1926-27. It is true that in 1927-28 we received $121,114.70 from the Toronto Standard mining exchange and $7,263.44 from the Vancouver stock exchange. But we received from the Montreal stock exchange in 1927-28, $280,061.57, and from the Toronto stock exchange, $132,756.60. I am sure my hon. friend has not considered this or he would not move an amendment to strike out this tax in toto, simply because some people who wish to speculate in mining shares object to the tax.

In the debate the other day the complaint was largely on the ground that what are called "penny" stocks—the lower priced stocks—would be unfairly discriminated against. Now under this taxation in its amended form if a man wants to take a flyer in the market and buys a thousand shares at 50 cents or less, it will cost him only a dollar. But to save him that dollar my hon. friend proposes to wipe out the tax on a thousand shares at $100 each from which we would receive $40. I submit to my hon. friend that this is not very good economics. No person who wants to speculate in a thousand shares at 50 cents or less is injured if he has to pay a tax of one dollar. If he is ready to take a gamble of that kind, surely he should not object to putting a dollar in the national treasury.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister does not mind if I ask him a question?

Mr. ROBB: Oh no.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose he is aware that all the provinces are taxing these transfers of shares. My objection goes essentially to that feature, that it is their business, and as they impose these taxes we should not be duplicating that form of taxation. We did it for the first time right after the war. I say it is a war measure that should now disappear so that we may let the provinces have the field to themselves.

Mr. ROBB: But the provinces are only taxing these mining and oil shares.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no.

Mr. ROBB: You are right, they do tax the others.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not all of them.

Mr. ROBB: The provinces of Quebec and Ontario do.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think all the provinces do.

Mr. BENNETT: I think so.

Mr. ROBB: Yes. The time may come when we should have a readjustment between provincial and federal taxation, but meanwhile I ask, is it good judgment on the part of the hon. leader of the opposition, in order to save the purchaser of one thousand 50 cent shares one dollar in taxation, to wipe out a tax that we hope will give us at least as much as it did last year, when we collected $615,000.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the reply of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) meets the case at all. He selects one item and indicates that there is to be a loss of revenue. He has already stated that the revenue at present is not a serious matter, that is, the total for 1927-28 was, I think, $615,000. What is it that the minister proposes to do? I think the house should get this clearly in its mind. He is repealing a stamp tax which was launched during the period immediately following the war when this country was put to extremes in order to get further revenue for unexpected and new expenditures arising out of the war.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: The problem still exists.

Mr. STEVENS: Since that time the minister has come to the house year after year boasting of increases in revenues. Here is an item which is producing a revenue of between six and seven hundred thousand dollars. He is promising to wipe that out and substitute for it a very onerous tax—not simply a stamp tax on documents, that is what it amounted to before, but a tax on property, because it is the exchange of property, that he is now taxing. Our contention is that, as applicable to mining, this proposal aims a serious blow at the development of this national, basic, industry. It will affect mining, not because it is a stamp tax but because it is an actual tax upon property, that is the share ownership in mines.

Now, this year the government has refused to assist two very important requirements of the people; one, technical education, and the other, the extension of the good roads system. In connection with the mining industry of Canada, in practically every province, particularly in northern Ontario, northern Quebec, northern Manitoba and British Columbia, the provincial governments are being called upon, I venture to say, to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars for roadways and other facilities in these new mining districts. The government have refused this session to give any assistance to the provinces in the matter of new highways—absolutely refused it. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) indicated that he considered a contribution of that kind to the provinces to be a vicious principle; he will not charge me with misquoting him in attributing that phrase to him. I say, they have absolutely refused to give any assistance in that direction. And now the minister says that he will tax the mining industry and obtain a large revenue therefrom.

Mr. ROBB: Not the mining industry.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, that is where we differ. The minister is making a distinct change in principle in this tax. He is repealing a section which is essentially a stamp tax. I have already pointed this out, but the minister does not realize the seriousness of it: he is repealing what is essentially a stamp tax, an ordinary stamp upon documents. That is what he has in the existing law, and he is substituting for it a heavy, an onerous tax; it is undoubtedly an onerous tax. My hon. friend from South Timiskaming (Mr. Lang), my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Lawson), my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) and one or two other hon. gentlemen have produced figures that are incontrovertible, showing clearly that in many cases the new proposal will render business impossible. I venture to say that the outcome of this will be, if it goes into force even after the amendment the minister introduced the other day, that mining concerns will have to abandon the issue of low priced stocks—that is, stocks at five and ten cents a share, which is the basis on which the mining industry in this country has been built. There is no use in our talking about stopping speculation; this will not seriously affect speculation in stocks in a large way, although it will affect speculation in the cheaper or penny stocks. In other words, it will largely deprive the mining industry of Canada of the opportunity to secure capital to carry on its operations.

The other day the minister was impressed, I think, with the arguments, particularly of the hon. members whom I have mentioned, in the presentation of the subject; the hon. member for South Timiskaming in particular went into the matter carefully. But the minister is persisting. I have tried to discover a motive and I think I have found it. The minister proposes to impose this onerous tax this year and to put it into force, and he will come to the house next year and cut the tax down to half or a quarter, or wipe it out, and then tell the people how he is reducing taxation. That is the only excuse for his putting on this tax; there seems to be no other. The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) applauds that; he says "That's fine." He endorses it.

Mr. JACOBS: Does not my hon. friend think, as a veteran politician, that that is good politics?

Mr. STEVENS: I think it is rotten politics; I think it is disgraceful politics. The minister has done this in regard to the sales tax and has got away with it. He raised the sales tax from 3 to 4 and to 6 per cent, and then he lowered it gradually to 2 per cent, and every year he took full credit for the reduction. He intends this year to increase the present tax to a degree which is not warranted and which he knows is not warranted and he will come back next year and cut the tax down and tell the people of the mining districts how he is reducing taxation. He will tell my hon. friend from South Timiskaming, "It is all right; there is no election this year, but next year there is an election and I will cut the tax down."

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

Mr. STEVENS: An hon. gentleman says that is right; I am glad they are endorsing it. My hon. friend from South Timiskaming spoke most effectively on this question the other day. We had not heard his voice in the house before but we were glad to hear it then. He made an incontrovertible case—what for? For the new mining district of northern Ontario. Now I had a wire—I am sorry it is not here—which reached me the other day from Vancouver, urging me strongly to oppose this proposal, not because the people there were opposed to paying a fair tax on the transfer of stocks; not at all. The people there have never squealed at reasonable taxation. But my correspondent points out actual cases on the stock exchange in Vancouver where an individual sells a small block of cheap shares, and under this proposal, after paying the tax, he will have very little left and in fact will incur an actual loss on the transaction.

Mr. ROBB: Right there, will my hon. friend say that $1 per 1,000 shares is unreasonable?

Mr. STEVENS: I say that $1 per 1,000 shares at 5 cents a share is too much. One dollar per 1,000 at 50 cents a share is not too bad, but it is the 5 cent shares I am discussing particularly. On this the tax will amount to 2 per cent. Will any hon. gentleman say that is a fair tax on a transaction of that character—a tax of 2 per cent? Will anyone say that is fair in a transaction which is taxed both ways? That sale having gone through, the moment a transfer is made again another tax is levied, and so on. Moreover, there is the provincial tax with commission on top of that. It makes the transaction impossible. And our contention is that the minister has no right to invade that field. The minister asks me whether I think this tax on 1,000 shares at 50 cents is too much. But that is the maximum of that class. Come down to the 5 cent shares and it is shown conclusively that the tax is utterly unreasonable. And some of the best mines in this country—Teck Hughes is one—were financed in their early stages on the 5 cent basis. The minister proposes a tax of 2 per cent on 5 cent shares, but that is not the whole story. Assume that this share is sold three or four times in the year: that means 10 per cent. And so you might go on through the various transactions.

The minister is wrong in his conception of this matter. The tax is exceedingly onerous. The very question which the minister asks me shows that the tax is unfair, because the man who sells shares of the 50 cent class pays exactly the same as the man who sells at 5 cents. That is the unfairness of it. One is a $50 transaction and the other a $5 transaction; yet they pay the same tax. If it were fair and equitable the man who sold at 5 cents would not pay the same as the man selling at 50 cents. Take comparisons in a score of different classifications and you find that in every one of these classifications there is a spread which is utterly unfair. I am reminded too of this—it has been pointed out before: 1,000 shares of Noranda at $54 represents $54,000, with a $30 tax. Does not the minister see how unfair the tax is?

I come back to the point from which I started: We are repealing a stamp tax involving a small charge of 3 cents or something like that on the transfer of certain documents. I am not saying that this is entirely equitable, but it is a stamp tax applying to the exchange of documents. But this is a tax on the exchange of property, namely, shares in mines. It might be any other property; it does not matter; we are speaking of mines because that is our chief activity. I submit again that it is utterly unfair; it is a tax that should not be added to Dominion taxation.

The minister has boasted of his $60,000,000 surplus this year; yet he is now increasing a tax which last produced some $600,000, and increasing it to such a degree that it will actually run into millions. There is no doubt that it will run into several millions. That is not the way to impose taxation in a country where the Minister of Finance boasts of his surpluses. If you have a surplus of revenue the proper thing to do is to budget so that your revenue and expenditure shall balance, with a fairly safe margin on the revenue side. That is proper budgeting. But in a country like this it is not the proper thing to budget for huge surpluses. Certainly a surplus is always welcome, but it is not proper to budget for surpluses. That is what the minister is doing, and I think we are warranted in opposing this measure and in asking the support of the house for the deletion of section 4 from the resolution.

Mr. HEAPS: Before my hon. friend takes his seat, could he inform the house what taxes are imposed on the sale of shares?

Mr. STEVENS: I could not say exactly. There is a tax on the sale; there is a tax on the purchase by the stockbroker in the stock exchange; there is a provincial tax, which is a perfectly proper tax, on the transfer of shares, and there is this tax which the minister is now seeking to impose.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is there any tax on shares when they are first sold?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: Under the present law the first issue is not taxed; if the first issue is handed to a broker and distributed by him to other brokers there is no tax, but when the stock leaves the broker and goes to the purchaser there is a tax.

Mr. MALCOLM LANG (South Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, for a few moments I wish to deal with the figures given the house the other evening by the Minister of Finance, when he was showing how the proposed tax would work out in creating revenue. As an illustration the minister took the figures from one particular day's sales on the Standard stock exchange in Toronto. On that day there were sold 324,900 shares valued at from one cent to fifty cents per share, with an estimated total value of $81,225. Under the present proposal the tax on the sale of those shares would amount to $324.90. Then there were 186,500 shares sold valued at from fifty cents to $1 per share, and under the present proposal the tax collected on that sale would be $466.25. There were sold 114,900 shares over $1 per share and under $3, on which the tax would amount to $1,149; there were 150,900 shares valued at over $3 but not over $20, on which the proposed tax would amount to $3,018, and his last figures were 29,300 shares valued at over $20 and under $100, upon which the proposed tax would amount to $879.

Just for a moment I would like to compare as fairly as I can the tax which it is now proposed to collect on the sale of these shares with the tax which would be collected if we had an ad valorem tax, which is the only fair tax if we must have any at all. On the day taken by the minister 324,900 shares of stock were sold at from one cent to fifty cents per share. I am going to average those shares at twenty-five cents each, and in so doing I am being more than fair to the minister, because if he will look over the records he will find that in the cheaper stocks the majority sell for from ten to twenty cents per share and then the price goes up to over fifty cents. However, we will take the medium price of twenty-five cents per share and see what tax would be collected at the rate of three-twentieths of one per cent, or fifteen cents on each $100 worth of sales. Just here I might explain how I arrive at the rate of three-twentieths of one per cent. According to the figures given by the minister the total selling price of the shares dealt in that day was $3,886,800, and under the proposed tax the revenue would amount to $5,837.15. If you divide the amount collected into the amount of the sales you get the figure of three-twentieths of one per cent on the value or fifteen cents on every $100 worth of shares sold, or in other words just five times the old tax which has been in force ever since 1922. That is, it would be five times the old tax of three cents on every $100 of value if that had been collected as an ad valorem tax on all the sales, but as I showed the other night that was not the case. That tax was only collected on a few of the shares and always on the lower priced stock, so that really for the last seven years the revenue under this tax has been derived mainly from the low priced stocks, and that principle will be continued under the proposed tax, as I intend to show; these low priced stocks will continue to bear the heavy load all the time, instead of that load being equally divided over all issues.

As I have already pointed out, on the 324,900 shares valued at from one cent to fifty cents per share there would be collected $324.90, under the present proposal. Taking an average price of twenty-five cents per share, the sale price of these shares would be $81,225, and a tax of fifteen cents per $100 of valuation would bring in only $121 in revenue. In other words, on this first item under the present proposal the minister would collect two and a half times as much as would be collected under an ad valorem tax. Then his next figures were for stocks valued at fifty cents to one dollar, and 186,500 shares of this stock passed over the exchange on the day he took as an example. At an average price of seventy-five cents a share the total sales price of these shares would be $139,875. Under the proposed tax the revenue from those shares would amount to $466.25, while under an ad valorem tax of fifteen cents per $100 of value he would collect only $210. Then we come to the next class, 114,900 shares valued at from $1 to $3, and at an average price of $2 per share the total selling price of these shares would be $229,800. Under the proposed tax he would collect on the sale of those shares $1,149; with an ad valorem tax of 15 cents per $100, the revenue received would be $345.

The next transaction mentioned by the minister was 150,900 shares at over $3 and under $20 per share. I took an average of $11 per share as being the fair price between those two figures. A sale of 150,900 shares at $11 per share would amount to $1,659,900. Under the proposed tax the revenue would be $3,018 and under an ad valorem tax it would amount to $2,490. In that case an ad valorem tax of 15 cents on $100 would be getting off a little cheaper than under the proposed tax.

The next transaction mentioned was 29,300 shares at over $20 and under $100 per share. I took an average price of $60 per share, which makes the value of the transaction $1,758,000. Under the proposed tax the revenue would be $879 while the ad valorem tax would return a revenue of $2,637. The revenue is only about one-third of what it would be with the ad valorem tax while on the cheaper shares the present tax will bring in a revenue of between two or four times the amount which would be received with the ad valorem tax. There is not a vestige of fairness in imposing taxation such as this. I cannot see how anyone would have the effrontery to attempt to justify such an unfair tax. It may be to a lesser degree, but nevertheless it is continuing along the old line of taxing the smaller man at a higher rate than the tax imposed upon the big man. There is no justification for it and I cannot understand why the Minister of Finance insists upon trying to impose this tax. I would like to quote from the remarks of the Minister of Finance which he made the other evening in an attempt to justify the tax upon the speculative stocks, as he called them. As appears on page 2454 of Hansard, the minister said:

> As soon as they begin speculating then certainly the nation has a right to take some share of the profits. If I were representing a mining section of the country I might take a onesided view of the matter. But this is in the interests of the mining industry, and in support of that statement I shall quote the opinion of the Northern Miner.

I will give that quotation later, but at present I desire to deal with the minister's first statement. I do not agree with the minister because whether you call it speculating or gambling, if there were not people who were optimistic enough to speculate—

Mr. BENNETT: Take a chance.

Mr. LANG: —in an endeavour to bring forth the treasures from the mineral lands of this country, then there would be no mining production or mineral development. This tax is being imposed upon the prospectors. They are the first ones to speculate or gamble; they speculate not only with the few dollars which they have, but they gamble with their time and with their energy; they risk their health and everything else in an attempt to bring about the mineral development of this Canadian nation. Such a statement as that made by the minister is entirely unfair to the people who are doing the pioneer work for this great industry.

If a tax is to be imposed it should not bear too heavily on those who take the risk of the initial speculation, the first gamble, which must precede any real development of our mineral resources.

I will continue with the quotations made by the hon. minister from the Northern Miner. As every hon. member of this house knows, that paper is one of the most reputable mining journals which we have in Canada. The Journal was first published in Cobalt during the early days of mining in that section of the country, and continued to be published there until a few weeks ago when it was moved to Toronto. This quotation which the minister read was apparently from an editorial published during the early part of this year, and is as follows:

> While the business of company promotion by brokers has lagged lately, reducing the prospector's claim market, fortunately he has never been in such good position to sell first-class discoveries. Dozens of big mining organizations will listen eagerly to his story if he has a good one to tell, and will send engineers hopping by plane to examine. If his show stands up money is waiting, on the nail. Easy going, long distance deals are completely out of fashion. The prospector can get quick action if he is willing to deal with the big companies.
> Competition for good ground is so keen that he is sure of good terms.

Then it goes on:

> On the whole, it has probably been a good thing for everybody that the promotional game has been slack. Buyers have had a chance to catch their breath and promoters a chance to realize and act upon the new conditions.

Then it says:

> The public was overloaded with half-baked propositions.

I take no exception at all to the minister having quoted that editorial to the house. If you take into consideration the time at which the editorial was written, it is a perfectly fair one and I agree with it in every respect. If I do not miss my guess, that editorial was probably written just soon after one of the worst financial disasters happened in connection with one of the oldest and supposed-to-be one of the best-established brokerage firms in the city of Toronto. I have no doubt in the world that editorial was written after that firm suspended operations. That was the Heron Company which closed its doors some time early this year. If the Minister of Finance was looking for something to justify taxing penny stocks in order to keep poor, innocent individuals from being rooked in that sort of game and losing their money, he picked the wrong editorial to support any argument of that kind, because everyone knows to-day that this firm was dealing in one of the high-priced stocks.

betting that the stock was going to go down instead of up, betting probably illegally by going short on International Nickel, one of the best stocks that we have in the country. It was because of that manipulation that the Heron Company had to cease operations, and this caused one of the worst financial disasters that we have had in Canada and a lessening for the time being in the number of people investing in mining stocks. But in my opinion and, I think, in that of every fair-minded man who gives the subject any consideration, that only goes to prove again that mistakes are made in the manipulation of high-priced stocks just as in connection with the cheaper stocks. I will leave that editorial by saying simply that if the Minister of Finance thinks so much of the views of the editor of the Northern Miner, I can put his mind at rest at once as to what the editor of that paper thinks about the present proposed tax. He thinks it is absolutely unfair; that it is not fair to the mining industry and particularly to the ones who do the pioneer work and of necessity have to get their money from the cheaper class of stocks. To tax the low-priced stocks more heavily than the higher-priced stocks is, in the opinion of the editor of the Northern Miner, a mistake, no matter who it is made by. The Minister of Finance also said:

> The Monetary Times of January 11 quotes Mr. Norman Urquhart, president of the Standard stock and mining exchange of Toronto, as follows:

And then he gives the quotation. I did not know at the time, but I understand that Mr. Urquhart was one of the gentlemen who were here representing the brokers from Toronto, asking the Minister of Finance not to impose a tax such as this. I am pointing this out just because the minister quotes Mr. Urquhart, and Mr. Urquhart feels that this is not a fair tax and that it should not be imposed upon the people notwithstanding the statement he made which the minister quoted. Mr. Urquhart's statement is a perfectly fair one coming as it did and when it did. We have had two or three unpleasant incidents in connection with mining this year, and for the life of me I cannot understand how any person could think they could improve conditions by imposing a tax on the people. Nothing bears out such an idea. An incident that happened just shortly before this statement by Mr. Urquhart, one of the Toronto brokers, was in connection with the Jackson-Manion dealings. This caused a flutter in mining circles and among mining investors in this country. Taxing cheap stocks has nothing to do with regulating that sort of thing. We have a Companies Act in Ontario and I expect there are somewhat in all the other provinces similar acts which are supposed to cope with situations of that character, call them "blue-sky" laws if you will. In connection with the Jackson-Manion affair, the managing director and the mine manager are to-day before the courts on a charge of conspiracy or collusion to defraud the investors in that mine. That is all I want to say about that. But it is absurd for anyone to get up before an intelligent body of people and endeavour to leave the impression that by imposing a heavier tax on the smaller-priced stocks, they are going to do anything to make safer the investment of the people who want to put their money into stocks of that kind in order to help mining development in Canada. I do not think that is an unfair statement for me to make.

The minister says further:

> Then I have another statement made by one of the most prominent bankers in the city of Toronto, where I suppose more mining shares are sold than in any other city of Canada.
> This statement was made by Mr. Bogert, general manager of the Dominion Bank, in his annual report.

This is a perfectly fair statement by Mr. Bogert, and I have no fault to find with it. It is an optimistic, not a pessimistic statement. It is just what one would expect from the head of a financial institution of that kind. In the paragraph which the minister quoted there is not one word to lend any colour for any person to think that good would be done by imposing a heavier tax on the sale of shares, and particularly a heavier tax on the sale of the smaller-priced shares than upon the higher-priced.

Then the minister crosses over to England to tell us that they have a graduated scale of taxation on shares. Everyone must and does know that the people of the motherland are carrying a heavier burden of taxation than probably any other people in the world. They are doing that because of the vast obligations which have been staring them in the face ever since the war. I think it would be entirely unfair for any of us in this house to pass any opinion upon the sort of taxation which the British people in their wisdom have imposed upon themselves, and I say again that their taxation has absolutely no bearing upon the case with which we are dealing at the present time.

Before leaving this tax schedule which I made up from the figures which the Minister of Finance himself gave the other evening, I would like to summarize it. The amount of the sales for the day he quoted was $3,866,800. On that amount, if this tax goes into effect, he would collect $5,837. I worked out what rate of taxation that would represent, and it works out to 15 cents on each $100 of value sold. The old tax that we have had since 1922 and which will remain in force until it is replaced by this new one, if it goes into effect, amounted to 3 cents on every $100, not of value, but of par value, and as was pointed out so well the other evening that tax was collected on only a very small proportion of the total volume of business done. The tax was falling on the small investor all the time, and if this new tax goes into effect it will still be the small investor who will have to pay the bulk of the taxation. You would think that after this house had looked into the matter and found out that for the last eight years the small investor is the one who has been most heavily taxed, we would now give him a little advantage to make up for the disadvantage which he has been suffering in the past. But no, a new tax is being brought down under which the small investor is going to continue to be taxed at the expense of the few and bigger investors.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I understand that the first sale of shares is not taxed, but only succeeding sales. How can the succeeding sales be of any benefit to the mining company?

Mr. LANG: I will answer that as best I can. I do not think that it has yet been made absolutely clear to this house that all of the first issue of stock is entirely free from taxation.

Mr. ADSHEAD: How can succeeding sales benefit the company?

Mr. LANG: Very often when a new company is formed, some one undertakes the underwriting of a certain amount of the treasury stock. For example, I cited a case the other night of a company selling one million shares at 5 cents a share in order to raise $50,000. On the sale of that stock they would be taxed $1,000 under this proposed tax.

Mr. HEAPS: Not on the first transfer.

Mr. LANG: All right. Whoever underwrites the stock guarantees to the treasury of the company 5 cents a share for that one million shares, in order to raise $50,000 for the company. Then the underwriter sells the stock to the public, and that stock is taxed. That is the way it works out.

Since this proposal was brought down by the Minister of Finance, I have received a letter from British Columbia—I am not familiar with conditions there, but the British Columbia members will know whether this is correct or not—stating that in British Columbia, where the mining industry has been undergoing great development in the last year, they raise the money for the initial development pretty nearly all through selling these cheap priced shares to the public, and to a far greater extent than we do in Ontario.

Mr. CLARK: Absolutely correct.

Mr. LANG: That is the information I have. The mining industry in Ontario is older, and we have mining people who have money and have been interested in mining for years who will speculate or gamble on the further development of the minerals of our province, and we do not so often go to the public with cheap priced stocks to raise the initial development money. Probably a syndicate of five or ten men will put up $50,000 or $100,000, after they have had their engineers look over the property and they are satisfied that the geological conditions are such that the property has a chance and may develop into a mine. It is always a gamble in the first instance. I do not care how good a prospect may look, it is nothing but a gamble, and anyone who has had anything to do with mining knows that. But what is the use of saying, just because it is a gamble and people might lose their money, the government might as well take some of that money because the stockholders might lose it anyway. Is not that an awful argument to put up?

Mr. ADSHEAD: I did not put it that way. If my hon. friend will permit me, I bought some oil stock in the Macleod Oil Company some years ago at $1 per share, and the company got 75 cents out of every dollar received from the sale of the shares. They developed a well, and later on I sold the stock for $10 a share. I got $10, but what I want to know is how that benefited the company.

Mr. LANG: One would need to know all the details of the deal before expressing an opinion. The hon. member benefited all right, and that is the main thing. He gambled and in that case won. In a lot of other cases he might not be so lucky.

Mr. HEAPS: Under those circumstances what objection would there be to the hon. member for East Calgary paying a tax to the government?

Mr. LANG: If he wants to pay a tax I do not object, but I say that as long as you tax the cheaper priced stocks more heavily than the higher priced stocks you are doing something that is absolutely unfair and something that cannot possibly be justified. I said when I was speaking on this matter the other evening that I was not a bit afraid of the minister putting on too high a tax if he made it an ad valorem tax. Let it rest fairly and evenly on all the people who are paying the tax. Let it be a tax on the value of the transaction. That is all I have been asking for. That is why I ventured to work out what this rate of taxation would be over the day's business. It would be just five times what it was before. I do not know what the minister is budgeting for in this tax, I do not know how much money he expects to get from it; he has not told us; but I do feel sure that any person who considers conditions in this country to-day will agree with me that there is not a doubt in the world that an immense volume of business will be traded in this year, so that one can hardly estimate it. Last year on the Toronto stock exchange there was a turnover of $600,000,000 dollars. That is only one of the exchanges. There are also the Montreal, the Calgary, the Winnipeg, the Vancouver and the other stock exchanges throughout the country. Undoubtedly vast developments are going on. There is no doubt there will be ten times that value traded in, and a tax of 15 cents on the $100, an ad valorem rate, would bring into the treasury millions of dollars this year.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I think, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend (the Minister of Finance) has made an entire mistake as to the meaning of this amendment. He seems to assume that it would do away with the tax on shares altogether; that was his argument. He told us the amount of revenue he received last year from this tax, and he suggested that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition surely did not want to do away with the tax altogether. That is not the purpose of the motion at all. The motion is quite plain and simple, as the hon. minister will see if he will take another look at it. It proposes that the bill should be sent back to the committee to strike out section 4. If that is done, then the present act remains as it is. It seems to me that the Minister of Finance might very well give the matter further consideration, after which I think he will be disposed to agree to the suggestion of the hon. leader of the opposition. It is quite evident that the feeling in the house and in the country is against this idea of increasing taxation on the cheaper shares. I congratulate the member for South Timiskaming (Mr. Lang) on the fine case he has made out for not increasing the taxation on this class of shares.

Let me cite what would be a very hard case if this legislation were put into force. In the list of investments of a man who had dealt very largely in mining shares there were two mining stocks that had to be sold under 2 cents a share; one realized only 1½ cents. That is all the executors could get for them. The minister says: "All right, you have had bad luck, it is true, but although this estate is getting only 1½ cents on each share I am going to take a cent of it for the treasury." Surely the minister cannot think that is fair. I would put the argument of the member for South Timiskaming in this way. The resources of this country cannot be developed unless people with money are willing to take a chance, not only the prospector who goes out and spends his time and money, and perhaps ruins his health in trying to discover new mines, but the men who are willing to risk their money in what may be a losing proposition. But if they are successful the minister surely ought not to tax them out of existence. He should not impose a tax of this kind that will deter those people and in turn hinder the development of our mineral resources. It is wrong in principle altogether. I agree that this tax ought to be on the basis of the value of the securities, and it certainly is not right that the cheaper stocks should have to pay more in proportion than the more expensive ones.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, fortunately I have before me a record of a day's sales on the Vancouver stock exchange, with the old tax and the proposed tax computed. On this particular day the present tax would be approximately $20. That agrees, I think, with the figures given by the Minister of Finance. Taking a three hundred day year, it would amount to about $6,000. The minister, I think, stated that the tax at present collected is about $7,000. Now, the proposed tax which the minister would collect if the same sales were made on that exchange would be $800. $800 instead of $20—forty times the amount. That is quite an appreciable increase in taxation. If I am not mistaken it is 4,000 per cent. Am I correct? Can it be that the minister hopes to increase taxation by 4,000 per cent? Let me give a few concrete examples from the days' sales. Here is a sale where the value of the stock sold was $312.50. The minister proposes to assess a tax on that of $500, or nearly $200 more than the stock actually sold for. The old tax on the same transaction was $3. Of course, the minister knows that that sale would not be made under such circumstances. That stock would go off the market so far as Canada is concerned.

Mr. ROBB: That would not mean the mine would go off the market.

Mr. CLARK: Yes, and I will show the minister how that particular mine might go off the market. If that company has unissued stock in its reserve—the only means by which it can secure capital to develop what may be an excellent prospect—it must put that stock on the market. Now, I ask the minister how would he finance the company to enable it to go ahead with its development work? To whom would he sell the shares in the company's reserve? Nobody would buy them. This is the answer to the question of my hon. friend from East Calgary. He asked: How do the succeeding sales of shares benefit the mine itself? I will show him. Here is a mine whose stock has depreciated to such an extent that it is selling at 1/16 of a cent a share. That mine may wish to issue treasury shares to go ahead with development. But who would buy those shares? True, it may be said that if I buy them I will not pay the tax on the purchase from the company. But would I buy them? Would my hon. friend from East Calgary buy them? Certainly not, because he knows he could not sell them again without paying a tax in excess of the value of the shares, and he would not buy such stock, neither would the Minister of Finance. This law would preclude the possibility of that company's refinancing and absolutely put it out of business forever. I wonder how my hon. friend would feel if he had paid $1 per share for stock in that company instead of in his successful oil company—if he had paid $1 per share and found that it had depreciated to one-sixteenth of a cent per share, and then have the minister pass a law which would preclude him from the possibility of ever retrieving his depleted fortune.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I have bought some from which I never got anything and never shall.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend is a fair judge, if he is able to purchase shares at $1 and sell at $10 he does not need much information. At any rate, there is a concrete illustration. Of course, that is rather extreme; nevertheless there are many companies with depleted resources who have to refinance, and in nearly every case the price of the stock is depreciated. The Minister of Finance, by passing this bill, will make it impossible for these companies to refinance.

Let me give a few more examples. There was a sale of 100 shares of Royalite valued at $175 a share, or a total value of $17,500. I wonder what my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Adshead) thinks that sale will be taxed if the Minister of Finance passes this bill? It will be taxed $4; whereas the Minister of Finance hopes to collect $500 on a sale which involves $312. Here we have the actual day's sales; this is what transpired in the course of a day's sales on the Vancouver stock exchange. I would point out to the minister that he is collecting under the present tax on that sale of Royalite $5.25. Now to the big man who can afford to purchase high priced stock like Royalite, and which is just as speculative as any other stock on the market, and perhaps a great deal more so, because it has appreciated in value some 2,000 per cent, the Minister of Finance says, "All right; any of you big speculators who can afford to buy these valuable shares at $175 a share can go ahead. If you have $20,000 to spend in that way I will charge you only $4." But to the little fellow who has only $300 to spend he says, "If I can get it from you, I will charge you $500." That is what the Minister of Finance says, in effect.

Let us go further. Here is a sale of Capitol Oil: the present tax is 6 cents and the proposed tax $10. In the case of Beaver Silver the present tax is 12 cents and the proposed tax $2; while on a sale of Kootenay King the present tax is 39 cents and the proposed tax $5. I do not know whether that belongs to the Minister of National Health (Mr. King). He might be able to help Kootenay King if he would devote his attention to the measure under discussion. Then, take two properties with which no doubt every hon. member is familiar, two mines—Big Missouri and Reeves McDonald. On a sale of Big Missouri of $1,500 value, at $1.50 a share, the present tax is 30 cents, and the Minister of Finance proposes to collect $10. In the case of Reeves McDonald, where the total value is $6,250, at $1.25 a share, the minister collects now $1.89 and he proposes to collect $50. I am going to take this case as a basis of further remarks. I assert that the Minister of Finance will drive practically every new promotion of similar mining companies in British Columbia at least, to Seattle or Spokane in the United States. He will make it impossible for these companies to finance in British Columbia. Reeves McDonald was refinanced and issued some of its treasury shares to the public in the month, I believe, of January of this year. These shares were issued at $1 each. They are now selling around $1.25 on the Vancouver stock exchange. A sale took place on the day in question of 5,000 shares of Reeves McDonald at $1.25, with a total value of $6,250. The tax thereon is $1.89 as compared with the proposed tax of $50. Now what I assert is this: There is not an hon. member in this house who will buy stocks, where the value is around $5,000, if he has to pay to this country a tax of $50. He will not buy them.

Mr. RALSTON: Did that stock have a par value?

Mr. CLARK: One dollar.

Mr. RALSTON: How then does my hon. friend get a tax of $1.89?

Mr. CLARK: The present tax.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought my hon. friend said the old tax would be that.

Mr. CLARK: No, the present tax; that is—

Mr. RALSTON: The present tax is 3 cents a share.

Mr. BENNETT: Three cents on $100 par value.

Mr. RALSTON: Which is 3 cents a share.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It could not be 3 cents a share.

Mr. RALSTON: Read section 58.

Mr. CLARK: In any case it is perfectly clear that the proposed tax will be $50. Now what will be the effect of that? Will the Minister of Finance tell this house—

Mr. BENNETT: It is 3 cents on $100.

Mr. RALSTON: Read section 58.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Three cents on every $100 par value.

Mr. CLARK: Then I am correct. I checked up a number of these and found them to be correct and I assumed that they were all correct. I think they are. I should like very much indeed to put the whole statement on Hansard for the information of the Minister of Finance or of any other hon. member of the house, because I think it will be of great value.

As I have shown, the Minister of Finance proposes to collect $50 on a sale of $5,000, and I once more assert that no member of this house, no Canadian, is going to participate in financing of that character. Fifty dollars is too high a tax to pay on one transaction. That means that these shares will not be marketable. Let me tell you what is going to happen. Take the Reeves McDonald property, which lies in West Kootenay. It is on the boundary line, practically adjoining Pend d'Oreille, which is in the United States, but it is financed in Canada. Now if this tax had been in force when these two properties were promoted, where does the minister think the promotion would have taken place? Unquestionably it would have been in Spokane, in the United States; after all that is the nearest city to these properties and that is where the promotion would have taken place. That is also where future promotions in British Columbia will take place, because the public will not tolerate a tax of $50 where the sale price is only $5,000. The shares will become unmarketable and no man will purchase stock from the underwriters, no matter how promising the properties may be, if he knows that when he sells his stock he will have to pay a tax of $50. These shares turn over ten or twenty times a year, and at the end of the year that $5,000 might pay a tax of $500 or even $1,000.

I am confirmed in my statement with regard to the financing of these properties by the oldest and most experienced men in the industry in British Columbia. I have received from them telegrams and letters, and they all assert that there can be no question that so far as new promotions and new developments are concerned they must necessarily take place in the United States because our people will not subscribe to them if they are to be taxed in this way. As I have said repeatedly on the floor of this house, in British Columbia since the war we have financed our mining development from our own savings, and the present enactment will create a handicap which will prohibit any future development of that kind. That will leave only one place where in future these promotions may be undertaken; that is the United States, in either Spokane or Seattle.

In addition to that, the trading which is now going on in the Vancouver stock exchange will be transferred to the United States, because you will find that a number of these companies with shares of low market value will perhaps wind up their affairs and reincorporate in the United States. They will list their stocks in that country and they will be traded in no longer on our exchanges. In that case the minister cannot hope to collect the tax which he proposes to impose on these lower priced shares. However, I am speaking for the industry rather than for the companies already in existence; I am looking to future developments. I want future development to take place here in Canada and to be financed in Canada; I want the Canadian people to benefit by the development, and I say they cannot do so if the Minister of Finance insists on passing through the house the measure now under consideration.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, the unfairness and iniquity of this tax as far as the mining industry is concerned has been abundantly established by the data and the arguments submitted by hon members on both sides of the house. I rise for only a moment in order to place on record a telegram which has been just received by the hon. member for West Kootenay (Mr. Esling) from Mr. S. W. Miller, head of the large brokerage firm of Miller and Court Company, Limited, Vancouver. This organization has been instrumental in successfully establishing some of the most important mining enterprises in British Columbia; it is not only a concern interested in the promotion of these enterprises but it is very much concerned in developing the industry. After expressing his appreciation of certain arguments advanced by the hon. member for West Kootenay, Mr. Miller says:

> For last fifteen years we have used our time and money to promote development of British Columbia mining, and should the government's present tax pass it is our intention to withdraw absolutely from the mining promotion business. You can appreciate what reaction a move of this kind would have on the mining development of our province.

Apart from the rights of the provinces with respect to taxation of mining enterprises, apart from the question of the division of the field of taxation, in the face of the data which has been submitted and in view of the incontrovertible facts and the judgment of men who understand the business, in this case I think the minister, with that breadth of judgment which he ought to display, should depart from the attitude of obstinacy which the people of Canada will believe to be actuating him if he persists in his present course and reconsider the proposal now before the house. If necessary he might delay proceedings at this time in order to study the facts and obtain full knowledge of the situation so that the best efforts of the government may be devoted to the mining industry of Canada.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I would like to say just a word in order to see whether I clearly understand the situation both with regard to the original proposal of the Minister of Finance and the proposal which was later brought before the house and which is the subject of the amendment now under consideration. The original provision, under which I understand both the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue have been working, is section 58 of the Special War Revenue Act, which provides:

> No person shall sell or transfer the stock or shares of any association, company or corporation, or any bond other than a bond of the Dominion of Canada or of any province of Canada by
> (a) agreement for sale;
> (b) entry on the books of the association, company or corporation;
> (c) delivery of share certificates or share warrants or bond endorsed in blank or payable to bearer; or
> (d) any other method whatsoever;
> unless in respect of such sale or transfer there is affixed to or impressed upon the document evidencing the ownership of such stock or shares or bond, or a document showing the transfer or agreement for the transfer thereof, an adhesive stamp, or a stamp impressed thereon by means of a die, of the value of three cents for every one hundred dollars or fraction thereof of the par value of the stock or shares or bond sold or transferred.

The exception is section 61 which provides:

> The first delivery by a corporation or company of such shares, or debenture stock, in order to effect an issue, or the first issue of a bond, or a sale or transfer of any bond between any recognized dealers or brokers shall not be subject to the tax imposed by this part.

That means that this tax shall not be imposed upon the original issue of these shares by the company, and I understand that this provision is to be still in force.

Mr. STEVENS: If the company makes an issue which is sold through a firm underwriting that issue, when the underwriting firm sells to the public the stock is taxable.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is quite right, but in that case the underwriters are in the position of the public as the purchasers of the stock. We can talk about underwriting as we like, but that does not consist of simply guaranteeing the sale of the stock; it means an agreement to buy stock, an agreement that the so-called underwriter will put into the treasury of the company the number of dollars required for the purchase of that stock, and that transaction is made free of any tax. Let us get that straight, and I say that the underwriters are in no different position from the public; they are the public in that they are the purchasers of the stock.

Mr. LADNER: In a business sense, although technically the underwriter is the purchaser, is he not really the agent of the company for the sale of the stock?

Mr. RALSTON: I never heard of an underwriter being the agent of the company; the underwriters are brokers who come along and propose to purchase the stock because they expect to make a profit out of it by selling to someone else.

Mr. STEVENS: They propose to market the stock.

Mr. CAHAN: Is not the underwriter the one who guarantees to purchase in case other purchasers are not found?

Mr. RALSTON: It depends on the underwriting agreement altogether.

Mr. CAHAN: That is the only kind of underwriting agreement that I ever heard of.

Mr. RALSTON: That may be, but my point is that the underwriter is the purchaser. If my hon. friend is correct, and the underwriter is not called upon under his underwriting agreement to purchase, the stock is sold direct to the public, and comes under the same heading as a sale to the underwriter world.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Absolutely, because it is the first issue by the company.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly not.

Mr. RALSTON: I am going to say what I have to say but I will make it just as brief as I can. That is my view, and I submit it to the consideration of the house. I say that the first transfer by the company, whether it is to the underwriter or to the public or to anyone else, is free from tax, and the purchaser who gets it, whether a so called underwriter purchasing en bloc, or individuals, they would not have that tax to pay and the industry would not be subject to that burden. The tax is upon the various subsequent transactions back and forth between people who are swapping shares with each other on the stock exchange.

Mr. CLARK: Could I interrupt the minister?

Mr. RALSTON: My only point—

Mr. CLARK: I just wanted some information, but I will not ask for it.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member need not be so short about it.

Mr. CLARK: You interrupted me.

Mr. STEVENS: That is his habit.

Mr. RALSTON: It seems to me that under the latter part of section 58 it is not an ad valorem tax but a specific tax. My hon. friends may not agree with that, but section 58 appears to impose a specific tax on shares of stock of a par value of $100 or any fraction thereof, and it does not seem to be a percentage tax at all. I do not know how it has been administered, and I am not very much interested in that, but when you read these words:

> an adhesive stamp, or a stamp impressed thereon by means of a die, of the value of 3 cents for every one hundred dollars or fraction thereof of the par value of the stock or shares or bond sold or tranferred.

it will be seen that a 3 cent stamp is required on the stock certificate, whether it be of a par value of $100 or less, which means a tax of 3 per cent on the par value. As I understand the present amendment, it is proposed to bring it back—

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is 3 cents on $100.

Mr. RALSTON: I was endeavouring to prepare my hon. friends for the shock when I told them that I thought they would disagree with my statement. Upon reading that section I think there is fair ground for saying that this is a specific tax and not an ad valorem tax. It is a specific tax of 3 cents per share for every share of a par value of $100 or fraction thereof.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not 3 per cent; it is 3 cents in $100.

Mr. RALSTON: It is one-third of one per cent, and I thank my hon. friend for the correction. If the amendment should pass it would bring this tax back to that situation.

The thing which is complained of is the taxation on the so-called penny shares, or the small priced shares. The minister first proposed that he would tax all shares selling at $3 or under at the rate of one cent per share; this would include a $3 share and go right down to the one-sixteenth of a cent per share mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark). It was pointed out that that one cent per share tax would be a pretty heavy tax on the small priced shares, but the minister now proposes that instead of that tax he will impose a one cent tax on shares selling at over $1 and up to $3. That means that there will be a tax of from one per cent to one-third of one per cent on those shares. As to the shares selling below one dollar, the minister now proposes that instead of imposing a one cent per share tax he will impose a tax of a quarter-cent per share on shares selling at not more than a dollar but over 50 cents. That means that the maximum tax would be one-half of one per cent and the minimum tax would be one-quarter of one per cent. Surely that is not something which would ruin the mining industry, as my hon. friends suggest. Then the minister proposes to impose a tax of one-tenth of a cent per share on shares selling at 50 cents or less. I do not think that that can be regarded as a very heavy tax, because it is less than the tax imposed at the present time. The rate on a 50 cent share would be one-fifth of one per cent and as the price of the share decreases the proportion goes up and the percentage of taxation is a little larger. When you get down to shares selling for one-sixteenth of a cent per share it means a pretty stiff tax, but I do not believe that there are many sound mining companies in this country whose shares are selling on the market at anything like one-sixteenth of a cent per share. Such companies are the ones who have sold their shares and put in their development, and the development has resulted unsuccessfully. The people who invested at that time have found themselves with shares on their hands and I do not think it would make very much difference to them whether their shares sold for one-sixteenth of a cent per share or one-sixtieth of a cent per share. The only thing they can do is to hold on to their shares with the hope of improvement in the situation, and I do not think the house would be very much concerned with that special situation.

Mr. CLARK: It would make it impossible to refinance.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. CLARK.: How could they get new money?

Mr. RALSTON: I thank my hon. friend for that suggestion. Although I am the last one to advise about it, I would suggest in an amateurish way that the method of refinancing should be for the people to value their property and issue such number of shares as could be sold at say 50 cents, and which would be taxed one-fifth of one per cent. Instead of issuing perhaps 5,000,000 shares for a property valued at only $50,000, the number of shares should be reduced and their value increased. The difficulty in the past has been that some mining companies issued their shares in millions and sold them at between 5 and 10 cents to people, if I may say so, who had no business to buy them but who were attracted by the large number of noughts on the face of the stock certificate and the very small amount of money they had to part with to purchase that imposing looking certificate. With all due respect to those who are interested in the mining industry, I do not believe that the people who are most interested in the mining industry are keen on seeing big lithographed stock certificates put out bearing amounts of hundreds or thousands of dollars on the face of them and selling, let us say, at 50 cents or a dollar or $2 per share. I suggest that it is much better to have the issue so limited that the certificate will sell at a price which will permit of a fair taxation of one-fifth of one per cent, or something of that kind, and regulate the number of shares to be issued by the amount of money which is required.

That is my answer to the question of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard with reference to refinancing. If a company has millions of dollars par value of stock in its treasury at a dollar per share, then they had better pass special resolutions and take the necessary procedure to increase the par value and decrease the number of shares so that they will sell at 50 cents or $1 at least in order that the tax rate may be small, instead of leaving the par value at $1 and selling the shares at one or two cents.

Mr. CLARK: What does the minister say about a tax of $50 on stock which is worth $1.25 a share and which has a total value of, say, $6,250. Is that a fair tax?

Mr. RALSTON: It is less than one per cent. A tax of $50 on a transaction amounting to $6,250 does not seem to me to be so terribly unreasonable. It does not shock me.

Mr. CLARK: What does the minister think of a tax of $4 on a sale of Royalite of $17,500?

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps that is not enough, but that is no argument that this tax is too much.

Mr. CLARK: Why not make it equitable?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friends have not suggested that at all.

Mr. STEVENS: We have suggested it a thousand times.

Mr. RALSTON: What my hon. friends are suggesting is to go back to the old three-cent arrangement whereby Royalite would have a lower tax than it has to-day.

Mr. CLARK: If the minister would make some suggestion along the line of making the tax equitable, it would not be long before we on this side of the house would accept it.

Mr. RALSTON: I am dealing with the amendment and it seems to me the mining industry is not going to suffer very seriously on account of this tax. If stock flotations are properly issued, I do not think there will be any difficulty about selling the stock. I am not very much impressed with the threat by some persons that they are not going to finance in Canada; in other words, that they are not going to play with the mining industry in this country, because this small tax is imposed. I do not think that argument should be allowed to influence us here, and the natural resources of Canada, if we may judge by what has happened recently, can be taken care of pretty well in Canada if necessary. I am quite sure it has not been fully apprehended that all the discussion about large taxation has had to do with the transfer after the industry has procured its capital and not with the original flotation.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I will take up only two or three minutes of the time of the house in replying to the remarks made by the Minister of National Defence. I think he has unconsciously misled the house in regard to underwriting. I have been connected with the underwriting of two or three companies and it is generally done in this manner. As he says, a group of brokers take the stock at a certain price. But they have to sell it to the public and whether they pay the tax when the stock is being transferred to them at the outset or after they sell the stock to the public, the public have to pay the tax just the same, and it has the same depressing effect upon the stock as if it were the first issue. The underwriters take the stock at, say 15 cents, and they sell it to the public at 20 or 25 cents because they have to take the risk: they have to put up perhaps $100,000 to finance the mine. They know and take into consideration that they have to collect the tax from the public, because the public have to pay it eventually. It depends upon how much the public have to pay for the stock whether they will take it or not, so that the tax has a marked effect on the small mining ventures.

Mr. RALSTON: What does my hon. friend say about changing the par value of the issue so that instead of selling at 15 or 20 cents, it will sell at 50 cents a share?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend has not the psychology of mining. Many people will not buy shares at 50 cents; they prefer to take their chances on the penny shares.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid it is those people who are being exploited.

Mr. MANION: They are not being exploited.

Mr. JACOBS: They are the table maids and office boys who are swindled by such shares as those.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. MANION: The people who bought Teck-Hughes at 15 cents, or McIntyre at 17 cents, and many other stocks at low prices, were not swindled.

Mr. JACOBS: What about the twenty thousand other companies?

Mr. MANION: Of course they cannot all make fortunes, otherwise there would not be any risk in the thing at all.

Mr. JACOBS: My hon. friend knows there has been more money lost in mining than has been made.

Mr. MANION: Is my hon. friend's argument that this whole scheme is for the purpose of stopping mining speculation and development altogether?

Mr. JACOBS: To a certain extent.

Mr. MANION: That is apparently what my hon. friend's argument is, and it is what this tax is going to do to a certain extent. It is going to stop a certain amount of this mining speculation. Some of it would be better stopped, but any man or woman who buys mining stock at a low price should know that he or she is playing a gambling game. I have gone into many of them on a small scale, and I have always kissed my money good-bye. If anything came back I said that it was "found" money, and that is exactly what these people do. Not many times did it come back, but sometimes it did.

Mr. JACOBS: That is gambling, pure and simple.

Mr. MANION: But it has helped to develop some of the mines of the country. You cannot stop gambling. People will gamble on horse races, and I would rather see them gamble on the mines where they are helping to bring about a good deal of development with their money.

Mr. JACOBS: But in mining they do not have a run for their money.

Mr. MANION: Oh, yes, they do. My intention in rising was to reply to the Minister of National Defence. While he to a certain extent ridicules the old tax, it was much more equitable than the new one. The complaint we are making is that the new tax is inequitable. For example, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) and various others have clearly demonstrated the inequity of this tax. When I was discussing this matter the other day I gave certain instances, and I have no intention of repeating them to-day, but one that I pointed out was a $30 tax on $54,000 worth of Noranda, and a $10 tax on $1,020 worth of Kirkland Lake, the number of shares in each case being the same. That is not an equitable tax. The thing is unfair; it is an unfair method of imposing taxes. The hon. member for West Kootenay (Mr. Esling)—and I will give the hon. gentleman credit for it—gave me a most extraordinary example and it illustrates it to an extreme, but to quite a possible, degree. He pointed this out to me a few minutes ago —and it will illustrate the matter better than anything that has so far been given. Take $1,000 and buy two shares of any stock that is worth $500 a share. For instance, Smelters was worth $500, although it is quoted at about $400 just now. The tax on that at the proposed rate would be eight cents on $1,000. But take the same $1,000 and put it into a stock selling at five cents a share, and the tax would be $20. In other words, there is a tax of $20 on $1,000 in the penny shares, and a tax of eight cents on $1,000 in the expensive shares. The expensive shares are the ones bought by the rich people, while the others are bought by the people who can afford to take a small flyer, as the expression is. Therefore the whole result of this tax is to hit the small man.

Mr. RALSTON: Hit the small share.

Mr. MANION: The small man buys the small shares because the poor man cannot afford to buy $500 stocks.

Mr. RALSTON: He can buy less.

Mr. MANION: But he does not do it. Many men will not buy $1,000 or $500 worth; they will buy $100 worth, and it is the small man putting in $10 here or $50 there or $100 elsewhere who, as was well pointed out by the hon. member for South Timiskaming (Mr. Lang), finances these new mines, some of which turn out profitably. I do not agree with the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) who suggests they are largely flim-flam games. No doubt there has been a certain amount of crookedness going on, and I do not dispute that for a moment. I did not happen to take any part in it that I know of. What we on this side of the house object to is the inequity of the tax, and I think we have demonstrated that pretty clearly. We object to the depressing influence it will have on new mining deals; to the fact that it is a greater tax on the poor man than on the rich man; and to the fact that while the Minister of Finance is continually talking about decreasing taxation, about revising taxation downwards, this is a revision of taxation upwards to a large extent. In every way it is inequitable and unfair, and it is a tax that should be voted against by every member in the house.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): There seems to be a great misunderstanding in regard to this question. I am opposed to the proposal of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) whether it applies to the penny stocks or otherwise, because it seems to me it is just another case of interfering with the legitimate development of business and discouraging the investor at all times. Others may call it what they wish, but I claim that this is a nuisance tax, and it is establishing a very vicious principle which I hope this house will not support. We have had several nuisance taxes in this country. Some of them have been abolished, and I had thought it was the intention of the government to eliminate all of them, because unscrupulous people in all walks of life and in all parts of the world take advantage of them. I think this government should be known as the gold-digging government, because they have devised more means than anybody else of taking money out of the pockets of the people, throwing it into the melting pot, and then wasting it in all parts of the country. No one knows better than the Minister of Finance that he is going to dig millions out of the pockets of the people and discourage investment if he carries out this proposal. At the same time he is making innocent people believe that he is reducing taxation. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is pretty hard to reduce and increase taxation at the same time, but the Minister of Finance is a fairly good window-dresser; he has succeeded in making certain innocent people believe that he has reduced taxation, but anybody who is alive to the situation knows better. This new tax is confusing; it will not be understood; it will mean extra cost to the mine operators; it will encourage dishonesty in mining development, and I hope that no member of this house will support it. I was a few minutes late coming into the house and I did not hear the resolution moved by my hon. leader (Mr. Bennett), but I am satisfied that it was along the right lines.

Mr. J. E. LAWSON (West York): I would ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) two questions arising out of the discussion this afternoon. The minister rather skilfully advocated the reorganization of the companies selling the cheaper priced stocks. When I call to his attention the fact that on one stock exchange in the province of Ontario there are approximately 100 stocks selling under $1 a share, does he seriously advocate that all these companies should reorganize and refinance in order to avoid the burden of taxation being imposed upon the cheaper priced stocks by this proposal of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb)?

Mr. RALSTON: I am not suggesting reorganization. The question was asked, if the stock of a certain company should go down to $\frac{1}{16}$ of a cent a share and the company should want more money, what would be done about it, and I was suggesting that the par value of the stocks should be revamped to sell in larger denominations, at a higher price. My hon. friend has not met the case at all because it is the 50 cent stock and not the $1 stock that is the one really complained of. I would ask him how many stocks of bona fide mining companies in Ontario that should be selling stock are selling stock below 50 cents a share?

Mr. LAWSON: I shall be very glad to give the information to the minister if he will give me time to go to my room and get the record. I would point out to him that the same argument which he advances in regard to stock selling at $\frac{1}{16}$ of a cent a share must be applicable, only in a lesser degree, to a stock the price of which has gone down to 2 cents a share.

The second question I would ask the Minister of National Defence is this: If I use $1,000 to buy the shares of a 2 cent stock, I could buy 50,000 shares, and the tax on that under this new proposal would be $50. But if I use the same $1,000 to buy two $500 shares, the tax on that would be 8 cents. What argument would the Minister of National Defence advance to justify the imposition of a tax that charges me $50 on my investment of $1,000 in the one case, where I buy shares at 2 cents each, and charges me only eight cents on my investment of $1,000 in another class of stock?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I rise to a point of order. It may be very interesting for the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) to be conducting an examination across the floor of the house of some hon. gentleman who has already spoken, but those of us who would like to see the business of the house expedited do not propose to sit here much longer while this cross-examination is going on. I rise to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that members who have already spoken should not be permitted to speak again.

[Mr. Lawson.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The point is well taken. An hon. member can speak only once in the debate, but if a question is asked and the house consents the minister may answer.

Mr. LAWSON: May I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that I have not spoken previously in this debate. My hon. friend must have reference to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. RALSTON: I think that was understood. My hon. friend should have addressed his inquiry to me while I was speaking.

Mr. MANION: He was making his argument by way of inquiry.

Mr. RALSTON: It is rather new in this house, but I suppose it can be done.

Mr. SPENCE: Nothing new here.

Mr. RALSTON: I repeat—

Mr. GUTHRIE: What about the point of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The point is well taken. If the minister does not receive unanimous consent he may not reply.

Mr. J. F. POULIOT (Temiscouata): This tax proposal, Mr. Speaker, of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has been considered from the viewpoint of the purchaser of shares. My friends on the other side of the house say that this tax will affect poor people who buy the lower priced shares. But there is another viewpoint. The purchaser is not the only one to be considered in this case. There is also the seller. I have personal knowledge of the fact that the promoters of mining stocks sold at a low price are often engaged in a huge swindle, and they try to get the money of poor people or, as my hon. friend from Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) said, of office boys and people generally in poor circumstances. I have noticed several times in our part of the country promoters who have come from the cities to try to sell mining stocks, and they tell the people that shares which they can buy at only 25 cents will go up and they will make a fortune within a very short time. Afterwards the people who buy the stock hear no more about their money. Very seldom does it happen that these low priced stocks turn out well. There are exceptions, of course, but as a general rule the selling of these low priced stocks to very small investors is just for the exploitation of the people.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would the hon. member prohibit the man of small capital from taking a gamble according to his means?

Mr. POULIOT: Not at all, but I say that big swindlers encourage such gambling in order to take money out of the pockets of the people. It has happened often in my own experience. A man opened a stock broker's office in my home town and went to gaol for swindling his clients.

Mr. McGIBBON: Are there many like that down there?

Mr. POULIOT: No, they come from outside and they never stay very long.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Nothing advanced this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, convinces me that the legislation we are presenting is not in the public interest. Hon. gentlemen opposite object to this tax on the ground of inequality. Based on that argument, where will you find any greater inequality than this? For instance, my friend the leader of the opposition may send a registered letter containing $100,000 out to Calgary, and my colleague the Postmaster General will charge him 12 cents—10 cents registration and 2 cents postage. Yet if I send a letter containing merely $20 to Valleyfield my colleague will charge me the same rate.

Mr. STEVENS: But that is a stamp tax.

Mr. ROBB: Or my colleague from Vancouver Centre may issue a cheque for $10,000 on which he will have to pay a tax of 2 cents; while if I issue a cheque for only $100 I have to pay the same tax. I submit the legislation is fair, and I cannot support the amendment.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Bennett) which was negatived on the following division:

WAYS AND MEANS

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The resolution before the committee appears in votes and proceedings of May 8, and reads:

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Excise Act, being chapter 60 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, by repealing subsection (a) of section 219 and substituting therefor the following:—

"On every pound of malt manufactured in Canada, subject to excise regulations with respect to coomings and absorption of moisture in warehouse as provided by the order in council on the seventh day of February, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, three cents; provided that malt may be removed from a malt house to a distillery in bond, and the duty on such malt may be remitted upon proof satisfactory to the department that such malt has been used solely for the production of spirits, in which production no other material than malt is used; and provided further that malt used, in any licensed bonded manufactory, in the manufacture of malt extract or other similar medicinal preparation approved by the department or in the preparation of any malt food product approved by the governor in council may have duty thereon remitted under such regulations as the department establishes."

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): It will be observed that the only change from the existing act is the addition of the words:

or in the preparation of any malt food product approved by the governor in council.

The explanation is that the Malted Milk Company of Canada desires to operate a factory for the purpose of manufacturing malted milk. It is represented that on part of the ingredients, whole malt, there is an excise tax of 3 cents a pound and on crushed malt 5 cents a pound. It is proposed to give them this free for that purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: The only objection is the old story—government by order in council.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; this medicinal preparation has to be approved of by the governor in council.

Mr. ROBB: I would point out to my hon. friend that this has been in the act many years. It was originally put in to protect the treasury.

Mr. BENNETT: This extends it to another item?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 279, to amend the Excise Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee and reported.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 212, to amend the Customs tariff.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the bill is given second reading I should like the minister to make a more adequate explanation of what is meant by using the words "of a class or kind not made in Canada," or "not manufactured in Canada," with respect to some nine or ten items in the tariff. Am I to understand that the policy of the administration is to call a halt now; that anything not made in Canada now they will permit to come in free or under a very low tariff, and that hereafter this country is to become economically dependent upon other countries for those commodities it may require but which are not now manufactured here? I observe that in some nine or ten instances the words "not made or manufactured in Canada" occur, and an explanation of exactly why these words are used would do much to enlighten many people who are inquiring as to whether the government has reached the stage where it does not propose hereafter to encourage the manufacture in Canada of goods not now produced in this country.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend is asking me to go into the history of the tariff schedules of Canada since the days of Sir Leonard Tilley. These words have been used in the tariff schedules from time to time, and I suppose the same rule applies now as prevailed then.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from May 10 consideration in committee of Bill No. 4, to amend and consolidate the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act—Mr. King (Kootenay)—Mr. Marcil in the chair.

On section 6—Unlawful for physician, etc., to prescribe a drug except for medicinal purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: Am I correct in my understanding that as the matter now stands this bill represents the considered opinion of the committee, in some instances unanimous and in others with some differences of opinion, and that medical men constituted the committee as far as that was possible?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. When we were considering this bill the other evening I moved an amendment to section 6, which consisted of the addition of a subsection. This provision is applicable to other sections of the act, but as I explained at that time, previously we had no trouble under this section, since we were fortified by a judgment of the appeal court of Ontario that upon trial by indictment and conviction the minimum sentence was three months' imprisonment, and that the judge had no discretion but to impose this sentence. Quite recently, however, and since the bill came back from the special committee, an appeal court of another province has decided differently; that court held that under section 1035 of the Criminal Code it is within the competence of the magistrate or judge to impose a fine and refrain from imposing imprisonment. After consultation with the Department of Justice it has been decided that this point should be cleared up, and they advised the amendment which I moved the last time we were in committee.

Mr. BENNETT: How will it read now?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The amendment is as follows:

Notwithstanding the provisions of the criminal code, or of any other statute or law, the court shall have no power to impose less than the minimum penalties herein prescribed.

That is the only amendment.

Section 6 as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

FISH INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee on Bill No. 25, to amend the Fish Inspection Act—Hon. Mr. Cardin—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section—Extension of application of act.

Mr. CARDIN: This bill provides for an amendment to the Fish Inspection Act in order to include fish-curing establishments, as was recommended by the Atlantic fisheries commission. The bill has been before the standing committee on marine and fisheries, which has approved it. Section 2 deals with the publication of the regulations in the prefix to the annual statutes. The Department of Justice has represented to us that the printing of these regulations in the statutes delays the publication of the statutes. In view of the fact that these regulations are printed in the Canada Gazette it has been decided not to have them published in the statutes.

Mr. ERNST: I do not desire to make any comments with reference to this particular bill, but I should like to take this opportunity of referring to a kindred bill, No. 26, which was before the committee a couple of times. There does not seem to be any disposition on the part of the officials of the department to have the provisions of that bill become effective. Could the minister give us some information in that regard?

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Mr. CARDIN: The hon. member is certainly mistaken as to the intention of the department. The government is absolutely serious in the bill which has been presented to the house and which is now before the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

Mr. ERNST: Apparently it is going to die there.

Mr. CARDIN: I understand that the committee has appointed a subcommittee to look into the evidence and recommendations of the Atlantic fisheries commission with a view to making a report to the whole committee. There has been no undue delay in the consideration of that bill as far as the government is concerned, and I can assure the hon. member that we are desirous of having that bill before the house as soon as possible, and before the session closes.

Mr. ERNST: That bill referred to the trawler question, and a subcommittee was appointed to look into the evidence taken before the royal commission. The minister must realize that to do this will require a period of some months—because the evidence was very voluminous, consisting of thousands and thousands of pages—and will make it impossible to present the bill to parliament during the present session.

Mr. CARDIN: I am sure that the subcommittee will not undertake to read every word in the evidence. They are familiar with the conditions and it will not be necessary for them to read the whole evidence in order to make a report.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN OF $10,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 37, to provide for a further loan to the harbour commissioners of Montreal.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 2—Loan of $10,000,000 to corporation for construction of terminal facilities.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister will state what this is intended to be used for.

Mr. CARDIN: It might be of importance to give a short statement of the expenditures that the harbour commission propose to make out of this appropriation of $10,000,000, if it is granted. The first item is $2,000,000, for the construction of three new berths for the unloading of grain and general cargoes in the harbour. Prior to the present the Tarte wharf was used for the unloading of tramp steamers, but since the development of the grain trade in the port of Montreal and the increase in the storage capacity of elevator No. 3, it has been found impossible to use the Tarte wharf for the purpose for which it was previously employed. It is proposed now to build three new berths at the Laurier wharf, and these three berths will be used in connection with the extended facilities at elevator No. 3. It is expected that the three new berths on this wharf will bring a return of about $80,000 and that on account of the increase in the grain traffic in that section of the harbour there will be an increase in revenue of about $50,000, so that the engineers and technical experts of the commission estimate that the return on this expenditure of $2,000,000 will be $130,000.

The second item provides for an expenditure of $2,000,000 for the reconstruction of two old wharves, King Edward and Alexandra, in the centre of the harbour. These wharves are used at present by the bigger vessels of 16,000 to 20,000 tons coming into the harbour of Montreal. These wharves were built thirty years ago, and the engineers of the harbour commission have been for several years representing to the commission that it is absolutely necessary to rebuild these old wooden structures.

Item No. 3 provides for an expenditure of $1,500,000 for the extension of the electrical system beyond the canal. The property of the harbour commission is divided by the Lachine canal and the electrical system of the section of the harbour east of the canal is operated by the Canadian National while the other, or main section of the harbour is operated by the electrical system of the harbour commission. Last year the harbour commission handled 150,000 revenue cars in the main section of the harbour and in the section of the harbour beyond the Lachine canal 50,000 revenue cars were handled by the Canadian National. It is a source of great inconvenience to have one section served by the electrical system of the harbour commission and the other by the Canadian National. The idea is to extend the electrical service of the main section of the harbour to the eastern section beyond the canal.

Mr. BENNETT: To electrify the whole thing?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. The present condition has been a source of great inconvenience and loss of revenue. It is expected when the system is extended to that section of the harbour, the revenue from the railway traffic on the harbour will be about $200,000. I think there is a justification for that expenditure.

Item No. 4 is an extension to the grain conveyor system. It must be remembered that the grain handled in 1926 amounted to 136 000,000 bushels, and in 1928 it reached the important figure of 218,000,000 bushels. The construction of the addition to elevator No. 3 makes it necessary to develop the conveyor system in order to cope with the greater traffic in the harbour.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the amount to be spent on that?

Mr. CARDIN: The amount suggested is $1,000.000. Item No. 5 provides for an expenditure of $500,000 for industrial wharves. It has been found necessary for the commission to build additional wharves.

Mr. BENNETT: Are there any election wharves in that?

Mr. CARDIN: Not to my knowledge, and I can assure my hon. friend I do not rely on that.

Mr. BENNETT: He will not overlook that. These wharves are, I suppose, where freight is collected.

Mr. CARDIN: They are supposed to be. Several companies in Montreal are using certain sections of the harbour for their establishments. The commission have leased at the present time a certain area of the harbour to companies which are using these wharves for their industries. It has been found necessary, as I said, to build additional wharves in order to meet the daily requirements of industries in the city of Montreal. These wharves will be leased at a price that will take care of the capital expenditure and the interest on the money invested in building them.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend means the interest and sinking fund to take care of the capital?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. The commissioners are not going to build these wharves unless they are sure of a revenue of 6 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the rate now?

Mr. CARDIN: That is the rate now for all the industrial wharves which are leased by industries in the city of Montreal. The revenue expected from that source will be $30,000 on an expenditure of $500,000.

Item No. 6 provides for an expenditure of $2,000,000, the object being to build new berthing facilities in the harbour of Montreal. It has been found that the port is in need of new development and new berthing facilities. Two alternative projects have been recommended to the commission by the engineers, either to make a new development in the upper section of the harbour, or to make a development in the lower section of the harbour, in what we call the Maisonneuve section.

Mr. BENNETT: What constituency would that be in?

Mr. CARDIN: That constituency is represented at the present time by Mr. Robitaille. Item No. 7 relates to the acquisition of lands as a result of a decision of the privy council. As the committee will remember, action was taken two years ago against the harbour commission of Montreal by a proprietor who contended that the commission had taken over part of his property without any compensation to him at all. The question came before the courts in this country, and later an appeal was taken to the privy council, and the privy council decided that the commissioners had no right to deprive the owner of his right of ingress and egress to the St. Lawrence. It has therefore become necessary for the commission to compensate these owners, and $1,000,000 is provided for this purpose.

Before taking my seat, I might add that the receipts from the harbour of Montreal have been increasing year by year. For the last year ending December 31, 1928, the total revenue of the harbour was $5,589,327.12. Other items are as follows:

The total operations	$2,810,052 08
Interest to government on loans advanced	2,023,448 94
Interest on over-draft at the bank	3,865 48
Sinking fund	477,100 06
Total	$5,314,466 56

This leaves a net balance of $274,860.62.

Mr. BENNETT: Are any allowances made for depreciation?

Mr. CARDIN: I think that is taken care of in the sinking fund.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not in the sinking fund.

Mr. CARDIN: No. The result of last year's operations in the harbour of Montreal has been very satisfactory. Business is going to continue to grow in the port of Montreal as the country prospers and as the importance of the harbour from a national point of view is realized. Under these circumstances I think I am justified in asking the committee and parliament to grant to the harbour commission the loan which this bill provides for.

Mr. BENNETT: What money has the minister on hand unexpended from previous advances?

Mr. CARDIN: About $2,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Then $10,000,000 will not be spent this year?

Mr. CARDIN: Oh no. The program covers at least three or four years.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the total amount now in the sinking fund?

Mr. CARDIN: It is $1,460,000.

Mr. GARDINER: In giving an outline of the expenditure the minister stated that the harbour commission would have to pay compensation for property rights by virtue of a judgment given by the privy council. Is this merely to pay this gentleman for taking the waterfront from him, and if so, what extent of waterfront are we expected to pay for?

Mr. CARDIN: The amount of $1,000,000 which we are providing in this bill is not the exact amount which will be required. We do not know the exact amount, but basing their judgment on the valuation which was made during the court proceedings the commissioners think that that amount will be sufficient to compensate the proprietors. At least one other proprietor is in the same position. Action was taken by one proprietor, but there are others; I am sure that there is at least one other property owner in the same position. If we pay to Mr. Tetreault the amount of money that he might claim as a result of the valuation made during the court proceedings, we shall have to pay the same amount to another proprietor who is in the same position. The commissioners believe that this amount of $1,000,000 will be sufficient to cover all the claims made by Mr. Tetreault and others who are in the same position.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that it has been the practice of the board not to buy land back from the waterfront, but rather to sink cribs and make their own property by filling in. It appears to me quite a large item to pay $1,000,000 merely for waterfront rights, which do not include any land. I presume the minister has under his hand details as to the extent of this waterfront, and I would like some information on that point.

Mr. CARDIN: I regret very much that I am not in a position to give my hon. friend that information, but it must be remembered that in the port of Montreal the land along the St. Lawrence river is of very great value, and it does not take a large extent of property to run into hundreds of thousands of dollars. To make the position a little clearer, I do not contend that this $1,000,000 will be required to pay merely for the shore part of the property. It may be found advantageous, instead of buying only a certain amount of property, to buy the property entirely which adjoins the works of the harbour commission. The commissioners in fixing this amount have contemplated the possibility of buying the whole property of Mr. Tetreault, for example, instead of buying only a small piece of his property along the shore. In that case it might be more advantageous for the harbour commissioners to buy the whole property for the development of the port. But I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I am not in a position to give my hon. friend the information he requires in regard to the length of the property.

Mr. GARDINER: Probably the minister can secure that information at some future time and give it to the house.

Mr. CARDIN: Certainly.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Interest on debentures during construction may be charged to capital account.

Mr. BENNETT: The reason I asked the minister as to whether or not this money is required this year is that, as I understand it, the debentures are issued from time to time as the government advances the money; but obviously if all the money is advanced at one time the board will be paying a larger amount of interest than it is receiving, and there will be a loss to the board. What is the method of payment of interest during construction?

Mr. CARDIN: I understand the interest is taken out of the advances made by the government.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—No loan until plans approved.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I notice that no loan is to be paid in respect of the construction of terminal facilities "unless such detailed plans, specifications and estimates have been submitted to and approved by the governor in council." Is a fair wage clause included in the specifications?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is it a clause approved by the Minister of Labour, such for instance, as that used by the Department of Public Works?

Mr. CARDIN: I understand the wages paid on all these contracts are approved by the Minister of Labour. In fact a case was brought to my attention a couple of years ago with respect to complaints in regard to wages, and I think the wages were fixed to the satisfaction of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is the minister sure? Would he consent to the clause being amended in this way?

That there shall be included in the said specifications a fair wage clause satisfactory to the Minister of Labour.

Mr. CARDIN: I hesitate to do that, although nobody is better disposed towards labour than I am. I should not like to establish a new fair wage clause in the place of one that has been so satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the minister assure the house that the fair wage clause is satisfactory to the Minister of Labour?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Sections 5 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN OF $10,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 66, to provide for a further loan to the Vancouver harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

Section 2—Loan of $10,000,000 to corporation for construction of terminal facilities

Mr. GARDINER: Explain.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, the expenditure which the harbour commissioners propose to make out of the loan of $10,000,000 will be:

1. For the redemption of the commissioners' matured mortgage notes issued for the balance of the purchase price of Hastings mill site and incidental expenses therewith—

Mr. BENNETT: How much?

Mr. CARDIN: That is $1,950,000.

2. Developments on site of the Hastings mill property:

(a) Wharf for vessels in coastal trade and grain jetty, for commissioners' operation, $350,000.

(b) Wharf for vessels in coastal trade, fish wharf and fish storage, also cold storage, for operation by lessees, $1,150,000.

(c) For development of a new ocean pier as warranted by increased business, $3,500,000.

Those sums make a total of $5,000,000 for item number 2.

3. Addition to grain handling facilities, as follows:

At elevator No. 1, to increase its capacity by approximately 3,000,000 bushels.

At elevator No. 2, to increase its capacity by approximately 2,000,000 bushels.

At elevator No. 3, to increase its capacity by approximately 2,500,000 bushels.

These additions to the grain handling facilities involve an expenditure of $3,000,000.

These two items represent a grand total of $9,950,000.

Last year the grain deliveries at Vancouver amounted to 97,250,548 bushels. To get an idea of the development and progress of the port of Vancouver we have only to remember what the deliveries were in 1924, only 4 years ago. For the year 1924 the figure was only 55,000,000 bushels. This gives an idea of the development of trade at Vancouver. The receipts last year amounted to $2,057,739.02 and the expenditures totalled only $1,682,-470.87. After taking care of operating expenses, interest due to the government, and sinking fund, a substantial balance was left in the hands of the commissioners. Another fact which indicates the development of trade there is that the number of deep sea ships coming into the harbour in 1927 totalled 1,100, whereas in 1928 there were 1,300, an increase of 200. I do not know that I can add anything else which is not known to practically all the members of the committee.

Mr. LUCAS: What is the total elevator capacity at Vancouver at the present time?

Mr. CARDIN: 5,325,000 bushels.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. LUCAS: And what is the proposed capacity?

Mr. CARDIN: 7,500,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Does the item of expenditure which the minister has given, $1,-682,000 odd, include interest on the capital expenditure and also the sinking fund, or is it merely for the running expenses of the commission?

Mr. CARDIN: The figure I have, with the heading under which it appears, is: "Operating expenditure, including debenture interest to government, $1,680,000". I think the sinking fund is taken out of that amount.

Mr. GARDINER: You have not these items separately?

Mr. CARDIN: Not in the statement I have.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister also said it was proposed to construct cold storage for leasing purposes. Is there any possibility of leasing all that space on favourable terms?

Mr. CARDIN: The commissioners have assured us that they will get companies or individuals to rent the space.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister has no authentic information as to tentative arrangements?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. GARDINER: Some years ago an elevator was bought for the purpose of subleasing, and it was finally sub-leased—at any rate it was supposed to be sub-leased—to the Oriental Grain Company. I do not know whether the house has ever had an opportunity of discussing the final payment made to that company by reason of the fact that they did not secure the space for which they had contracted. The lease was broken. Can the minister give us any information regarding that transaction?

Mr. CARDIN: At the moment I cannot give any definite information, but I will undertake to afford the hon. member an opportunity to discuss the matter. I am ready to bring down all the details we have. This is a special case and I have not the figures before me at the moment, but I shall endeavour to submit them at some other time.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: I may say that two years ago this house insisted that the case be taken to the courts in British Columbia and there the company received a settlement for $133,000 odd.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the information given to the house by the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Blatchford) is startling. Fortunately for Vancouver and for Canada as a whole we have now a new board of commissioners at that port, and I trust from the experience we have had with the old board that the new commission in making leases will not get into a jackpot as their predecessors did. I cannot imagine that the people of Canada would appreciate the circumstances if they were aware of them. It appears to us in Alberta that this was more or less a political proposition and that political favourites got a nice rakeoff in consequence of this lease. I trust the minister in the future will pay closer attention to leases of this description.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: When that lease was granted to the British and Oriental Grain Company, the United Grain Growers and the Alberta Pacific Grain Company, who looked over the plant, refused pointblank to entertain a lease. It was considered a white elephant on the waterfront, and the harbour board at that time got in touch with a group of Alberta people who agreed to take the lease over. At a later date the United Grain Growers, after the lease had been cancelled to the British and Oriental Grain Company, took the plant over, and made twice as much profit in one year as the British and Oriental Grain Company had received by way of settlement.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend's argument would be feasible if he had told the committee that the company who made this large profit—I do not mean the Oriental Grain Company, but the other one—had actually done work and earned the money. The hon. gentleman says this was a white elephant. From what we have been told in regard to the amount it has cost the country to settle with the Oriental Grain Company it seems to me that instead of being a white elephant it was highly coloured with gold.

Mr. KELLNER: What question was submitted to the courts? Was it to find out whether the government owed the Oriental Grain Company money, or was it to determine the amount?

Mr. CARDIN: The question submitted to the courts was to ascertain the value of the claim.

Mr. GARDINER: Was the question submitted, in the first place, whether the government or the commission owed the company any money?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Quite sure of that?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I am glad the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) is in the house, because I should like him to assure us that a fair wage provision will be inserted before any monies are granted. We did not have any assurance in that regard in the other case. I should like also to have a copy of that fair wage clause if it is possible to obtain it. In my opinion, also, the enforcement of the fair wage clause should come within the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour in order that we might have uniformity in connection with fair wage clauses. We have not unanimity in that respect at present. When difficulties arise in connection with labour we find one fair wage clause here and another somewhere else, and, as the Minister of Labour well knows, when a similar question arose on a previous occasion this session I had some trouble in getting certain fair wage clauses enforced. The fair wage clause in one department was not the same as that in another, and the fair wage clause in which I was interested, and which the Minister of Labour was trying to enforce, was made absolutely useless by just one provision which vitiated the whole thing. I want to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to assure the committee again that a fair wage clause satisfactory to the Minister of Labour will be inserted here and that a copy of that clause will be furnished me.

Mr. CARDIN: I will give that undertaking, certainly.

THREE RIVERS HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN OF $2,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 67, to provide for a loan to the Three Rivers Harbour Commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Sir Eugene Fiset in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Loan of $2,000,000 to harbour commissioners for terminal facilities.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister explain?

Mr. CARDIN: For a number of years the works in the harbour of Three Rivers were taken care of by the Department of Public Works. The main wharves in that harbour were built by that department, and although a few years ago a harbour commission was created at this point certain works were later undertaken by the Department of Public Works, namely the construction of additional wharves. When the commissioners came to the government this year asking for an advance of money for the development of the harbour, it was decided that the money for the works which were started last year, and which will cost between $300,000 and $400,000, if my memory serves me aright, should be provided by such an advance rather than by the Department of Public Works.

The object of the expenditure is to provide first for a quay wall 688 feet long, a pier 500 feet long and approximately 320 feet wide, and an additional quay wall to the inner end of the pier and fronting on basin number one, 375 feet long. Then it is intended to construct another quay wall fronting basin number two 515 feet long, with a short section of quay wall at right angles to this, 135 feet long. There will be thus provided seven additional berths in that harbour, and this amount is necessary for the construction of those wharves, which provide open storage.

When I presented the resolution to the house, if I remember correctly the hon. member for Acadia asked how we contemplated securing the necessary revenue to meet the interest on that expenditure. My answer is that the new development in that harbour will naturally increase the facilities available and will result in a very material increase in the traffic handled. In fact, at present the commissioners are not able to meet all the requests for space on these wharves, and the companies doing business at Three Rivers and in that vicinity have been complaining because the vessels on which their merchandise is carried are delayed in the harbour. In particular, there will be a large increase in the amount of coal imported through this port. The Dominion Coal Company has given a guarantee that this year it will unload 200,000 tons of coal in the harbour of Three Rivers.

Let me repeat that it is impossible at present for the commissioners to meet the demands for space which are made upon them. This committee will realize, Mr. Chairman, that Three Rivers is a very important industrial city; its population now is over 35,000, and its industries are very numerous. When we were discussing the resolution someone suggested that the object of this advance was only to accommodate the paper mill at this point, but that is not the case. Other industries of importance are established in Three Rivers, and we must remember also that Three Rivers serves a very important territory so far as port facilities are concerned. I refer to Shawinigan Falls and the town of Grand'Mere, where there is a large development of water-power and where important industries are being established all the time. So I think the conditions justify the proposals of the harbour commissioners, and I think they are entitled to ask this assistance from parliament.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. GARDINER: Is this the first loan to the new harbour commission?

Mr. CARDIN: This is the first loan to be made by the government.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister any information as to the revenues last year?

Mr. CARDIN: The revenue for the year 1928 was $74,142.71. In 1924, only four years ago, the revenue was $39,468.71.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the expenditure?

Mr. CARDIN: The expenditure for 1928 amounted to $34,910.10, leaving a surplus of $40,000.

Mr. ADSHEAD: When does the minister expect the specifications will be in his possession?

Mr. CARDIN: I understand that the plans and specifications are already in the department.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Then the minister will be able to give me a copy of the fair wage clause?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

CHICOUTIMI HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN OF $2,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 68, to provide for a further loan to the Chicoutimi harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Sir Eugene Fiset in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister give us an explanation of this bill, stating particularly how much has been expended?

Mr. CARDIN: The object of this bill is to provide for an advance of $2,000,000 to the harbour commissioners. Two years ago an advance of $500,000 was made, and at the present time the commission has under construction a wharf extension which will cost $503,626. The present bill is to provide for a loan to make a further extension of 2,400 feet to the wharf, and the expenditure in that connection will amount to a little over $2,000,000. The receipts last year amounted to $18,587.63 and the expenditures to $5,497.13. The commission were able to use only the old section of the wharf; they did not have the use of the facilities which are being constructed.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the cost of management last year?

Mr. CARDIN: I have only the total expenditure, salaries, maintenance and sundry disbursements on revenue account, amounting to $5,497.13. It may be asked as to how the interest on this new expenditure will be obtained. The commission reports as follows as to the expected revenues:

Present wharf, one berth facilities..	$15,000
Coal, 225,000 tons..	25,000
Paper, 70,000 tons..	15,000
Sulphur, 20,000 tons..	5,000
Pulp, 200,000 tons..	25,000
Gasoline, 3,000,000 gals..	30,000
General freight..	20,000
Car shunting, lease of space, moorage fees, etc..	25,000

We must remember that Chicoutimi is the centre of a very large and important industrial activity due to the tremendous development of electrical power in that section. At present 700,000 horse-power is being developed and there is in process of development an additional 800,000 horse-power. During 1930, of the 800,000 horse-power, 250,000 will be developed. Chicoutimi, as is known by the members of the committee, is at the head of the Saguenay river and an aluminum company and other very important industries are located and are being located there as a result of the tremendous development of water-power in that section of Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not another harbour they are using?

Mr. CARDIN: There is another harbour which is being used at present, and which is called the Baie de Ha-Ha.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the one.

Mr. CARDIN: When these proposed developments were being considered and when the harbour commission of Chicoutimi was created, the question was submitted to a very competent harbour expert, Mr. Swan.

Mr. BENNETT: Not Mr. Palmer.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Swan. He made a very extensive survey of all the territory and in his report he contends that the harbour of Baie de Ha-Ha is not as advantageous as that of Chicoutimi on account of the grade from the level of the water to the height of land. He said that the grade on which the trains would have to go from the level of the harbour to the site of the industrial centre would be very heavy and he contended that this would be an objection. Moreover, the port of Chicoutimi is open earlier in the year. The ice goes out of the harbour of Chicoutimi much sooner than it does out of the harbour of Baie de Ha-Ha. The latter being a bay, there is no current to carry out the ice. Therefore the advice of the expert confirms the belief of the commissioners that the harbour of Chicoutimi is by far the more advantageous of the two. Of course I understand there is a certain amount of dispute between the two localities, but from an engineering point of view there is no doubt that Chicoutimi is by far the better place, and it is also much nearer the centre of the industrial development which is taking place in that section.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister informed the committee that he expected a revenue of $160,000 per annum. He also gave the various items that go to make up the total. Can he inform us when he expects to reach that amount of revenue?

Mr. CARDIN: As soon as the facilities are provided, as soon as the wharves are built, the traffic will commence there because the industries are waiting for the development of these facilities to handle the larger amount of supplies they propose to handle.

Mr. GARDINER: Do I understand that these industries cannot develop until such time as the facilities are provided, or what are they doing with the business now?

Mr. CARDIN: They are handling the business as well as they can, but they are not at the present time importing into Chicoutimi the same amount of supplies that they will be in a position to import when the industries are completely established. These mills are in the course of completion, and the harbour commissioners want to be ready, when the mills are in operation, with the necessary facilities in the harbour.

Mr. GARDINER: I take it that the total expenditure, after this item is passed, will be $2,500,000?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. KELLNER: Has the government lent any money to the Ha-Ha harbour the minister was talking about?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

HALIFAX HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN OF $5,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 69, to provide for a further loan to the Halifax harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 2—Loan of $5,000,000 to corporation for construction of terminal facilities.

Mr. CARDIN: In regard to this bill I am not in a position to give any extensive or detailed statements as far as the past year is concerned, because the harbour commissioners were put in possession of the facilities of the harbour only during the latter months of last year. An advance of $500,000 was authorized a few years ago for the harbour of Halifax, out of which there has so far been expended $31,095.65. The elevator up to recently was under the control of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the information we have from that department as to the grain shipped through it is as follows:

	Bushels
1927	1,047,670
1928	2,191,659

[Mr. Cardin.]

A summary of the proposed expenditure which has been submitted to me is as follows:

Miscellaneous, plant equipment	$ 85,000
Deep Water Terminals
Proposed revetment wall	400,000
Pier No. 4, repairs	8,200
Pier No. 3, repairs	17,300
New Pier No. 2, miscellaneous repairs	62,000
Ocean Terminals
Marginal Road pavement	80,000
Sheds 23, 24, 25 and 28, permanent foundations and floors	166,000
Pier No. "A", two transit sheds	440,000
Pier "B", construction together with 1 transit shed	3,741,500
1,000,000 bushel addition to the grain elevator	300,000
Land damages	100,000
Total	$5,400,000

Mr. GARDINER: Was there any revenue last year?

Mr. CARDIN: I have no statement as to that, but the revenue would amount to practically nothing, because, as I have said, the commissioners took over the property late last year.

Mr. GARDINER: The revenue from the elevator would come under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: From the statement of the minister it appears that 1,000,000 bushel additional capacity is to be provided at a cost of $300,000. Does the commission feel that this will be justified? What is the present elevator capacity?

Mr. CARDIN: Speaking from memory, 2,000,000 bushels.

Mr. GARDINER: And you have just filled that elevator once, because the number of bushels passing through last year was 2,000,000. I would recommend that the minister look into that question, because an elevator can handle a great deal more grain in the year than its capacity, and additional capacity should not be built until there is greater volume. A few days ago I inquired whether the elevator had been leased. The minister's information was that he did not think so. Can the minister say now whether any bin room in that elevator has been leased to private parties?

Mr. CARDIN: We have nothing to indicate that the elevator has been leased to anyone.

Mr. GARDINER: Did the minister have the files of the Trade and Commerce department examined to see whether a previous lease had been given by that department?

Mr. CARDIN: No. All the information we have in my department indicates that the elevator is still under the control of the harbour commission. The commissioners, having taken possession of the property only last year, would certainly have advised the department if the elevator had been leased. Such a thing would not have been done without the consent and approval of the department.

Mr. GARDINER: I have received information that the bin room in the elevator had been leased to private parties for the purpose of mixing Canadian and American grain. If that is the case, naturally we would take very strong objection to it. May I suggest that the minister make further inquiries to see whether that is being done?

Mr. CARDIN: Certainly.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have received representations from my constituency concerning top wharfage at Halifax. This is being charged as a result of the establishment of the harbour commission.

Mr. BENNETT: We told you that last year.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would like to place a few facts before the minister for his consideration. The Halifax harbour commission was established, as hon. gentlemen know, as a result of one of the recommendations of the Duncan commission. Prior to the establishment of the commission the wharves at Halifax were owned by the Canadian National Railways. The item of freight in which I am particularly interested is apples coming from the Annapolis valley. Several million dollars worth of apples go through the port of Halifax every year. The charge for top wharfage on apples prior to the establishment of the commission was 4 cents a barrel. The harbour commission has established a rate of 1 cent a barrel, which so far as I can learn is probably the most moderate rate in Canada. But the shippers of the Annapolis valley were not called on to pay top wharfage charges. The Canadian National Railways shared in the transportation of the apples to a slight extent and they charged what they called a switching charge, part of which the shippers paid. The shippers still have to pay their proportion of the switching charge; but the wharves having been taken over by the Halifax harbour commission, a top wharfage charge is now imposed by the commission, which is just that much of an addition to what the shippers all along the Dominion Atlantic Railway have to pay. The charge, as I say, is moderate, and as the whole of Nova Scotia, I think I am safe in saying, was in favour of the establishment of the Halifax harbour commission—certainly I received many resolutions from boards of trade, asking that I support the establishment of the commission—I do not think any very reasonable exception can be taken to the charge. But it is thought that to the extent that it is imposed upon freight coming from points along the Canadian National Railways it should be absorbed by that system. If that situation arises—absorption of the top wharfage rate by the Canadian National Railways, which is quite proper—there should be a similar absorption by the other transportation system, or at least some arrangement should be made so there would be no discrimination between the shippers on the Canadian National system and the shippers on the Dominion Atlantic Railway, which is part of the Canadian Pacific Railway system. I bring these facts to the attention of the minister for his consideration. The matter is of some importance because the shippers of the Annapolis valley send a great deal of freight to foreign countries through the port of Halifax.

Mr. SHORT: The minister mentioned an expenditure of $100,000 for land damages. Has he any particulars as to whom those damages were paid?

Mr. CARDIN: I regret that I have not the details before me, but I will undertake to supply them to my hon. friend.

Mr. SHORT: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the same matter that my friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) has referred to. Prior to the establishment of the commission I understand there was no top wharfage charge, that it was absorbed either by the railways or by the steamship companies. The constituency which I have the honour to represent in that district ships upwards of 1,000,000 barrels of apples annually. Naturally the shippers protest most vigourously against this charge. I trust the minister will take the matter into consideration and see if some arrangement cannot be made whereby either the railway companies or the steamship companies will absorb this charge. It means quite a tax on the shippers. We were all in favour of the establishment of the harbour commission, but we were led to believe there would be no advance whatever in the charges. I am glad my hon. friend from Hants-Kings has brought the matter up, and certainly it should receive consideration by the minister.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, I feel sure the harbour commissioners will be most anxious to make the port of Halifax as popular as possible with shippers. They know the conditions of the province and I am confident they will do their utmost to meet any representation made to them by the shippers of Nova Scotia. If they are in need of any advice along the lines suggested by my hon. friends, I shall be quite willing to tender it.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: So far as I know, every public harbour which comes under the direction of harbour commissioners finances itself by certain charges imposed on all shippers. While I deeply sympathize with the shippers through the port of Halifax, I certainly see no reason to suppose that they should be treated in any way different from the shippers through other ports. I have always understood that the money we lend is to be expended by the harbour commissioners to provide improvements for facilitating the shipment of goods, and therefore it is to be expected that the shippers will have to meet a part of that cost. I should like to know whether the suggestion made by the two hon. members from the Annapolis valley is to be treated as an exception to the general rule.

Mr. CARDIN: I think the tariff of rates that the hon. gentlemen have been complaining of is prevailing generally in all the other harbours.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is my impression.

Mr. CARDIN: Although it is desirable that the charges be the same in all harbours, there is always room for certain exceptions according to the locality in which the port is situated. We have to take care of the special conditions surrounding a particular line of trade. But certainly it is expected the harbour commissioners will make their charges high enough to pay the interest on the money we are advancing to them. However, we always try to have the charges as low as possible.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am quite in agreement with the minister that the charges to cover the cost involved should be as low as possible. It has always been my impression that however those charges are absorbed, in the long run the shippers and the consumers of the goods on which such charges are levied must meet them. If they are absorbed by the transportation companies, they will certainly be included in the freight rates, and eventually they will be reflected back in the prices which the shippers will receive for their goods.

Mr. ILSLEY: My main point is that the shippers on the two transportation systems should be treated in the same way; there should be no difference.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT: I ventured last year to express the opinion that Halifax and St. John should be free ports, and it was suggested during the course of the debate that the words "free port" had been misunderstood by myself. If the minister has been following the observations of the trade commissioner at Hamburg, who recently has been making addresses throughout Canada, he will realize that this gentleman has advocated exactly what I then suggested to the house. I suggested that in our export business we were competing with the world by reason of the fact that the home market was by this government handed over to our foreign competitors, necessitating our seeking foreign markets for exports for which we should be able to find markets at home; and as we were driven to foreign markets we have to compete not only with the domestic markets in those foreign countries but, as well, with other competitors throughout the world. This being so, the question of charges—top wharfage and charges of that character in connection with export trade—becomes very important. This gentleman from Hamburg in, I believe, his address at Prince Rupert, pointed out the inevitable result and he further indicated the experience in Hamburg, where he is stationed, giving particulars of the whole matter. I shall not go into this to-night beyond observing that the recommendation of the Duncan report was that these harbours should be put under a commission. I had no doubt when I read that report, nor have I any doubt now about this: It was not intended that these ports should be regarded as commission ports in the sense in which we ordinarily use that term, implying self-sustaining undertakings, but that they should be considered to be national ports out of which, summer and winter, goods might be exported in order that the idea which was behind the confederation of the maritime provinces and the other parts of the Dominion should be carried out. That idea was that the export traffic of the country should find its way to the ports of the world through Halifax and St. John, during the winter at any rate, although during the summer, as it was then pointed out, the harbours of Montreal and Quebec afford many facilities in that direction. The conditions to which the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) has alluded indicate clearly that what I anticipated has happened, namely, that the charges imposed for top wharfage have affected the movement of commodities, such as apples in the Annapolis valley, and commodities of that kind. Whether the traffic originates on the Canadian National Railways or on the Dominion Atlantic, or whether it originates at the port of St. John, the situation is one which, if it continues, cannot but be injurious to the ports and must bring about a condition which will prevent the accomplishment of the purpose intended in the expenditure of the monies in question; because these expenditures are made for these ports as national undertakings; they are ports through which it is intended that Canadian goods shall be shipped to the markets of the world. That is the position as I understand it, and I think the minister must approach the question in the light of the Duncan report from a different angle than he otherwise would. These are not ports of the character of those that are closed during a portion of the year.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. GOTT: Before you do so, Mr. Chairman, may I point out that in the last seventy-five minutes we have voted money at the rate of a quarter of a million dollars per minute. Bill No. 66 provides for a loan to the harbour commission of Vancouver of $10,000,000; Bill No. 67 provides for a loan of $2,000,000 to the harbour commission of Three Rivers; Bill No. 68 provides for a loan of $2,000,000 in connection with Chicoutimi; and this bill, No. 69, makes provision for a loan to the Halifax commission of $5,000,000. This represents a total of $19,000,000. In 1914 plans were drafted for a breakwater at the town of Leamington in the riding of South Essex, which I have the honour to represent, and that proposal involved an expenditure of $300,000. But although continued representations have been made to this government no favourable consideration has ever been given to the harbour there. I wish to direct this to the attention of the minister so that possibly, in preparing his estimates next year, he may favourably consider a constituency whose colour has not been at all times Liberal.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What about Halifax?

Mr. GOTT: South Essex used to be Liberal. I may say that I have written to the deputy minister asking that minor repairs be also made to the wharf at Amherstburg and I trust that favourable consideration will be given this matter.

Mr. CARDIN: That is something that comes under the Public Works department, but I will undertake to bring the representations of my hon. friend to the knowledge of my colleague.

Mr. CANTLEY: I wish to refer briefly to the harbours of Halifax and St. John, and particularly Halifax, in relation to the report of the Duncan commission in its recommendations respecting these harbours. The report recommends that these ports be developed just as the railways and the canals in Canada were developed. Now we all know how the railways of Canada were developed and particularly how the canal system of this country was developed and is maintained. These undertakings were carried out at the cost of the Dominion as a whole and are to-day operated without any tolls whatever. Not only does that apply to our own traffic; it applies also to the traffic of our neighbours to the south of us. Now we in Nova Scotia are in this position: this country is giving to the people to the south of us facilities which enable them to bring in their coal and steel, using for their transport our canals free of all toll charges, to compete with the maritime provinces in Montreal and other cities of central Canada. To balance to some extent the disabilities under which we were labouring in this connection and in some other respects, the Duncan commission made this recommendation with reference to the maritime ports. It is no answer to the recommendations of that commission to say that the government have appointed a commission to regulate, to govern and to operate these harbours when they make no provision for so doing except through tolls levied on the traffic of these harbours. And that is exactly what has happened under the harbour commissions of St. John and Halifax. This was not what was intended or recommended by the Duncan commission, to whose report I have referred. So long as the present condition of affairs prevails we in the maritime provinces will continue to protest against a situation which is very far from that recommended by the Duncan commission. I wish again to call the attention of the minister and of the committee to these facts.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to say just a word in regard to this matter. My hon. friend and I do not agree, but since he feels it necessary to put his views on record, I feel that I should not allow the opportunity to pass without once more reminding this committee of the exact situation.

My hon. friend has referred to-night, as he did previously, to the terms of what is now known as the Duncan report. I only desire to direct the attention of the committee to the passages in that report which already have been referred to and which I say with all due respect do not bear out the contention of my hon. friend. The report states clearly that the recommendation is that there shall be statutory commissions appointed. As I had occasion to point out previously the gentlemen who made that report were not unskilled in the use of the English language; they were men with full ability to make their meaning plain, and from cover to cover of the report there is no suggestion that the statutory commissions which were recommended should be different in any degree from the statutory commissions already established at Vancouver, Quebec, Montreal and other places. So clear is this that in the report itself, following the recommendation, Sir Andrew Rae Duncan and his associates expressly refer to the fact that they had an opportunity for a private session with the Montreal harbour commission, and they go on to say:

> ...and, by hearing from them the steps they took to survey and stimulate production in their immediate territory as well as wider afield, we are confirmed in our view as to what harbour commissions (constituted of business and experienced persons) at Halifax and St. John could do in stimulating the trade of the maritime provinces.

Then they go on to reiterate their recommendation. Quite contrary to what my hon. friend has said, I am of the opinion that the suggested commissions were similar to those of which Sir Andrew Rae Duncan and his colleagues were fully aware, and if anything more were needed to substantiate that belief I find it in the case which was made before the Duncan commission, during which the gentleman who spoke for the city of Halifax advocated commissions similar to those already established in Montreal and Quebec. Let me just read a portion of the representations which were made. This gentleman said:

> Probably the quickest way to bring this to the attention of the commission would be to glance through the annual reports of the harbour commissions of Quebec, Montreal and Vancouver, and you will find in reading their reports that the minds of the commissioners are centred principally on the two things: Port development and solicitation of traffic; and inevitably they make a great deal of the improvement in the quantity of traffic moving through the port each year.

There was not a suggestion that fair tolls should not be charged in connection with the business but rather it was thought that the work of these commissions should be principally in improving business and soliciting traffic. Further, this gentleman said:

> We have no objection to their solicitation of traffic, and believe that they are acting wisely as trustees for that property, which belongs to the Dominion government; but we do claim, as I stated before, that a similar body should be constituted for the port of Halifax and not with any idea of taking traffic away from Montreal or any other port, but rather in the hope that it will at least offset the competition of these other ports which are being developed by the aid of government money.

I do not think there can be any question but that the ports were to be on the same basis, and the aid of government money means just exactly what we are doing to-night, namely the voting of a substantial loan to the harbour commission for the purpose of developing and improving the facilities of that port. No one has suggested that tolls are to be charged which will retard the development and use of these ports. Rather the reverse is the case; after all the Dominion government is advancing this money in order that these facilities may be improved and traffic developed, and tolls are to be charged as they are charged on the railways, namely the rates to be according to what the traffic will bear—

Mr. McGIBBON: "A Daniel come to judgment."

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know what that means; that is not my name. Perhaps the hon. gentleman refers to my hon. friend who preceded me. I only desire to point out that my hon. friend from Pictou referred to the railways and canals, and said Sir Andrew Rae Duncan also referred to them. He dealt with the canals; let me deal with the railways. The railways were developed through the advancing of large sums of money by the Dominion, but no one has suggested that the railways should not charge tolls. Money is being advanced in the same way to this harbour commission, and I think tolls are properly collected so long as they are not in excess of what the traffic will bear.

That brings me to the question of the free port, brought up by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I do not think he intended to suggest that there should be no tolls paid at all. Reference was made last year to the free port of Hamburg. It was pointed out that there is a certain area in which goods are not required to pay duty, but Hamburg charges tolls far in excess of those charged at the Atlantic ports of Halifax and St. John.

Mr. CANTLEY: No.

Mr. RALSTON: I dealt with that question last year, and I shall not delay the matter by going over it again to-night.

Mr. CANTLEY: I have been there, and I am thoroughly well aware of the conditions prevailing in the free port zone.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend from Pictou will agree that considerable advances have been made with respect to Halifax harbour even in the short time it has been under the administration of the harbour commission. There has been a concentration of effort in connection with the solicitation of traffic, in connection with the arrangements whereby certain large steamship companies are calling and in some cases turning there, in connection with a very substantial increase in the general cargo passing through that port, the figures for which I will not trouble the committee with to-night, and in connection with the movement of grain. All these things have come to pass within the last two years; I believe the harbour commission are entitled to a great deal of credit and I believe if this committee passes this loan the resulting substantial improvement in facilities will bring about a large increase in the production of traffic and will assist the development of the port as Sir Andrew Rae Duncan and his associates had in mind when they made the report to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am absolutely convinced—and I think I could prove to any unprejudiced group of people—that Sir Andrew Rae Duncan meant one thing, viz: that a harbour commission should be brought into being which, as he said, would develop the port. What did that mean? It meant the provision of adequate facilities for port development, and who was to pay for those facilities? They were to be paid for by the Dominion of Canada, just as the Dominion as a whole paid for the construction of our canal system, and these two maritime ports were to be operated as our canal system is operated, free of tolls or harbour dues. As a matter of fact Halifax was formerly practically free of all tolls on its public wharves, and its harbour facilities were maintained at the expense of the Dominion before the creation of this commission, but now, in order to meet the interest on the bonds issued by the commission, of necessity tolls must be and are applied, so to-day Halifax has to submit to a system of tolls which it did not have previously.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will permit me—

Mr. CANTLEY: Not now; I did not interrupt the minister, but he is the champion interrupter of this house; that is his reputation, and it is not creditable to him.

I repeat, that is the situation, and my point is, always has been and will continue to be that what Sir Andrew Rae Duncan meant was that a commission should be appointed to administer this port. The minister refers to the fact that the Duncan commission interviewed the Montreal harbour commissioners. Of course they did; they did so in order to see how they had developed the harbour of Montreal, not in order to recommend a similar taxing commission for Halifax. In the mind of Sir Andrew Rae Duncan these were to be different commissions altogether; there is no doubt about that. The minister may argue as long as he pleases, but he cannot convince the people of Halifax, the people of Nova Scotia or the people of St. John, New Brunswick, that we have the type of harbour commission which was foreshadowed and intended by Sir Andrew Rae Duncan. That is my answer to the minister.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN THE YUKON TERRITORY

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 131, respecting the administration of justice in the Yukon territory.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): The explanatory note in connection with this bill says that because of the geographical location of the northern part of the Yukon territory it may be more convenient to carry on the trials of persons charged with indictable offences committed therein before a magistrate of the Northwest territories. The explanatory note refers to the northern part of the territory but the bill does not, and I would regret to see that principle applied to the whole of the Yukon territory.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is not the intention.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): That might not be the case with the present Minister of Justice, but I intend to suggest when the bill goes into committee that it be confined to the northern part of the territory. The administration of justice in the Yukon is swift enough, but it is not carried on as it is in the Northwest territories. Not so long ago we had an account of a trial of a criminal case in the northern part of the Northwest territories. A judge was sent up to try a murder charge and the Department of Justice took the precaution of sending a gallows with him. That may have been a very wise precaution but we do not move quite so swiftly in the Yukon.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the hangman?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I think they found a hangman up there. For these reasons I would like to have the operation of this bill confined to the northern part of the Yukon around the Arctic ocean, and not have it apply to that part of the country where the white people live.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will the hon. member suggest a wording which will meet his views in that regard?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Sir Eugene Fiset in the chair.

On section 1—Power to order trial.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) suggests that the words "alleged to have been committed north of the sixty-fifth parallel of latitude" be added after the word "offence" in the seventh line. Would the hon. member tell me if that would include Herschel island?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): That would include Herschel island and Fort McPherson.

Mr. STEVENS: Herschel island is away north of that.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Herschel island is in the Northwest territories, and it would be more convenient to communicate with those centres of population than with the southerly parts of the Yukon. If you adopt that recommendation you would be excluding from the operation of the bill all that part of the Yukon which is inhabited by white people and where business is being carried on.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I should like to change the word "supposed" in the ninth line to "alleged." That would make the wording more legal in form.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugene Fiset): The hon. Minister of Justice suggests that the following words be added to the section, "and thereupon the court or judge so named shall have jurisdiction to try such person." The section as amended would read:

1. Whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the Minister of Justice that it is expedient to the ends of justice that the trial of any person heretofore or hereafter charged with an indictable offence alleged to have been committed north of the sixty-fifth parallel of latitude in the Yukon territory should be held in some district or place other than that in which the offence is alleged to have been committed or would otherwise be triable, the Minister of Justice may order that the trial shall be proceeded with in the Northwest territories before the court or judge named in such order, and thereupon the court or judge so named shall have jurisdiction to try such person.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 170, respecting juvenile delinquents.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Sir Eugene Fiset in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister will explain the circumstances under which this bill has been prepared. As I understand the matter, it has been very carefully gone over by a representative number of Canadians who are interested in questions respecting juvenile delinquents, and it has met with the unanimous approval of various organizations and experts in that particular line of endeavour. If that be so, the minister might make an explanation that would expedite the passing of this proposed legislation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The bill arises entirely out of recommendations made at a conference of the Canadian Council on Child Welfare, held in October last and attended by persons from all parts of Canada, representing the various agencies connected with the enforcement of the Juvenile Delinquents Act throughout the Dominion. The conclusions of the conference were the subject of a report to the department, and this bill embodies the suggestions made by the conference after a full discussion by judges, men at the head of this organization and officials of the Department of Justice. It is the old act with certain changes and improvements, all made with a view to facilitating the working of the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Section agreed to.

On Section 2—Definitions.

Mr. JACOBS: If this legislation is to be put into force, and each province is to have the right to change the age, will it not interfere greatly with the uniformity of the law? Why should one province declare that a juvenile delinquent may be eighteen years of age, while another declares that the age shall be sixteen?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no change as to that. That was the old act. A mistake was made in the revision of the statutes, and the change which appears to be made now is simply for the purpose of restoring in that respect what was in the old act. It has always been so.

Mr. JACOBS: That is to say, under the law as it is now each province may declare who is and who is not a juvenile delinquent according to age?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: This is the explanatory note in connection with section 2:

> Under the 1908 act the age is sixteen years. The two provisos are to enable the governor in council to provide by proclamation that the age may be raised to eighteen years in any particular province which desires it, and that such proclamation may have reference to boys or girls only, or to both.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Under the 1908 act the age is sixteen years. By chapter 37, section 1, of the statutes of 1921, that provision was repealed, and it was provided that "child" means a boy or girl apparently or actually under the age of eighteen years. But it was provided that the amendment should come into operation only in such province or provinces as the governor in council might from time to time by proclamation prescribe. The age is sixteen but, as my hon. friend says, it may be changed to eighteen when a province desires the change to be made.

Mr. JACOBS: Does this not seem anomalous?

Mr. BENNETT: Not in any sense to interrupt the explanation of the minister, I think the hon. member for Cartier will find the explanation in subsection (2) of section 3 of the act, which reads:

> Where a child is adjudged to have committed a delinquency he shall be dealt with, not as an offender, but as one in a condition of delinquency and therefore requiring help and guidance and proper supervision.

It was thought desirable by some of the provincial authorities to exercise help and guidance and proper supervision over some children who were older than sixteen years. Hence, sixteen being the standard, it is provided that by proclamation the governor in council may continue those provisions to children of the age of eighteen. That is, I think, the governing section of the whole of this legislation, namely, that a child is in a state of delinquency and is not an offender, but requires help and guidance and proper supervision.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As a matter of fact, only in British Columbia was such a proclamation made raising the age to eighteen. In all the rest of Canada it is sixteen.

Mr. JACOBS: That is to say, in British Columbia they have only as much intelligence at eighteen as in the other provinces they have at sixteen. I should like to hear from the hon. member for Vancouver Centre in regard to that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Paragraph (g) reads:

> "Juvenile delinquent" means any child who violates any provision of the criminal code or of any Dominion or provincial statute, or of any by-law or ordinance of any municipality.

Is that not pretty broad?

Mr. BENNETT: It has always been that way.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Municipalities have many by-laws that are more or less trifling, and it is pretty hard to make a delinquent of a child who violates them. For example, there are by-laws that provide that you shall not scatter paper in the park or spit on the sidewalk. Surely you are not going to make a delinquent of a child who violates such by-laws as those.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Such a child would be treated with benevolence and care. If it were an ordinary provision in the criminal code, my hon. friend would certainly be right, but I would call his attention to the fact that the old act contains the same provisions; the only change is the striking out of certain words, namely:

For which violation punishment by fine or imprisonment may be awarded.

The part which reads—

"Juvenile delinquent" means any child who violates any provision of the criminal code or of any Dominion or provincial statute, or of any by-law or ordinance of any municipality.

—was in the old act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: "For which violation punishment by fine or imprisonment may be awarded."

Mr. LAPOINTE: Those are the words that are asked to be struck out. I would hesitate to change the bill, because it was carefully considered and discussed by those most qualified to deal with it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Does the minister mean then that imprisonment is abolished as regards a juvenile delinquent?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will see that in the subsequent provisions of the bill the ordinary imprisonment is abolished. But paragraph (g) is only a definition of what a juvenile delinquent is.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I should like to revert for a moment to paragraph (g) of section 2, which refers to a child who is liable to be committed under the ordinance of any municipality. Suppose a child is haled into court for riding a bicycle on a sidewalk, which is a very common practice; would that constitute delinquency under this statute?

Mr. LAPOINTE: As the leader of the opposition said a few moments ago in reply to my hon. friend from Cartier, I think that the other provisions of the bill will help to a full understanding of the meaning and intent of the act. For instance, under section 3, where a child is adjudged to have committed a delinquency, he is to be dealt with, not as an offender, but as one in a condition of delinquency and therefore requiring help and guidance and proper supervision. It is not for the purpose of punishment so much as for the purpose of helping the boy or the girl in question. The fact that violations of municipal by-laws are included among the offences which may constitute a child a delinquent is really not so serious because, after all, the purpose is simply to provide help and guidance and proper supervision.

Mr. JACOBS: And warning sometimes.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Saskatoon has asked a question that some of my friends here were asking a few moments ago, and I have had some little discussion with those interested. There is no change in the section from what it was before. The child who rode a bicycle on the sidewalk would not be charged as an offender, but merely as a delinquent if thought desirable. If it were not for the provisions of this act he would be charged as an offender. That is the real distinction, and the whole purpose of the bill is that instead of the punishment that would be meted out to an offender, help and guidance and proper supervision shall be given and the child treated as a delinquent, not as an offender.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is based on kindness rather than on anything else.

Mr. BENNETT: On kindness rather than on punishment.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Delinquency.

Mr. McGIBBON: May we have an explanation of this?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I really cannot make it clearer than the wording of the section itself. This is the collective wisdom of those who are dealing with these matters. Perhaps this section is not altogether necessary, but it is more for the purpose of explaining the principle upon which this whole legislation is based.

Mr. McGIBBON: I really think the minister ought to give us some better explanation than that. I have every sympathy with legislation of this kind, but it does seem to me that in all such acts the one object should be reformation, to reclaim those who have transgressed the laws of the country and put them in the way of making of themselves good and reputable citizens. Along with that it must be remembered that punishment is a means to an end, and I am rather afraid that much of the legislation we pass here has not that object in view, but rather that punishment is really punishment, instead of reform.

Mr. LAPOINTE: By the other provisions of the act sufficient punishment is provided, but as my hon. friend says, reformation is the principle underlying this bill. It is very likely that this section is not necessary, but it is harmless, and I believe it embodies a meritorious doctrine.

Mr. McGIBBON: Many such sections as these appear to be harmless when they are passed by the house, but when placed in the hands of the law officers of the country to administer they are found not to be harmless, but rather detrimental, in my opinion, to the growth and development of character.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will perhaps surprise my hon. friend if I tell him that his objection was mine when this bill was submitted to me by the officers of the department. I also thought that this section, although finely worded, was not necessary, but they said that it was harmless and they would hesitate to advise that it be struck out because it was recommended by the child welfare organizations after very long and serious consideration.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would recommend to the minister that he have the courage of his convictions and strike it out.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am always willing to take the advice of others. On this bill I would prefer, perhaps to take the advice of the different bodies that met here last fall. Perhaps my hon. friend does not believe in them, but I do. There are many other matters on which I should be very glad to take the advice of my hon. friend.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the minister say that he takes their advice against his own convictions?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Ah well, may be.

Section 3 agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Powers of judge of juvenile court.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is provision made in all places for a juvenile trial?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. ROSS: What about those districts in which great harm is done and where there is no juvenile court?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The act does not apply. It applies only in provinces where they ask that a proclamation be issued to apply the act, and in cities where a by-law is passed to that effect, and where it is proved that the necessary facilities for the enforcement of the act are available.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): But this act arranges for special trials in all cases?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister knows the great harm done by magistrates in country districts who impose sentences out of all proportion to the offences committed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know that. The idea is to extend the act as much as possible, but it does not apply where proper facilities are not provided.

Mr. McGIBBON: This would not apply in Ontario except to such cities as Toronto, Hamilton and London?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot say from memory all the places where it applies, but I know only last week we issued a proclamation applying it in the city of Oshawa.

Mr. McGIBBON: It would not apply in the rural districts?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Exceptional procedure when offence is indictable.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Have any representations been made to the Minister of Justice as to the advisability of changing this section?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I know there have been complaints that too much responsibility is imposed upon juvenile courts. This section applies to indictable offences committed by juveniles who are apparently over the age of fourteen years. It is to be noted that discretion is given to the magistrate or to the juvenile court judge to order that the child be proceeded against by indictment. That is in the absolute discretion of the juvenile court. The section proceeds:

> —but such course shall in no case be followed unless the court is of the opinion that the good of the child and the interest of the community demand it.

So that the juvenile court has the exclusive jurisdiction as to whether it shall try the offender or whether there shall be an indictment. In practice it is found that the juvenile court judge is more or less inclined to be very lenient with children who appear before him or her—in some places of course we have women juvenile court judges. Very serious offences are committed by boys who are almost men, and it is the gravamen of the complaints I have heard that in many cases these boys are not punished as they should be owing to the system in vogue in juvenile courts. I suggest there is something worth considering in these complaints, and that there should be a change made in the section by adding these words:

—or on the application of the attorney general of the province where the offence is committed.

In such a case where the attorney general thought it advisable he would simply make application to the judge, and the judge would be bound to commit that child by way of indictment. The present practice does not work out very well, inasmuch as it is more or less an encouragement to the young hoodlums I am referring to to commit serious offences when they know they will not be adequately punished.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As my hon. friend will notice, this is not a new section. The principle upon which the act is based is that even when children break the law they are still children and should be treated as such rather than as adult offenders. I would hesitate to accept the change mentioned by my hon. friend to take away discretion from the judge of the juvenile court, who is well acquainted with the conditions of the community, and to give that discretion to the attorney general. It is evident that the latter could not devote the same personal attention and personal care to the conditions under which the offence may have been committed and in which the child finds himself as could the judge, or even the committee dealing with the question of children in that community. I believe the act has always worked well so far as this section is concerned, and that we should retain it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am rather inclined to believe that there is something in the observations made by the hon. member for New Westminster. My attention was directed to a case in which a juvenile court judge was always inclined to err on the side of sentimental regard for the delinquent, with the result that certain rather grave offences were treated with a very great lack of seriousness. Would any injury be done to this statute if it provided:

Where the act complained of is, under the provisions of the criminal code or otherwise, an indictable offence, and the accused child is apparently or actually over the age of fourteen years,—

Fourteen years being the age at which intent may be presumed.

—the court or the attorney general of the province in which such court is situate—

Being the words used in section 7,

—may, in its discretion, order the child to be proceeded against by indictment in the ordinary courts in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Code in that behalf; but such course shall in no case be followed unless the court or the attorney general is of the opinion that the good of the child and the interest of the community demand it.

There is no doubt that there must be a very sharp dividing line between the desire to bring about reform by kindly means and the regard for punishment. If an indictable offence has been committed—it must be indictable and the delinquent must be over fourteen years of age—there comes a time when it might well be that the sentiment of the presiding judge would lead to a course which would be injurious to the welfare of the country, and the attorney general, who after all has considerable responsibility under the criminal code, should be in a position to say, "It is quite clear that this is a case in which the ordinary course of justice should be followed, and the case heard as an ordinary charge against the provisions of the code". I do not think any injury can ensue from this, and it is just possible that an untrained legal mind might realize that after all there was the principal officer of the crown to whom an appeal might be made in that regard. It is worth considering. My hon. friend from New Westminster has mentioned the matter, and the minister no doubt sees that there might be a case where it would be desirable to take this view.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If our minds are centred on punishment probably my hon. friend is right; his view is no doubt sound if we are thinking of punishment rather than of reform and improvement. I think however that the judge of the juvenile court is better situated to know whether it is more in the interests of the child and even of society that a boy should not be sent to an ordinary prison. I really cannot see that it would be in any way advisable to change the law.

Mr. McGIBBON: I voice my personal opinion when I say that extreme penalties, especially prison sentences, should be our last resort. When you imprison people a stigma follows them to the grave; that stigma falls also upon the wife of a man as well as upon his children. To put a boy of fourteen or fifteen, or even sixteen or seventeen in a gaol for any offence without taking into consideration his education, his environment, his training or his parents is, I think, a very great mistake. We wish in this country to bring up respectable citizens, and I have always been opposed to gaol sentences except as extreme penalties. The object of all punishment is reform, and especially is this true when you are dealing with children who have not had the advantage of proper home influence, training and environment and whose mistakes or crimes, if you will, are committed in ignorance. I am very much opposed to taking the authority away from the local body and placing it in the hands of the attorney general.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Names not to be published or identity of child indicated.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Does this include the publication of pictures? This has got to be a serious matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sure it does.

Mr. ADSHEAD: This section speaks of a delinquency committed by a child. Under section 2 "child" means any boy or girl under the age of sixteen years. Now in section 9 we are providing that any child over the age of fourteen may be proceeded against by indictment in the ordinary course. Surely that is not consistent; if he is under sixteen he is a child and should not be so dealt with.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Section 9 deals with cases in which the child may be proceeded against under the provisions of the criminal code, in the discretion of the judge.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Nevertheless he is still a child.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, but in that case it is in the discretion of the judge.

Mr. JACOBS: Does not the hon. gentleman know that a child of fourteen can be hanged for murder?

Mr. ADSHEAD: You have defined "child" as a person under sixteen; surely you will not proceed against a child by indictment.

Mr. JACOBS: A child can commit an offence.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has overlooked one fact. The criminal code provides that at the age of fourteen certain obligations rest upon every person, male or female, and section 9 of this act declares that the provisions of the criminal code may, if the judge so determines, become operative against that person if he or she is over fourteen. This act provides that up to the age of sixteen the child shall be regarded as a delinquent. There is no inconsistency; section 9 relates to the criminal code, which provides that every person, male or female, becomes responsible in the eyes of the law at the age of fourteen.

Sections 13 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On section 16—Court may adjourn or postpone hearing.

Mr. JACOBS: Just as a matter of information I should like to ask the Minister of Justice why all these sections which are not changed are reenacted?

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is a revision and consolidation of the act.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Proceedings may be informal.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I may say that the convention made a recommendation which went much further than this; they recommended that we should provide that any warrant or process issued by the juvenile court should run through all parts of the Dominion. In the department we thought it better to retain the limitation contained in the criminal code and to require that a warrant be endorsed by a judge in the district in which the arrest is to be made. I think there can be no objection to this section in its present form.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Seal not required.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The same rule applies under the criminal code.

Section agreed to.

Sections 19 and 20 agreed to.

On section 21—May be dealt with under provincial law.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is unchanged except for a merely formal amendment.

Section agreed to.

On section 22—Parent or guardian may be ordered to pay fine, damages or costs.

Mr. BENNETT: Under this provision it would be possible to impose a penalty upon the parents of a child without their having an opportunity to be heard. I think this question should be carefully considered by the law officers of the crown.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I must confess that I was awaiting the reaction of the committee to this section. Personally I think it goes rather far, and if it were not for the fact that it was so strongly recommended by this convention I would hesitate to support it. I am quite willing to let this section stand.

Mr. BENNETT: The principle is all right.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, but we are making the parents or guardians responsible and they may be compelled to pay.

Mr. BENNETT: Without having a chance to be heard.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think parliament usually goes quite so far, I am quite willing to let this section stand for further consideration, and we may be able to suggest changes which will make it less objectionable.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a provision in subsection 4 giving the parents a chance to be heard, but the relation between the two is not quite what it might be. If the minister would let it stand we would have an opportunity of looking it over and trying to make it satisfactory.

Section stands.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With the permission of the house I should like to table a copy of the protocol for the prohibition of the use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and of bacteriological methods of warfare, signed at Geneva on June 17, 1925. I desire to move:

It is the intention during the present session to ask the house to approve of this convention.

Motion agreed to.

SOCKEYE SALMON FISHERIES TREATY

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to suggest to the Prime Minister that the papers and correspondence in connection with the sockeye salmon treaty be brought down before we discuss the treaty itself. There must be some correspondence and some instructions issued to our commissioners. I thought I had spoken about this matter previously but apparently I failed to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the correspondence has not already been brought down I will see that it is laid on the table as soon as possible.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 17, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

SOCKEYE SALMON FISHERIES TREATY

On the order, government notices of motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I rise, Mr. Speaker, not for the purpose of submitting the motion with reference to the sockeye salmon fisheries convention, of which notice appears on the order paper. Last night before adjournment my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) asked whether he might have the correspondence with reference to this convention. I may observe that the correspondence appears to be very largely of a confidential character, as is the case with respect to most correspondence pertaining to the negotiation of treaties; I see, however, no objection to placing the entire file at my hon. friend's disposal. If the leader of the opposition wishes to see it, I shall have pleasure in sending the file to his office, and he may look it over and place it at the disposal of hon. members on his side of the house.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I thank the right hon. gentleman for his courtesy, but it was to permit some of our friends from British Columbia, who are greatly interested in the matter, to see the correspondence that I inquired. It was in their behalf rather than for myself that I asked the question in the first instance. If the Prime Minister would permit the correspondence to be inspected by our members from British Columbia, I think that would quite serve the purpose, provided he does not consider this in any sense a violation of any confidence that should be respected in the matter. Of course, I should not want to disregard any such confidence, but I should like my hon. friends to have an opportunity to see the correspondence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend did not hear me add that he might place the correspondence at the disposal of his friends on the other side. It is confidential inasmuch as it is of an international character. We should like to proceed with the resolution on Monday and I hope my hon. friend will be ready to proceed then.

Mr. BENNETT: So far as I can see.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall I say "Stand"?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Motion stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SITTING ON VICTORIA DAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Does the Prime Minister propose to sit on May 24? Some of my friends have asked me to inquire.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The house has sat on May 24 in previous years and it is the intention to sit on that date this year.

BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS

CATTLE SLAUGHTERED IN FRASER VALLEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to the questions, passed on May 2 and 6, as orders for returns with respect to cattle slaughtered as reactors under the bovine tuberculosis test. I believe the information is all on the files in the department and I should be very glad if the minister would bring down the returns at an early date.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I will look into the matter and see that the information is supplied as quickly as possible.

WESTERN POSTAL EMPLOYEES

READJUSTMENT OF SALARIES OF THOSE DISMISSED AND REEMPLOYED

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General) moved the third reading of Bill No. 252, respecting certain employees of the postal or railway mail service of Canada.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The bill which is now before the house for its third reading is somewhat different in terms from the bill founded on the resolution which was first submitted for consideration by the Postmaster General. It offends a principle which we think should govern legislation of any character having to do with public servants who are reemployed in the service of the country after they have been dismissed from that service for good cause, or have left the service. This bill retroactively grants, in its terms, increases in pay to certain men on the basis of the employment which it is alleged they undertook when they reentered the service. I asked the Postmaster General to give the house some particulars with respect to the matter. It will be recalled that in 1919 this strike occurred. It will be further recalled that during the summer of 1919 the employees in question were dismissed from the service because they declined to avail themselves of the opportunites which were offered by the administration for reemployment. Having thus left the service by reason of failing to obey a lawful command of the state to go back to their work, they were dismissed by order in council. It was later thought that, having regard to all the circumstances, these men should be afforded an opportunity to be reemployed in the public service, and to that end the difficulty was waived with respect to their age and they were permitted to apply for reemployment through the Civil Service Commission; and having been reemployed they reentered the service as new employees. Their salary was fixed; the compensation they were to receive was a matter of contract between them and the state. That compensation was not as much as the compensation they enjoyed before they left the service and this measure seeks, whether successfully or not, to provide that these men shall now receive pay on another basis than that of the contract which they made with the state when they were reemployed. We cannot get away from that fact. The question is whether or not this house will give effect to that principle, and in order that it may realize just what is involved I am going to give some illustrations from the documents brought down by the Postmaster General in order to clear away any misunderstanding. For instance, a large number of these men did not go to work for five or six years after they had been dismissed; a large number did not seek reemployment, some until after six years, many until after five years, some after four and others after three years, while others did not reenter the service until nine years after they were dismissed from their positions.

Now I will give a few illustrations, without using the names. Here is a man who was first employed on March 16, 1908; at the time of the strike he had been eleven years in the postal service. He was not reemployed until November 2, 1925, six years after he had been dismissed. At the time of his reemployment the bonus had disappeared from the public service and he received an initial salary of $1,020. At the time of his dismissal he was in receipt of a salary of $1,419, but by meritorious service in May of this year he reached a salary of $1,440, or $21 more than the salary he was receiving when he was dismissed from his employment. It is now suggested by the Postmaster General that this man who, when he was dismissed from the service, was employed as a letter carrier, and who was later employed as a mail porter, should receive compensation on the basis of the salary and bonus he was receiving when he was dismissed from the service. This is the fifth case on the list.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely my hon. friend misunderstands that table if it appears to indicate that payment is to be made for letter carrier service if the man is not employed as a letter carrier.

Mr. BENNETT: I am very grateful to the Prime Minister for making that observation, because it does remove at least one difficulty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That I think, is clear.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say it is not alleged in that sense by those who are affected by this measure, and the reason I took this illustration was that the matter might be made perfectly clear before the bill is read the third time. Under the schedule provided by the Postmaster General it is stated that at the time this employee left the service through dismissal he was engaged as a letter carrier, and when he was later reemployed he went back as a mail porter. Now he is receiving $1,440, although at the time he left the service he was receiving $1,419, of which $480 was a bonus. When this man rejoined the service in 1925 he received a salary of $1,020, and the contention made outside of this house by those affected is that this employee is to receive his salary on the basis of the difference between what he was receiving at the time he was dismissed—

Mr. VENIOT: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that is the contention made outside this house by those affected; they contend that this man is to receive the difference between the amount he was receiving when he was dismissed and the amount he has received since going back to work.

Let me take another case which illustrates this wrong principle perhaps a little more clearly. This employee first joined the service in 1914; he had worked in the department five years when he was dismissed, and he did not go back to work until six years after the strike. When he was dismissed he was receiving, with bonus, a salary of $1,419, but on May 1 of this year his salary was $1,500. On both occasions he was employed as a letter carrier. Now, mark you, six years after he left the service he went back to work as a letter carrier, and when he was reemployed he received a salary of $1,200 although with the bonus, as I have said, he received $1,419 when he was dismissed. The contention is now made that he should receive additional compensation, although he was out of the service for six years before he went back to work as a letter carrier. The suggestion now is that he is to receive a salary not according to his employment but on the basis of what he would have received if he had not lost his job.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what they are contending it means, and the Postmaster General will say that that is their contention.

Mr. VENIOT: Who are contending that?

Mr. BENNETT: The letter carrier in this case.

Mr. VENIOT: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That man was a letter carrier when he was dismissed and he is a letter carrier now; his case is number six on the schedule. As I pointed out, six years after he was dismissed he went back to work under a new contract with the state, and the salary he received was $1,200 although when he left six years previously he had been receiving a salary of $1,419. Now, by meritorious service, his salary has increased to $1,500, and my submission is that no body of men in the world can determine how much of the recommendation for meritorious service was attributable to his antecedent knowledge of the business and how much to the improvement which he showed from the time he was reemployed up to May 1, 1929. Remember that this man is now receiving almost $100 more than he was getting when he left the service; he has been at work now only three years, after having been out of the service of the government for six years, and now the Dominion of Canada is proposing to give him additional money. I submit that that is wrong.

Now let us take another case in order that there may be no misapprehension. The next case is a little stronger still; it is the second last case on the first page of the list. This employee first entered the service in 1909, and therefore had ten years of service when he was dismissed; I find that he was not reemployed until March 22, 1928, nine years after his employment with the state was ser ered. When he went back to work he was paid a salary of $1,020; when he left the employ of the state, according to the report furnished me, he received a salary of $1,300 and a bonus of $430, making a total of $1,730. On May 1, 1929, he was receiving only $1,140; he is now working as a postal helper, and when he left the service he was engaged as a primary sorter. He has been in the service now just over one year; he returned to work on March 22, 1928, and this is May 17, 1929. As I have said, he was reemployed at a salary of $1,020 and is now receiving $1,140, or $120 more than when he was reemployed some fifteen months ago. It is now asserted that he shall be paid on the basis of what he would have received as a postal helper had he continued his services without a break from the time he was first employed.

Let us go to the next case, the last one on the first sheet—I am not mentioning the names purposely. This man was reemployed in 1920, a year after the strike, at a salary and bonus amounting to $1,200. When he was dismissed from the service he was receiving $1,419. In both instances he had been working as a primary sorter. Look at what we are doing? That man made a definite contract with the state to work as a primary sorter a year after he was dismissed, the contract carrying a salary of $1,200 including bonus. When he left the year before he was receiving $1,419 and it is now contended that because he was employed as a primary sorter when he was dismissed and is employed as a primary sorter now that he shall be paid and compensated on the basis of $1,419 per year from the date of reemployment, although his contract calls for $1,200. In other words, the Dominion of Canada is to pay a man who makes a new contract, after he has struck in the public service and has been dismissed, $219 because he struck. That is the story.

Then we go to a case, which is found on the second page. This is a very striking case of a man who was employed in 1916, three years before the strike. He was dismissed after three years of service and did not go back to work until 1927, eight years after the strike. When he was reemployed he received $1,020; when he left the service he was receiving only $1,080 or $60 more than he received after being out of the service for eight years. He is now employed at a salary of $1,200 as a mail porter, and when he left the service he was employed as a letter carrier.

The next case is that of a man who was employed in 1918, about a year and a few months before he went on strike. He stayed out of the service four years, having come back on June 7, 1923. When he was reemployed he received $1,155 with bonus; when he was dismissed he was receiving $1,080. I want to show how this case works out. When he went back to work he received a larger sum of money than he was receiving when he left the service. He was receiving $1,620 on May 1st of this year, and in both instances he was employed as a subsorter.

Mr. VENIOT: What page is that?

Mr. BENNETT: The second page, the ninth from the top. The date of reemployment was June 7, 1923, four years after the strike. When reemployed he received $1,155 with the bonus; when he was dismissed his salary and bonus amounted to $1,080, and he is now receiving $1,620. He was employed as a subsorter at the time he left the service and was reemployed in that position. I put this to the house: How can you say that this man should have any adjustment of pay when he has been able so to conduct himself as to merit the appreciation of his employers to the extent of having his salary raised to $1,620?

Mr. VENIOT: He would not receive any readjustment.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point I want to make. This man receives nothing, and the man who worked in the same job—the case I mentioned a few minutes ago—will receive $219.

Mr. VENIOT: This man was taken back after the strike as a subsorter, while the other case mentioned by the hon. leader of the opposition was that of a man who was taken back into a lower position but who did the work of a higher position; there is a difference between the two cases.

Mr. BENNETT: I am pointing out only what is shown on this sheet.

Mr. VENIOT: That is what it shows.

Mr. BENNETT: And these figures are given by the Postmaster General. I go to the next case, that of a man who was engaged as a subsorter and who was acting in the same capacity when he was dismissed. This man had been a little more than a year in the service and he went back to work in November, 1920, a year after the strike. At the time he was reemployed he received $1,260 with the bonus, but when he was dismissed he was receiving only $1,080. He is now receiving $1,800 and is still working as a subsorter.

Mr. VENIOT: He has reached the maximum of his class.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, and he has done that through meritorious service. I put this to the house: Is it a sound principle to say that you are going to differentiate between the periods when meritorious service was rendered and go back to an antecedent period of time when a man received a certain amount of pay to determine what he is to receive in the light of what he should have received if he had not been so employed? That must be wrong, and the illustrations I have given prove it. That man would receive nothing under the readjustment; he would not even be considered according to the statement made by the Postmaster General.

The next case is that of a man first employed on March 18, 1912, seven years before the strike. He went back to work immediately after the strike, on November 10, 1919. He was reemployed at $1,202.50 including the bonus, but was receiving $1,206 when he was dismissed, and he is now receiving $1,740. When he was dismissed from the service he was employed as a subsorter and when he went back to work he was taken on as a mail transfer agent. In other words, he went back to work as a mail transfer agent at $4 per year less than he was receiving when he was dismissed. It is suggested that he is to be paid as a substorter from the time he started to work. I would like the right hon. the Prime Minister to make the matter clear, because the statement of the employees as to what they are to receive is entirely at variance with what has been stated in the house, and I am taking this opportunity to illustrate the inequalities in order that a concise statement may be made with respect to what is to be done. Only this morning I was asked about it, and certainly the construction placed upon this matter is entirely different from that which the right hon. the Prime Minister and the Postmaster General suggested is the correct construction of the document.

The third case, on the top of page 3, is a very striking one. This employee had only been at work for a little over two months, having started to work on May 7, 1919, and having struck in July, 1919. He was reemployed six years after, on April 28, 1925, at a salary of $1,020; when he was dismissed his salary was $1,080, because there had been readjustments of salary during that time. He is now receiving a salary of $1,200 per annum. At the time he struck the position was purely temporary because he had not been long enough employed to be on the permanent staff. The record shows that he went to work as a mail porter in 1925. What adjustment is possible in that case?

Let me pass to another case which illustrates the same principle. This employee went to work on the 2nd January, 1917, or a little more than two years before the strike. He went back to work on the first October, 1923, or about four years after the strike. When he went out on strike and was dismissed, his total salary and bonus amounted to $1,184.25. When he was reemployed his salary was $1,095 and it now amounts to $1,320. In both cases he was employed as a letter carrier. That is what this sheet shows. That is, he was employed as a letter carrier, as hon members will observe, four years after he was dismissed, and he is now receiving $1,320, on account of meritorious service based upon his ability as, I take it. At the time of his dismissal he was drawing $1,184.25, but when he went back to work he got only $1,095, and we are told there is to be a readjustment of that man's pay. This is plainly a case in which the Postmaster General says there is to be a readjustment. Can the country put itself behind such a principle? I leave it at that.

The next case is a very striking one, because this man was employed in June, 1914, five years before the strike, and he went back to work six years after the strike, namely, in 1925. The salary rate when he was reemployed was $1,020, there being no bonus. He has now risen to a salary of $1,500. At the time he left the service he was receiving $1,380. When he left the service he was enjoying the rank of a primary sorter; when he went back to work he got a position as a subsorter. In his case, according to the statements made in the house, there is to be a readjustment, I cannot tell on what basis.

I come now to the last case that I will mention, because it is not necessary to take up further time. On the 1st May, 1917, this employee entered the public service of Canada. Two years and a few months later he was dismissed. He stayed out of the public service for three years. When he was reemployed he received $1,095, including bonus. When he was dismissed he was receiving $1,184.25. He has now risen to a salary of $1,500 and in both cases before and after the strike he is classified as a letter carrier. Can you readjust his pay? If so, on what principle?

I will not take up further time in dealing with these cases. I took them just at random as I looked over the pages, some of them indicating men who went back to work shortly after the strike, and some who did not go back to work for some years after the strike, one indeed, for as long as seven years afterwards. The contention is made that by reason of particular experience in certain work men were able to render greater service to the state than they otherwise would have been, in other words, they were found to be better employees of the Post Office Department than they otherwise would have been. I am going to read to the house a letter I received from one of the officials of the Amalgamated Civil Servants who was himself employed in the post office at Winnipeg and who gives this illustration to me for the purpose of showing that although a man might have been out of the service for a very considerable time, nevertheless his past experience was of importance. I use it to show just what the meaning of this proposal is. These are the exact words:

I joined the public service of Canada on the 4th of November, 1919.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What letter is this?

Mr. BENNETT: It is a letter written to me by one of the members of the Amalgamated Civil Service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend give his name?

Mr. BENNETT: It is hardly fair to give his name. He was writing to me, complaining about the position taken by me in this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is hardly fair to read the letter if the hon. member does not give the name.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not bound to disclose the name of the correspondent. I do not fancy he has any objection to my giving it, but I am not doing so at the moment. He goes on:

I had postal experience in England, terminating in 1911, when I came to Canada. As is usual with a young healthy immigrant, I turned my hand to anything, and worked at all sorts of civilian duties absolutely unconnected with post office work. I enlisted in 1914, stayed with it until 1919, so I had ample time in which to "forget".

The day after I entered the Winnipeg post office—

And hon. members will recollect that that was November 4, 1919.

—I took over walk 36, head office—as a letter carrier, and surprised my officer, Mr. R. F. Ross, by having my walk routed up without assistance for the second delivery. I did that route for two weeks without assistance, even on the Monday, when all walks are heavy.

As a reward, another man was taken off walk 33, head office, and I was given the walk for my own. From the date I took that walk, early in December 1919 until Christmas 1919 I trained three newcomers to the service, on walk 33 to see if they could do it, in order to give the supervisor the chance to use me as a "relief" man.

It was impossible to train a new man in so short a time, especially just before Christmas, so I retained the walk and now have a very good record as a carrier.

He is still a carrier.

I think my point is well taken and amply illustrated—that experience tells.

Let us see what we are doing. This young man receives his experience in England, not in Winnipeg. He did not strike sympathetically or otherwise. He joined the service of the state under a contract but because of his past experience that enabled him to do his work better than others, he was able to train others and his ambition being as it was, he found larger scope and wider opportunities because he desired to make progress. He now says that he has made that progress. The experience which he had in England was of assistance to him as a letter carrier. Had he struck, had he been reemployed, he would now come back and get some pay from the country because it was said that he had experience in Canada before he struck. But being a man whose experience was derived in another country and who is not making it the basis of a claim for more pay, we are now told that he has no part or parcel in this transaction. He does not claim it, I may say. He is supporting the claim of these men.

Mr. VENIOT: He supports their contention?

Mr. BENNETT: He is supporting his fellow workers; he is their representative and the minister evidently has the letter in front of him also, so there is no question he knows to whom I refer. Having regard to the fact that men antecedently to employment may have been employed in a particular walk of life which enables them to do better the work in which they are engaged, and having regard to the fact that their employer must every year make recommendations as to their meritorious service, which recommendations, as I have pointed out, have resulted in many of these men receiving higher pay now than they had when they left the service, and in some cases receiving their maximum, is it not an unsound principle to say that because of the circumstances under which they left the service, you are to go back to their antecedent employment in order to determine the compensation they will receive.

If that principle can be applied as this gentleman thinks it can—and he is speaking for the Amalgamated Civil Servants of the country—as the Postmaster General and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) say the bill means, and as the Prime Minister says it does not, we can only look at the terms of the bill itself and ask ourselves what it does mean. What does the bill say? It says that these employees who subsequently were reemployed and are now in the said postal or railway mail service shall be paid for services actually performed as from the date of their reemployment at the rates of remuneration paid to other employees for similar services. That is a letter carrier is to be paid a letter carrier's pay.

Mr. VENIOT: If he performs the work.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is what I am saying. A letter carrier is to be paid a letter carrier's pay. That is what he was before, and you cannot segregate the work that he did from the time of his reemployment against the experience that he has had in all these years and say that when he is promoted and receives additional pay it is referable only to the time of reemployment. It is referable to the whole experience he has had in life. It is so with everyone of us. I may have had experience in one particular line of work, and then have gone out of it, and come back to it. It is likely that the work will come back to me a little more readily because of my previous experience, and I am pushed up a little more quickly and reach the maximum of my class a little more rapidly than the other man. But we are now to say, that notwithstanding it was the experience that some one had somewhere else that enabled him to rise to the position he has reached without any assistance, he is not to share in any division of this money, although he has done this work, joining as a novice. Although he has had experience, he joins as a new employee, and he has now risen to the position where he is ranked as one of the very best of the employees, and yet he does not have anything to do with respect to this $100,000 that is to be distributed. That is the sum which the Postmaster General says is to be distributed, and on the letters that are now before us as to the position of these gentlemen, I am satisfied that with the bill construed as it would be construed by a court, it would be very difficult to see how any employee would get anything. I am only pointing out to the house what the men think they are getting and what the bill itself says, and I leave it at that.

I cannot for my part bring myself to believe that it is a sound principle in a country like this to declare that because men received certain compensation before they sympathetically struck and left their employment, thereby tying up the public service, when they were reemployed and made a new contract with the state, and were reemployed because the state realized that the conditions were such that if possible they should use these men's services—I cannot believe that it is a sound principle not to punish them for striking. The only punishment according to this list that may be said to have been given to many of these men—the loss of seniority, whatever that may mean, they say is lost, because you cannot change the clock, time does not stand still. All that they have lost if this bill becomes operative is their seniority. The effect of it will be that some of them—not all, but some of them—are already saying that they have vindicated their position and that the postmaster at Winnipeg is to go. That is the next thing. They say: We have got the government to do this and now we are going to drive the postmaster out; we have got it started now. Thereby they are saying to the world that in the great struggle for the supremacy of law and order in this country against the forces of revolution and rebellion, this parliament is going to put the imprimatur of its approval upon the latter and not upon the former. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) who is behind this move may think that it will bring great kudos to him from organized labour, but if my memory serves me well, in the long run it is the great labour forces in this country who are best served by the maintenance of law and order, and they look in the end to fair and even justice for the preservation of their rights, justice and fair play and fair treatment under every consideration. I am not unmindful of the effort that has been made in some quarters to induce me, for instance, to realize that those who supported this bill will be approved and those who did not will not be. I will not give my assistance to the forces of anarchy and the forces that brought disruption to the postal service of Canada, and I tell that to the Minister of Labour of this country. I tell him that he is doing no service to his own organizations when he does this, for the Postmaster General is but the medium through which the Minister of Labour expresses his opinion with respect to these matters.

apparently the government thinks otherwise. The government thinks that it is going to bring some measure of peace and harmony out of discord and trouble by saying: We now recognize the principle that those who without notice left the service of the state, depriving the public of their opportunity for getting their mail, who disrupted a great public service, and who did that under circumstances to which we shall not now refer, should be rewarded and compensated for what they then did. If that be so, a precedent has been established which will have a far-reaching effect, and when you cloak it behind the hollow pretence of saying that men are going to be compensated for the work they do, that is cant and hypocrisy so far as the public is concerned, because every man who is employed to do a job and is seeking with ambition to advance his future and make a better place for himself in the world does not watch the clock and see how little he can do, but does the best that is in him by reason of the experience that he has had. Just as this man coming to this country in 1911 and working at various times after the war finally went into the postal service in 1919 and was able in the light of his past knowledge to rise more rapidly and be of greater use to the public service and get in the end a higher classification and more pay than the man who joined the service as a novice, so these men in the light of the knowledge which they had knew when they reentered the service what they were doing; they made their contract with the state, and the state now says that it was not a contract such as they should have made, and the state is now going to make a new contract for them. I can only say that that principle I oppose. This bill is undoubtedly a modification of the first proposals. What it means I think it is difficult to say. It is not clearly stated. It is to be left to certain gentlemen to work out in the future, but when it is said that it involves $100,000, it can only do that if the principles which the Postmaster General and the Minister of Labour have from time to time told these men would be applied, are applied.

Mr. VENIOT: I wish to correct the hon. gentleman. I never told these men anything of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Then he told the house.

Mr. VENIOT: I never told the house either.

Mr. BENNETT: Did not the minister say the amount was $100,000?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Well, then, what are you talking about?

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend said that I told these men certain principles would be applied. I never told these men of any principle that would be applied except that a workman was worthy of his hire, and I laid that principle down in this house every time I spoke.

Mr. BENNETT: The day before yesterday, according to Hansard, the minister said that the amount involved would be $100,000, and not $125,000. It is the old story, the hon. gentleman never will make a frank statement with respect to anything if he can avoid it. He told this house last year the amount was $125,000, and it was in the supplementary estimates. It is not there this year. He now tells this house that it is $100,000. He told the house that the other day when he was passing his resolution and his bill. What does he mean by saying now that he did not say any such thing?

Mr. VENIOT: I never said that I did not say that. I said that I did not state to the men that the principle the hon. gentleman is now laying down is the principle I was to follow, but that the principle was that every man was worthy of his hire.

Mr. BENNETT: How can you know that you are paying every man the worth of his hire unless you supervise every contract in this country? Is the Minister of Labour going to revise the contracts of the men who went to Hudson bay and worked ten hours a day although the fair wage scale saye eight hours? Is he going to revise the contracts of the men who went to Hudson bay and worked fourteen hours a day when the fair wage scale says eight hours? Is the Minister of Labour going to say that for every hour over eight hours that they worked they shall be paid overtime? Is he going to revise these contracts or not? These were contracts that the state made with the workmen. Is the bargain that a man makes a contract or not? Is it some other bargain? Is some other consideration going to prevail? Is somebody else going to make the contract? The Minister of Finance is paid $10,000 a year. It is a little inadequate. Are you going to enter into a new contract with him and make it retroactive; is that what is to be done? What about the deputy ministers whose salaries are to be increased; are you going to make the increase retroactive? They have been doing the same work all these years that they are doing now. Are you going to do it with every branch of the public service? Shall the Dominion of Canada make new contracts and say "The labourer is worthy of his hire"? Is that the sort of talk that you get as the answer to the question whether or not we shall make a new contract. And who is going to determine it? The men themselves? When men without duress, without fraud, without undue influence enter into a contract with an employer, that contract binds; it binds in every other walk of life; but it remains for this government to say that that contract thus made is not a contract that governs between the employer and the employee because some six, some seven, some eight years ago, the employee had experience in the particular job in which he now finds himself. That is the retroactive principle this house is asked to endorse. It is against that retroactive principle that I place myself, it is against the recognition of the right of this government to make such a contract. A contract between the state and the individual is as solemn as a contract between two individuals. And the men who will suffer most are the men who might find themselves opposed to the power of the state—as they well might be at some future time—when the state might claim the right to break its contract with impunity. It is easy for the state to break a contract in order to reduce wages as it is to break a contract to increase them. If a contract is broken and you reduce the pay you have changed an important condition, just as you do when you break a contract to increase the pay. The two cases are similar. There will come to this house year after year numberless cases in which it will be said, "Having interfered with the postal workers' contract you must make a new contract for us." And some day we may say, "We will make a new contract and reduce the compensation." This is what will be said about the sanctity of a contract. Then we shall hear the hollow cry of "The labourer is worthy of his hire." Those who make their contract, as I say, without undue influence, without fraud, men over twenty-one years of age, ought to appreciate the bargain they make. Having made it, but for promises by the Minister of Labour they would have observed their contract and lived up to it gladly and willingly.

It is for these reasons, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot bring myself to support the third reading of a measure conceived as it is upon a principle which, if adopted, destroys the sanctity of contracts, is injurious to the state, places a premium upon those who endeavour at moments of crisis to dislocate the public service, and, if carried to its logical end, destroys the very state itself.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the opposition is, I think, quite right in endeavouring to see that before this bill passes its third reading there should be left no possibility of misunderstanding as to what it means not only to hon. members in this house, but to those who may feel themselves entitled to some consideration under its provisions. With respect to his desire to have the meaning of the bill made perfectly clear, I have no exception to take. I would take very strong exception, however, to my hon. friend seeking to misrepresent in any way either the motive or the purpose of the Postmaster General or the Minister of Labour in so far as their association with the measure is concerned.

I will give to the house what the government understands to be the full force, meaning and effect of this bill, and if in any particular I am expressing a view which is other than that entertained by the Postmaster General or by the Minister of Labour, each of whom is in his seat at the moment, I hope he will correct me at once, because so far as the government is concerned there is no doubt in our minds as to what this measure contemplates, and there is one opinion only entertained by the cabinet with respect to its intention.

In a word, the bill means exactly what it says. I will read the section, omitting the few words that refer to certain orders in council. It is that:

> the former employees of the postal or railway mail service of Canada who were removed from such service—

Then I skip a few words.

> —and who were subsequently reemployed and are now in the said postal or railway mail service, shall be paid for services actually performed as from the date of their reemployment at the rates of remuneration paid to other employees for similar services.

That language is, I think, as plain as the English language can be. I do not believe it is possible to express in words a meaning more clearly than that expressed in this clause which in fact is the whole bill. It says that the employees are to be paid for services actually performed. My hon. friend has taken a table of statistics which has been supplied by the Postmaster General, and has placed his own interpretation upon their meaning. My hon. friend must have meant what he said as to the statistics leading to certain deductions which in fact he drew, but I am bound to say that so far as I can see no deductions of any kind whatever appear on the statement which is before my hon. friend

What is recorded throughout is a mere statement of fact. There are no deductions or conditions set forth. I may be allowed to read the headings of the various matters referred to in the table:

Name of employee; year of birth; date of first employment; date of reemployment; salary rate when reemployed; salary bonus and total; salary rate when dismissed; salary bonus and total; salary May 1929; occupation at time of strike; occupation when reemployed.

These are the headings that appear on the table, and beneath them are given the facts or statistics that appropriately relate to the several headings. There are no deductions. My hon. friend has drawn his own inferences, and I confess that its seems to me he must have had in mind as he was doing so the resolution as it originally appeared on the order paper and his own interpretation thereof.

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask my right hon. friend a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: He will observe on page one there are six within the first ten that were L.C.—letter carriers—when the strike came on and who were reemployed as letter carriers. The salary they received was not as great when they went back to work as that which they had received before they were dismissed. What is to be done under this bill with respect to those cases?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will answer my hon. friend in a statement which will be applicable to all cases. Perhaps I may simplfy the matter by saying that insofar as this bill is concerned no account need be taken of the salary a man was receiving when he went out, no account need be taken of the date of his reemployment, no account need be taken of anything other than the actual work at which he has been engaged since his reemployment.

Mr. BENNETT: I am very greatly obliged to the right hon. gentleman. That clarifies it very much.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the whole position. Now, may I go a step further? With respect to the salary that he receives when he is reemployed, as hon. gentlemen know, the Civil Service Commission attaches a certain rate of remuneration to each of certain classes of employment. That rate of remuneration is known and it is supposed to apply to all who are employed in a particular class. Had there been no strike, all who were engaged in performing a particular class of duties would have been receiving an amount of remuneration equivalent to that assignable to that particular class. There are some men who came back into the postal service at Winnipeg under the terms of the order in council which permitted them to reenter. They were put into certain classes of work, but were put into these classes not at the rate of remuneration which these classes properly command but at a rate which was lower than that for which the service at which they were engaged should have been remunerated. This bill provides that where such was the case men shall be paid for the work they actually performed at the rates of pay attaching to the work of the class on which they were engaged. If, for example, a man was a letter carrier and was doing letter carrier's work, but was paid as a postal helper at a much lower rate, he would be entitled to the difference between the postal helper's rate and the letter carrier's rate for the time during which he had been doing letter carrier's work; nothing more. The same with respect to all other classes of employees. Now I ask hon. gentlemen: Is not that obviously the fair thing to do?

There is no necessity of confusing the present measure with any question that relates itself back to the reemployment of these men. If there was an error in their reemployment it is an error for which the present administration at all events is not responsible. We are not trying to saddle responsibility upon anyone with respect to the reemployment of these men. We say that the principle involved in their reemployment, whether right or wrong, was settled by the government in office in 1920. We are not even taking exception to the manner in which they settled the matter. But the fact is that they settled it without reference to any act or authority; they settled it in total disregard of the Civil Service Act. Hon. gentlemen have been saying a good deal about the attention that should be paid to the Civil Service Act. Well, the act was there, and if they had followed its provisions we should not now be discussing this matter. But they ignored the act altogether. My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) thought they had proceeded under authority of the War Measures Act, but I find on going into the matter that they ignored that act also. In other words, they followed no act; they proceeded without authority, and arbitrarily under order in council, to reemploy the men.

Mr. BENNETT: I was careful to say that I did not know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; my hon. friend did say that he did not know. But I wish to make it clear that, having looked into the matter, I find the facts as I state them. Be that as it may, however, we are all prepared, I hope, to concede that at that particular time many things may have occurred which we trust will never occur again. But what we do say is that the question of reemployment. the right or the wrong of it, was settled at that time; and that, therefore, is not the principle which is to be settled at this moment.

Let us come now to what this particular measure seeks to do. It seeks to proceed in accordance with another principle, namely, that the state in hiring labour should pay for services rendered in certain positions the rates of wages which those positions command, either in accordance with the current rate or in keeping with what may be fixed by the Civil Service Commission or by some other recognized authority. In all government employment there is a certain basis on which labour is paid, having regard to the amount and the quality of the work performed. In this particular matter there is no dispute regarding what certain classes of work of a particular quality command. It is known that a postal helper receives so much a day; that a sorter receives so much a day; that a letter carrier receives so much a day. And so on. Records are kept of the work of employees from day to day, and it is known whether men have worked as letter carriers or sorters or helpers. It is possible therefore to ascertain exactly the difference between what any man was paid and what he should have received had he not been penalized in the matter of his wages.

This bill seeks to remove, as respects actual service performed, a sense of injustice not only in the minds of the men immediately affected but in the minds of labour generally; because as the matter now stands the government of the country is in the position of seeking to depress standard rates of wages, and hon. gentlemen know that if labour is concerned about one thing above another it is the maintenance of certain standards in the matter of hours, wages and conditions of employment. We say there is no dispute as to the standard which should prevail with respect to wages, hours and conditions of employment in this particular post office at Winnipeg, and we believe that the state, as a model employer, should see to it that the men who have been reemployed and have done certain work should be given the full payment due them for the services they have performed. I trust that this explanation is clear. I do not think it leaves doubt in the mind of anyone, and I think this house would do itself a fuller measure of justice if it unanimously accepted the principle of the payment of wages for actual work performed to those who have been so engaged especially where the men who have been reemployed have been reemployed by the state itself.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the Prime Minister permit a question? In the light of the explanation he has just made, why has not the government for the last seven years paid employees wages for services rendered—a principle very clearly explained by the right hon. gentleman?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope the government has done so. There may be some laws—the Civil Service Act for example—which operate in the matter. That act gives to the Civil Service Commission the power of fixing certain rates and the government complies with that particular law. Each case must be met on its own merits. So far as I am concerned I stand strongly for the principle that employees, whether engaged by the government or by private industry, shall be paid for services actually rendered.

Mr. STEVENS: The Prime Minister does not catch my question. I have not time to read the list, but I venture to say that a substantial percentage of the men have been reemployed during that period—I am not referring now to the period which the Prime Minister rather condemned, namely, under the previous government, but in the last seven years. This practice which the Prime Minister has just strongly condemned has been observed all along. Why has not the government taken steps until this late date to invoke the principle which he has advocated to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the leader of the opposition said a moment ago that an effort was made last year and the year before, but apparently the excitement which the introduction of the measure provoked prevented our getting as far along with it as we have succeeded in doing this year with the present bill. The reason these men have been paid a lower rate for so many years is that the order in council which permitted their reemployment necessitated their reentering the service at a low rate. Had they been placed at and continued in the employment which commanded that low rate no exception could be taken at all to what was done. But what happened was this: The men who were qualified to act as sorters and letter carriers were obliged, under the order in council of reemployment, to enter as postal helpers and to receive the pay of postal helpers, although they were not given postal helpers' work to do. Many of them were put into the class of sorters or letter carriers or other of the higher classes and were paid lower rates of wages than sorters, letter carriers and the other classes command. That is where undoubtedly the mistake has occurred, with consequent confusion. If these men had entered the class of employment at which by the order in council they were supposed to start—postal helpers—and had worked up step by step, always receiving the full payment for the class of work on which they were employed, then certainly there could be nothing due them to-day. But where a man entered at a postal helper's rate of pay and worked as a sorter or as a letter carrier, we say that an injustice was done—an injustice which this bill seeks to remove.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder whether I am trespassing too much on the right hon. gentleman's patience in asking a single question. On the list supplied by the Postmaster General there are the names of thirty-seven men who are alleged to have been employed as letter carriers at the time of the strike and who were reemployed as such. I thought the right hon. gentleman said that what they were receiving at the time of the strike, before they were reemployed, was not to enter into the matter. What I was anxious to know, was—because it will clarify the whole situation—whether or not there would be any change with respect to those employees who went back to the same work in which they were engaged at the time of the strike.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certain men were letter carriers when they went on strike and when they came back they were put into the class of letter carriers. When they were put back into that class they were not paid letter carriers' wages; had they been paid those wages nothing would be due them to-day. This bill provides that when men were put back as letter carriers, although they were engaged as postal helpers, and were given the wages of postal helpers notwithstanding that they did the work of letter carriers, they should receive the difference between what they actually earned as letter carriers and what they were actually paid as postal helpers.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I would like to ask the Prime Minister one or two questions. Where men are employed in the civil service who for some considerable time have done the work of a certain position without receiving the salary attached to that position, and when they do obtain such position will the government adopt it as their policy that these men shall be paid for the services previously rendered? For example, in our penitentiaries a man is appointed as guard; for some considerable time, perhaps for a year, he fills a higher position before he is actually promoted to it. Will the government pay for such services as a matter of policy?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think every case should be examined and considered on its own merits. Perhaps that will answer my hon. friend's first question.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Then my second question is this: These men who are to receive higher salaries for a year or two back will pay a certain amount into the superanuation fund, so they will obtain a higher rate of superannuation. Is that the case?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should think the superannuation would relate to the class of work they have been doing and the payment received for that work. The Postmaster General tells me that superannuation was not affected by the strike.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I do not think the answer given by the Prime Minister is satisfactory; it does not really answer the question. I have come here repeatedly on behalf of men who went back to work during the war and who were getting a certain amount of pension, but these men have been consistently refused consideration for their services. They have been ignored, although they did not go on strike; they gave good, faithful service, but their applications have been refused by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can only say that any case of apparent injustice should be considered on its merits.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed on division.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) (for Mr. Robb) moved the third reading of Bill No. 279, to amend the Excise Act.

Mr. STEVENS: I rise to a point of order, and I do so because I wish to raise the point in connection with another practice which has arisen. Can this third reading be moved in the absence of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was simply trying to save time.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask under what rule any member of the house is denied the privilege of proposing a private bill for another member?

Mr. SPEAKER: A private bill is in a different position; there is a difference between a government order and a private bill.

Mr. STEVENS: I know there is a difference, but I would like to have the clerk furnish us with the rule. I will not delay the house to press the point at the moment, but I would like that rule cited.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would not like my hon. friend to think me guilty of a discourtesy. As hon. members know, we are desirous of making progress in these matters.

Mr. STEVENS: I am entirely in accord with this practice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Finance is in his office; I have asked him to come to the house.

Mr. STEVENS: Go ahead; I entirely disagree with the other practice, that is all.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister), for Mr. Robb, moved the third reading of Bill No. 212, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Mr. L. S. R. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): I desire to move in amendment to the motion for third reading:

That Bill No. 212, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, be not read a third time but be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions to amend item 460 F by adding thereto after the words "trough belt conveyors" the words "of a class or kind not made in Canada."

My reason for proposing this amendment, Mr. Speaker, is that the belt manufacturers of Canada will be placed in a very difficult position if some action of this kind is not taken. In their competition with British and United States manufacturers they are handicapped by the fact that while their raw material is imported free they must pay on it higher transportation charges than they pay on the finished product, because the raw material is more bulky.

Mr. BENNETT: The raw material carries a lower freight rate.

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe): But since it is more bulky the transportation charges are higher. Moreover, the manufacturers are handicapped by the action of this house in imposing a duty of fifty cents per ton on all their coal and a duty of 27½ per cent on their machinery when it is of a kind made in Canada, or 10 per cent when it is of a kind not made in Canada. Under these circumstances the Canadian manufacturer is not in a position to meet the competition of the British manufacturer who is not affected by these duties, and as a matter of fact the Canadian industry is hardly able to meet the competition of the American industry even under a duty of 12½ per cent.

Let us suppose the American and the Canadian manufacturers were placed on the same footing; we could reasonably assume that they would divide the Canadian trade, and therefore 50 per cent of our consumption of this article would be furnished by American manufacturers to the detriment of Canadian labour. It seems to me that these are conditions which should not be approved by this house and which should not be the policy of the government; at a time when the balance of trade is so much in favour of the United States I think we should not continue to increase our purchases in that country and decrease the production in Canada, particularly when it is very clear that the Canadian consumer will not derive any benefit.

I think if we add to item 460 F a provision that the reduction in duty will apply only to trough belt conveyors not made in Canada the requirements of our industry will be satisfied and it will be for the general advantage of our country.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I ask whether the general effect would be an increase or a decrease in revenue?

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe): It all depends on whether these articles are presently imported from the United States. If they are not imported now there is no revenue; if they are imported of course it will increase the revenue.

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): I am very much surprised that any member of this house should once more seek to introduce into the tariff of Canada the most dangerous phrase ever invented. The clause says that articles shall come into Canada free which are "of a class and kind not manufactured in Canada." I have been endeavouring to ascertain from the Department of Finance who it was that invented this clause; I have been trying to ascertain when it was first introduced into a budget. It is an amazing thing to find this clause no less than nine times in the present budget. I object to the clause because it is a dangerous one. The province of Ontario has recently passed a bill permitting municipalities in that province—

Mr. MORRISSEY: What about the other provinces in Canada?

Mr. KAISER: The province of Ontario does not pass laws for any other province. This bill will permit municipalities to issue debentures to defray the cost of laying out sections of their cities or towns for industrial purposes. The city of Oshawa, where I come from, is a highly industralized community and we are asking authority to lay out a portion of the city for industrial purposes. What form of industry can we induce to come to the province of Ontario? Naturally we look into our imports to see just what articles are consumed in Canada, but when we look at the budget we find that articles which are not made in Canada are permitted to come in free. What encouragement is that for the industrial development of our province? The clause appears nine times in the present budget and I look upon it as a blight. I cannot imagine anything more injurious to the future of Canada than the continual injection of that clause into the industrial budgets of Canada, a clause which says that anything which is not made in Canada shall be allowed to come in free. The people of Canada want to manufacture as much as possible in Canada and not have it continually said that when an article is not made here it may come in free.

We are endeavouring to manufacture every part of the automobile in Canada, and we are asking firms to invest money in building factories in order that certain parts may be manufactured here. Then this clause without modification is injected which says that those articles which are not made in Canada shall be permitted to come in free. How can we ever build the entire article in Canada when this clause is continually being thrust into the budgets?

I would like to find out who invented this clause and when it was first used in the budgets of Canada—I hope the time will come when in its unqualified form it will be eliminated from the budget altogether.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member (Mr. Morin, St. Hyacinthe) in moving the amendment is out of order. Beauchesne, paragraph 553, states:

> When it appeared from the debate that an amendment proposed to a resolution reported from the committee of ways and means would increase the charge, the Speaker ruled the amendment out of order.

And 551 is as follows:

> It is a fundamental principle that no resolution or amendment to increase a charge upon the people can be moved with the Speaker in the chair; it must be initiated in committee by a minister acting on behalf of the crown.

[Mr. Kaiser.]

The hon. gentleman has stated that the effect of his amendment might increase the rates, and under those conditions I am obliged to rule his amendment out of order.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I fail to see how the moving of this amendment is out of order. I think a statement should be made by someone in authority, and I would be quite satisfied to take the opinion of the Minister of Finance. I am frankly in accord with the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Morin), and if I might be permitted to proceed I could state very shortly my reason for taking that position. I think we should have something which is authoritative.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the best authority is the sponsor of the amendment.

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe): I do not believe that my amendment would increase taxation because it would leave the articles mentioned in this section under the tariff which is actually in force. We are dealing with a bill which will reduce taxation but the bill is not law as yet, and the purpose of my amendment is only to maintain the actual legislation or the actual duty which is at present imposed on this class of goods; therefore, it does not increase the taxation.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, I abide by your ruling. If the argument of the hon. member is correct that it does not increase taxation, then there is no necessity for his amendment.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

WAR REPARATIONS

AUTHORITY TO PLACE $2,500,000 TO CREDIT OF CUSTODIAN FOR PAYMENT OF CLAIMS

The house resumed from February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Rinfret that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

> That the Minister of Finance be authorized to place to the credit of the custodian, out of the reparation money paid into the treasury for losses sustained during the late war, a sum not exceeding $2,500,000 and that provision be made as to the method and scale of payments.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister in charge of this bill has suggested a certain amendment which he would like me to move to the resolution. The government is inclined to believe that there is a misunderstanding on the part of some who have opposed the resolution in its present form. The resolution contains the words "not exceeding" and these words seem to have suggested to the minds of some hon. members that if the resolution were adopted in its present form it would not be possible at a later stage, if it were thought advisable so to do, for the government to consider any payments beyond that amount. That was not the intention of the resolution as it was drafted. I have spoken to the clerk, who advises me that the words "not exceeding" are not essential and that the substitution of the word "of" having regard to the provisions of the bill would be perfectly proper. If the house would give its consent to that substitution, I would move in amendment to the resolution:

That in the third line of the resolution the words "not exceeding" be struck out and the word "of" be substituted therefor:

The resolution would then read:

That the Minister of Finance be authorized to place to the credit of the custodian, out of the reparation money paid into the treasury for losses sustained during the late war, a sum of $2,500,000 and that provision be made as to the method and scale of payments.

If the resolution passes in that form, the minister will be in a position, when we are discussing the resolution in committee and, later on, the bill, to indicate to the house the view of the government with respect to making certain immediate payments. The question whether further payments should be made will necessarily depend in no little measure on the discussion that may take place when the resolution is in committee or when the bill is before the house, but the minister himself has been precluded from indicating to the house up to the present time the particulars of the bill, because, having spoken once on the resolution, he is prevented from speaking again, and the debate seemed to turn on the question of the words "not exceeding", as though in some particular the government had intended finally to restrict all payments to that amount.

Mr. SPEAKER: This amendment cannot be put at the present moment, but it can be made when the resolution gets into committee Standing order 50 reads:

A motion to refer a bill, resolution or any question to the committees of the whole, or any standing or special committee shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

In a few moments when the resolution is in committee, the amendment may be moved.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the resolution goes into committee, I should like, in order to enable the minister to deal with it properly in committee, to ask why we have been so long in using money that came to the treasury of Canada to pay the claims of people justly entitled to payment. The word "reparations" means just what it says, and the reparation that is sought is to have the money that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has been keeping in the treasury of this country for the purpose of swelling his surpluses, used for the object for which it was paid. Germany paid the money to make reparation for injuries done to the civil population. The money which has thus far been received amounts to $21,000,000 and it has gone into the consolidated revenue fund of Canada. There is therefore ample money to pay all the claims that have been made, assuming that they are just and proper. Without any consideration other than an order in council, the government appointed successive commissioners to deal with this matter, and they have determined that certain of the civil population making claims, are entitled to receive the money. The commissioner, namely, Commissioner Friel, has provided that 5 per cent should be paid upon that money from a given date with respect to most of the claims. The date that he has fixed for the interest to run from is the date of the conclusion made as to the treaty of Versailles. That is with respect to personal losses only: property and other losses stand in a different category.

There are some people who are actually suffering because they have not received this money. They have lost everything, and I have never yet been able to understand why the government holds that money in the treasury to swell, as I say, the surpluses of the country, using it for public purposes instead of paying it to the people for whom it was intended. It is idle to say that there is no trust. I know there was not a trust in the ordinary sense of the term, but the government received this money to be distributed among the people who were entitled to it. When the minister amends his resolution, I hope he will not only provide for the claims that will exhaust the $2,500,000 but deal with people who have claims of any kind. Last year it was suggested that some claims would have to be referred to the courts. That may be so, but in the meantime that has not been done, and if they have just claims, all of us who have business experience know that it is desirable that such claims should be paid promptly. Some of these people are poor. I recall receiving a letter from a poor woman who said that she had been solicited by many people to put her claim into their hands and who asked me if I could do anything in the matter. I said that I would refer to it in the house. It is only a small claim of about $900, but it means a great deal to her. I suggest that we should utilize the money for the purpose of paying all the smaller claims in full; that if there be business claims about which there is no criticism, they should be paid, and that if there be doubt as to the soundness of the conclusions arrived at by the commissioner, such claims should be dealt with by the proper authority, for instance a judge of the exchequer court, so that there may be no delay in the matter. I hope the minister, when the resolution gets into committee, will amend it so as to deal with all the cases to which I have referred.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) a little while ago asked for a ruling about the moving of private or public bills. If he will refer to May, thirteenth edition, at pages 255 and 226 he will find the following:

A member of the government may act in behalf of a colleague in all cases including the proposal of new clauses on the report stage of a bill; but, with this exception, or in the case of an unopposed return, or of a motion for leave of absence, no motion can be moved save by the member in whose name the notice stands.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg to move:

That the resolution be amended by striking out in the third line the words "not exceeding" and substituting the word "of" therefor.

Mr. RINFRET: I dealt with this matter at some length last year when it was discussed on a motion for supply and an amendment thereto moved by an hon. member on the other side, and I do not intend to cover the whole field again, unless in reply to questions that may be put to me by hon. gentlemen. But for the proper understanding of the present resolution, some essentials should be brought out again and coordinated. I believe they all centre on two different points: first, the character of the reparation money paid to Canada by Germany through Great Britain, and, second, the nature of the claims put before, and the awards recommended by the commissioners; that is to say: money and claims. What is this money that we have now in the consolidated fund, and that may be used for this purpose, and what is the nature of the claims and the awards made by the commissioners? The claims we are dealing with originated under certain articles of the treaty of Versailles which have been read a number of times in the house but from which I should like to read again at least essential extracts. Article 231 says:

The allied and associated governments affirm and Germany accepts the responsibility of Germany and her allies for causing all the loss and damage to which the allied and associated governments and their nationals have been subjected as a consequence of the war imposed upon them by the aggression of Germany and her allies.

Article 232 is in these terms:

The allied and associated governments recognize that the resources of Germany are not adequate, after taking into account permanent diminutions of such resources which will result from other provisions of the present treaty, to make complete reparation for all such loss and damage.

The allied and associated governments, however, require, and Germany undertakes, that she will make compensation for all damage done to the civilian population of the allied and assoicated powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an allied or associated power against Germany by such aggression by land, by sea and from the air, and in general all damage as defined in Annex 1 hereto.

Then annex 1 sets out some ten categories as applicable to article 232.

Now what is the meaning of these two articles? In the first place article 231 clearly establishes that the responsibility for all damages and losses caused to every allied nation is acknowledged by Germany, not only the damage done to the civilian population, but the whole damage of the war generally. That is the meaning of article 231.

But in article 232 it is admitted by the allies that Germany cannot compensate the allies for the whole losses of the war, but Germany accepts the responsibility of compensating for the losses caused to the civilian population, as a basis for general compensation.

That is the meaning of these two essential articles of the treaty of Versailles, and that is the interpretation that was placed upon them by the British government itself when this matter was discussed in the British parliament. That is very important.

I wish first to dispel the impression that has gone abroad, an impression, in fact, that was evident in the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition a moment ago, that this reparation money is intended purely and solely to meet the losses of the civilian population. It is not so, and we do not admit that. The treaty says very clearly that Germany admits responsibility for all the losses of the war, but that inasmuch as Germany cannot meet all these losses, Germany on the one part and the allies on the other part accept as a basis of settlement the civilian losses. That is the interpretation that is to be placed upon the treaty of Versailles, as I tried to explain last year when we discussed this question in the house.

But this interpretation, even if it were disputed, is not so material after all, because that basis set out in the treaty has been abandoned in further conferences between the allies and Germany and has been replaced by another basis altogether. It was represented that if civilian losses alone were taken into consideration some countries would receive a much larger amount than others which had suffered from another class of losses which were much greater than their proportion of civilian losses. And therefore it was agreed that instead of taking these articles as a practical basis for settlement a fixed amount would be adopted for Germany to pay to the allies, and that fixed amount was to be distributed. The allies reached an agreement upon one point. The reparation payment it was agreed should be distributed to them, not on the basis of the civilian losses, but on the following fixed basis:

	Per cent
British Empire	22
France	52
Italy	10
Japan	·75
Belgium	8
Portugal	·75

As regards the balance it was agreed that: 6·5 per cent shall be reserved for Greece, Roumania, the Serb-Croat-Slovene state, and for the other powers entitled to reparation which are not signatories to this agreement.

Canada by agreement with the representatives of the British Empire was to receive a proportion of the 22 per cent allotted to the British Empire on the following basis, along with the other dominions:

	Per cent
Great Britain	86·85
Minor colonies	·80
Canada	4·35
Australia	4·35
New Zealand	1·75
South Africa	·60
Newfoundland	·10
India	1·20

This is clearly acknowledged in the first place by Commissioner Friel himself, who says at page 16 of his report, paragraph 4:

> The first intention had been apparently to assist in arriving at Canada's share of the British claim to be presented to Germany under the treaty of Versailles. The claims were never used for this purpose because the amount to be paid by Germany to Great Britain in which Canada would share was fixed otherwise.

That is the very same interpretation that was given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, speaking in the British House of Commons on May 4, 1920. I desire to read what he says because it bears on the whole question and it gives at least a very authoritative explanation of the whole matter, as my hon. friends will see. It will be found at page 1874 of the English Parliamentary Debates of May 4, 1920:

> His Majesty's government are engaged in preparing, for submission to the reparation commission, schedules of claims which they are entitled to put forward against the German government under the various categories specified in annex 1 to the reparation chapter of the treaty of peace. The reparation commission will in due course decide whether and to what extent the claims submitted are admissible. They are required to notify to the German government, on or before 1st May, 1921, the amount of damage for which Germany is liable, and to draw up a schedule of payments prescribing the time and manner for securing and discharging the entire obligation within thirty years.
> The British government may not, therefore, know for some time the amount at which their claim in respect of damage done to individuals is admitted. In any case payment may be expected to be spread over a considerable period.
> His Majesty's government have given careful consideration to the position of individuals in respect of whose losses reparation will be claimed by His Majesty's government. It must be understood that the claims to be made are claims by the British government in respect of a wrong done to the state, and not claims by individuals in respect of private wrongs, and that the government do not act as the agents of any individual to put forward his personal claim. Any payments that may be received from Germany are therefore the property of the nation, and no individual will have any claim in law for any sum which the British government may receive from Germany in respect of reparation.
> But His Majesty's government recognize that in particular cases, while there can be no legal claim a private individual may have a strong moral claim for compensation for sufferings and damage for which it will be the desire of parliament to make provision. They propose, therefore, to set aside a sum of £5,000,000 out of the first receipts on account of reparation which are allocated to the exchequer of the United Kingdom, as distinct from the British empire. . . . to be used as a fund out of which payments can be made to individuals as an act of grace on the part of His Majesty's government.

I think this document, Mr. Speaker, is very clear.

Mr. ERNST: If the minister will permit a question, is the course of action which has been followed by the government of this country subsequent to 1920 consistent, in his opinion, with adherence to the principles enunciated by Sir Austen Chamberlain?

Mr. RINFRET: I shall come to that. I was trying in the first place to explain the character of the payments made to Canada through Great Britain. Then I will come to the nature of the Canadian claims and the way in which they have been received and treated in this country. I am glad to see from the question of my hon. friend that he agrees with Mr. Austen Chamberlain that the money —and he puts it very clearly—is intended to compensate the wrong done to the state, not to pay individual claims; that there is no legal claim, but there is a moral claim that might be recognized. The British government did acknowledge and recognize that moral claim, and set aside a certain amount—not to compensate the whole of the claims that had been made, but to pay them to a certain extent and on a certain scale. My hon. friend shakes his head. In the papers before me is very clearly indicated the way in which the British government has met those claims.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister permit me? Did not this parliament three years ago formally and finally recognize the principle of compensating private parties? Why go into an academic argument as to whether it is an act of grace? We have admitted all that.

Mr. RINFRET: I am delighted to hear it. We can start from that point and very likely reach the decision that we are all anxious to reach.

Mr. STEVENS: Let us pay the claims. That is all we are after.

Mr. RINFRET: Let it be understood then that we are not disputing any further that this money is the property of the state, that we acknowledge only a moral claim on the part of the claimants. And perhaps we can go further and regard the action of the British parliament as an example of what should be done in Canada.

Mr. ERNST: Oh no.

Mr. RINFRET: I am now coming to the story of what happened in Canada, and I hope I may be as convincing as I have been regarding the character of the money. Let us see what was done in 1918. On November 15 of that year the Borden government passed an order in council appointing the Under-secretary of State, Mr. Thomas Mulvey, as an officer to take such steps as might be necessary to make a list of the Canadian claims and submit them in proper order. Advertisements were circulated inviting claimants to send in their claims and setting forth the machinery for dealing with the matter.

I may point out that when the advertisement was circulated the Canadian government of that day made it very clear that although these claims would be received, at the same time the government would not guarantee that they would ever be paid. I admit that at the time it was intended to submit the claims, not to a commissioner in Canada, but to a mixed commission that would sit in London and pass on them. It had also been contemplated at the time that payments might be made direct by Germany to Canada to meet those claims. But as I established a moment ago, that basis was abandoned, and instead a commissioner was appointed to act in Canada, his instructions being to hear the claims, and to recommend awards.

Now, it is true there has been considerable delay in this matter, and I agree with my hon. friend that we should do everything possible to avoid any further delay.

Mr. ERNST: Tell us what you are going to do, then.

Mr. RINFRET: But at the same time an unkind fate has caused delay, irrespective of either party which may have been in power. The former government in 1921 appointed Sir John Douglas Hazen as commissioner. Later he was called to the bench and therefore could not act. In 1923 the Liberal government appointed the Hon. William Pugsley as commissioner, but unfortunately after hearing a few cases he died. In 1925 Commissioner Friel was appointed, and he heard the claims, numbering in all 1,613. Last year he made his final report, but by the time it had been printed the session was pretty well advanced.

Mr. ERNST: It was printed in December, 1927, according to the report.

Mr. RINFRET: The typewritten report was sent to the printing office, but the printing was a rather complicated affair by reason of the number of figures to be dealt with. It took considerable time for the commissioner to go through the proofs, and it was some weeks later before the printed report was actually in the hands of the government. But, I may set my hon. friend's mind at ease if I tell him that I admit there has been undue delay in this matter.

Mr. ERNST: Hear, hear.

Mr. RINFRET: I hope we shall agree that the delay was due to various causes that it would only prolong the discussion to explain.

Mr. CLARK: I should like to know whether it is a fact that the report of Commissioner Friel was in the hands of the press for months before it came into the hands of members of parliament?

Mr. RINFRET: So far as I know, I must deny that. I have no such information.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister get the information for the house? I am informed that the report was in the hands of the press for months before it became available in parliament.

Mr. RINFRET: I can tell my hon. friend that neither the minister nor his department gave the report to the press as he indicates. But perhaps my hon. friend will admit that this is only a detail, and as we are all very anxious to avoid delay, it might be desirable that I be allowed to complete my explanation before we come to such episodes.

Mr. ERNST: Tell us what you are going to do.

Mr. RINFRET: During the course of the session of 1925 Commissioner Friel had hardly begun his work, but it is true that the then Secretary of State, the Hon. Mr. Copp, brought down a resolution asking the house to authorize the Secretary of State to receive the report and to pay the claims that might be recommended. Every time we discuss this matter it is pointed out very strongly by hon. members opposite that the introduction of this resolution was a clear indication of the policy of the government. But my hon. friends are less anxious to remind the house of the very clear indication of their own policy at the time. The resolution to which I have referred was so strongly opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite that it was withdrawn by the government.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but the minister surely is not going to precipitate a discussion on that point, because if he wants to do so it will not look so well when we get through with it as it does from the presentation he is now making. There were very good reasons for opposing that resolution. This has been threshed out over and over again. All we are urging the government to do now is to get on with this resolution and let the country pay those poor people who are entitled to be paid for the losses they sustained. Why raise up old issues? If the minister discusses them we will have to discuss them and so unnecessarily delay this business.

Mr. RINFRET: My hon. friend does not get my point, for the very good reason that he did not allow me to make it. I only wanted to point out that the conditions at the time did not permit—

Mr. SHORT: You have rehashed that sort of thing time and time again, year after year. Why don't you tell us when you are going to pay these claims? That is what we are interested in.

Mr. RINFRET: I am quite willing to stop my explanation right here and appeal to the leader of the opposition. If he is willing that this resolution should pass and will allow me to introduce my bill, I shall be quite willing to conclude my speech at once.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. minister has referred to me. If he will be good enough to indicate what payments he proposes to make, and what claims will be dealt with, I think it would expedite the passage of the resolution.

Mr. RINFRET: When the Hon. Mr. Copp introduced his resolution in 1925 he made it quite clear that he was introducing that resolution in order to meet the moral claims of certain of the claimants. He did not at that time lay down a policy on any legal ground. Our hon. friends on the other side and in the far corner pointed out in the first place that the nation should be recognized and, in the second place, which was very proper I think, that inasmuch as there was no report before the house it was scarcely opportune to consider such a resolution at that time. Consequently the resolution was withdrawn.

Last year, on May 19, my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst), on a motion for the house to go into supply, introduced an amendment recommending payment of the claims in full or in part, and I then undertook to explain that as we had not had an opportunity to study the report fully we were not in a position to recommend payment of the claims in full. I indicated on that occasion, however, the intention of the government in the following observations with which I concluded my speech:

> Therefore, as I have said, it is our intention during the recess, when the labours of the session are over, to give that report, the judgments and the evidence the fullest care and study in order to be in a position at the beginning of next session to introduce legislation. I cannot now forsee exactly what the legislation will be, but I can say that in principle it will be shaped by and based upon the policy adopted in the British parliament by the British government. It will not admit any legal rights, but the government is willing to meet some of these claims on compassionate grounds and as an act of grace. And I hope that this policy will commend itself to the good sense of the parliament of Canada and of the country.

Voting on the amendment, the house endorsed that statement by rather a large majority. Now coming to the bill proposed to be introduced, I may say that in the first place the explanation would have been available a long time ago had opportunity been given me to make it. The bill proposes to meet precisely the position which the government took at the time the amendment was moved on May 19, 1928. What it is intended to do by the bill is to recommend immediate payment of all small claims and payment on account in respect to the larger ones.

Mr. BENNETT: What is meant by small claims?

Mr. RINFRET: I will indicate that. The bill provides in the first place that the report of the commissioner shall be deposited with the Secretary of State, and the Minister of Finance shall then place to the credit of the custodians the sum of $2,500,000. It sets out in clause 5 the method of payment. It is proposed to meet in full all claims up to $15,000; in excess of $15,000 and up to $25,000, payment of 25 per cent; in excess of $25,000, payment of 10 per cent; in no case shall the total amount exceed $25,000. Under the scale adopted in the proposed bill the outlay required will be as follows:

Assessments to $15,000..	1,294	$1,761,018 00	In full	$1,761,018 00
Excess of $15,000 to $25,000..	10	191,541 35	25 p.c.	160,274 34
Excess of $25,000..	17	2,294,309 40	10 p.c.	410,092 92
	1,321	$4,246,868 75	.....	$2,331,385 26

In other words, the number of awards recommended by the commissioner is 1,321. If this bill is adopted it means that 1,294 of these claims will be met in full; 10 other claims will receive $15,000 plus 25 per cent; and 17 claims will receive these allotments plus 10 per cent. But in no case will the sum paid be greater than $25,000.

As pointed out by the Prime Minister a moment ago, this is not intended to be a final settlement or in any way to preclude or prejudice further discussion of this question; it is intended merely to avoid any further delays in meeting the claims of the 1,294 claimants where the amount does not exceed $15,000. It is only in respect to the 27 claims exceeding $15,000 that we are not in a position immediately to recommend to the house payment either in full or in any higher proportion than proposed. This is a matter in which at the present time as in the past both parties are interested; moreover, it is non-political. It should be approached in that spirit and I do invite the fullest discussion of the question from all parts of the house. I know that some hon. gentlemen are anxious to have us meet all claims in a larger proportion; but I know also that other hon. members will probably take the opposite view, the view taken in 1925, that the money belongs primarily to the nation. The losses of the nation have been very heavy, running into a billion dollars, and possibly it will be thought that $2,500,000 is a sufficiently large sum to spend at the present time. We must not forget that other settlements have been made along the same lines. Such have been made in the British parliament—war claims of this very nature. The Home bank claims here have also been settled in this manner and it is therefore not altogether extraordinary to make a proposal of this kind.

I wish to stress this point—because I am anxious that there shall be not the slightest misgiving in the minds of my hon. friends—that the government invites the fullest discussion of the matter; it is desirous to know the sentiment of the house. In 1925 the house was absolutely opposed to any form of payment, but last year by a somewhat large majority it rather indicated that, in its opinion, a partial payment would meet the case. If the representatives of the people, having met their constituents, indicate in the discussion the feeling that this payment is not sufficient, we are willing and prepared to meet the demand of the people and of parliament. And perhaps I might indicate, in case my hon. friends think this would mean a delay of another year, that we have ascertained the possibility, after we have laid down the principle contained in this bill, of having an amount in the supplementary estimates to increase the payments if it appears from the discussion that such is the desire of the house.

Before I sit down I wish to make another point. We have not made allowance for interest. The reason is obvious. I do not think we can consider interest unless we meet all claims in full. It would not be proper to pay certain claims with interest and make only partial payments in the case of other claims where interest is not possible. Therefore I do submit that the government is not inspired in this matter by any desire other than to meet the wishes of the nation as expressed here by the representatives of the Canadian people.

Mr. DUFF: I am sure we listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the Secretary of State. I am not particularly interested in the legal argument. I do not particularly care whether these claims are technically legal or whether some typist omitted to cross a "t" or dot an "i" in typing the treaty of Versailles; this matter is far above any technicality of that kind. I do not pretend to know any law; I am sometimes referred to as a sea lawyer, but when I hear some of our lawyer friends discussing different matters I think perhaps the laymen can come to equally good if not better decisions by simply using their common sense.

For a few moments I would like to deal with some of the arguments advanced by the minister, who claims that there is no legal obligation on the government to pay this money. If that is true I wonder why certain sections are included in different orders in council which were passed not only by this government but by the previous government, giving certain instructions to three successive commissioners. The order in council of October 31, 1921, stated that the commissioner was to take such steps as were necessary to obtain a complete list of claimants and persons residing or carrying on business in Canada who suffered damage due to the destruction of life and property through the illegal warfare carried on by the enemy.

Then it goes on:

The minister further submits—

That means the government of the day.

—that, under article 231, part VIII (reparation) of the treaty of Peace with Germany, the allied and associated powers affirmed and Germany accepted the responsibility of Germany and her allies for causing the loss and damage to which the allied and associated governments and their nationals had been subjected as a consequence of the war imposed upon them by the aggression of Germany and her allies.

It seems to me that this includes not only the loss caused by naval and military operations during the war but also the losses suffered by our nationals, or in other words the individual citizens of Canada. After Sir Douglas Hazen resigned the same instructions were issued to Hon. William Pugsley, and if we look at article 232 of the treaty of Versailles we find the following:

The allied and associated governments, however, require, and Germany undertakes, that she will make compensation for all damage done to the civilian population of the allied and associated powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an allied or associated power against Germany by such aggression by land, by sea and from the air, and in general all damage as defined in annex 1 hereto.

Section 9 states:

Damage in respect of all property wherever situated belonging to any of the allied or associated states or their nationals, with the exception of naval and military works or materials, which has been carried off, seized, injured or destroyed by the acts of Germany or her allies on land, on sea or from the air, or damage directly in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war.

My hon. friend tried to argue that legally all this or any other government could pay out of the moneys received from Germany was the cost of the actual operation of the war. Let me tell my hon. friend that even if he is technically correct the people who suffered the damages set forth in Mr. Freil's report have to help pay the cost of the war as well as those who did not suffer any special damage, and I believe that the cases of the 1,600 claimants should be considered and their damages paid.

My hon. friend told us what Great Britain did, but we have a neighbour closer than Great Britain; I refer to the United States. Their claims totalled $191,000,000. If, as the minister says, he cannot legally take the full amount necessary to pay these claims out of the payments made by Germany, which to date have totalled $21,000,000 and which will amount to $360,000,000 in the next fifty years, I would suggest that he follow the lead of the United States and pay this money from another fund. In the United States they took 30 per cent of the German property held by the custodian, amounting to $45,000,000, in order to settle these claims. I understand that we have some $13,000,000 or more obtained from the same source, which has been kept in a special fund, and if we cannot pay all these claims with the reparations money surely we can use the money in that special fund.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Did they pay interest also?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, from March 10, 1925. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, putting aside the legal question, that, as the minister said a few moments ago, there is a moral question involved. These people have suffered damages; in my own county I know there are hundreds of people who suffered greatly through the loss of their ships, in the case of ship owners, the loss of wages in the case of seamen and the loss of their catch in the case of fishermen. Some of these men have never recovered from their losses, because they have been waiting all this time for this government to reimburse them, which should have been done from the reparation money.

I say that in fairness to these claimants they should get not only the amounts set opposite their names but also the interest as set forth in Mr. Freil's report. Certainly this government had confidence in Mr. Freil when they told him to investigate this matter; they practically said, "We will accept the report you make." In his report Mr. Freil declared in no uncertain terms that after going over these claims it was his opinion that they come under section 232 of the Versailles treaty and under part 8 of annex II to part 2.

In view of the fact that the government appointed these commissioners, that a large amount of money was expended in order to investigate these claims, that the claimants themselves have spent small and large sums of money in order to file their claims that hope has been held out to them during the past ten years that they will get their money, it seems to me that this government, this country and this House of Commons should have no hesitation in passing a unanimous vote that the claims be paid in full. Not only should the $2,500,000 be paid but the government should bring down a supplementary estimate to provide for sufficient money to pay the claims in full with interest.

To show that I am not as selfish as people sometimes think I am, I want to say that the $15,000 proposition made by the minister covers every claim I have. I think my hon. friend will agree with me when I say that possibly all the claims in the county of Lunenburg, which has the most claimants, will come within this $15,000 proposition.

An hon. MEMBER: There will be no interest, though.

Mr. DUFF: I know that. The reason the majority of our claims will be paid is because most of our vessels are owned by shareholders. We differ from the people who own vessels in other parts of the country. When a man owns one, two or up to ten or twelve shares in a vessel, it does not amount to $15,000, but there are other cases of ship owners where there is only one share. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) may own a whole ship, and is it fair that I and the sixty-three other shareholders should get the full amount of our claims while my hon. friend gets only $15,000 and 10 per cent besides? Take case No. 51, in the county of Cumberland. This covers the loss of the schooners L. C. Power and Lillian H., and the total claim amounts to $78,640. These ships were owned by G. M. Cochrane and if they had been divided into sixty-four shares the total of the $78,640 would be paid. But because this man owns the ship outright he will only receive a portion of his claim. I submit that that is not fair or right. The same principle applies to claims of $200,000 or $300,000, or upwards.

The total of all the claims amounts to only about $4,000,000, and the interest is only $2,000,000. It is not our fault that the interest has mounted up, because we should have had the money many years ago. The government has had this money for years, so they really would not be out the interest. As my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said, the government has had $21,000,000 for two or three years from the reparation receipts, and $13,000,000, representing enemy property funds, since 1918, so if the government should meet these demands it would not cost the country one cent. The government has to provide only $2,000,000 in round figures in the estimates to pay all the claims in full.

The government does not want the people to come knocking at its doors day after day. There is only one way to settle the thing, and that is to settle it right and the government or parliament will not be settling this question right if they only pay the $2,500,000 as proposed. The way to settle it is to pay all the claims, because if the money is not paid in full with interest, day after day and year after year not only will the government be bothered, but every member of this parliament will be receiving letters and be tormented until the government finally decides to pay the claims in full.

I think the government should appreciate the fact that although I was strongly in favour of the payment of these claims last year, I showed my allegiance to my party by voting against the want of confidence amendment moved by one of the hon. members on the other side. I do not want to be placed in that position this year. Whether these claims are called legal claims, equitable claims or moral claims, the only way to settle them is by payment in full with interest so that the people will receive the money to which they are entitled.

Mr. ERNST: Mr. Chairman, I heartily endorse everything which has been said by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), even though his enthusiasm for these payments in full is somewhat belated.

An hon. MEMBER: The lion and the lamb.

Mr. ERNST: Who is the lion? I said the hon. member's enthusiasm is apparently belated. I do not intend to attempt to answer argument by argument, but the hon. minister referred to the treaty and the most conclusive answer to every argument he has adduced is the action of this government and its immediate predecessors in office. The example of Great Britain has been brought forth as an argument, but in the face of that example Mr. Pugsley was appointed in 1923 as a commissioner to determine the amount of the claims due to civilians owing to enemy actions during the war. When you invite claimants to come before a tribunal and do not tell them that any payment which they may get as a result of the award of that tribunal will be a matter of charitable donation or an act of grace, you encourage them to expect that the claims will be paid in full according to the award. That is the only conclusion to which you can come in view of the action taken in 1923. In addition to that, a resolution was introduced in 1925 by the then government which sought to provide for payment in full.

An hon. MEMBER: And with interest.

Mr. ERNST: And with interest, yes. In the face of these facts how can the minister ask the house to believe that he seriously thinks we ought to follow the example of Great Britain, when he knows perfectly well that his own government departed from that example? He knows perfectly well that we have between $13,000,000 and $14,000,000 which we have received from Germany as reparations under section 232 of the treaty. He knows the United States have interpreted a similar section in the treaty of peace which they signed as meaning that civilians are entitled to participate in the money received under that section.

I realize that the amount of $15,000 will cover most of the industrial claims in Lunenburg county, but it will not cover them with interest. I accept the proposition of the minister that we cannot reasonably expect interest to be paid upon the small claims until the large claims are paid in full, but I submit that having the money and having intimated to the various claimants that payment would be made when the money was available, there is no moral justification today for refusing to pay the claims in full. They should be paid in full and with interest as the commissioner awarded or recommended —interest on personal losses other than property losses from the date of the signing of peace, which was January 10, 1920, and interest on property losses from the date of the loss. The government has had the use of this money during a period of years, but the people who lost their property through the illegal warfare have been put to great hardship in many cases, and in other cases they have had to borrow money and pay interest. They have lost the use of their capital during that period; that capital was worth something to them, and that something is interest. They should get back their capital and the interest as well. I know of dozens of cases of fishermen around my own part of the county whose capital was lost. I know of some instances where they have had to borrow, and when they borrowed they have had to pay interest. The government has the money and it should pay in full with the interest. This interest means the addition of approximately 50 per cent to each award.

Some reference has been made by the minister to the fact that this proposal in its present form is introduced only to test the feeling of the house. I understood him to say that some revision might be made through the medium of the supplementary estimates, but I think I know the feelings of this part of the house. If it had not been for a motion from this side of the house we would not have received the report last year. The minister refused to table it until my leader said that we would not go on with supply until we got it, and then the report was forthcoming. This resolution was called during the early part of the session but for some reason, which the minister alone knows, it has been allowed to stand over a period of months and as it is now late in the session he can offer that as an excuse for not presenting any amended measure if the house voices its disapproval of the proposal as it now stands.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is politics.

Mr. RINFRET: We will have to ask the member for Vancouver to come back and address to my hon. friends the remarks he addressed to me.

Mr. ERNST: I am about to conclude with this remark that the minister knows perfectly well that the sentiment on this side of the house is in favour of payment and payment in full, with interest.

Mr. RINFRET: I will just read to the hon. member his own amendment of last year:

Mr. W. G. Ernst (Queens-Lunenburg): I move in amendment seconded by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark):

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house regrets the refusal of the government to introduce legislation at the present session of parliament providing for the payment in full or in part of the various sums fixed by James Friel, Esquire, K.C., a commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act, as losses sustained by the civilian population of Canada during the Great war."

"In full or in part."

Mr. ERNST: That was the amendment, it is true, but would the minister say from that that this side of the house did not pledge itself to payment in full? It did pledge itself to payment in full, but to test what the feeling of the house would be on the amendment, the alternatives were necessary. But this side of the house believes in payment in full and with interest, and forced the government to its present position, if you will. The minister must know what the feeling on his side of the house is, and there is no reason why these claims cannot be paid in full and at once, with interest.

Mr. JACOBS: I am glad to see my hon. friends on the opposite side of the house have changed their views with respect to the payment of these reparation claims. In 1925, had it not been for the obstruction of the opposition, this money would have been paid to every one of the claimants.

Mr. BENNETT: That is nonsense.

Mr. JACOBS: I would like to support my statement from Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: I have the Hansard under my hand.

Mr. JACOBS: I should like to read to the leader of the opposition the views of the then leader of the opposition, a man who, I think, at that time had the confidence of the gentlemen who sat behind him to the same degree that the present leader of the opposition has. Might I refer to the remarks of Mr. Meighen as reported in the Commons debates, under date of June 19, 1925, at page 4517:

Right Hon. Arthur Meighen (Leader of the Opposition): This is undoubtedly a measure of some consequence, the full purport of which should be made very clear before the resolution is adopted. The opening sentence is rather threatening, that it is expedient to bring in a measure "to make provision for the payment of claims". And paragraph (3) provides for payment. Does the minister propose that on the report of the late Hon. William Pugsley he is to be permitted to distribute assets amounting to millions of dollars in cash among those whom Mr. Pugsley thought the money ought to go to?

Then I would cite Mr. Meighen a little further. If this is nonsense, I am in pretty good company.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that the observations of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen were nonsense; I said that the observations of the hon. gentleman who is speaking were nonsense.

Mr. JACOBS: But I said that this would have passed and become law four years ago if the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen and the hon. gentlemen who sat behind him had not opposed it.

Mr. BENNETT: Who had the majority in the house at that time?

Mr. JACOBS: The government had the majority, but the opposition was such on the other side that the government thought it well to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. SPENCE: Do they withdraw things now that they can put through?

Mr. JACOBS: Sometimes they do.

Mr. SPENCE: Not very often.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If you want to put it through, why not do it now? You have the majority now.

Mr. JACOBS: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I will quote some of the remarks on his own side of the house, and perhaps I will find some of his remarks too. I will continue with what Mr. Meighen said—the "nonsense"—as follows:

Mr. Meighen: If the motion is adopted it will be in the face of my protest. This is merely requesting the government for authority to pay out millions of money as a first charge on reparations, on the mere say-so of him who, unfortunately, now has passed away, but who was for many years a close associate of the government themselves. It is a measure of far-reaching consequence, and that it should be brought in at this stage of the session and sought to be precipitated through along with many others seems to me a disgrace to this house. I for one lodge my protest, and lodge it now. Under what rule of equity, or reason, or fidelity to the public interest—

Here is some nonsense.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit of it.

Mr. JACOBS:

—are millions of money to be paid out merely on the dictum of a commissioner? Possibly he had some practical duty to perform in investigating certain facts and saving the time of a duly constituted court; but here was a commissioner acting under the authority of, subject to the will of, dismissible on the whim of, the government in office,—and we are asked to act now on the assumption that he was a final judge in appeal as between the treasury of this country and certain claimants to vast sums of money. Is it right? I know of no other country that has done any such thing. I do not know what the nature of these claims is. I do not doubt some of them are good. I am not going to speak arbitrarily on the priority right of these claimants. It may be they have it; I doubt it. I want to say now, I doubt very much if special claims for damages due to the war are in priority to the state itself,—the damage of the state.

Further nonsense from the then leader of the opposition.

Reparations are not paid in respect of the special damage of the individuals of a country; they are paid in respect of the damage of the nation itself. Now this government asks us to take the dictum of the late Hon. William Pugsley, grant the priority of claims that he has allowed, pay the money out—money paid to Canada as reparations of the war—to these claimants, and lose the whole of it so far as the general taxpayer is concerned. These vast sums are all to be paid to individuals. And more—because no doubt these seven or eight millions are just a beginning—we are called upon to decide to-day what course we are going to take as to the whole career of this thing. As for me, I am firmly against it from the beginning. I will protest against its passing, this session in partcular.

Does the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) not think he spoke a little too soon?

Mr. BENNETT: Not at all, as I shall presently show.

Mr. JACOBS: Perhaps that is the reason my hon. friend is now leader of the opposition and Mr. Meighen is no longer in the house. Maybe it was some of that nonsense which caused Mr. Meighen to seek private life. In any event, what I want to say is that if there had not been such opposition, such obstruction, shall I say, from hon. gentlemen on the other side, this money might have been paid. Mr. Meighen was not the only one. Perhaps I can cite the names of some hon. gentlemen who are still well known on the other side of the house and who, happily, are still with us: the hon. member who now represents Fort William (Mr. Manion); my smiling friend the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) who uttered some rather pungent criticisms. Then I find that an hon. gentleman asked whether, in view of the opposition to the resolution coming from the other side, the Secretary of State would not be well advised to withdraw it. "Evil communications corrupt good manners." The Secretary of State withdrew the resolution and now, four years afterwards, when it is reintroduced by the Secretary of State, we find that the strongest protagonists of the measure are these very hon. gentlemen who opposed the resolution four years ago. They cannot get away with anything of that kind. They cannot go to the country and say: The government did not wish to do anything at all in the matter of paying these reparation claims, but were forced to do so. My object in rising is to show that the view of the Conservative party in 1925 was in strong opposition to the resolution. Mr. Meighen says that legally and morally the claimants are not entitled to one penny of the money. I am glad the present leader of the opposition says that this is nonsense.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say so.

Mr. JACOBS: We believed his remarks were nonsense four years ago and we believe to-day that we were right at that time.

I am opposed to the resolution before the house because I do not think that it goes far enough. I am in favour of seeing payments of all the claims made in full, as was suggested four years ago, and if the Secretary of State would take my suggestion he would withdraw his resolution and bring in something that would give satisfaction I think to the entire house, satisfaction to us in 1925 and in 1929, and satisfaction to the Conservative party in 1929.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman from Cartier rose in his place and made an observation the effect of which was that but for the opposition of 1925, the reparations claims would have been paid. I said that that was nonsense, and I repeat it. He then, realizing that he had made a statement which was entirely without foundation, states that what was said by hon. gentlemen in the house at that time was declared by me to be nonsense. Does he think that that improves his position? Does he think that a misstatement such as that from a member of the legal profession as to what was said by a member of this house improves his position?

Mr. JACOBS: In what respect did I make a misstatement?

Mr. BENNETT: When he said that I declared that the observations made by the then leader of the opposition were nonsense. He knows that I said no such thing.

Mr. JACOBS: No, excuse me, I did not say that. What I said—

Mr. BENNETT: He said "more nonsense."

Mr. JACOBS: There was obstruction by men in his party in 1925, and he said that was nonsense. Then I quoted what the nonsense was.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman is beginning to get a sense of responsibility. I am glad to see that he is not endeavouring to laugh himself out of the false position in which he placed himself. You cannot fool with the truth and get away with it as a joke.

Mr. JACOBS: In what respect was I fooling with the truth?

Mr. BENNETT: I repeat that he said several times in his speech when he read from what Mr. Meighen said at that time that that was more nonsense according to the leader of the opposition, and I say that I said no such thing, and he knows it.

Mr. JACOBS: Does my hon. friend then agree with Mr. Meighen? Answer that.

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly shall, but once more my hon. friend is evading again; it is the old story.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Answer the question.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman from Melfort is doing the same thing. The question before this house is a simple one. The hon. member for Cartier got up and said that I said that the speech made by the leader of the opposition was nonsense, and I say that is untrue, and he knows it was untrue. How will that go? Does the hon. member for Melfort understand that?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): As the hon. gentleman has brought my name into it, I would ask him to answer the question he promised to answer.

Mr. BENNETT: I will in my own time, in the right way, on the right occasion.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Then leave the hon. member for Melfort alone when he is leaving you alone.

Mr. BENNETT: You asked me to answer a question, and I say I will answer it when I get ready. I am dealing at the moment with the hon. member for Cartier, who has endeavoured in this house to place a statement on Hansard that was incorrect and false, and he must have known that it was.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

JOSEPH NICHOLL

Mr. W. F. GARLAND (Carleton) moved the third reading of Bill No. 202, for the relief of Joseph Nicholl.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the house to the fact that we have about ninety-five divorce bills on the order paper in a single day, and the majority of these, if not all of them, are uncontested. We are dealing simply with ex parte evidence. The house the other day referred one of these bills to its own private bill committee for the first time in many years. The case was investigated and evidence taken, with the result that the bill was withdrawn. So I would just point out to the house what might happen if we investigated all these bills thoroughly—perhaps not one-quarter of them would be allowed to pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed on division.

MARION ISABEL KEMP

The house in committee on Bill No. 153, for the relief of Marion Isabel Kemp—Mr. Arthurs—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand there are two children. Has any provision been made for them?

Mr. ARTHURS: Any such provision is entirely in the hands of the courts of the various provinces. No provision can be made by this parliament. There are three bills standing in my name for consideration in committee. I have read most carefully the evidence in each case, and I am quite satisfied that the committee will be justified in passing these bills.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Was there any representation that the children should be cared for before this divorce was granted?

Mr. ARTHURS: Representations of that kind, Mr. Chairman, would be no use to the committee on divorce.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the matter come up in the courts of Ontario? It is important to know that the children will not be thrown on the street without provision. The committee should have required the petitioner to give evidence on that point.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that in this case we are departing from the rule which requires the sponsor of a private bill to be in the house.

Mr. SPENCE: I called on the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) on Sunday and I have had a letter from him. He is absolutely unable to be out of doors, to say nothing of coming here, and he probably will not be here this session.

Mr. MARCIL: I merely wanted to have it understood that this was the reason for allowing the bill to go through in the absence of the sponsor, on account of illness.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Everyone in the committee knew that.

Mr. MARCIL: But it is just as well to have it in Hansard so that there may be no misunderstanding. I have no personal interest in the matter but I wish to safeguard what I conceive to be public morality and to give expression to the sentiments of the people whom I represent.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Any children?

Mr. JACOBS: I am not in a position to say; I am not responsible.

[Mr. Spence.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think the least we can expect is some information regarding the facts of the case, and until the sponsor is prepared to ascertain the important information as to whether or not there are children we ought to ask that the bill stand.

Mr. JACOBS: What difference would it make to my hon. friend whether there were children or not? That matter does not come before us.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It makes considerable difference.

Mr. JACOBS: That is a matter for the provincial courts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is quite within the competence of this parliament to refuse the divorce on this ground, among others, namely that there is no assurance that the children will be provided for. I think the Minister of Justice will support me in that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree with that.

Mr JACOBS: Parliament, of course, could do anything; it could abolish my hon. friend.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have a right to ask whether there are any children in this case and whether they are provided for. If the sponsor of the bill is not in a position to answer that question I shall have to ask to have the bill stand.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): The hon. member has a perfect right to ask that question. He has asked it in respect to several bills and has received a reply in most cases. But I would ask him, now that he has got the information, what he proposes to do.

Mr. MARCIL: Call public attention to the matter.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): We know that we have not the power here to deal with that aspect of the matter. We might refuse the divorce asked for, but we have not been doing so. How much further ahead are we? I appeal to the good common sense of the house. We know perfectly well that we are now simply taking up the time of the house. I was one of those who for some time during this session protested against the refusal to provide a divorce court for Ontario; I strongly advocated the bill in that respect. I thought it was our duty to bring the matter to the attention of the house and of the country. That has now been done, and for the life of me I cannot see what we are gaining in taking up the time of the house. I am not suggesting for a moment that an hon. member has not the right to ask any questions with reference to any of these bills, but after we have obtained the information asked for I do not think it is serving any purpose to delay matters.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): No; I do not waste much of the time of the house and I will say what I have to say. No one will stop me. I want to appeal to the good common sense of every hon. member to take a reasonable and sane view of the whole situation, and unless there is some specific reason why a particular bill should not go through I think we should expedite matters as far as possible.

Mr. MARCIL: In answer to my hon. friend, I would point out that the people who are asking for these divorces are residents of Ontario and Quebec where the law of the indissolubility of marriage prevails. These people, therefore, are asking to be exempted from that law; they are asking in each case for a law unto themselves. When therefore they ask that favour of parliament, parliament has a perfect right to deal with the matter as it sees fit, as was done in the Bourdon case which was referred back to the committee on the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). After the evidence had been heard the bill was withdrawn because the parties knew the house would not grant it. Are we going to deal honestly and conscientiously with these bills, some three hundred, as we do with all other measures that come before parliament, or are we going to constitute ourselves merely a rubber stamp, shouting "carried", without giving them any consideration? Are we going to break up family ties and throw the children on the streets, leaving them for the Canadian people to support? I should not care to face an audience in any place where the marriage tie is still held in high veneration and confess that I had taken that stand.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, there is something important involved here, and if some of us make ourselves unpopular I suppose that is the penalty we will have to pay for insisting on reform. The other day we came to a sort of understanding that far from in any way blocking these bills we would simply ask that when they were considered in committee—during that one stage—we would make an inquiry concerning the children, or if any bill came up of which we had special information we would ask for a simple outline of the case. Surely that is reducing our inquiry to the lowest possible minimum. We have let all these third readings go by when we could have checked them; we have let the first readings go by and we have let the second readings go and now we are letting these pass committee after simply asking one question which I at least think is very important.

There are hon. gentlemen in this house who blame a few of us for this condition of affairs. I am not going to refer again to the divorce court question except to say that if anyone is to blame for this situation it is these members who voted against the establishment of such a court. Further than that, there are members of this house who leave early Friday afternoon and do not return until late Monday night or Tuesday; they come chiefly from points near Ottawa, and for their own convenience they travel home every week end, leaving some of us who are far from our homes to struggle along as best we may, week after week, month after month, without a chance to see our homes at all. Then, because these men are not here to sponsor their bills we are told that we are responsible for keeping the order paper cluttered with these bills. They are responsible and they must bear their responsibility.

As the hon. member for Bonaventure has said, owing to an appeal which was made to me personally I asked the house to refer one particular bill back to the committee. The house responded splendidly to that request; I do not think any hon. member could have conscientiously refused to do so. A number of sessions of the private bills committee were devoted to an investigation of that case and serious allegations were made, so serious that some gentlemen concerned did not want to appear before that committee. In any case the result, as we all know, was that the committee did not refuse to report the bill for the simple reason that it was withdrawn. I would suggest that the newspapers which undertook to comment on the bill and which said there was no likelihood of its being turned down were absolutely misrepresenting the case, because a number of hon. members were well understood to be in favour of that bill not being reported again to this house. In addition to that, when it was suggested that a doubtful operation had been performed there were members of this house who told me such a thing was impossible, that no reputable surgeon would do it and that no hospital would permit that sort of thing, yet the evidence disclosed that a reputable doctor in this city did perform such an operation in the civic hospital here in Ottawa. This information has not been brought out here before. I have no desire to name the doctor, although his name was given in evidence before the committee, but I do say this is a most serious state of affairs. If out of 300 of these bills one is referred to a committee and that one is turned down by the committee, I say it is a serious question as to whether we should not consider more of these bills in our private bills committee. Now I come to the point raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): On a point of order, I would like to say that the bill was not turned down by the committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not say it was turned down; I said it was withdrawn.

An hon. MEMBER: You said both.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I want to make it clear.

Mr. McGIBBON: It was withdrawn because it was thought parliament would prorogue before the bill could be put through.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I intended to say that the bill was withdrawn. Further I am very much concerned, as I know many social workers and citizens generally are concerned, with the fate of the children in these cases. We have been told by the Minister of Justice that this is a provincial matter; I presume he is right, and for the time being we accept that decision. However, that does not absolve us from some responsibility in granting divorces where children are concerned. If I were a member of the senate committee I would make it a condition precedent to the granting of divorce that the children should be provided for; I think that would be a reasonable thing. Until the senate adopts that procedure, and they can do so any time, I think that without referring these bills back to the committee I am quite within my rights to call the attention of the house to the fact that there are children involved and that some provision should be made for them. I suggest that I can take that action, for my own reasons, without being charged with obstructing.

Mr. NEILL: Does my hon. friend consider that the children will be any better off if these divorces are not granted?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, but for my own information and the information of others I want to know if any children are involved and whether or not provision has been made for them.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. JACOBS: May I tell my hon. friend that the responsibility of the parents towards the children exists just the same as if there were no divorce. They have a legal responsibility, and these children have a right to apply both to the father and to the mother for maintenance, notwithstanding any divorce which may have been granted. Under the law in Quebec the father has the custody of the children unless, for some sufficient reason in the opinion of the court, the custody is given the mother. However, the responsibility exists just the same, so really all these harangues do not amount to anything.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They may not amount to anything in the opinion of my hon. friend, but I still insist that we have the right to know something about these cases. This house has deliberately adopted this procedure of dealing with divorce cases, and under this procedure I am quite within my rights in asking for some information with regard to these bills. The information I want is as to whether there are any children and whether or not any provision has been made for their future maintenance. I should like the sponsor of this bill to answer those questions.

Mr. JACOBS: Nothing appears in the record with regard to whether or not these people have children; otherwise I should be glad to give my hon. friend the information.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then, for us to know the real situation is a decided gain, because it shows that this question is not considered by the senate committee.

Mr. MARCIL: As I said before, we do not have divorce in either Quebec or Ontario but we have processes which are very similar, and I question very much whether any court would grant a separation without inquiring as to whether or not there were children.

Mr. RYCKMAN: There is one child, a child of the adulterous father who left his wife, who, according to the principle of public morality announced in the house to-night by the hon. member for Bonaventure, should not have a divorce. There is a child by the father who offended against his wife.

Mr. MARCIL: I am surprised at the hon. gentleman making that statement. I am not defending the guilty party in this case. I am merely asking the house to deal with the matter seriously and not be a rubber stamp, approving, without any investigation, what has been done in the other house. I am prepared to defend my attitude in that regard.

[Mr. Spence.]

Mr. RYCKMAN: The hon. member for Bonaventure would not grant a divorce in this case. He said—and I took down his words—that these people were a law unto themselves and came to parliament seeking divorce. Who is a law unto himself? The offending husband who would not be granted relief by anyone, and my hon. friend from Bonaventure would not dare rise in his seat and say he would grant the wife relief. If a divorce should be granted in any case, it should be granted in this. Will the hon. member say on the floor of the house whether he would grant her a divorce?

WAR REPARATIONS

AUTHORITY TO PLACE $2,500,000 TO CREDIT OF CUSTODIAN FOR PAYMENT OF CLAIMS

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Johnston in the chair:

That the Minister of Finance be authorized to place to the credit of the Custodian, out of the reparation money paid into the treasury for losses sustained during the late war, a sum not exceeding $2,500,000 and that provision be made as to the method and scale of payments.

Mr. BENNETT: When the house rose at six o'clock I had been endeavouring to point out the very improper attitude taken by the hon. member for Cartier with respect to certain observations that were made by myself. I have taken the trouble to ask Hansard for the record of his remarks, and I find he said that:

> In 1925 had it not been for the obstruction of the opposition this money would have been paid to every one of the claimants.
> Mr. Bennett: That is nonsense.

He proceeded to point out that the then leader of the opposition had taken a very pronounced stand against that resolution, and in the course of his observations he added:

> Then I would cite Mr. Meighen a little further. If this is nonsense, I am in pretty good company.

At once I pointed out that I had not in any sense indicated that the observations of the then leader of the opposition were nonsense. Again the hon. member for Cartier said the same thing later in his speech. I repeat what I said before recess, that such statements are not to the credit of this house or of my hon. and learned friend from Cartier who made them. For when he endeavoured to indicate that the leader of the opposition of to-day had said that the observations of the leader of the opposition in 1925 were nonsense, he made a statement wholly without foundation, and he knew it to be without foundation, a statement for which there was no warrant on the record as he himself read it. I repudiate such a statement as that, and I say further it is not creditable to a member of the legal profession or to a member of this house to continue to make a statement of that kind in the light of the record then before him.

Mr. JACOBS: Would the hon. gentleman pardon a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. JACOBS: What remarks of mine did he consider were nonsense? Perhaps I am entitled to know that.

Mr. BENNETT: Why, certainly. I have already said so and I repeat it. The hon. gentleman said that in 1925 had it not been for the obstruction of the opposition this money would have been paid to every one of the claimants.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the hon. gentleman deny that?

Mr. BENNETT: I say it is nonsense.

Mr. JACOBS: I cite the remarks of Mr. Meighen and his party on that occasion. If what I say now is nonsense, what Mr. Meighen and his party said then is nonsense.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the gentlemen who applauded that are not paying a tribute to their own intelligence. If "a fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind," it is because they find themselves so often in the same box.

The right hon. gentleman, the then leader of the opposition, opposed a somewhat similar resolution to the one now before us, and he told the government his reasons why. In the first place, the resolution was introduced on the 19th day of June, and the house rose on the 27th. It was introduced, as Sir Henry Drayton pointed out, in the dying days of the session. Further, it was not a resolution to pay claims that had been ascertained. A part only of the claims had been settled by the commission; the balance were to be settled. The position was taken that until the claims had been determined by some authority, Mr. Meighen thought that a single authority without reference to parliament was not ample enough. When the hon. gentleman speaks of obstruction, I would point out to him that the whole debate, participated in by Liberals, Conservatives and Progressives, took only eight pages in Hansard. He ventures to call that obstruction. The Hon. Mr. Copp, then Secretary of State, withdrew his motion, giving as his reasons that he had not expected that it would be so treated. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) also participated in the debate and gave two reasons why he was opposed to the resolution, which were in part the reasons of the then leader of the opposition. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre, who has spoken to-day, pointed out that these claims had not been determined and that it was proposed to give to the government, without reference to parliament, the power to settle claims when the commissioner had not yet completed his work.

The whole purpose of our effort last session was to endeavour to secure the report of the commissioner in order that we might see in black and white what the decisions were so that this parliament might know whether or not those decisions were based upon appreciation of the evidence, and that the government might for itself determine, as was then said, whether or not it would pay the claims or wait until they had referred some of them to a judge. What action the government will now take I cannot say, but the smaller claims under $15,000, I take it, have been reviewed by the administration in terms of their promise of last year, and the administration is satisfied that the claims of $15,000 reported upon by the commissioners should be paid in full.

My friend, the member for Melfort, asked me to answer the question he put to me, whether I was now desirous to adopt the language of the then right hon. leader of the opposition. I say, without adopting his language, which is his own always, as my language is my own, that I approve entirely of what he said—

Mr. JACOBS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: —that no parliament should be called upon to approve of the payment of claims about which it does not know. If the hon. gentleman will look at the resolution, which is found on pages 4517 of Hansard for 1925, he will find that the house was asked to approve of the report of the commissioner as far as it went. Then:

(2) That from time to time, as sums are received on account of reparation under the agreement of London——and so on, they shall be placed to certain credits.

until such time as the aggregate of such payments is equal to the total amount of the claims for reparation as determined by the report of the said commissioner and approved by the governor in council;

(3) That the Secretary of State shall, on receipt of such payments, from time to time distribute the same to persons found entitled to claims for reparation in the commissioner's report, by way of pro rata dividend;

(4) That the Secretary of State shall annually lay before parliament, within fifteen days after the meeting thereof, a report of the receipts and expenditures under the proposed legislation.

The obvious principle being that this was to be a matter extending over many years, because they were to lay before parliament fifteen days after it met a report of the moneys received and the moneys paid. What we pointed out last year was that the money had been received in sufficient amounts to enable the payments to be made in full of the claims that had been approved. That is what we endeavoured to point out. When the hon. member from Antigonish-Guysborough—who described himself this afternoon as a "sea lawyer" but whom we always affectionately term as "the Admiral"—referred to these claims as he did, and said that out of loyalty to the administration he voted with them last year, although he felt they should pay the claims, he but presented the argument which we now make to this government, that having the money in hand which was paid by Germany for the purpose of reparations for the wrongs and injuries suffered by the civil population in the terms that were read this afternoon by the Secretary of State, then indeed we should proceed to discharge them. In other words, the money is there, the claims are now proven, judgment has been given by the commissioner, and on that judgment we should proceed to pay in full.

Let us proceed a step further. There was another reason. A very few claims had been considered by the late Mr. Pugsley. Some of the larger ones and the great multitude of the small claims which Mr. Commissioner Friel dealt with, had not, may I remind the hon. member for Cartier, even been considered by the commissioner. These claims that were referred to this afternoon, the claims that the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough mentioned, the claims in which we are all interested, are the claims of the small persons who have suffered by reason of not having received this money. I do say to the Minister of Finance, now that he has had the use of this money for all these years and has received $21,000,000 that enabled him to pay off obligations due by the Dominion, carrying interest at the rate of five per cent, he should with the remaining money and the accumulated benefits that have come to this treasury by the use of it all these years pay these claimants in full with interest at five per cent per annum in the terms of the judgment of Mr. Commissioner Friel. Why should this country retain the money which belongs to these people and not pay interest on it? Would a private individual do so? It is true there was no legal trust set up, but the very word "reparations" and the language that my hon. friend the Secretary of State this afternoon referred to, namely the injuries and the wrongs done to the civil population, indicate that this money—as indeed it was—was paid by Germany for one purpose, to discharge at least in part the damages that were done to the civil population by reason of the war. There seems to be no doubt about it on the part of all the members of this house. The hon. member for Cartier said three years ago the government recognized that principle; the opposition of that day said, you have not ample evidence before you to warrant you taking this step; the hon. member for Vancouver Centre pointed out very distinctly aand clearly that fact; Sir Henry Drayton in his observations pointed out that it was late in the session and it should not be done. The right hon. leader of the opposition pointed out further that the money belonged to the state and they could do with it as they pleased. I say I am not discussing the legal rights; I never have. I have conceded always, so far as the state is concerned, that the obligation of parliament is not an obligation that can be measured in terms of exact contract. But the money was reparations money to repair the wrongs done to a civil population—not injuries suffered in the field, not defeats suffered on sea or land, but injuries done to the civil population through the war. The men who lost their fishing smacks, the men who lost their nets, the men who lost their boats, the women whose husbands were lost at sea—all these are losses of the civil population for which Germany, being responsible for the war, has paid a sum of money into the treasury of this country. These are losses which the civil population suffered and for which Germany, having been responsible for the war, has paid money into the treasury, and I think it ill becomes any Minister of Finance, whether it be the present incumbent of the office or some other, to state to this house that he will depart from the principle under which such moneys are paid. That principle is that such moneys shall be available to rectify the wrongs and injuries done the civil population of the country in consequence of the war. My hon. friend from Cartier and the Secretary of State take this attitude: they say that what this house thinks this house will do. That is a very fair attitude to take because, as has been pointed out, the wrongs were suffered not by one class of people alone; they were not suffered only by members who supported the administration, although one member is concerned in the net result. But not one member of parliament or two, not Liberals or Conservatives, are to be considered as such in dealing with the matter. That is not the point. Those who suffered these wrongs were citizens of Canada, and Germany has paid a sum of money to repair those wrongs, that sum of money being known as reparations.

Now since we are all agreed in that respect —members on the right as well as those on the left—then let us see to it that we express unanimously the desire that the Secretary of State should amend this legislation. He cannot do it in this resolution inasmuch as he must introduce a new resolution if he intends to increase the amount and secure the approval of His Excellency the Governor General. But if he cannot meet the situation without the introduction of a new resolution he can, as has been indicated, place in the supplementary estimates, if the Minister of Finance will enable him to do so, a sum sufficient to pay these claims; and that amount should represent the sum total of all the claims which the Minister of Justice and the law officers of the crown believe are proper claims, fully established upon testimony taken by the commissioner and upon which he has reported. Last year it was thought desirable perhaps that a judge should review the findings. Now, I take it, the administration has reviewed the findings as it thought best and concluded, for reasons that must be ample to it, whether or not these claims should be paid; and I assume that although there may be some doubt as to the soundness of the judgment in some cases, or as to whether the evidence has sufficiently made good particular claims, with respect to most of the claims there can be no question that they should be paid and paid in full. The fact that a man's claim is large does not differentiate it in principle from a small claim. If it be a great corporation that has lost money, it is as much the money of the shareholders as is the money claimed by the man who lost a suit of clothes and his trunk in the Lusitania, for which a sum as small as £100 has been awarded. These, however, are mere details; the principle is that the money, having been paid by Germany to repair the wrongs suffered by the civil population, and that money being now available in the treasury of the country, should be paid for the purpose for which it was intended and was received. This was clearly recognised by the former government as well as by the present administration, and for that reason I submit we should all unite and urge upon the Secretary of State that the claims be paid in full. It is not sufficient at this late date to say that mere expressions of acquiescence in the will of parliament should govern the matter. I urge that it is no satisfactory disposition of the question to pay the claims without interest. I wish to impress that upon the minister.

I would point out to the Minister of Justice that the very bill we have been considering in the last few days, the bill arising out of the Winnipeg strike, is one which has appeared and reappeared on the order paper, in the estimates and elsewhere—and why? Because those interested were encouraged that if they pressed long enough they would get something. Similarly, in the matter of these reparations, unless we satisfactorily dispose of it there is going to be, as the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has observed, a persistent effort on the part of constituents to press their claims. Those who support the present administration will bring pressure to bear, and that pressure will become stronger and stronger, the necessity becoming probably greater as it did in 1926, and consequently promises will be more apt to be made than would be the case if the matter were finally settled in a satisfactory manner. When the pressure becomes too great you will once more have recourse to parliament. Let us be done with it; let us treat the matter on a broad, generous scale, as it was intended that we should. Here is the money, here are the claims; let us pay those claims and pay them in full. Let us say to those who have been out of their money all these years that we will compensate them with the money, the use of which we have had; because once we recognize these claims we must, it seems to me, also recognize the fact that, having had the use of money belonging to these claimants we should pay for it, the money being a commodity which we have kept from them.

What did the Minister of Finance do with respect to those who had automobiles in storage? What about the budget of Sir Henry Drayton which affected adversely the interests of men who had automobiles in stock? That was under the government of Mr. Meighen, when Sir Henry Drayton was Minister of Finance. He passed a measure which adversely affected a certain number of automobile dealers and it was thought that compensation would not be paid. Yet on one occasion an amount was included in the estimates to cover the matter. But in this case we have money provided by a third party and passing through this conduit pipe of parliament—money made available for Smith, Jones and other beneficiaries entitled to it, and which has earned interest in the banks and elsewhere. We have used that money and I submit that without question it should be used now to liquidate with interest these claims as found by the tribunal created by the government. I say that these claims should be paid with interest from the date fixed by the commissioner who investigated them.

Mr. ILSLEY: As one of the Liberal members from the province of Nova Scotia I wish to place myself on record in this matter. I am in accord, I may say at the outset, with the conclusions to which the leader of the opposition has come. I believe that the claims of civilian claimants which have been established before the various commissioners should be paid in full, and paid this session, and should all be paid and with interest.

But, Mr. Chairman, I must dissent from some of the observations which the leader of the opposition has made especially in reference to the argument put forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Cartier. I have before me the debate of June 19, 1925, in which Mr. Meighen, then leader of the Conservative party, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and some others participated; and when the leader of the opposition would have the committee believe that Mr. Meighen's only objection was that the matter had not come before parliament, or that some of the claims had not been adjudicated upon, I submit that he is leaving a wrong impression on the house. I wish to read a few sentences from the speech of Mr. Meighen in 1925. It is to be found at page 4519 of Hansard of that date, at the bottom of the first column:

> I want to say now, I doubt very much if special claims for damages due to the war are in priority to the state itself—the damage of the state. Reparations are not paid in respect of the special damage of the individuals of a country; they are paid in respect of the damage of the nation itself. Now this government asks us to take the dictum of the late Hon. William Pugsley, grant the priority of claims that he has allowed, pay the money out—money paid to Canada as reparations of the war—to these claimants, and lose the whole of it so far as the general taxpayer is concerned.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That was read this afternoon; we can all hear.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was the principle laid down then.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It has been read once

Mr. ILSLEY: I am going to read it again, even if it has been read once, and I am going to make two or three observations with reference to it. The principle underlying Mr. Meighen's objection in 1925 was that if these claims were paid in full the money would be lost so far as the general taxpayer was concerned. He goes on to say:

> These vast sums are all to be paid to individuals. And more—because no doubt these seven or eight millions are just a beginning—we are called upon to decide to-day what course we are going to take as to the whole career of this thing. As for me, I am firmly against it from the beginning. I will protest against its passing, this session in particular.

I am free to say that the reasons given in some of the other speeches, particularly those delivered by Sir Henry Drayton and by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre are not these reasons, but the then leader of the Conservative party placed on record his objection to the step which we are now being asked by the opposition to take, and the objection was that if these claims were paid in full the money would be taken out of the pockets of the general taxpayers. I hope I have made that clear. The hon. member for Cartier points out that only a few moments ago the present leader of the opposition said that while the language used by Mr. Meighen at that time was a little different, his sentiments were the same and he concurred in Mr. Meighen's conclusions.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the leader of the opposition repeat what he did say?

Mr. BENNETT: Hansard will show it in the morning.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I am glad Hansard will show what the leader of the opposition said.

Mr. ERNST: And Hansard will also show what the hon. member for Hants-Kings has not said on any previous occasion.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not previously spoken on the question; there was no reason for my doing so. However, I am glad the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg brought up that point. This afternoon the Secretary of State approached this matter in a very conciliatory way; he invited the fullest discussion from all parties in the house and he intimated the willingness of the government to place in the supplementary estimates an amount to meet these claims in full if the general opinion of the house was in favour of such procedure. If I had been a member of the opposition, after listening to that statement I would not have indulged in a very extreme, violent and partisan speech such as we heard from the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, this afternoon and which I was very much surprised to hear. The hon. member said that his party or he himself, as I gathered, had forced the government to adopt this position. I want to say that not in 1925, not last year and not up to the present time have we known the attitude of the opposition in regard to this matter.

An hon. MEMBER: What about last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will deal with last year.

An hon. MEMBER: Read all the speeches.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have read the speeches during the dinner recess, and I was surprised at their contents. In the first place, what was the resolution moved by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg?

An hon. MEMBER: Read them all.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will my hon. friends please keep quiet for a moment? I would like to read the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg last year, and I ask hon. members to remember the attitude taken by the hon. member and by the leader of the opposition to-night, which is that the opposition have been in favour of payment in full of these claims, and still take that position. Here is the amendment:

> That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "This house regrets the refusal of the government to introduce legislation at the present session of parliament providing for the payment in full or in part of the various sums fixed by James Friel, Esquire, K.C., a commissioner apointed under the Inquiries Act, as losses sustained by the civilian population of Canada during the great war."

There is nothing in that resolution about paying all the claims in full. It says in full or in part.

Mr. ERNST: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: Just wait till I finish. I have been invited to read the speeches which were delivered last year, and I wish to say that the only request made then was that the government pay the smaller claims. In the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, I find the following:

> It may be that in some of the large claims—I understand there are one or two of over a million dollars—time should be taken to scrutinize them carefully. If there are such cases, by all means scrutinize them with the greatest of care. . .

What for, if they are to be paid in full?

> ...no one objects to that; but we do object to the holding up of claims by individuals who are suffering privation while the government coolly takes time to look into these other matters.

In other words, "Pay the small claims but not necessarily the large ones." That was the entire request last year, to pay the small claims. At page 3205 of Hansard for last year we have the leader of the opposition saying:

> Mr. Rinfret: Does my hon. friend take the stand that the report should be considered as final?
> Mr. Bennett: The report is final so far as this commissioner is concerned; he is through. But whether or not it should be final so far as the government is concerned depends, it seems to me, upon the amount involved.

In other words, at that time the opposition were not prepared to accept the findings of the commissioner as final; that is, they were not prepared to pay the claims in full as determined by the commissioner. Later on in the same speech, at page 3206, I find the following:

> But the point is that the smaller claims should be disposed of. Whatever the government might consider just in the way of a partial payment on account of the larger claims, I submit that the smaller claims should be dealt with at once; because after all, when men lose their all, by act of war, and they know that a fund has been provided by the enemy to pay that liability, it only makes for dissatisfaction when that money is withheld from year to year.

So it was with great satisfaction that I heard the unequivocal declaration of the leader of the opposition to-night, a declaration which has not been made before on behalf of the opposition, aithough my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg purported to speak for them this afternoon. I was glad to hear the leader of the opposition say he was in favour of paying all these claims in full, with interest, at once.

What he says as to there being no real distinction between the large claims and the small claims is perfectly correct. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough pointed out this afternoon that the smaller vessels are owned in shares, and that each of the shareholders who suffered a loss was entitled to file and did file an individual claim, whereas certain larger ships were owned by incorporated companies and the claim of the company is dealt with as a whole. So if the large claims are not paid in full the shareholders of the large companies will be prejudiced or discriminated against. In the part of Nova Scotia from which I come I know there is a fairly large number of shareholders in these larger companies; many of them are not in affluent circumstances, and they would feel that they were very greatly and very unjustly discriminated against if the government paid their claims to the extent of only 10 per cent while at the same time they paid an individual claim to the extent of 100 per cent.

If, as I believe is the case, the members on both sides of the house are now in accord as to the procedure which should be followed in adjusting this matter, I feel that the resolution should be altered in order to provide for the payment of about $4,000,000 in addition to the $2,500,000 mentioned in the resolution in order to satisfy the claims in full with interest.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask a question of the minister in connection with a point in this discussion which was under consideration during the debate of February 26. Article 232 of the Versailles treaty reads, in part, as follows:

> The allied and associated governments, however, require, and Germany undertakes, that she will make compensation for all damage done to the civilian population of the allied and associated powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an allied or associated power against Germany by such aggression by land, by sea and from the air, and in general damage as defined in annex 1 hereto.

Section 9 of annex 1 reads as follows:

(9) Damage in respect of all property wherever situated belonging to any of the allied or associated states or their nationals, with the exception of naval and military works or materials, which has been carried off, seized, injured or destroyed by the acts of Germany or her allies on land, on sea or from the air, or damage directly in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war.

I read these two paragraphs to point out to the minister that by a treaty to which Canada's name is appended an obligation is placed upon this country with respect to the moneys which we received from Germany, and I submit that there is created not only a moral obligation on the part of Canada in relation to her nationals but also a legal obligation, because the very wording of the treaty makes the contributions of Germany payable to the nationals of this country.

I rise to make this point and to ask the minister a question upon it. If there is in any sense a legal claim on the part of a claimant, or if there are principles of law involved on the part of any claimant, and the commissioner, either through lack of judgment or lack of knowledge of the law, or for any other reason, has failed to give justice to the claimant, I consider that the claimant should have the right of appeal to a court which could properly determine the question, just as the right of appeal prevails with respect to the administration of justice in all our courts. My question is this: As the minister has had time to consider the matter following the previous discussion, is it his intention to provide for a right of appeal with respect to the claims which have been turned down, where good cause for appeal can be shown?

Mr. RINFRET: In reply to the hon. member I will say that this question is very much along the same lines as the question of interest, which was mentioned this afternoon. It was decided that this matter would not be settled finally until it was decided whether we would pay the awards in full, but we have given consideration to the matter. There are instances where Commissioner Pugsley had practically rendered his judgment but the cases have been revised by Commissioner Friel. There are other cases, either dismissed or an award granted, which might possibly be reviewed with advantage by a judge. I am not willing to admit the legal right which my hon. friend stresses; in fact I was stopped this afternoon from making my point by the response of the other side of the house that the moral right was admitted. Even on moral grounds I think we should act with as much equity as possible, and although the bill does not contain any clause with reference to appeals, I am quite willing to discuss that feature when the bill is in committee and possibly make a proposal which will cover the matter.

I invited a very full discussion of this matter and I do not want to stifle it, but the house as a whole seems to be in favour of this resolution inasmuch as it is not considered as being final. I would submit that we might possibly report the resolution and allow the bill to be introduced and the matter could be discussed on the second reading. If it is proposed by the government that additions be made, either in committee or later on by way of supplementary estimates, I would be in a position to make a declaration.

Mr. SPENCE: Mr. Chairman, the hon. minister has said that this matter should be allowed to proceed until it reaches the second reading of the bill, but we would like to know what he is going to do. As far as I am concerned, I am not very well satisfied. He has not as yet promised to pay the interest, and I think an honourable government should carry out its agreement after a commissioner has heard the cases of the claimants and awarded certain sums of money to individuals who have suffered both on the water and on the land. I have received many pathetic letters from different parts of Canada which give the views of many people as to the conduct of this government. It is too bad that so much time of the house is taken up by hon. members on the government benches continually rehashing the days which have passed. The whole business world has been reformed since the war; the man who did not change his methods has no business to-day, and I hope the government will forget the past and let us legislate for the future. The guilty party is on that side, as a rule. I am satisfied that the right thinking people of Canada are behind this proposition and will heartily support the payment of the awards with interest. This party has never prevented the government from carrying out any honourable act and we advocate strongly that these payments be made. I have in mind a particular case I might mention, that of a gentleman who lives up in the north end of my old riding. He went overseas and was taken prisoner. His case was tried and he was awarded $4,000, but since that time he has struck nothing but hard luck. Had that man received the $4,000 when it was awarded to him it would have put him in business and would have been worth far more to him than it will be to-day, because his health is breaking down.

Even though the bill is passed this session we do not we do not know when the claims will be paid. It may not be for ten years, and by that time many of the claimants will have died. When the bill comes down to the house it should be understood just when the claims will be paid.

Another case I might mention is that of a man who has borrowed $966 from the Reverend J. D. Gibson. He has had a wonderful record; a son who enlisted at fourteen years of age—of course he told them he was nineteen—went to the war, and came back blinded.

Here is another case of a man in Winnipeg. He went down with the Lusitania. He was an electrical engineer but has never been able to do any work since his return, as his health is gone. He was awarded $8,850, and if that had been paid to him at the time he could have gone into business and would have been able to do something for himself. He is getting old and feeble and in a few years he will be gone and no one will be getting anything in relation to that claim. I believe in doing something now. Give the people flowers when they are alive—not thorns, as this government is trying to do all the time.

The next case is that of a lady with three daughters living at 16 Inglewood drive. They were on the Lusitania, and she has been awarded $5,680. This is what she says:

> If these claims, which have been passed by the government's own commission, are to be denied it is surely the cruelest piece of deception which a government could conceive—

I think the same, because I believe the government, after they have received this money from Germany, are in honour bound to pay it out. There is no reason why they should put it into some other melting pot or spend it in some other way. This lady says also:

> —besides being a waste of public funds which the government now seems to be so desirous of conserving.

This is a lady in distress. I have another case of a person who is getting on in years. An award of $1,000 was made, but nothing has been paid.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. SPENCE: It will be carried when I say so. I just want to point out that these are sad cases. These people should have had the money long ago when it would have done them more good without interest than it would now with interest. I think the government are really waiting until half of these people die. Here is another case, affecting people who used to live in Toronto but who now live in Vancouver. It is a case of great hardship where a lady is suffering. She is awarded only $1,400. I am not asking that the big claims be paid in full, but I contend that claims up to $15,000 should be paid in full with interest. The government are in honour bound to do this and I hope at the next sitting they will change their minds in regard to the payment of interest on these small claims and will bring in a bill to cover the situation.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am interested in this question from the point of interest of quite a number of my constituents, both private parties and corporations. I listened this afternoon with scant patience and a good deal of indignation to the pussyfooting speech of the hon. the Secretary of State. This matter has been before the government for ten years. Ten years ago the then Secretary of State introduced a resolution into this house providing for payment on reparations account.

Mr. RINFRET: It was only three years ago, not ten years ago. I do not want to be alluding to that all the time, but I may say that it was a resolution that was put forward tentatively by the government and withdrawn.

Mr. CANTLEY: It was introduced in June, 1919, ten years ago, lacking one month, by the then Secretary of State.

Mr. RINFRET: June, 1925.

Mr. CANTLEY: No, it was in June, 1919. Is that not ten years ago lacking one month? What therefore is my hon. friend talking about?

Mr. RINFRET: If my hon. friend will allow me—

Mr. CANTLEY: I allowed my hon. friend this afternoon to talk a great deal of what I considered nonsense. His predecessor in June, 1919, introduced a resolution and I will read its terms.

Mr. RINFRET: It was in 1925.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister's predecessor.

Mr. RINFRET: We are not talking about the same thing.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not referring to the minister; I am talking about certain actions of his predecessor. The resolution was to provide that reparation payments should be turned over to the Secretary of State by the Minister of Finance and——that the Secretary of State should, on receipt of such payments, from time to time disburse the same to persons found entitled to claims for reparation in the commissioner's report, by way of pro rata dividend.

That was withdrawn.

Mr. RINFRET: I regret to rise again just to put the thing straight. That was moved by the Hon. Mr. Copp in 1925.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It was moved in 1919 almost before the hon. member was born or got any knowledge.

Mr. RINFRET: There was a resolution moved by the Hon. Mr. Copp in 1925.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is another one. Get back to the facts. This was moved in 1919.

Mr. RINFRET: My hon. friend is rehashing the past. I was trying to deal with the present.

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister is only making matters worse. Apparently there were two occasions on which the government came to a decision that the money ought to be paid. The minister wasted a great deal of time this afternoon on the same subject. The money is not yet paid over and nobody on this side of the chamber knows whether the government are going to pay in full now or not. Germany admitted that they were not able to pay all the losses occasioned by the war, but they said they would pay the losses occasioned to the civilian populations of the countries involved, and they have already contributed a very large amount for that purpose. This government has received over $21,500,000 which they hold plus a good deal of accumulated interest as from the date of the first payment, but nothing has been paid out yet. Hundreds of people in Nova Scotia and elsewhere in Canada have suffered and suffered severely for a long time. Some of the original sufferers are dead; many of them are in want. But the government insists, I think wrongfully, on withholding from those people money which should be paid to them on account of those losses. Germany paid that money on one account and one only; the government took that money from Germany, and if they do not pay it over to the people who sustained the losses, either they are guilty of taking money from Germany on false pretences or they are defrauding parties in this country who are entitled to those amounts—one or the other. I have scant respect for the idea that this money belongs to the state, come from what source it may. If the government cannot deal justly with money that comes into their hands for a specific purpose, then woe betide the country.

As regards the question of interest, the government have held this money for years. They have either spent the interest or saved it; it is immaterial which. The people to whom the awards were made by the government's own commissioners after evidence taken and inquiries made, are entitled to the payment not only of the amount awarded by the commissioners appointed by the government, but to the interest. As to that there is no possible doubt. I am at a loss to understand why this or any other government should insist on keeping in the treasury money which does not belong to them, and which they received for a specific purpose and which is due people who are and have been in needy circumstances for many years.

I apprehend that probably the present intention of the minister although it has not yet been disclosed, is to now vote a portion of the amount. Certainly that was his intention when he brought down the resolution in the first place. I anticipate now, from the hedging which has been exhibited in the house this afternoon, that he intends later to bring down a bill providing for the payment of the balance. I suggest to him that it would be better for him, better for his government and better for the well-being and honour of the Dominion of Canada that he should pay the full amount this year rather than next year immediately prior to a coming election. If he will take my advice in that matter, he will act accordingly. I only regret that I am not able to put this matter as effectively as I should like to. My leader has however, ably done so, and I again appeal to the government and to the minister to deal with this matter as they would deal with it if it were a matter in their own private business. We are sometimes told that members of the House of Commons coming here are sometimes not actuated by the best of motives. I repudiate that idea, which however the action of the government as outlined by the minister this afternoon goes far to give colour to. If the minister persists in the attitude which he has so far adopted a good many people in this country will have occasion to blaspheme.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would ask the hon. Secretary of State to take into consideration the real mind of this parliament, and I suggest that because he has shown himself disposed not to put a limit upon the amount but rather to offer opportunity to increase it. I am familiar myself with many cases of hardship, and I think that nothing else will do but paying the full amount of these claims according to the judgments that have been given. The people of Canada will not be satisfied with less. You cannot pay just a certain percentage, 20 per cent or 50 per cent; you cannot single out some and deny others; you cannot make a choice between those who can afford to do without the awards and those who cannot. In a matter of this kind the full amount of the claim has to be reckoned. As the hon. gentleman who preceded me said, in 1919 the attitude then taken was to recognize these claims and to pay them. The Secretary of State says that it is an ex gratia payment. So it is in law. None of these private individuals would have a lawsuit against Germany; that is well understood, but that money has been paid in respect of a specific application, and I say it would be fraud on the part of this country if these claims were not recognized.

An automobile accident takes place. The father is in the car with his child. Both are injured. The father is awarded so much for himself and so much for his child. The child cannot take the money but his claim is paid; it is an ex gratia payment if you like, but who would say that the father could appropriate that money to himself? He is not allowed to touch a cent of it. So I say when this money has been given to Canada for a specific purpose, why should the Dominion of Canada say how that money should be spent? Why apply it to the consolidated revenue fund? Why should the government say: We are going to make a payment for which we should be complimented, if we recompense in part those who have suffered? Let me tell the Secretary of State that the people of Canada will never be satisfied unless the specific money has the specific application which it was intended to have, and I am satisfied that the people of this country will say that those who have suffered damages should be recompensed according to the judgments handed down.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I am interested in the resolution which is before the committee because there are a few reparation claims in the province of Prince Edward Island now waiting to be adjusted. I think the viewpoint that has been expressed from the different parts of the house should convince the hon. Secretary of State that something further should be done before the matter is finally disposed of. I am sure that we are pleased at the attitude taken by the Secretary of State to-day, because I think we can read between the lines and see that he is ready to amend this legislation to meet as far as possible the views of the different sections of the house. I believe that in doing so he is acting wisely. I feel sure that unless this matter is dealt with in a way that will appeal to the claimants and also be approved by the people of the country generally, it will not be settled satisfactorily.

The bill provides for the settlement of some fourteen hundred claims. There are only a few others, no doubt large ones, but I think possibly the government would be well advised to endeavour to take care of them also.

My main object in rising at this stage is to advocate the payment of interest in connection with these claims. There are different reasons, and I think good reasons, that can be advanced in favour of that course. One is that the government has had this money for some time, and as has already been stated, the money has been earning interest for the government, so the government would not be much out of pocket if they paid the interest on these claims. Another reason, and I think it is perhaps a stronger one, is this: We are now acknowledging these claims. If we acknowledge these claims I contend that we are admitting the principle that that money has been held by the government in trust for the different claimants, and if the money has been so held by the government, it is in duty bound to pay interest on the claims.

The question next arises as to the date from which interest should begin. That is a very material matter to the claimants, because if you will read over the different claims you will find that a great many different dates have been stated. I have in mind two claims one of which I am interested in. Both these parties lost properties on the same date in 1918. The claims were adjusted by the same man, but he recommended that interest be paid in the one case from 1918, and in the other only from 1923. That is a matter that will have to be looked into very carefully before the money is paid over. I observe that the United States has admitted the payment of interest on all claims from the one date, from September 16, 1928. I do not know whether the claimants in Canada would be satisfied with a settlement of that kind—I do not think they would; but I think possibly the government could arrive at a decision to pay interest on all the claims from a certain date. That is a position which the government could very well take, and it is one to which not much objection could be taken. We should approach this matter not in any spirit of party recrimination or fault-finding. The minister has shown his willingness to meet the views of the house, and I think we can trust him to do so. I am highly pleased with the attitude he has taken to-night. I feel that nothing that the government has done this session will be received in the country with more enthusiasm and more appreciation than its settlement of these claims. We have settled other claims in this parliament. We settled the claim of the automobile dealers who were asking for a refund some years ago; the Home bank depositors had their claims dealt with, and only to-day we passed a bill providing compensation for the postal workers in western Canada. I think therefore that the house would be well advised to go as far as we possibly can in adjusting these claims and making a clean job of the matter. Let us provide the money and the interest, and let the interest be fixed to run from a certain date, and then I think that the people will thank the government and the members who advocated this measure.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I did not intend to take any part in this discussion, but sitting here and listening to the debate I have been deeply impressed with the injustice of the attitude which the government takes towards these claimants, these unfortunate people who are suffering because of the non-payment of debts that are due them fairly and honestly, and which the government holds the money to settle. I look upon it as nothing more nor less than misappropriation of funds. The payments were put off for a commission to examine the claims. The commission reported long ago, and yet we are told "Oh, well, these claims are not going to be paid; we want the use of this money a little longer." This is in line with the record of this government in connection with the Duncan report and with the fisheries commission. They appoint these commissions and then they take no action on their reports. I say to the government to-night that if the Duncan commission report is not fully implemented, and if the other commissions' reports are not dealt with, there will be another maritime rights agitation. and the government will be compelled by public opinion to take action, as they were compelled when they appointed the Duncan commission. I warn the government that will be the procedure in the maritime provinces, and if we cannot get what we are entitled to by a fair and moderate appeal, we will force the government to give us our just rights.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rinfret thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 285 to provide for the payment of claims for compensation for loss sustained by the civil population of Canada during the late war.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Care of patients and medical examination of pensioners, $2,600,000.

The CHAIRMAN: Vote 232, page 63 of the estimates.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Chairman, I desire to direct my remarks to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. King) with regard to this vote. The minister, of course, is perfectly well aware that the Department of Health was created in 1919 for several specific purposes, the more important of which have not been carried out by the department. The main activities of the department since that date have been generally in connection with various kinds of work which were formerly done by other departments. Those works were of importance in themselves, but they were very efficiently administered by other departments before the health department was brought into existence at all. In themselves they did not constitute a real cause for the organization of a department of health, and as a matter of fact they were not considered a reason for the creation of that department, but were simply thrown in, I might say, as ballast.

The conditions existing after the war had something to do with the creation of a health department. The control of venereal disease, the coordination of health activities of the provinces into a unit, and the establishment of a bureau of scientific research with regard to health, were the real basic reasons for the creation of a health department. Since that time it has not in any way attempted to implement the basic purposes for which it was created in 1919. So far as the control of venereal disease is concerned the department apparently thought they had done their duty when they relegated the matter to the provincial departments of health and gave them $100,000 a year to be distributed pro rata to population. Not even on the question of immigration, where large numbers of people were coming into this country, did the department attempt to control this disease or to find out those suffering from it, although the department must have known quite well that in the free clinics of our various hospitals 60 per cent of those asking for free treatment for the disease were members of our foreign population. Scarcely anything was done to keep out that class of people; the only class they attempted to exclude were those suffering from syphilis.

In so far as coordination of the various health activities of the provinces is concerned, nothing was done but to appoint a Dominion council of health. That council was constituted of men eminent in the medical profession and in other walks of life, representing the departments of health in the various provinces and certain departments of the government as well as outside societies. I think the council was constituted of about fifteen members, but they were practically crippled in their efforts to do anything in relation to public health. They were earnest and desirous of doing something for the public health of Canada, but they were not given any facilities or any means by which they could carry any project to a successful conclusion. Consequently they confined their efforts to giving advice.

So far as the real basic reason for establishing the health department is concerned, that is, the bringing about of a bureau of scientific research, not even has it been spoken of so far as I know by any official of the department or by any member of the government. Since the day of the organization of the department nothing has been done in any way to establish a bureau of scientific research. I know the government has a laboratory of hygiene upon which a few thousands each year have been spent, but that has nothing whatever to do with scientific research. I do not wish to minimize the benefit of even the laboratory of hygiene, I think it has done fairly good work in looking after the purity of food, standardizing drugs, and also in analyzing patent and proprietary medicine. It has done some work of that kind; but with regard to the establishment of scientific research nothing has been done at all. I do not need to tell the minister, because he knows it himself, that the establishment of a real research institute properly equipped and manned would be one of the best agencies for the promotion of good health in Canada that could be had. He knows that it would be a centre around which the activities of the various provinces would revolve, and it would create in Ottawa a health department which would be an asset to the country instead of a liability. It would be a sort of clearing house for health information and would help to coordinate the activities of the various health departments in the provinces which are now doing good work. I am of the opinion that the establishment of a scientific research bureau is the one thing needed to coordinate the efforts of the various health departments of the nation into a unit which would perform a splendid service in the Dominion. There are many and substantial reasons why the government should take this matter into serious consideration at the earliest opportunity in the future and establish a bureau of scientific research.

The greatest asset of a country is its people, and the greatest asset of a people is good health. There is no doubt on that score. Good health gives a vigorous body, a sound mind and great mental activity, with initiative, resourcefulness and ability and courage to carry projects into effect. These attributes of body and mind are influenced by many factors, some of them natural and others under our control. Professor Fisher of Yale, making a demand for a scientific health institute in the United States, made the statement that the future belongs to the nation that has the greatest inventive genius. I think that is correct, but I would go further and say that, other things being equal, the future belongs to the nation that keeps the health of its people up to the highest standard. Mr. Hoover, making a speech in the city of New York only a short time ago, said that we were entering a period of increased competition from the reconstructed nations of Europe. That is quite correct; everyone will agree with it; and I might go further and say that increased population and the increased propagation of scientific knowledge and methods will increase competition still further, so that only those nations that are alive to the necessity of a vigorous citizenship will be able to take leadership or maintain it. Canada should have little difficulty in doing this because nature has endowed us with two of the main contributing factors. Nature has given us a splendid climate in a north temperate zone, a climate which is conducive to strong, vigorous and mentally active people. We have the nucleus of that people now, and Professor McLennan of Toronto university, when he appeared before the special committee on industrial research, made this statement with regard to our people:

> Canadians have an intellect, a freshness of mind, a virility, a broad outlook and a resourcefulness not excelled in any country in the world.

I think most hon. members in this house will agree with that statement. Again, we have a country teeming with natural resources of such a wide variety that we have the raw material for almost every kind of industry; and having the people there is no reason in the world why we should not forge ahead with great strides towards leadership amongst the nations. But, Mr. Chairman, great natural resources are of little use if the people have not the intelligence and energy enough to make use of them. Large areas of agricultural land are useful and valuable just in proportion to the quality and the extent of cultivation. Great mineral resources are valueless if they are left buried in the ground. It needs a healthy, energetic people to turn these resources into wealth. I say, therefore, that we in Canada are neglecting the greatest asset this country has. Are we going to continue in our present haphazard methods with regard to these conditions that exist to-day? We should give direction from the city of Ottawa to the health activities of the whole Dominion. The one thing needed to weld these various activities into an efficient whole that would give proper service is a bureau of scientific research in health, a bureau which would bring the brightest scientific minds in the medical profession into this city, giving them the facilities which would enable them to undertake research in the cure and prevention of disease. I do not think anyone in this chamber could estimate the value to the Dominion of Canada of a cure and preventive for the flu, or influenza, or even a common cold. It would be impossible to estimate the benefits that would accrue to mankind; you could not compute it in dollars and cents. It is beyond human computation. Yet that is something that will be found in the future, and it should be our duty at least to make an attempt in this Dominion to solve that problem. It is estimated that the deaths from flu in 1918 were many times greater than the number of deaths caused by the Great war. Senator Copeland, at one time Minister of Health in New York, said that the deaths caused by influenza in 1918 exceeded the deaths caused by all the wars of history. I should not care to go to that extent, but I am satisfied that the number was very large indeed. Professor Fisher of Yale university made an estimate of the economic loss to the United States in a single year from loss in wages due to preventable illness and premature deaths, and he placed that loss at fifteen billions of dollars. If that estimate is right as regards the United States, then the loss in Canada annually from the same cause amounts to between a billion and a billion and a half. Surely it is worth while on behalf of the people of this country for us to take such steps as we may to prevent such losses year by year.

The Great war stimulated medical and scientific research. It has been well said that necessity is the mother of invention, and the unusual difficulties with which the medical forces of the world armies were faced during the war stimulated them to find remedies to meet the various cases with which they had to deal. In all the previous wars of history disease carried off many times more soldiers than were killed by the enemy, but the Great war was a signal vindication of medical science. The war could not have been carried on but for the advances which have been made in medical and sanitary science during the last twenty-five years. Disease and pestilence would have decimated the armies if they had not been able to avail themselves of these discoveries.

Typhoid fever always has been the great scourge of war. During the South African war, in which only 200,000 men were engaged; 80 men died from typhoid to every 20 men who died from their wounds. There were over 60,000 cases of typhoid fever, with 8,227 deaths. During the Great war ten times that number of men were engaged in the British army; they were engaged in the field for four and a half years, yet during that time there were only 4,571 cases of typhoid fever with a mortality of 1.3 per cent. Through the advance of medical science the ratio of deaths from disease and deaths due to enemy bullets was reversed; 20 men died from disease to 80 men who died from wounds, and one writer has gone so far as to say that 95 per cent of the deaths in the Great war resulted from wounds and only 5 per cent from disease. The victory over typhoid fever was the greatest success of the war, and it was brought about by the use of a preventive serum and by sanitation, as far as that could be carried out.

Another great success of the war was the victory over tetanus. The medical corps of the different armies were very much exercised over the dangers which might exist in the highly cultivated soil of Flanders and France, which contained a large amount of fertilizer; it was realized that the soil would be teeming with the bacillus of tetanus. A serum had been developed previous to the war but had not been thoroughly tested; it was brought into use, and the results were wonderful. Tetanus was practically eliminated as a cause of death during the Great war.

Malaria has been stated by one writer to have been the cause of the fall of Rome and the decadence of Greece. Malaria took a hand in the Great war; on the Macedonian and Mesopotamian fronts malaria was a more formidable enemy than the Bulgarian or Turkish troops. The mortality from that cause was very high; many men were invalided home and it cost the British government millions of pounds in after years to bring these men back to any degree of health, and many of them are still suffering from a recurrence of the disease. The campaign on the Gallipoli front was a failure because of malaria and dysentery among the troops. dysentery both of the amoebic and bacillary varieties. There was no real remedy at that time for these two diseases, which were mainly caused by the large number of flies in that hot climate, but before the campaign ended the medical service perfected two remedies which were very effective indeed, and from that time on the deaths were very few in comparison to what they had been previously.

A federal health institute of research has been provided for in the act which was passed in 1919, and all that is required is an amount of money placed in the estimates sufficient to care for the organization of that department. Subsection (a) of section 4 of chapter 24 provides for cooperation with the various health departments of the provinces, while subsection (b) provides for the establishment of a bureau of scientific research. In moving the second reading of the bill Mr. Rowell is reported at page 1171 of Hansard for 1919 as follows:

> —I should think that one of the natural and inevitable developments of a federfal department of health would be a bureau of scientific research in connection with it.

The power is there and, as I have said, the only thing lacking is an amount in the estimates sufficient to provide for the organization of this department. Professor Fisher of Yale, in advocating a health institute in the United States, said:

> The heads of all the leading research bodies and medical organizations testify that the proposed national institute of health will not duplicate their work, but will rather help to focus it better.

I am of opinion that a scientific institute here in Ottawa would focus the health activities of the Dominion and make them very much more effective. Such an institution would be a clearing house for the provinces, particularly with relation to epidemic diseases. At present there is no method by which the various activities of the provinces can be brought together and the information developed in one province communicated to the others. A scientfic research bureau here would accomplish that purpose.

In 1917, when the Military Service Act was enforced, a little over 50 per cent of the men examined were rejected because of disease; of 361,655 men examined 181,225 were rejected. Of those rejected almost 60 per cent were found physically unfit because of preventable diseases. Surely it is a severe indictment of the public health activities of the Dominion of Canada when so many men were found physically unfit because of diseases they should not have had.

A great deal of research work has been done, much of it by private individuals and by our universities in a rather desultory way; many men work by themselves, yet even so a great many discoveries of immense benefit to the world have been made. What is the value of those great discoveries of the past to the people of the world? Jenner discovered a vaccine for smallpox. Can anyone estimate the value of that one discovery? It goes on in increasing volume as the years go by and it will continue throughout the centuries. When a remedy is discovered for a disease the value continues for ever. Pasteur discovered a remedy for hydrophobia. Lister discovered antiseptics which revolutionzed surgery and made it possible to perform surgical operations which otherwise would have proved fatal. Cavities of the body may be invaded and diseased tissue removed with impunity because of that discovery. What is the value to be put upon the discoveries of Simpson and Morton in the matter of anaesthetics? Surgery was revolutionized when the groaning and struggling patient was made to lie quiet while the operation was performed without pain. Banting through his discovery of insulin has done a great deal for people suffering from diabetes. He has lengthened their lives and made them happier. Reed and Carroll discovered the cause of yellow fever and made it possible to complete the Panama canal. Klebs and Loeffler discovered the bacillus of diphtheria and made the first step in the direction of producing a serum which has practically eliminated that loathsome disease which is very fatal to children. Are these discoveries worth anything to the world? No one can estimate their value, and if anyone doubts their value he has only to get one of the diseases and he will realize what it means to him.

There are still many worlds to conquer in the realm of medicine and we should do our share in that regard, and at the same time consolidate our position with regard to the discoveries which have been made in the past. At times such discoveries are not used because of the indifference of public health authorities and the ignorance of the people. I was interested in reading the other day an article by Doctor Rajchman, director of health organizations of the League of Nations, in which he drew attention to the fact that smallpox had not yet been eliminated from the world although we had a very effective remedy in the vaccine discovered by Jenner. Many people have a feeling that the vaccine caused other diseases. He gave a list of the epidemics which have occurred in the last few years, as follows:

Minneapolis	1925
Detroit	1924
Los Angeles	1927
Algeria	1927
Rio de Janiero	1926

He reported that in 1927 there were 280,000 certified cases of smallpox reported in the world, and during that same year 50,000 deaths occurred in India from the same disease. He also reported that the death rates in these epidemics ranged from 10 to 30 per cent. In 1927 there was an epidemic of smallpox in Indiana, which has no compulsory vaccination law. In 1885 there was an epidemic of smallpox in Montreal and Quebec, and 7,000 deaths. In 1884, the previous year, the Ontario Medical Health Act was passed. As soon as the outbreak occurred in Quebec the Ontario health authorities organized 563 local boards of health and appointed 283 medical officers and 160 sanitary inspectors. They enforced compulsory vaccination and the result was that the epidemic was stopped in that province with a loss of only 18 lives. That illustrates what can be done when science is fully organized.

In 1928 the city of Olean, New York, had an epidemic of typhoid fever caused by infected water. Actions were brought against the health department and judgments were granted to the amount of $350,000. Application was made to the state legislature for an enabling act to allow them to issue bonds to pay these damages, and they will be paying for the neglect of their health department for the next twenty years. The city of Albany, New York, has also had judgments rendered against it for the same cause, and I should think the city of Ottawa would take warning. No city I have ever visited had so vile a water supply as this city.

What is being done outside of looking after the human element in the Dominion of Canada? When I consider the estimates for other departments I find that more is being done for them than is being done for the public health of the country. In 1916 the national research council was set up to promote the utilization of our natural resources and to find means of using the waste products from the same, as well as to carry on other duties. This council is composed of some of the most prominent scientists of Canada. The council has given 344 scholarships to 199 persons who have shown special adaptability for scientific research. Young men are being turned out in our universities trained in medical and other sciences, but year after year they go to the United States and the universities of that country are filled with Canadians who have been trained here. They have been forced to take that step because we do not employ them.

We spend millions on agriculture and we have brought it to a very high state of efficiency. The 1930 estimates for this department amount to $8,483,000. Of that amount $2,450,000 is being asked for the health of animals branch, and $1,530,000 for the improvement of live stock. That amount spent upon the public health of Canada would be very acceptable, and would make a very splendid contribution to scientific research.

The estimates of this year include an item of $730,540 for the mines and geological survey. Of that amount $257,000 is for the investigation of mineral resources and deposits, and $363,000 for the geological survey.

We are spending $2,403,000 in an endeavour to make the fishing industry of this country profitable. Of that amount $442,000 is for the culture of fish, $301,000 for scientific and practical work, making a total of $743,000 spent in scientific work for the benefit of the fisheries of this country.

Mr. BENNETT: With very little advantage.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): With very little advantage. As regards immigration we have this year a grant of $1,300,000 for immigration societies, women's hostels, and contingencies and a grant of $1,000,000 for the empire settlement scheme, making a total of $2,300,000 to bring people into this country, and yet we neglect the people we have at home. We do not look after their health and we are losing many of them prematurely because of inactivity in our public health departments. For the health of the people of Canada how much do we spend? This year for the laboratory of hygiene we have an estimate of $150,000; for the control of venereal disease, $100,000, for quarantine, $240,000. Quarantine properly belongs to the Department of Immigration. The appropriation is largely spent in connection with that, although some of it, I am sure, is spent in connection with quarantine stations for other purposes. That makes a total of $490,000 for the health of human beings in Canada. It is surely a reflection on the intelligence of the Dominion parliament that such a situation exists to-day Millions for the health of animals, millions for bringing immigrants into Canada, and millions for mining and fishing, but a paltry five hundred thousand dollars to improve the condition of health of the people.

I do not intend to labour this question much further, but I should like to read what President Hoover has to say with regard to the situation in the United States and his desire for further organization of the health department. In his speech made on March 1 of this year Mr. Hoover says this:

> Public health service should be as fully organized and as universally incorporated into our governmental system as our public education system to-day. The returns are a thousandfold in economic benefits and infinitely more in reduction of suffering and promotion of human happiness.

I direct the attention of the Minister of National Health to these statements and I would say that if next year he will decide to insert in the estimates an amount that will provide a building, equip and man it for the purpose of scientific research in health, the money will be returned to him, not a thousandfold, but many thousandfold, and if in future years they are able to find a remedy and preventive for the flu, the amount spent will return to him so many times over that he will be surprised. I therefore ask the minister to take this matter into his serious consideration and turn the present Health department of the Dominion of Canada, which is now doing some work but which is inefficient and not carrying out the provisions of the Health Act as it was intended by the government and parliament which passed it in 1919, into a real asset to the country so that it will be worthy of his tenure of office.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I supplement what the last speaker has said in his very excellent address by a few statements which I should like to place on the record as appearing in a pamphlet issued by the Canadian Social Hygiene Council, as follows:

> Figures would appear to prove that from 45 to 60 per cent of all disabling illness is of external origin and, therefore, within the possibility of prevention.
> Various authentic estimates would show that 2 to 3 per cent of the total population is continuously ill.
> Of the population of Canada, 30 per cent are adult males; 30 per cent are adult females.
> It is thus estimated that 54,000 adult males are continuously ill. This amount of illness would suggest that in the adult male population alone there are lost each year 16,200,000 working days.
>
> Calculations show that, for every 20 males gainfully employed, there are aproximately 6 females similarly employed. This would suggest that, in addition, the female population loses 4,800,000 working days per year.
> Total loss per year—21,000,000 working days; at least 50 per cent preventable.
> Superfluous loss per year 10,500,000 working days.
> It is important to bear in mind that the resultant cost must be reckoned not only in terms of loss of pay to employees, but also in terms of diminished output, disorganization of industry and other economic results.
> It is estimated that the total cost of illness to the Dominion of Canada per year is $270,000,000, which equals 75 per cent of the total expenditure of the Dominion Government for 1924.

This pamphlet is several years old. There has been little opportunity for discussing this matter and now I do not want to say very much with regard to it. It is most unfortunate that there is no provision in this house for the careful study of an important ques- of this kind. I would venture to suggest that we could not do better than set up a committee on public health that would definitely devote itself to a study of the whole field of public health. Here we come to a Friday evening at nearly 11 o'clock, and this is about the only opportunity we have in the course of the whole session for a discussion of a question of this kind.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): We shall have more.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope we shall, and I think the doctors might well take the lead in this matter. I know the public would respond if they would take the lead in a progressive policy of this kind. While the discussion was going on, I glanced around the chamber and I found there were only thirty members present.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Six on the government side at one time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I noticed nine on the government side when I made my observation, but in any case there were only thirty people in the house for a discussion of an important question of this kind. I can only hope that the medical men in the house will give us a lead, and I am quite sure the public outside will support any reasonable expenditure in connection with public health.

Mr. McGIBBON: I know the minister does not expect to get much through to-night, but I think it is his duty to give the committee a resumé of the doings in his department. I have been in the house for a good many years. I was one who helped to bring the Health Act into existence. With one exception I have never known anything to happen but what has happened to-night; at eleven o'clock on Friday night the estimates of this department have always been brought in. I think this is a reflection upon the intelligence of the house, upon the people of Canada and upon the minister and the government who have for ten years sat in office and have had at their disposal a department which should be a most useful one in this or any other government. I say without contradiction that it has failed in every particular for which it was brought into existence. The minister smiles. On Monday probably I will give him some facts that may change that smile. I remember quite well, when this act was brought down in the old museum, the late Mr. Carvell coming to me afterwards and saying: "McGibbon, you are only making positions for a lot more employees; you are only going to add to the country's expense; you will accomplish nothing." I was shocked that a minister of the crown should make such a statement upon such a subject. I have said before that I was speaking as a prophet, and to-night the voice of history records the accuracy of my prophecy as to the accomplishments of this department, which have been nothing up to the present time. It has been nothing but a bill of expense to the country, and it has failed in every particular to do what it was intended it should do. I intend to have something more to say on this subject on Monday. As it is now five minutes to eleven, I do not suppose the minister expects to get any estimates through to-night, and I think he should come to this house on Monday or whenever the estimates come up again prepared to give parliament and the country some account of his stewardship during the last five or six years. The report which has been handed out by the department is nothing but a catalogue.

Mr. BENNETT: And no bargains in it.

Mr. McGIBBON: No, not for the country. It is simply a rehash of the doings of the mounted police, a reprinting of some reports from the Ontario Department of Health, and other departments of the government; but as to the essential purposes for which the department was created, to look after and improve the health of the people of this country, you can read the report from cover to cover and you will find it is absolutely devoid of imagination or any new suggestions. It is simply a reprint by the department of what has been done in other departments of the government. It makes a show of having a department here that they call a Department of Health, but which has no more to do with health than with mines.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As it is near eleven o-clock I shall not attempt to reply to-night to my hon. friends who have just spoken. I am sure we all enjoyed the excellent review of medicine and medical history given by my hon. friend from Halton. It was especially interesting to those of us who are of the medical profession. This, of course, would not be the time to discuss the matters brought forward by my hon. friend. The vote under consideration is one dealing with the care of patients and the examination of pensioners. Later on we shall come to the estimates to maintain what is known as the Health section.

In regard to this department my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. McGibbon) indicated that as a member of the house at the time he had a great deal to do with the enactment that brought into being the Health department. I shall take occasion to deal with that subject when the estimates of the Health section are under consideration. It is all right for us to say that there is a great field in health measures. That is recognized the world over, but under the practice that has existed in Canada up to the present and as is provided for in the bill, these matters come under the provinces and under the municipalities.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister cite the clause in the British North America Act which states that public health is a provincial matter?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not need to do that. I can cite the section from the Department of Health Act itself.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister said under our constitution.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I said that it had been the practice.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Under the constitution.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not under the constitution; I said in the bill, but it is under the constitution also, and if my hon. friend will take the pains to consult the Justice department he will be so advised. My hon. friends who are complaining in regard to the activities of this department should read the legislation which they say had a great deal to do in improving, bringing into being the Health department. Section 7 of the Department of Health Act says:

Nothing in this act or in any regulations made hereunder shall authorize the minister or any officer of the department to exercise any jurisdiction or control over any provincial or municipal board of health or other health authority operating under the laws of any province.

Mr. ANDERSON: The minister surely does not mean that that applies to a national bureau of research.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is quite different; I was not speaking of that, I shall deal with that later, because we have progressed in the matter of a bureau of research and moneys are being voted this year for the establishment in the city of Ottawa of research laboratories, laboratories which I believe the Health department will be able to utilize for the advantage of the people of Canada.

Mr. McGIBBON: Are these laboratories for fundamental or applied science?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): An arrangement will be made whereby the Department of Health will have the opportunity to carry on scientific investigations in these laboratories.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister said they were in existence.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): If my hon. friend will permit me, I shall speak of that matter later. As I said when I rose, I do not propose to-night to make any extended explanation of these matters, because this is not the time or place. The vote called is the one dealing with the care and treatment of patients, and that means the care and treatment in the departmental hospitals of our men who served overseas.

Mr. BENNETT: Put on the record the story of the various units in which they are lodged and cared for.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Under this vote we provide for the care and maintenance in outside institutions and in mental institutions of the men who served overseas and who suffered disabilities; also for drugs, medical and surgical supplies, and dental treatment and supplies, medical examination and observation of pensioners, manufacture and purchase of orthopedic, ophthalmic and surgical appliances, supplies and repairs, and for the transportation of patients and pensioners.

Under the heading of departmental institutions the expenditure was $797,004.38; in outside hospitals and for doctors, $1,252,661.93; indirect charges, transportation of patients, escorts $50,085.61; funeral expenses $25,673.24; expenses of travelling medical boards $5,062.27; transportation of pensioners $47,576.24, or a total of $128,397.96. The expenditure for limb factory operations was $263,204.22. Altogether the total expenditure was $2,441,268.49.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): As the item is worded it consists of two parts, pensions and health. We are now dealing with the first part, pensions, and in order to save time I would ask the minister to come prepared on Monday or when next his estimates are up to give an account of what has been done by way of reorganization in that department; second, the amount apportioned under this heading to each province. It would save time if the minister would also give the same information with regard to pensions. Third, as to sheltered employment, and fourth, as to the officers who have been retired within the last two years and those who have been added to the staff by provinces, together with the allowances to those who retired.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I shall be glad to gather that information for my hon. friend.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, May 20, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

MONTREAL RAILWAY TERMINALS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I was asked a day or two ago to make such provision as would enable members of the house generally to acquire information respecting the proposals contained in the Montreal terminals bill which has been referred to the railway committee. I wish to announce that models and maps are now in the railway committee room and will be there until Thursday, when the railway committee will meet to consider the matter. It will be appreciated if members generally will avail themselves of the opportunity to secure information regarding the Montreal terminals scheme. Officials will be present to explain any feature to any member desirous of securing that information.

PASSENGER STEAMERS IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. MACDOUGALL:

1. What are the names of the boats which carried passengers and plied between Nova Scotia ports, one or more of which are in Cape Breton island, in 1926, 1927, and 1928?
2. Did the Department of Marine investigate each of such boats in each year to see if it complied with the law?
3. If so, what are the detailed requirements of each of such boats which it investigated, regarding certificated officers, and life equipment, and to what extent did it not comply?
4. If not, what are the names of the boats the department did not investigate in each year?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. According to the records of the marine branch of the Department of Marine and Fisheries the following boats were engaged in the carriage of passengers between or to and from ports in Cape Breton in 1926, 1927, and 1928:—

3. Certified officers—(a) Master—certificate as master of a passenger boat is required; (b) Mate—in the case of a steamboat over 400 tons registered tonnage or carrying over 40 passengers, a properly certificated mate is also required; (c) Engineers—the chief and other engineers must each hold a proper engineer's certificate or permit according to the nominal horse-power of the engine.

COST OF MOVING GOLD

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What does it cost per $1,000 to move gold from Ottawa or Montreal to New York?
2. What has been the average exchange rate during January, February, March and April, respectively, in 1929, between Canada and the United States?
3. Is it true that Canada sent the following amount of gold to the United States this year per month: January, $39,000,000; February, $3,000,000; March, $1,500,000; and April, practically nothing?
4. Is it a fact that of the $192,000,000 in Dominion notes issued as in February, 1929, the banks had $164,000,000 in legals, leaving approximately $28,000,000 in general, or hand to hand circulation?
5. When the banks need gold can they present Dominion notes and get specie from the Department of Finance?
6. If the banks exercised their rights now in asking for Dominion notes to be redeemed, would it not have a tendency to bring on a deflation in prices?

Mr. ROBB:

1. Approximately 11/64th of one per cent.
2. New York Funds, January, 1929, 15/64 pm.; February, 1929, 21/64 pm.; March, 1929, 37/64 pm.; April, 1929, 49/64 pm.
3. Exports of gold from Canada to United States: January, 1929, $37,992,621; February, 1929, $5,659,412; March, 1929, $4,339,411; April, 1929, $1,955,490.
4. Yes.
5. Yes.
6. The exercising of the "rights" suggested in this question to such an extent as to bring about a deflation of prices by depletion of the gold reserves need not be seriously considered as, under the provisions of the Bank Act, each bank must hold at all times forty per cent of its cash reserves in Dominion notes and, further, an additional large amount of Dominion notes, particularly of the denominations of $1 and $2 is required for circulation with the public, the banks not being permitted to issue their own notes for amounts less than $5; deducting such notes from the total of our outstanding notes issued against gold, the balance would not be available or sufficient to diminish seriously the gold reserves with the treasury.

There being a divergence of views held by various financial authorities as to relative importance of any one of the various conditions which operate towards deflation of prices, it would serve no good purpose to put forth an opinion as to the effect, if any, towards deflation of prices of suppositious transactions such as the reexchanging of Dominion notes, now doing the work of gold held in trust in the Dominion treasury, for the actual possession of the gold itself.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

LETTERS OF CREDIT

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What is the total amount of letters of credit for each department for the year 1927-1928?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

FISH TRAPS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—JUDGE ELLIS, COMMISSIONER

Mr. BRADY:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, petitions and any other communications between the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and any other persons or bodies, with reference to the appointment of Judge Ellis to sit in commission and take evidence in regard to the establishment of fish traps or otherwise in northern British Columbia waters.

GUS CARRIER—PRINCE ALBERT PENITENTIARY

Mr. CLARK:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents relating to Gus Carrier, Prince Albert penitentiary, from January 1, 1925, to date.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): This man is an officer at the Prince Albert penitentiary and the matter in question is one of administration and discipline, which is presently under consideration by the department. I really cannot see that it would be in the public interest to lay these documents on the table; as a matter of fact there are no documents excepting reports by inspectors and the exchanges between the superintendent and the inspectors.

Mr. CLARK: Why should a member of parliament be denied access to that file?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Because it is a matter of discipline and it would not make for good administration to take such action. After all, that is the practice. If the matter were settled it might be different, but it is actually under consideration now.

Mr. CLARK: Without entering into a debate on the question, would the minister let this motion stand for another day?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Very well. I am sure if my hon. friend knew what is involved in the matter he would not insist.

Mr. BENNETT: He persists because he does know about it.

Motion stands.

ACTIVITIES OF COMMUNIST PARTY

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents relating to the activities of the Communist party of Canada during the year 1928?

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is another case in which I must be disagreeable, but in connection with police reports concerning the communists or any other persons in Canada, they are strictly confidential, and I will not lay those papers on the table.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would point out that the Communist party is a political party in this country at present; in my own city of Winnipeg there is a member of the city council who belongs to that party, and they have run candidates in federal and provincial elections as well.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: On a point of order I would submit that if my hon. friend desires to debate this resolution he cannot do so now; he will have to transfer it to another order, and it will come up at the proper time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was hoping the minister might reconsider his stand.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I certainly will not lay the police reports on the table.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I would like to have this motion transferred to the other order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The motion will be dropped.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Transferred to motions.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It will be dropped from this order and transferred to the other order.

Motion dropped.

SUSANNAH MUSSON SAVERY

The house in committee on Bill No. 156, for the relief of Susannah Musson Savery—Mr. Bell (Hamilton)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children in this case?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): One child, Mr. Chairman, who is now in the care of the petitioner.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

On section 2—Right to marry again.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to ask what the effect of this section really is. If I understand the matter aright, the solemnization of marriage is entirely a provincial matter. Both in the province of Ontario and in the province of Quebec, it is placed in the hands of the clergymen of the various religious bodies. We are told that certain churches in this country are opposed to divorce and refuse to allow remarriage. That means that a large number of clergymen both in the province of Ontario and Quebec absolutely refuse to conduct a marriage ceremony where the parties have been divorced. I take it that that means that those clergymen refuse to be bound by the findings of this parliament. We give the right to the innocent party to remarry, and by inference that right is given also to the other party, but certain clergymen refuse to be bound by the decision of this house. They set themselves up as being superior to parliament and refuse to permit the marriage of those people who this parliament say may be remarried. Perhaps it may be a theoretical question as to which is supreme, parliament or the church, but there is a practical aspect to this matter. As I have said, the solemnization of marriage in these two provinces is left in the hands of the officials of the various churches. In practice, that means that it is very, very difficult to secure a clergyman in Ontario or Quebec who is willing to remarry divorced people. It is possible in Great Britain for divorced people to be remarried before a justice of the peace. I do not know whether that is possible in any of our provinces, but it certainly is not possible in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec from which most of these cases originate.

Mr. NEILL: You cannot be married by a justice of the peace in Great Britain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: By a magistrate.

Mr. FORKE: You can marry much easier than that in Scotland.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I am correct, Mr. Chairman, when I say that there is a provision in Great Britain for civil marriage.

Mr. NEILL: That is a different thing; that is performed by a registrar, not a justice of the peace. I am perfectly correct in saying that a justice of the peace has no right to marry in Great Britain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I accept the correction, but the point I was trying to make is that there is provision for civil marriage. I am told that in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec there is no provision for civil marriage, which means that these people will have to go to a clergyman to be remarried and since a great many of the religious bodies are opposed to the marriage of divorced people it will mean, as far as these two provinces are concerned, that this clause 2 amounts to very little. The person who has been given the right to remarry will have to go up and down the country in an endeavour to find a clergyman who will consent to perform the marriage ceremony. I raise this point simply because it reveals a very anomalous situation in that this parliament is given distinct jurisdiction over marriage and divorce while the provinces have jurisdiction over the solemnization of marriage.

Mr. MARCIL: Mr. Chairman, my well founded opinion, after many years in parliament, is that at least one-half or three-quarters of these applications would not be made if this second clause was not included in the bill. It has always been my opinion that a grave injustice is done by placing the guilty party upon the same footing as the innocent party. It is bad enough to give the innocent party power to remarry without giving the same power to the other party. As regards the religious law, if members of the Roman Catholic church want to comply with its rules and regulations, that church does not permit the remarriage of divorced people. The church of England in Canada has also made it known that it will not allow the remarriage of divorced people. There is good authority for that point of view in the Bible if those who are interested would only read the words of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. I hold that these churches are not governed, so far as their rules and regulations are concerned, by any decision of parliament. The religious authority is quite independent of the civil authority, and while the civil authority has complete jurisdiction within its own domain, in the religious domain each church is quite independent of parliament. I regret once more that parliament is allowing such a large number of divorce bills to go through, over three hundred of them, without full evidence, because the two parties have not been heard. We are giving a decision on ex parte evidence and I am glad to see that in the province of Ontario, where the great majority of these applications come from, there is a movement looking to a change in the procedure so that the power of granting divorces may be taken away altogether from the Dominion parliament.

SOCKEYE SALMON FISHERIES TREATY

REFERENCE OF CONVENTION TO MARINE AND FISHERIES COMMITTEE

On the notice of motion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

Resolved that it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention for the protection, preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries in the Fraser river system, which was signed at Washington on the twenty-seventh day of March, nineteen hundred and twenty-nine, on behalf of His Majesty for the Dominion of Canada, by the plenipotentiary named therein, and that this house do approve of the same.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It has been intimated to the government that some hon. members of the house would like to have detailed information with respect to this treaty. In order to supply the information which they wish to have, it would appear to be desirable to have the resolution referred to an appropriate committee of the house where that information could be given. In the form in which the motion stands, it being a motion to approve a convention, nothing more is contemplated than formal approval after consideration of the resolution by this house while the Speaker is in the chair; it is not contemplated to have the resolution as it stands referred to the committee of the whole house. In the circumstances, believing that the select standing committee on marine and fisheries is perhaps the best committee to deal with this particular convention, I move:

That the subject matter of the government notice of motion standing on the order of proceedings for this day respecting the protection, preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries in the Fraser river system be referred to the select standing committee on marine and fisheries.

Among other advantages of having the resolution so referred is that of enabling the committee to hear at first hand from the officers of the department who have had to do with the negotiation of the treaty itself.

[Mr. Millar.]

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the course suggested by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is one which commends itself to our judgment for it affords an opportunity for detailed consideration of the merits of the treaty that might otherwise be denied, and I have great pleasure in supporting the motion that has just been made.

While I am on my feet may I venture to suggest to the right hon. the Prime Minister, as indeed I have already done, that he consider the propriety of approving a treaty of this character by legislation rather than by resolution. I shall not discuss that at this moment, but I think if he will look into it he will satisfy himself that this form of treaty which in its substance involves future legislation should be approved itself by an act of parliament. I have gathered together some of the authorities, and I shall be glad at a future time to give them to the right hon. gentleman. I think myself that the matter should be dealt with by a substantive bill and not by a mere resolution.

Motion agreed to.

GENEVA PROTOCOL

PROHIBITION OF POISONOUS GASES AND BACTERIOLOGICAL METHODS OF WARFARE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the protocol for the prohibition of the use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and of bacteriological methods of warfare, which was signed at Geneva on the seventeenth day of June, nineteen hundred and twenty-five, on behalf of His Majesty for the Dominion of Canada, by the plenipotentiary named therein, and that this house do approve of the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as you have just indicated in reading the resolution, this protocol was signed at Geneva in June, 1925—signed, I understand, by some thirty-four different countries, including Great Britain and Canada. The protocol has since been ratified by a number of countries, but has not been ratified by either Great Britain or Canada.

At the meeting of the preparatory commission on disarmament which was held at Geneva this spring, Lord Cushendun, on behalf of His Majesty's government in Great Britain, intimated that it was the intention of His Majesty's government in Great Britain to ratify the protocol, subject to two reservations, the first being that its provisions should bind only vis-a-vis such countries as are also parties to the protocol; and the second being that the provisions should cease to bind vis-a-vis a contracting party which ceases to observe the protocol's provision.

We instructed our representative on the preparatory commission on disarmament, Mr. Riddell, to inform the commission that it was the intention of the Dominion government to ask the approval of parliament to the protocol in order that it might be ratified at the same time on behalf of Canada as it is ratified on behalf of His Majesty's government in Great Britain. It is for that reason that the house is now being asked to approve the protocol. I do not think it necessary to go into the provisions of the protocol. They speak for themselves—" the prohibition of the use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and of bacteriological methods of warfare."

Mr. CAHAN: Will the government of Canada make the two same reservations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my hon. friend for asking the question. I should certainly have said that it is our intention that the instrument of ratification should contain the same reservations on behalf of Canada as are being made by His Majesty's government in Great Britain. The protocol is to assist in making binding upon the conscience and practice of nations the provisions which it contains, and thereby help establish international law in that particular.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the senate of the United States ratified the protocol?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not aware that the senate has.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the precedent has just been set in the previous resolution of reference to the most appropriate committee. Several years ago at the Prime Minister's own suggestion the committee on industrial relations was enlarged to be the committee on industrial and international relations. I think during the four or five years' existence of that committee there has never been any reference to it of any international matter. It strikes me that it would be highly desirable that the committee, and through the committee the house at large, should be more closely in touch with international affairs. In the past we in Canada have had very little to do with international affairs, and it is desirable that the general public should be familiarized more or less with the details and the implications of our international relations.

In order that this be accomplished I can see no better way than the discussing of these relationships in this house by going into details in regard to such matters before a committee, as is done with regard to other matters. Hence, since we have just referred the previous resolution to a committee, I would venture to suggest to the Prime Minister that similar action might be taken in this case.

Further, it seems to me that some time, either now or later, the Prime Minister ought to give us some reason for including in this protocol certain reservations. The only reason hitherto suggested is that Great Britain has done so. I do not think that is quite enough for us. It does seem to me that we ought to have some underlying reasons of our own for such action. It may be that Great Britain in this respect is right; and it may be that Great Britain is not right. The present policy of the British government is the policy of the Conservative party in Great Britain. I do not know why this government should necessarily follow the policy of the Conservative party of Great Britain. And in any case I think it is right that we should have definitely set before us the reasons for placing these reservations in this protocol.

I offer my previous suggestion to the Prime Minister in the hope that in this way we may gradually enter upon a better understanding of our foreign relationships.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I heartily concur in the observations made by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this is a purely formal matter. There is nothing in this protocol that can be said to be contentious. We are endeavouring to prevent a form of warfare, if the world ever again should know war, which we hope it may not, that has met with the universal reprobation of mankind. Asphyxiating and chemical gases we know wrought great havoc in the armies engaged in the last world conflict, and in one instance, which was well authenticated, use of bacteriological methods brought great disaster to a very large community. We are merely declaring in that with other nations of the world we will not have anything to do with that kind of warfare. I cannot see that there would be any use in referring this resolution to a committee, with due deference to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Certainly there is no analogy between this and the other resolution on the order paper.

With respect to the reservations, I apprehend that the reservations suggested by Lord Cushendun on behalf of Great Britain were reservations that were made as a result of the experience of Great Britain in the recent war. It was said that one of the greatest soldiers of the British Empire, as well as one of the great soldiers of one of the overseas dominions, was of the opinion that notwithstanding the fact that the enemy used poisonous gases, the allies should not do so; but ultimately that judgment was over-borne and recourse was had by the armies of Great Britain and the allies to the use of poisonous gases to combat the poisonous gases used by the enemy. Large quantities of such gases were made on this continent and sent to the field of hostilties.

All that I understand these reservations to mean is that in the event of one of the parties to this protocol being engaged in hostilities and breaking the terms of the obligations, and utilizing asphyxiating or poisonous gases or bacteriological methods of warfare, we would thereby be relieved from our obligations with respect to that country, and that country only. That is, there is no general release from our obligations, but only from those obligations that affect that party which has already broken its obligations under the protocol. That is how I understand it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to the first reservation, it merely makes clear, what I think is already abundantly clear, that the terms and obligations of the protocol are binding only between those parties who have signed the protocol.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: Under these circumstances, as I have said, it is a great pleasure to support the measure, although it does not afford scope for any discussion of large international problems which I fancy the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will avail himself of when his estimates are under consideration, and should the necessity arise.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that the proper place for a resolution of this character would be the committee which has for its object the consideration of resolutions or other matters dealing with international affairs. One of my reasons for this statement is this. I recently found, in an answer to a question in the British house, the information submitted by the ministry there that they had used in the chemical laboratories in the Defence department some 1,142 animals since 1925 in the testing of chemical gas for warfare. Now we find this protocol before us, and I think our committee should investigate the sincerity not only of the government of Great Britain but of our own Department of National Defence in matters of this kind. Frankly, I am all in favour of any treaty or any undertaking between nations which will eliminate the use of chemical gases. Indeed, I would go further than the Prime Minister and would propose the elimination of all means of warfare—all of them, as an hon. member suggests. Frankly, I should be agreeable to that so far as Canada is concerned. I think we have the least to fear of any nation, and we are in a geographical position of the most extraordinary advantage as compared with other nations in that regard. But on this question of the use of chemicals and poisonous gases in warfare, I think we should acquaint ourselves thoroughly, in order that our people in turn may be acquainted, with what steps have already been taken by the British war office in connection with such matters. My interest was aroused by that answer made in the British parliament recently, and I should like to know whether the Prime Minister has any information regarding the point.

Mr. BENNETT: Why should we examine into what they are doing any more than they should examine into what we are doing?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Because they are a joint partner with us in this treaty.

Mr. BENNETT: No. It is stated that the treaty is signed on behalf of the British Empire but not for the overseas dominions, and our representative and no one else signed the treaty for Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But having signed the treaty we become a party to it with the others, and we want to find out what they are doing in the matter.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend seriously suggest that a committee of this house could possibly find out what is being done by all the countries that have signed the treaty? Does he suggest that a committee could get information along the lines he speaks of?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am quite sure that if the old system of secrecy still prevails there are great difficulties in the way. Certainly, however, so far as our own activities are concerned we should be made fully aware of them.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I have just a word or two to say, first, with regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that the matter be referred to the committee. The provisions of the protocol now before the house contain Canada's stated and considered policy since at least 1922. In 1922, at the time of the Washington naval conference, Canada became a party to a treaty framed practically in the same terms as this, and which I understand was ratified at that time. This treaty goes further only in two respects. In the first place, it includes other parties not present at the Washington conference; as the Prime Minister indicated, it includes thirty nations. In the second place, it adds bacteriological means of warfare to those already prohibited by the Washington treaty. The special provision in the Washington treaty was article V:

> The use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and all analogous liquids, materials or devices, having been justly condemned by the general opinion of the civilized world and a prohibition of such use having been declared in treaties to which a majority of the civilized powers are parties.
> The signatory powers, to the end that this prohibition shall be universally accepted as a part of international law binding alike the conscience and practice of nations, declare their assent to such prohibition, agree to be bound thereby as between themselves and invite all other civilized nations to adhere thereto.

As has been said on both sides of the house, this is no new policy for Canada, and I submit that it does not involve any technical examination which would require reference of the matter to a committee.

Secondly on the point mentioned by my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) with regard to the necessity for inquiring into the good faith of the various parties to the treaty, if that suggestion is valid in respect to this treaty, how much further would the hon. gentleman's argument carry him in connection with the so-called Briand-Kellogg pact?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: It would mean the complete examination of the defence forces, of the armaments, and of every means for warlike preparation possessed by every nation which has signed the pact. I understand that the very heart of that treaty and, I believe, the very spirit of this one, is dependence upon the good faith of the contracting parties; there are no securities either in that treaty or in this one. There is no provision as to anything that will take the place of what is prohibited, there is nothing that provides any guarantee that the terms of the treaty will be carried out. There is simply the word, the good faith of the nations who have signed the treaty. It seems to me, therefore, that we should be flying directly in the face of these treaties, questioning the very spirit in which they were entered into, if we began immediately questioning the good faith of the parties by instituting an enquiry as to whether they intend to carry out their obligations and whether they are making preparations which might be suspected to permit of a violation at the first opportunity of the principles of the treaty.

With regard to the situation in Canada, may I say one word. Canada is not making any provision for the use of chemicals in warfare except in a defensive way. Training has been extremely limited. We have regarded the obligation imposed in the Washington treaty as our obligation and have endeavoured to carry it out not only in spirit but in actual practice. There are in Canada at the present time probably one thousand anti-gas masks, used for the purpose of training our personnel in anti-gas measures. We have no personnel whatever engaged in connection with research, nor have we any personnel engaged in connection with the manufacture of this means of warfare. And that is the policy which we propose to carry out. The personnel we have specially trained in this work comprises one officer and two non-commissioned officers trained in England who from time to time give instructions to a limited number who in turn qualify for instructors in anti-gas measures, and I trust that will be found to be the only necessity which Canada will have to meet in that respect

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister give us any information regarding the manufacture of poison gases by any of the other nations who are signatories to the treaty?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I can give no information in that regard. I can assure my hon. friend that we endeavour to keep in touch with progress in matters of this kind. It is, of course, very difficult to differentiate between chemicals used for industrial and for military purposes respectively; it is extremely difficult. The nation which has great transportation systems in connection with civilian activities is obviously better prepared for quick mobilization for war and in the same way a nation engaged in the manufacture of chemicals for purely civilian purposes, may in case of war be the quickest to adapt these agences to military uses. We know there are developments in chemistry throughout the world, and particularly in industrial chemistry. That always can be associated with the possibility of utilizing such gases or chemical substances in connection with war. The department with which I am connected naturally must keep before it information which we get from time to time with regard to these developments, not in any critical or suspicious sense but simply with the idea of providing defensive measures should these agencies be used by any nation which is not a party to this treaty.

While I am on my feet I would like to refer to one point in reference to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) with regard to the reservations. I think that question has been dealt with already; the reservations are two. First there is a limitation that this treaty only applies as between us and similarly contracting parties; in other words the treaty is reciprocal, and in the second place we are not bound as against any enemy state who fails or whose allies fail to respect the agreement. I think that is a reasonable provision; I think the house will recognize the force of it and necessity for it, and I do not think it is a reservation which need be submitted to a committee or, with all deference to my hon. friend, which will require very much debate in this house.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I would like to make just one observation, and it is this: Any country might be conscientiously and sincerely intending to live up to a treaty such as this while at the same time they are going thoroughly into the manufacture of poisonous gases or bacteriological methods of warfare. In the last war, for example, without being part of a treaty it was well understood among the civilized nations that such things as poisonous gases would not be used, yet they were used to the horror and disgust of the allies at least. In the same way, in the next war, should such an unfortunate event occur, a country desiring to live up to this treaty to the nth degree should be prepared in case one of the other countries should take the attitude which was taken during the last war. I believe no horror could have been greater than the feeling which was engendered among the allies when poisonous gases were used against them in the last war and therefore, with all due respect to other hon. members who have spoken, I think the fact that one of the allies might be conducting a thorough examination into these methods of warfare would not necessarily mean a lack of faith should war occur. I think that action should be taken as a defensive precaution in case one of the opposing countries adopted that method of warfare.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston): I see no objection to referring this matter to a committee, because I believe in that way much information might be gained which would be advantageous to a great many people. Chemical gases are used industrially, and I believe the work being done now is of great service to the industrial world and to people in general. We had an example of the effect of poisonous gases in Cleveland just a day or two ago, and if in our schools we can proceed with the study of these gases and discover defences against them we will do a lot of good, because defence against these gases is just as important as the use of gas. No country is going to produce gases for any purpose other than defence, so I think this question could be submitted to this committee with a great deal of benefit to everyone. They will find nothing prejudicial to themselves or to any other Anglo-Saxon country, but they will find a great deal of research work being carried on in order to protect human life against these gases.

The information obtained during the last war has been of great benefit to the world at large; perhaps many people will condemn the use of animals in experiments of this kind, but we must remember that these experiments have for their object the protection of human life, whether in war or in industry. The other day in Cleveland it would have been of great benefit if some protective measure had been available against the effects of the poisonous gases which were released during that accident; perhaps a hundred lives might have been saved. We saved thousands of lives during the war through our knowledge of how to protect our men against the effects of a common gas which, previous to the war, was used only in industrial fields. So I see no objection whatever to the suggestion that this question should be referred to a committee; I believe a great deal of information can be obtained which will assist in the protection of human life.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend who has suggested that this particular resolution should be referred to a committee that I had considered the possibility of following that course, but on reflection it seemed to me that the provisions of the protocol were so self-evident and would be so generally approved by every hon. member of the house that to have proposed the reference of the protocol to a committee might have seemed, at least to some people outside of this house, rather a questionable if not invidious procedure. I may say to my hon. friend however, that speaking generally I think he is quite right in suggesting that the government should refer measures of an international character to a committee especially charged with questions of the kind, and I think I have shown with regard to the course recommended with respect to the preceding resolution that the government is entirely favourable to a committee, especially qualified to inquire into the subject matter of particular resolutions, being given an opportunity of so doing. With respect to future resolutions relating to international affairs I shall hope to have them referred to an appropriate committee wherever there appears to be reason for so doing. With respect to this particular resolution, my hon. friend may perhaps feel that his purpose has been served, in drawing attention to the wisdom of adopting such a course.

I should have told the house that the two reservations which are being made by Great Britain and Canada to the instrument of ratification have been made also by France and Russia; I omitted to mention that fact when the resolution was being discussed.

Mr. HEAPS: Purely as a matter of information, could the Prime Minister tell us what countries have signed this protocol?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will find a list of the countries that have signed in the printed copy of the protocol which is before him.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe Belgium has signed since that list was prepared.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would also move:

That a message be sent to the senate to acquaint their honours that this House has adopted a resolution approving of the above protocol.

And that the Clerk of the House do carry the said message to the senate.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE

SALARIES OF PROFESSIONAL AND TECHNICAL OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I would like to ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government to obtain the report of the commissioners considering the question of increased remuneration for technical civil servants in time to make their findings effective by legislation this session or whether the report will be brought down next session just prior to the election. I would also inquire if the commissioners have been notified and if formal instructions have been given them.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With regard to my hon. friend's reference to the election I might suggest that he should not be too sure that the election will be held next year.

Mr. LADNER: Will the Prime Minister say it will not be held?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the country is well satisfied with the government, and it may be the country's desire to have the government continue in office until well on towards the end of 1931. However, that is a matter which may be considered in due course. With respect to the report of the commission, I am afraid the government will have to allow the commission some latitude in the matter of time required to gather evidence and make a report. I do not think we can put any pressure upon them with regard to the time taken to consider the matter. I have no doubt that the commission will be anxious to make its report as speedily as possible. When the report is received we will then have to consider its recommendations.

Mr. LADNER: Have the commissioners been notified?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

PRESERVATION OF NIAGARA FALLS

CONVENTION WITH UNITED STATES

The house resumed from February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention and protocol for the preservation of Niagara falls by the construction of remedial works and for the experimental withdrawal of additional water from the Niagara river, which was signed at Ottawa, on the second day of January, nineteen hundred and twenty-nine, on behalf of His Majesty for the Dominion of Canada by the plenipotentiary named therein, and that this house do approve of the same

And that a message be sent to the senate to acquaint their honours that this house unites with the senate in the approval of the above-mentioned convention and protocol;

And that the Clerk of the House do carry the said message to the senate.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in respect to this resolution I would say that it was discussed quite fully by the house some little time ago, but the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was absent at the time and at the request of one of the hon. members opposite it was held pending his return, in case the hon. leader of the opposition might have some remarks to make.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I did not desire that the passage of this resolution should be delayed by reason of my absence, and I thought I indicated that fact before I left Ottawa.

In the first place I desire to observe that the procedure adopted in this case, in my judgment, is improper; this approval should be the subject matter of legislation and should be introduced by way of a bill and not by the method which has been adopted. A few minutes ago I directed attention to what I conceived to be the true principles which should govern in a matter of this kind, and perhaps I may refer to the authorities without taking up too much time of the house.

There is an article in the British Year Book of International Law for 1928 which summarizes the whole matter. The following appears at page 59:

Anson, writing in 1908, tells us that:
"where a treaty involves a charge upon the people, or a change in the general law of the land, it may be made, but cannot be carried into effect without the consent of parliament"; and also that "apart from precedents relating to Indian territory, it has of recent years been thought desirable, if not necessary, that the consent of parliament should be given to the cession of territory in time of peace. Cessions made at the conclusion of peace or in course of a war, or of lands acquired by conquest or cession, for which parliament has not legislated, and for which the king has not by his own act deprived himself of the power of legislating by order in council, would seem to stand on a different footing."

The summary is as follows:

We may conclude by suggesting the following summary of the present state of British constitutional law and practice.

(1) Treaties which for their enforcement by British courts of law require some addition to or alteration of the existing law cannot be carried into effect without legislation. Therefore the king will not be advised to ratify them unless and until such legislation has been passed or parliament has given the necessary assurance that it will be passed. A treaty imposing on Great Britain a liability to pay money either actually (for instance, to make a loan) or contingently (for instance, to guarantee a loan), usually falls within this category, because as a rule the money could not be raised or expended without legislation.

(2) Treaties which modify the belligerent rights of the crown when engaged in maritime warfare will receive effect in British prize courts without legislation.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

(3) Treaties made expressly subject to the approval of parliament require its approval, which is usually given in the form of a statute.

(4) Apart from the Indian Empire, which stands on a special footing, it is the practice, amounting probably by this time to a binding constitutional convention, for treaties involving the cession of British territory to require the approval of parliament given by a statute.

The article was written by Arnold D. McNair, C.B.E., LL.D., fellow of Gonville and Caius college and university lecturer, Cambridge, and who I believe is also the editor of the last edition of Oppenheim's International Law.

The treaty made between the United States and Canada, and which we are considering, will involve the expenditure of public moneys. One parliament should not bind or restrict the full authority of another parliament unless it be done by statute, for resolutions have no place or binding authority in the courts. One of the anomalies of our system of legislation, as has been pointed out by some commentators, is that mere resolutions are not taken notice of by the courts at all; although it may be a resolution passed by the House of Commons and passed by the Senate as well it is not taken notice of by the courts because a law can be passed by the sovereign only with the advice and consent of the commons and senate in parliament assembled. That is, the three estates of the realm must unite to give effect and validity to legislation, but in this case we have only a resolution, which, although approved by the commons and the senate, has not the force or effect of a statute. It is a resolution which contemplates a charge upon the public revenues, and therefore it comes within the purview of the first rule laid down by Professor McNair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has that ever been the practice in Great Britain?

Mr. BENNETT: We are new at dealing with these matters in Canada, but where we have dealt with them we have endeavored to do so by legislation. Perhaps the most important of all international documents with which we have had to do was the one in connection with the International Joint Commission, and that is the subject matter of a statute which is to be found in the annual statutes for the year in which it was passed.

Another difficulty is purely a practical one, and I submit it to the Minister of Justice as being one which will commend itself to him. When rights are affected by a treaty information regarding such treaty should be easily available to those who are interested. When the treaty is attached as a schedule to a statute it always appears in the statute books of the country and there is no difficulty in referring to it. For instance, the parliamentary approval of the treaty between Great Britain and France made in 1919, to which Professor McNair refers, is in these terms:

1. The approval of parliament is hereby given to the treaty set out in the schedule to this act.
2. This act may be cited as the Anglo-French treaty (Defence of France) Act, 1919.

That embodied the whole matter. It will be observed that the words used are "approval of," not ratification; for ratification means one of the prerogative rights of the sovereign. The approval by parliament means that sanction has been given to the treaty by the representatives of the people in the form of a bill which is the recognized procedure by which parliament expresses itself for the purpose of enabling it to be recorded as a part of its deliberations upon the statute books of the country. When parliament has expressed its approval of the treaty that treaty becomes a part of the schedule to the act.

Without going further into a matter which has been already discussed, it is sufficient for my purpose to point out that some of our treaty obligations create new obligations. To implement the obligations it will be necessary either to vote money or pass legislation. The voting of money is embodied in the supply bill, which is a legislative act, so that the principle which governs in such cases should, in my judgment, govern in this. Wherever a treaty is sought to be approved by the parliament of Canada, which consists of the Senate and the House of Commons acting with the sovereign, it should be by bill and not by resolution, for wherever the document itself contains provisions which obligate this country, as one of the high contracting parties, to discharge obligations or to do any act or thing mentioned or described in the document, that can only be given effect to through legislation, then there should be legislative approval of the treaty itself by act of parliament. When we endeavour to bind the hands of future parliaments, we cannot do so by means of resolutions, but only by acts of parliament, and, therefore, I submit that this matter should have been submitted to parliament in the form of a bill.

There is another ground upon which I desire to make a few observations, and that is this: the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) was charged with the responsibility in connection with this matter, But when the minister was considering the use and conservation of water of the Spray lakes, which are in the Rocky mountains some distance from the Bow river and in connection with which I think the minister will agree that not even the scenic beauties of the Rocky mountains park were affected, there was such a long delay that ultimately nothing was done and recourse was had to the development of additional power at the Ghost river site on the Bow river. It happens that the city of Calgary, a portion of which I have the honour to represent, is entirely dependent upon the Bow river for its supply of hydro-electric energy. The representations as to the water in that river in the early days appear, in the light of ultimate information, to have been very inaccurate and the quantity of water fell at one time as low as 600 cubic second feet in the winter season, and the minimum flow of a river is the important thing to ascertain when one is determining the question of power development. On the other hand storage possibilities are ever present in a country such as we have in western Canada, near the Rocky mountains. It was sought thus to utilize the waters of the Spray lakes. There are those connected with the parks branch of the minister's department who believe that the scenic beauties of the park would be so marred or interfered with by the construction of a dam to enable the waters of the Spray lakes to be utilized, with a tunnel to convey the water through to the river, that the matter should not be considered. A great agitation was carried on. Many of the papers in the west joined in the attack against the power company in an urgent endeavour to protect, as they said, the scenic beauties of the parks of the west.

The Niagara falls have been known in history for, I think, something like 250 years. I believe the first measurement of the falls was taken by one of the early explorers in the seventeenth century. The falls have undoubtely been gradually receding. The action of the water has been to destroy partly the falls on the Canadian side. On the United States side, where the fall is much wider, a thinner film of water has been spread over the rock and the result has been that there has not been as much erosion as on the Canadian side where the body of water is greater and its action more apparent. It has been represented by United States engineers in one of their journals that the rock on the Canadian side has receded as much as five feet a year in recent years. It seemed to me to be incredible that it should recede so great a distance, but that is the figure which has been given.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the Horseshoe.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, in the centre of the Horseshoe on the Canadian side. That is the figure, whether it be accurate or not. Many years ago Isham Randolph prepared elaborate plans for the purpose of conserving the beauties of the falls. I will not endeavour to deal with the plans he then put forward, but one of the gentlemen who signed the present convention between the United States and Canada, I think Mr. Macfarland, is the editor of a very important journal and I recall seeing upon the cover of that journal some years ago a picture of Niagara falls practically dry, with nothing but the rocks over which a thin trickle of water was flowing, the falls having been destroyed by the activities of the power companies. That was the position which was then taken by those who were endeavouring to project their minds into the future. No such condition has as yet arisen, but I suggest that the present convention is intended for one purpose and one only, namely, to enable more power to be secured from Niagara falls by both the province of Ontario and the interests that operate in the state of New York. It will be recalled that neither the state of New York nor the province of Ontario is a party to the treaty: it is a treaty made between the United States and Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is entirely wrong with respect to that. While they are not parties, they are entirely in accord.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I am saying. They are not parties to the treaty. Naturally the United States speaks as a nation through the treaty just as does Canada. New York is a part of the United States and Ontario is a part of Canada. We are given to believe that Ontario is satisfied with the provisions of the treaty, but there is nothing to show whether the beauties of the park or the falls are matters to be considered. The point seems to be rather that more power may be available by diverting the water over a wider area and spreading it over the Horseshoe in a thinner stream, thereby causing less erosion, so that additional power will be available in Ontario and in the state of New York. It is already a matter of record that, because of this treaty, the state of New York has said to the private corporation operating on that side that while that additional water is to be available by the methods employed, they must pay to the state of New York a license fee not only for the additional water to be secured, but for water now being taken about which heretofore there was a grave question whether they would pay anything or not. That is a matter of record. I suggest that the principle that has governed in eastern Canada in considering this matter should also be applied in western Canada.

When the matter was actively before the department in connection with the Spray falls, I was a shareholder in the Calgary Power Company, although I was not a member of the house, When I assumed my present duties I disposed of such few shares as I had remaining in that enterprise, and therefore I feel I can speak with some degree of freedom with relation to it. It seems to me that you should not have one set of principles governing in the west where, for instance, in Calgary we are wholly dependent on that development for hydro-electrical energy, and another set in the east with respect to Niagara falls and the hydro-electric development dependent upon that large head of water.

I desire to refer to but one other matter—the method to be used is the construction of submerged dams. Mr. Isham Randolph, the elder, if I recall aright, according to a report he made, did not believe that was the best method to adopt. They had in mind at that time the creation of small islands, with sufficient loam upon them to enable some vegetation to appear so that the utilization of the water would be in harmony with the beautification of the park and the scenery surrounding the falls. The present scheme, so far as I can gather from the documents, contemplates nothing more than submerged concrete dams which will be close to the surface of the water and will not give any additional green appearance to the surrounding landscape and not add in any sense to its beautification. That at least, is the contention which has been made. I suppose the minister will say that this is a matter the details of which might be worked out by those charged with that responsibility. The treaty in the ultimate analysis is one made by the United States because of the insistence of the private power interests in the state of New York; and as regards Canada I suppose, not without the same measure of truth it may be said the treaty is largely the outcome of the representations of those who are seeking additional hydro-electrical energy in Ontario. Those are both desirable ends; both are ends to which we should try to lend our assistance in every way possible, but not if as a result the beauty of the falls is to be destroyed. If we are in any way to lessen the scenic beauty of these falls which, as I say, have been world renowned for over two centuries, we should not even for the purpose of getting a little additional horsepower, become parties to the transaction. It was only because of that fear which I expressed to some of my colleagues a few weeks ago, that the matter was delayed, apart altogether from the discrimination which I thought was being practised between the east and the west in connection with this matter, scenic beauty is desirable both east and west, but the principle of utility should at least be applied in the same way in the east as in the west, and as I have said, I am firmly of opinion that the methods adopted are not those which one of the most eminent engineers of his time recommended should be applied, and departure from which will certainly detract from the scenic beauties of Niagara falls and park.

The first objection I have urged as to the method adopted is common to all these questions of the approval of treaties. We are entering upon a career of international treaties. It is highly desirable that we should settle the practice with some degree of certainty. I shall have something to say later as to section 132 of the British North America Act, which in terms does not contemplate this country making treaties with foreign countries apart from the empire. Section 132 I think should be closely studied having regard to the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in determining who is a "person" within that act for the purpose of taking a seat in the senate. Having regard to the terms of that decision, it does occur to me that it is not an unfair inference to conclude that section 132 of the British North America Act should be construed by the same canons of construction. In the event of the Prime Minister considering this fall amendments necessary to the British North America Act to enable Canada to exercise powers that belong to this Dominion if we are on an equality of status with Great Britain, I would suggest that he study section 132 in order that the treaty-making powers may be properly exercised without any question being raised in the courts, as might hereafter be done, as to the true interpretation and meaning to be placed upon section 132. There is only one purpose I have so far as the first matter is concerned, and that is that our practice should be settled along the lines that are supported by precedent and reason and that will be relied upon by future parliaments and future generations as establishing a system that is sound from every standpoint, and I cannot think that any approval of a treaty is sound that undertakes to bind the action of future parliaments without the consent of parliament expressed in the manner and form in the constitution provided—by His Majesty the King by and with the consent of the House of Commons and Senate in parliament assembled—and not by a mere resolution of the two houses of parliament.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): May I say a word or two with regard to the first point raised by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I did not know that the matter was to be brought up in this manner, and I can only rely on my memory and on what I believe to be the sound principles governing this matter.

As my hon. friend knows, the ratifying power in matters of treaties varies with different nations. In some countries the ratification is made by parliament; in others it is made both by parliament and the king; in others it is made by one branch of parliament. In the United States, for instance, the power of ratification belongs to the senate. So far as British countries are concerned, it is His Majesty the King who ratifies the treaty. So far as the British practice is concerned, it is and it was only when money was to be expended under the treaty that the treaty was formally submitted to the imperial parliament before being ratified.

Mr. CAHAN: Or if it affected any vested interest.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When the Versailles treaty of peace was submitted for approval, I remember reading a speech of Mr. Lloyd George, then Prime Minister of Great Britain, in which he reiterated that the ratification power is vested in the king, but that that treaty was of such tremendous importance that he thought it proper to submit it to the approval of parliament before asking for ratification by His Majesty the King. In this country for the last few years we have taken the stand that no treaty should be ratified before it is submitted for the approval of this parliament. That course the government has followed in every instance, and it is following it in this case. When there is need of special legislation for the purpose of enforcing a treaty, legislation has been introduced, but introduced apart from the treaty. I remember an instance in 1923 or 1924 when the halibut treaty was ratified. I was Minister of Marine and Fisheries at the time the treaty was negotiated, but not, I think, when the treaty was approved by parliament. In that case it was found necessary, apart from the formal approval of the treaty by resolution of this parliament, to amend our legislation concerning the protection of fisheries in order to make it conform to the provisions of the treaty. We had a special statute passed at the next session, providing, for instance, penalties for violations of the treaty —because it was necessary, as my hon. friend has said, that when matters relating to the treaty were submitted to the courts there should be statutes for the purpose of enforcing its provisions. I think this course should be followed in cases where special legislation is needed. I do not think there will be need of such legislation in this case, but if there is a need there is nothing to prevent the introduction of a bill for the purpose of enforcing every provision of the treaty. I may remark that not so very long ago we were bound even by treaties which not only had not been submitted to the approval of this parliament but, still less, had not been followed by a statute of this parliament. That is changed now. We cannot be bound unless this parliament approves, and I believe that under the circumstances the method suggested by my hon. friend that in every case there should be a statute is not the method that is followed in the British parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: Not in every case, but every case in which the document itself involves obligations necessitating future legislative action.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Even in that case I think my hon. friend will admit that a bill could follow when necessary after the formal approval of the treaty.

Mr. BENNETT: But the treaty should be part of the statute.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): It seems to me that the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has fallen into some confusion of thought in making an analysis of the legal situation as compared with the constitutional situation in Canada in respect of the ratification of treaties. I think one may suggest with great confidence that a treaty ratified by His Majesty the King in a legal sense may have full force and effect in Canada without any approval whatsoever either by resolution of this house or by statute of this parliament. Legal effect is given to many international agreements, conventions and treaties by the simple ratification by His Majesty the King. But in the constitutional sense my hon. friend has insisted that treaties, which affect and apply to Canada, prior to their ratification by His Majesty the King should receive the approval of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will allow me. I hope he did not misunderstand me. I never said we should do away with the approval of parliament. I am in favour of it entirely.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not misrepresenting the hon. gentleman, and I think we will agree on that. But we passed a resolution in this house, two or three sessions ago, to the effect that, before the government of Canada should advise His Majesty the King to ratify any treaty or convention which in terms affected Canada, the government of Canada should first submit that treaty or convention for the approval of this parliament. Now, in this case, the government of Canada in the name of His Majesty have entered into a treaty with the United States of America, and before advising the king to ratify that treaty, the government of the day have submitted that treaty for the approval of this house. This house may give approval by simple resolution, or by a statute of parliament confirming the treaty and providing for the carrying out of its terms. What is the distinction between treaties which are approved in the one form or in the other? This convention or treaty, which is now being approved by resolution, will have no more legal effect in Canada than if it had never received the approval of this house by simple resolution. This convention which is being approved by resolution merely has that effect in Canada which it would have had at any time during the last two centuries if simply ratified by His Majesty on the advice of his privy council at Westminster.

But there may be treaties and conventions containing terms which, even if His Majesty in the exercise of his royal prerogative, ratifies them by the advice, either of his privy council in England or of his privy council in Canada, would have no legal effect whatsoever, and would not be respected or enforced by any court in this country. You have only to look through the English decisions where you will find time and again that distinguished judges of the courts have declared that treaties merely ratified by His Majesty on the advice of His Majesty's privy council in England, or by formal resolution of parliament, sometimes contain terms which are not enforceable in those courts, because they had no statutory force or effect.

Therefore, I suggest to the Minister of Justice that the clear distinction is this. Any treaty which in times past could have been ratified by His Majesty alone on the advice of his imperial privy council, and by its terms may be made applicable to all the dominions and colonies without any statutory legislation by the imperial parliament or by a dominion parliament, and which could be enforced without such statutory confirmation by the imperial parliament or by the Dominion, may have full force and effect in Canada to-day if approved by a simple resolution of this house, that simple resolution being strictly a moral support to the government of the day in taking the responsibility of advising the king, through His Majesty's privy council, to effect such ratification.

If the treaty or convention, however, which is to be submitted to parliament for approval before ratification by His Majesty, affects the revenues of the country, or provides for any expenditure of public funds, then, ever since the time that Anson collected his precedents, we know that no such treaty or convention can have full force or effect until it is submitted to parliament by a bill which, previously—as in England—has been authorized by His Majesty, or until it is submitted to this parliament by a bill, which has previously been authorized by His Excellency the Governor General.

But to go further. If the treaty or convention affects property rights or interests in particular sections of this country, and the treaty is only given effect to by ratification by His Majesty on the advice of His Majesty's privy council of Canada, then no court in Canada is bound to respect such treaty which has not been confirmed by statute, except to the extent that His Majesty by the exercise of his royal prerogative could, even without the advice of his privy council in Canada, have given by his ratification such force and effect to it.

I do not know whether I am making my idea clear. Whether hon. gentlemen opposite accept it or not is another matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is very interesting.

Mr. CAHAN: We are not raising any partisan discussion or issue. I called attention once before to the question as to which treaties became public law in Canada by mere ratification by His Majesty the King, and which treaties become public law in Canada only by statutory confirmation by the parliament of Canada. But take article 2 of this treaty—I am not raising objection to its terms—it provides for the construction of certain remedial works in the Niagara river above the Niagara Falls, designed to distribute the waters of the river for certain purposes. Article 2 says that concurrently with the construction and test of the remedial works, additional use of the water for hydro electric purposes may be permitted to a certain extent and subject to certain conditions, and further that additional diversions shall be permitted during only a certain period of the year. Those additional diversions to be permitted in the state of New York shall not exceed a certain aggregate. Additional diversions to be permitted within the province of Ontario shall not exceed a certain daily diversion at the rate of 10,000 cubic feet per second. Now, I wish to suggest that this is one of a class of treaties which should be confirmed by statutory enactment, because, unless it is so confirmed, any person living along the banks of the Niagara river, a riparian owner or other person interested in the flow of that water, whose rights are prejudicially affected, could go into the courts of Ontario and secure an injunction against the proposed diversion, if he showed that any right vested in him was injuriously affected thereby. And in the proceedings for injunction I suggest that this treaty dealing with private or public property interests in the province of Ontario, which has been ratified only by act of His Majesty the King and which has not been confirmed by act of this parliament, would not be considered in any court of justice as authorizing the diversion or the works which are contemplated by the terms of this treaty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It should be confirmed by statute?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, confirmed by statute. Therefore it seems to me we should make a clear distinction between those classes of treaties which may be ratified by His Majesty, by reason of the exercise of his royal prerogative, and by reason of the exercise of such royal prerogative be given full legal effect to in this country, and those other classes of treaties which deal with matters of public revenue and expenditure or which alienate public rights in property or which prejudicially interfere with private property rights. And the latter class, if they are to be respected and enforced by the courts of the country, should receive statutory confirmation by the parliament of Canada or by the legislature of the province. I do not wish to discuss another aspect of the question because it is clear under the constitution that certain treaties made between the empire and foreign countries may be enforced by legislation of this parliament, even although the terms of the treaty may override and conflict with legislative enactments of the provinces.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): There are one or two aspects of the case, and particularly the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), to which I wish to devote a moment or two. One statement made by the leader of the opposition was that the scenic properties were not given consideration, but that it was a matter of the securing of power. May I assure the hon. gentleman that that was not the purpose; the purpose rather was to take such steps as would prevent the very thing deprecated by the hon. member and others who are interested in the scenic properties of the falls, namely, the convergence of a large volume of water over the Horseshoe and the erosion at a very rapid rate of the Horseshoe itself.

Let me say that a great deal of study has been given this matter in the past ten years by the engineers who have investigated the methods suggested by my hon. friend. Those methods have been thoroughly examined and the consensus of opinion on the part of the engineers who have advised both the provincial government and the state of New York, the federal government at Washington and our government here, was that the submerged weir would ensure the best results. The diversion of twenty thousand feet more is merely incidental to the trial of what the engineers in their judgment consider the best method whereby to preserve the scenic qualities of the falls. That is all I have to say in that respect.

As regards the question of not considering the Spray lakes matter from the same standpoint as the Niagara falls question, I may say to my hon. friend that exactly the same study was made in both cases, and that study indicated that no great damage would ensue from the proposal of the Calgary Power Company. Later on some delay occurred owing to the fact that the provincial government intervened and was desirous of utilizing this storage basin as a provincial undertaking. Naturally there was a delay in order to allow them to study the whole question.

Mr. BENNETT: Several years, was it not?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, we have been about ten years altogether studying the Niagara falls proposition, and the same care has been taken in connection with both projects. My hon. friend will agree that in Canada there is a very considerable public opinion on the desirability of preserving, as nature left them, many of the scenic spots which are to be found throughout the country. With that view I have no quarrel. Let me say, however, that my study of the Spray lakes problem, the study made by the officials of the department, has convinced me that the proper thing to do is to leave the Spray lakes out of the Banff park reservation altogether. It will be outside the park reservation, and so long as a flowage of 350 cubic second feet for the three summer months, is guaranteed in the Spray river, we are prepared to issue a license to anyone who is desirous of going in there. The first opportunity to develop will be given to the provincial government, then to any power company that may wish to develop the undertaking, provided they build a tunnel to carry the water.

I have nothing to say with respect to the small controversy that has arisen as to whether this resolution shall be statutory or by the approval of parliament.

Mr. CAHAN: It is not a small controversy; the matter is important.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I must take exception to the last statement of my colleague (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) who dismisses this weighty matter as a small affair. Hon. gentlemen in this house will feel that my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has rendered a very helpful service in making clear the distinction between public law and statute law, which I gather was one of his objectives in the debate.

With regard to what we are doing at the moment, I think my hon. friend will agree that we are not attempting more than to carry out the third article of the treaty, which provides that:

> The present convention shall be ratified by His Britannic Majesty in accordance with constitutional practice, and by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the senate thereof.

As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has said, the constitutional practice which we are following in this parliament is to have all treaties approved in the first instance by both houses of parliament; and that is what just now we are seeking to have done. But it is possible that, in carrying out the provisions of the treaty, further enactments in the nature of statutes may be necessary. The only point that seems to me to come up in the way of difference between us is whether both the approval of the treaty itself in a broad way and the statutory provisions that may be essential to the carrying out of all its provisions, must be a part of the one document and effected simultaneously.

Mr. CAHAN: If the Prime Minister will pardon the interruption, I tried to make the distinction between the constitutional practice to which he is now referring, and the other practice which I shall presently mention. The constitutional practice to which the Prime Minister is now referring is a practice largely inaugurated by himself for the purpose of protecting the autonomous position of Canada, to which end he submitted to parliament his resolution that the government of Canada should not give assent to the ratification of a treaty unless approval had first been obtained from the Canadian parliament. But there is another constitutional practice of equal importance in vogue in Great Britain whereby parliament has asserted its right in respect of treaties proposed to be ratified by the king, namely: that when such treaties involve the revenues or expenditures of the country, or alienate property within the territory of the country, or prejudically affect private vested interests, in these cases it is in accord with another constitutional practice, I believe, that such treaties before ratification by His Majesty should be first approved and confirmed by imperial statute. I was trying to make that point clear.

Motion agreed to.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS

The house resumed, from May 16, consideration in committee of Bill No. 179, respecting juvenile delinquents—Mr. Lapointe —Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 22—Parent or guardian may be ordered to pay fine, damages or costs.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I wish to make two changes in this section. In the third line of subsection 2 the word "sixteen" should be "twenty", and in subsection 4, line sixteen, the word "nine" should be "ten". Perhaps that is why some hon. gentlemen thought the other night the parents might not receive notice. Section 9 was not the proper reference; under section 10 notice is given in every case.

Mr. BENNETT: Does my hon. friend now think subsection 4 is sufficiently connected with subsection 2?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend was referring the other night to section 9, which has nothing to do with notice to parents; he will see that section 10 provides that parents and guardians always must receive notice.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will pardon me if I point out that in addition I was endeavouring to suggest that I had some doubt whether that notice would bring sufficiently home to the parents the possibility of their being charged with financial responsibility, because the notice under section 10—

Mr. LAPOINTE: —is a notice of the prosecution against the child.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, and I though we should make it clear in the terms of the notice that there was a possibility of the parent being mulcted by a fine or by having to assume financial responsibility. In other words, a notice might be sent in a casual sort of way, directed to one of several persons, but after the hearing the magistrate might order the parent to assume the responsibility, and it might be successfully contended that it is doubtful whether the parent had notice of that particular point—if I make myself clear. In other words, I might ask for a judgment against some person for $25,000; the name of another person might be in the complaint, with an inferential direction to that person. That person might not turn up; he might say, "I am not interested in this case; it is just a judgment against someone else." What I feared was that the parent might not be given ample notice of what might result by not appearing.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Of course, this not only has the approval of but is urged by the committee. Probably the first two lines of subsection 4 might be sufficient:

> No order shall be made under this section without giving the parent or guardian an opportunity of being heard.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what I think.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have no objection to making this subsection read as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps we can go through the rest of the bill and then return to this section later. I believe the minister and I are of the same opinion, and it is only a question of method.

Section stands.

Sections 23 and 24 agreed to.

On section 25—Children under twelve.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The only change is that the words "of neglected children" are left out after the word "superintendent". They are unnecessary because the word "superintendent" is defined in the general section.

Section agreed to.

On section 26—Children to be separated from adults.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): How is it that with a section of this kind we still have forty children in our penitentiaries?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will see that by subsection 2 this does not apply to a child who has been proceeded against by indictment under section 9 of this act, and it does not apply to places where there is no juvenile court. As I said the other day, this act applies only in certain places where provision has been made for a juvenile court and where a proclamation has been issued to that effect.

The other day I was asked as to the number of places under this act; at that time I had no information, but now I can give those places in Ontario if my hon. friend would like to have them.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): If you please.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In Ontario there is the city of Ottawa; the city of Toronto; the city of Stratford and the county of Perth; the judicial district of Timiskaming; the city of Berlin—now the city of Kitchener—and the county of Waterloo, which came under the act in 1914; the city of Brantford and the county of Brant; town of St. Marys; city of Galt; city of Windsor; town of Walkerville; town of Ford; county of Grey; county of Huron; county of Haldimand; city of Hamilton; district of Nipissing; county of Lincoln; town of Port Colborne; county of Middlesex; city of London; town of Cochrane, excepting certain townships; town of Dundas; and city of Oshawa. Apart from those places in Ontario, there can be no juvenile delinquent under the act. A boy of sixteen has to stand his trial under the criminal code in the ordinary way.

Mr. McNUTT: Does that apply to Nova Scotia?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will give the list for the rest of Canada: city of Winnipeg; city of Vancouver; city of Victoria; city and royalty of Charlottetown; town of Summerside; city of Halifax; city of Montreal; province of Alberta; county of Pictou; district of Dauphin; province of Saskatchewan; each electoral district of British Columbia; province of Manitoba.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Of the forty juveniles in the penitentiaries, twenty-six have come from institutions. It would look as though a boy could be taken up under this juvenile system and sent to an institution, but if he escaped he would be sent immediately to a penitentiary.

Mr. STEVENS: If he is incorrigible.

[Mr. A. E. Ross.]

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The warden of the penitentiary has told me that just as soon as they escape they are sent down to the penitentiary, and that does not look as though they are complying with this section.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That would show the advisability of having separate institutions for the young offenders, whether they have been tried by way of indictment or otherwise. I will try to get the Minister of Finance to help me in that regard.

Mr. BENNETT: If it does not involve any money he might help you.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): We have been working along these lines for years and I thought there would be something done when this meeting was held last fall. We have been told that when juveniles are sent to penitentiary they will not be permitted to come in touch with "lifers," and yet just two weeks ago I found one in a penitentiary who was sitting on a bench with a "lifer." It does not look to me as though a boy would have a chance if he is treated in that way, and the report of the superintendent of penitentiaries shows many cases of this kind. These boys are placed side by side with the "lifers," they work at the same benches, and they cannot be disputed. I have followed up a couple of cases myself and have found that to be true. Once a boy escapes from one of these institutions to which he has been sent he is immediately sent to the penitentiary.

Section agreed to.

On section 27—Juvenile court committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Subsection 3 provides that a petition must be presented before the power can be exercised.

Section agreed to.

On section 28—Duties of committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no change in this section except by the elimination of four words which were thought to be unnecessary.

Section agreed to.

Sections 29 to 31 agreed to.

On section 32—Probation officers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would like to explain the exception for the province of Alberta. In that province the probation officer does not function directly under the juvenile court judge because the judge is not appointed. An existing official is designated to act in that capacity and the probation officer is directly responsible to a central authority at Edmonton.

Section agreed to.

On section 33—Adults liable.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This section extends the jurisdiction to persons other than the parents or guardian of the child. Under the old section only the parents or guardian could be held responsible.

Section agreed to.

On section 34—Penalty for inducing.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is really nothing contentious in this section.

Section agreed to.

On section 35—No preliminary hearing.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The only change is to make the provisions of the criminal code applicable.

Section agreed to.

On section 36—Contempt of court.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is making the court a real one in this respect.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. minister will agree that this matter is one which has engaged the attention of tribunals to a great extent. There were two prominent cases in England during the last few months, and perhaps the minister has had his attention directed to them. It is a very extraordinary power to confer upon any court, this power to punish for contempt of the court itself. Perhaps the section may not be used to any great extent, but I suggest to the minister that under the circumstances he make the penalty somewhat smaller.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I share the view of my hon. friend to a large extent, but the committee of the child's welfare organization suggested imprisonment as well as a fine for contempt of the juvenile court. After discussion with my officials I came to the conclusion that we should limit it to a fine only. I have struck out "imprisonment."

Mr. BENNETT: Under the circumstances I think that is right.

Section agreed to.

On section 37—Appeals by special leave.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a new section.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. It is to give the right of appeal. In this case I again did not go as far as the committee asked me to do. They recommended appeal as of right. I came to the conclusion that we should not grant the appeal in indictable offences, but still, to meet their views to some extent, I have made it subject to special leave granted by a judge of the supreme court in the province. Then, instead of going to the appeal court as under the criminal code, the appeal will be heard by a judge of the supreme court of the province.

Mr. BENNETT: The right of appeal to a judge of the supreme court should be ample, but it having been made possible to go to the court of appeal, might it not be better to go there first of all and thereby save two appeals?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is only one appeal.

Mr. BENNETT: The section reads:

> Save that the appeal shall be to a supreme court judge instead of to the court of appeal, with a further right of appeal to the court of appeal by special leave of that court.

What I have in mind is this: that as the procedure is inexpensive when you get into that kind of litigation, there is always a desire to exhaust the courts to which it may be taken. The only query I make is whether or not it might be advisable to permit an appeal to the court of appeal if a judge of that court granted leave. That would end the matter because the cases would be very few. As it stands now, it goes by leave to a single judge; he hears it and then the court of appeal may grant leave of appeal.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What would my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. BENNETT: I daresay only extraordinary cases would ever go to the court of appeal.

Section agreed to.

On section 38—Act to be liberally construed.

Mr. BENNETT: I think this would be a very good section to have at the end of the bill. As a matter of drafting, it should be the last section of the bill except the repealing section.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But there is no change.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a declaration which appropriately comes after you have given all the other sections of the act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, but we have merely followed the old act in that respect, because the subsequent sections followed in the old act also.

Section agreed to.

On section 39—Not to affect provincial statutes.

The CHAIRMAN: There is a change in the third line by the addition of the words "intended for the protection or benefit of children," after the word "statute."

Mr. LAPOINTE: That was to make it clearer.

Section agreed to.

On section 40—Repeal of former law.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No change.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the former section 35.

Section agreed to.

On section 41—Sections 12 (4) and 17 (3) in force in Canada.

The CHAIRMAN: This is new.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is a necessary self-explanatory provision on account of the rest of the legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the one about publications in newspapers. It is a very serious innovation. It provides that special provisions of the statute shall be in force in all parts of Canada whether this act is otherwise in force or not. While it is highly desirable that newspaper references to these cases should disappear, the fact is that this is very peculiar legislation. The section reads:

> Subsection (4) of section 12 and subsection (3) of section 17 shall be in force in all parts of Canada, whether this act is otherwise in force or not.

It is substantive legislation applying to every part of Canada, regardless of the application of the act otherwise in any province or city or town.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will see, if not the necessity, the importance of it. The first clause mentioned in section 41 concerns newspapers. Of course, as regards the province of Quebec, I think only the city of Montreal comes under the provisions of the act.

Mr. BENNETT: Now the act will apply to the whole province.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If it were not for this provision it would be possible for a newspaper published in Quebec City and read in Montreal or the Montreal district, to contain the names and other details concerning young offenders.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. BENNETT: I am wholly in accord with the principle, but the method by which it is brought to operation may cause difficulty in connection with some newspapers which are trying to conform to the law. This section is really a new statute with respect to the publication of accounts of these proceedings in newspapers in every part of Canada. It is highly desirable, but it is put in such a way in the statute that it is made difficult to understand.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend suggests that it should be clearer.

Mr. BENNETT: It is making this part of the substantive law of the country apply to every part of Canada. Regardless of whether the act is in force, for instance, in the city of Moose Jaw, this portion of the statute will be applicable to the whole of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and to that extent it curtails properly the license heretofore exercised by newspapers in connection with matters of this kind. The question is only one of making it plain to the newspapers. They will be anxious to obey the law once they know what it is, but it is not clear with a little section in the statute bringing other provisions into force with respect to the whole of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think this section is necessary. Subsection (4) of section 12 already states:

> Subsection (3) of this section shall apply to all newspapers and other publications published anywhere in Canada, whether or not this act is otherwise in force in the place of publication.

This should be sufficient without section 41 of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: But the section must have been put there for some purpose.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It merely gives effect to what is already stated in subsection (4) of section 12.

Mr. STEVENS: It includes subsection (3) of section 17.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Even there it is made clear. Subsection (3) of section 17 reads as follows:

> (3) If a person, whether a child or an adult, against whom any warrant has issued out of a juvenile court cannot be found within the jurisdiction of the juvenile court out of which the same was so issued, but is or is suspected to be in any other part of Canada, any judge or deputy judge of a juvenile court within whose jurisdiction such person is or is suspected to be, or if there is no juvenile court having jurisdiction in such place, then any justice within whose jurisdiction such person is or is suspected to be, upon proof being made on oath or affirmation of the handwriting of the juvenile court judge or other officer who issued the same, shall make an endorsement on the warrant, signed with his name, authorizing the execution thereof within his jurisdiction.

So the two things which are mentioned in section 41 are, already in the bill. We might do without section 41. It merely repeats what is already in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is desirable to continue it there so that there shall be no doubt as to its application.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If those two things were not already there, I agree that this would not be sufficient.

Section agreed to.

On section 42—When act shall be enforced.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no change there except, "subject to the provisions of section forty-one."

Section agreed to.

On section 43—Any city or town may ask for this law.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am struck by the unfairness of this thing. For instance, you have children from the county being tried in the city, and they are being treated differently from the city children.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is there any county my hon. friend has in mind?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The county of Frontenac. The city of Kingston may have a juvenile court, but the children of the county of Frontenac will be treated in a different way from the city children. They must go to the penitentiary or prison.

Mr. BENNETT: Not necessarily the penitentiary.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): To the prison or penitentiary. The juvenile courts have the privilege of treating the city children in a different way and sending them to some other place of detention. It may be claimed that more crime exists among city children, but I do not think so in proportion to the number. The unfair thing is that children from parts of the province where there is no juvenile court will be sent to the penitentiary or prison, whereas the city children will go elsewhere.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend understands the obstacle that we have in the British North America Act. The penitentiaries are under federal jurisdiction, but all other prisons and institutions, hospitals and asylums, are under the province, and we could not enforce this act except with the cooperation of the province and the local authorities.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): When I asked the minister in regard to these forty children he claimed that some would be from districts outside the jurisdiction of this act. That is what I point out as an unfair feature, that those outside the jurisdiction of this act must go to penitentiary or prison.

Section agreed to.

Section 44 agreed to.

On section 45—Operation of act.

Mr. CLARK: I cannot see any really new provisions in the act that ensure the segregation of juveniles from adult criminals in the penitentiaries. I would ask the minister to point to the sections of the bill with respect to that phase of the matter which make provisions not contained in the old act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As far as that goes we have not changed the old act. The amendments are rather on questions of procedure, providing for the right of appeal, for instance, and to make the act more workable.

Mr. CLARK: Then there is no attempt by this act to ensure the segregation of juveniles from adults in the penitentiaries?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not in this act.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Has the minister any intention of dealing with that matter this session?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is my intention—I am speaking for myself just now—and I have warned the Minister of Finance that I shall appeal to him before the session is over.

Mr. CLARK: Will it require a special act, or just an amendment to some existing act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Merely an item in the estimates.

Mr. CLARK: It will be done by regulation rather than by legislation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, absolutely.

Section agreed to.

Section 46 agreed to.

On section 22—Parent or guardian may be ordered to pay fine, damages or costs.

Mr. BENNETT: I think this section might be improved upon, but I do not think it will work any great injustice as it is.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend thinks of some amendment we can have the section changed in the senate.

Mr. BENNETT: The senate may amend the bill, but in view of the fact that cases such as I mention will not often happen, I am not going to insist upon an amendment.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. LAPOINTE moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): May I ask the minister if during the discussion of his estimates on penitentiaries he will have an announcement to make in regard to the detention of juveniles in penitentiaries?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend has already asked me what my intention was, and I have told him. I hope I shall be as persuasive with my colleagues as he was with me.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I just wished to say that I have some suggestions to make in regard to the matter when the estimates are up.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

CONVENTION OF 1924 BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES RESPECTING REGULATION OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, on the motion to go into committee of supply to consider the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, I would ask the privilege for a few moments of referring to the enforcement of the National Prohibition Act of the United States, particularly in regard to British shipping and shipping of Canadian registry.

On January 16th, 1929, the eighteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States was ratified. That constitutional amendment inaugurated an entire change in the attitude of the government and people of the United States to the sale, transportation, exportation and importation of intoxicating liquors. It has one remarkable omission, that neither in the amendment itself nor in the Volstead Act, known as the National Prohibition Act, which was passed in October, 1919, is any prohibition or penalty imposed upon the purchase or consumption of intoxicating liquors within the territorial domains of the United States. Therefore those residents there who can induce others to sell may legitimately purchase, and there is no penalty imposed for their consumption of the liquor so purchased. This act came into effect in January, 1920.

To prevent the smuggling of liquor into the United States from the sea, the United States congress included in its tariff act of September, 1922, the provisions of section 581 of that act, authorizing federal officials of the United States—

> —to go on board of any vessel or vehicle at any place in the United States, or within four leagues of the coast of the United States, to examine the manifest and to inspect, search and examine the vessel or vehicle, and every part thereof, and any person, trunk or package on board, and to this end hail and stop such vessel or vehicle, if under way, and to use all necessary force to compel compliance, and if it shall appear that any breach or violation of the laws of the United States has been committed whereby or in consequence of which such vessel or vehicle, or the merchandise, or any part thereof, on board of or imported by such vessel, or vehicle, is liable to forfeiture, it shall be the duty of such officer to make seizure of the same, and to arrest any person engaged in such breach or violation.

This tariff act of 1922, which has been held to be binding upon the courts of the United States, extended their jurisdiction beyond the three-mile limit up to the twelve-mile limit, and to that extent purported to authorize infringements upon the rights of other nations beyond the three-mile limit, rights which are clearly established by the well recognized rules of international law.

Therefore, while the courts of the United States are legally bound to enforce the provisions of the tariff act of 1922, which provides for the twelve-mile limit, no other nation is bound to recognize that twelve-mile limit, and United States customs officials beyond the three-mile and up to the twelve-mile limit have, so far as established rules of international law are concerned, no right to inspect or seize vessels flying the flag of any other nation.

In discussing proposed amendments to the tariff act of 1922, Senator Sterling said that the United States Secretary, Mr. Hughes, had taken up with the British government the question of reaching an agreement whereby searches of British vessels outside of the three-mile limit would be permitted. He stated that the Secretary of State was of the opinion:

—that the three-mile limit was generally accepted among the principal maritime nations of the world as the limit of a nation's jurisdiction over the adjacent sea, and that the government had on more than one occasion committed itself to that limit. Hence, in the view of the Secretary, there should be an international understanding or agreement in regard to the matter. Otherwise interference with foreign vessels, outside the three-mile limit, might bring about international complications and subject the government to claims for damages.

I am quoting from the Congressional Record, volume 62, Part II, page 11593. Under the conditions which then existed, the seizure by the United States coastguard service of a British vessel within twelve miles from the coast of the United States was authorized by the statute law of that country, which its courts were bound to respect but which other nations, to preserve their rights under international law, would be bound to protest. And the government of Great Britain did persistently protest against seizures of British vessels at any greater distance than three marine miles from the coast of the United States.

In 1922 the case arose of the Cunard Steamships Company versus Mellon, which is reported in 262 United States Reports, page 122. Mr. Justice Van Devanter in delivering the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States said:

It is now settled in the United States and recognized elsewhere, that the territory subject to its jurisdiction includes the land areas under its dominion and control, the ports, harbours, bays and other enclosed arms of the sea along its coast and a marginal belt of the sea extending from the coast line outward a marine league or three geographic miles.

So that by that unanimous decision of the Supreme Court of the United States up to the three mile limit was recognized as the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, as it had been recognized throughout the British Dominions by the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act of 1878, which declared that:

—any part of the open sea within one marine league from the coast measured from low water mark, be deemed to be open sea within the territorial waters of Her Majesty's Dominions.

To show how completely the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States coincided with the opinion entertained by the government of Great Britain, I find that in 1923, in 163 Commons Hansard, column 961, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs stated the views of the British government in these terms:

The doctrine of territorial waters is not laid down in any international instrument, but the jurisdiction of nations over coastal waters has been accepted by usage and is now a recognized rule of international law; His Majesty's government have always maintained that by international law and practice, the general limit of territorial jurisdiction is three miles, but from time to time claims to extend the three mile limit have been advanced by different states. Such claims, which amount to annexation of the high seas, could only be made effective by international agreement.

The convention between the United States and Great Britain, of 1924, had its inception in a letter written by Mr. Charles E. Hughes, United States Secretary of State, and dated June 26, 1922. This letter was addressed to the British Ambassador at Washington with regard to the possibility of aid by the British government by means of—Cooperation on the part of the British and American authorities with regard to the smuggling of liquor.

It does seem to me most peculiar indeed that authentic copies of this correspondence between the British governments and the United States government, which was given to the press by the Department of State at Washington some two years ago and which has been cited by various legal authorities in the United States in the discussions before their own courts, and in contributions to their legal reviews, should not be available to the House of Commons of Canada, which is directly concerned in those negotiations and in the interpretation of the convention which was consummated as the result of those negotiations; because there is one rule of interpretation of treaties which I think is accepted by all modern nations, namely, that the correspondence leading up to the completion and ratification of a treaty is relevant always for the purpose of construing the purport and intent of the treaty so negotiated. Therefore it is rather surprising that when we desire to construe the terms of that convention, which has now been laid upon the table of the house, there should not be available to us the correspondence which led up to the consummation of the treaty. In this diplomatic note the United States Secretary of State, on June 26, 1922, suggested that an——international arrangement between the United States and Great Britain, under which the authorities of each nation would be authorized to exercise, beyond the three mile limit of territorial waters, a measure of control over vessels belonging to the other——was most desirable. The note proceeded to allege that:

The situation with which the authorities of this government are confronted has become so serious that this government feels prompted to inquire whether your government would be disposed to enter into a treaty for the purpose of checking the illegal practices in question. Such a treaty might contain reciprocal provisions authorizing the authorities of each government to exercice the right of search of the other beyond the three mile limit of territorial waters, to the extent of twelve miles from the shore.

There was implied in that note an admission that the United States government had a right of search and seizure within the territorial limit of three miles, but that its right of search and seizure between the limit of three miles and the limit of twelve miles, enacted by the United States Tariff Act of 1922, depended upon the acquiescence of foreign governments.

On November 13, 1922, the British government replied at length, stating in detail the measures which they had taken to prevent breaches of British laws by persons engaged in the liquor trade with the United States. The British note then proceeds:

His Majesty's government had thus taken steps, even before the receipt of representations from the United States government, to prevent the practices, to which attention has now been drawn. They have now, as already indicated, issued supplementary instructions in the matter and hope that the measures taken will prove successful in preventing any breaches of the local law. They feel, however, more difficulty in accepting the proposal that a treaty should be made authorizing the authorities of each government to exercise a right of search of vessels of the other beyond the three mile limit of territorial waters up to a distance of twelve miles from the shore.

His Majesty's government have consistently opposed any extension of the limit of territorial waters such as that now suggested. They feel that the outbreak of smuggling which has led to the proposal cannot be regarded as a permanent condition, but is one which will no doubt be suppressed by the United States authorities within the not-distant future. While, therefore, they are desirous of assisting the United States government to the best of their ability in the suppression of the traffic and in the prevention of the abuse of the British flag by those engaged in it, they do not feel that they can properly acquiesce, in order to meet a temporary emergency, in the abandonment of a principle to which they attach great importance.

In communicating the above to you I am directed to add that while His Majesty's government are, as already indicated, unable to acquiesce in the proposed treaty for the extension of territorial waters, they are nevertheless most desirous of taking any steps within their power to prevent any infractions of the local law by persons engaged in liquor smuggling.

In the meantime, on September 13, 1922, the British vessel Gardner was seized twenty-two miles from the coast of the United States, and the British government protested against this seizure on the ground that it had taken place beyond the three mile limit. On account of, or at least following, this protest by the British government, on November 9, 1922, instructions were issued to the United States collector of customs by the United States Secretary of the Treasury, as follows:

The department is in receipt of your telegram of the 8th instant, relative to the seizure of the British auxiliary schooner M. M. Gardner on September 13, 1922.

It appears from your report that the seizure was made outside the three mile limit, and that while the master admitted unloading part of the cargo beyond the three mile limit there is no evidence that the vessel was communicating with the shore by means of her own small boats or equipment. Under these circumstances it is the desire of the Department of State and the Department of Justice that all foreign vessels so seized shall be released, and you will be governed accordingly. A report should be made to the department in each instance.

So that the government of the United States at that time, even before the negotiation of the treaty, by its acts and its orders, acquiesced in the contentions contained in the protest of the British government. The newspapers at that time reported that approximately twenty vessels were released under this order, but the United States government retained possession of a British vessel named the Grace and Ruby, which they claimed had been searched and seized beyond the three mile limit but which had been in communication with the shore by means of her small boats. In regard to the retention of the Grace and Ruby, on December 30, 1922, the British ambassador wrote the United States Department of State as follows:

In order to avoid the possibility of any misunderstanding, I am desired by my government to make it clear that His Majesty's government are unable to acquiesce in what they understand to be the ruling of the United States government, namely, that foreign vessels may be seized outside the three mile limit if it can be shown that they have established contact with the shore for illegal purposes by means of their own small boats. My government must reserve their right to lodge a protest in any individual case in which action may be taken by the United States government under this ruling.

That was a clear protest on the part of the British government against the search and seizure beyond the three-mile limit of British vessels which were or had been in communication by their own boats with the coast of the United States.

On January 18, 1923, the United States Secretary of State replied as follows:

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your note, No. 973, of December 30, 1922, stating that your government desires you to make it clear that it is unable to acquiesce in what it understands to be the ruling of the United States government, namely, that foreign vessels may be seized outside the three-mile limit if it can be shown that they have established contact with the shore for illegal purposes by means of their own small boats. You state that your government must reserve the right to lodge a protest in any individual case in which action may be taken by the United States government in cases of this character.

I have the honour to state that consideration has been given to the statements contained in your note, and the conclusion has been reached that the government of the United States should adhere to the position it has previously taken, that foreign vessels outside the three-mile limit may be seized when it is established that they are using their small boats in illegal operations within the three-mile limit of the United States. This conclusion is supported by the position taken by the British government in the case of the British Columbia schooner Araunah, which was seized off Copper island, by the Russian authorities in 1888, because it appeared that members of the crew of the schooner were illegally taking seals in Behring sea by means of canoes operated between the schooner and the land, and it was affirmed that two of the canoes were within half a mile of the shore. Lord Salisbury stated that Her Majesty's government were of opinion that, even if the Araunah at the time of the seizure was herself outside the three-mile territorial limit, the fact that she was, by means of her boats, carrying on fishing within Russian waters without the prescribed license warranted her seizure and confiscation according to the provisions of the municipal law regulating the use of those waters.

Therefore the negotiations at that period had this result: The United States abandoned their claim that they had the right to seize British vessels outside the three-mile limit except those which were communicating for illegal purposes, or in breach of the laws of the United States, with the shore of that country by their own boats. On April 30, 1923, that was followed by a statement made by Mr. McNeill, Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in the British House of Commons at Westminster, in which, referring to the case of the Grace and Ruby, he said:

> His Majesty's government have questioned the right of the United States government to make this seizure, and diplomatic correspondence on the subject is proceeding.

Therefore, at that time the government of Great Britain did not acquiesce even in the claim of the United States government that it had a right to seize beyond the three-mile limit British vessels which were in communication with the shore by their own small boats.

On July 10, 1923, the British Charge d'Affaires at Washington wrote to the United States Secretary of State in reference to the condemnation of the Henry L. Marshall, which was alleged to have transferred her cargo of liquor to an American vessel at a point ten miles off the coast of the United States; he stated that this vessel was not entitled to British registry. There had been a fraudulent transfer to British registry, the vessel really being owned by a citizen of the United States, and the British government intimated that they did not intend to exercise their diplomatic privileges for the protection of an American who had procured a fraudulent certificate of registry under British law. However, the British Chargé d'Affaires continued:

> In order to avoid the possibility of any misunderstanding on the part of the United States government as to His Majesty's government's attitude in this matter I have the honour, under instructions from His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to inform you that any attempt on the part of the United States authorities to seize a British ship outside the three-mile limit would be regarded by His Majesty's government as creating a very serious situation. In regard to the Henry L. Marshall case, I have been instructed to explain that the absence of a protest by His Majesty's government against the condemnation of this vessel in no way implies any alteration in the views of His Majesty's government with regard to the principle at stake, inasmuch, as that vessel, owing to the circumstances in which she secured her British registry, was not recognized by His Majesty's government as entitled to British registry. Consequently, His Majesty's government have not felt called upon to assert the principle at stake on her behalf, since, as far as His Majesty's government are concerned, the Henry L. Marshall remains an American vessel.

Again, in diplomatic language, the British government made a most emphatic protest against the seizure of this vessel beyond the three-mile limit from the American coast. On July 16, 1923, before the negotiations for the 1924 liquor convention were consummated, Mr. Charles E. Hughes, United States Secretary of State, replied to the note which I have just read, justifying the seizure of a British vessel if the facts show—I quote:

> —that its direct and single effort was by fraudulent means to introduce the cargo, and all of it within the territory of the United States; and that the vessel prior to and at the time of its actual seizure, even though more than three miles from the shore, was hovering off the coasts of the United States and engaged in an attempt to violate the laws of the United States by the introduction of liquor into its territory.

This is the first time that the American doctrine was expressed that vessels hovering near the three-mile limit, but just beyond that limit, were liable to seizure by the United States authorities and thereupon liable to forfeiture by decree of the United States federal courts.

In the meantime a draft treaty had been prepared by Mr. Hughes, Secretary of State, and submitted on behalf of the government of the United States to the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The terms of the draft treaty proposed that each of the two governments would be permitted to board vessels of the other within a distance of twelve geographical miles from the coast, in order to make inquiry whether such vessels or the persons on board were engaged in an attempt to violate the laws of the other party to the proposed treaty. That was a clear suggestion of the desire of the United States to incorporate into the rules of international law, which limited the territorial jurisdiction to three miles, that provision of the United States Tariff Act of 1922 which extended the jurisdiction of their officials and of their courts to a limit of twelve miles from their coasts. In pursuing the discussion on this treaty, on July 19, 1923, Mr. Hughes, the Secretary of States for the United States, wrote to the British government making an official declaration. Before I read that declaration I wish again to emphasize the contention that in respect of a treaty which intimately concerns the Dominion of Canada, and in the interpretation of which the correspondence which preceded its ratification is absolutely necessary for a clear understanding of its import, we should not be denied access to that official correspondence. I have a part of that correspondence as published in the American press and also as quoted in some of the briefs submitted to the United States federal courts in cases arising out of the seizure of British vessels. Mr. Hughes made this declaration:

> The proposed special agreement would bear only upon those vessels which came within twelve miles but hover off the three-mile limit for the purpose of aiding in the smuggling of intoxicating liquor, or other prohibited articles, into the territory of the United States.

That is a clear declaration that the proposed special agreement would give the United States government officials the right of search and seizure only within the proposed twelve-mile limit of the original draft agreement. Mr. Hughes proceeds:

> It may confidently be asserted that there would be no disposition on the part of the American authorities, and the special agreement would not justify any attempt, to seize a British vessel, save within the limits proposed and when it was clear that the vessel concerned was directly involved in an attempt to introduce its illicit cargo into the territory of the United States.

I think that declaration is one which binds the honour of the government of the United States in dealing with these seizures of British and Canadian vessels beyond the three-mile limit; it was a declaration involving the honour of the United States that no seizures would be made beyond the limit provided for in the draft agreement which was subsequently consummated, signed, ratified and confirmed by this parliament of Canada.

On September 17, 1923, the British government replied, saying:

> So far as British subjects are concerned, there is no violation of any law, British or international, in the sale of such liquors on the high seas to purchasers of any nationality; therefore there is no obligation upon His Majesty's government to interfere with the prosecution of a perfectly legitimate trade. Nevertheless, the whole question has been carefully examined with an earnest desire to afford the United States government any proper assistance in the difficulties which they are encountering in the enforcement of the Volstead Act.

I then omit some matter which is irrelevant for my purpose, and the note concludes:

> I am to add, in view of the difficulties of the case, that His Majesty's government could not agree to the extension of the three-mile limit, even for a limited purpose, until the matter has been submitted to the imperial conference, which will meet within a few weeks in London.

These negotiations clearly disclosed that the British government objected to fixing a distance defined in miles for the exercise of the proposed search and seizure beyond the fixed territorial limit of three miles from the shore; but that, if the territorial limit of three miles were affirmed, the British government was willing to agree not to object to the boarding and search of vessels flying the British flag "outside the limit of territorial waters," but not at a greater distance from the coast than can be "traversed in one hour" by the vessel suspected of committing the offence, except in those cases where the cargo of liquor is intended to be conveyed to the shore by a vessel other than the one boarded and searched, in which event the distance from the shore is determined by the speed of the other vessel.

While these negotiations were pending and under discussion by the two governments, a meeting of the American Society of International Law, held at Washington, D.C., in April, 1923, discussed the matters then at issue in the correspondence between the government of the United States and the government of Great Britain. Mr. Frederick K. Nielson, counsel with the United States Department of State, was present at that conference. His remarks I have taken from the proceedings of the American Society of International Law for the year 1923, at page 38. After Mr. Nielson had stated the position which the United States government had taken in years past with respect to the freedom of the seas beyond the three-mile limit, he said:

I have tried to emphasize the position taken by the United States in the past. It seems clear that until an appropriate agreement respecting the alteration of the well-established rule shall have been reached, the United States, in view particularly of this positive position, cannot justify a departure from that rule for the purpose of dealing with an isolated or temporary situation.

He was referring to the isolated or temporary situation which was created by the enforcement of the Volstead Act and the eighteenth amendment throughout United States territory. At page 46 of the report, Mr. Nielson continued:

Writers who have discussed the so-called Hovering Acts, authorizing the boarding of vessels on the high seas bound for a port, point out that such action cannot be taken pursuant to the exercise of a right, but that it is a permissive jurisdiction in which a nation whose vessels are boarded may acquiesce.

I should like to call the attention of the Prime Minister to that remark, which I believe to be a correct statement of a rule of international law. Mr. Nielson continued:

Of course the action authorized by the so-called Hovering Acts is something different from undertaking to interfere generally with vessels beyond the three mile limit with a view to the prevention of smuggling. We can hardly expect nations to acquiesce generally in such action solely for the purpose of preventing smuggling. The violation of our law is, to be sure, a serious thing, but to other nations there is merely presented a case of difficulty in preventing smuggling. They do not think that drinking wine will destroy or degrade their civilizations. I do not know whether it will or not. I have never made any sociological studies along those lines, but as I say, they do not consider the question so serious as to warrant its being dealt with pursuant to principles underlying the so-called right of self-preservation, and surely they would never concur in the idea expressed by Doctor Stowell—

Who had preceded him.

—as I understood him, that they would assist us in punishing infractions of our laws relating to smuggling. We have enacted such laws and it is incumbent upon us to enforce them. They, of course, concede our sovereign right to do so within our jurisdiction. Surely, they will not admit our right to call upon them to help us exercise our sovereign rights. And in view of positive statements often heard in this country with regard to exclusive sovereign rights, to deal with matters relating to control over imports and immigration, it might not be considered desirable by the people of the United States that foreign countries should volunteer to help us to enforce those rights.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Whose words are those?

Mr. CAHAN: Those of the counsel with the United States State department, Mr. Nielson. At this stage—in November, 1923—the imperial conference assembled at London, and in the correspondence and documents recently brought down by the Prime Minister I find this extract from the summary of the imperial conference of 1923:

During the session of the conference, the question of the regulation of the liquor traffic off the American coasts and of the measures to be taken to avoid a serious conflict either of public opinion or of official action was seriously debated. The conference arrived at the conclusion that while affirming and safeguarding as a cardinal feature of British policy the principle of the three-mile limit, it was yet both desirable and practicable to meet the American request for an extension of the right of search beyond this limit for the above purpose, and negotiations were at once opened with the United States government for the conclusion of an experimental agreement with this object in view.

There was a clear statement of the understanding of the representatives of the various dominions and the British government at that imperial conference in 1923, namely, that, assuming, as they did assume, and as they had a right to assume, that the United States had no right of search beyond the three-mile limit from her coast, nevertheless, in order to assist the United States in the enforcement of its smuggling and other tariff laws it was expedient to meet the United States request for an extension of the right of search beyond this limit for the above purpose, and negotiations were undertaken with that end in view.

I should like to place the treaty on Hansard where it can be read by everyone who takes Hansard, but I suppose I shall not be permitted to do that and I do not wish to take up the time of the house in doing so. Is there any objection?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not at all. Far from it.

Mr. CAHAN: That treaty should be known throughout the length and breadth of this country. It is as follows:

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India;

And the President of the United States of America;

Being desirous of avoiding any difficulties which might arise between them in connection with the laws in force in the United States on the subject of alcoholic beverages;

Have decided to conclude a convention for that purpose;

And have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India:

The Right Honourable Sir Auckland Campbell Geddes, G.C.M.G., K.C.B., his Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United States of America;

The President of the United States of America:

Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State of the United States;

Who, having communicated their full powers found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:—

Article 1

The high contracting parties declare that it is their firm intention to uphold the principle that three marine miles extending from the coastline outwards and measured from low water mark constitute the proper limits of territorial waters.

(1) His Britannic Majesty agrees that he will raise no objection to the boarding of private vessels under the British flag outside the limits of territorial waters by the authorities of the United States, its territories or possessions in order that enquiries may be addressed to those on board and an examination be made of the ship's papers for the purpose of ascertaining whether the vessel or those on board are endeavouring to import or have imported alcoholic beverages into the United States, its territories or possessions in violation of the laws there in force. When such enquiries and examination show a reasonable ground for suspicion, a search of the vessel may be instituted.

(2) If there is reasonable cause for belief that the vessel has committed or is committing or attempting to commit an offence against the laws of the United States, its territories or possessions prohibiting the importation of alcoholic beverages, the vessel may be seized and taken into a port of the United States, its territories or possessions for adjudication in accordance with such laws.

(3) The rights conferred by this article shall not be exercised at a greater distance from the coast of the United States, its territories or possessions than can be traversed in one hour by the vessel suspected of endeavouring to commit the offence. In cases, however, in which the liquor is intended to be conveyed to the United States, its territories or possessions, by a vessel other than the one boarded and searched, it shall be the speed of such other vessel and not the speed of the vessel boarded, which shall determine the distance from the coast at which the right under this article can be exercised.

Article 3

No penalty or forfeiture under the laws of the United States shall be applicable or attach to alcoholic liquors or to vessels or persons by reason of the carriage of such liquors, when such liquors are listed as sea stores or cargo destined for a port foreign to the United States, its territories or possessions, on board British vessels voyaging to or from ports of the United States, or its territories or possessions, or passing through the territorial waters thereof, and such carriage shall be as now provided by law with respect to the transit of such liquors through the Panama canal, provided that such liquors shall be kept under seal continuously while the vessel on which they are carried remains within said territorial waters and that no part of such liquors shall at any time or place be unladen within the United States, its territories or possessions.

Article 4

Any claim by a British vessel for compensation on the grounds that it has suffered loss or injury through the improper or unreasonable exercise of the rights conferred by article 2 of this treaty or on the ground that it has not been given the benefit of article 3 shall be referred for the joint consideration of two persons, one of whom shall be nominated by each of the high contracting parties.

Effect shall be given to the recommendations contained in any such joint report. If no joint report can be agreed upon, the claim shall be referred to the claims commission established under the provisions of the agreement for the settlement of outstanding pecuniary claims signed at Washington the 18th August, 1910 but the claim shall not, before submission to the tribunal, require to be included in a schedule of claims confirmed in the manner therein provided.

Article 5

This treaty shall be subject to ratification and shall remain in force for a period of one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications.

Three months before the expiration of the said period of one year, either of the high contracting parties may give notice of its desire to propose modifications in the terms of the treaty.

If such modifications have not been agreed upon before the expiration of the term of one year mentioned above, the treaty shall lapse.

If no notice is given on either side of the desire to propose modifications, the treaty shall remain in force for another year, and so on automatically, but subject always in respect of each such period of a year to the right on either side to propose as provided above three months before its expiration modifications in the treaty, and to the provision that if such modifications are not agreed upon before the close of the period of one year, the treaty shall lapse.

Article 6

In the event that either of the high contracting parties shall be prevented either by judicial decision or legislative action from giving full effect to the provisions of the treaty the said treaty shall automatically lapse, and, on such lapse or whenever this treaty shall cease to be in force, each high contracting party shall enjoy all the rights which it would have possessed had this treaty not been concluded.

The present convention shall be duly ratified by His Britannic Majesty, and by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the senate thereof: and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention in duplicate, and have thereunto affixed their seals.

Done at the city of Washington, this twenty-third day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four.

(Seal) A. C. Geddes.
(Seal) Charles Evans Hughes.

Article 1 of the treaty reads:

The high contracting parties declare that it is their firm intention to uphold the principle that three marine miles extending from the coastline outwards and measured from low water mark constitute the proper limits of territorial waters.

That was a declaration made, as I said, in accordance with the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Mellon versus the Cunard Company. It was in accord with the pronouncement, which I read, which was made on behalf of the British government in the House of Commons a short time before. Article 2 provides that:

(1) His Britannic Majesty agrees that he will raise no objection to the boarding of private vessels under the British flag outside the limits of territorial waters by the authorities of the United States, its territories or possessions in order that inquiries may be addressed to those on board and an examination be made of the ship's papers for the purpose of ascertaining whether the vessel or those on board are endeavouring to import or have imported alcoholic beverages into the United States, its territories or posessions in violation of the laws there in force. When such inquiries and examination show a reasonable ground for suspicion, a search of the vessel may be instituted.

Then clause (3) of article 2 expressly declares:

The rights conferred by this article shall not be exercised at a greater distance from the coast of the United States, its territories or possessions than can be traversed in one hour by the vessel suspected of endeavouring to commit the offence.

Or in the alternative, in case she is communicating with the shore by means of another vessel, one hour's sail of such other vessel.

The treaty is on the record and can easily be read. In view of the correspondence that took place between the two governments, in view of the solemn declaration made by the United States Secretary of State as to the extent and scope of the proposed treaty, that it would confer no rights whatsoever upon the United States authorities beyond the new limit of one hour's sail therein defined, I suggest that from the date of the ratification of this convention of 1924 the sole and exclusive right of the United States to deal with shipping flying the British flag must be found within the four corners of that convention. That contention is supported by a number of decisions of the federal courts of the United States. I do not pretend to have run all of them down or to have examined all of them closely, but I wish to call attention to a few of them.

After the treaty had been ratified, the case of the Frances Louise arose in the year 1924, in the federal district court of Massachusetts. This vessel was seized sixteen and a half miles off the coast of Cape Cod in the state of Massachusetts and the case was heard and decided by Judge Morton, one of the most distinguished judges of New England. He held in his decision that:

Both nations intended the treaty to deal with the matter in a complete way.

Then he proceeded to state that the terms of the treaty were conclusive in the case of this vessel which had been seized sixteen and a half miles off Cape Cod.

In the following year, 1925, there was the case of the Marjorie E. Bachman which also came before the same judge in the same federal district of Massachusetts. This was a case against a vessel seized twenty-one and two-tenths miles from the Massachusetts coast. Judge Morton dismissed the seizure and said:

In extending the rights of this country, we are invading those of other nations. The question is really one of international law. Moreover, as to British vessels, this country has expressly agreed not to seize them except within the provisions of the treaty. As to them, if there is no case under the treaty, there is no case at all when they are on the high seas.

The next case that I have found was the case of the Sagatind, a Norwegian vessel. After the liquor treaty of 1924 between the United States and Great Britain had been ratified, similar treaties were ratified with a number of other European governments, one with the Norwegian government. The Sagatind was a Norwegian vessel which was seized twenty-two and seven-tenths miles from the coast, after she had delivered, while at anchorage, a cargo of liquor to the Canadian vessel Diamantina, which was also seized the following day at a distance of 16.5 miles from the coast. The federal district court of Massachusetts dismissed the cases against both vessels. The court, commenting upon the Norwegian treaty, which in respect to the Norwegian vessel bore the same relationship as the British-American treaty would bear with reference to a British vessel, said:

The foregoing treaty extends any limitation which might exist upon the jurisdiction of the court to proceed against offending vessels for violations of our laws, prohibiting the importation of alcoholic beverages, to such cases as may come within the terms of the treaty, and I think also implies as an alternative rule of treaty-made law that vessels shall not be proceeded against for violations of such law when seizure was made beyond the distance from the coast prescribed in the treaty. In other words, the treaty deals with the extreme right of seizure upon which initial jurisdiction of the cause of forfeiture depends.

On appeal to the circuit court of appeals, a federal court, the decision was delivered by Judge Hough, one of the most distinguished authorities in admiralty law sitting in the federal courts of the United States. The court of appeals held that the questions involved in the case were exclusively determined by the terms of the treaty, and that the only arguable point was whether the treaties had authorized the proceedings avowed in the record before the court. He also added:

> Nowhere in the treaty can any words be found indicating an intent on the part of the contracting parties to change or extend the limits of the territory of the United States. In fact, the contrary is plainly indicated by Article 1 of each treaty.

Then there arose the case which was heard in 1926 of the Francis E., a British vessel, seized sixteen miles off the Florida coast. On appeal in that case, the circuit court of appeals for the district, a federal court, held:

> There is nothing in the treaty from which it could reasonably be inferred that it was the intention of the high contracting parties to extend the criminal laws of the United States beyond the three-mile limit. The vessel may be seized if those on board have violated any law within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States that would subject her to forfeiture except as to provisions relative to seastores and compensation for loss occasioned by improper acts, not germane to the subject here under discussion. That is the extent of the agreement.

Referring to the treaty, the court also held that "the American-British treaty did not in fact enact criminal legislation" and that no statute had yet been enacted by the United States making illegal the acts committed by foreigners on foreign ships on the high seas, nineteen miles from the coast of the United States.

After I had run these cases down, through the courtesy of the Department of External Affairs, I had access to Jessup, an American authority, who has recently issued a work dealing with marginal waters. After referring to these cases to which I have called attention, Jessup says that the weight of judicial authority—> —certainly sustains the view first enunciated by Judge Morton, in the case of the Frances Louise, that the treaties deal completely with the subject and exclude all extraterritorial seizures not made in conformity with its terms.

I have some other cases, but I do not wish to tax the patience of the house.

I wish to direct the attention of hon. members to the correspondence which has been laid on the table by the Prime Minister between the Hon. Vincent Massey, Canada's representative at Washington, and the State Department of the United States relating to the sinking of the Canadian vessel I'm Alone. The first letter is of March 28, 1929, addressed by Mr. W. R. Castle, Jr., for the United States Secretary of State, to the Hon. Vincent Massey, and simply recounts the facts from the American report. The reply is dated April 9, 1929, and is subscribed by the Hon. Vincent Massey, and directed to the Hon. Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of State of the United States. The Canadian government takes a very, very strong position, a position I think irrefutable in law, in view of the terms of the convention of 1924 and of the correspondence which I have cited to-night and the decisions of the American courts to which I have made allusion. Paragraph 8 says:

> It was of the essence of the convention that its provisions covered the whole field of extra-territorial seizures.

So far as I am concerned, I am not disposed to be critical, but I wish, for the sake of preserving a strong position on the part of the Canadian government for all future time, that that note had practically ended with paragraph 8. I am sure the government will agree with this proposition, that, in our diplomatic correspondence with foreign governments, any formal admission made by this government stands registered for all time against any future claims of this country arising out of a similar situation; and therefore it is very necessary indeed that statements of law should be made only after the most careful consideration and reflection, and that they should be made in such express terms as to leave no doubt whatsoever as to their meaning. This note of Mr. Massey is in the nature of a pleading before a court. I do not know who wrote it, but I am sure that, if he had been accustomed to preparing pleadings in our courts of law, he would realize the advisability on all occasions of stating one's client's case quite fully both as to the facts and the law on which he based his claim; but it is always advantageous to leave the opposing attorney to state his own case, so that in reply you may place your own objections more pertinently and expressly before the court which is to consider the issues. In paragraph 12 of this letter Mr. Massey continues:

> In any case the pursuit lasted through two days and two nights, far beyond the starting point, and the sinking took place over two hundred miles southward in open sea. It has been intimated that pursuit and seizure on the high seas might be justified on the ground of hot and continuous pursuit. It is agreed that international law recognizes that pursuit begun within territorial waters may be continued on the high seas, if immediate and continuous.

Now, first, in the prior correspondence there was no such intimation as Mr. Massey suggests. It had not been intimated that pursuit and seizure on the high seas might be justified on the ground of hot and continuous pursuit. It might better have been left to the American Secretary of State to make that contention, and, in my opinion, such an admission should not in any event have been made on behalf of this government. It will be noted that Mr. Massey proceeds:

It is agreed that international law recognizes that pursuit begun within territorial waters may be continued on the high seas, if immediate and continuous.

I take this opportunity of suggesting that that is not a statement of international law which is generally recognized to-day, and that the admission so made may prove most prejudicial to the interests of Canada in this prospective arbitration, and possibly most prejudicial to the interests of Canada in such cases as may subsequently arise during the existence of that treaty. After making that admission Mr. Massey proceeds:

The validity of this doctrine has been fully recognized by the Canadian courts.

I beg to suggest that there is only one case in which this doctrine has come before the Canadian courts, and I also suggest that it has not been recognized to the extent and in the terms which Mr. Massey has expressed. I refer to the case of the ship North versus the King, reported in the Supreme Court of Canada reports, volume 47, page 385, et sequitur. I wish to call attention to the decision of Mr. Justice Davies,—more recently known, before he died, as Sir Louis Davies,—who gave the decision of the majority of the court. But first let me state the facts under which the decision arose.

The American schooner North was discovered fishing illegally within the three-mile limit with four of her boats out fishing within three miles of the Pacific coast in violation of the treaty of 1818. One of these boats was seized by the Canadian fisheries protection cruiser "Kestrel". The North was pursued and overhauled one and three-quarters miles beyond the three-mile limit. Her boats were out within the three-mile limit, and the "Kestrel" was delayed in overtaking her by stopping to seize one of these boats. Now the North was seized, it is true, beyond the three-mile limit. It was a hot and continuous pursuit. But if I understand that decision correctly, our Supreme Court held that, in the case as between the owners of the American vessel and the King, they were not called upon to consider or to decide whether the vessel had been rightfully seized in accordance with the rules of international law, at the point where she was seized, one and three-quarters miles beyond the three-mile limit. The court held that although the seizure may have been illegal and the first arrest illegal, inasmuch as the vessel was brought within the jurisdiction of Canada, and a proper attachment made subsequently to her being brought into Canadian waters, the court could decide on forfeiture as against the owners, leaving the government of the United States—the vessel being of American registry—either to acquiesce in the seizure having been made, at the place where it was made, or to make a claim for damages on behalf of the owners, which claim would be settled by some international tribunal. Mr. Justice Davies said:

But even if there was a reasonable doubt as to the power of the officers of the cruiser to seize the schooner on the high seas beyond the three-mile limit, under the circumstances before us, I am of the opinion that such irregularity could not affect the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court to hear and determine the offence charged against the schooner. That offence being within the jurisdiction of the court and the vessel being also within such jurisdiction and properly attached and libelled could not plead an alleged irregularity in the mode of her being taken on the high seas as a defence.

The manner in which she was brought into port and within the jurisdiction of the court was, if wrong or irregular, matter for diplomatic protest at the instance of the country to which she belonged or for civil action by the owners of the ship. If that country does not complain of any offence against its honour and dignity the ship libelled cannot do so. If the poaching schooner had escaped into the territorial waters of her own country and had been chased there, captured and brought back the government of that country might well justify intervention. But short of such intervention I think the ship charged with illegal fishing within the three-mile limit being within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court and properly libelled there for an offence committed within its jurisdiction procedings cannot be defeated or the jurisdiction of the court ousted merely by an irregularity in the taking of the ship.

The principle underlying the decisions relating to persons kidnapped and brought before magistrates having jurisdiction over the offence with which they are charged are, I think, in point. These cases show that the remedy for the illegal arrest and the kidnapping of the prisoner is by proceedings at the instance of the government of the foreign country whose law or territory has been violated or at the suit of the injured party against the trespasser.

This doctrine of hot pursuit has been suggested at times by the United States in respect of the pursuit of vessels which have been found within the three-mile limit, committing offences against the customs laws of the United States and which, when an attempt has been made to seize them, have escaped beyond the three-mile limit and have been seized. But I suggest that no British authority has ever made the clear, bald admission, with respect to the validity of this American doctrine of hot pursuit, in the terms in which Mr. Massey makes it in the note from which I have just quoted. And although up to this time the Americans had never suggested in this correspondence that they could vindicate their actions by reason of the hot pursuit of the I'm Alone, Mr. Massey continues in paragraph 14:

It is believed, however, that the government of United States will agree that it is essential for the effective operation of the convention of January, 1924, and for the attainment of the definite and agreed procedure, which was the object of the contracting parties, that the terms of the convention should be strictly observed.

Having thus taken his ground accurately, in express terms and in the most convincing manner, he nevertheless proceeds in the next sentence:

His Majesty's government in Canada trusts that the government of the United States will further agree that the search and seizure of vessels beyond territorial waters should be exercised in accordance with the terms of the convention,—

Splendid; but he unfortunately adds:

—that pursuit should not be continued beyond an hour's sailing distance from the shore unless initiated within territorial waters.

This subsidiary contention destroys the force and effect of his main and valid argument that the United States had no jurisdiction beyond such limits as are defined within the four corners of the treaty. He says that pursuit should not be continued beyond an hour's sailing distance from the shore unless initiated within territorial waters; but clearly the whole purpose and intent of the convention was that pursuit, hot or otherwise, wherever initiated, could never be carried beyond the distance covered by one hour's sail of the pursued vessel from the coast of the United States. To determine that fact, and to secure from the United States an agreement to that end, was the sole purpose of the long continued negotiations between Great Britain and the United States. Moreover, it was due to the express declaration of the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, to which declaration I have already referred, that under this convention there would be no seizure beyond the twelve-mile limit, that the government of Great Britain and, I believe, the government of Canada also were induced to approve of and authorize the ratification of that treaty. That the United States Secretary of State very speedily placed his finger on the weak point in our contention will appear from his letter of April 17, 1929. It is to be found on page 15 of this printed report, about two thirds of the distance down the page:

It is not understood that your government questions the validity of the doctrine of hot pursuit as such but merely its application in the instant case.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Then he goes on to suggest that since Mr. Massey has attached the doctrine of hot pursuit to the express terms of the convention of 1924 he, on behalf of the United States, will press his new vantage point to the extreme. He says:

In the estimation of this government, the correct principle underlying the doctrine of hot pursuit is that if the arrest would have been valid when the vessel was first hailed, but was made impossible through the illegal action of the pursued vessel in failing to stop when ordered to do so, then hot pursuit is justified and the locus of the arrest and the distance of the pursuit are immaterial, provided:

(1) That it was without the territorial waters of any other state;

(2) That the pursuit has been hot and continuous.

Then I would direct attention to the final letter from Mr. Massey, the date of which does not appear to be printed. Paragraph 5 of that letter reads as follows:

5. Even, however, were it not established that the I'm Alone was beyond the treaty limits when ordered to stop, the government of Canada cannot agree that any adequate ground has been established for pursuit on the high seas. They have previously indicated their view that the doctrine of hot pursuit which has been advanced is not applicable to a pursuit which, as is agreed to have been the case in the present instance, did not begin in territorial waters.

There we are endeavouring to limit the application of the doctrine of hot pursuit which we, quite unnecessarily, were led or induced to admit in the very first statement which we made as to our legal position.

I simply wish to direct attention to this and to suggest that if we are to engage in diplomatic correspondence of this nature with other countries, dealing with the rights of Canadian citizens on the high seas or in other parts of the world, it is absolutely necessary that our Department of External Affairs should obtain access to the Department of Justice for legal advice; if that access is not open at the present time, or, if that department is not now thoroughly equipped to deal with the international issues which are sure to arise from time to time, immediate steps should be taken to provide for such thoroughly experienced and competent legal advice as is certainly necessary in dealing with a nation such as the United States which, I say with deliberation, having, through the United States Secretary of State, pledged its honour to one interpretation of that treaty in the most formal manner, now undertakes to sink British shipping on the high seas and to bolster its act of almost deliberate wantonness, by developing an entirely different interpretation of an international convention, which, in its plain terms, does not admit of any such construction.

It seems very clear to me—and I say this deliberately—that under the tariff laws of the United States as they may be construed by their express terms, the coastguard of the United States was not authorized to seize British or any other shipping, save perhaps American shipping, at any point more than twelve miles distant from its coast. In this case the evidence seems clear that this pursuit of two days continued to a point on the high seas 215 miles from the coast, and in my opinion the second coastguard vessel, the Dexter I think, which then came upon the scene, would never have sunk a British ship by cannon shot 215 miles from the coast, unless by wireless she had received direct instructions from the political authorities of the United States to commit that act which, if actually authorized by the executive political authority of that country, was an act of war, or which, if not authorized by that political authority but actually committed on the initiative of the United States coastguard alone, was the equivalent of an act of deliberate piracy.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope the house will recognize that in discussing a matter which has been referred to arbitration under an important treaty the government occupies a position very different from that occupied by an hon. member of this house who also happens to be a member of the opposition. I think it is even questionable whether my hon. friend, though sitting on the opposition side, in view of the fact that at the moment this case has been referred to arbitration, should have gone the length he did this evening in presenting what, to his mind at any rate, will be the Canadian side of the case when the matter comes to be argued before the proper tribunal. Certainly it would be an extraordinary procedure were the government, in the circumstances, to argue with my hon. friend with respect to any aspect of the case.

As a result of correspondence which has taken place between the two governments the I'm Alone incident has been referred to arbitration, and the arbitrators are about to be appointed. In these circumstances I think any criticism which the opposition may have to take against the administration, considering all the factors, might well be raised at a time when it is not calculated to embarrass in any particular those who will be charged with presenting the Canadian side of the case.

May I say that with respect to the correspondence which Mr. Massey, as the Canadian minister at Washington, presented to the American government, our government of course takes full responsibility. Mr. Massey acted under the instructions of the government, and any criticism which may be directed against any communication of his would be properly directed against the administration itself.

My hon. friend has spoken at great length and has given a very lucid and comprehensive statement of the grounds on which he believes the case should be decided in favour of Canada. In so doing he has displayed his great abilities as a counsel, but again I submit that in the interests of the country at large he might have presented his argument to better effect in some other form to those who are at present at work upon this case.

I shall not attempt in any way to review what my hon. friend has said. He began by speaking of the domestic law of the United States of 1922 with respect to the tariff and certain discussions which related thereto. He then reviewed at some length the cases of seizures which had taken place beyond the three-mile limit prior to the enactment of the convention to which he subsequently referred. He made mention of a remark by the Hon. Mr. Hughes, Secretary of State of the United States, which he said in honour bound the United States to a certain position, and having said that much he then came to the convention under which the I'm Alone incident has arisen and said that everything relevant to that particular incident must be contained within the four corners of the convention; in other words, all that he had said up to that time was more or less beside the mark.

Mr. CAHAN: Not beside the mark, but rather in support of the position.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my hon. friend's whole argument will prove to have been in support of the position, and I think it would have been much stronger in that direction if it had not been so critical towards its close. The hon. member next spoke of the cases which had arisen since that convention was concluded all of which undoubtedly will be brought up in the course of the discussion before those who may be appointed as arbitrators in this matter. He came finally to one point in the correspondence between the Canadian government and the United States government and he said in effect: Here is a very serious mistake which has been made on the part of Mr. Massey in his communication with the United States government. He has made mention of the doctrine of hot pursuit. That doctrine, he went on to say, was not raised by the United States government at the outset in correspondence with the Canadian government and should not have been raised by the Canadian minister at Washington in correspondence with the American government. If my hon. friend intended to imply by his remarks that the United States government had not at the inception of the discussion put forward the doctrine of hot pursuit in any form, he was quite mistaken and quite wrong in what he said. Very shortly after the I'm Alone incident occurred, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States defended the seizure and the action of the United States government on the ground of hot pursuit, and this contention was therefore referred to by Mr. Massey in his communication.

Mr. CAHAN: Was that in an oral conversation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it was a statement issued as Secretary of the Treasury of the United States government in charge of coast guard operations. It was apparent to our government that the United States was basing its whole claim on the doctrine of hot pursuit. Had we ignored that position in our communications to the United States I think my hon. friend would have been the first to have directed our attention to the fact that we had overlooked what the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States had said publicly on behalf of the United States government as to its attitude.

May I say again that in speaking on this matter I feel the restriction which is necessarily imposed on myself as a member of the government in attempting to give all the reasons why mention was made of that particular doctrine in the first communication sent to the American authorities. I think that will become wholly apparent when the case is argued, and until it is argued I would prefer to leave the statement just at that point.

Throughout our negotiations with the United States government we have worked in the closest cooperation with the British government with respect to the substance of the communications which have passed between Canada and Washington. The British government is interested as a party to the treaty and Mr. Massey has been in the closest touch with Sir Esme Howard, the British ambassador at Washington. The Department of External Affairs at Ottawa has been in close communication with the Foreign Office in Great Britain. I may say that so far as the government is concerned we take much greater pride in the commendation which we have received from the British government with respect to the manner in which this incident has been handled than concern over anything which my hon. friend has said tonight.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Did I understand the right hon. the Prime Minister to say that other cases would be referred to this arbitration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the hon. member could have understood me to say that; I made no reference to other cases.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, without in any sense reviewing the authorities or discussing the matter which has been so fully and admirably dealt with by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), may I say this: My appreciation of the correspondence between the government of Canada and the government of the United States was and is that there were dangerous admissions made on the part of the Canadian plenipotentiary. I do not believe that it is right or proper for any official, much less a plenipotentiary, to anticipate, in replying to a Secretary of State of a foreign country, what his contentions will be, because of what was said publicly or otherwise by an official of the treasury. In one instance you are dealing diplomatically with a great nation by means of a despatch and you are making a serious and considered communication, in the other instance, the secretary of another branch of the government, the law-enforcing branch, the Treasury department, has made a statement with respect to the matter, a statement which I saw in the papers, and which others saw, and which was not necessarily the statement of a lawyer. In this instance, however, we have the considered judgment of the plenipotentiary of the Dominion of Canada anticipating a defence to be made by the authorities of a foreign country in their formal despatch. In pleading in courts of law we would regard that as very bad practice and I did think, as my hon. friend has just pointed out, that by so doing—to use language which is not unfamiliar to those of us who play bridge—we lost a trick.

With reference to the second point, which arises out of the first, it seemed to me to be reasonably clear that our plenipotentiary had not abundantly satisfied himself that the doctrine to which he alluded was a doctrine which had any application under the circumstances admitted in the case, and the Canadian authorities to which he referred certainly do not fully bear out his contention. It was for that reason that I then concluded, and I still think, that a little more care and the exercise of a little more considered judgment with respect to the legal position, especially with reference to the Canadian authorities which I think, in careful analyses, would bear out the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, would have enabled our minister to have presented a vastly different contention with respect to the matter.

In diplomatic despatches such as these we have once more the evidence of that principle of our jurisprudence about which so many people have complained from time to time: We are bound by precedent and governed by authorities. We remember what Tennyson said about that codeless myriad of precedent. When we come to deal with diplomatic controversies I do submit that it never should be forgotten that so far as this treaty is concerned we have placed a construction upon it which governs this Dominion of Canada for all time. That is a tremendously serious matter and one which I think should have and I am sure must have occasioned much anxious thought on the part of the hon. minister in charge of that department. I cannot think that any minister should have so lightly anticipated the objections of his opponents and endeavoured to traverse them before the objections had been made, as was done in the despatches we now have before us, if there had been that clear and distinct understanding of the serious implication of those admissions upon the future conduct of this country's diplomacy with the United States in connection with that treaty.

I will refrain from making any further observations this evening with respect to the matter. But because of its serious character and the far-reaching consequences of this single precedent and the wrongful and erroneous admissions made by our minister in respect to the matter, I desire to associate myself with what has been said so ably by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, so much better than I could have said it, and to protest against these explanations in anticipation of contentions that may be made by one's opponent. My friend beside me says that the science of pleading has disappeared because of our modern judicature acts but those of us who were trained under the old common law acts and the old system of pleading will recall the advice that I remember was once given to me by an old judge. He said: "Do not anticipate your opponent's case in pleading. Wait until he makes it."

Mr. JACOBS: Did my hon. friend do that last Friday night?

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly did not do that last Friday night. I found the hon. member for Cartier endeavouring to make, on false statements, a case which he did not succeed in making.

Mr. JACOBS: I deny that. That is false.

Mr. BENNETT: I expect a gentleman who would make it would also deny it, because the capacity to do the one is quite consistent with the desire to do the other. I shall refrain, I say, from traversing the case further, but I cannot but think a very serious injury has been done to this Dominion by our minister in dealing with this matter on an assumption which is unwarranted in law, which is based apparently upon a misapprehension of the facts, and which places upon a doubtful doctrine of international law a construction that, had he read the case in the lower courts, he would have found was substantiated by United States decisions which have never been fully recognized as applying to other than cases of blockade, and not to breaches of revenue laws or domestic statutes of that country. He is setting up that country's contentions just as we were, in regard to the seizure of this ship beyond the three-mile limit, which according to my appreciation of international law is the limit within which continuous pursuit can be commenced. The words are not "hot and continuous pursuit" in the case to which reference has been made, but "continuous pursuit'" and so strongly was that doctrine relied upon that it was a question of grave doubt whether or not when the pursuing ship stopped to arrest the dory of the ship and its crew within the three-mile limit, she had not broken the continuity of the pursuit so as to render the doctrine asserted by the Supreme Court of the United States to be no longer tenable. In this case the closing observations of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George clearly indicate the alternatives that must be in the mind of every Canadian, having regard to what happened to that ship some 200 miles from seacoast at the time she was destroyed by shot and shell from a vessel of a friendly power.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): I am sorry that I was not in the house when the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) began his argument in this case, and my object in rising is merely to say that I question the propriety of bringing this matter before the house at the present juncture when the case is sub judice.

Mr. CAHAN: It is not sub judice under any doctrine of law in regard to sub judice that I have ever heard of.

Mr. JACOBS: It is being submitted to arbitration and a thorough ironing out by the arbitrators will be made. I represent the owners of the cargo and the schooner, and as such I want to say that we are thoroughly satisfied with the present status of the case. We feel assured that justice will be rendered in the matter and that when a decision is given the owners of the cargo and the schooner will be satisfied. There is a radical difference between the language of the notes which passed between the United States and Canada and the language of the debate in this chamber this evening. It is well known —I think it was Lord Randolph Churchill who said, that the business of an opposition is to oppose. That is their business, and strange to say, the opposition in this house knows its business thoroughly. It opposes everything which is brought up by the government; whether it be a matter of a diplomatic nature or not, the opposition opposes; but I would have thought that an eminent lawyer like the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, and an equally eminent lawyer like my good friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) would know something of the rule in regard to cases before the courts, namely, that when a case comes before or is about to be tried by a court, all criticism should be allowed to rest until judgment is rendered.

Mr. CAHAN: This is neither before a court nor coming before a court, and it is subject to public criticism.

Mr. JACOBS: Does my hon. friend not think that when a case comes before the arbitrators it is not before a court?

Mr. CAHAN: No arbitrators have been appointed. We have an official statement from both Washington and Ottawa to that effect.

Mr. JACOBS: They have both agreed upon it.

Mr. CAHAN: You cannot say it is before a court when a court is not constituted.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. JACOBS: Does my hon. friend think the case of Canada is to be improved when they read to-morrow in the newspapers in Washington of the criticism of our minister by the opposition?

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly it will not be prejudiced.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not think it will do the case any good; I think it will do it harm.

Mr. CAHAN: In what way?

Mr. JACOBS: My hon. friend is doing disservice to his country when he rises to criticize the conduct of the government in this matter so far as it has gone. I am rather surprised at the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CAHAN: In what way is it doing a disservice?

Mr. JACOBS: Criticising the conduct of our minister and of our government because, after all, the minister is the mouthpiece of the government in the stand they have taken in regard to the question.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. gentleman admit that the government of this country, through its minister, may be allowed to take, in a diplomatic note, a position which stands as the view of this government for all time without criticism if the opposition deems it worthy of criticism?

Mr. JACOBS: This is not the time for criticism.

Mr. CAHAN: This is the only time we have.

Mr. JACOBS: This is not the time, when the case is before the court.

Mr. CAHAN: It is not before the court.

Mr. JACOBS: The case is sub judice. The time for criticism is when the decision is rendered and it then comes before parliament. Then my hon. friend can move a vote of non-confidence or anything else he likes.

Mr. CLARK: Is this the appropriate time for counsel in the case to make his speech?

Mr. JACOBS: My hon. friend does not seem to know that a private attorney acting in a case is not permitted at all to speak before this court. The government will appoint counsel learned in the law, who will know all about the case. I am acting merely for the parties and I have no status before the court.

Mr. GEARY: And know nothing about the case.

Mr. JACOBS: It may be that when the government appoint counsel they may look to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark). I have no doubt they will find in him a very able man who will do justice to the case and see that the interests of Canada are properly presented. I am merely a private member of parliament expressing my views, and I question the propriety of this matter being raised in this house at this juncture.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I ask, on a question of grave parliamentary privilege, in view of the observation just made by the hon. member for Cartier that we have agreed upon the arbitrators, whether the right hon. gentleman will be good enough to tell us who they are? It is passing strange that a private member of parliament should know, when parliament is denied that right.

Mr. JACOBS: Who said that a private member of parliament knows?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman said, "We have agreed upon them."

Mr. JACOBS: Not at all. I am as ignorant on that matter as my hon. friend is on many subjects.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, this is not a matter to be treated with levity. The hon. gentleman said that the matter had been referred to arbitration, whereupon the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George stated that there had been no arbitrators appointed; at least he said that a denial had come from Washington and from Ottawa to that effect. Thereupon the hon. member for Cartier said, "We have agreed upon them."

Mr. JACOBS: Agreed upon arbitration.

Mr. BENNETT: "Agreed upon them." That is what he said. The record will show it. Let us send for the record.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think what my hon. friend wants most to know is who the arbitrators are. Up to the moment no arbitrators have been appointed, and I did not understand my hon. friend from Cartier to say that any arbitrators had been appointed.

Mr. BENNETT: He said that they had been agreed upon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understood him to say that arbitration had been agreed upon. As to the arbitrators themselves, they have not yet been appointed, not yet, in fact, agreed upon.

Mr. CAHAN: Then the Prime Minister will admit that there is no constituted court at present.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Quite the contrary. The two countries have agreed to refer this question to arbitration. I think my hon. friend will admit that. Having agreed to refer this matter to arbitration, from the moment of agreement upon arbitration until the award is given I think members of parliament might well refrain from giving arguments to our opponents in the case.

Mr. CAHAN: It is not sub judice until the arbitrators are appointed.

Mr. BENNETT: The arguments we were making were all in favour of this country and against the argument which the minister was trying to establish.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

Civil Government—office of the Secretary to the Governor General—salaries, $34,335; contingencies, including house allowance of $1,500 per annum to Secretary to the Governor General, $72,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The details of this vote will be found on page 75 of the estimates. The messengers' staff has been decreased by one. The appropriation asked for this year is less than last years's vote. There are no increases.

Item agreed to.

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE

Privy Council—salaries, $55,170; contingencies, $7,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The details will be found on page 100 of the estimates. It will be seen that there are no increases in the staff, and no increases in salaries with the exception of the allowance to the deputy head, to the clerk of the privy council, whose salary has been increased from $8,000 to $9,000, an increase of $1,000 as the deputy head of this department.

Mr. SPENCER: I notice that the deputy ministers whose salaries are being increased are not all getting the same amount of increase. Would the Prime Minister inform the committee on what basis the salaries of these deputy heads are being increased?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will recognize that some of the departments of government are very much larger than others and involve rather more in the way of expert knowledge and continuous pressure of duties. I do not wish to say that all departments of the government do not require expert knowledge on the part of the heads, but certainly it will be admitted that some of the departments, from the point of view of the class and amount of work involved, are not as considerable in their demands upon the deputy heads as others. The privy council is a department of the government which is all important, but it has not been felt by the administration that the deputy head of that department should receive an allowance comparable, for example, with the deputy head of some of the large administrative departments, carrying on work without cessation from day to day and month to month. The work of the Privy Council is not wholly comparable in the way of continuous duty to that of some other departments.

Mr. GARDINER: The first item in the details shows an increase to the deputy head. I understand from the estimates that the deputy heads of departments have been granted substantial increases. I think probably it is due the committee for the Prime Minister to make a statement as to the basis on which the government, in view of their refusal to increase the salaries of the lower paid civil servants, have decided to increase the salaries of the deputy heads.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows the agitation there has been with respect to technical and professional officers in the government service and the difficulty there is to obtain those who are required to fill the high positions relatively to the difficulty experienced in regard to filling positions in the service commanding less in the way of knowledge and ability. The deputy heads, I submit, come very much within the class of those requiring technical and professional knowledge and whose special service in that regard should receive special consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: There is only one observation I have to make with respect to that at the present time, because the whole matter will be under consideration before we finish the estimates. But there must be some principle governing matters of this kind. In some instances the increase in the salaries of the deputy heads has been $1,000 and in others $2,000, while still other deputy heads have received no increase at all. Perhaps the Prime Minister as the head of the administration would give us some idea on what basis these increases have been granted. If it is on a percentage basis, it does not work out; if it is on the basis of the work done, it does not work out; if it is on the question of length of service it does not work out. It is difficult to ascertain just what principle has been followed. If it were known on what principle the increases were being made one would be better able to determine what his course of action in the matter should be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend will realize that there are departments of government recognized as such with responsible ministers at their heads. It is only the deputy heads of these departments that for the present the government has considered in the matter of increases. There are some branches of the government service which have at their head officers with the rank of deputy, but who are not deputy ministers in the sense in which the word is used without qualification. The question of their increase has not been finally considered up to the present time. There are important officers of state performing duties, some of them undoubtedly of a character similar to those performed by a deputy head. As I have said, up to the present time their position has not been finally considered by the government. We felt that inasmuch as a commission was being appointed to inquire into the whole question of the salaries of those who are expected to have technical and professional qualifications, its members would wish to consider the cases of all those in the public service who hold positions which demand qualifications of that kind. Later the government may have something to say with regard to the additional remuneration, if any, to be accorded to them. But certainly with the difficulty the government is experiencing in retaining the services of some of those who are at the head of the departments of state, it has been felt that, having regard to the salaries paid for similar services by private organizations, and having regard also to the length and quality of the services rendered, we should make the increases which we have made.

Mr. BENNETT: I think, Mr. Chairman, the observations of the Prime Minister answered a portion of the questions which I asked. The maximum appears to be $10,000. Now, if there has been an increase in the amount of work that has to be done by deputy ministers, I should think in one department in which it would be reflected, if not two, there has been no increase, apparently $10,000 being the maximum. Then there are other departments which are being gradually shorn of their responsibilities, by reason of the provinces being likely to receive their resources some time in the next century, and presumably those deputies having less work to do, should not be receiving increased compensation. Now, all these are matters that I find it difficult to reconcile. If the maximum to be paid a deputy minister is $10,000, then the matter is clearly settled, because there are no increases with respect to the two deputies who now enjoy that salary. With respect to others we have increases of $1,000 and $2,000, and, as I have said, neither upon the basis of length of service and character of the work rendered, nor upon any other factor of that character, could you say why one should receive an increase of $1,000 and another $2,000. It is a little difficult to reconcile these various factors in order to arrive at a common policy. It has been suggested that the political predilections of some of the gentlemen before they were appointed have had a great deal to do with determining whether or not they should receive additional compensation. That has been stated by friends in and out of the house who have not been considered. It is a matter, I think, upon which a statement should be made.

I do agree with the Prime Minister that it is difficult nowadays to get men to remain in government service. There has never been a time when the demand for competent and qualified executives was greater than it is to-day, and if the country is to be well served it must be prepared to pay. The difficulty I experience in connection with the whole matter is that we have a multiplication of employees in Canada to whom we pay indifferent wages and compensation, with the result of a steady increase of the number, spreading over too wide an area—spreading it very thinly, if I may use a term that is easily understood—the number which would give efficient service. I listened to some explanations made during the passing of the estimates the other night, and as I thought over what was involved I began to understand why the minister was unable to recommend any increase having regard to the number employed. The figures given in the last civil service report indicate that this country pays $82,000,000 for permanent servants of the state, temporary employees and casual labour. Under these circumstances the right hon. Prime Minister will understand why we should like some explanation as to the principles which govern in connection with this matter, why some should be left on one side, and why some should be selected for a preference of $2,000, some for $1,000, there being no relation, as I have said, between the increase and the length of service or the character of the work that has to be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say first of all to my hon. friend with respect to political predilections that I can assure him they have had nothing whatever to do with the decisions of the government in this matter. The particular vote that we are considering at the moment relates to the position of the Clerk of the Privy Council, who is the deputy head of that department, and who was, as I think hon. members are well aware, for many years private secretary to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and has been a life-long Liberal. I assume he is a Liberal still.

Mr. BENNETT: I would think so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But he receives an increase of $1,000 only. And my hon. friends, I am sure, will realize that the work of the Clerk of the Privy Council is not comparable, for example, with that of the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, the next vote to be referred to, in what it demands in the way of sustained effort, expert knowledge and tax upon time and energies. There has been in the latter case an increase of salary from $8,000 to $10,000, because the government is of opinion that the Department of External Affairs is one of the most arduous, difficult and exacting departments of the government for whoever may be administering its affairs permanently. In no case has an increase been granted beyond $10,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to mention to the right hon. Prime Minister only one case. The head of the Civil Service Commission has a very difficult task. He was a former supporter of the Conservative party and a member of the privy council in Sir Robert Borden's administration. His salary certainly is not increased in these estimates, and he has been in office eleven years, if my memory serves me aright. I suggest that he probably would think it very improper for me to mention his case; for I have not had any conversation with him, much less a discussion in any way, shape or form; but it did seem to me that there is one, the deputy head of a department, whose services certainly are continuous and arduous. Having regard to some observations made by one of my hon. friends opposite, whom I do not see in his seat to-night, those duties are certainly very arduous. Under those circumstances I think there is some discrimination in leaving his salary at $6,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is $7,000. May I say to my hon. friend that, as I mentioned, the government has not attempted up to the present time to take account of the salaries paid to any of those who have the rank of a deputy as distinguished from the position of the deputy head of a department. The head of the Civil Service Commission has not the position of a deputy minister corresponding to the permanent head of a government department. He is an officer who is appointed for a term of years under statute, and the Civil Service Commission, I think, reports through the Secretary of State.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: His position is different from that of the deputies who have been considered up to the present time. No doubt that position and many other positions of officers of state holding high and responsible posts will be considered in connection with the work of the present commission looking into salaries.

Item agreed to.

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER—SALARIES,

Office of the Prime Minister—salaries, $29,255.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The particulars of this vote will be found on page 97. It will be noted that there is an increase of two stenographers; that is all.

Item agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

External affairs—salaries, including appointment of Laurent Beaudry and John E. Read at $6,000 each, notwithstanding anything contrary in the Civil Service Act, $98,890; contingencies, $50,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The details of this vote will be found on page 80 of the estimates. It will be noticed that there is provision for one stenographer and additional provision for a legal adviser. I fancy that after the discussion we have had on the I'm Alone, and the importance that has been ascribed to the necessity of having communications in external affairs very carefully considered, from the legal point of view, hon. members will agree that it is wise to make this provision forthwith.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no hesitation in saying that the department is exceedingly fortunate in securing the services of Mr. Read. For many years Mr. Read was dean of the faculty of the law school of Dalhousie university, Halifax, and he has made for himself an enviable reputation as a lawyer. My memory is that he was a Rhodes scholar. I may be wrong—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is my memory. But we have counsellor and legal adviser as well in that department. Why are there two? There is usually only one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This department had formerly a legal adviser, Mr. Christie, but from the time of his resignation we have had no legal adviser attached to the department.

Mr. BENNETT: But there was no counsellor.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The work has grown considerably since Mr. Christie left the department, and both positions are necessary. For some time past there has been a counsellor, Mr. Desy, but he has gone to Paris and his place is being filled by Mr. Laurent Beaudry, who has been at Washington.

Item agreed to.

London—Salaries and expenses of the office of the High Commissioner for Canada, including $2,000 additional salary for the High Commissioner to that authorized by chap. 15, R.S.C., $117,260.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The department has been seeking to bring about a certain uniformity between the salaries paid to the heads of the different legations and to the High Commissioner in London. The salary fixed for the minister at Washington, the minister at Paris and the minister at Tokyo has been $12,000; the salary for the High Commissioner in London is, under statute, $10,000. We have felt that, the position of High Commissioner in London, being the oldest of the quasi diplomatic posts, and the most important of them, the salary attaching to that office should be made the same as the salary paid the ministers in the capitals I have mentioned. For that reason we are asking the additional $2,000, notwithstanding the amount fixed by statute.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the total cost of the High Commissioner's office in London? The Prime Minister, when speaking on the budget, made a statement with reference to the cost of this office and he challenged some figures which I had used and, of course, some remarks I had made. I should like to know what the total cost of this office is at the present time. Is it the sum of $117,260 which is asked for under this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the total sum which the Department of External Affairs pays for the work carried on in the office of the High Commissioner. There is an additional amount which is paid by the Public Works department for upkeep of the building.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How much is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: $35,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then do these two items —$35,000 paid by the Public Works department and $117,000 paid by the Department of External Affairs—constitute the whole cost of that office?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They constitute the whole cost, yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But there is another item of $10,000 for salaries, to be found at page 10. Would that be added to the total expenditure authorized by statute?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; I should have added that. It is the salary of the High Commissioner as provided by statute.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then, if my right hon. friend will add these figures, he will find that I was not far wrong in what I said in connection with the budget. The office costs much more than I stated, and the increase has been enormous.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The comparison I was making was between the figures my hon. friend quoted as prevailing now and those that prevailed at the time he was in office. He will find that I paralleled the columns in both cases.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But my right hon. friend when he paralleled them did not add the $10,000 and the $35,000 paid by the Public Works department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Neither did my hon. friend.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not know about them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was in the same position in my comparisons.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The increase is greater than I stated.

Mr. BENNETT: Are there any details of the vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are not detailed.

Mr. GARDINER: Can the Prime Minister give the committee some information as to the duties of the High Commissioner in London? Friends of mine who have been in London have made a very striking comparison between the High Commissioner from Canada and the High Commissioner from Australia in relation to the duties performed by these gentlemen, and I regret to say that the comparison is not to the credit of this country. Most visitors seem to think that the Canadian High Commissioner is there more or less for the purpose of introducing Canadians to high society, and I think it would be well for the Prime Minister, if it is possible for him to do so, to dispel such an idea and give the committee an understanding of the High Commissioner's duties.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No one familiar with the important and varied duties of the High Commissioner could entertain such an idea. The Canadian High Commissioner represents the government of Canada in innumerable transactions, and particularly in its relation with the government of Great Britain. For the barest outline of last year's activities I would refer my hon. friend to page 10 of the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At the bottom of the page he will find an account of a few of the duties performed by the office of the High Commissioner during 1928. Perhaps I might read a paragraph in point:

> The High Commissioner's office in London has discharged its usual multifarious and important duties, acting as the organ for maintaining the necessary detailed relations between the departments of His Majesty's governments in Canada and Great Britain, as well as in connection with the government expenditures and contracts in Great Britain, with measures for informing the British public as to Canadian matters and extending requisite assistance to Canadian visitors. The office was represented at the periodical meetings of the Pacific Cable Board, the Imperial Institute, the War Graves Commission, and the Imperial Shipping Committee.
> In pursuance of his usual practice with the object of keeping in close touch with Canadian public life, the High Commissioner visited the Dominion during the month of August, delivering speeches and holding interviews at various places. He was actively engaged also in the conclusion of an agreement with the Bulgarian government under which the property of Bulgarian nationals in Canada sequestrated by the Custodian of Enemy Property is to be restored to them, and also in the arrangements connected with the transfer to the Royal Canadian Navy of the Champlain and Vancouver as well as the building of two new destroyers for the Canadian navy.

This makes no mention of the many financial transactions for which the High Commisioner's office has been responsible in part in the past and is responsible at the present time—for example the collecting of outstanding debts from the governments of Great Britain, Roumania and Greece, as well as many other highly important transactions. It may be stated that the High Commissioner in cooperation with the Minister of Finance was instrumental in securing, during the seven years Mr. Larkin has been in office, the settlement of outstanding accounts resulting from war transactions, averaging $29,500,000 per annum. As one instance of the effective service of the High Commissioner during the past year I would mention his success in cooperation with the Imperial Shipping Committee in doing away with the discriminations previously in force in the insurance rates charged by the underwriters upon ships voyaging to Canadian ports, particularly Halifax and St. John and in some measure St. Lawrence and British Columbia ports, a practical service to every Canadian exporter and importer.

I do not know from what source my hon. friend obtained the information which occasioned him to make the comparison he did between the High Commissioner for Australia and the High Commissioner for Canada. Nothing could possibly be further from the mark. I think anyone who has any knowledge of the work being done in London by Canada's High Commissioner will say that we have been extremely fortunate in having in the Honourable Mr. Larkin a gentleman of exceptional business ability and administrative capacity and one who has been most industrious and efficient in watching over Canada's interests in London. I think Canada's office will more than bear comparison with any similar office in Great Britain.

Mr. SPENCER: In support of the criticism of the hon. member for Acadia I may say that I visited London in 1927, and from my inspection of Canada House as compared, say, with Australia House, I would say that we do not go far enough in advertising Canada except possibly in the advertising matter which is on the shelves of the ground floor. It is a very nice office and they have very fine reception rooms, but when it comes to the advertising the wares of Canada certainly we can take a leaf from Australia's book; from a commercial point of view there is no comparison between the two. If you go into Australia House—and any members who have been there will support me in this statement—you will find a miniature Australia before you; you will see every state; you will see pictures of the various industries, of the fields and of the farms; their products are on display where any vistor can see them. On the other hand, if you go to Canada House you will find a very nice office, and commodious waiting and reception rooms, but that is all you can say. What the high commissioner does there in his capacity as Canada's representative I cannot say. The Prime Minister is in a position to give the house that information, but from the point of view of advertising Canada to the public I certainly think we take second place to Australia.

Mr. FORKE: I should like to say a few words with regard to the statement made by the hon. member for Battle River. He forgets that Australia concentrates entirely on London; all the advertising they do in Great Britain with regard to the products of Australia is done in the city of London, and as far as London is concerned it is well done. However, my hon. friend must bear in mind that Canada has ten offices in the principal cities of Great Britain, where splendid exhibitions of Canadian products are maintained, advertising Canada all over Great Britain. We consider that a much better way of advertising Canada than by concentrating everything in London where it can be seen only by the people of that city

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might add to what the Minister of Immigration has just said that so far as Australia is concerned not only is all the immigration work centralized in London but the work pertaining to their railways and in regard to trade and commerce and so on is carried on there as well. The Canadian Department of Trade and Commerce while partially housed in the Canadian Building has in London its separate offices for exhibition purposes, and the advertising work carried on by the Canadian National Railways is handled through their own offices as well. I think if the entire advertising of the two countries were taken into account it would be seen that Canada is well looked after in comparison. Apart from that, Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that Australia pays her High Commissioner a salary of £3,000 a year, together with an allowance of £2,500. Then there is an allowance of £29,037 for salaries and allowances for the High Commissioner's staff, a further allowance of £9,034 for contingencies, and an allowance of £20,000 for the upkeep of Australia House. Australia has purchased and furnished an official residence for her High Commissioner and made substantial provision for its upkeep. Canada's High Commissioner has provided and maintained a residence in London at his own expense. If a comparison were made as to the cost of maintaining these officers I think it would be found that Australia allows about twice the amount we pay for the services rendered.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the Prime Minister tell us the cost of the construction of that building?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We discussed that matter six or seven years ago, and I am afraid I have not the figures with me at present.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Then will the Prime Minister say what all these little sub-offices cost?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The estimates of the Department of Immigration will be down to-morrow, probably.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): It might be worth while to get the aggregate cost if we are to make a comparison with Australia.

Mr. CANTLEY: Do I understand the Minister of Immigration to say that Australia does no advertising in Great Britain except in the city of London?

Mr. FORKE: I would not say they do not carry on any advertising in the counties, but they have no exhibitions in the different large centres such as Liverpool and so on, and Canada does carry on work of that kind. I suppose the Australian government has immigration agents throughout the counties, but there is no exhibition of Australian products such as we have of ours.

Mr. CANTLEY: Am I to understand that no advertising is carried on in the city of Glasgow, for example?

Mr. FORKE: I do not think there is any exhibition there; not to my knowledge.

Mr. CANTLEY: I referred to advertising and I am certain I have seen such several times. I have also seen such advertising in Edinburgh, and in other places.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A moment ago I gave some figures relating to the office of the Australian High Commissioner in London. I have before me some additional figures given recently by the Premier of Australia. These include £2,600 for advertising in addition to what I have given for the High Commissioner's office and Australia House; £19,000 for immigration salaries; £12,000 for immigration contingencies; £1,000 for the council for scientific and industrial research; £2,000 for marketing, and so on. Then there is the dairy officer, the fruit officer and so on, giving a total of £139,988.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): All connected with Australian House?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These are in addition to the other figures I gave. The activities they represent are centred in Australia House.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The only reason I ask the question is that the remarks of the Minister of Immigration would seem to indicate that Australia had just the one centre in London, whereas I think the figures now given by the Prime Minister show that the work is carried on all over Great Britain.

Mr. GEARY: Would the Prime Minister tell us, without going into great detail, the reason for the $5,000 increase, excluding the $2,000 increase in the salary of the High Commissioner?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Due to the increased work of the London office—and I may say this work has grown considerably even within the last year coincident with our having in Canada a High Commissioner from Great Britain—we have thought it advisable to make provision for another clerk in the Canada House office, and there is an appropriation of $3,000 for that purpose.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would like to ask the Prime Minister if this $2,000 increase was requested or suggested by the High Commissioner, or whether it is a bonus offered by the right hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can assure my hon. friend that it was not asked by the High Commissioner. As I said a moment ago, the department is seeking to adopt some uniformity in the scale of allowances for salaries and other purposes as between the different offices. We have felt that London is the first of the positions abroad, and that the salaries and allowances should be made proportionate in relation to what is being paid elsewhere. I do not think I am wrong in saying that the High Commissioner spends many times the total of his salary and allowance in connection with the services which he is rendering the country overseas.

Mr. BENNETT: He must spend at least $100,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure it is more than that.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I think the Prime Minister is absolutely right when he says that the High Commissioner spends more money than he is paid by this government. What I am afraid of is that while this matter is being taken care of with regard to London we will have the ambassadors extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary at Tokyo and Washington stating that their services are worth more money than they are paid.

An hon. MEMBER: I think they are.

Mr. RYCKMAN: We have had very distinguished men occupying the office of High Commissioner at London but it can never be said that the present High Commissioner has done more than Lord Strathcona did, and I never heard it suggested that more money should be offered to Lord Strathcona. I think the position should be an honorary one; but if it comes to the point where money is to be paid for these services, then let the matter be carefully weighed. This is one of the first positions under the government. It is well known that the office has been adorned by men who have been anxious to serve their country, and I am unwilling to see it put on a pecuniary basis. If an offer of $2,000 has been made, put it on a business basis and if necessary offer more.

Item agreed to.

Passport office—salaries and expenses, $28,500.

Mr. MANION: Are there branch passport offices throughout the Dominion where passports are issued without applying direct to Ottawa?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, there are not.

Mr. MANION: Someone has made the statement that there is one at Montreal; is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the income derived from this office?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Last year the income amounted to $140,000.

Mr. COOTE: Is it necessary for people coming from Great Britain to Canada to have passports?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. COOTE: Then why should it be necessary for British subjects going from Canada to Great Britain to have passports before they are permitted to enter that country?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That question has been asked repeatedly of the British government by our administration. The British government takes the position that they have adopted the passport regulations to enable them to control the admission of aliens. They contend that those who are British citizens will, in the long run, be occasioned less discomfort, if I may use that term, in their admission to Great Britain through having a passport than if they came without one. There is a process of examination which they desire to have in Great Britain in order to satisfy themselves as to persons not being aliens, and a passport apparently avoids any questioning. For that reason the British authorities have considered that plan as being preferable to having individuals undergo a course of examination and questioning on arrival. The matter has been taken up by correspondence, and it was taken up at the last imperial conference. If I am not mistaken, it was taken up at the previous imperial conference but the British government up to the present time has not seen fit to do away with the passport regulation.

Mr. HEAPS: The Prime Minister has said that this is done to make it easier for Canadians to enter Great Britain. I wonder if something could not be done to make it easier for Canadians to return to Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no trouble getting back.

Mr. HEAPS: There is much more trouble for a Canadian returning to Canada than there is for one going to Great Britain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. HEAPS: That has been my experience.

Mr. COOTE: I have been told that there is considerable delay in the passport office in the issuance of the passports. I do not know whether the complaints are all justified but some cases have come to my attention where the parties have been held up for three weeks without receiving a reply from the passport office. Some of these people had engaged a berth on a certain ship and had to use the telegraph to speed up the passport office in order to receive their passports in time. Would the Prime Minister look into this matter and see whether there is any unnecessary delay or whether the passport office is requiring information which perhaps is not necessary?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should be very much obliged if the hon. member would give me the names of any persons who have experienced delay in obtaining passports, and I will undertake to let him have a statement as to the date on which their applications were received and the date on which they were given their passports. I have heard from many sources that the passport office at Ottawa is particularly efficient and the government has been complimented over and over again on the fact that there is less delay and less red tape in the matter of getting a passport from the Canadian office than from any other. I think the information of the hon. member probably has been given to him in an exaggerated form, but I should like to look into it.

Mr. COOTE: It is quite possible that the applicants may not have completed the form, or something of that kind. I have not the particulars, as these cases came to my attention when I was at home. Does the Prime Minister think unnecessary questions are being asked before a passport is granted, and that the procedure is quite as simple as it might be?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I am right in saying that the question of passports was taken up at the League of Nations with a view to having a similar set of questions asked in all countries. We have endeavoured to simplify our passports as much as possible and have brought the questions down to the minimum.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. member for Macleod must be wrongly informed. I doubt if there is any other office where passports can be obtained as readily and with as courteous service as in this country. From my own personal experiences, one in Great Britain and one in France, I have come to the conclusion that we have nothing to learn in either promptness or courtesy in this regard. I think the difficulty arose through the correspondents of the hon. member having omitted to reply to what they thought to be an irrelevant question. Sometimes the signature is not put on the back of the photograph, and obviously that might give rise to a very difficult situation, because the country as such certifies to the validity of the passport, and with no signature there is nothing to indicate that the photograph is that of the person in question. If one is desirous of going to Great Britain the railway companies will take the requisite fee, have the form filled out and send the passport on to meet the passenger at the boat. I know of three cases since the opening of navigation this year in which that has been done. I only say that in justice to the gentlemen in charge of the office. One must speak of them as one finds them, and they have shown not for me alone, but for any person I have known who has had to communicate with them, a willingness to assist, a great courtesy, and an earnest desire to serve the public.

Mr. SPENCER: I think the trouble lies largely in the fact that the public do not understand the full information that is required of them with regard to passports. I am glad indeed to say that in any communications I have had with the passport office, I have been given the very best service. But I have had complaints from people who, not having the full information, have been wondering why their passports have been held up. That is where the trouble lies. The passport situation is a nuisance, but I am glad to say that I have received most excellent service from the passport office in Ottawa.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: My experience has been the same; that is, I have received great courtesy, most efficient service and had the matter I was dealing with expedited as much as possible. But having many complaints with regard to delays that have taken place, just to see how long it really took, I followed step by step the case of a friend in my part of the country who was applying for a passport. Living, as many do, some distance from a railway, he received his mail by rural mail carrier twice a week. When he wrote me I went to the office and had the necessary form sent out to him, but it required about two weeks for his letter to reach Ottawa and for a reply to be sent. He wrote to Ottawa, and the application was promptly mailed to him, but this took two weeks. The application was sent back to Ottawa improperly filled out and had to be returned with explicit and courteous instructions as to what should be done. This took two more weeks. When he finally got the passport, a little over six weeks had elapsed, but almost the whole of that delay was due to the distance and the time required for the application to reach that outlying point and then to be returned. It took six weeks, without the slightest dilatoriness on the part of the passport office, the necessary information having been sent at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. COOTE: So far as I have had any communications with the passport office they have been answered as promptly as possible, but I have had cases where the time elapsing between the making of application for a passport and the receipt of it was just as long as in the instance quoted by the hon. member for Red Deer. I am speaking only from memory, but in some cases it seems that an unnecessarily long time elapses between the despatch of a request for a passport and its being received. The delay may have been accounted for by circumstances which were not brought to my attention. Personally I have had the best service possible from the passport office.

Mr. BENNETT: As I understand the matter, they deal with the applications in sequence.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I do not want in any way to criticize or to sound a note of discord in regard to what has been said as to the work of the passport office. We are moving far away from the war and the post war period, and it seems to me that the work should therefore be lighter and easier. The sum of $5,500 is an important item. If an explanation were given why at this date the expenses of the office are increased, it might be illuminating.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As times are improving, people are travelling a great deal more. The cost of printing passports is in itself a considerable item.

Mr. RYCKMAN: But there is the money collected.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But a larger number are required to attend to the business as there is more business to attend to.

Item agreed to.

Washington—representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments, $100,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the Prime Minister give the details of this?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will notice that the amount asked for this year is the same as last year. I would refer him, if I might at this hour of the evening, to the report of the Department of External Affairs on the work of the legation at Washing. I think the extent of the work of the legation is now pretty generally known.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): In view of the statement the Prime Minister has made regarding such cases as the I'm Alone incident, namely, that he is not prepared to refer them to arbitration, I am afraid that in justice to one of my constituents I shall have to take up the time of the committee for a little while.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say that I was not prepared to refer them to arbitration. I said that I thought this was perhaps not the time to make a decision on that point.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): My statement will take up some time, and I do not wish to take the time of the committee now if the Prime Minister will assure me that he will give my case the consideration it deserves. I think his deputy will assure him that I am pressing pretty strongly in connection with it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He has told me about it several times. I have said to him that we must give it every consideration, and we shall do so.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): I am afraid if I let this opportunity go by I shall not haave another one for a year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can promise my hon. friend another opportunity during this session.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Before the session is over?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): That will be satisfactory.

Item agreed to.

Paris—representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments, $80,000.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Why the increase?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will realize that the legation itself was opened within the past year and the premises in which it is at present housed are different from those which we had heretofore. There have been some additional expenses in connection with the new building and they account for the slight increase.

Mr. SPENCER: What extra work will our representative in Paris do to-day that he did not do before his change of position?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might mention just one matter which may help to illustrate the increase in his duties. Heretofore the Canadian Commissioner General had no right of immediate approach to the French government. Matters of a governmental character were dealt with by the British ambassador.

Mr. BENNETT: He had no right of audience.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He had no right of audience, as my hon. friend says. To-day all the duties that were formerly carried out through the British ambassador's good offices are attended to immediately by our own office. The interests which Canada has in France have been increasing from year to year. The number of Canadians visiting France and wishing to be assisted in many ways in the matter of information and in connection with the business in which they are engaged has increased considerably and altogether the importance of the position has grown with the years.

Mr. BENNETT: Do I understand that our diplomatic representatives do not, except in cases of difficulty with the country to which they are accredited, deal with questions of trade and commerce and commercial matters?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They deal with all matters of governmental character.

Mr. BENNETT: I am speaking of—

Mr. DUNNING: Trade promotion?

Mr. BENNETT: Not only trade promotion, but questions connected with trade and commerce. I was advised, and I said that when I got the opportunity I would ascertain whether or not it is correct, that our diplomatic representatives do not deal with questions of trade except for the purpose of making representations. For instance, I assume that our representatives at Washington made representations with respect to the proposed new United States tariff, and that our diplomatic representative at Paris might make representations with respect to contemplated action by the government of France in connection with duties and matters of that kind. But in the development of trade, as distinguished from the diplomatic side of trade, do I understand that our plenipotentiaries do not deal with such matters?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend would include in the diplomatic phases of a plenipotentiary's work the giving of a great deal of information on commercial matters, I should say that he was in the main right in saying that the direct and detailed promotion of trade is left to the commercial representatives of the government, but the diplomatic representatives have much to do with furnishing information not only to departments of the government but to individuals with respect to important trade matters in the countries to which they are accredited, and in creating the interest and affording many of the facilities essential to the promotion of trade.

Mr. KAISER: In what manner and to what extent can a member of parliament ascertain what is being discussed by our diplomatic representatives? How can we ascertain, for instance, what matters have been placed before the United States government by our diplomatic representative at Washington?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The report of the Department of External Affairs gives some indication of the work that is being done. There is a committee of this house on industrial and international relations, and I think it would be advisable at some time to have the question of the work of these legations referred to that committee so that the ministers themselves, were it so desired, and others connected with the legations, might appear and advise members of the house at first hand of their various services. I think that would be preferable to attempting to discuss these matters on the floor of the house.

Mr. KAISER: The Prime Minister must admit that the Department of External Affairs publishes only a very meagre report. I read it through very carefully, and I confess that I was more confused than I was before. I could form no idea of what matters had been under representation by our diplomats.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows that it is part of the art of a diplomat not to say too much about what he is doing.

Item agreed to.

Tokyo—representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments, $75,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Will this pay the whole cost for this year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We hope it will.

Mr. BENNETT: You are not buying a building, I take it.

Mr. GEARY: There is an increase of $25,000 in this item. A minister has been appointed, I believe, and last year his salary did not appear in the estimates. Perhaps the Prime Minister would give us details of the increase.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the estimate was being prepared last year it was understood that no appointment could be made and no steps taken in the matter of the organization of the legation until possibly the beginning of the present year. Accordingly parliament was not asked to appropriate the amount which we now feel is necessary for another year. We feel that the additional amount will be necessary for the coming year.

Mr. GEARY: The item last year was $50,000, and this year it is $75,000. What is the extra expense for?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The amount last year was the estimated amount, part of which, but not all, has been spent, in providing accommodation and equipment for the legation in Tokyo.

Item agreed to.

Geneva—salaries and expenses of the office of the Canadian advisory officer, $22,500.

Mr. MANION: This question may come more pertinently under the next item, but perhaps the Geneva items will all be dealt with together. What check-up is there on the League of Nations in regard to its expenditure? I have seen a good deal of criticism in various sections of the press regarding the expenses of the league, and what appears to be everybody's business is nobody's business. That seems to be the impression of some of the English and Canadian journals that I have read. Would the Prime Minister give some explanation of how the expenses are checked?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My colleague the Minister of Railways and Canals was on the budget committee at the last meeting of the League of Nations and can probably answer that question.

Mr. DUNNING: It is more difficult to get estimates past the budget committee of the League of Nations than past any legislative body of which I have been a member. The debates regarding what might be called the internal economy of the league and the presentation of the estimates for the various branches of the league's work certainly arouse very strong and very critical discussion. One can understand that when one remembers that some of the nations are not interested in certain phases of the league's work, and naturally they are very critical of expenditures on those phases which do not particularly interest them. The procedure is almost identical to that followed in this house. I can assure my hon. friend that I was surprised at the thoroughness with which the representatives of the various nations criticized the estimates and brought about from time to time reductions in the votes brought before the budget committee of the League of Nations.

Mr. MANION: I do not dispute that, but at the same time. I have seen a good deal of criticism of the expenses of the league. I notice, for instance, that Canada's contribution, and we are one of the small countries of the world, is increased by over $21,000 this year. I am not trying to hold up the estimates of the Prime Minister, but he cannot get these four items relating to the league through to-night, so it does not really matter very much. It would be interesting to the committee if the Prime Minister when next these estimates are up would give a brief sketch of how the expenses of the League of Nations are made up and how our proportion is worked out. I do not expect anything lengthy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps in the meantime we can pass this item.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 21, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar, for Mr. Parent) moved:

That the tenth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, which was presented on the 17th May, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

VICTORIA DAY ADJOURNMENT—MORNING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the work of the session has been proceeding fairly rapidly of late. We have exhausted most of the legislation on the order paper with the exception of supply. There are still one or two reports of committees to be received, with possibly one or two bills to be based thereon, and maybe another bill or two. I would suggest that on and after Monday of next week the house might begin its sittings in the mornings. I think this an appropriate time to bring the matter to the attention of the house. If there is no objection I would present the formal motion now; if it is desired to enter upon a discussion of the matter I should be glad to have it proceed immediately.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): personally, I would object to morning sittings for the reason that those of us who are trying to keep in touch with what is going on find it absolutely impossible to do justice to our work. I agree with what the right hon. the Prime Minister has just said that we are getting on very nicely and if we do not sit in the mornings it will only mean an extra two or three days, or we could possibly start at two o'clock in the afternoon. I would remind the house that it is particularly hard on the Hansard staff who have to sit here working while the house is in continuous session.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) who has just taken his seat, apparently mistook the thunderous applause which was given on the appearance of the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) for approval of his observations. In view of the fact that we have reached the point we have in connection with legislation and that the major part of the business which must engage our consideration during the balance of the session will be the estimates—I might say here that the government has been very derelict in not proceeding with them earlier in the session—I think we could get in two hours extra work in the morning without very much difficulty. It is impossible, strive as we may, to keep in touch with everything. I do my best but I realize that the government put it over on us very frequently and I agree with the hon. member for Battle River as to the necessity of having several supporters to watch what is going on. I am quite sure my hon. friend will find it difficult to follow the intricacies of the operations of the mind of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), especially on the tariff, in this or in any other house. Some of my hon. friends have pointed out that it has not been customary to sit on Empire day. The other day I asked the right hon. the Prime Minister whether he expected the house would sit on that day and he said that was the intention. My memory was that the house did sit last year but I never trust my memory in a matter of that kind and I have not looked it up, but there seems to be an opinion on the part of many of our friends that as that day is being kept as a holiday by one-quarter of the world's population it might be well for us to reconsider what our attitude should be in the premises.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Ever since I have been in the house we have always had towards the end of the session late sittings while at the early part of the session we have always had a number of holidays. This year we had quite a long Easter recess and now at the end of the session we are asked to hurry along with the result that much legislation will be ill considered. I join with what the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has said, that we should have the twenty-fourth of May as a public holiday. We observed the holiday on May ninth, I believe some religious or church holiday, and if we observe a religious holiday I do not see why we should not observe Empire day. Not that I am an imperialist by any means; I join with my friend, David Kirkwood in the statement that he belonged to the British commonwealth of nations not because he was an imperialist but because he thought it was the greatest movement for peace which we had ever had.

These things are apparently arranged by the government as the private members of the house would seem to be just pawns in the game. I hope that the next session of the house will be so arranged that we will not have a number of holidays at the beginning of the session and then finally have to resort to morning and Wednesday evening sittings in the effort to rush things through.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I have been in this house long enough to realize that anything I say will have no effect, but nevertheless I am going to exercise the privilege of free speech. Personally, I have no objection to the house sitting in the mornings when the committee work is finished. Some of us who come from western Canada are particularly interested in the Canada Grain Act and have been attending one or two meetings daily of the agriculture committee. On one or two occasions this committee has sat three times in the one day and we find it impossible to keep in touch with the work which is going on in the house. There is to be a very important meeting of that committee this afternoon and I understand that there will be a motion to go into supply on the Immigration estimates. I am finding it difficult to decide which is the more important matter for my constituency, the question of immigration or the Canada Grain Act, but I suppose I will have to decide that matter before four o'clock. I do protest against this house sitting three times a day while some committees are sitting twice a day, as it is not fair to the members of the committees. We find it difficult now to get a quorum in our committee and I do not think the members of this house should be practically precluded from taking part in what is going on in the house, and that is what will happen should the committees be sitting twice a day while the house is sitting three times a day.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, for nine years I have been looking for an opportunity to support the right hon. the Prime Minister, and at last I have discovered something. I should like to put myself on record as being in favour of morning sittings. As the leader of the opposition has said, it is impossible to keep in touch with all the different committees anyhow. The hon. member who has just taken his seat pointed out that he had a committee meeting this afternoon. If the house were sitting in the mornings conditions would not be different as both the committee and the house would be sitting at the same time. Some of us who have not rented our farms would like to get back to attend to our professional duties, and I am one of those.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As hon. members know, in matters of this kind the government is anxious to meet as nearly as may be possible the wishes of the house as a whole. With respect to Empire day may I say to my hon. friends that we did feel that probably the greatest service which could be rendered the empire by this parliament on that day would be to put good legislation upon the statutes. However, if there are hon. members who were counting on Empire day as an opportunity to visit their constituencies or to take part in Empire day celebrations of one kind or another, certainly it would be the wish of the administration not to disappoint them in that particular.

Mr. CAHAN: Has the right hon. the Prime Minister considered that for thirty years, without exception, this House has kept Empire day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was not under the impression that such was the case.

Mr. CAHAN: Except once, when it came on Sunday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend says that such is the fact I will accept his word; I would be willing to accept his word on almost anything, particularly where it relates to Empire day. The government is quite prepared to have a motion presented immediately providing that the house shall not sit this year on Empire day. But might I suggest, seeing this is a matter of accommodation, that the two motions be put at the same time. We shall be losing a day out of this week if we give up Friday. We might as well make up that time next week by sitting in the mornings, and if that is agreeable, I would move:

That when this house adjourns on Thursday the 23rd of May, instant, it stand adjourned until Monday, the 27th of May; and that on and after May 27th instant until the end of the session, this house shall meet at eleven o'clock in the morning and that in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock, p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock p.m.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): May I suggest to the government and to the house that, instead of or even in addition to sitting in the morning, we sit until a reasonable hour at night. It is ridiculous to stop work just when we are getting into our stride. We are like a lot of school children being sent off to bed at eleven o'clock. This is absolutely out of proportion to our capacity for work or for happiness. My suggestion would satisfy those who wish to sit on committees in the morning and in the afternoon. We could make it a rule of the house that committees would not sit in the evening and that in the evening and until the early hours of the morning we proceed with the business of the country. In the few years that I have been in the house I have found that we get through more work in a much more intelligent manner after eleven o'clock than we do before. I would submit for the consideration of the house that at any rate we ought to be able to pass up our privilege of going to bed at eleven o'clock for a week or two until the end of the session.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): We find it hard enough to maintain a quorum until eleven o'clock now.

Motion agreed to on division.

PRIVATE BILLS

JOSEPH EDWIN WOOD

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Edwards) is out of the city and probably will not be back again this session on account of sickness. At his suggestion and with the permission of the house I will substitute my name for his.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent, Mr. Howden for Mr. Edwards (Ottawa) moves that bill No. 290 for the relief of Joseph Edwin Wood be now read the first time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 280 respecting Alliance Nationale. —Mr. Mercier (Laurier-Outremount).

Bill No. 286 for the relief of Marion Annie Terry.—Mr. Taylor.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE PROSECUTIONS —MR. HARRY BRONFMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Does the responsibility of carrying out the prosecutions recommended by the Customs commission fall upon the Department of Justice, or upon the attorney general of the province in which the accused is a resident? If it is the duty of the federal Department of Justice, why has the prosecution of Mr. Harry Bronfman of Regina, as recommended by the Customs commission, not been proceeded with?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Perhaps my hon. friend will allow his question to stand, and I shall see to it that he receives an answer.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): I desire to direct to the attention of the government the fact that on May 6th, an order was passed by the house for the production of papers in connection with the prosecution of Harry Bronfman. I should like to know when the papers will be brought down.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I will look into the matter and see if I can expedite the return.

FISHERIES PATROL SERVICE OFF BRITISH COLUMBIA COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. BRADY (Skeena): As the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) is not in the house, I bring to the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), with a view to having action taken, a telegram that I have received stating that great dissatisfaction is felt along the British Columbia coast because the patrol boat Malaspina has been tied up in the harbour of Prince Rupert since she seized five American fishing boats on May 11th, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is urged to take immediate steps to release this boat to carry on patrol service, which is imperative if poaching and illegal fishing of American fishing vessels in Canadian waters is to be checked. I trust that the Minister of Marine and Fsheries will take action in this matter because it is very important.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to see that the representations in the telegram which my hon. friend (Mr. Brady) has just read are brought to the attention of the minister.

DIAMOND JUBILEE OF CONFEDERATION

COMMEMORATION MEDAL SUGGESTED FOR CANADIAN MAYORS

On the orders of the day.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Has any promise or suggestion been made that mayors of Canadian cities during the jubilee year of confederation are to be presented with a bronze medal?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not recollect any such promise being made, but I think it would be a very appropriate action to have taken.

NOVA SCOTIA COAT OF ARMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. A. BLACK (Halifax): The other day the Secretary of State laid on the table some correspondence with reference to the coat of arms for the province of Nova Scotia. I find that the return is not complete because reference is made in a letter of the premier of Nova Scotia dated May 3rd, to a letter of Mr. G. Law Samson, who put an interpretation upon the matter that might have an important bearing on this question. I would like to have a copy of that letter and also a copy of any further correspondence that may have been received since this return was brought down.

May I be permitted to say that the province of Nova Scotia was granted in 1625 by Charles I an armorial achievement. It is a very beautiful and artistic piece of work, which I am sending to Your Honour for your examination, because I think it is worth looking at.

It would seem that when after confederation the Department of the Secretary of State was called upon to prepare coats of arms for the provinces, not knowing that the province of Nova Scotia had a coat of arms, and I believe it is the only province in Canada that held a coat of arms, one was prepared for the province by the department and it took the place at Ottawa of the one granted by Charles I. I note that it is suggested in this correspondence that the coat of arms prepared by the department should supersede the one granted by Charles I. To that the province of Nova Scotia objects, and I believe that legislation and the necessary consequent steps have been taken to have the original coat of arms as granted put in use here. The one now in use here was prepared by the Department of the Secretary of State in 1868.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I think he might very well bring up this question on the estimates of the Secretary of State. The coat of arms is certainly beautiful and I would call the attention of the government to it.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): I draw the attention of the Acting Minister of Agriculture to the fact that on April 25th I placed a question on the order paper in regard to the slaughter of diseased cattle. The question was passed as an order for a return. Up to the present time the return has not been brought down. When may I expect it?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is in the city but not in the house, so there is no acting minister at the moment. I shall be pleased to bring the hon. gentleman's question to his attention when he returns.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 278 to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

On section 4—stamp tax on sale or transfer of stocks, bonds and so forth.

Mr. COOTE: This section caused a good deal of discussion when the resolution preceding this bill was in committee, and I think that there is not much doubt that the majority opinion of the committee was not in favour of the section as it is printed. The hon. member for South Timiskaming (Mr. Lang) made out such a good case, I think, against this section that it is not necessary for me to enter into any argument at all. Personally I think that whatever tax is imposed on the transfer of these stocks and bonds should be based upon the amount of money that is involved in the transaction, which I think almost everyone admits bears no relation whatever to the par value of the securities traded in. I therefore beg to move:

That section 4 of the bill be amended by striking out all the words after the words "a die of the value of" and substituting therefor the words:

three cents for every one hundred dollars or fraction thereof of the amount paid for the bonds or shares so sold or transferred.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the difference between that and the old rate?

Mr. COOTE: I am sorry that I have not the old act here, but under it the tax was imposed on the par value. The amendment bases it on the actual value of the shares or bonds sold or transferred.

Mr. MANION: Will this increase or decrease the tax as compared with the old tax?

Mr. COOTE: That would be hard to say. In some cases there would be an increase, in others a decrease, but the amount of tax payable would be on the actual consideration given for the transfer of shares.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to delay the committee by reviewing the arguments presented when the resolution was before the house. Since it was passed in committee it will be recalled that there has been some objection from our friends in British Columbia. But I recall one telegram from a mining man in Nelson expressing satisfaction with the legislation as adopted.

Mr. CLARK: I would not be much surprised because I have had many, many more telegrams the other way.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the hon. minister really advance as a serious argument the fact that he received one telegram in favour of the change? That is as ridiculous as the principle underlying this measure.

Mr. IRVINE: Apparently one man outside of the house is worth forty inside.

Mr. CLARK: There is one man left in British Columbia ready to support the Minister of Finance.

Mr. ROBB: I would direct your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that the proposed amendment would involve an increase of taxation; consequently it is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: It does appear to me that this amendment would mean an increase in taxation. Subsection 555 of standing order 60 provides:

> No increase can be considered either of an existing, or of a new or temporary tax for the service of the year, except on the initiative of a minister acting on behalf of the crown.

I must therefore rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. COOTE: Is the chairman satisfied that this amendment would involve an increase?

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Finance has so stated, and from my reading of the amendment I would think it would mean an increase of taxation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May we have the reasoning underlying the ruling?

Mr. COOTE: If the minister does not base his opinion on any principle more solid than that under which he introduced the tax, I think the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee have my ruling. I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. COOTE: All I can say, Mr. Chairman, is that your ruling is made without proof that the amendment would involve an increase in taxation.

Section agreed to on division.

Sections 5 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY

EXPORT OF LIQUOR TO THE UNITED STATES

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, I should like to call attention to a situation in this country which in the view of at least a great many citizens is far from satisfactory.

Early in the session I gave notice that I intended to move a resolution urging parliament to introduce legislation to prohibit clearance being granted to vessels carrying intoxicating liquor to United States ports. That resolution was not reached before private members' day was taken away. I should like very much to have been able to secure a recorded vote on a resolution of this kind. I think it would have been of considerable advantage to the country at large if we could have been able to see just where members stood on this question. To-day I have not moved an amendment, simply because that would be regarded as a vote of lack of confidence in the government, and I should like, if possible, to see a free expression of opinion on the question itself and not have the discussion merely along party lines.

There has been considerable interest shown in this question, as is indicated by the large number of petitions from the various parts of the country that have been presented to this house. I am hoping that this discussion may afford an opportunity for those members who have presented their petitions—the member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) and others—to back up those petitions on the floor of the house.

Mr. GOTT: Why single out the member for South Essex?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The member for South Essex comes from a part of the country which is very vitally concerned in this question, and I have no doubt that, having received the congratulations of the Speaker he will be able to make a very eloquent appeal to the house. The government, although questioned in regard to this matter, has not given us its policy. Again and again throughout this session we have tried to arrive at the position the government intended to take, and I hope to-day that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) will state very clearly the policy of the government in this regard. The papers which were tabled last Thursday indicate nothing whatever except what might be called a "stand pat" policy. I regret to-day the absence of several members of the cooperating groups here—the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy)—all of whom were keenly interested in this question, and intended to take part in the debate.

Let me say that this is by no means a fight between prohibitionists on the one hand and, on the other, the advocates of so-called government control. I hope that from the very first we shall clear our minds of the idea that this is simply a question either of enforcing prohibition on this side of the line or assisting to enforce prohibition in the United States. It is a much more serious question than that of prohibition. It strikes at the root of organized government itself, and involves the most serious problems in international relations. First of all I would suggest that there is involved in this question the responsibility of government to parliament. You may remember the resolution which was passed by this house on June 18, 1926. I shall read only two or three paragraphs from the report of the special committee appointed to investigate the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise. Section 10 of that report reads:

> The committee find that it is the common practice of the department to grant clearances to vessels wholly or partly laden with liquor for the United States, or allegedly bound for a foreign port, but admittedly sailing to "rum rows", and that false landing certificates have been produced to obtain cancellation of bonds given for foreign export of cargoes so cleared.
> The committee further finds that a strong presumption is raised that some proportion of the liquor so shipped and cleared finds its way back into Canada for consumption. The committee, therefore, recommend that excise and sales tax be levied on all Canadian-made intoxicating liquors released from bond, no matter where they are carried and consumed, and that duty and sales tax be levied on all alcoholic liquors entering Canada, whether in bond or otherwise, irrespective of their ultimate destination.
> Doubts have been cast upon the sufficiency of existing legislation to prohibit or authorize regulations prohibiting the illegal export of intoxicating liquors to the United States. To the extent to which such legislation may be insufficient the committee recommends that it be amended. The committee further recommends that, as soon as possible, regulations be made to prohibit clearances being granted to vessels carrying liquor as cargo, sailing from a Canadian port to a United States port, such regulations to make an exception in favour of liquor being imported into the United States in accordance with the laws of that country.

I wish the house would recall the circumstances under which that resolution was passed. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) a little earlier in the session, had made, an impassioned appeal to the house to get rid of some of the evils connected with smuggling. The government was fighting for its very life. I confess that I was one of those who gave the government a chance for its life, and a number in this corner agreed in that policy. The government accepted the resolution. I doubt very much whether the session could have continued had the government not accepted it. The report was passed by the house. Now I take it that such a report, especially when passed under such circumstances, would be mandatory in character. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) often speaks of the necessity of maintaining responsible government in this country. May I ask him, to whom is the government responsible? Surely to the House of Commons itself; and if the government is not responsible to the house then we have ceased to have responsible government. What have we to-day? To a very large extent, as I understand the situation, the cabinet is controlled by the Prime Minister; the party is very largely dominated by the wishes of the cabinet; and these groups undertake rather autocratically to carry through certain types of legislation with very little reference to the house at large. Do we call that responsible government?

It seems somewhat curious that the Prime Minister, who rather likes to boast that his grandfather helped to establish responsible government in this country, may be lending himself to a procedure which is undermining responsible government. I recall some words of Mr. Henry W. Nevinson, the great English war correspondent, in which he points out that at each stage in history we have to struggle to maintain those things which our forefathers won.

For freedom, we know, is a thing that we have to conquer afresh for ourselves every day like love; and we are always losing freedom, just the same as we are losing love, because after each victory, we think we can settle down and enjoy it without further struggle. The battle of freedom is never done and the field never quiet.

I submit that we ought to have a very clear pronouncement to-day from the Prime Minister as to why he has disregarded a resolution passed by the house under those very peculiar circumstances. It is true that a royal commission was appointed; I myself, I think, was responsible for the suggestion as to the appointment of a commission. Though my own amendment was lost, the idea was incorporated into another amendment that carried. I had thought that we were suggesting a constructive policy which might take this matter out of the heated atmosphere of party discussion, and that we might have an impartial tribunal which would guide us in deciding what was the best policy for the country to pursue. The commission was appointed and in due time reported. I quote a few paragraphs from its report:

> The evidence adduced before us disclosed that a great majority of such shipments never reached the named destination, and the inference was strong that the liquor comprised in such shipments had been smuggled into the United States. In many cases landing certificates were produced to customs that our investigation showed to be forged and fraudulent. In some cases the bonds were released, but in other cases the department was not satisfied, and the bonds are still outstanding. We have dealt with this aspect of the matter in our interim report No. 10.
> For some time past an additional method has been adopted which is to export duty-paid liquor. The practice is to enter at customs the liquor as being for export to certain ports in the United States, but the liquor is never landed at a port recognized by the United States authorities, and is smuggled into that country in various places where there are no recognized ports or customs houses.
> Many regulations have been framed and enacted for the purpose of meeting this method of smuggling, but they have proved ineffective.
> We are convinced that the export houses are established in practically every case for the sole purpose of selling liquor to be smuggled into the United States and that they exist for no legitimate purpose whatever. Some of these export houses have customs bonds, and we would recommend that all these bonds be cancelled.
> As all of the provinces of Canada have either assumed control over the sale of liquor or have prohibited it altogether, the principle of the Doherty Act should in our opinion be extended to prohibit the export from any of these provinces by anyone other than the provincial governments or the manufacturer.

And this is the paragraph to which I call special attention:

> We also express our entire concurrence in the recommendation of the special committee of the House of Commons as contained in paragraph 10 of that committee's report. An effective method of carrying out the intent of the treaty referred to would be to prohibit clearances to vessels or vehicles of all kinds carrying a cargo of liquor to the United States, contrary to the laws of that country.

One would have expected action to be taken by the government but nothing whatever has been done. In addition to that, the Prime Minister himself gave a serious pledge to this country; on September 11 a full page advertisement appeared in the Toronto Globe under the heading "A pledge From the Liberal Leader." It said:

> When returned to power I pledge myself to continue relentlessly the investigation of the customs service and to carry out without fear or favour the needed requirements.

What were the needed requirements? The committee of this house, after sitting for weeks, decided that one of the needed requirements was the prohibition of clearances, and their decision was confirmed by a royal commission appointed by the government. There is not the slightest doubt in the world as to what those requirements were; the Prime Minister stood solemnly pledged to carry out the needed requirements, yet nothing whatever has been done. I recall the high praise accorded by the Psalmist to the man who, when he made a pledge, carried it out notwithstanding the cost involved:

> He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not . . . . He that doeth these things shall never be moved.

Nothing is said about what will happen to the man who does not do so. I would like to ask why the government has refused to act in this regard. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre is in his seat; I hope we shall have his support in this connection. We remember the work he did, for which I think we must give him due credit, as I did at the time; I think he should complete his work and help straighten out this international situation.

Why has the government refused to take action? It may be because we are still going on the old principle of complete national sovereignty; sometimes I think perhaps the government has been unduly influenced by the "red-blooded" speeches of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), who has told us again and again that we should maintain our national honour by doing this, that or the other thing. I think the time has come when we should realize that this old doctrine of complete national sovereignty is becoming obsolete. It used to be that each individual householder believed that his home was his castle and that he could do as he pleased without regard for his neighbours, but in our modern city communities we know that this doctrine cannot be maintained. I am curbed in a hundred ways by the desires and wishes of my neighbours who surround me. In the old days each city could do as it pleased, but to-day even the cities must conform to certain general regulations, because we are no longer living isolated lives. In my opinion the same thing is true to-day in international affairs; No one nation lives to itself. We are bound together by a hundred ties and we must have regard to the convenience and the welfare of other nations if we are to preserve our own national life and if we ourselves are to be treated decently. In the great street of the nations we are but one house, and we must remember that we must live in that street with the others.

If I might give a simple illustration, it sometimes occurs to me that our position is very similar to that of two old women who have adjacent back yards. The one old lady keeps hens and the other keeps a garden, and in one way or another the hens from the one back yard wander into the garden, and of course the old lady who keeps the garden is very indignant over it. She says to the other, "You keep your hens at home" and when the other old lady answers that she will let her hens run and scratch where they please, the first old lady replies, "If they come over here I will wring their necks." So the quarrel goes on, and at last the old lady owning the garden says, 'We must live as neighbours, I am going to erect a fence in order to try and keep your hens from my garden, but will you not help me do so? At least help me to stop the holes in the fence." The old lady owning the hens replies, "If you would only keep hens like I do there would be no trouble about your old garden; we would live as neighbours, without trouble." So the squabble goes on.

That is about the situation as between Canada and the United States; we have government control and they have prohibition, and our government takes the position that as long as they have a different system from ours we cannot settle anything. We say, "If you put up your fence and make it tight enough nothing will happen", to which they reply that they cannot make it tight enough to keep out all the hens, so they ask our help. I believe that in ordinary law affecting community life we are beginning to recognize certain rights of neighbours. My little illustration indicates at least my position with regard to this international situation. I believe international neighborliness is essential.

Mr. Woodsworth.]

There is a suspicion that powerful interests are behind the people who thus evade the law of the United States; hon. members will recall the reports of the royal commission, and from interim report No. 10 I have selected a few paragraphs. With regard to the Cosgrave Export Brewery Company Limited, the report stated:

> An audit of the books of this company disloses the fact that certain moneys were deducted from the gross earnings of the company which were paid as contributions to compaign funds, in respect of certain plebiscites taken in the province of Ontario. There does not appear to be any justification for these deductions and as these were improper there would be due considerable arrears of income tax.

With regard to the Carling Export Brewery Company, the report stated:

> In order to insure the success of these operations, it was necessary to procure customs seals, both of the United States and of Canada, and the necessary customs and shipping documents. According to the evidence, Low stated that he could procure these. . . . These cars had affixed United States and Canadian customs seals which had been stolen or otherwise unlawfully procured and affixed to the cars, and customs and shipping documents that were forged or otherwise unlawfully procured.

With regard to Gooderham and Worts:

> It was disclosed by an examination of the books of the company that large unvouchered payments were made, which were charged as part of the cost of operation, under various headings which did not show the real nature of the expenditures. Most of these payments were deducted from the profits before arriving at the amount upon which income tax was payable by the company to be government. The evidence disclosed that these payments were principally for political and propaganda purposes. In so far as contributed for federal political purposes, they were illegal and contrary to the provisions of section 10, chapter 46 of the Dominion Elections Act. . . .

With regard to Hiram Walker and Sons Limited:

> The evidence also indicates that this company made large payments for which there were no proper vouchers and for purposes not recognized by the department as properly deductible for income tax purposes, and that the same were deducted from the profits of the company on the income tax returns made from year to year. The evidence suggests that the income tax returns of this company and the settlements made of the income tax should be reviewed.

With regard to Wiser's Distillery Company similar statements are made. Reporting the sittings of the royal commission at Montreal, The Toronto Telegram of June 14, 1927, stated:

> James G. Lawrence, secretary-treasurer of the Consolidated Distillers, admitted that the sum of $380,608.59 was paid to both political parties between July, 1923, and the end of 1926.

I do not accuse the right hon. the Prime Minister of receiving campaign funds directly from these great breweries and distilleries; I do not intend to imply that the members sitting on the opposite side of the house are in direct receipt of these amounts, but I do say that when it is a well-established fact that large sums of money have been used for political propaganda and for election purposes, it does at least leave some ground for the suspicion that in some way or another, in the underground workings of the party system, there are influences at work which are inimical to the public welfare. I have been informed upon very good authority that when one of the old parties starts a federal campaign it requires a minimum of $1,000,000; I think I have that on fair authority.

Mr. JACOBS: Shame, shame.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) may make light of that, but we have all been long enough in politics to know that these practices do exist.

Mr. BOURASSA: The hon. member is shamed with the small figure.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said a minimum of $1,000,000. It may be for the legitimate purposes of the party, but what I am getting at is this; large corporations are making enormous fortunes in this way and we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that by underground methods these corporations have tremendous power and may influence public sentiment through the party organization, through the newspapers and in other ways. The right hon. the Prime Minister and the government should very definitely clear themselves of all suspicion of participating in any way or of being influenced in any way by organizations of this character.

Further the present practice encourages bootlegging. We have been told by government officials that bootlegging has been decreased to almost the vanishing point. Well, tell that to the marines, or perhaps I had better say "tell it in the maritimes; tell it on the Pacific coast." Personally I do not know much about the border between Ontario and the United States but I do not think that anyone who knows of the conditions there will say that smuggling has decreased to the vanishing point. I will frankly admit that the government has introduced some great reforms in the regulations and I want to give every credit to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) for the way in which he has carried out those reforms. There has been a reduction in the number of docks and an elimination of the abuse of the B-13 forms, and liquor is now being loaded in the presence of a customs officer. I have no doubt that these reforms have done much good, but they have not been sufficient. In the report of the Liquor Control Board of Ontario dated October 31, 1928, Sir Henry Drayton, the chief commissioner, states:

> It is hoped that substantial relief will be obtained through these reforms and that the short-circuiting which has so undoubtedly taken place, substantially reduced.

Sir Henry continues:

> Bootlegging and short-circuiting will never really be stopped until proceedings are effectively taken against those supplying liquor in the first instance.

According to the Toronto Globe on November 22, these regulations are not satisfactory to the Attorney General of Ontario. If we are committed to the government sale of liquor in this country we should supplement that by government manufacture and make the handling of liquors purely a government monopoly.

Miss MACPHAIL: We would save the taxes too.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think that is a reasonable and constructive proposal which might be considered by the government. Let me repeat: If we are committed to government sale in most of the provinces of this country, I think the only logical thing for us to do is to go in for government manufacture; manufacture practically at cost because that would eliminate the bootlegger as he would have no particular reason to go into the business if the liquors were manufactured by the government and sold at as nearly cost as possible.

Mr. GEARY: Sold abroad at cost?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not considering the sale abroad; I think that we will have enough to do at the present time to consider our policy with regard to Canada itself. In considering our foreign policy we might very well determine it on a somewhat different basis from that which now prevails under private manufacture.

An hon. MEMBER: Why manufacture at all?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not intend to go into the question of why manufacture at all; I simply say that as we seem to be committed at the present time to government sale we should go right through with a public control policy and adopt government manufacture.

I charge that the present practice encourages lawlessness here in Canada. I should like to read a few brief paragraphs from our daily papers. The first is from the Toronto Globe of December 3, 1928, and is as follows:

There can be no mistaking the nature of the business itself or the men engaged in it. Official figures show that in the past trade year the Canadian customs cleared for United States points liquor valued at more than $25,000,000. This is not all. It is an open secret that most of the liquors ostensibly cleared for any of the four corners of the outside world are actually destined for consumption in the United States. This is big business—and it can be transacted only by those who daily risk their lives in evading our neighbour's police. It was inevitable, therefore, that the rum-running ranks should have been largely recruited from the gangs of gunmen and thugs who formerly inhabited the underworld of Chicago, Detroit and New York.

Is there any one so simple as to imagine that these gangsters are criminal only on their native side of the border and become good citizens the moment they cross or recross the invisible boundary? Such a hope is an impossibility. There are several hundreds of pages of evidence in the investigation of our customs scandal. A great many of them witness to the fact that these criminals are always criminals; that they are not in business for the fun of it; that they are not particular whence their profits come; that they just as readily smuggle narcotics, tobaccos or silks north as they smuggle liquor south; that their contempt for their own American government does not magically become admiration for the Canadian authority simply because it shelters them and abets them.

A particular case is mentioned in the London Free Press of December 3, 1928, as follows:

Last year J. D. Hanson, a native-born Canadian, was slain by a liquor enforcement officer for no discoverable reason. Hanson was not a bootlegger and did not even have any liquor in his possesion when shot down in cold blood. Children living in Sandwich had narrow escapes from death as long range bullets from guns of enforcement officers sped over the Detroit river. Motorists traversing the border cities along the water front were in danger of their lives. A state of siege every once in a while occurs on lake Erie off the Port Dover district, when it is not safe for law-abiding citizens to venture out on the lake in their launches. They risk instant death or injury at the hands of the quick-trigger American liquor enforcement officials.

I need only mention the sensational articles which appeared in MacLean's Magazine of December 1, December 15, 1928, and January 1, 1929. But I should like to quote a paragraph from a statement by Sir George Foster. I read it in the Winnipeg Tribune of February 23 of this year. This is what he is reported as saying:

An organized band of rum-runners and smugglers who by the corruption of Canadian and United States officials, by outwitting the United States guardians of the law, and by the employment, if necessary, of gunmen and hired bandits, forced the forbidden borders of a friendly state and delivered therein to other organized bands of law-breakers, the goods banned by the laws of that country. By these methods and with such associates, Canadian brewers and distillers disposed of $27,000,000 worth of their wares in 1928, and pocketed their proportion of the illegal profits made by the venture.

Again:

The organization exists—it is skilled and experienced and absolutely unscrupulous; it is well armed with corruption funds and sawed-off shotguns, and shrinks not at the sight of blood. Why should the Canadian government give support and sustenance to so efficient and soulless an organization?

That question is being asked right across this country from coast to coast: Why should the Canadian government give support to such an organization as that? Let me quote this statement by Sir George Foster which, for me, is unanswerable:

The citizen of one nation who does not respect the law of another nation of equal civilization will not be likely to respect the law of his own, if it conflicts with his own personal self-interest.

I do not know that I can do better than reiterate that statement. It is all I want to say in the way of argument. The citizen of one nation who does not respect the law of another nation of equal civilization with his own will not be likely to respect the law of his own, if it conflicts with his own personal self-interest.

I want to suggest that the practice that now exists, encourages political corruption. The old brewing and distilling firms were well known. They had certain standards of public and private morality. They may have contributed and they did contribute to the campaign funds of at least one of the older parties and, I think, to both of them; some to one, some to the other, but the same corporation did not contribute to both. It was known to which party they contributed and they did so as any other corporation would. These new firms which have had such a mushroom growth and which have made such enormous profits, have the morality of bandits and pirates. They cheat even the government which protects them. I need not go into details but no later than May 16 I read this in the Toronto Star. I happened to be in Toronto on that date, but similar statements can be found in almost any newspaper. The article reads:

The Attorney General of Canada brought action against Hiram Walker and Son, distillers, to recover the amount of bonds totalling $107,000 and given by them on the export of 4,000 cases of whiskey to W. O. Watson, Guatemala, by way of Victoria.

Again:

Captain Nicholles swore that he sailed from Victoria, B.C., with sealed orders, which he opened after leaving port. These orders instructed him to be off a port on the west coast of Vancouver island and there to discharge 2,400 cases of whiskey. He swore he did so discharge the cargo to a steamer called the Pascawa, of Canadian register, and that 100 cases of Hiram Walker's was included in this discharge.

Continuing, witness swore that afterwards his orders were to proceed south to a point off the Faralon islands, off San Francisco, and that there he discharged the balance of the cargo, part to another steamer of Canadian register, the Chief Skujuid, and the balance to small boats, that arrived from the American shore.

Captain Nicholles swore he never went to Guatemala nor to Bonaventura, Colombia, that he did not know how landing certificates had been procured.

He swore that for the return voyage he required an outward bound report from the authorities at Bonaventura and a clean bill of health to present to the Canadian quarantine officials on return. These papers, he swore, were handed to him as his ship lay off San Francisco.

This sounds very much like the information that was given us some years ago by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). Instead of this having been cleaned up as we had a right to expect, we find that under the present practice these rotten conditions are being continued.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would give me time for a question. I am sure he does not want to misrepresent anything. Can he give the date when this offence was committed?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. EULER: He will find that is one of the old cases which is now being prosecuted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad of the correction. I did not look into the question of the date of the offence. The paper I am quoting from is of recent date. I quite admit that this case does not have any bearing upon or back up my argument at this point.

But to proceed, it seems to me that the refusal of our government to take action along this line constitutes an unfriendly act towards the United States. On June 6, 1924, Canada signed a treaty with the United States "for the suppression of smuggling operations along the international boundary between the Dominion of Canada and the United States and assisting in the arrest and prosecution of persons violating the narcotic laws of either government and for kindred purposes." Article 1 provides for the exchange of information concerning clearances of vessels, and article 2 provides for the elimination of the practice of granting fake clearances. Almost before the treaty was signed it was found that in practice it was altogether inadequate. So, as early at least as October 6, 1925, we find the United States officials opening up negotiations with Canada—I have not the earliest letters, but a letter of that date refers to still earlier negotiations—to see whether Canada would not consent to legislation which would make the treaty effective. Under date of October 6, 1925, I find a communication from the United States authorities:

> Suggesting, first, that—clearance be refused by the Dominion authorities to vessels carrying cargoes of liquor destined for the United States; second that a convention be concluded for the extradition between the United States and Canada of persons guilty of offences under the customs laws of either government, and, third, that a convention supplementary to that signed on June 6, 1924, be negotiated for the transportation of liquor to Telegraph Creek, British Columbia, via Stikine river through Alaska.

Negotiations dragged on month after month. At last, on October 6, 1926, the Canadian government asked for a still further delay until after the royal commission had reported. It was pointed out by the Canadian government that:

> The order in council instructs the commissioners "to continue and complete the said investigation into the Department of Customs and Excise and also to inquire into and report on the operations of the treaty made between the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America dated June 6, 1924, for the suppression of smuggling along the international boundary between the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America and as to whether the said treaty is being carried out according to the declared intent thereof and as to whether any amendment to the said treaty is necessary or desirable to ensure the suppression of smuggling."
> In view of the fact that the above inquiry has been initiated and that the reports and recommendations of the royal commission will be of great value in the discussion of the interpretation and possible amendment of the existing convention and collateral questions, the Canadian government is of opinion that it would be desirable to await its findings before setting a date for the proposed conference between representatives of Canada and the United States.

It is quite apparent from that letter and from the subsequent correspondence that the American people expected, and the Canadian government more or less conceded, that some revision of the treaty would be made. A preliminary conference was asked for by the United States and at last on January 8th, 9th and 10th of this year a conference on commercial smuggling was held. I should like to summarize a few of the important presentations made at that conference, following the Canadian summary.

First of all the Canadian representatives made it clear that that conference had no real authority. It consisted of officials rather than of members of the government, and they had no authority to determine matters of policy and were called upon simply to bring out in discussion the implications of any proposals made.

The United States representatives showed that there was a growing importation of liquor from Canada. I quote from the summary:

According to Canadian official statistics the export of liquor to the United States for the year ended 31st March, 1928, amounted in duty-paid value to over $18,000,000. It was estimated that the importations from Canada formed the largest proportion of the supplies from outside.

I would urge that the amount of duty-paid liquor does not anything like cover the whole amount of liquor that was taken into the United States. Some of my official friends may be inclined to trust merely to the documents in this respect but some years ago I had some experience in waterfront work, and from inside knowledge I can testify that there is a good deal that goes on that is not found in the official documents.

Again, the American representatives stated:

Contrary to statements appearing in the press the United States officials were seriously attempting to solve the liquor smuggling problem. They had substantially succeeded in cutting off the smuggling of liquor from the high seas but had not been able to stop the flow across the Canadian border, particularly in the Detroit area.

Further:

The fact remained, however, that since the treaty went into effect between 1926 and 1928 the shipment of liquors to the United States, according to Canadian statistics, had increased.

With regard to the vessels that were operating they pointed out that the information as to clearances was frequently not sufficient to permit of identification. Then followed their proposal:

The proposal merely meant that each country should refuse to allow its instrumentalities to be used by persons engaged in breaking the laws of the other country. This remedy could be afforded by treaty amendment to the following effect, or by corresponding legislative or administrative action:

"The high contracting parties agree that clearances of shipments of merchandise by water, air or land from any of the ports of either country to a port of entrance of the other country shall be denied, if such shipments comprise articles the introduction of which is prohibited or restricted for whatever cause in the country to which such shipment is destined, provided, however, that such clearance shall not be denied on shipments of restricted merchandise when there has been complete compliance with the conditions or laws of both countries."

Quoting further from the summary:

It was made clear, however, in subsequent discussion that in addition to the renewal of clearances the United States representatives considered it would be necessary, in order to check the flow, for the Canadian authorities to take steps to prevent the release from distilleries of duty-paid spirits for export to the United States.

Years ago the Liberal party negotiated a treaty for reciprocity between the United States and Canada. I am one of those who believe that that proposal should have been adopted. The failure to carry it into effect has been, I think, a tragedy for Canada from which we have not yet recovered. Here is another reciprocal treaty which has been proposed, a reasonable treaty, which the Liberal government so far has refused to consider. The Americans pointed out that other countries had done what Canada was refusing to do. Mexico and Cuba had taken action along these lines, and I understand, though I do not find this in the memorandum, that Japan has also done so. Norway refused to clear shipments of liquor to the United States, and not only that, but it penalized Norwegian vessels engaged in smuggling liquor into other countries. It was stated that Great Britain had taken action, but I believe that that was later questioned. In any case, Great Britain had gone so far as at least under certain circumstances to extend the three-mile limit to twelve miles. Quoting from the summary:

The United States delegation stated that it was their well considered opinion that nothing short of discontinuance of the existing practice of issuing clearances or other official documents permitting the legal exportation from Canada to the United States of goods which cannot be legally imported into the United States, would be of material assistance in dealing with the problem.

So they stated, very clearly indeed.

Mr. IRVINE: What report is that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am reading from the memorandum compiled by our own Canadian authorities as to what took place at the conference held in Ottawa between the United States and Canadian representatives in January of this year. I should like, however, to go just a little outside of that official memorandum to quote a couple of paragraphs direct from what was said by the American authorities. I read from the papers laid on the table:

Admiral Billard concluded his statement with a parable, based on the operation of Article II of the present treaty, of a man who asked for a clearance for his vessel with a cargo of liquor to a port in Cuba. The clearance was refused on the ground that the vessel would not be able to make the port specified, and there was, consequently, a suspicion that the liquor might be smuggled into the United States. The man thereupon asked for a clearance to Detroit with the same cargo, which was promptly granted, since all suspicion had been cleared away.

Further, Admiral Billard said:

The treaty with Canada already concluded between the United States and Canada is entitled a Convention "To Suppress Smuggling" between the two countries. It seems to us, then, that Canada has already subscribed to the general policy, not only of reducing smuggling between the two countries, but of suppressing it. In other words, that we are not asking the Canadian government to adopt a new policy on this matter; we are asking them to take the policy they have already officially sanctioned, to suppress smuggling between the United States and Canada, and to supplement the existing treaty into which they so willingly entered and which they have so thoroughly upheld—to supplement it by accomplishing that suppression of smuggling, to the suppression of which they have already indicated their official willingness.

The Canadian government since the conference has made a suggestion that it might be possible to meet the wishes of the Americans and to effect the desired reforms by permitting the American officials to be stationed at the docks on this side of the line. This, however, is the reply of the American authorities to the proposal. It is dated April 20, 1929. I read simply the essential parts:

In the above communication you were good enough to state that in order to cooperate with and further assist my government in the effective enforcement of its laws, the Canadian government was prepared to permit United States officers to be stationed on the Canadian side of the border, at ports of clearance to be determined, in order to enable the United States officials themselves to transmit immediately to the appropriate authorities in their country information concerning clearances of all vessels carrying liquor cargoes to the United States.

I now have the honour, under instructions of my government, to inform you that it is the view of its competent authorities that the proposed arrangement would not be a solution of the problem.

That letter is signed by William Phillips. Se here we arrive at the same point at which we started back in 1924—a deadlock, the United States asking that we would legislate in such a way as to enable them to carry out their laws, that we would not connive at the breaking of their laws, and we refusing to do what I think the world would consider to be a very neighbourly sort of act.

What will be the next move of the United States? Well, I cannot tell, but I found this in a recent despatch from Washington:

Someone here put it this way—"Canada has been asked to stop the rum-runners from her side before they start. Failing that, by far the biggest effort yet will be made to prevent them from finishing. If the Canadian government does not make shipment of liquor to the United States illegal, then the United States will talk to the Canadian distillers and their rum-runnning agents in a language that they will understand."

If in this effort it becomes necessary to stop and examine everybody and everything that crosses the border by auto, by boat, in railway cars; to stop and examine all express and freight shipments, there will be delay, discomfort, inconvenience and friction. It is to be hoped that this will not be necessary, but if the present temper on the United States side of the line persists, however reluctant the authorities may be to adopt such drastic measures, there is a feeling that whatever it is necessary to do will be done, but that rum-running must and will be stopped.

An hon. MEMBER: What paper is that in?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is an article published in the Toronto Star of April 10 from a special correspondent at Washington.

An hon. MEMBER: Why don't they stop them?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Surely it is not necessary to say that to-day, when the American representatives themselves have shown so clearly that under existing conditions it is next to impossible for them to do so. They ask our help, at least to a degree that we will not actively connive at this traffic, that we will pass legislation that will prevent clearances to rum-running vessels. But further than that, I find this statement, which was published, I think, in nearly all our papers. I read this in the Toronto Star of April 12:

"Only when it is apparent that a boat trying to escape search is faster than ours is gun fire to be used," an official said to-day. "Even then, under no circumstances, are boats to be followed into Canadian waters. We have warned the officers, in case the zeal of some of the younger men should run away with them in their desire to make a capture."

When the United States prohibition navy—

—in this sector—

Mark also those words.

—is assembled within a few weeks there are to be twenty-nine "36 footers" capable of a speed of 45 miles an hour, and five "75 footers" capable of making 25 miles in heavier seas. The first twenty-nine will carry machine guns, and the larger submarine chaser type, will mount one pound guns in the bows.

In the whole history of prohibition enforcement along the Niagara river boundary, no fleet to equal this has ever been assembled by the United States to blockade Bridgeburg, Port Colborne, Port Maitland and Dunnville. This flotilla has to cover the shore line from the straits of Mackinaw to Sacketts harbour, opposite Kingston. In places of twenty-five "36 footers" last year, Commander Rasmussen has twenty-nine this season. Last year he had only 250 men, this year he has 300.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that that is rather a serious situation to develop on our great lakes and boundary rivers. I was reading, with a great deal of interest, a speech made by the Prime Minister a few weeks ago before the League of Nations Society in this city. Let me quote simply one paragraph:

> We are able to point to our unprotected frontier of over 3,000 miles, a frontier stretching from ocean to ocean across an entire continent, along the whole of which not a shot has been fired for over a hundred years.

That simply is not true, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that certain types of United States boats are not found on the lakes, but other boats of smaller tonnage are there; and although guns of a certain calibre are not used, smaller guns are. Let me say there is every danger of friction and conflict when that situation exists. Three hundred men in these boats at the present time. I urge that here is a dangerous situation that may easily lead to some most unfortunate incident. In fact we had only last night brought to our attention the I'm Alone incident, and it was declared on the floor of this house that that was a case either of war or piracy. Now, I am not going to discuss that case, but I submit that when words of that character can be used in the Canadian House of Commons with regard to an incident that involved this country and the great republic to the south, it is a serious situation. And even although the orders to the United States officers may be that there is to be no passing into Canadian waters in pursuit of rum-running vessels, is it not inevitable that there will be exciting chases in the course of which there will be a rush to our side of the line? So narrow are these waters in some places that gun fire may endanger the lives of Canadian citizens, and should it unfortunately happen that any of our people are killed or wounded, it can readily be understand there will be passions aroused—well, it is hard to know whether those passions could be held in check. It may well be that the United States coastguards in the I'm Alone case were in the wrong—I think they were—but are we justified in provoking such acts? That is another question and one we have to answer. Some of us have had to discipline children, either our own or somebody else's in school. Jack is told that he must not hit Mary. We say to him "Now, Jack, it is not nice for a boy to hit a little girl. You must not do it." Then one of these days there is a squabble, and poor Mary comes home crying and says "Jack hit me." I suppose we should then inflict condign punishment on Jack for having done it. Well, I confess that at times, in the case of such domestic troubles, I sympathize with Jack. Mary has been perhaps as tantalizing as girls know how to be—I am glad that the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) is not here. Undoubtedly they grow better as they grow up, but girls can be very tantalizing. Probably Mary sticks out her tongue at Jack and says smart things—and girls can always say smarter things than boys. Jack of course becomes exasperated and he strikes her. That little incident may, I think, be taken as suggesting the relation between ourselves and the United States in this matter. It may be true that the coastguard exceeded his authority, but at the same time this was a vessel of Canadian registry; and whether or not the clearance papers had been granted by Canada the fact is that she was smuggling goods, and therefore we are more or less involved. And there are other cases.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member knows that she did not clear from a Canadian port.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say, whether or not clearance papers had been granted. I am glad the hon. member has made that clear. She did not clear from a Canadian port, but I urge that irrespective of that fact she was a vessel of Canadian registry. As a matter of fact only to-day a gentleman who has come from the west coast tells me of incidents of this kind which are taking place out on the Pacific.

I have carefully read the statements of Canada's representatives at the conference, and really it does seem to me that after all we are simply offering excuses. That is all I can say. I have tried to find a reasonable ground for our refusal to accede to the request of the United States but I have not succeeded. If the shoe were on the other foot I know that we should be indignant had the United States taken the position that we are taking.

We are maintaining, at enormous cost, an embassy in the United States to promote friendly relations. Are we going to maintain that embassy simply to try to protect international rum-runners, as in the I'm Alone case? I ask this question: Why should we shield a gang of outlaws, many of them American outlaws, whose business means gain to a small group of Canadian distillers and their parasites, but is not in the interests of the great mass of the people of Canada? I say this is not decent treatment of a friendly nation. All Canada is asked to do is to refuse to facilitate the operations of law-breakers. I have said earlier—and I do not intend to develop this point—that this trade as now carried on threatens the morality and peace of Canada itself; and that perhaps is even more important than the question of our international attitude. Perhaps I should not say that; I do not know whether it can be more important but at least it is of equal importance. And to recall the earlier part of my argument, since the government had such a clear mandate from this house, and since it had the report of the royal commission which the government itself appointed, it does seem that inaction on the part of the government constitutes a threat to the principle of responsible government itself.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): It has become habitual in this house, so habitual in fact as to be almost a commonplace, for any member who rises to address the house on any subject to refer to that subject as being of such transcendent importance as to constrain him to take part in the debate. While however this may have become habitual, I submit that the question before us is intrinsically and from the point of view of the Canadian public one of importance. It is, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has said, a subject of importance inasmuch as it involves our international relationships as well as the morality of our own people. As the hon. member was speaking, my mind went back a few days, and I thought of that treaty which was brought before the house having for its purpose the renunciation of war. That treaty was epoch-making in its importance; it was tremendous in its possibilities. It was based, not upon law but upon the crystallized and articulate conscience of a people, and the measures for its enforcement lay not in legal action nor in legal penalties but in the indignation of an aroused people. And so with this. Many questions of importance in constitutional law are here involved, and there are many problems, staggering in their difficulty, in the way of administration. But these, notwithstanding their importance, fade to my mind into comparative insignificance in the light of two other factors which arise—factors overshadowing the question of law or the question of administrative detail, as the oak would overshadow—I was going to say the violet, but that comparison is not so apt—the shrubs and bushes at its roots. These questions may be divided into two; they are two great questions. First is the degree to which our action will affect international peace and international harmony as between two great nations, nations which for decades have prided themselves, and rightly so, on their cool-headed common sense and kindly consideration when dealing with their mutual problems. This matter before us is, I think, one which threatens the very purpose for which the treaty for the renunciation of war was brought forward.

I am not going to speak of connivance on the part of the government, for as I interpret the word "connivance" it implies a certain degree of approval; and I cannot believe that this government would or could view with any approval the actions of certain criminals —I speak of them as criminals, but perhaps I had better say certain men—in their own country. Moreover, I cannot imagine the present minister of the department (Mr. Euler) viewing the situation with approval. I have known that minister as a private member and as the head of the department for eight years, and during those eight years my respect for him has grown as a man of courage, sincerity and character. I shall not therefore speak of connivance in that sense. But to the degree to which connivance may be interpreted as a knowledge of what is going on, without any effective steps being taken to curb the situation, I might possibly use the word. We have watched the effects of this trade, which is carried on legally in this country although it is illegal in the country to the south of us; and we have seen that trade leading to conditions which we all deplore. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, it is leading to the arming of people, a very small percentage of people it is true, in order to defend the laws of the United States against what they believe to be aggressive acts on the part of some of our nationals. You will note that I say aggressive acts on the part of some of our nationals, and I am not in the least confusing individual citizens of Canada with the government of Canada. That is a very different thing, but it has led to the arming of a people and to the I'm Alone and other similar incidents. I believe that from the point of view of every right thinking man—and I believe every member of this chamber is a right thinking man—it may lead and has led to deplorable incidents.

I intend to speak very briefly on this matter; I wish simply to express my opinions and those of thousands of other citizens of this country, many of whom have communicated with me, and therefore I shall pass to the second phase of this issue, which was also touched upon by the hon. member who opened this discussion; I refer to the morale of our young people. When you go to the frontiers of our country where this trade is principally carried on you will find men who have grown wealthy from this traffic; I am not sure that you will find women, but at all events you will find such men. The young people of Canada, who see these men and are associated with what is going on day after day and who see so little effective action being taken to curb it, to my mind are subject to the great danger of setting up false ideas of right and wrong and of the heroic and the base. When they see men enriching themselves in this way; when they see these same men retain their standing as respectable and responsible citizens of the community; when they see that the actions of these men and the trade in which they are engaged apparently do not lower them in the eyes of the adult community, what kind of ideals will these boys and girls have? What will they think; what heroes will they set up? Then, to go into it further, right along our frontiers we find boys and girls and men and women becoming associated with the idea of violence and bloodshed, and I am afraid that we are coming to the point where familiarity does not necessarily breed contempt but where familiarity dulls the keen edge of their perception, wipes out the sense of right and wrong and takes away the right balance of mind.

Let me repeat that I am considering this as a moral rather than a legal issue. I am not qualified by either experience or knowledge to speak of the law; neither am I qualified to speak of the administrative difficulties, but I think I am capable of voicing here the opinions and the best common sense of some people at least whom I know in this country. It is their opinion that we are in danger of interjecting into our international relationship, into the international harmony and goodwill which is of such great importance, an element which will threaten if not destroy it, and that we are still more in danger of destroying all that is best in some of our people. I believe we are tearing down the bars which have protected what is best in mind and in conscience of these people who are now becoming accustomed to this traffic, and we are setting up in the place of statesmanship, of self sacrifice and of morality and goodwill an ideal of financial success without regard to how that wealth may be brought about. So it does seem to me, without being able to state definitely just what steps should be taken, that this parliament and this government should approach the subject seriously and with sincerity, and from the moral point of view as much as from the legal point of view. We should do what lies within our power to stop this practice.

I have heard it advanced as an argument against action being taken by our government that the United States is not very sincere or very desirous of seeing these laws enforced; we are told that they would rather throw upon us the onus of that problem than assume it themselves. I can hardly accept that statement without having very definite knowledge, but I do know that no matter how lax the officials in that country may be or how insincere in their attitude towards their own laws, it does not remove from Canadians the responsibility which rests upon us and for which we alone must account. So once more this parliament and this government have set the stamp of approval upon such repressive or preventive methods or measures as may be brought into force, they represent a people who are moral and peace loving; they are, I believe, individually and as a whole anxious to do the right thing both here and abroad, and in all earnestness and sincerity I appeal to the government and to the house to treat the subject on its merits and to see that at least Canada shall place herself beyond reproach.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, those of us who were here in 1925-26 will clearly recall that charges were made with regard to the administration of the Department of Customs and that a special committee was appointed to make a very careful study of the whole subject. In one regard at least that committee made a unanimous report to the House of Commons in June of that year, and on June 18 the house approved of the report. Among other things that report urged that:

> . . . . regulations be made to prohibit clearances being granted to vessels carrying liquor as cargo, sailing from a Canadian port to a United States port. . . . . .

That is a very simple recommendation which anyone can understand. Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, now the Prime Minister of Canada, gave earnest and hearty support to the investigation and to the report of the committee; he pledged himself and his party "to continue relentlessly the investigation of the customs service and to carry out without fear or favour the needed requirements." That pledge was given during the election campaign which followed the investigation by this committee.

Mr. King was returned to power and has done much to make the Customs department efficient. I for one wholly approve of the Prime Minister's selection of a minister for that department; I honestly believe I could not have done better had I picked him myself. During the first session of the next parliament a royal commission was appointed, which spent eleven months in finding out all the facts which were gathered from a very wide field, and that commission aproved of section 10 of the report of the special committee. I read part of this section a few moments ago, but now I would like to read the entire last paragraph:

> Doubts have been cast upon the sufficiency of existing legislation to prohibit or authorize regulations prohibting the illegal export of intoxicating liquors to the United States. To the extent to which such legislation may be insufficient the committee recommend that it be amended. The committee further recommend that, as soon as possible, regulations be made to prohibit clearances being granted to vessels carrying liquor as cargo, sailing from a Canadian port to a United States port, such regulations to make an exception in favour of liquor being imported into the United States in accordance with the laws of that country.

Two bodies, a special parliamentary committee and a royal commission, studied this subject much more carefully than any individual could. They made a recommendation and parliament approved of that recommendation but has not carried it out. The next question which occurs to one's mind is: Why has not parliament carried out the recommendation which a committee of this house and a royal commission made to it?

I am concerned with how this matter affects the United States, but I am not going to discuss that phase just now. The speech made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) expresses exactly how I feel about it. There is no use in our talking about the peace of the world and in unanimously approving such things as the pact of Paris until we can deal effectively with an irritating and troublesome question which affects the peace of the world. It is nonsense to think that because the problem is irritating and troublesome to us we can escape the duty of putting a stop to the bootlegging of liquor into the United States of America. From my point of view the liquor business is a dirty business. I have never seen anything good come out of liquor and I have seen a great deal of evil arise from its use. It corrupts all those who touch it, whether they are individuals or groups of individuals. I have no use for the whole dirty business and the fact that we are allowing liquor to pour out of southern Ontario into the United States and are doing nothing effective to stop it is giving to the Canadian people the mentality and the ethics of bootleggers.

Very eminent gentlemen—I think one would call them eminent—are hunting for defences for our attitude. It is quite true that we are making money through the sale of liquor to the United States but what is the use of gaining even the whole world if we lose our national soul? How can we expect the young men and women, the boys and girls of this country to respect the laws of the land if we do not respect the laws of another country? Our example will mean more to them than our teaching; our acts will loom so large that they will not hear our words. From the standpoint of morality in this country we should do something about it, whether it be to stop the clearance of vessels or whatever it may be, and we should set about getting it done as rapidly as possible. Supposing we had a bad child in a community—we have been apt to say "bad boy" but I do not want to say that because there are bad girls as well as bad boys—and suppose that only one parent of that child was anxious that it should be reformed and was doing everything to help the child to a better way of life. But some other neighbour in the community, knowing the will of the one parent, deliberately put evil in the path of the child. What would we think of that neighbour; what would we think of him as a community builder? We would have nothing but contempt for him, and that is almost the place we are in as a nation as between ourselves and the United States.

Mr. HEPBURN: Does the hon. member not think it advisable that we should dry up our own country before we try to dry up the United States?

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes, I think it advisable that we dry up our own country and if I had the doing of it there would not be any liquor. I do not want any and if everyone were like me there would not be any. If the Canadian people have no more sense than to want to drink stuff which is poison to them and which does them no good, there is a country south of us which officially does not want it, and has said so, and we are not doing everything which we could do to help them carry out that law, called the Volstead Act.

Since the session opened I have been in Buffalo twice and in Detroit once. I was amazed at the strength of public opinion expressed by former Canadian residents in those two cities. These people were not particularly prohibitionists but they felt that something which they had held very high had fallen. They had thought of Canada with a great deal of love and admiration; they had thought of us as being people with very high moral standards; they had thought of us, and it was expressed quite freely to me, as maintaining ideals superior to those of the country in which they were residing. They told me that in this regard we had not lived up to our former high standard of morality; they felt that we had let them down rather badly. As one man said to me, "For the first time in my life I am apologetic for my country." I think that expresses the opinion of the people who are close to this problem and see it in operation on the other side.

Some may think that the resolutions which have come from rural communities, and which have flooded this house, are of no consequence. I am well enough acquainted with the people of the country to know that when they sign their names to a paper and put it into an envelope and mail it, they know what they are doing, because it is one of the hardest tasks in the world to get rural people to write letters. When they do write them you know that they are interested in the thing they are doing or they would not bother posting the letter. The fact that they have sent hundreds of these resolutions to the house convinces me that there is a very strong public opinion in the country, particularly in the townships of Canada, concerning this question.

If anyone has taken the trouble to look up the press, either recently or back in 1927, he will have seen that many papers strongly condemn the position which we are taking. I have an editorial from the Country Guide, the new name for the Grain Growers Guide, which I would like to read. I have not the date of this issue, but I believe it is recent. The editorial, in part, is as follows:

> There is a lawless element in the United States engaged in smuggling Canadian liquor across the border. Huge fortunes have been acquired in this rum-running business. The American bootleggers are assisted by an equally lawless element in Canada. The two have terrorized a considerable section of the territory along the great lakes and crime has become a commonplace. This situation is a disgrace to both nations—but more so to Canada.

The article then reviews the fact that a parliamentary committee and a royal commission had been set up and had made recommendations which were not carried out. The editorial continues:

> Why is the government doing nothing? Why is the Liberal and Conservative press practically silent? What is the mysterious influence which prevents the government from setting the machinery in motion to exterminate this nefarious business? Perhaps another royal commission could find out. All other civilized nations are cooperating with the United States to curb rum-running. Canada, the nearest neighbour is also the most unneighbourly. If the situation were reversed we would be incensed. This is an opportunity to apply the golden rule.

I would like to quote briefly from an editorial in the Toronto Globe of March 1, 1927, which contained the following:

> The royal commission on customs is collecting considerable evidence showing how this country is helping the rum-runners and bootleggers to defeat the aims of the Volstead Act in the United States. Added to the evidence taken by the special parliamentary committee, it would form rather a voluminous indictment of Canada, as a partner in the international liquor business.

I do not believe that anyone can derive satisfaction from an editorial like that in a leading daily of the province of Ontario. The Port Hope Guide of April 8, 1927, contains an editorial which, in part, reads:

> It is a criminal offence to systematically smuggle goods into this country. It is equally so to likewise smuggle into the United States. Why should this country encourage or allow any class, no matter how wealthy, to carry on, systematically and publicly, smuggling operations to the United States in intoxicating liquors with any greater immunity than we would tolerate such action by the Chinaman with his opium or the white-slaver with his victim?

And they add something which struck me as being so true that I feel I should place it on Hansard. It continues:

> The law gloats over the capture of a poor wretch in the back townships, found in possession of illicit still. . . . But the other man who is violating international laws is encouraged in his nefarious traffic. The former is probably trying to keep the wolf from the door. His place is prison. The latter wins the King's Plate at the Woodbine, and is presented to, and dines with, the Governor General.

I do not think that is overstated. I have often thought that, when I have seen the place of honour that is given to our big distillers and brewers in this country. I do not think their business is an honourable one, and to me they can never be honourable people while they are engaged in it. The editorial continues, but I think I have already said what is repeated in it.

I do not care to say any more except this, that if the government wants to hold up a high moral standard to young boys and girls in Canada, it will have to do something to prevent huge fortunes being made by Canadians who are breaking the laws of another country. If this is not done, they cannot expect the laws of this country to be respected, nor can they expect the moral fibre of the Canadian people to be maintained.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue): The question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), so ably seconded by the eloquent member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), and supported by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), who has just spoken, is apparently one of considerable public interest, perhaps more so in recent years. But upon that question I think all members of the house will admit there is a very sharp division of opinion as to what the policy of the government should be. Undoubtedly there is a very strong body of public opinion which is opposed to the export of liquor from Canada to the United States. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated that that feeling is not confined to those of prohibition sentiments. I was rather inclined to think that such is the case, and that is not in any sense to be regarded as a criticism. It is equally true that there is just as strong and possibly a stronger body of public opinion which is entirely opposed to the suggestion that we should, in their words, assist in carrying out the laws of another country. For these reasons the government welcomes a very frank discussion of the whole question in all its bearings. Personally I am glad to have an opportunity of correcting some of the misconceptions that are apparently in the public mind to-day and to review as briefly as I can the situation as we find it. Essentially—and I think most members will agree with me—the situation is one that must almost inevitably arise where two adjacent countries deal with the liquor problem in two radically different ways. The one country, Canada, is "wet"—I think I may use that term—under a system of government control in seven out of the nine provinces: the other, the United States, has a drastic prohibitory law.

Something has been said with regard to liquor and its evil effects. With some of the remarks I agree, but so far as the average individual is concerned, liquor is apparently a commodity in a class by itself. In my experience, laws with regard to liquor have never been regarded with the same respect as laws with regard to any other matter whatever. People who are otherwise quite respectable —and perhaps I should not use the word "otherwise"—people who are quite respectable, in this country in the past, and no doubt to-day in the United States, seem to have so little respect for prohibition laws that they will violate them apparently with no offence at all to their consciences. Liquor laws, dry or wet, always have had a strong minority, or possibly, even a majority opposed to them. I believe it is literally impossible for a wet country to lie adjacent to a so-called or ostensibly dry country without a flow of liquor proceeding from the wet to the dry. That, of course, is the basic reason to-day for the situation which we are now debating.

During the war Canada had a prohibitory law. The United States continued wet. They were not yet in the war. Liquor flowed freely at that time from the United States to Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Very little.

Mr. EULER: It is perhaps fair to say that I have no recollection, and I think no one has any, that the United States, at a time when conditions were reversed, made any effort whatever to stop the exportation of liquor from one friendly nation to another friendly nation which was engaged in a great war. I am not sure that that is an argument, but in any disposition we may make of the question I believe we ought to consider the attitude of the United States itself in regard to this matter. To-day with Canada wet, and the United States ostensibly dry, the flow is from us to them.

I want to congratulate the members in that corner who have discussed the question from a very high moral plane and to assure them that I desire to discuss it solely on its merits. When I say that, I wish for a moment to take exception to an inference apparently drawn by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he says that it is at least suspicious that no action is taken in the direction which he desires and that perhaps we may be influenced by money which would flow out of the coffers of the distillers and brewers into party funds. I am not sure whether it is worth while denying that, but if it is, so far as I am concerned I wish to issue an absolute denial. No better proof of the sincerity of that denial can be offered than the fact that in every case where action was recommended against brewers and distillers who had not paid their taxes, that action was proceeded with without any exception whatsoever. We have collected from those brewers and distillers a good many million dollars, and expect to get some more.

Perhaps I might deal briefly with the subject in chronological order. As has been said, in 1924, a treaty was concluded with the United States for the suppression of smuggling. The chief obligation into which Canada entered was that we should report to the United States authorities whenever a clearance was granted by Canadian customs officials to liquor-laden boats bound for the United States. A good many other things were discussed, but those who are familiar with the treaty will agree that that was the outstanding obligation in it. May I say in passing that the United States government on several occasions has stated officially that the Canadian government, through the Department of National Revenue, has faithfully carried out the obligations embodied in that treaty. But the United States has not been satisfied with the provisions of the treaty. With that I have no particular fault to find. Indeed, before the treaty was made, the United States requested that there should be inserted in it a provision that no clearances be granted to vessels of the kind mentioned, namely, vessels carrying liquor to United States shores. It was not so included in the treaty. We merely agreed to give notice of clearances that had been granted.

As has already been stated, in 1926 a request came from the United States government for a further conference with the Canadian authorities, their purpose being to persuade the Canadian government, if possible, to grant the very thing which they are again now asking. That conference, held last January, was attended by certain officials of the United States government and the Canadian government. Suffice it to say that the outcome of the conference was merely this, that the Canadian officials expressed doubt as to the efficacy of the remedy proposed by the United States officials, and that the United States officials re-asserted their conviction that the only way in which the difficulty could be met was by Canada passing such regulations or such laws as would prevent the export of liquor to the United States. I might say here, although I shall come to that point later, that merely to prohibit the granting of clearances will not remedy the situation at all. To make such a measure effective you would also have to forbid the release of liquor or beer from the distilleries and breweries.

I have spoken of the net result of the conference of last January. Following the conference, the officials made their reports to their respective governments. The report of the Canadian officials was received by the government some months ago. After some consideration by the government a communication was sent to the United States suggesting a proposal, which has already been described by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that it was thought would be of assistance to the United States, namely to permit them to station their agents on Canadian docks from which liquor was being exported, so that they could observe and report to their own government and thereby stop the export to the United States, The United States authorities, in further correspondence, reverted to their former request and stated that the only thing that would serve their purpose would be for this government to stop the issue of clearances. There the matter stands to-day.

I should like, because I think it is of interest and will remove misapprehension in the minds of some hon. members and certainly of some people in this country, to describe what takes place in the exporting of liquor. In the first place it should be understood that liquor manufactured and sold in Canada pays an excise tax of $9 a gallon. Liquor imported into Canada pays a duty of $10 a gallon—a little bit of protection, as some of my Conservative friends would say.

Mr. BENNETT: As the minister would say.

Mr. EULER: I will say it myself.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Both of them say it.

Mr. EULER: It should also be understood that when liquor is bona fide exported to another country and it can be proven that the liquor has been landed in that foreign country, there is no excise tax to be paid.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When was that excise tax on liquor manufactured in Canada for export imposed?

Mr. EULER: It all depends upon the country to which it is being exported. If the liquor is actually exported to the West Indies, if it actually goes there, the method is this: The liquor does not pay an excise tax as it leaves the distillery, but the shipper gives a bond issued by a reliable guarantee company for twice the amount of the excise tax. That bond is released and cancelled by the Department of National Revenue when the shipper brings back from the country to which the goods were shipped a bona fide landing certificate, showing that the goods were actually landed in that foreign country.

Some reference has been made to the fact that in the past a good many bogus landing certificates have been obtained and the bond released when the liquor was not actually landed in the foreign country to which it was destined. I want to assure the house that that practice has absolutely discontinued; that the bonds which are given are bona fide bonds, and that the landing certificates which we receive and upon the receipt of which we cancel the bonds are absolutely genuine; there is no doubt about that.

Liquor exported to the United States is in a different class in this way: It is apparent, of course, to every member that it is impossible for a vessel to obtain a landing certificate for liquor shipped to the United States, that country being under a prohibitory law. Therefore, in order to avoid any difficulty, the practice is for the distillers to pay the excise tax before the goods leave the distillery.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): When did that practice start?

Mr. EULER: Mr. Speaker, I have only forty minutes, and although I should be glad to answer any questions if my time were extended, there are certain things that I should like to say. In any case I cannot answer my hon. friend's question; that was before I took charge of the department.

When liquor is destined for the United States, the excise is paid and it is then just as legal to export that liquor as any other commodity—boots and shoes, furniture, iron and steel, or anything else that can legally be exported. So far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned, when the excise tax is paid, all its demands are satisfied and the liquor becomes exactly similar to any other commodity that might be manufactured in Canada. When these liquors are exported to the United States, however, it is necessary that the boat or conveyance carrying them to the United States obtain a clearance from the Canadian customs and fill out the necessary export papers. That is the whole procedure.

Most of the liquor that goes from Canada to the United States is shipped from what we may call the Windsor-Detroit front and the Lake Erie front. Some goes over the border from lake Ontario, and some from western Canada and from Quebec, but not so very much. Most of it goes out from the area I have mentioned in the province of Ontario, and some from the province of Quebec. In every case clearances and export entries are necessary under our law.

I should like to correct a few misconceptions that are current throughout the country. It has been stated that the government loses revenue by reason of the export of liquor to the United States. That is not the fact. Every bottle of liquor that leaves a distillery in Canada, no matter where it goes, pays the excise tax before it leaves the distillery unless it is bona fide destined for some foreign country where bona fide landing certificates can be obtained, and in that case the shipment is made under bond. It is no longer true, as some people believe, that clearances to small boats are issued from our lake ports to countries like Cuba or Mexico. That practice was discontinued even before I took charge of the department. No boat which it is quite evident cannot proceed to the destination designated in its papers can receive a clearance.

Reference was made to a clearance being refused to a boat at Bridgeburg going to Mexico because it was quite apparent that it could not proceed there, and a clearance being given when it was stated that the boat would go to Detroit. I do not see anything very peculiar in that, because in the one case the master of that boat gave a false declaration, and in the other he did not. In the one case he was violating our customs law, in the other he was not. I think it will surprise the members of the house when I say that when these boats clear from Windsor, we will say, for Detroit, or from Bridgeburg for Buffalo, they go to Detroit and go to Buffalo. They clear for a definite destination. If we know that they are clearing for some destination to which they are not actually going, they are violating our law and a penalty is applied.

Mr. STEVENS: Do they present their clearances to the port to which they go?

Mr. EULER: I do not suppose so. I am glad my hon. friend mentioned that point; I might as well deal with it now. The boats which are smuggling liquor are not violating our law, because it is not smuggling while they are in Canada. But when they deliver liquor in the United States they are violating American law, and the boats that are carrying this liquor to the United States are almost 100 per cent United States boats; they are not Canadian boats at all. Not only that, the men who are carrying the goods across are Americans practically 100 per cent, not Canadians. Here is a peculiarity in the respective laws of the two countries. In Canada every boat, no matter how small it is—and most of these goods are carried in small boats—must obtain clearance from a Canadian customs officer. In the United States—and these boats are owned in the United States, I should like the house to remember—boats under 5 tons need not obtain clearance, and need not report when they come back. In Canada they must obtain clearance when they leave and report when they come back. While the United States are asking that we discontinue clearances to these boats—their own boats manned by their own people—they do not demand clearances themselves from those very boats.

Mr. MANION: Are these boats not treated in exactly the same way as a boat carrying, we will say, a shipload of potatoes? Suppose an American boat came across here for a cargo of potatoes, she would get clearance and would be treated in exactly the same way as these rum boats?

Mr. EULER: Yes, exactly the same. The difference is in the tonnage. In the United States they demand clearance of boats of five tons and over. But the anomaly is in this

They now ask us to discontinue giving clearances to their own boats, which in most cases are less than five tons. They themselves do not require clearances of those boats. I would respectfully suggest that they would have considerably more control over their own boats, manned by their own people, if they would enact a law that those boats, no matter how small, should be obliged to obtain clearances when they leave their shore and report when they come back, the same as we require in Canada. That would give them some control.

The chief export points are the Windsor district and the Bridgeburg district. I have said something which may appear a criticism of the United States. I have no desire to be offensive, but I think there are some facts I should place before the house in view of the statements made that we are not dealing in a friendly way with our neighbour to the south. It has been stated that these boats go across at night. That is not entirely true. I took the trouble last fall to go down to Windsor. I was offered safe conduct by a liquor exporter and went out on a launch on the Detroit River. I could see the United States customs office on the other shore, and I could also see that it was not difficult to detect any boats that left the Canadian shore to go to the American side. While in Windsor I got into conversation with a man engaged in the business of exporting liquor. I asked him, "Do you cross in the day-time?" He answered, "Yes, quite often." I said, "How is it they do not get you?" He replied with a smile, "It just happens that they are not there when we go across."

Our inspector went to Windsor not so very long ago. He did not select any special day. While there, on January 14, he observed the following vessels cross the river to Detroit in daylight with cargoes of liquors:

"Ben", J. King, master,
10 quarter barrels beer
11 cases whiskey
"Rat", J. Sales, master,
24 cases whiskey
5 cases wine
1 case brandy
"Bat", A. Jacks, master,
19 cases whiskey
1 case wine
"Rabbi",—

Mr. JACOBS: I suppose he was a spiritual leader.

Mr. EULER: Most of the cargo seems to have been beer, and I am afraid you would hardly call that "spiritual."

"Rabbi", I. Straight, master,
5 half barrels beer
8 cases whiskey
"Bird", J. Bloom, master,
18 cases whiskey
8 cases bourbon
1 case Scotch whiskey
"Bar", J. Peters, master,
13 cases whiskey
4 cases bourbon
3 cases brandy

That was in one day. Those boats went over in broad daylight. I leave members to draw their own inferences from that state of affairs. From the Bridgeburg district I have a report, in reply to an inquiry, by the collector at Bridgeburg, Ontario, written on April 11 of last year, and directed to the commissioner of customs.

Dear Mr. Breadner:

I wish to give you a short account of the rum-running at this port, and our procedure in the matter.

There are about twelve boats plying between here and Buffalo, N.Y., the river at this point being about half a mile wide. Some days we only have two or three boats out—

I do not think he should say "we" have.

—they have only two or three boats out, and on other days the whole fleet will make a trip.

The liquor and ale are brought from the distillery and brewery by truck, arriving here about two o'clock in the afternoon. The boats are all loaded and clearance granted about 5 p.m. and they are compelled to leave by 6 p.m. Some of these boats carry from 800 to 1,000 cases, and on their arrival on the American side it takes from two to three hours to unload them. No effort as far as we can see is made by the United States authorities to seize any of these boats, as the United States customs are always notified by us an hour or two before the boats leave, and occasionally we notify them as the boats are leaving, giving them the names of the boats and the quantity of liquor or ale on board. We have had high customs officials from Buffalo, special agents, and officers connected with the coast guard come over to the Canadian side, watch these boats load and pull out. It is a well known fact that some of these boats land within a few hundred yards of the United States customs office at the foot of Ferry street and unload without being disturbed.

Some few weeks ago, no doubt you saw in the press where it was stated that a truck had drawn out on the Peace bridge, and unloaded the ale down on the bank on the American side by tying a rope around the cases and lowering them to the river bank. As a matter of fact this ale was unloaded from one of the rum boats plying between here and Buffalo, right under the Peace bridge within a few hundred yards of the customs house.

Our officers who check these boats out were informed by one of the rum-runners that they had no trouble in landing their cargo as they were assisted by the officers of the dry squad on the American side, and it would appear that such must be the case when seven or eight boats will leave here, and land their cargoes, sometimes taking them three hours to unload without any casualties.

These boats are loaded directly opposite from the United States customs office at Black Rock. You can stand by the window in that office and look across, and see every case that is loaded on the Canadian side. I know if conditions were reversed that we would have all these boats tied up in less than a week, and if the officers on the American side wish to put a stop to this business they could do it in about the same length of time.

An hon. MEMBER: Whose report is that?

Mr. EULER: That is signed by F. T. Pattison, collector of national revenue at Bridgeburg, Ontario. I am reading this, Mr. Speaker, not for the purpose of making a criticism against the United States' officials—I do not question the good faith of the men at the top—but I think it is at least a fair reason for considering whether the Canadian Government would be justified in going to what, I think I can show, would be a heavy expense if this law were enacted that is being asked for, in face of the fact that the United States authorities are making no very earnest effort to do it themselves.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like to ask the minister a question which it will not take him a moment to answer. Were not these facts known at the time the special committee and the royal commission made their report? Did they not then know that some, at least, of the United States officials were not trying to enforce their own laws?

Mr. EULER: My answer would be, I do not know. But I could hardly understand why they would fail to have knowledge of these facts.

An hon. MEMBER: Why did we endorse it?

Mr. EULER: That endorsation was given in 1926, as I understand it, and if the house desires I will deal with that later, if I have time, but I would prefer for the moment to go on with another phase of the matter.

It has been said, I think by the member for Winnipeg North Centre, that we have done absolutely nothing to assist the United States. I desire to cite some of the things we have done.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I thought I gave the government credit for having done something.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I am accusing the hon. member wrongfully, but I understood him to say that we had not done anything to assist the United States. The first thing we did was to agree to a treaty establishing the twelve-mile limit, which has at times involved considerable difficulty to Canadian boats. That helped tremendously in stopping the importation of liquor from the Atlantic seaboard. We agreed to give information as to clearances and have faithfully carried out that agreement, as the United States has testified on more than one occasion. We insist on bonds of the kind I described some time ago, where boats laden with liquor come from across the ocean, or from St. Pierre Miquelon, which is the centre of the trade, and enter Halifax harbour; at least they used to enter that harbour in stress or storm or from any other cause. They now must give a bond in the same way as the others that export to foreign countries. The result is that that business has stopped altogether, and the depots that were formed in Nova Scotia, from which liquor was smuggled into the United States, are no longer in existence. In addition to that we closed the export houses to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred. There were in Canada so-called export houses—houses which imported liquor, stored it in these places in bond, and then exported it. I think it is true to say that perhaps 95 per cent of the liquor in these export bond houses went to the United States. We have closed these and shut out that source of supply to the United States, because this department agreed with the royal commission that these customs bonds served no useful purpose; and although it is quite true that the Dominion government obtained considerable revenue from that source, it was not taken into consideration at all. We passed last session the Intoxicating Liquors Act; the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) piloted that bill through the house. The result is that now, with a few exceptions, no other than the local control authorities in any province may import liquor into that province. That also has prevented the accumulation of liquor which later found its way into the United States. We have limited in Ontario, where most of the export business is done, the number of docks from which liquor may be exported.

Mr. STEVENS: How many are there now?

Mr. EULER: Windsor district was the most notorious, if I may use that word. I do not know the exact number, but there were about fifty places from which liquor went out. There are now ten.

Mr. MANION: Are ten enough to supply the demand?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DIVORCE PROCEEDINGS

RIGHT OF MARRIED WOMEN TO ESTABLISH DOMICILE

The house resumed from May 7, consideration in committee of Bill No. 75, respecting the domicile of married women in proceedings for divorce—Mr. Ward—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 2—Married woman separate from husband.

Mr. BOTHWELL: When this bill was before the house the other evening objections were voiced to it as it stands, and at that time a proposed motion was placed before the house but was not put as there was no seconder. The proposal contained in that amendment was also objected to when it came before the house. The discussion brought out very clearly that there is a real need in Canada for some such legislation as is proposed in this bill. The hon. leader of the opposition, when the bill was up before, explained some of the difficulties that the courts in Canada have to face in connection with our divorce legislation, and the references that he made to various cases which have been decided showed clearly that there is a real need for some such legislation as is here proposed. In order to meet some of the difficulties that were mentioned in the discussion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk, that sections 2 and 3 of the bill be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:

> 2. A married woman who either before or after the passing of this act has been deserted by and has lived separate and apart from her husband for a period of two years and upwards and is still living separate and apart from her husband may acquire in any one of the provinces of Canada in which there is a court having jurisdiction to grant a divorce a vinculo matrimonii a domicile of her own choice as though she were a feme sole for the purpose of commencing in the province in which she has acquired such domicile an action for divorce a vinculo matrimonii praying that her marriage may be dissolved on any grounds that may entitle her to such divorce in the court of such province having jurisdiction to grant such divorce whatever the domicile of the husband may be, provided that for the purpose aforesaid such married woman shall be deemed to retain the domicile of her husband at the time she was so deserted until she has acquired a domicile of her own choice as aforesaid.

The amendment meets the objection that was raised the other evening that the bill as it stands goes too far and might encroach upon other situations than that of divorce, because it clearly and definitely limits the domicile to the purpose of divorce. As the bill is changed by this amendment I can see no objection to it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, I objected to the bill on the two occasions when it came before the committee, first, as originally drafted, and afterwards as amended. I must admit that as far as the constitutional side is concerned, the new amendment is not subject to criticism as were the two first drafts. But speaking for myself I am sorry to say that I still object to the bill, and I would regret if it should become the law of this country. I wish to repeat what I have stated as to the various effects of this bill if it passes parliament. For instance, a wife will be able to take proceedings for divorce in Manitoba or in Saskatchewan, while her husband may apply to this parliament for divorce if he still lives either in Ontario or in Quebec. There may be two applications for divorce in two different places. There may be even two divorce trials before two different courts if the wife goes to another province where there is a divorce court. There may be two actions for divorce, and there will be a race for the better position. I still believe in the soundness of the British doctrine in this respect, that there is only one, and that there should be and can be but one, domicile as long as the matrimonial tie continues, and that only when it is dissolved can there be two domiciles.

My regret more particularly is that this bill if enacted would provide greater facilities for divorce. Public men in other countries have regretted the increased facilities for divorce, but once the door has been opened it is very difficult to close it. We in this country have always boasted that our record is clean in this respect. I admit that I do not share the viewpoint of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, that it is better that we should have the facilities which this bill will provide to avoid the scandal of some of our people going to the country to the south of us and there building up a fictitious domicile to obtain a divorce which has more or less legal effect in Canada. I repeat I do not agree with my hon. friend in that regard. I think it is better for us to keep our record clean in this respect, and that the remedy will be worse than the disease.

Our conditions are very similar in so many respects with those that prevail in the United States that I am afraid the troubles that are regretted over there will become ours if we adopt their system and make our laws concerning marriage and divorce more like those of that country than those of Great Britain.

[Mr. Bothwell.]

The strength of our Canadian life has been based to a large extent on our marriage laws, and I do not think there is anywhere in Canada much public opinion in favour of changing those laws. Among all classes of our people marriage is respected. Our people everywhere have always believed that once a man and a woman are united in marriage, the union is for better or for worse, and that it is a lifelong contract. This has always been the Canadian conviction, and we have been proud of it. I still think that by the adoption of this measure we should be entering on a new policy fraught with danger to our national life, and for that reason I cannot agree with the amendment and shall register my vote against it.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I regret my inability to agree with the Minister of Justice in respect to this matter. I think he has overlooked one or two essential factors that should be considered. First of all, this bill does not extend the causes for which divorce may be obtained. The only ground upon which divorce may be obtained is unfaithfulness. Secondly, it must be remembered that the wife in order to obtain a separate domicile must be deserted by the husband. If she has lived in the domicile where the husband has deserted her, by this bill she merely will be able to maintain her action there on the assumption that he having gone away, she knows not where, has for the purposes of the action left her with the domicile where she was deserted. There can be no scandal in that. If by reason of her desertion she finds it necessary to leave the community where she lives and go to some other province, she can acquire domicile only by satisfying the court of two facts, because domicile is a question of fact: (a) residence and (b) intention to remain in that jurisdiction. When these two factors are present and the court finds as a matter of fact that the wife is thus domiciled, this legislation will confer upon that court the necessary jurisdiction to enable that action to be maintained. How can it be successfully said in this age, when a woman may hold property and, under the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857, shall, if judicially separated from her husband, be regarded as a feme sole and, as such, may for every purpose in the world be deemed an unmarried woman, that she shall nevertheless, for the purpose of separating herself from her spouse, who has been unfaithful, be unable to acquire that necessary ingredient to enable the court to exercise its jurisdiction, namely, domicile? How can we take the view in this day and generation that she shall not be considered to have a separate domicile in a matter of this kind, because by a fiction of law "they two are one"? It must not be forgotten that the principle of British law, to which my hon. friend has referred, is a principle based upon that old saying—"They two shall be one, and the husband is that one." In France, in Germany and in other continental countries where the question has been considered it has been conceded that the adandoned wife may acquire a domicile inasmuch as she is in the eyes of the law a separate entity, her existence being no longer merged in that of her husband. And since there is no longer any merging of her identity or personality in that of her husband, and she may exercise the power of a feme sole, as we have evidence of in legislatures and parliament and other institutions of the country, I do not think we are going to the extent indicated by the minister when we merely confer upon the appropriate court the power to exercise its jurisdiction upon its being satisfied that a woman who has been deserted and abandoned by her husband—he having been guilty of unfaithfulness—has acquired, by virtue of residence and intention, that domicile which will enable her to prosecute and maintain her action for the termination of the marriage tie by reason of such infidelity.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the bill is carried I want to state my views on this matter. I wish to say first of all that what astounds me is that every particular case will be decided under this act. Now every case is entirely different from every other. In the province of Quebec, when a wife asks for separation from bed and board, she presents a petition to the judge seeking the right to have a separate domicile temporarily until judgment is given. The judge listens to the arguments in support of the petition, and if he deems it advisable to grant the wife a domicile separate from that of her husband he granted the petition. On the other hand, if, according to the evidence, it does not seem to him proper to grant the petition, he refuses it. The matter is left to the good judgment and experience of the judge. But more than that, judges of the superior court of the province of Quebec very often in these cases try to bring the two parties together; in his chambers the judge places the situation before them and hears what they have to say. Sometimes the separation is asked for merely because the parties for some reason or other cannot agree, but the cause of difference is not so serious as they imagine and the judge tries to conciliate them. Consequently the suit is very often abandoned by reason of the very sensible course followed by the judge, who exercises his office for the benefit of both parties concerned.

Some arguments brought forward in this discussion are rather strange. Someone has said that in such a case the wife should have the same rights as the husband. Well, undoubtedly the wife has as many rights as the husband, but they are not of the same kind; it makes all the difference in the world. For guidance, are we going to go back four centuries ago when the Indians had camps here, and on this very spot where now stands this beautiful parliament of Canada? At that time the squaws had many powers and rights; they used to go out hunting while the husband kept the home fires burning.

Mr. IRVINE: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to inform the house whether he is speaking for the bill or against it? It is nearly nine o'clock and we should like to know.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, you may call this an exordium; I am giving you the general lines of my speech. Afterwards I shall come to what we call the confirmation of the speech, and I shall then submit stronger arguments to support my view. Someone has said in this debate that the wife should have the same rights as the husband. That may be all right; but that matter is not in question at all. I cannot agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) when he dismisses as fictitious the idea of unity as between man and wife. It is not merely saying that husband and wife shall be one; it is more than that. It is a question of the very existence of the family.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. POULIOT: No. I have listened politely to my hon. friends, and I have the floor now and will hold it. On Tuesday next I will give the house what I call the confirmation of my argument.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

EXPORT OF LIQUOR TO THE UNITED STATES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) for the house to go into committee of supply.

Mr. EULER: When the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing the measures which had already been taken by the Department of National Revenue to limit the carrying of liquor to the United States. I stated that we had agreed to the right of search within the twelve-mile limit by United States vessels of ships supposed to be carrying liquor to that country. I stated also that we had agreed under the treaty to give information to the United States of all clearances of vessels leaving Canadian ports and carrying liquor to the United States. As I said this afternoon, that agreement has been faithfully carried out, and statements to that effect have been made by the United States government.

I might have made reference to a rather remarkable condition existing at Windsor in connection with the giving of notices to United States customs authorities. As I said this afternoon, Windsor is one of the chief ports of liquor export to the United States. Under the treaty the collector at the port of Windsor did give notice by telephone to the United States customs authorities at Detroit of clearances that had been given. I am not going to suggest any reason, but peculiarly enough we were requested by the United States government to discontinue the giving of telephone notices to the collector at Detroit, and in accordance with that request such notices were no longer given at that port. They asked us then to give weekly reports rather than daily reports by telephone, and we have acceded to their request.

Mr. McGIBBON: Was that the United States federal government?

Mr. EULER: Yes. I further said that we are now demanding bonds for all liquor-laden vessels coming from abroad and entering Canadian ports, no matter what the reason may be. In the past that was made an excuse for landing some of these liquors in Canada, thus providing a convenient means of later transporting it to the United States. The result of our action in demanding these bonds has been to stop that method entirely.

In addition, we have taken steps to close all the export bond liquor houses in Canada; while I mentioned that fact this afternoon I forgot to mention one other point. These houses imported liquor from abroad and stored it in bond for the purpose of later exporting it to the United States. We decided that these houses should be closed, that they served no useful purpose but promoted the exportation of liquor to the United States. We took action to close them, but under the law any liquor in bond could remain there for two years. No further liquor has been allowed to come into these houses for many months, and the liquor remaining there must be exported in about a year from now, I believe some time in June, 1930. Then this system, which was a very fertile source of exportation of liquor to the United States, will be done away with entirely.

Mr. BENNETT: How many of these houses remain in that position?

Mr. EULER: I think there are one or two in British Columbia and one in Halifax, but in June of 1930 these places will be out of business and in the meantime they cannot import further stocks. I said this afternoon that we also passed the Intoxicating Liquors Act, which gave to the provincial authorities the sole right to import liquor. That again circumscribes the power of export to the United States.

At six o'clock I was referring to the fact that in certain parts of Ontario we had limited the number of docks from which liquor could be exported, and perhaps it would be interesting to the house if I reviewed what led up to that action. At the interprovincial conference held in the fall of 1927 I agreed to cooperate in every reasonable way with the provincial authorities in the enforcement of the provincial liquor laws. One of the results of that agreement was the passage of the Intoxicating Liquors Act, although that act had been introduced the year previously. We further agreed that no additional licenses for distilleries or breweries should be issued anywhere in Canada by the Department of National Revenue without first consulting with the provincial authorities, and I may say that unless some arrangement had been made prior to the agreement with the provinces, in no case has a license been issued except with the consent of such provincial authority.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does that "consultation" necessarily mean "consent"?

Mr. EULER: We are not bound by it, but I may say that the minister has so far followed the wishes of the provinces. I do not think, however, he should bind himself entirely; circumstances might arise which would lead him to believe that such licenses should be granted, but the fact is that no such license has been issued since that arrangement with the provincial authorities was arrived at, and I propose to continue that policy.

Mr. MANION: What date was that?

Mr. EULER: The promise of cooperation was made at the interprovincial conference, and the actual agreement with the provinces was arrived at some months later. I think it has been in existence about a year, or perhaps a little longer.

Something was said this afternoon with regard to short-circuiting; it was suggested that the export of liquor to the United States made it possible to short-circuit liquor into the different provinces without any great trouble. I believe that statement has been made by the chairman of the Ontario Liquor Control Board, Sir Henry Drayton. I am not altogether prepared to contradict him, but I do not think there is very much short-circuiting of liquor in the province of Ontario, because any man who desires liquor can purchase it without trouble at the stores of the Liquor Control Board. There may be a little short-circuiting which comes about in this way: Occasionally a boat which sails from the Ontario side, perhaps from the port of Windsor, finds it impossible to land the cargo on the other side and is forced to turn back and land that cargo of liquor somewhere in Ontario.

Mr. STEVENS: That seems to be a rare occurrence.

Mr. EULER: I think it is quite rare. We have further instituted a system of checking all shipments of liquor from the docks into the boats; our officers carry on that work. We are also abolishing what was termed the nuisance and abuse of the B-13 forms connected with the shipment of beer; we are now inaugurating a new system of permits which I think will remove most of the complaints of the provincial authorities. As a matter of fact, as I said this afternoon, the number of docks at the border in the Windsor district has been reduced from fifty to ten. That was done absolutely with the cooperation of the provincial authorities; the selection of these docks was made by the collector at Windsor in conjunction with the inspector working under Sir Henry Drayton. Perhaps I should not take any undue credit for trying to assist the United States in regard to the limitation of docks; I will admit that it was done for the sole purpose of assisting in the enforcement of the Ontario Liquor Control Act. It was felt that if the number of docks were limited the Ontario authorities could more closely watch the operations of the exporters and take precautions in order to see that there would be no short-circuiting. However, the result has been that the United States authorities have been given, if they choose to avail themselves of it, a similar opportunity to watch the operation of these exporters and protect their own shores.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand that we receive no landing certificates for these cargoes of liquor, but what certificate is received from the American authorities showing that the vessel which cleared from Windsor has arrived at Detroit?

Mr. EULER: We receive none; we are not entitled to any under the law. We cannot even demand a certificate showing that a landing has been made in another country, when the boat returns to Canadian shores. That question has been brought up before; we have consulted with the Department of Justice and that is the law.

Mr. MANION: Is it not true that a number of those docks which were closed were merely little unimportant docks or jetties?

Mr. EULER: Yes, that is quite true; some of them were very unimposing places, but still they were shipping liquor. It had been thought, and corresponding criticism had been made in the press until about a year ago, that the Minister of National Revenue had authority to discontinue the issuance of clearances to boats exporting liquor to the United States. Probably my hon. friend, (Mr. Stevens) who was minister for a short time before I took over the department, had the same thought; I may be wrong but I think he found, as I did upon making inquiry, that there was no power under the act for the minister to refuse clearances in that way. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I think that the department and the government have done practically everything which could be done under the law as it now stands to help our neighbours, short of the actual prohibition of exports. It should be remembered that after all Canada is not a prohibitionist country. That fact may be regretted by a great many estimable people, and many of them may be in this house. I have no fault to find with that, but the fact remains that under our law liquor may be manufactured and sold in Canada under certain conditions. We have a system of public control for the making and the sale of liquors and we have been quite consistent in the matter of limiting the number of docks, which implies control but does not imply prohibition.

It is quite apparent that in order to bring about the result which is desired by the United States, and by our friends who have spoken prior to myself, it is necessary that the law be changed before the issuance of clearances can be stopped.

I would like to sum up very briefly what seem to me to be the reasons both for and against a policy of that kind. It has been said that we are violating the spirit of the treaty which was made in 1924 by not absolutely prohibiting the exportation of liquors. I cannot agree with that and I do not think it is a fair charge. As I stated this afternoon, before the treaty was actually made the United States asked that the export of liquor should be made illegal, that no clearances should be granted; that is what it wanted but the Canadian government did not grant that. It seems to me that if it was the intention of the Canadian government to stop the export of liquors it would have been specifically stated in the treaty which was made; that seems to me to be absolutely logical, and it is just as reasonable to suppose that what was specifically stated in the treaty was as far as we cared to go at that time. I refer to the obligation which we are carrying out, to give notice of clearance whenever a boat leaves the Canadian shore.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on, go on.

Mr. BENNETT: He is a minister replying.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. EULER: I thank the members for their very courteous indulgence and I promise not to impose unduly upon their patience.

This question has been discussed very freely and I think it is only fair to give at this time some of the facts which I think have not been brought out. One argument which impresses me most strongly in favour of the prohibition of exports is the moral argument. It has been stated that the business of the exportation of liquor has resulted in the demoralization of people and has increased the disregard for law generally. I believe that, to some extent, that is the fact, a fact very much to be deplored, and one which I do not think any member of this house will condone. It will be agreed that wherever a country is under a prohibitory law to which a very large minority is opposed, the condition which has been described is inescapable.

It has been stated that other countries prohibit the issuance of clearances, and Great Britain was cited by the United States authorities in that connection. As a matter of fact we have made inquiry, and there is no such practice in Great Britain. That country does not refuse clearances for the exportation of liquor to any other country in the world, so far as I know.

Petitions by the hundreds have been presented to this house asking that clearances be no longer issued. I believe that the petitioners have so petitioned because they are opposed absolutely to the traffic in liquor. I do not believe that they were moved primarily by their regard for the feelings of a friendly nation; I believe that the prime motive was as I have stated, but I must say that I have no fault to find with that motive. I might say in passing—perhaps I should not say this, but I will—that to me it does not seem quite consistent that we as a country, or as separate provinces, should permit the legal manufacture and sale of liquor and then place undue restrictions upon the sale of liquor anywhere else.

One of the arguments offered against our prohibiting the issuance of clearances is that the problem which the United States is now experiencing is one of their own making and that we are not primarily responsible. Another is—using the words of the man on the street—"Let the United States enforce their own law." In the light of the statements which I made this afternoon, in connection with the lack of effort on the part of the United States to enforce their own law, I think that attitude is a very human and fairly reasonable one and that we might at least go slowly until we have some assurance and some evidence that they are trying to do for themselves what they are now asking us to do for them.

I mentioned this afternoon the peculiar fact that whereas we in Canada compel all boats, no matter how small, to take clearances when they leave our shores and to report when they return, that practice does not obtain in the United States. All boats under five tons sailing from United States ports are not required to take clearances and do not report when they return, yet practically all the boats engaged in this traffic are of United States registry and the great majority of them are of a tonnage less than five. Perhaps I should not offer advice to the United States as to what they should do, but it seems to me it would not be unreasonable for us to say, when they ask us not to give clearances to small boats, that they should amend their own law and demand clearances from their boats when they leave a port and ask them to report when they return, thus obtaining control over their own boats.

The statement has been made frequently that it is Canadian liquor which is flooding the United States. There is no reasonable doubt that a large amount of liquor does go from Canada into the United States, but relatively speaking the amount is very small based upon the evidence of United States authorities connected with the enforcement of their law that it is only from two to five per cent of their total consumption which is imported from Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer the most important argument as I see it. Suppose for the moment that it is thought desirable to accede to the request of the United States and to the requests of the many petitioners who have come to this parliament, and that we pas a law prohibiting the issuance of clearances. In my opinion, if that remedy were adopted it would not solve the difficulty. Liquor can be obtained throughout Canada quite freely. In the province of Ontario liquor may be purchased in fairly large quantities from the government stores. In the province of Quebec they have the right under their law, although it is not exercised, to sell any quantity for export by the Quebec Liquor Commission. Liquor may be bought in fairly large quantities in almost every province of the Dominion. If clearances were not issued perhaps the quantity exported would not be so large, but there is no doubt in my mind that a great deal of liquor would be purchased throughout the Dominion of Canada for the purpose of exportation to the United States. If clearances would no longer be granted; the result would be that shipments of liquor to the United States would not go from recognized customs ports on the Canadian border, and the traffic would be forced underground to the corruption of Canadian people where perhaps it has not extended to Canada as it has to the United States. That would be a very undesirable situation. Moveover, probably the liquor that now goes across the border might successfully be shipped down to ocean ports and perhaps exported to St. Pierre and Miquelon, which also takes no particular precautions as to where the liquor is going, and from whose exports we in Canada suffer very considerably. One of the worst troubles we have in connection with preventive measures in the maritimes is that the St. Pierre and Miquelon islands lie at our doors and it is impossible to prevent the smuggling of liquor from those islands into our own country. It seems to me that in that case, if the liquor cannot go out through a recognized customs port in Canada, it will go out through perhaps every little landing place that may exist along our boundaries lined with lakes and rivers.

Mr. MANION: And worse liquor.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps worse liquor, and the difficulty from our point of view will be that it will then be illegally exported. As the matter stands now, the export of liquor from Canada is absolutely legal. The illegality arises where the liquor enters the United States, because the importation of liquor into that country is against their law. Exportation of liquor from Canada is entirely legal. If we pass a law prohibiting clearance, the liquor will then go out in any case, but it will go out illegally and secretly instead of openly, aboveboard and subject to a certain amount of observation, because we have limited the number of places from which exportation can be made.

I mentioned this afternoon that when the excise was paid on liquor manufactured in Canada, the liquor became free goods and could be exported the same as any other commodity. I repeat that because I want to add this further observation: that being the case, we cannot stop the exportation of that liquor from any customs port in the Dominion. We have limited the number of docks. but that has not resulted in stopping the exportation of liquor through those ports. We can limit the number of docks within any one port, as we did, for example, at Windsor; but we cannot, under the present law, stop the export through any open port in the Dominion. There are those who say—and I have in mind now particularly a prominent Toronto newspaper—that if we passed a law prohibiting the granting of clearances, we would at least have washed our national hands of an offence against a friendly neighbour, and that, having done that, we would be under no obligation to spend money or time to uphold the laws of the United States. I cannot agree with that view. I cannot escape the conclusion that we then assume a responsibility which now rests upon the United States. As the matter stands, if there is any violation of law it is a violation of United States law. As it would be under the new law, it would be a violation of Canadian customs law. The law is the law, and we cannot shirk responsibility as readily as that suggestion would make it appear. If a Canadian customs law is violated, surely it becomes the duty of Canadian customs officers to see that that violation is punished. I am not trying to exaggerate; I do not think I am drawing a fanciful picture at all, but I say that if we are under an obligation in the Department of National Revenue to see that violations of the law are punished, surely we shall need to establish a preventive force a good deal larger than the one we have now, which, I may say, is giving me enough trouble as it is. I am sure the most ardent prohibitionist will not say that this country should be under any obligation to spend large sums of money in employing many men to see that that law prohibiting the exportation of liquor is not violated. Nations have not yet become quite so altruistic as that. Besides that, we would not succeed; we could not stop the exportation of liquor, although it might be lessened to some extent. After we had passed a law of that kind and liquor still continued to flow into the United States, I feel sure that our neighbours would yet be much inclined to criticize and we would continue to get the blame.

So far as I am concerned—and I think I can speak for the government in this matter—we are honestly anxious to do all that we reasonably can to assist our neighbours. But I will also say very frankly that I am more concerned with stopping smuggling into Canada than stopping smuggling into the United States. The first is our own particular business and the other is primarily theirs. The Department of National Revenue, as it is now with its many branches and ramifications, provides plenty of work for those connected with that department. It is a fairly big job and I will admit I have no inclination at the present moment to add more duties to that department which has already so many. I am not deliberately looking for more trouble. I admit the problem is a difficult one and it gives the government some concern.

Personally—and I think I may again speak for the government in this—I have received with considerable sympathy and every consideration the protests of those who are opposed to the exportation of liquor, but I sincerely believe that under all the circumstances as related by myself this afternoon and evening, and with all the measures already taken, the government has done fairly well, and has perhaps gone far enough. But the door is not closed; the government is always prepared to give further consideration as developments may justify it. I feel, however, that before we take any further action there should be more convincing proof that our neighbours are sincerely doing all they can to help themselves. In the meantime the government desires and welcomes a frank discussion by members of all parties of a difficult and vexing problem, in order to enable it to arrive at new conclusions or to be confirmed in the position that so far has been taken.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house as a whole will agree with me when I say that the minister has given a very frank and carefully studied statement of a most difficult problem. Personally I congratulate him upon the clarity of his utterances; and with the greater part of what he has said little fault can be found. I should like briefly to bring to the attention of the house one or two points arising out of what he has said.

There are perhaps two main suggestions arising out of his remarks: first, it must be granted by every hon. member that the problem is an exceedingly complicated and difficult one. Second, by the official statements of the Minister of National Revenue in charge of the administration of the customs and excise of the Dominion of Canada made in the house to-day regarding the manner in which the officers administering the law on the other side of the line have reciprocated, shall I say, the courtesies and the efforts that the minister declares his officers have made, there is presented to the house an appalling situation. The minister told us most frankly, and in clear and unmistakable language, that under a solemn treaty entered into between the two countries Canada had agreed to render to a friendly neighbouring state the service of notifying them when vessels laden with liquor cleared from Canada for points in the United States; that these vessels have been cleared from Canada in a perfectly legal manner for the last few years; that Canadian officers had promptly, and in some cases twice for the same vessel, notified the official at the United States point to which the vessel was going of the name of the vessel, the name of the officer in charge, and the nature of the cargo; that these vessels left Canadian ports, Bridgeburg, Windsor and other points in broad daylight; that they proceeded across the river, and that the actual unloading of the cases of liquor themselves could be seen from the Canadian side, and yet in the work of unloading they were unmolested and not interfered with by the American officers, although in every case the American officers had been advised of the departure or prospective departure of the vessels, in some cases only two hours prior to sailing. Further, it has been declared that with very few exceptions these boats are American-owned boats, the names of which are well known to the officials on the American side, and that finally, little or no notice is taken of this courtesy on the part of Canada in the discharge of her duties under the treaty. The minister further tells us that the American government had requested that the notification in regard to the Windsor-Detroit traffic should be discontinued.

Mr. EULER: They requested that the notification sent daily by telephone should be sent weekly, and not by telephone.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, that the practice of notifying them by telephone, as was the understanding, should be discontinued and that notification should be sent weekly instead of every day. These statements, coming as they do from a minister of the crown in the House of Commons, and from a minister of the crown noted for the coolness and deliberateness of his utterances, present to this parliament a situation which I think warrants our attention. I make this suggestion to the Prime Minister—I have not had time to consult either with my leader or with those around me, and I am therefore discussing this matter on my own responsibility, simply as a member of the house—I suggest to the Prime Minister that a treaty such as that which we have made genuine efforts to observe, the United States authorities apparently taking no notice of these efforts on our part, might very well be dispensed with and abrogated. It seems to me that the treaty is a farce. I must say that the picture drawn by the minister presents a situation which if I can judge of the temper of the people south of the line will cause them a good deal of anxiety and will perturb the mind at least of the government there for some time to come.

There are two or three things that I should like very greatly to discuss. On one of them the minister touched lightly, but I think he will not disagree with me when I say that it is clear that the practice of certain persons, largely American citizens, from what the minister tells us, in continually violating the American laws is building up a spirit of lawlessness which is reflected not only in the smuggling of liquor but in much more violent ways. I think it is known the world over, it is certainly known all over this continent, that in Detroit and Chicago and other American cities the violent crimes directly attributable to this traffic are nothing short of appalling. I recall reading only a few weeks ago an address by the president of the United States to the press association of the United States, pointing to the number of murders committed in one of the great American cities, the number of convictions, and the number of apprehensions due largely, but not wholly, of course, to this traffic. I have not the statement with me, but it seemed to me unbelievable. That feature, I think, warrants the attention of the government of this country as well as that of the United States. We cannot lightly brush it aside on the ground that some of us may be in favour of a prohibitory measure and some of us opposed to it. That is not the ground from which that class of criminality can be viewed, and anything that contributes to such a situation merits the closest scrutiny of parliament itself.

What is lying at the bottom of all this? At the bottom of it all is the profit that is in it. There is one aspect of the matter which I should like to present to the house and to the government. Last year, according to returns which I have received, the Dominion of Canada collected from the distillers in this country, by way of excise duty the sum of $12,400,000. Of that amount, $7,800,000 was duty paid on spirits exported to the United States, and $4,600,000 on domestic spirits, or spirits consumed in Canada. I pause to impress upon the attention of the house the significance of those figures. Under the Excise Act as I read it there are only two ways in which the release of spirits may be treated; one is for domestic consumption, where an excise duty of $9 a gallon is imposed, and the other is for export, where this $9 excise duty is refunded. But in recent years, owing to the development of this illicit traffic to the United States—illicit only so far as entry to the United States is concerned—we have introduced a third class of duty, namely, the collection of the regular home consumption excise duty of $9 a gallon on such liquor as is exported to the United States. I submit that in my opinion that excise duty ought not to be collected. I put it upon this basis: After all, the minister was perfectly correct in his statement that this is a legal business in Canada. I made the statement three years ago, and again last year, that just so long as the manufacture and sale of liquor is legalized in Canada, just so long are those in the business entitled to fair and equitable treatment by the administrative authorities of this country, dominion and provincial. I conceive that neither this nor any other government has the right to single out this particular business and say: We will impose a tax upon you in respect of all the liquor exported to the United States, but we shall not impose it upon liquor exported to Cuba, Porto Rico, China, Japan, England, and so forth. A very considerable quantity of liquor is exported to other countries. I have not the figures before me, but speaking from memory, last year the total export was some 1,800,000 gallons, whereas the export to the United States was 1,100,000 gallons—in round figures showing about one third was exported to other countries.

That trade paid no excise tax—it was fully refunded; but the 1,000,000 gallons going to the United States were taxed. To the extent that we collect that revenue and allow the fact of the $7,000,000 from that source to influence the mind of parliament, we are partners in this export business to the United States. I think we might as well frankly face that situation. I know there is a school of thought in Canada which argues that if we can make a dollar out of the export of liquor to the United States—well, let the Yankee pay it. I remember that one of the witnesses who appeared before the customs committee, a man by the name of Cooper, made an immense fortune out of this business. By the way, it was recommended that he should be sued for some $900,000, but I do not know whether the case was proceeded with or not. He made the statement that it was a splendid thing for Canada to get "the good American dollar," as he put it. I submit it is not in the interests of Canada's self respect that for the sake of a revenue of $7,000,000 we should actually become partners in the business of export of liquor to the United States.

Mr. EULER: I do not like to interrupt, but may I ask a question?

Mr. STEVENS: My forty minutes are just as short as the minister's.

Mr. EULER: I merely wish to ask this question. The hon. member suggests that we should not collect excise tax on liquors exported to the United States. Does he mean that the liquor should be allowed to be exported without paying the tax?

Mr. STEVENS: I did not put it quite that way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: I submit that this is not a laughing matter.

Mr. EULER: My question is quite serious.

Mr. STEVENS: I will try to express myself clearly to the minister. I do not think this is a matter that should be treated lightly. I want to say to the Prime Minister and his government that I am not approaching the question in any captious spirit, nor do I intend to do so during these remarks. I repeat, under the statutes as I read them, the practice—leaving out of the question for the moment the export to the United States—in years gone by was to treat the taxing of liquor on two bases, one, that Canadian-made liquor exported was not taxed, that is, the excise tax was not imposed; two, that on liquor manufactured in Canada for consumption in Canada an excise tax was imposed of $9 a gallon. But there has now grown up a third basis, namely the imposition of an excise duty of $9 a gallon on liquor exported to the United States. To put it a little differently, the exact form of that tax is this: the excise duty of $9 a gallon is paid on all this liquor, and it is refunded where the liquor is exported to foreign countries, except to the United States. I submit that that in a sense makes us a partner in this business of trafficking in intoxicating liquor to the United States—indirectly, not directly. I submit further that that is not conducive to the dignity of this country.

When I was interrupted I was proceeding to say that at the bottom of this business is the money that is in it. Let me give to the house the profit which accrues to those engaged in it. The minister will correct me if I am wrong in my figures; I think I am not. Whiskey constitutes the great bulk of the liquor traffic. Each case of whiskey contains 12 bottles or 2 gallons. The excise tax is $9 a gallon or $18 a case. That is, the Dominion of Canada takes $18 a case in the form of excise tax. If the goods are sold in Canada by some province there is a wide margin of profit. I will give the figures for my own province as they used to be; I think they still apply. They have a profit of $20 a case. That makes the cost $38 a case. According to the returns of the Department of Trade and Commerce, whiskey costs to produce $2.65 a gallon, or about $5.50 a case. On an article worth about $5 or $6 the Dominion tax and the profit of the province represent about $38. In the case of imported liquor it is $40. If the bootlegger or smuggler bringing in liquor from outside can sell without the province knowing it he has a margin of $20 a case upon which to work; if he can evade the excise duties or customs duties, he has another $20, that is, a margin of $40 a case. The point I make is that the monetary inducement to violate the law is simply terrific. Last year I suggested, and I suggest again now, that it would be good business on the part of the parliament of Canada if we made a very drastic revision in the import duties and the excise duties and so take away a substantial portion of this attractive profit offered to the illicit dealer in liquor. Secondly—and perhaps this is not my business, but I will mention it—if the provinces under the government sales system would merely add a profit that would take care of the cost of the distribution of the liquor with a margin of safety, it would largely do away with the inducement to deal illicitly in liquor in this country.

Now I come to the suggestion of the minister that there would be no advantage in refusing clearances. In one sense I agree with the minister that perhaps there would be no advantage. But I should like to submit this to him. If we lowered our excise and also our customs duty we would of course lose a certain amount of revenue, but I am again pointing out that if you are going into this business for the revenue that is in it, then you must take the consequences of the persistent evasion of the law, whether in Canada or outside of Canada. But I assume that we are not in the business for the purpose of making money. It is a legal business and we want those in it to make reasonable profits and to act legally. Assuming that is the basis upon which we are to deal with it, then I say the minister can very well refuse clearances and not experience the result that he suggests, namely, that an underground system would be worked out. The only reason for an underground method being developed would be the excessive profits in the business. No men will go into this business and risk their lives, as they do daily and hourly—many of them, I think far more than we have any idea of, losing their lives—they will not go into the business except for the exorbitant profits in it. I am not going to take the minister to task on his suggestion that to refuse clearance would simply develop an underground and illicit trade, but I do wish to suggest to him that at the present time we are actually facilitating the business. Let me put it to the minister this way. Had we not charged the distillers of Canada $9 a gallon and then given them in return for that $9 of revenue a free right of way to the export docks, and every possible official facility to get their liquor out of the country —had we not done that, or, to state the case differently, if we surrendered the $9 a gallon, we should not have to give that service. What we are actually doing is giving them that facility, that protection, and collecting $9 for it. In the first place I contend that the minister ought not to collect the $9 a gallon; they ought to be given the right to export, as they export to Cuba or China, or any other country. That is my first point. My second point is that it is not the business of the government to facilitate the moving of liquor to the boundary line for export. That is the business of the dealer in liquor.

Mr. EULER: We don't do that.

Mr. STEVENS: You do in this way: I understand that under the provincial law they would not be permitted to do it—under this very law which the minister passed last year giving the provinces control. The minister issues a form of permit—X-13 or whatever it is—which accompanies the liquor out. I submit that there is a facility in the movement in liquor resulting from the collection of the $9 a gallon, which I contend is illegally collected; and I venture this statement, that if the distilleries took their case to the courts, and the government gave them a fiat, they could recover the money they have paid in under that practice, provided they could show that the liquor was exported. And the minister knows that it is exported because he would not give them the permit otherwise.

In a return I have here it is shown that we collect $7,800,000 on liquor exported to the United States, which I take it is at the rate of $9 a gallon. It is indicated as from the licensed distilleries of Canada and as Canadian export. We get $7,800,000. But in the trade and commerce returns I find that up to the end of February, for the same year, we exported to the United States 1,103,000 gallons which, at $9 a gallon, would be roughly $9,930,000. And that does not include miscellaneous liquors; that is whiskey alone. Now if we exported that quantity, according to these returns, how is it that we collected only $7,800,000?

Mr. EULER: I might have explained that but I was told not to interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not tell my hon. friend not to interrupt me; I merely suggested what he himself suggested to me, namely, that forty minutes was rather short.

Mr. EULER: This is a possible explanation—that the $7,800,000 which we collected for liquor exported was for liquor that went directly from the distilleries. But there is no doubt that a good deal exported is sold by the commissions and does not pay the excise duty.

Mr. STEVENS: It would not account for the difference—

Mr. EULER: It might.

Mr. STEVENS: —because the total amount collected was only $12,000,000, for domestic consumption and export; and if we collected on the 1,103,000 gallons which, according to this return, we exported to the United States, we should have collected $9,930,000.

Mr. EULER: Is there any reason for assuming that the Department of National Revenue's figures are incorrect rather than those of the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. STEVENS: No, but I am suggesting to the minister the responsibility of explaining this discrepancy amounting to some $2,100,000. Let the minister understand me; I am not making any statement charging him or his officials with anything wrong. But there is an obvious and a serious discrepancy that should be explained. Another point that struck me as extraordinary was this: There was produced in Canada last year some 9,000,000 gallons of whiskey. It is known that we are releasing this liquor, not under the old law of the two-year period, but within the two-year period. Under certain new processes it is sometimes released after nine months and sometimes after a year and a half. So that there seems to be a discrepancy between home consumption, export and production. I think these figures should be carefully checked up. I am not particularly asking for an explanation, but I submit the problem to the minister as one that merits very careful checking up.

There is another point I wish to bring to the attention of the house, and in this respect I must say I find myself at sharp cleavage with the minister. In 1926 there were fifteen distilleries in Canada, and in 1929, according to this return, there are twenty-five. I take the ground—I have taken it before and I still hold it—that we ought to keep down the number of distilleries in this country.

Mr. EULER: We are doing so now.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, there is an increase from fifteen to twenty-five in less than three years.

Mr. EULER: But the sale of liquor has been made legal in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not criticizing that. But I think that the increase in the number of distilleries and, furthermore, in the distribution of the stock, which is a private matter throughout the country, is tending to increase the country's national interest in the business. Now I have no brief for anyone in any attempt to combat the use of intoxicating liquors on the part of those people who so choose; that is not my purpose at the moment. I am not challenging anyone's right in this matter. But I do say that it is not desirable for the people of Canada to increase the facilities for the handling of liquor and for the production of it. And we are doing both of these things, largely from the inducement of revenue.

Mr. EULER: I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend, but I might answer him in this way. In the first place the minister did not think that any monopoly should be created in the business; and secondly—I do not think my hon. friend was present when I made the statement—I pointed out that for a year at least no licenses have been issued except with the consent of the provincial authorities.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think the minister should advance that as a reason. After all the responsibility for granting licenses rests with the Minister of National Revenue, and with him alone. Let me give the minister a case parallel to all this. In years gone by—about 1922-23-24—there were a large number of licenses or permits issued for export houses, which the minister himself now tells us he is bending every effort to exterminate. And when we challenged that in the house we were told that every license was granted on the advice and with the consent of the attorney general of the province where the export warehouse was to be established. Now it will not do for parliament to hide behind the gown of the attorney general of a province; that excuse is without any validity or value. The point I make is that there is a substantial increase in the number of distilleries in Canada. The minister says he does not want to create a monopoly, but I would infinitely rather have seen the distilling business remain where it was ten years ago, in the hands of a few outstanding and reputable firms, than distributed over this long list of some twenty-five distilleries in Canada. I see that in my own city there are four where there used to be one—that is, in the neighbourhood of my city. I am very serious on that; I think it is bad policy for Canada to increase the number of distilleries throughout the country. Then there are the breweries; I have not the list under my hand but I know there has been a large increase in the number of breweries as well. The minister says he does not want to create a monopoly, but we have virtually a monopoly in this case, with the provinces controlling the sale of liquor as a provincial right and the federal government controlling it by the heavy excise duty. As I said before, we are partners in the business to the extent of the revenue we are receiving, so there is virtually a monopoly. However, there is a tendency to let others into this very choice monopoly; it is a very valuable concession to anyone, and it is against that I am now raising my voice.

It is not my intention to prolong the discussion; I repeat that in his excellent address the minister has given the house a picture in regard to the liquor treaty betwen Canada and the United tSates which is nothing short of appalling. I repeat to the Prime Minister and the government now that a treaty which is held so lightly by one party and which, according to the minister, we have bent every effort to observe, is scarcely worth keeping. So I would suggest that the time has come when we might properly advise the United States that the treaty should be abrogated.

Mr. J. F. POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to add to this discussion. First let me sincerely congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) on his very interesting speech, which was delivered, as always, with great clearness. He has his own views, on the matter, with which we may all agree to some extent, but there are also other important features to be considered.

Listening to the remarks which were made this afternoon one might think that all the crimes perpetuated in Chicago are due to the importation of Canadian liquor into the United States, but I think this is a great exaggeration. At the root of the liquor trade is not only the profit but also the pleasure which some people derive from drinking liquor. This has been elementary since the days of Noah; it is quite an old principle, and it is well known that even in the United States liquor is sold on doctor's prescription. However, they take such great care to prevent the smuggling of liquor into that country that even diplomats must drive their own cars when they contain embassy liquor, and I do not mean Embassy Scotch. I have in my hand an article which appeared in the New York Times and which is as follows:

Diplomat Drives Car With Embassy Liquor. By This Means Load Is Enabled To Pass Safely In Streets Of Washington.

Washington, March 13: The truck was accompanied by a member of the diplomatic corps, who personally took over the steering wheel and drove the truck into the city. In one case an attache of an embassy was following a truck in his private automobile, but this was not thought sufficient to give the truck immunity from seizure for carrying liquors. These warnings were given by the police before the passage of the Jones law, imposing more severe penalties for dry law violators.

This is very severe. I also remember having read in the papers that Lady Heath, I think, came from Great Britain with a bottle of champagne to christen a ship in the United States, and the bottle was seized. I have another clipping from the New York Times which contains the picture of an aviator and his wife, with these words underneath:

The Volstead Act Lays a Hand Upon Science: Captain William Lancaster, a British aviator, holding the compass which was brought from England by Mrs. Lancaster and held up at the customs because it contained four ounces of pure alcohol. It was later passed.

Then I have an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of March 20:

Until Death Do Us Part

Years ago Macaulay spoke of the United States as being "all sail and no anchor." Reading the American press these days, with their tales of machine guns in the streets of Chicago, of 10,000 stills discovered in "dry" Pennsylvania, of thousands of undetected murderers, of bandits and crooked bosses, of bootleggers and hi-jackers, of domestic scandals and civic graft, one thinks of Macaulay's phrase.

Further in this article I find this paragraph:

Dudley G. Newcomb had a "love for liquor," said his wife. The judge thought he detected an odour at the hearing. Wherefore the court ruled $75 a month alimony to Mrs. Newcomb, Mr. Newcomb going to jail for contempt because of his aromatic breath.

This happened under American law; and I am not through with it yet. There is not only the comical side of it, which lies in the exaggeration of these people who think that when they have uttered the word "law" they have done everything; there is more. I have another clipping from the Ottawa Journal referring to a despatch under date of December 31. It is a very sad case and will show how stupidly the law is enforced in the United States:

A Legal Monstrosity

A court clothed with the power, and representing the authority and majesty, of a great state of the neighbouring republic closed its record for the year 1928 with an act which for its revelation of the state of mind and folly that bigotry upon a public question can produce, should not go unheeded. What happened is told as follows in a despatch that appears in the New York Times:

"Lansing, Michigan, December 31: Mrs. Etta Miller, mother of ten children and grandmother of two, and the first woman convicted as a fourth offender under the new criminal code, was sentenced to life imprisonment in the Detroit House of Correction this afternoon, immediately after a jury, which had deliberated twenty minutes, returned a verdict of guilty. Her fourth offence was the sale of two pints of liquor."

When one thinks of the thousands of murderers scot free in the United States, of the gunmen and "racketeers" who ply their trade in Chicago and New York, of the clemency that has been extended to capital offenders and the light sentences imposed upon others, one wonders what is becoming of some of the people who are in authority across the line. To their strange mentality apparently the sale of a pint of whiskey is a more terrible offence than the murderous use of a gun.

The saddest case of all happened in Illinois last March, and in that connection I have a clipping from the Washington Times under date of March 27. This article refers to a woman who had a gallon of wine, not spirits, in her house. She was killed by the dry officers and the case aroused intense indignation throughout our neighbouring country It only shows the stupidity of these so-called dry officers, and I do not think I am exaggerating when I use that word; I should like to find a stronger one to qualify it as it deserves. This issue of the Washington Herald contains the following headline:

Dry Slayer Blames Law

Mr. GOTT: Put it on Hansard.

Mr. POULIOT: This appears upon the first page of the Washington Herald.

Mr. GOTT: What year?

Mr. POULIOT: This year. The headline and article continue:

Aimed Shot At Woman In Defense, Agent Says. Prohibition Makes More Trouble Than Good, Is Lament of Illinois Rum Raider.

Aurora, Ill., March 27 (I.N.S.)—"I wish there was never such a thing as prohibition. It has made a thousand times more trouble than it has done good." This was the first declaration made in a hospital here to-day by Deputy Sheriff Roy Smith, who killed Mrs. Lillian De King in a dry raid here and assisted in clubbing her husband into insensibility.

This act was committed by a man who had absolutely no judgment but who was authorized to enforce a stupid law. Upon this same page appears the picture of a dry congressman, and beside the picture appears the following:

Dry Legislator Brings In Rum. Representative Morgan Lands In New York From Panama With Four Bottles.

This was afterwards denied, but as the hon. gentleman in question is not a member of this house we are not bound to take his word.

In relation to a question of this kind there are many views. Some believe in moderation, others in abstention—

An hon. MEMBER: Which is the worst?

Mr. POULIOT: I do not say it is the worst, because I believe that sometimes the people are sincere. Some people abstain because they cannot drink any more; others abstain because they have never tasted alcoholic beverages, and still others abstain because they dislike them. I respect the opinions of others, but it is very difficult for one who is not a doctor or who has not had any experience with the good or bad qualities of liquor to say, "This is bad for everyone." It might be good for the man next door, and it is not right to say that it is bad for every man or every woman.

An hon. MEMBER: Was that a lady doctor?

Mr. POULIOT: A lady doctor, yes. One should show a little tolerance in these matters. I find as I grow older that tolerance is not a bad thing. We must accept the other man's point of view. Liquor will not be abolished because a man or a woman is a teetotaller; that would be Utopia. There will be liquor so long as grapes are grown, and when people are careless enough to lose themselves in the lord's vineyard, so much the worse for them. But when that does happen it is not to be expected that they will be followed by everyone, because the majority of the people are in favour of moderation.

They have plenty of liquor in the United States. A friend of mine, born in Canada but living with his mother in New York or some other big city to the south of the line, told me last Sunday that on one occasion his mother had wanted a little whiskey and he said he would be able to obtain some for her without having to go more than a block away. She did not believe that one could obtain liquor in that city, but he told me that he knew of four or five "blind pigs" within the block, and he was able to get it without any trouble.

Mr. GOTT: Did he get a chaser?

Mr. POULIOT: He went to one of those "blind pigs" and obtained a bottle of liquor, to his mother's great surprise.

Mr. GOTT: Or joy?

Mr. POULIOT: Who can say that that liquor came from the country of my hon. friend? No one can say that.

Mr. GOTT: It might have come from Temiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: We do not carry on that business there. It was probably moonshine whiskey manufactured in the United States. Anyone who reads the American papers knows that there is plenty of moonshine whiskey manufactured in that country. They even work during the sunshine—

Mr. GOTT: Make moonshine by sunshine.

Mr. POULIOT: As the hon. member appears to know so much about this matter I will take his word for it. It is a mistake to say that all the liquor consumed in the United States comes from Canada. It is a gross exaggeration, and only creates a bad opinion of our country. It would be better for our tourist trade to have the American people who are fond of our liquor feel that they had better come here to drink it on the spot.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre suggested a reduction of the excise and import duties on alcoholic liquor. If a reduction is to be made, it should be made in the excise duty. As I have already said in the house, I think it would be proper to give our own people a chance to produce liquor in this country instead of importing it from other countries. Just in conclusion I will take the liberty of asking those who are discussing these matters, although they are free to say what they like, to be very moderate in giving an expression of opinion as to whether the whiskey and other liquor supplies of the United States come from Canada.

Mr. B. W. FANSHER (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, one would think from the discussion that has taken place thus far that the request that clearances should not be granted to liquor cargoes going to the United States was made in the first instance by the delegation which visited Ottawa in January of this year. It is well, perhaps, that the United States delegation brought to our attention some of the recommendations that were made in the session of 1926 when the customs scandals were under investigation. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) this evening reminded us that the Ontario Liquor Control Board had requested one or two years ago that restrictions be tightened up at Windsor. The fact was that conditions became so intolerable in that district that the Border Cities Star, a very influential paper of Windsor, through a series of editorials complained of the conditions existing there. The Ontario government was forced to take action and it reminded the federal government of the recommendation of the royal commission and also of the committee that sat in this house in 1926 in connection with the smuggling situation. The recommendation was that the number of export docks should be reduced, and it was favourably considered by the Ontario Liquor Control Board and by the federal government. We are informed to-night that the number was reduced from about fifty to ten.

I wish to approach this question not from the viewpoint of the request of the United States delegation but entirely from our own viewpoint and our own concern. In the session of 1926, when it was suggested that clearances should not be granted to cargoes of liquor bound for the United States, there was no thought that we were assisting the United States in enforcing their laws. The idea was that it was for our own good, for the benefit of this country and for that alone, that such a reform should be undertaken. It seems to me rather a superficial view to take of the situation to say that we should go rather slowly in assisting another nation to enforce their prohibtion laws when it is remembered that this question was under consideration for nearly a whole session in this parliament. A committee of this house brought in a report recommending that clearances be refused, and that report was adopted by the parliament of the day with all parties assenting thereto and not a dissenting voice in the whole house. The Prime Minister and the government of the day agreed that such should be done. The opposition, under a different leader from the hon. member occupying that position to-day, agreed that clearances should not be granted. The Progressive group in this part of the house were very anxious and insistent that all reforms along this line should be undertaken. As I say, the report of the committee was approved unanimously. Shortly after that the whole question was thrown into the arena of a Dominion election. Definite assurances were given that the necessary measures would be taken to clear up the situation. The Prime Minister gave a pledge to that effect and a royal commission was appointed which spent many months in investigating the whole liquor business and smuggling in general, although I may say that most of the smuggling was found to be in connection with liquor. The report of the commission revealed an appalling situation. The liquor trade seemed to recognize no law whatsoever: they would not, in many instances, pay excise tax or make income tax or sales tax returns. I believe that more than $4,000,000 have since been collected in back taxes from liquor firms.

The report of that royal commission was tabled only a short time ago, after a general election, before a new parliament, before a house whose personnel had largely changed, with many new members, and with a new leader of the opposition. That report recommended that the export of liquor be prohibited; that clearances be not granted. That report again was endorsed by every member of the house, by the government, by the opposition and by the party in this corner. There was not a dissenting voice. Why then should we hie away to the United States for an excuse to evade what at that time we deemed to be our responsibility in connection with this matter? I want to say at this juncture that a large section of the people of this Dominion has not lost sight of the promises made at that time, of the reports given to the house, and of the way in which they were received. Many of those people are very sincere when they petition the house at this session to have that recommendation enacted into law. The house has received petitions not only from temperance organizations but from women's institutes, township councils and various other organizations of a secular nature urging that the government carry out what both the committee and the royal commission recommended and what two parliaments adopted and agreed should be done. It is difficult for me to understand why this question should not now be considered from that viewpoint rather than from the viewpoint of assisting the United States in the enforcement of their law. The justice of the end sought I think demands that we should enact legislation which would refuse clearance to liquor cargoes going to the United States. Surely we are not interested in the trade to the extent that we are going to assist it by giving clearance to vessels landing contraband stuff in the country adjoining, but we should be interested, and I think we are interested as Canadian citizens in maintaining law and order in this country, and in maintaining the virility of our citizens.

I was astounded when I heard the Minister of National Revenue say that he was more interested in stopping smuggling into Canada than in prohibiting smuggling from Canada into the United States. I wondered by what process of reasoning he could figure out that he could curtail smuggling into this country when he says to the liquor exporters, citizens of this country perhaps only temporarily, but many of them citizens of this country for a good while: Pay me your $9 a gallon excise tax and you will get your clearance papers allowing you to land your cargoes in the United States. When he facilitates the entry of that liquor into United States, gives the smuggler clearance papers and facilitates him in his work, how can he expect the smuggler to respect his request not to smuggle goods back from the United States into Canada? It seems to me that he cannot expect our citizens to respect the laws of this country so long as our government does not respect the laws of the adjoining country.

It has often been brought to my mind very forcibly that the export liquor traffic, especially in the southwestern peninsula of Ontario, which the trade calls the bottle-neck of the trade—and the bottle-neck it really is, because most of the liquor gravitates into that peninsula and crosses over the border at Detroit—has a demoralizing effect upon the citizens of that district, so much so that, as I said before, the Border Cities Star thought it its duty to take a hand in the situation and represent the facts as they were with a view to having the border cities cleaned up. That in a measure was accomplished, but to my personal knowledge, from observation of the trucks that ply our highways day by day in large numbers laden with liquor for export across the Detroit river, and the certain knowledges of all our citizens that that trade is aided and abetted by the government in giving clearances to liquor laden vessels, it is not at all surprising that there has developed in the minds of the citizens in that district a somewhat lax idea of respect for law in general. It has been my observation that there have been more hold-ups on the highways, more bank robberies, more hold-ups of gas stations and the like in that territory within the last few years than there have ever been in the history of Ontario before. Only the other day we had a very unfortunate incident upon No. 2 highway down in that district, when an American citizen shot dead a Canadian citizen who attempted to hold up his car. Knowing, as I say, the state of affairs that exists there, the Detroit citizen was not going to take a chance on what might happen. Surely we owe it to ourselves and to our country to see that the morale of our people is kept at a high standard. Instead of condoning the export of liquor to the United States, the trade which is largely concentrated in that area close to the Detroit river having such a detrimental effect upon our citizens, I say that we owe it to ourselves to use every means in our power to try to stop that traffic.

I was somewhat concerned when the Minister of National Revenue gave us the information that when liquor is exported to any country which does not prohibit its importation the exporter is required to furnish a bond of twice the amount of the excise tax, but anyone who desires to export liquor to the United States is required to pay the excise tax in cash because it was not recognized by the department that he could land a cargo within that country. Then the minister made the observation that the excise tax having been paid and clearance granted it was no more of the department's concern or the concern of the government, but that the liquor was then in the same position as free goods, and could go anywhere. The minister, in other words, virtually gave us to understand that having received the money and issued clearance papers, he washes his hands of the transaction and says: It is nothing to me; do what you will with this stuff. But is that really the case? I do not think it is. There is a situation developing between this country and the United States that will some day alarm us and we shall be forced to sit up and take notice; and it is developing in that southwestern peninsula of Ontario. We cannot go on indefinitely forcing our goods which are contraband within the United States upon that country without engendering their ill-will, and some morning we shall perhaps read in the newspapers that some act has been committed which we shall greatly deplore.

This government has considered the question. It has before it the report of the royal commission and the endorsation of two parliaments. Then why should there be any excuse offered at this time not to carry out the recommendations made by that royal commission and by the committee of the House of Commons? I say the least we can expect is that the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition should make a pronouncement upon this question. It seems this debate is going to end without the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition being concerned enough about the situation to make a pronouncement to the house. To my mind this is one of the most important questions that has come before the house this session, not only because of the investigation made in 1926 and the recommendation which followed it, but because it involves our honour in connection with a neighbouring nation.

Yesterday I listened very attentively to the remarks of the Prime Minister when he introduced the resolution dealing with the Geneva protocol. He stressed the fact that we had to rely on the good faith of the contracting parties. That was the fundamental bond of the whole treaty. Surely in connection with the request of the United States in this regard, good faith means a lot in cementing the international good will that has endured for so many years and that I hope will endure in the years to come. I urge upon the government not to let this matter pass without taking action, but to present to the house a solution for the problem by amending our law in the manner recommended by the royal commission which investigated the situation in 1926.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to minimize the importance of this subject. Indeed, in my judgment the control of the liquor traffic is one of the most important subjects that could engage our attention. Neither do I propose to minimize the difficulties that confront us in dealing with this particular phase of the liquor traffic. It may very well be that those difficulties peculiar to this phase of the traffic are not sufficiently appreciated in all quarters of the country. Indeed, we shall always have difficulties in dealing with the sale of intoxicating liquor so long as we permit its manufacture. It certainly would be an anomaly if, having granted the distilleries the right to manufacture, we began to interfere with the sale of their product. My own personal inclination would be to stop the whole business, and I hope the time may come when the country will see that that is the only way in which the liquor traffic can be handled.

An hon. MEMBER: It will be a long time.

Mr. BROWN: The millennium may be a long time in coming. But I am hopeful the time will come when the general sense of the people of Canada will be in favour of going about the eradication of the liquor traffic in a logical way, in such a way that we will not be confronted with these anomalies that arise from time to time.

We approach this particular question from two different standpoints. We have to approach it from the standpoint of our obligations to our friendly neighbours across the line. It has been urged upon us from some quarters that they have done all they can to control this traffic. and that if we would only do the little bit more necessary to complete their work, their problem would be solved. If that were demonstrated to be true, I should have no hesitation, nor do I think this parliament would have any hesitation, in undertaking to do that little bit more. Unfortunately, as I think has been shown this afternoon by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler), there is good reason to believe they have not taken all the steps that they might have taken, and when we are considering the question from the standpoint of our obligations to our neighbours we cannot altogether ignore that feature of the case. If they come to us with the assertion that they have done everything they can to stop this traffic, and demonstrate to us that that is the case, certainly we should not rest satisfied until we had done everything that lies in our power to help them to enforce their own law. Not that the obligation should be thrown upon us to enforce their law, but that we should lend them friendly assistance in that particular. The treaty was entered into with that object in view, and so far as its terms are concerned, I do not think it can be shown that Canada has not faithfully lived up to them.

Personally I should be very happy to see us go further and enter into a new treaty, if we could help them and ourselves to eliminate this evil. It is true that we might pass a law forbidding the export of liquor, not dealing with it from the standpoint of simply refusing clearance papers, a procedure which might not be as effective as many people seem to think. But I say it is true we might deal with the matter by passing a law absolutely forbidding the export of liquor to the United States. Towards such a law I would be entirely sympathetic, but I would be compelled to concede that tremendous difficulties would confront us when we were called upon to enforce it, especially when we have distilleries situated within a gunshot of the American border.

Let me add what I intended to say at the outset. When I knew that the government had offered the United States every opportunity for their officers to come over to the Canadian side and get full information as to shipments of liquor destined for that country, I was hopeful that the Americans would accept that offer. It seemed to me, whether it would satisfy those who wished for the refusal of clearance papers or not, that such action might be taken as would have all the effect expected from the refusal of clearance papers without any of the consequent difficulties that might result. It is true the Americans have refused that offer. I cannot understand why. It rather confirms me in the thought that perhaps they have not been dealing with the matter entirely in good faith. I repeat, personally I should be willing and anxious to see Canada take all possible steps to cooperate with the United States in enforcing that law. But looking at the matter from our own standpoint, I must say that even if the Americans were negligent in the enforcement of their law, from the point of view of a great many people in Canada who feel that total prohibition is the only final solution of the liquor problem, we are anxious to see the law a success in the United States, and we should put no difficulties in the way of their enforcing it. Then, from our own standpoint, wishing to see their great social experiment a success, I should be still more anxious that we should do everything within our power to curtail the traffic in liquor across the line. On the other hand, it cannot be disputed that apart altogether from the question of short-circuiting liquor, which is after all only incidental, the whole wretched business must of necessity have a demoralizing effect upon our own people; and if through any action on the part of this government in dealing with this particular phase of the situation we could bring about better conditions, certainly I should be only too happy to support any efforts in that direction.

One feature of the situation has been referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) as a third method of dealing with the duties imposed upon this traffic. Undoubtedly it is a new practice that seems to have been necessitated by the peculiar circumstances of the case. The liquor is not intended to go into consumption in Canada, nor can it come under the export laws or regulations that apply to the export of liquor to countries where it may be legally imported. When the minister was speaking I was compelled to do some thinking on that phase of the situation and I may say frankly that, with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, I do not look with any degree of satisfaction on the fact that Canada is reaping a revenue from that particular branch of the traffic. I may say that in regard to the methods of handling liquor in so many provinces of Canada to-day, I look with a good deal of alarm on the fact that the revenue that is being received from the traffic is making the people just a little less antagonistic to it than they were before. I know we are confronted with this situation as we were in Manitoba—that we are to consider whether it would be better to take such revenue as comes from the traffic when it is sold at a high price, or to increase the sale by selling at a lower price. Therefore I cannot altogether agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre when he urges that we should not collect the excise on this liquor in this particular form inasmuch as it tends to increase the profits of the bootlegger. I cannot see it in that light. It seems to me that if the government refused to collect the revenue from the sale of the liquor it would enable the distiller to pass the liquor over to the other people that much cheaper; they would make just as much money selling it a little cheaper as they are doing to-day, and the possibility is that the consumption of that liquor would be vastly increased. I cannot look favorably on any resolution that would tend to increase the consumption of liquor. So that for my part at the present time I find myself on the horns of a dilemma, as to whether I should accept the situation, much as I dislike it, of receiving revenue from the sale of liquor, or in the alternative increase the sale of that liquor.. I can however agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre when he takes exception to the policy of increasing the number of distilleries.

Mr. EULER: But we are not doing that.

Mr. BROWN: I was merely taking the hon. gentleman's statement that the distilleries have increased in number in the last few years. However, if the statement is not correct—

Mr. STEVENS: It was correct.

Mr. EULER: It might have been correct a year ago, but that is not the case now.

Mr. BROWN: We may take it, then, that it is not the policy of the government to increase the number of distilleries. That attitude on the part of the government will certainly secure my endorsation, which will be given all the more heartily if in some measure they can manage to decrease the number.

The unfortunate thing to-day in the liquor situation in Canada is the fact which is also evident in the old country: So many people are acquiring a vested interest in the traffic that it is consolidating itself more than ever before. The financial interest in the traffic is becoming so widespread that the time seems more and more remote when we shall secure from the people of Canada a vote which will abolish the traffic from our midst. That is one feature of the present situation which I dislike—the fact that more and more citizens are securing a financial interest in the traffic. When that is the case we are not likely to take such steps towards its abolition as many people in this country would like to see taken.

Personally I have this to say in regard to the whole question. I know it is true of many people in this country that they want to see Canada do whatever can be done to help a friendly nation to carry out its laws. I do not altogether agree with what the minister said, that the people were not really concerned about our attitude towards a friendly nation, but were only expressing the views they held as prohibitionists. That is not altogether true, although there may be a measure of truth in it, because I feel that a great many of the honest and right-thinking people of Canada do consider it a reproach to the citizens of this country that we should be engaged in a traffic which is abhorrent to the wishes of our friendly neighbours.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, May 22, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

MANITOBA NATIONAL PARK

Mr. BISSETT:

1. Is it the intention of the government to establish a national park in the province of Manitoba, as requested in a memorandum submitted to the Minister of the Interior on March 9, 1928, bearing the signatures of all the Manitoba members of the House of Commons?

2. What methods are adopted in determining the suitability of any given areas for national park purposes? Is there a set standard as regards physical characteristics of the area so chosen? If so, what is it?

3. Who made the examination of the proposed eastern Manitoba park site, and the proposed Riding mountain park site?

4. What portion of the whole area in the proposed eastern Manitoba park site was covered by Mr. R. W. Cautley of the Department of the Interior, on which his report dated February 11, 1929, is based, and on what evidence does he report: (a) that there is no uninterrupted waterway through this area; (b) that there are no trout or bass in this region; (c) that it is impossible to construct motor roads except at uneconomical and impractical costs in this area?

5. Has the government expressed its willingness to the government of Manitoba to establish a national park within the province of Manitoba? If so, when and what answer was received?

6. Has the government of Manitoba been asked to submit or approve of any given area for national park purposes? If so, what answer was received?

7. What mining claims have been staked and what other lands have been alienated in whole or in part in the proposed eastern Manitoba park site since the passing of an order in council on April 19, 1928, setting aside this area as a provisional reservation for park purposes?

8. What amount of money has been spent: (a) in connection with the Riding mountain forest reserve during the last three years; (b) in connection with the recreation ground established within that reserve and on whose recommendation were those expenditures made?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Under consideration.

2. When it appears that there is a responsible body of public opinion urging the establishment of an area as a national park, the department considers, first, whether the area is available for the purpose; secondly, whether the area is of national parks standard, i.e., that it is the best example available, typical of any region which is nationally interesting and valuable from a scenic, ecological, educational and recreational point of view. This is determined by inspection.

3. R. W. Cautley.

4. The portion north of the Canadian National railway. (a) The Whiteshell river is the only continuous waterway through this area and there are thirteen unavoidable portages in the 48 miles from its mouth to where it flows under the Canadian National railway embankment in a culvert; (b) On the evidence of his Indian guides, and local squatters; (c) Because of the generally rocky and difficult character of the country for highway construction from an engineering point of view.

5 and 6. The subject has been discussed tentatively with the province, but not finally.

7. None.

Mr. POWER:

For a copy of all papers, correspondence and other documents referring to the promotion of Mr. Arthur Lovett to the position of inspector of customs at Halifax, in August, 1925.

PENITENTIARIES—RULES AND REGULATIONS

Mr. SPENCER (for Miss Macphail):

For a copy of the rules and regulations governing officers of the penitentiaries.

BRANTFORD PUBLIC BUILDINGS—EMPLOYEES

Mr. RYERSON:

For a copy of all letters, reports, rating sheets, decisions, memoranda and any other documents on the files of the Civil Service Commission, Department of Public Works, or any other department of the government, relating to the appointment of a heating engineer, grade 2, advertised March 20, 1928, and the appointment of an engineer caretaker in May, 1929, for public buildings, Brantford, Ontario.

RETURNED SOLDIERS' INSURANCE ACT

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR RECEIVING APPLICATIONS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved that the time for receiving applications for insurance under the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act be extended for one year from the 31st August, 1929.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE PROSECUTIONS —MR. HARRY BRONFMAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I desire to answer a question which was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). The Department of National Revenue transmitted to the Depart of Justice the findings of the Customs commission in a number of cases, and upon consideration of the same, proceedings were instituted by the Department of Justice, but in the case of Harry Bronfman the department reached the conclusion that while, as found by the commission, there might be a prima facie case on the facts, the crown was not in a position to make out a good case in law, and that opinion was expressed to the Department of National Revenue by the Deputy Minister of Justice.

NOVA SCOTIA COAT OF ARMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I should like to reply to a question put to me yesterday by the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) with reference to the return of correspondence laid before the House of Commons respecting the arms of Nova Scotia. The interpretation of the arms referred to in the Hon. Mr. Rhodes' letter of the 3rd instant, a copy of which was included in the return, was merely a coloured representation of the arms asked for by the province and a copy of such could not be supplied.

No correspondence has been exchanged with the premier or other officials of the province relative to this matter since the departmental despatch of the 15 instant.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I should like to state, in the absence of the hon. senior member for Halifax, that in his request of yesterday he asked that a certain letter, which was mentioned in the correspondence brought down but which was omitted from the return, should be furnished to the house.

Mr. RINFRET: The reply I just made bears on that very point. Premier Rhodes uses the word "interpretation" of the gentleman named in his letter, but the word "interpretation" refers not to a letter but to a coloured drawing of the arms, and a copy of this cannot be supplied. If the hon. member wishes to see the drawing, of course he will be welcomed in the department.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg your pardon. I just remembered the request.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Kaiser) was desirous of knowing when the report would be forthcoming that he asked for some time during the latter part of last month regarding certain live stock diseases. This entails a great deal of work on the part of my staff and they have been busy on it ever since. I am afraid it will be still another eight or ten days before the information is fully compiled.

PENSION PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Some time ago I asked the government if they would lay on the table order in council P.C. 8481, dated January 16, 1928, as referred to on page 223, volume 1, of the Auditor General's report. I have not yet received the order in council and I would like to know whether it will be brought down before the militia estimates are before us.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I will look into the matter and see if I can expedite the return.

INTEREST ON REFUNDS OF TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Has the government under consideration the question of the payment of interest on refunds, such as excise tax, made by the government?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): A considerable lobby has been carried on for that purpose, but we have not yet seriously considered the matter.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 278 to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Mr. I. D. MACDOUGALL (Inverness): I wish to move in amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-West Cape Breton (Mr. Macdonald):

That all the words in the motion after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"In the opinion of this house the application of the sales tax in respect of personal clothing and boots and shoes places a heavy and unnecessary burden upon the people of Canada and should be discontinued forthwith."

No extended argument is required to establish the merit and justice of the amendment which I have just submitted to the house. The sales tax was distinctly a war measure. When first adopted in 1919, it could be justified. At that time Canada was just emerging from the world war. For four years this country had given unstintingly of its man power and financial resources in that great struggle. The obligations arising out of the war were colossal in their nature. Under the circumstances, ordinary methods of raising revenue were not sufficient; extraordinary means had to be resorted to, and the sales tax was one such extraordinary method. But to-day the scene has changed; the circumstances are entirely different. The fiscal year under review records abounding revenues and the Minister of Finance was able to tell the house of a surplus of $69,000,000 in national bookkeeping. Eleven years have elapsed since the consummation of peace. To-day our land, and I use that word in its broad economic sense, our labour, our capital, the creative genius of our people, are all alike devoted to the pursuits of peace, and under these entirely different circumstances, Mr. Speaker, the sales tax, which was distinctly a war measure, now lingers superfluous on the stage of national finance and in my judgment should be completely abolished.

But in this amendment I do not ask for its complete abolition, and for this reason: When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) presented his budget to parliament he told us that out of the $69,000,000 of surplus, some $40,000,000 would have to be earmarked to retire maturing obligations. The revenue derived from the sales tax during the last fiscal year totalled $71,000,000, and were I to move at this time for its complete abolition the Minister of Finance might well reply that complete abolition would interfere with plans that he had for the retirement of maturing obligations. I have consequently in my amendment limited the abolition of the sales tax to boots and shoes and clothing, a source from which only about $7,000,000 of revenue is derived, and derived from commodities which enter directly into the family budget of the poor people of this country. Whatever argument my hon. friend the Minister of Finance might make against complete abolition of the sales tax at this time, there is no semblance nor shadow of an excuse for not abolishing it in respect to the commodities which I have mentioned in my amendment—commodities which as I have said enter directly into the family budget of the poor people of this country.

In the matter of levying taxes and of remitting taxes every government must be guided by some canon of taxation, and what better canon could this or any other government adopt than the canon of human welfare? What more just than where taxes are levied the strongest backs should bear the heaviest burdens and those who are best able to pay should pay the most? In the matter of remitting taxation and giving relief to the taxpayers, what more equitable than that relief should be given first to those people in our country who most urgently need relief. Under the amendment which I have proposed the beneficiaries will be our farmers, our fishermen, our miners, our lumbermen, the artisans and common labourers of Canada. All I ask this house to do is to relieve those classes of our population of a burden of taxation amounting to some $7,000,000. All I ask this house to do is to join with me in attempting to reduce the cost of living of the masses and correspondingly increase their standard of living.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has presented to parliament a rich man's budget. It is my privilege to-day to move a poor man's amendment to a rich man's budget, and I move that amendment with the confident expectation that it will be given the sympathetic support of every hon. member of this house, irrespective of party, who wishes to bring a little more of comfort and happiness into the homes and a little more of cheer and encouragement into the hearts of the great masses of the people.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): The resolution before you, Mr. Speaker, is that the bill be now read a third time. That bill provides for a reduction of taxation amounting to over $20,000,000, and my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) moves an amendment which I have not before me, but happily we have two years' notice of it because it is exactly the same amendment as moved by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in 1927, namely, that all the words after the word "that" be struck out and other words substituted.

Now if that means anything it means that the house will reject the reduction of taxation as presented in the budget of $22,000,000 and will not be declaring for a policy such as was presented in the amendment which was moved to the budget by my hon. friend from South Wellington, speaking for the opposition—a policy of protection and the safeguarding of industry. When the budget was under discussion the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite all indicated, not a desire to help the poor man, not a desire to reduce taxation, but a desire to impose indirect taxation because every hon. gentleman opposite will admit that protection is in a measure indirect taxation. To-day we have the issue put straight before us. We have before us to-day an amendment which proposes to reduce direct taxation. The amendment goes still further. It proposes to wipe out altogether the reduction of $22,000,000 in taxation as provided for in the budget and declares for a policy which, after all, is a policy of direct taxation. It is interesting to consider just how the various elements in this house will regard the amendment. I can quite understand that my hon. friends opposite who seek to impose indirect taxation would support a policy of reducing direct taxation, but I cannot see how some parts of the country that favour a policy of direct taxation could support the amendment.

I admit at once that the sales tax is a direct tax. In that regard it is similar to the income tax, which everyone will admit is a direct tax. If anybody has any doubt as to who pays the sales tax as collected by the retail merchants, because in the last analysis it is the retail merchant who collects the sales tax, and if anybody has any doubt as to who pays the income tax, all they have to do is to consult the circulars that are being sent out at this time by the electric power and light companies in the province of Quebec, who say to their customers: If the government would only reduce the income tax, we should be able to reduce to you the cost of light and power. Now if the electric power and light companies in the province of Quebec are right in that contention—I am not going to discuss that for the moment—then I ask this house who pays the income tax which the government imposes upon corporations, great transportation companies, the big life and fire insurance companies and the banks of this country? And, remember, the larger portion of the income tax, which is a direct tax, comes from the corporations. So I submit that the policy of my hon. friends opposite is a policy of increasing indirect taxation, while making a gesture that they are in favour of reducing direct taxation. I said a moment ago that after all it is the consumer who pays this tax.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROBB: I notice my hon. friend in the corner applauds that remark. Now, if we accept this amendment, what do we do? At once we declare that we are not in favour of the reductions in taxation, amounting to over $22,000,000, provided for in the budget.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh no.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, that is what it means.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It will take something more.

Mr. ROBB: But we go further. If hon. gentlemen are right in saying this would not be the effect of the amendment, then we impose upon the treasury the same obligation that was imposed upon it in 1920 when the luxury tax was wiped out. On that occasion certain automobile dealers throughout Canada contended that they had paid the tax and therefore it should be refunded to them. This parliament recognized the reasonableness of their contention and provided in the estimates for a refund, which totalled $1,699,464.

Mr. BENNETT: Does that include interest?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. My hon. friend who has moved this amendment claims that the amount involved will be $7,000,000. Now, I have before me a statement from the Retail Merchants' Association—I will quote it in a moment—claiming that a considerable part of the tax in the year referred to was paid in advance, I think about one third. It is reasonable to suppose that if they were right then they are right to-day, and that one third of the tax has already been paid. It has been assessed by the manufacturer on the wholesaler, and by him passed on to the retailer who has the goods on his shelves. He has paid this tax. If the amendment is carried, not only do we wipe out the budget provision for the reduction of $22,000,000 in taxation, but we also invite a further raid on the treasury for one third of the $7,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister permit me? If that argument is sound, does it not apply to the reduction in the sales tax that he has made this year and last year?

Mr. ROBB: No. I am glad my hon. friend has raised that issue, because it gives me the opportunity of bringing to the attention of the house what the people who collect this tax directly from the consumer think of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite and the policy of the government. In December of 1926 my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), speaking of the sales tax, used these words:

How are we going to get relief from this oppressive taxation? The method I propose is boldly to strike out and do away with the sales tax.

Apparently that speech was brought to the attention of the Retail Merchants Association of Canada. The secretary of the association directed to the Prime Minister this letter, dated December 15, 1926:

To the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister and President of the Council.

Dear Sir,—We would call to your attention the following statement made by the Hon. Mr. Guthrie, leader of the opposition, in his reply to the address from the throne, delivered on Monday, December 13, 1926, and reported on page 25 of Hansard of that date as follows:

Then they quote the passage that I have just cited.

We cannot find any reply in your address to this statement, and as this is a matter which very vitally concerns every retail merchant in Canada, and more particularly the merchant than the manufacturer, we would like to refer to this statement.

The retail merchants ultimately pay the sales tax and not the manufacturer as the manufacturer simply hands the sales tax on to the merchants who are carrying the stock. The manufacturer does not pay the sales tax until the goods have been sold or invoiced to the purchaser.

If there was approximately $90,000,000 collected in sales tax last year, and the average turnover of the class of merchandise by the merchants on which the sales tax has been paid is four times a year, which we believe is very much higher than the average turnover would be found to be, as while groceries are turned from ten to twelve and even a greater number of times per year, clothing and wearing apparel, in most instances, are not turned in excess of three times and some of the other lines of merchandise even less, but even taking the turnover at a maximum of four times, the merchants must have merchandise in stock to-day on which they have paid a sales tax in advance to the government in excess of $22,500,000.

We do not believe that the government could do away with this amount of revenue in one year, and we are certain that the merchants in Canada could not afford to take this loss, most of the merchants still holding that the gradual reduction of the tax, as set out in the resolution, would be preferable to its total removal at one time.

The Retail Merchants Association of Canada.
Per N. B. Douglas, Secretary-Manager.

That is the point of view of the men in the trade who collect this tax for the government. I submit to my hon. friends that in presenting this amendment they are doing no kindness to the many retail merchants throughout the country who have already paid this sales tax in part on the goods on their shelves. Just as sure as we are in this chamber, if this amendment is adopted we will again have before us claims similar to those made by the automobile dealers.

I submit to hon. gentlemen that the policy of the government in gradually reducing both debt and taxation is a sound and sane policy. My hon. friends opposite have frequently referred to the position of the finances of the country. We are glad to have it acknowledged from all sides that Canada to-day is in a good financial condition. The mover of this amendment has said that the sales tax was a war measure. True, the war is over, but the war debt has not yet been paid; the country still has obligations to meet in this respect. We are gradually reducing those obligations. We say to parliament frankly, we are budgeting to take care of maturities as they come along. We propose to take care of those maturities from now until 1933. We are budgeting for that purpose, and I submit to hon. gentlemen, and especially to my hon. friends who are in favour of direct taxation, that the country will prefer the policy of the government in gradually reducing taxes to the resolution as presented by my hon. friend, which I am sure he does not expect to carry. All he wants to do is to be able to say that a hard hearted Minister of Finance refused to accept this proposed reduction of taxation. I submit to him that the orderly method of the government in reducing our debts and taxation is more acceptable to the country than the abrupt wiping out of a tax that will create embarrassment to the retail merchants throughout the country.

SUPPLY—IMMIGRATION POLICY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 21, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of supply.

[Mr. Maloney.]

Mr. A. D. McRAE (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring to the attention of the country what I believe to be its greatest problem. I refer to immigration and colonization. In order to do this I will move an amendment to the motion to go into supply.

The ominous silence on this subject which has prevailed on the government side of the house this session—uninterrupted but for the speech of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) in March last— indicates that the government has decided to permit the hon. minister to continue to muddle along. His speech breathed an atmosphere of satisfaction, which must be discouraging to those throughout the Dominion who have been endeavouring to goad the government into action. The minister in his speech, as reported in Hansard, said:

> Everything seems to point to the fact that things seem to be going fairly well with us.

Again he says:

> Perhaps we have about reached the point where we can absorb the stream of immigration now flowing in. That means that as the country develops and capital increases, there would be an increase in population and under normal circumstances we will be able to absorb more immigrants.

This statement, Mr. Speaker, means, if it means anything, that his government is content with the situation as it stands, and that no special effort will be made to improve the present unsatisfactory immigration.

What is this movement that so satisfies the minister? He says that for the last calendar year we received 166,782 immigrants, but I prefer to deal with the fiscal year as shown in the recent report of his department. These monthly reports do not check with the official annual reports of the department; invariably they leave too favorable an impression and are apparently issued to soothe the troubled feelings of those Canadians who are becoming impatient with the government's inaction in this matter. As a a matter of fact, taking our official immigration reports for a number of years, they do not hold out; ever since the inception of the department, they have been inaccurate and misleading. If we take the returns for the last 45 years, including the natural annual increase estimated at 2¼ per cent, we find we should now have in the country about seventeen million people. We are short seven millions at least.

Let us accept the minister's return for the last fiscal year as accurate. It shows an immigration of 151,597, or an increase of 7,606 over the previous fiscal year. Is such an infinitesimal increase satisfactory to the country, even if correct? What are the facts? We find the annual report of the department since 1924 contains a new schedule, headed "Returned Canadians", not included in the immigration figures. Evidently this schedule is inserted by the government in an effort to minimize the effect of the serious movement of Canadians to the United States. In the year 1927 it shows 56,957 Canadians, who came back to Canada to live. In 1928 the number was reduced to 39,887, which, even if accurate, equals only about one-half the Canadians who left our Dominion for the United States last year. However, taking this new schedule for the past two years, there is a decrease of 17,070 last year as compared with the previous year. Deduct from this, the reported increase for last year, already referred to as 7,606, and there remains a net loss in our immigration last year, compared with the year before, of 9,464. This is a decline of 6 per cent and not an increase as we have been led to believe, and estimates of our immigration for 1929 by those who ought to know predict a further falling off this year of 25 per cent. A British report published in March states that after allowance was made for the harvesters who returned, British migration to Canada last year fell off about 6,000, and this is the result which the minister thinks is "doing fairly well."

The minister says that the immigration we received last year constituted a better record than for some of the preceding years, when we had over 400,000 annually. What do the records of his department show? In the five years in which immigration returns have been most discussed, that is 1910 to 1914 inclusive, when we reached the enormous total of over 400,000 in a single year, 38 per cent were from Britain, in our largest year, 1913, over 37 per cent came from the British Isles. Last year, with the immigration about one-third as large, only 34 per cent came from Britain. This, I submit, Mr. Speaker, does not justify the minister's conclusion.

The report for the past year refers to the establishment of the overseas medical examination, both in Great Britain and on the continent. Notwithstanding all the trouble and expense this has occasioned, it is worthy of note that of a total of 2,205 immigrants who were either deported after having been admitted, or were rejected on arrival at ocean ports, 1,256 were British. That is, while only 34 per cent of our immigration came from Great Britain, 57 per cent of our rejections were British. Such figures furnish their own interpretation. Our immigration is back where it was in the early years of the century, over a generation ago. With all our increased business as evidenced by our trade returns, and with a largely undeveloped country, capable of supporting comfortably at least a population of fifty millions, are Canadians to be content with the present stagnation?

The minister says capital and immigration are closely allied; this may be granted, but with our capital increasing by hundreds of millions, why has the increase of our population failed to keep pace with our financial development, as apparently the minister thinks it should? In his speech this year and also last year, the Minister of Immigration and Colonization complained of the criticism of his department; in referring to the discussions which occurred throughout the country on this question of immigration, he said:

> "The difficulty that I experience, however, is that there does not seem to be any unanimity in regard to this question."

In reply to the question of the late hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) as to what was his idea, the minister said:

> "I have not yet heard from the member for Frontenac any well-defined policy of immigration."

Well, Mr. Speaker, who is the responsible Minister of Immigration and Colonization? Certainly it was not the late member for Frontenac. Has the minister any definite plan? Of course he has not; his department is as barren of ideas as the sands of the Sahara are barren of farms.

The minister has a big staff, a deputy, an assistant deputy and four commissioners in Canada, and a director and an assistant in London. If all are accurately accounted for, it is said the staff of his department will total 1,000. I am reliably informed that 86 per cent of our colonists come to us through the solicitation of the various outside agencies at work. If so, then less than 15 per cent of those we receive are in any sense the result of the direct solicitation of our Department of Immigration and Colonization. We may well ask the minister what he is doing with this huge staff for which we vote on the average $3,250,000 a year. The opinion of these agencies which are struggling to work through and under the orders of his department can be summed up in the suggestion I heard from one of them a few days ago, that we should change the name of our Department of Immigration and Colonization to the department of interference and confusion.

There is little evidence that the other members of the government are concerning themselves with the minister's dilemma; the right hon. Prime Minister himself does not appear to be much concerned. I think I might say, Mr. Speaker, he usually talks about the things that interest him, but he is very silent on this subject.

Last year, in response to the minister's request, I made bold to submit to this house a definite colonization program, but owing to an accident I was unable to appear before the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization. To-day, I am prepared to support that program in its entirety; I believe it is practical, conservative and not beyond the ability of Canadians to put into effect. It was a program for the whole of Canada; every province would benefit, more particularly in the west where the settlement of the vacant lands adjacent to our railways is so essential. My colleagues sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker, will discuss the problem with reference to the settlement of their provinces.

I wish, however, to refer to-day to the potentialities and the development of the great Peace river district; that was the part of my proposal last year most vigorously criticized by the government. Having that criticism in mind I took occasion last fall to make my third trip to the Peace river country, this time far off the beaten trail. Peace River cannot be seen on a parliamentary pass; railways and motor cars afford facilities for a very limited view of this vast country. The Minister of Colonization was there last fall, on a bit of a joy ride with the Edmonton Board of Trade. I concur in his endorsement of that section of the country. I was requested by the settlers at Fort St. John to express to him their great disappointment that although he had spent the night on the flats, 1,100 feet below their great plain above, his time did not permit him to take a personal view of their magnificent country.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member knows the reason why.

Mr. McRAE: No, I do not; it is quite a walk.

Mr. FORKE: I would have had to walk.

Mr. McRAE: I walked 100 miles.

Mr. FORKE: You are a young fellow.

Mr. McRAE: I did not see the Peace River district that way. I spent over a month there, travelling by boat, pack horses and on foot about 1,500 miles, mostly in the districts away from settlement, in an endeavour to learn through first-hand information the extent and character of the country, the fertility of its soil, and its ability to support an agricultural population. During this time I interviewed between 250 and 300 merchants, traders, trappers, natives and old-timers who were supposed to know the country. By comparing the information they gave me on the country I had not seen, with their judgment of the country I had just passed through, I have arrived at what I believe to be reasonably sound conclusions. The district is so extensive that it would take years for an individual to cover it all.

On my return, to reinforce my conclusions, I spent some weeks reading the many reports of the district which are on record. I want to take this opportunity of expressing my appreciation of the splendid assistance I received from the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and especially from the Natural Resources branch in charge of Mr. Lynch. They went to no end of trouble to place at my disposal all the reports on file with the government. These reports present a romance which I believe cannot be equalled in the history of any other section of the Dominion.

It begins with the discovery by Alexander Mackenzie in 1789 of the great river which bears his name—a river which drains a larger area than the St. Lawrence with all its great lakes and tributaries. This statement should give hon. members some idea of the vastness of our great empire in the north. I have not the time to note all the great explorers who followed Mackenzie, but it is worth mentioning that history records Daniel William Harmon of the Northwest Company, who in 1808—over 120 years ago—reported the country as capable of growing wheat. He says he finished cutting his barley on July 21 that year.

Then we have Sir John Franklin, 1827, expressing great enthusiasm over the fertility of the district.

Sir George Simpson, in 1828, and Sir John Richardson in 1857 both said that wheat could be grown as far north as the 58th parallel of latitude, which is approximately Fort Vermilion.

Professor Macoun in 1878, spoke of the splendid wheat grown at Chipewyan, latitude 58·70. This was grown by the Roman Catholic mission, which in 1876 won first prize at the Centennial exposition at Philadelphia.

Coming along, we find the reports of Ogilvie in 1877-78, in which he says that the country is suitable for wheat and actually reports a yield of 41 bushels per acre. And again, in 1884 he estimates the land available for agriculture as a district 600 miles long by 40 miles wide. Not a small vision for half a century ago.

Then we have the reports of the special senate committees, the first in 1888, the second and the most valuable of all, in 1907.

Time does not permit me to dwell on the dozens of reports which make up the history of this great district. Is it any wonder that the Peace River country now attracts so much attention? It attracted more attention one hundred years ago than the now settled sections of the prairie provinces. The present enthusiasm is no accident. It has been built up on the story of the achievements of a great race of explorers and hardy pioneers, extending over the last one hundred and forty years.

It fell to the lot of my old friend, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) who I notice is not in his seat, to throw doubt on my proposals of last session. I was somewhat surprised at the levity with which he approached the subject. However, as regards his witticisms, I think we on this side of the house are sometimes too harsh with him. After all, perhaps he agrees with Harry Lauder who says, "If you can even laugh at 70, you're lucky." I propose to take up in detail the points disputed by the hon. Minister of Agriculture last session. The agricultural section of the Peace River country extends from the foothills in British Columbia on the west four hundred miles to the Athabaska and Slave rivers on the east. The abruptness in the change from the alluvial deposit on the west side of the Athabaska and Slave rivers to the rock formation on the east side is a phenomenon as true as it is unusual.

Beginning at the 55th parallel of latitude, this plain extends far to the north. In my opinion the northern limit of successful wheat growing at present is about the 61st parallel of latitude. This gives us a distance north and south of four hundred miles. In suggesting the 61st parallel as a northern limit for successful wheat growing to-day, hon. members should keep in mind that Mr. Elihu Stewart when before the senate committee in 1907 reported wheat as being successfully grown at Fort Providence, which is at 61.25, and further, that he had seen it there in the milk on July 15th, fifty-six days after planting.

Henry A. Conroy in his evidence before the same committee says wheat was ripe at Fort Providence on August 1st.

Fort Liard, about the same latitude in British Columbia, has a milder climate. Here the Hudson's Bay Company records, as well as Macoun's reports, show wheat to have been successfully grown many years ago.

These conditions existed over 20 years ago. The improvement which has been made in the maturity of wheat in the interval has shortened the time not less than two weeks. This leaves no doubt of the successful growing of wheat as far north as 61 north latitude.

I estimate the area suitable for agriculture in the Peace River country as 400 miles square being 160,000 square miles and containing roughly 100 million acres.

It is rather interesting to note that this estimate, which includes the northeast corner of British Columbia, is the same as that given by W. F. Breden before the special senate committee in 1907 for Alberta alone, north of the 55th parallel.

In further support of my estimate I refer hon. members to the government map of 1910 which has one of the wheat growing provinces of Russia,—Tobolsk,—superimposed in the correct latitude in the Peace River district. It shows Tobolsk, the capital, a city with 20,000 population in 1906, to be on the exact latitude of Fort Vermilion. Tobolsk province had a population in 1906 of 1,656,000 and their wheat crop in 1907 was 11,779,000 bushels. Following the same idea, I have had a map prepared showing Finland similarly superimposed. Hon. members will be surprised to know that the extreme southern boundary of Finland is latitude 60 and Finland's largest city, Helsingfors, with a population of 215,800, is in the same latitude as Fort Liard. Finland with an area of 133,000 square miles, practically all north of our Peace River district and smaller in area, had a population in 1926 of 3,558,000, an average of 26 people to the square mile. Among the exports of the republic of Finland in 1926 was one item of 106 million dollars for food obtained from animals. Finland cannot successfully grow wheat but does grow large crops of rye, oats, barley and the like.

I have also prepared a map showing in a general way the location of the agricultural land in the Peace River district. With your kind permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to table, for the information of the hon. members of the house, the three maps to which I have referred.

It is my opinion that, when Canada has a population of 50,000,000, as I believe it will have, parliament will still be engaged in considering the development of districts as yet not in our calculations.

I am very familiar, Mr. Speaker, with the agricultural areas of North America, and I say to hon. members that in no other part of this continent is there such an extensive area of uniformly good land as in the Peace River district. It was originally, so geologists say, the bottom of a great lake. The soil is an alluvial deposit of great depth, free from stone. Some idea of the character of the soil may be obtained from the fact that the Peace River has worn itself down from the plain above a depth of 1,000 feet at St. John—where the minister was not able to walk up, and I do not blame him very much—and 700 feet at Peace River crossing.

As to the percentage of the 100,000,000 acres available for agriculture, probably 10 per cent should be allowed for land covered by water. In many districts there is no waste at all. A conservative estimate is 75,000,000 acres of good agricultural land. Hon. members will note that this is 50 per cent more than the acreage I assumed in my proposal of last year. Seventy-five million acres means 468,000 homesteads of 160 acres each. As the Peace River district is preeminently a grain country, short seasons make it imperative that the work for the coming year's crop be done during the summer months. This will undoubtedly result in the average farm being much larger than the original homestead. Half a section would be the ideal farm. The average farm, however, will probably be about 240 acres. This means that homes could be found in the Peace River district for at least 300,000 farmers or a rural population of 1,500,000.

The census records for 1926 show that in the province of Saskatchewan 70 per cent of the population is rural and 30 per cent urban. On this basis, 1,500,000 rural population will support an urban population of 650,000. This makes the entire population which I estimate the Peace River district alone would support, 2,150,000. The population of the three prairie provinces in 1926 was 2,067,000, so that my claim last year that the development of Peace River would double the population of the west still holds good. Hon. members should keep in mind, however, that this great development would mean an increased population in other sections of Canada as well. The cities of Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver will all grow. It is difficult to arrive at a basis on which to estimate the development of these cities resulting from this rural development. I am inclined to think that the increase in population which would result outside Peace River would be as great as the Peace River development itself. If so, 2,000,000 people in Peace River would mean an addition of 2,000,000 to our population elsewhere, or 4,000,000 in all.

[Mr. McRae.]

Some such national development as I am proposing has to come about, if the boys and girls we are educating in our schools and colleges are to find opportunities in Canada. There is no other solution—we must grow in population, or we must continue to lose the best of our young Canadians. What can be done to bring about this development in our day and generation? That is the question which concerns the country.

Last year, I proposed what has been called "the wholesale clearing of land by the government." My plan contemplated clearing and breaking the easiest half of each homestead; the erection of the necessary log buildings from timber available on the ground; and the financing of this expenditure by the government, amortized over a period of 33 years, the first five years to be free from any repayment such as interest, principal or taxes.

This plan apparently did not meet with the approval of the government. I presume the Minister of Immigration and Colonization refers indirectly to this proposal in his speech this year, when he said:

> The amazing development that has taken place in western Canada did not come about by means of any great settlement scheme.

Mr. WARD: In the face of the crop we had last year, with an enormous surplus on our hands for which we have hardly any outlet, where does the hon. member hope to sell the tremendous increase in production from such a scheme as he mapped out last year and as, I presume, he has in mind at the present time?

Mr. McRAE: I presume the hon. member agrees that we must increase our population. My idea is that the only place where it can be increased is on the land. During the last forty years I have observed the development on this continent march from far south of the line up as far as it is now north of Edmonton. I have seen sections wear out as wheat growing land and come into diversified farming. I have no doubt that in the development which will come about in this country and which will take care of our ever-increasing population, the same process will follow as has followed in Kansas, Iowa, and even Minnesota where wheat is no longer the principal crop, although a little over twenty years ago it was practically the entire crop. This development will all take time; the wheat line will move gradually northward and as, after all, wheat is a world commodity, whether we grow 100,000,000 bushels more or less in Canada is not vital to the world situation. That, however, is a question which is open to discussion and which I am not going to deal with now because I have a good deal more to say on other subjects. There will be an opportunity later for the hon. member to deal with the matter.

The Minister of Agriculture, speaking for the government regarding my Peace River proposal last session, said:

> I know of no other such scheme since settlement first began on the north American continent.

Of course not! But why should our land settlement work not progress the same way as every other line of endeavor? Why should this, the greatest of all work,—the transplanting of people,—stand still for twenty-five years, when the whole world has made such progress? Would the hon. ministers have us return to the old reapers to harvest the western wheat crop? This would be in line with their colonization efforts.

During the amazing period of development to which the Minister of Immigration and Colonization refers, the railway companies owned millions of acres of agricultural land, large tracts of which they sold en bloc to land companies who greatly assisted them in their settlement work. Land taxes in those days were practically nothing; lands investment was attractive and thousands of non-resident purchasers became active colonization agents throughout this continent and Great Britain. To-day things are different. The railway companies have disposed of a great part of their lands. Owing to high taxes unimproved farm lands are no longer considered a desirable investment, and active land agents have largely disappeared.

Besides, the best of our districts awaiting settlement to-day are more or less covered with timber of varying density, from open parklike country, light brush or scrub, to the so-called timber land, little of it giving promise of ever becoming of commercial value so far as the timber is concerned. Peace River district is very fortunate. About 50 per cent of that country is what is termed park-like land, and of this at least half is open prairie. Our problem is to make this land available for settlers with the least cost and at the earliest posible date. I quote Hansard as to my exact proposal last year:

> Using modern methods, confining the clearing to the easiest half of each homestead, avoiding heavily timbered areas, and pro-rating the expense over the whole district, I estimate the cost on the whole would not exceed at the most $12.50 per acre.

Presumably criticizing this statement, the Minister of Agriculture said, and again I quote Hansard:

> Why, twice that amount of money will not clear off the heavy scrub lands in the northern parts of the prairie provinces.

It will be apparent to hon. members that we were not talking about the same thing at all. I wonder if the hon. Minister of Agriculture, with his usual political adroitness, hoped to get away with that sort of criticism. He was talking about heavy scrub, while I was talking about park-like country, that is, open prairie and light scrub. It just happens that I am in a position to prove to the Minister of Agriculture, from government reports on file, that even the kind of country he refers to can be cleared well under my estimate.

I said last year that the grub hoe and the axe, so far as clearing land is concerned, should be relics of the past. The hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization, speaking of the settlement in the west, states it was brought about by:

> ...people beginning in a small way, humbly adding to their belongings—bit by bit— until the whole country was transformed.

That was true in the old days, but holds good no longer. It is not in the national interest that they should make such slow progress, even if new settlers would be content to do so. I believe it is just as necessary for us to conserve our man-power as our money. It certainly is much more human to put the new settler on a partially prepared homestead, than to place him on scrub land where he must spend years of effort clearing it in the old way. This is not only an unnecessary waste of many years of his life, but in most cases results in breaking his heart before he gets on his feet. The men who will tackle such a proposition to-day are few and growing less.

The individual settler cannot afford even to consider purchasing the expensive equipment necessary to open up economically and rapidly the scrub lands which are practically the only lands now available for homesteads.

I found in the north many experienced men who support my estimate of the cost of clearing this park-like land. First, there were the government's own officers who estimate the park-like country in their district at between forty and fifty per cent and the cost of clearing and breaking it on the average $11.50 per acre. At Fort Vermilion the United Farmers estimated the park-like land in their district to be 50 per cent, which they say can be cleared and broken at $10 an acre. My estimate of $12.50 per acre they think too high.

Mr. Robert Jones, superintendent of the experimental farm at Fort Vermilion, also estimates the open park-like country at 50 per cent and gives $12 per acre as the outside figure for clearing and breaking. He says the land when cleared will be worth $25 an acre. There are many others. All these figures are based on the old out-of-date axe and grub hoe methods of clearing land.

I took occasion to investigate very carefully the experience of such brush cutting machines as I could find in action. At Grande Prairie a light 25 horse-power outfit had just finished clearing 30 acres for a Mr. Curtiss. It was considered very heavy clearing, poplars up to 6 and 7 inches in diameter and heavy willow.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At page 103 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, rule 314 reads:

> It is a rule in both houses of parliament that a member must address the house orally, and not read from a written, previously prepared speech, for the reason that if the practice of reading speeches should prevail, members might read speeches that were written by other people, and the time of the house be taken up in considering the arguments of persons who were not deserving of their attention.

I quite understand that in the first session of a new parliament there is always a generous interpretation of that rule. The members coming in are new to parliament, tenderfoots, many of them, and some consideration is shown to them, but I do not think the hon. member who is now reading his speech comes in that category. I understood that he was the leader of the people's party in the province of British Columbia, a party now defunct, I believe, but as leader he must have had a great deal of experience and so I do not think he should claim the privilege of a new member. Another point is that the hon. gentlemen in this particular case does not come within the forty minute rule. If the rules of this house are to be observed by hon. members, I do not know why we should discard rule 314 more than any other. I ask for your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: On the last point, the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. McRae) is in order in speaking beyond the forty minutes because he is moving an amendment under standing order 37.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I quite admit that, Mr. Speaker. I was simply pointing out that as he was not limited to forty minutes it was more important that he should observe the other rule as to not reading speeches; but I have seen the hon. gentleman read page after page. He is doing nothing but reading his speech.

Mr. STEVENS: How about the Minister of Finance reading his budget speech?

Mr. BENNETT: And the Prime Minister?

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course the hon. gentleman is entitled under rule 37 to speak beyond the forty minutes because he is making a motion of no confidence. As regards the other point, I have followed the hon. gentleman very closely and I have seen him refer occasionally to his notes, but I can conscientiously declare to the house that he has not been reading his speech all the time. He has been reading technical notes.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BENNETT: The ruling is not debatable. An appeal is the only thing that is in order if the hon. gentleman does not like the ruling.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I would—

An hon. MEMBER: Take a dose of castor oil.

Mr. BENNETT: There should be some observance of the rules, Mr. Speaker. I certainly think it is most objectionable after the Speaker has given a ruling that the house should not be bound by it. The traditions of this house are worth something. There is the right of appeal, if the hon. gentleman so desires.

Mr. SPEAKER: No remarks should be made upon a ruling after it has been given unless there is an appeal.

Mr. McRAE: I was referring, Mr Speaker—

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): To your notes.

Mr. McRAE: I was referring to the observations I had made with respect to the brush-cutting machine. Mr. Curtiss told me he cleared this land in three days, an average of 10 acres per day,—and it cost him $66.76 actual outlay to do the job, not including depreciation or capital investment. This is exactly $2.23 per acre. The burning he said cost him practically nothing. Curtiss estimated it would cost to break the land with this power outfit $2.50 per acre. Allowing $1 per acre for burning, the total cost for clearing and breaking would be somewhere around $6 per acre, not including depreciation.

The average cost of clearing land with the brush cutter in the Grande Prairie section was given to me as $2.77 an acre, which is 50 cents higher than the instance I have just quoted.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Was it seven inch poplar?

Mr. McRAE: There were six to seven inch poplars on the land. The whole thing including breaking would figure around $6 an acre. I decided to see the largest operators in this line of clearing in the west, so I visited Didsbury, Alberta, where I saw the Weber Brothers in action. They are no amateurs, having cleared about 6,500 acres in that district, and their experience on such a large acreage extending over several years is very interesting.

Weber Brothers keep accurate accounts. Their average cost for cutting, piling, burning and breaking somewhat over 6,000 acres is $6.50 per acre. This includes interest on the investment and depreciation, but no profit.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Were they selected lands?

Mr. McRAE: No, they were the residue of the lands in that district. When I was there in November they were on their last contract.

Weber's brush cutter cuts on an average 15 acres per day, at an outlay of $2.57 per acre, a trifle less than the experience at Grande Prairie, which is perhaps due to their using heavier equipment. They think on the average $3 per acre will include depreciation and upkeep, but not profit. His tractor also breaks 10 acres a day. By deep ploughing, ten or twelve inches, the stumps are successfully ploughed under, and as two crops are taken off before again plowing the land, the refuse largely disappears and there is little further trouble with it.

Weber says that heavier equipment would be advantageous and thinks a 100 horse-power brush cutting outfit would cut 25 acres a day, and do it for less money. Mr. Weber claimed this cleared land is much more productive than the open prairie in his district, which he accounted for by the fact that repeated prairie fires had more or less burnt off the humus. He states he is willing to take on a contract at any time to cut and burn the scrub at $6 per acre and would make good money. This would leave of my estimate of $12.50 per acre the sum of $6.50 per acre available for the breaking of the land. This I am sure the hon. Minister of Agriculture will agree is the top price for breaking, even in his old fashioned way, with horses.

I do not know if I have made this modern brush cutting operation clear to hon. members. So as to remove uncertainty and more particularly in the hopes of enlightening my hon. friends, the Minister of Immigration and Colonization and the Minister of Agriculture, as to present day methods, I have arranged for an exhibition. With your kind permission, Mr. Speaker, and with the assistance of the Motion Picture Bureau of the Department of Trade and Commerce, I have arranged to give in the railway committee room, at one o'clock next Wednesday, a moving picture of the modern brush cutter and breaking plough in action, followed by other pictures of the up-to-date farming appliances in use in the west. These explain how so few men take care of the ever increasing western crop. I hope all hon. members will attend. I have seen the picture and can guarantee that they will find it worth while.

I now direct the attention of hon. members, Mr. Speaker, to the opportunity we have to make a large number of farms immediately available for settlement in the Peace river district.

It would not require any great administrative ability to assemble and equip clearing units, which might be located at several points, in numbers sufficient to clear and make available along the lines I have indicated homes for at least 2,000 new settlers a year. The personnel of these units would in all not exceed 1,000 men. That is the equivalent of the strength of one battalion. During the war Canada maintained in France 100 battalions as a fighting force engaged in the work of destruction. Should we hesitate now, in peace, to maintain the equivalent of one battalion in the work of construction? We can increase this force as desired.

The clearing and breaking equipment required for the work would not exceed the cost of the guns for a single battery. I can seen no reason, Mr. Speaker, why we should not have the courage to tackle this proposition in a large way, particularly as it could be done under my plan without costing the treasury a dollar.

I have promised the hon. Minister of Agriculture that I would show him a way to clear the heavy scrub land, which he says will cost $25 an acre, for very much less than my mate of $12.50, to which he has taken strong exception. I refer to clearing land by controlled spring fires.

Through the kindness of the Minister of the Interior I have been furnished with a copy of the report, with before and after photographs attached, which clearly show the result of the experiment carried on by G. J. Lonergan, under the direction of the Surveyor General in May, 1919. This report is a very illuminating one and I commend it to all hon. members who are interested in the clearing of the great Peace River district in a comparatively few years.

I suggest to the government that, instead of keeping forest rangers fire-guarding useless forest reserves in that district, they put these men at the head of crews to burn sections of the country systematically in the spring, and to occupy themselves during the rest of the year providing fire-guards for the following spring's burning operations, and in protecting the country from fall fires, which are undoubtedly injurious to the land. This could be made a very much needed opportunity to furnish work for new settlers during certain periods each year when it would not interfere with their farming operations.

The report to the Surveyor General shows that allowing his men $7.50 per day—certainly sufficient—the cost of fire-guarding and burning a very considerable tract, approximately 6,000 acres, was only 10 cents an acre. The report says this acreage was the average scrub country of the north. This statement is borne out by the photographs. It was the same kind of land that the Minister of Agriculture was talking about last year. Lonergan estimated the cost of clearing before burning at $25 per acre. After the fire he estimated the cost of clearing what remained at $5.25 per acre —a reduction of 80 per cent. So by the expenditure of 10 cents an acre a saving of nearly $20 an acre was effected in the cost of clearing this heavy scrub land. The report shows clearly that this spring burning did not damage the soil in the slightest.

This report was endorsed by the officials of the Alberta government—of which the Minister of the Interior was then premier and who, it is said, had great faith in it—as well as by every member of the crew. This included a practical farmer, a resident of the district for about 40 years. Clearing by controlled spring fires is said to have been first advocated by the Association of Dominion Land Surveyors. The report in question was submitted to their annual meeting in 1920, and, I am informed, met with general approval.

[Mr. McRae.]

The spring fires are possible in the Peace River district as the great growth of grass of the previous year easily carries a hot fire early in the spring before the frost is out of the ground. With two or three burnings at the most, open prairie country results.

I made careful inquiry into this matter during my sojourn in the Peace River country last fall. Of the many men I interviewed on the subject, I did not find one who was not enthusiastic about it. Spring burning they all agreed was not injurious to the soil. All claimed it was the only way to clear up the country. This was endorsed by the government inspector at Peace River Crossing, who added that no damage would result from spring burning. I interviewed the United Farmers of Alberta at Fort Vermilion. They said it was the only way to clear the country.

Mr. Robert Jones, superintendent of the experimental farm there, a very conservative man indeed, supported this method of clearing. The Dawson board of trade held it was the only system and that two burnings would clear the district.

Perhaps the man who was most emphatic on the subject was Mr. W. D. Albright, superintendent of the experimental farm at Beaver Lodge, who said that spring burning is the only way; that it did not hurt the soil, that at most only two or three annual fires would be required to clear an area, and that with a systematic, aggressive policy the whole country could be cleared in from five to ten years.

I am sure the hon. member for Peace River, whom I visited last fall just as he was completing the clearing of a tract of land in the old-fashioned way, will agree with my statement that the proper way to clear the Peace River country is by controlled spring fires.

The cost under this plan would be very much less than my estimate for clearing with mechanical equipment, but the results would not be so immediate. Mechanical equipment should be depended on to provide for the first few years, then systematic spring burning. Beginning to prepare for it this fall would clear the land as fast as required, thus relieving us from most of that part of our expenditure. In a few years at most, open prairie, country fire cleared, would be available to take care of all our incoming settlers.

Once the country is opened up the so-called muskegs which, with an odd exception, are merely the alluvial soil of the country in depressions, covered with moss, will soon disappear and such land will be equal to the best in the district.

An opportunity to develop an area capable of supporting two million people, thus repeating the western development early in this century, is available to the government with sufficient courage to carry it out.

I proposed last year that the government issue land bonds against their expenditure on such a development. I gave as the maximum required $300,000,000 for a ten year program, an average of $30,000,000 per year. The hon. Minister of Agriculture in referring to my program, made reference to the loss in the soldier settlement scheme. Buying improved farms at top prices bears no resemblance whatever to partly developing what is undoubtedly better land at no cost for the land to begin with. The soldiers would indeed have been fortunate if some such scheme had been adopted in their case. The history of farm land values is always the same. In good districts, as settlement intensifies, prices move upward. It is the settler who gives the value to the land. This is emphasized by the sale of school lands by the province of Alberta in the Peace river district last year.

On July 16th last 36 pieces of raw school lands were sold in the Waterhole district by auction at an average price of $20.61 per acre, the highest price being $30 per acre.

At Berwyn, north of the Peace river, 50 pieces brought an average of $20.26 with the highest price $40 per acre. The hon. member for Peace River told me last fall that in his district private lands eleven miles from the railway had been sold as high as $25 per acre.

What gives these unimproved lands such values? The answer is—settlement, neighbours. We may expect even better results in the consolidated settlements I am proposing, especially with the improvements I suggest we make on the land.

When the settlement of a district is complete, a land value of $30 an acre would be in keeping with the present Peace River values. This means that the homesteader who gets a partially improved homestead for the amount spent on it by the government (which I estimated last year not to exceed $1,500) would not be long in seeing that at $30 per acre for his 160 acre homestead he would have a prospective value of $4,800, on which he would owe the government only $1,500. Such a substantial equity in his farm, particularly if, as in the case of the ordinary homesteads, a five-year residence is required, would be a great incentive for the new settler to stick it out, and few homesteaders would abandon their claims and lose their equity by moving into town; and anyway in that event others would be anxious to immediately take their place.

Under my proposal the government would be expending on the land about one-third of its value when surrounded by settlers. Reasonably administered, it should not be possible for the government to lose money in this work. Mortgages on improved farms for about half their value have constituted for years the safest security available on this continent and the experience of the government should not be different from the record of our great mortgage companies, who have made a specialty of farm loans.

It is probable that the maximum advance I have mentioned, namely $300,000,000, will never be reached, as repayments would probably assume proportions which would take care of advances long before the end of the ten-year period. I base this assumption on the fact that our federal government in the early colonization of Manitoba advanced $100,000 to the Mennonites, which was repaid in full with 6 per cent interest within six or seven years. There is no reason why the repayments of advances under this plan should not result in a revolving credit which could be continued indefinitely.

The opening up of Peace River district is a sound national development, even without any fixed settlement scheme. In undertaking it, there need be no worry about farmers to occupy the homesteads when semi-improved. In any event, preference must be given to our own people and more particularly to Canadians. We must look after our own boys first. Making available desirable farms, such as Peace River can offer, will do much to keep our Canadian boys on the farm and will offer them a real inducement to stay in Canada. Not a few labour men in the cities through the country, as a result of my discussion last year, have written me that they would welcome such an opportunity to get back to the land on a farm of their own.

Colonization is the major task before the government. I do not believe it can be delegated to a committee or commission with any hope of success. If for no other reason, the doors of approach to government officials at home or abroad would be barred against such a committee or commission. It would have no status abroad and is certain to be abused at home and probably would not be supported even by the government that created it. No, Mr. Speaker, this is the major problem before the country—the first and greatest responsibility of the government today. It cannot be sidestepped.

I suggest to the government that they overcome their chronic indecision on colonization matters and give us an exhibition of courage and confidence in the future by tackling this Peace River development in a big way and thus prove to an anxious public that we have still in the government of this country some of the vision and daring of our forefathers. As I said last year, Peace River offers the best opportunity in the British Empire to establish an adequate British migration scheme. Like many others deeply interested in such a movement, I am greatly discouraged with the feeble efforts in this respect which have emanated from the Department of Immigration and Colonization during the past year. They even offend our sense of responsibility in this important matter. Some of the British colonization schemes suggested during the year, with the best intentions in the world, were not only inadequate but unsound, and if carried into effect would have resulted in failure.

We must get down to stern realities in this business if we are to succeed. There is no royal road for successful farmers. Failures must—so far as possible—be eliminated in Great Britain. Ne'er-do-wells in England are even worse here, for, as a class, they lack the initiative essential to success in a pioneer country. In some way we must make the farms of Great Britain the clearing house for acceptable settlers under any successful British migration scheme. It is unreasonable to expect that three months in a so-called training farm in England can educate applicants, or, for that matter, enable the unqualified to be eliminated. In my judgment the proper training school for Britishers who want to become farmers in this Dominion is on the farms in Great Britain. During the war I saw Britishers, from the cities, built into great strong men, good workers and great soldiers—none better. Would not a year of work continuously on farms in Great Britain develop men into farmers capable of meeting Canadian pioneer settlement conditions?

The problem of migration and empire settlement is one of the first magnitude. Are Great Britain and Canada so bankrupt in statesmanship that under peace conditions we cannot, acting together, find the solution? Surely our statesmen are equal to successfully meeting a situation so vitally important to this Dominion and the future of our empire. It is no more complicated that many of those great international and domestic questions which were successfully solved by Canadian and overseas statesmen during the Great war.

The latest arrangement which the government has effected with the overseas settlement committee and the Labour department of Great Britain is for 6,000 trainees, men who have had a 90 day's sojourn on one of those kindergarten farms. Of these 6,000, 75 per cent must be taken from the distressed colliery areas and the remaining 25 per cent from other districts, preferably farmers. My information is that at least one-half the so-called farm settlers will not be farmers at all. Our government undertakes to distribute and find employment for them. I leave it for some of the Labour members of this house to ascertain how this is to be done, and I leave it to hon. members who came from the same island as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) to inquire why in this movement of 6,000, the Irish are absolutely barred. I am told "no Irish need apply;" evidently the Irish have been added to the government's so-called non-preferred class of immigrants. I also understand that the government has recently allotted to the railways the task of selecting 2,000 immigrants and to the Hudson's Bay Company 200, in all 2,200 immigrants, all untrained the same as last year's harvesters, 75 per cent from the distressed areas, and again the people from the Emerald Isle must pay a higher passage rate if they are to come to Canada, raised as I am informed from £2 to £10.

The Minister of Immigration and Colonization in his speech the other day, in answer to a question, estimated that only 30 per cent of the farm labourers coming in under the railway agreement remained on the land; this is a most unsatisfactory condition. Until there is a more all-round development of our resources there is little need for immigration to the cities; there are more than enough Canadians drifting from the rural communities to the urban centres to meet present requirements. An analysis of table 6 in the last annual report of the department is illuminating; it shows that of 151,597 immigrants, including men, women and children, only 83,316 or 55 per cent were of the so-called farming class, presumably destined for the land. Of the 45 per cent of our immigration which makes no pretense whatever of being farmers, over 13 per cent are classed as labourers, mechanics and miners. Then we have those coming under the railway agreement, including some 25,000 brought in by the government direct under special permit, of whom 70 per cent drift to the cities, according to the statement of the minister. This alone would aggregate 100,000 in the last two years, so the situation is infinitely worse than the records disclose. In fact, taking the minister's statement and applying it to the returns of his department, only one conclusion can be arrived at and that is that less than one-third of our immigrants stay on the land. Need we wonder that labour men generally are opposed to any immigration at all?

I do not wish to tire hon. members of this house with a further recital of the inefficiency and, may I say, hopelessness of the government in these matters. The situation is getting worse and worse as the years roll by. The sad part about all this business is the failure of the government to appreciate either its responsibilities or its opportunities, some of which I have endeavoured to place before the house.

In his speech for the government last session, the Minister of Agriculture said:

> Now, what are we ourselves doing in connection with Peace River development? Are we dong anything? To hear my good friends talk, one would imagine we are sitting comfortably here and merely wearing out our chairs from day to day.

Well, I fear the minister, who has been a swivel chair farmer for over a quarter of a century, is now becoming sensitive about it. I quite agree with this summary of his, as a true statement of their efforts. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization, in his speech last March, referring with some pride to the homestead entries for the past year, said:

> In the Grande Prairie and Peace River country, 5,216 homesteads were taken up, a gain of 450 per cent over the previous year.

The minister did not say to the house where he was placing these 5,000 new settlers; that part of the story was left for me to tell. Perhaps he does not know. I would feel derelict in my duty as a member of parliament if I did not call the attention of the house and of the country to the situation which will develop in Peace River if all these homesteaders move in this spring. The government, through its agents, encouraged these homesteaders to take up land in the Peace River district. Many of them have located so remote from settlements that there is not the slightest possibility of our government providing the necessary railway transportation to enable them to succeed, and, what is even more serious, they will be beyond the reach of the most modest requirements of rural life. The Minister of Agriculture in his speech last year, speaking of the Peace River, said:

> I admire the men who are hanging on. Possibly my admiration was inspired by the fact that I myself hung on for over 20 years, waiting for the railway.

Again he added:

> I may say the settlement that is taking place there is not settlement of the feeble-minded either but of strong, sturdy, vigorous men and women.

I can tell the minister they are not feeble-minded, unless their natural assumption and trusting faith that in this day and age a government which opens up land for homestead entry will provide the necessary transportation facilities to enable the settler to succeed can be so regarded. Because the minister waited 20 years for a railway in what is now a well-settled part of Canada is no reason why he should expect the pioneer settler in the Peace river country to waste 20 years of his time. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that so far as colonization work is concerned, the day to which the Minister of Agriculture referred with so much pride and satisfaction is past, gone forever, let us hope. I fear that he and the Minister of Immigration and Colonization are living in the past. This is the year 1929, not 1890. Certainly we have reached the point when governments should direct their colonization work so as to bring about consolidated settlement and thus ensure, within a reasonable time, the necessary railway facilities, schools, churches and the many other requisites of a successful settlement. The Minister did not tell the house that many of these homesteaders were located far beyond the reach of any railway likely to be built in our time, and that they will not have a ghost of a chance to succeed.

Let me tell hon. members just where some of these settlers are located. Suppose we begin in the northwest corner of the district, about 30 miles north of Fort St. John; from this point on to Fort St. John, many home-seekers have selected their new homes. Go directly south as the crow flies, in all about 100 miles, that is about 30 miles southwest of Dawson creek; in the very mouth of the Pine pass settlers, hoping for transportation that will not come in our day, have located The Dawson creek farmer is to-day paying 33 cents per bushel to have his grain trucked to railhead 60 or 70 miles east. Hon. members will understand the fate in store for the new settler 20 to 30 miles further away.

Then, all along the southern boundary of this great district until we reach Sturgeon lake, 60 miles east of Grande Prairie across the Smoky river, many homestead entries have been made more than 20 miles from probable railways. The new settler has located north of Lesser Slave lake, sixty miles west of Waterhole and about the same distance east of Fort St. John I saw a lone homesteader erecting his cabin in a district without roads or neighbours and with little prospect of enjoying either. There was evidence of entries here and there along the old Yukon trail to Fort St. John and beyond. Worst of all, however, is that splendid district beginning at Battle River, 40 miles north of the nearest railway station of Grimshaw; settlers straggle along 60 miles further north to the Keg river district and then 80 miles still further on to Fort Vermilion. Here the settlement is scattered both north and west 20 miles south at least and the settlement extends to that magnificent prairie country at the foot of the Buffalo hills 30 miles away from Fort Vermilion. On the east good surveyed townships attract the homesteader still further afield. The excellent crops I saw in this country had absolutely no market as they were 200 miles from a railway. At the Fort St. John end of the district some of the very small crop of 1927 is still unmarketed.

Almost to the four corners of this vast empire the government has permitted, yes even encouraged home-loving, land-hungry settlers to locate on land which for years must remain beyond the reach of transportation. It would take at least twelve branch lines, aggregating 1,000 miles, to put these settlers within the twenty miles of a railway which is to-day considered the maximum distance from transportation for successful farming. The government has provided for only sixty miles during the next five years. If all these 5,216 homesteaders to whom the Minister of Immigration and Colonization refers with so much pride were to comply with the homestead regulations and move into that country this spring with their wives and children, perhaps 20,000 in all, we would be responsible for a real misfortune. Already a great many settlers in that vast area are beyond the reach of transportation; beyond the reach of medical help and the other necessary facilities. Women and children die there for lack of medical attention. Either there is no doctor at all or the distance to a doctor is so great that the cost makes it impossible for the settler to properly care for the lives of his wife and children.

If evidence of this startling statement is necessary I would call the attention of the hon. members to the press despatches in January last which recited the heroic accomplishment of May and Warner, who flew from Edmonton to Fort Vermilion in January of this year, in a temperature 40 degrees below zero, with the antitoxin necessary to curb an epidemic among the 165 settlers I met there last fall. This is perhaps outstanding as one of the most heroic efforts ever attempted in medical relief work. The eyebrows were frozen off these flyers on their return trip to Edmonton.

Again the air service by its flight 220 miles north of Edmonton to the Pelican portage on the Athabaska river brought out a woman and saved her life. Unfortunately aeroplanes have not yet been brought into as common use as ambulances.

Is there any excuse for all this misplacing of immigrants? Surely there can be no justification for the government repeating the mistakes of the past and permitting innocent people to move into our north country without reasonable provision for their welfare and their success.

Under a proper, systematic plan for consolidated settlement, these 5,216 homesteaders could easily have been located in a block of land not to exceed fifty townships. This would be an area of roughly twenty-four miles wide and sixty-five miles long. A single railway through the centre of the block would place the most remote settler well within twenty miles of a station and would require from our railway companies the least capital outlay. In the past they frequently have had to build unprofitable branch lines through sparsely settled districts, but by following the march of consolidated settlement they would construct the minimum mileage, profitable from the start. In the natural order of events towns and villages would spring up; roads, schools, churches and the other essentials to successful settlement would follow almost immediately.

Mr. Speaker, we have long passed the time when any government should even permit, let alone encourage, this great waste of human effort, this total disregard for the welfare of our fellow men and women. I believe it is the bounden duty of the government to see that new settlers are so placed that they will have a reasonable chance of success, an opportunity to rear a family which will be a credit alike to themselves and to the nation. This, in my judgment, is in many instances impossible in the scattered settlements now permitted throughout the Peace River district.

I therefore offer the following amendment, seconded by Mr. Arthurs:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefore:

this house regrets the failure of the government to profit by Canadian experience in the colonization and settlement of the country and deplores the fact that men and women have, during recent months, been settled on western crown lands at great distances from transportation, educational, hospital and other necessary facilities, thereby making it almost impossible for them to achieve success and happiness in their new surroundings, and is of the opinion that such conditions can only be remedied by an immediate reorganization of the Department of Immigration and Colonization.

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at any great length and I hope to finish by six o'clock. Although I had some intimation that an amendment would be moved when the motion was made to go into supply on Immigration, I had no idea as to what line that amendment would take. One of the peculiarities of the Department of Immigration is that you have no idea from what quarter an attack is likely to come, it may come from one direction or it may come from another. You may be accused of flooding the country with immigrants or you may be charged with failing to obtain enough immigrants; so I was entirely at a loss to know just what the amendment would be. I was quite relieved when I heard the speech on the amendment, and I want to pay to the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) the compliment of saying that he always has something to offer; it is not a negative amendment, it has a plan and a scheme. Probably it is a product of the imagination; I am sure I could sit down and work out a very nice scheme under ideal conditions, dot the country with fine homesteads and have prosperous and happy people everywhere. It would make very nice reading and perhaps I would get on the front pages of the newspapers and they might say that I had some imagination and some foresight.

I have had forty years of pioneer life and I know something of the conditions which govern the success or failure of these people. I have no fault to find with the proposition which has been offered by the hon. member for North Vancouver and I do not intend at this time to criticize at any length the plan which he has put before the house. I do not believe that any government scheme involving the expenditure of many millions of dollars will in the end turn out to be successful.

In regard to immigration, as I said before, I have observed the people who succeed and the people who fail. I think the people who live on the prairies will bear me out when I say that quite a large percentage of those who started with open prairie under very favourable circumstances have failed and the duty of the Immigration department in connection with any scheme that is brought forward is to see that the immigrant has at least a fair chance of succeeding by not being loaded up with too heavy an overhead charge to commence with. I will repeat: I have more faith in the man succeeding who begins slowly as many of our immigrants have done. They have gone up into the northern part of the prairie provinces; they have built themselves log shanties where they have placed their wives and children, and they have gone out and worked by the day or by the month to earn a little money to start with. Then they have gone back to their homesteads; they have cleared them, and I can tell hon. members that those people, starting with practically nothing, in four or five years find themselves comfortably situated and with good homes. This is being and can be done if you have people who will buckle to and face the difficulties which they are likely to meet.

As regards the trip into the Peace River district, let me say this because I think the hon. member for North Vancouver thought I had lost heart right there at Taylor's Flats and that that was the reason why I had not gone up to Fort St. John. The real truth of the matter is that there was a tremendous downpour of rain and, excepting in the city of Winnipeg thirty or forty years ago, I had never encountered such slippery mud anywhere as on the banks of the Peace river. I walked two miles—

Mr. BENNETT: And went back three.

Mr. FORKE: That is the old schoolboy story we used to tell when we were late. The automobile in which I was riding refused to take the slope and I walked two miles down into the flats, expecting to meet the Hudson's Bay boat there at the river. When we arrived there, it was raining very hard and no boat was to be seen. There was no shelter but the woods where I spent the entire night while it rained heavily most of the time. Next morning a small boat came forty miles up the river and I went in that small open boat, on a very cold morning with heavy rain still falling and my spirits not at the highest, though I did not lose heart.

Mr. MANION: I am afraid my hon. friend is a temperance man getting lost in the woods at night.

Mr. FORKE: When I reached the boat about six o'clock in the morning I received a very hearty reception from the captain, and the first thing he did was to fetch a bottle of whiskey, put it on the table and say, "That will put you all right."

An hon. MEMBER: Did it?

Mr. FORKE: It was the temptation o my life.

Mr. STEVENS: Say when!

Mr. FORKE: I am very proud to be able to say that I withstood the temptation, got a good, hot cup of coffee and felt as well as one or two other gentlemen who applied the spirits.

Mr. McGIBBON: The hon. member did not climb the hill?

Mr. FORKE: No, I slipped over the hill. I saw a good many hundred miles of the Peace River district although I admit it was mostly in the settled portions. I have nothing but praise for what I saw. It was a revelation to me and I think I will repeat what I said in my speech on the budget, namely, that I was surprised to see the fields of waving wheat ripening in the sun at least ten days earlier than in the older parts of the prairie provinces. I suppose most of that ripening wheat was reaped before the frost did very much damage. The difficulty that I saw regarding the Peace River country was that of clearing the scrub and small trees which were growing on land that could be made available for homesteads. Of course a large portion of the country is covered with pretty heavy timber and it will take a great deal of work to clear it although something can be realized on the timber. I am quite in accord with what the hon. member for North Vancouver has said as to what can be done with steam power and ploughs in ploughing up scrub. I was very much surprised at the size of the trees that could be pulled down by one of those great ploughs with a strong motor pulling it, but at the same time I think $10 to $12 an acre is possibly too small an estimate for clearing the land.

It would take a good deal of time to analyse all the propositions that have been laid before the house by the hon. member for North Vancouver. He spoke about settling people in a close community and how many families you could place on so many square miles. Human nature being what it is, one cannot control these things as one would like to. He stated that the Department of immigration had allowed people to go into the Peace River district miles and miles away from the railway; in fact he said that was encouraged by the Department of Immigration. That is the only statement to which I am going to object. The Department of Immigration does not encourage people to go any distance away from a railway. I have always contended that no one can carry on successfully more than fifteen or twenty miles from a railway and I have never advised immigrants to go far away from one. I know people have been crossing the Peace river and going as far north as Fort Vermilion almost 100 miles or perhaps more from a railway. I am not very sure of the distances. There is no doubt that this is a mistake, but they are doing it and what can you do about it? They are free people; they can do as they like. They have the spirit of adventure and if they are making a mistake, they will find it out in the future. But that is what they do, and no department of immigration will prevent their doing it. The same thing occurred on the prairies; when good land could be secured near a railway, you would find people going twenty or thirty miles away just to find the piece of land they wanted at that particular time. The same thing will happen again and you cannot prevent people from doing this.

As regards immigration from the United Kingdom, that was mentioned by the hon. member for North Vancouver, that has been one of the difficulties during this year. We have been continually criticized on account of the lack of British immigrants. The fact of the matter is that there is no difficulty in getting all the British people we want of a certain type if the country could absorb and take care of them. It has been the duty of the department to see that so far as possible the supply of immigrants is not larger than the country can absorb. That is perhaps a little different from the criticism we hear all the time that we cannot get immigrants for the Dominion. I would not be afraid to flood this country with hundreds of thousands of people if we want to open the doors and allow all to come who really want to come, but the difficulty is to get the type of people we want who, we know, will succeed and do well for themselves and the Dominion.

Mr. McGIBBON: Why the difficulty?

Mr. FORKE: Because those people are not used to go on the land and suffer the hardships and the pioneering work necessary in commencing a new life in a new country. If we can work satisfactorily with the British government, no more of these people will come than we think can properly be taken care of, so that no idle people will be walking the streets and seeking employment if the department can possibly help it.

I want to say a few words in regard to the statistics quoted by my hon. friend from North Vancouver (Mr. McRae). He seemed to think that I had made a mistake. I used the figures in a little different way from what he did, but my figures are just as correct as his and hon. members can draw their own inferences. I have had some statistics made up in just a little different way. When immigrants enter this country they are entered by race as well as by country and I tried to ascertain how the 166,722 immigrants who came to Canada last year were made up according to race. The figures are as follows:

Racial origin	Number
British	75,581
Northwestern European	41,059
All others	51,082

It will be noticed that the British and northwestern European nations made up 116,640. This constitutes two-thirds of all the immigration that came to Canada last year. Some of these immigrants of the British race may have come from the United States or elsewhere than the British Isles, but they were all British people.

In the calendar year 1928, 54,709 people left Great Britain for Canada; 33,689 for Australia and New Zealand; 7,095 for South Africa; 13,489 for India and other parts of the empire. and 22,345 for the United States. More people came to Canada from Great Britain than to all the other dominions put together, and 32,364 more people came from Great Britain to Canada than to the United States.

Mr. ARTHURS: Do the figures the minister has given include the harvesters brought out last year?

Mr. FORKE: No. We do not include in any immigration figures more than the 2,000 harvesters who did not go back.

I would also point out that 78 per cent of Canada's population was born in Canada, 12 per cent in Great Britain, and 10 per cent in foreign countries. Surely in view of those figures there is no need for any great alarm on the part of those who are afraid that Canada is going to cease to be largely British and French in its population. I am not saying that to belittle in any way those immigrants who have come to Canada from other countries, because I believe that some day we are going to have a Canadian nationality that will conserve all that is brightest and best in British institutions, and perhaps those immigrants who are coming to our shores from other than British countries will be able to contribute something to our nationality.

The statistics of the department show that we have received 30,560 immigrants from the United States and 33,793 returning Canadians who made declarations that they intended to make their permanent home in Canada. That makes a total of 64,353. The figures I have from Washington of Canadians going to the United States is 57,330, showing a balance in favour of Canada of 7,023. I have some doubts in regard to this figure from Washington because I have seen it stated that the number was 70,000. As the house may know, we have no records in the Immigration department of Canadians who left for the United States, and we have to trust to the Bureau of Statistics in Washington, which is not always correct. It is difficult to get a correct figure of the number of Canadians who are leaving Canada. My hon. friend from Fort William quoted a figure around 73,000.

Mr. MANION: I have the figures here of the American authorities, and they show that last year 72,616 Canadians went to the United States.

Mr. FORKE: Those figures were compiled at the border, and they are just as liable to be wrong as right.

Mr. MANION: That is true of both sides of the line.

Mr. FORKE: It is not a correct figure, but we will let it go at that.

I should like to give the figures for 1924. Our immigration from all sources in that year was 148,560, but instead of 73,000 Canadians leaving this country for the United States, 159,058 Canadians left this country for the United States in that year. So surely the tide has turned and things are very much better than they were just a few years ago.

There is one point of view that I should like to put before the house in regard to the colonization of western Canada, which the hon. member for North Vancouver has brought up in his address to-day. It is a fallacy to suppose that the western provinces were colonized by the immigrants who came to this country. Most people seem to think that the great flow of immigrants to Canada colonized the western prairies. I know exactly what took place in Manitoba because I was there. Who can ever forget the long trains loaded with horses and cattle and implements coming from east of the great lakes and colonizing that western country? These were Canadian people. No doubt there was quite a sprinkling of British people too, and there was a colony of Mennonites which has done well, but in the main that western country was colonized by Canadian people from Ontario and the maritime provinces. It was not the big immigration that came to this country that colonized Manitoba; I know that. There was at that time a large immigration of foreign people into Canada; a great deal of railway building was going on and public works of all kinds were being undertaken, and these people did that labouring work. They came mostly from Europe; a large part of the money they earned was sent back to Europe, and when the era of railway construction ended these people returned to their own countries. That large immigration, therefore, was not at all the benefit that some people really think it was. It was a benefit in the sense that these people by their labour performed a service for the country, but it was not an immigration that was of permanent benefit to the country as a whole.

We are told that immigration is the supreme need of this Dominion. The whole argument of the hon. member for North Vancouver was that Canada needs a tremendously large immigration. I am not going to say that we do not need immigration; indeed, I should not be true to the position I occupy if I suggested such a thing. But there is this to be considered: will the population that is at present living in Canada gain by a tremendously increased immigration? Does anyone here think we shall all be wealthier and happier if we have a population of twenty millions instead of nine and a half millions? That is the thought I wish to suggest. Not that I am condemning the development of the country, but a large immigration does not necessarily mean that we shall be happier or more prosperous. Why has Canada come back so soon after the war compared with other countries that were engaged in it? Because we are a country of nine and a half million people, endowed with great natural resources, and we had something wonderful to fall back on. That is why Canada, with its sparse population and great natural resources, has recovered more rapidly than any other country.

Now, I am afraid I shall be quoted in the newspapers to-morrow morning as condemning immigration. I say we do not want immigration that we cannot take care of; we do not want immigration that will be a burden on the country. We do not want to bring here discontented people who will be unhappy in this country. We want people to come here who will enjoy our prosperity and who will themselves be prosperous. That has been the aim of the department since I have been at the head of it.

Statistics prove that the lack of immigrants has not been the trouble. Last year we absorbed 166,000 immigrants—and our population is only nine and half million. I am going to repeat what I said in my speech on the budget, that we are trying to absorb more people per capita than the United States ever attempted to absorb. When they absorbed 850,000 immigrants their population was at least 100,000,000. Unless you have some tremendous scheme such as that proposed by the hon. member for North Vancouver, I claim that 166,000 immigrants is no small number for a population of nine and half million to absorb and take care of without dislocating the whole economic system of the country. In the five years from 1910 to 1914 Canada attempted to absorb 1,761,425 immigrants. What happened? Canada suffered from indigestion, and a very small percentage of those people remained with us at the end of ten years. As I said before, the big era of railway building and expansion came to an end, and thereupon those immigrants left the country. It does not do the country any good for this to happen. It may help the transportation companies to bring in hundreds of thousands of immigrants, but when those immigrants do not stay in the country it damages our reputation.

In the past few years great changes have taken place. The wealthiest country in the world, the United States, is facing an unemployment problem. This is one of the paradoxes of modern time—a country the wealthiest in the world and enjoying unprecedented prosperity, and yet with a million and a quarter of its people unemployed. An hon. member speaking some little time ago complained that during the last twenty years this country has been standing still. Well, twenty years ago we were producing 100,000,000 bushels of wheat; last year, with practically the same population, we produced 500,000,000 bushels. That is the economic situation that we have to face. It is so easy to be critical in speaking of this question. It is when you are face to face with the situation that you realize the tremendous difficulties that must be overcome. To-day we have fewer hands engaged in industry, yet there is increase in production. This has brought about unemployment. In the United States the farm population has decreased five and a half million in twenty years. Canadians do not go to the United States to farm. Notwithstanding the great increase in urban population in the United States—and I want the house to pay attention to this—the United States farmer still exports as large a percentage of his produce as he did twenty years ago. He is still dependent upon the foreign market for the price of his goods. I hope those farmers across the line who think they are going to be helped by more protection will realize the fact that they are exporting just as large a percentage of their produce as they were twenty years ago, and that the price they will get for it will be the price which it brings on the foreign market.

There need be no anxiety for the future of this Dominion. We are the happiest and most prosperous people in the whole world at the present moment. Why all this criticism and discontent as if things were not satisfactory?

Mr. McGIBBON: You are speaking only for the government.

Mr. FORKE: I am speaking for every individual in Canada.

Mr. McGIBBON: No.

Mr. FORKE: I know there are no happier people anywhere than in this Dominion, no people who have better reason to be happy. I am not speaking from the political point of view. I am simply stating a fact, and I am sure anyone who considers the situation will admit it to be the fact. There need be no anxiety, I say, for the future of Canada. Development is taking place in all directions. Our business people are holding their own in industry, and we are exporting more per capita than any other country in the world. Why this despondency? The railways are prospering, reaching out into new districts and providing railway facilities for those people who were venturesome enough to settle in remote districts. In a word, optimism and hopefulness are abroad in the land. Immigrants will come to Canada, Mr. Speaker, I have an idea that in the not far distant future we shall have to take measures somewhat similar to those adopted by the United States to restrict the number of newcomers to the point where we can absorb them.

Mr. CLARK: When we get a new government that might be.

Mr. FORKE: I think you might call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FORKE: Since the house rose at six o'clock I happened to pick up the report of the oversea settlement committee in Great Britain, and I came across a few sentences which I shall read, because I fancy they will afford an answer to those who are under the impression that the British people do not appreciate the difficulty of getting their own population to migrate.

In their report for the year 1927 the settlement oversea committee enumerated some of the chief causes, partly political and partly economic, which prevent the more rapid distribution of population as between this country and the dominions, and particularly of those for whom state aid, or at any rate employment on arrival overseas, is essential. Chief among these are:

A. (In Great Britain)

1. The industrial habits and the townward bent of the general population and its consequent unwillingness, and, without training, unfitness, to take advantage of openings overseas (such openings as concern men, are for the most part in land work, and, for women in domestic work).

2. The upward tendency of the standard of living and comfort in Great Britain during the present generation.

That is rather a peculiar sentence and it is worth noting, because a great many people in Canada do not believe that there is a higher standard of living in Great Britain to-day than prior to the war.

As I have once before observed, the people have hard times in Great Britain and know destitution, but that is in spots, in the mining districts and among those engaged in trades whose workers have been thrown out of employment. This would be in large districts and would, of course, make for hardship. But the fact is that there is an upward tendency in the standard of living and of comfort in Great Britain during the present generation.

3. The cumulative effect of schemes of social insurance and especially of unemployment benefits. The effect of these schemes is probably greater than has hitherto been supposed, and it seems inevitable that they should tend to anchor population in this country and decrease its mobility.

4. The fact that Dominion governments have not hitherto seen their way to grant assisted passages to any except single men or families going to land work, single women going to domestic service, or nominated persons.

5. Although it is true that emigration may at times be stimulated by sheer necessity and want, it is clear that under modern conditions the population of this country is most ready to undertake the adventure of migration when it is prospering, and least ready to do so when it is faced with adversity. The spirit of successful migration is a spirit of buoyant optmist.

I have read this to show that the oversea land settlement committee, who have in hand the work of immigration, really understand the position in their own country; so that when we hear the department in Canada criticized, as throwing obstacles in the way of British immigration, I believe that these sentences which I have quoted will serve a useful purpose.

This afternoon we listened to the scheme enunciated by the hon. member for North Vancouver, and I shall make no attempt at the moment to criticize that scheme. It is so vast, it involves such a large sum of money, is so comprehensive and considerable in a great many ways, that I should have to analyse it very carefully before undertaking to criticize it. Being of a certain nationality, however, I must say that I have my doubts. Probably it will be remembered that last year when the committee on agriculture had under consideration the subject of immigration they made this recommendation:

> The committee having heard the evidence in connection with the experiment of the three thousand settlement scheme, now almost completed, recommends that time be given to test this form of land settlement before embarking upon extended schemes of this character.

Under the circumstances I do not think it would have been wise, even had it been thought practicable, for this department to undertake any land settlement scheme in view of that recommendation submitted last session. It was recommended by that committee that where the Department of Immigration could enter into tripartite agreements with the imperial and the provincial governments in connection with land settlement, such a course should be encouraged. We have made every endeavour to work in cooperation with the provinces in that way, but so far as the west is concerned nothing of a practical nature has been accomplished. They have taken the stand that the Dominion retains their natural resources, and until they possess those resources they are not prepared to enter into any scheme of land settlement. However, we have entered into a land settlement scheme with the province of New Brunswick, and I am happy to say that I believe it will work out very successfully. Under that scheme I believe it is intended to bring out about five hundred families in five or ten years.

Mr. BENNETT: Could the minister, without difficulty or inconvenience, give the details of that agreement up to the present?

Mr. FORKE: I would ask the leader of the opposition to excuse me; I have those details in my desk, and when my estimates are up I shall be glad to give them.

We have sought the cooperation of the provinces in immigration and land settlement and, in fact, in every way we have thought it possible to work together, because the provincial governments are in a position to know the requirements of the provinces perhaps much better than the Department of Immigration and Colonization can know them. Hon. members may remember the severe criticisms which were levelled at the Department of Immigration because to some extent we curtailed the immigration from central and southeastern Europe. Two very prominent gentlemen in Canada went to the newspapers and published articles about a column and a half in length criticizing the department for this policy and claiming that the country would suffer from a lack of labour during the coming summer. I think time has justified the stand I then took, when I said I thought I had a better estimate of what the country required with regard to labour than was possessed by either of these prominent gentlemen, who no doubt thought they were speaking in the best interests of the country. I had taken the opportunity during the summer of visiting the western provinces and discussing with the provincial governments their needs and requirements, and I came to the conclusion, as I have said already, that thirty per cent of the immigration from central and southeastern Europe would amply fill all the labour requirements during the summer. I may tell the house that during the last two or three weeks I have been just a little anxious over what was taking place in the west; I sent wires to the different large centres in the three western provinces just to keep in touch with the labour situation, and at times there has been a surplus of labour, with a large number of idle men looking for employment. I believe that condition now has disappeared; it occurs every spring just after the close of the winter work and before the summer work opens up. However, I am satisfied that the immigration has been quite sufficient to take care of all the labour requirements up to the present. It is a favourite saying of the railway companies that once you stop the stream of immigration it is very difficult to start it again, but I do not think we will find any difficulty in that regard. Whenever this country wants immigrants from Europe all we have to do is open the door and we will get them without trouble. The great difficulty will be in selecting the ones we really want.

Before I sit down I wish to pay a tribute to the voluntary societies which have been working on different immigration lines. The hon. member for North Vancouver stated that these societies had been doing perhaps the large part of the work in regard to immigration. I do not think that is true, although I recognize their services and am glad to have their assistance. At the same time, all that work is carried on under the Department of Immigration; we take the responsibility for all immigration and we see that the people who are brought in by these voluntary societies are of the right type, in addition to making sure that the societies take care of them after they have come to Canada. I have taken what I believe is the correct stand, that in the last analysis no matter who brings the immigrants to the country the Department of Immigration is responsible; consequently while I am in charge of this department I have no intention of letting my responsibility rest upon any other shoulders. Whether this work is carried on by the railway companies or by other voluntary societies I hold that all selections and examinations must be under the control of the Department of Immigration.

However, as I said before, I want to pay a tribute to the work which has been done by these societies. I believe the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in particular is doing very splendid work in this regard. That work may not always have been a success from a financial point of view, but while the land settlement work carried on by a large corporation such as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company may not be quite as profitable as it could be, still I believe they get their reward in many ways not available to colonization societies. We are ready and willing to assist these societies in every way and we will accept their assistance wherever it is possible for us to do so.

I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the house. I have already said that I have every faith in the future; I believe in Canada; I believe we will continue to prosper and grow day by day, and there is no doubt that the population will increase if the country prospers. It may be asked, what of the future? Who can tell what the population of Canada will be one hundred or five hundred years from now? We talk of Canada's destiny, but each generation will meet its own problems and to-day we cannot foresee what the years will bring. However, a responsibility rests upon this generation to see that the stream of humanity which mingles with the native population shall be of such a character that the highest and best traditions of the past shall be maintained and that Canada's influence in world affairs in the days to come may be for the "healing of the nations." I remember some words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which perhaps I may be permitted to quote. Speaking of Canada, he said:

> Her bark is on the ocean making for the harbour. I know not where that harbour will be, but it will be a safe harbour.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, at this late stage in the session I do not intend to take up very much of the time of the house, but I have given some study to this question and it is so important that I should like to make a few remarks. Before doing so I should like to congratulate the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) on the effort and energy, the time and probably the money, he has spent in making the thorough investigation which was indicated by his speech this afternoon. Whether or not the house agrees with him and his conclusions we must admit that he has devoted a great deal of time and effort to this difficult problem, and he deserves much credit for his work.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the whole question of immigration is in such an unsatisfactory state that regardless of any attempt at defence on the part of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) the opinion throughout the country is that the immigration policy of this government has been a complete failure. I do not intend to discuss it at length but I do wish to put on record some statistics; to a large extent my remarks will be a story of statistics, which may be very dry but which will perhaps demonstrate the conditions better than any general remarks of mine could do.

Before going into that, however, I wish in a few words to deal with the remarks of the minister. I am sorry to say, for the sake of the country, that to me he appeared to make a very lame defence of the policy, if it can be called a policy, which he has been carrying out. He complimented the hon. member for North Vancouver on his remarks, and said that at any rate they were constructive. I am sorry I cannot say the same about the minister; as far as I could see—and I say this quite honestly and with no desire to be unfair—his remarks were largely destructive. His whole attitude seemed to be one of despair, a sort of throwing up of his hands in an admission of national failure.

In Canada we have a country covering 3,500,000 square miles. With twice the area of the whole of Europe, we have a population of only ten millions. Europe, with half our area, has a population of 300,000,000. The hon. minister practically stated this afternoon that we are a happy little family and should be content to remain as we are and not look for other people to come to our shores.

Mr. FORKE: I did not say that.

Mr. MANION: Not in those words, but that was the sum and substance of what the minister said, and anyone who reads his speech cannot help but see that he practically doubted the need of immigration. Had he gone but one step farther he would have been praising the exodus and arguing that if we could get rid of a few more thousands of people then we would be still happier; we would have our great resources to divide among a smaller number and would therefore be that much happier and that much more contented.

We have one of the greatest countries in the world and if it were properly handled it should be the mecca for all the desirable peoples in all the overcrowded portions of the earth. I do not intend to comment further upon the minister's speech except to say that the whole of his remarks were an excuse for the fact that his policy had been a failure. The French have a proverb, qui s'excuse s'accuse—he who excuses himself accuses himself—and I am afraid the minister accused himself this afternoon. Some of the figures which he quoted were not quite correct, but the difference is small. I have the figures from his own department showing that 72,000 British immigrants, including English, Irish, Scotch and Welsh, came into this country from the United States instead of the 75,000 he mentioned. The immigration has been very small while the emigration has been quite large.

We are spending to-day $5,862,900 on immigration and colonization. The Department of Immigration and Colonization will spend $3,462,900, and $1,400,000 will be spent for general land settlement advances. The railways will spend about $1,000,000, which gives us a total of a little less than $6,000,000. Will the country receive full value for that amount of money? That is not the opinion of the people in Canada; the opinion is that there seems to be something radically wrong.

During the calendar year 1928, 166,782 immigrants came to Canada. From the British Isles there came 55,848, from the United States, 29,933, and from other countries, 81,001. In other words, there were 110,934 from other countries and 55,848 from the British Isles, which is a ratio of two to one. It is true that some of the immigrants from the United States were British born, but that ratio still applies.

During the first year of Liberal rule the British immigration into Canada amounted to 47 per cent of the total immigration; last year it was 33 per cent, which shows that the British immigration is decreasing, whatever the cause may be. During the last four fiscal years before the war, 1911 to 1914, we received into Canada 1,451,000 people. During the last four years during which this government has been in office we have received exactly 501,000, or a little more than one-third of the immigration during the four years before the war. The proportion of British immigrants to immigrants from other countries is about the same, but the total must be disappointing to anyone who wishes to see this country prosper and build up.

British immigration during 1925 was 53,000, while last year it was 51,000. In this case I am speaking of the fiscal years, as the figures are easier to get for that period. During the year 1925 we received 15,000 immigrants from America, and in 1928, 25,000, an increase of 10,000. The immigration from countries other than Great Britain or America amounted to 42,000 in 1925 and it had increased to 75,000 in 1928, an increase of 33,000. These figures show that British immigration is the only class which seems to be decreasing, which is certainly not a very satisfactory condition.

Let us consider this question from another angle and take the first fiscal year of the Liberal government, ending March 31, 1923. During the larger part of the year ending March 31, 1922, the affairs of the country were under the direction of a Unionist government or a Conservative government, so I have taken the year 1923. From countries other than the British Isles and the United States we received that year 16,372 immigrants, while we received 75,038 during 1928, or four and one-half times as many. British immigration increased from 34,508 in 1923 to 51,552 in 1928, or an increase of one and one-half times. In other words, British immigration increased one and one-half times while immigration from other countries increased four and one-half times. My complaint is not so much that the number of British immigrants is not larger, as that our immigration of all classes is much too small. The question is often asked: how many can we absorb in this country? I submit that we can absorb as many as we can put at useful occupations and as many as we can handle without crowding out the other classes of the people already here, whether they be farmers or labouring people. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we could take many times the numbers of people of all kinds than we are getting at the present time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How about doctors?

Mr. MANION: My practice has been pretty well shot since I got into politics, but the doctors have not raised any particular objection to medical men coming in.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the hon. member have them submit to an examination when they come to this country?

Mr. MANION: There is no doubt that they should be fully qualified. I would not like to have even the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) attended by a doctor who had not passed an examination. I am not saying that in any offensive tone, because my hon. friend is a very good friend of mine and I do not want to hurt his feelings.

I submit that we can take many more immigrants of all kinds. During the last fiscal year before the war we had an immigration of 384,000, but during the fiscal year 1928 it had dropped to 151,000, or a little more than one-third.

I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not in any way criticizing or attacking those who came from countries other than the British Isles or from the United States. I have many of those people in my constituency and I have the utmost confidence in them. I have practised medicine among them for many years and my feelings towards them are of the kindest. The children of these newcomers to our land make very fine Canadians and I certainly do not object to their coming into this country. I submit that we have a need for people of all classes. These people from the continental European countries are willing to do certain classes of work which the Canadian, British or American will not do and they are needed for those purposes. If our country is as prosperous as the right hon. the Prime Minister and some of his followers claim it is, we should be able to absorb hundreds of thousands of all classes of immigrants from all countries. If immigration is to be taken as a criterion of prosperity, we are certainly not particularly prosperous at the present time.

I know that many hon. members of the house will not agree with me, but my contention is that one of the reasons we do not have a proper immigration to this country is that a wrong practice respecting fiscal affairs has been followed.

I remember being struck, I think a year or two ago, by a very fine speech delivered by the present Premier of British Columbia, the Hon. Mr. Tolmie, a man who was loved in the house and whose opinion on agricultural subjects commanded the respect of not only the house but the country. He spoke of the lack of protection for our sheep industry. He pointed out that in Canada in 1871 we had a little more than 3,000,000 sheep, and that in 1927, fifty-six years later, we had practically the same number, perhaps 100,000 more, whereas in the United States, instead of 3,000,000 sheep as we have in Canada, they have 44,000,000. He claimed—and I have no reason for doubting his word—that we have just as good facilities and just as good a capacity for sheep raising in Canada as they have in the United States. He pointed out that in British Columbia there are 160,000,000 acres of good range land, but they have only 100,000 sheep, and he said that they have room for twenty times that number in that province.

I remember reading last year the evidence of Sir Henry Thornton before the committee on agriculture, and he claimed that the maritimes were just as good a sheep raising section as any other section of the country. The trouble is that we have been giving no encouragement to sheep raising. I made it my business to-day to make sure that my statements were correct, and I found that there was no protection on raw wool coming into this country, whereas the United States has had protection at various times, ranging from 15 cents to 45 cents a pound. The United States as a consequence, although having no greater capacity for sheep raising than we have, have fifteen times the number of sheep. This is another instance of our treating the sheep industry in the same way as we treat the fruit and dairy industries. It might be well to put on Hansard these figures which I took from the International Year Book of agricultural statistics, and I think they are correct. This shows the number of sheep in various countries in 1927:

Country	Number of Sheep
Canada	3,263,000
United States	44,455,000
Bolivia, Brazil, Peru, Chile and Uruguay	50,000,000

These five South American countries have a total of something over 50,000,000 sheep though they have an area about the same as that of Canada.

Australia	104,260,000

Thirty-five times the number that Canada has.

New Zealand	25,640,000

So far as area is concerned we could drop little New Zealand into lake Superior, yet that country has more than eight times as many sheep as we have.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): How many sheep have they in Great Britain, where they have no protection at all?

Mr. MANION: I was going to give those figures: In Great Britain and Northern Ireland they have 25,000,000 sheep. Great Britain, by the way, as my hon. friend says, may not have protection on raw wool, but the reason for that is that Great Britain is the greatest manufacturer of woollen goods in the world and requires raw wool as a raw material for the manufacture of woollen goods. That is why they have no protection, and probably my hon. friend is correct in saying they have not.

Mr. HANSON: Manufactured goods to export to Canada.

Mr. MANION: Yes, to Canada where we do not protect our sheep industry as the United States are protecting theirs. Let me mention two or three other figures in order to show the small countries which have large numbers of sheep. France, with half the area or less than that of northern Ontario, has more than 10,000,000 sheep. The little Irish Free State has as many sheep as Canada has. Roumania has nearly four times as many.

The same story could be given with regard to cattle. The figures are as follows:

Country	Number of cattle
Canada	9,172,000
United States	55,696,000
Germany	17,982,000
France	14,940,000
Great Britain and Northern Ireland	8,183,000

These little countries with probably one-thirtieth of the area of Canada have practically as many cattle as we have.

Australia	11,880,000

Speaking of prosperity, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave as a proof of prosperity the figures for the acreage under field crops in Canada in 1928—59,351,000 acres—but in 1921, seven years before that, we had under field crops 59,635,000 acres, or practically 300,000 acres more the year before the present government came into power than we have now, and a lesser acreage under field crops than in any year between 1921 and 1928. Certainly that is not a very good indication of prosperity, and it does not seem that immigration is interfering with competition in other markets, since our acreage is not increasing. Immigration, according to the figures as to acreage, does not seem to be interfering with the farming sections of the country.

Mr. WARD: Is the hon. member saying that the acreage under field crops is no greater to-day than it was eight or ten years ago?

Mr. MANION: It was 300,000 acres less in 1928 than it was in 1921.

Mr. WARD: Why, then, has production so tremendously increased?

Mr. MANION: I do not know; I cannot answer that. I am giving the acreage as it is set out in official sources. My hon. friend can get them from the Bureau of Statistics, where the Prime Minister got his. The facts are as I give them, but in any case the acreage is less to-day than it was in 1921. That is not due to lack of room in our country, because I made it my business also to ask the Department of the Interior as to the acreage which is not settled at the present time in the western provinces alone. I find that in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta there are in round figures probably 30,000,000 acres of land suitable for agriculture within fifteen miles of the railway. The Minister of Immigration, speaking to-day, said that he would not like to place anybody further than fifteen miles from a railway.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): Broken land or raw prairie?

Mr. MANION: This is land fit for agriculture. Mr. Beatty gave the figures last year before the same agriculture committee as that before which Sir Henry Thornton made the statement which I quoted. Mr. Beatty said that in 1922—and I think I am quoting his exact words—there were 34,000,000 acres of fairly fit land in the three prairie provinces within fifteen miles of a railway. I intend, however, to give the official figures from the Department of the Interior. This is a letter dated April 11, 1929, to myself from the Deputy Minister of the Interior; I shall simply give the essential parts:

> The last compilation of unoccupied and uncultivated privately owned land was made in 1922, and the result was as follows:

He shows that in 1922 there were 18,003,040 acres of privately owned land, uncultivated. That is divided amongst individual owners, the Hudson's Bay Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Canadian National Railway Company, other companies, and unclassified. That is the last compilation of privately owned lands. He gives Dominion lands available for entry in 1928 as 23,167,000 acres, and also unsold school lands 1928, as 6,314,787 acres. These three classes of lands, total 47,484,817 acres. Then he adds:

> With regard to the suitability of the above lands for agricultural purposes, I may say that railway lands were selected by the companies concerned—

The railway lands amount to 5,197,520 acres.

> —and may therefore be looked upon as being suitable for agricultural purposes. There is no definite information as to what proportion of the other above-mentioned classes is suitable for agriculture.
> Practically all of the privately owned unoccupied lands are within fifteen miles of a railway, possibly one-half to one million acres being outside that distance. Of the crown lands still available for homestead entry, nearly 12,000,000 acres are within fifteen miles of a railway.

Summing this all up, taking it as well as I can from what he has said about it, I estimate that in round figures there are 30,000,000 acres suitable for agriculture within fifteen miles of a railway.

Mr. FORKE: Why then go hundreds of miles away up into the Peace River?

Mr. BENNETT: Because the minister encourages them to do so.

Mr. MANION: There are also vast quantities of land in other sections of the country that are suitable for agriculture, though in many cases a little more difficult to clear. Northern Quebec, northern Ontario, British Columbia, and the maritimes are empires in themselves. Northern Ontario, extending from North Bay to the Manitoba boundary, is as large as Germany and the British Isles put together, and yet in that area there are but 150,000 people. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) said that the land in northern Ontario was mostly rock. There is a good deal of rock, but there are also fine agricultural valleys in many sections; if my hon. friend would some time stay off with me at Fort William I could show him fine agricultural land just a few miles from my own city, cultivated by prosperous and successful farmers. In many such sections throughout that northern part of Ontario, there is as fine agricultural land as can be found in the western prairie provinces. The same is true of northern Quebec, British Columbia and the maritimes.

But the fact is, Mr. Speaker, that we are not getting immigrants. Whatever the causes may be, that remains the fact. Or if we are, as has been shown many times—the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) stated recently in the house what the population now should be if we had retained our immigrants and the hon. member for North Vancouver gave the same information to-day—we are losing them to the United States. Immigrants mean nothing to our country unless we keep them here. Unfortunately, we not only are not keeping the immigrants that come here, but we are not keeping our own Canadians. Our immigration from the United States last year—I am giving the minister's own figures—was 29,933, or in round numbers, 30,000. Now I will give the American figures for Canadian immigration to the United States. I have them under my hand in letters that I have obtained from the department in reply to my queries, and they show that we lost to the United States last year 73,605; in other words, two and one-half times as many left this country for the United States as we obtained from the United States last year. The minister's figures differed a little from those I am giving, but I accept the minister's figures as to the number coming into Canada and the American figures as to the number going into the United States.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member has forgotten the immigrants we got from the United States.

Mr. MANION: No. I mentioned that. I said that we got 29,933 from the United States, and that we lost 73,605 to the United States.

Mr. FORKE: Returning Canadians also?

Mr. MANION: The Americans do not give any as Canadians coming from the United States, but as English, Irish, Scotch, Welsh or French, as the case may be; because there is no Canadian nationality in the census and the United States follows the same method.

Mr. FORKE: What I wanted to say was that immigrants from the United States and returning Canadians make up about 65,000.

Mr. MANION: I am afraid the minister's figures are rather high. As a matter of fact, I tried to get from the United States the figures of returning Canadians, but as I said, they do not classify them on that basis, and I have therefore taken the minister's own figures on that.

Mr. FORKE: We have the figures here.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry, but the minister will have to use those figures himself. I have given the official figures as I obtained them. I have very grave doubts, without attempting to impugn the honesty of the minister at all, as to the accuracy of the figures as to returning Canadians from the United States given by the Immigration department of this country. I know that as I go through this country in almost every section pretty nearly every family of any size that I meet has some member of it in the United States, and I rarely hear of their coming back.

Mr. McINTOSH: When did they start going to the United States?

Mr. MANION: They have been going for forty or fifty years.

Mr. McINTOSH: Before 1896 how many went?

Mr. MANION: I have not the figures for 1896, but I will give my hon. friend these figures; they may have some effect on his enthusiasm. I will give the figures of Canadians leaving this country for the United States during the last four years of Conservative rule, or Conservative and Union rule, and the figures for the last six years during which this government has been in power, according to the American figures.

From 1919 to 1922—part of 1922 was under Liberal rule, but we would have to take whatever blame there is coming for the greater part of the year—we lost to the United States, according to American figures, 267,920 people, or an average during those four years of Conservative rule of 66,980, or in round numbers, 67,000. From the fiscal year 1923 to 1928, which are all Liberal years, we lost, according to this same set of statistics, in those six years, 666,338 or an average for the Liberal years of 111,056, or pretty nearly twice as many per year as we lost under Conservative rule.

Mr. McINTOSH: What are the Liberal and Conservative figures from 1867 up to the present time?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend can give them; he has more time than I have.

Mr. McINTOSH: You are debating the question.

Mr. MANION: There is nothing to prevent my hon. friend from debating it; he is ready to debate any question. As I was saying, the average for the six years of Liberal rule was 111,056 and the average for the four years of Conservative rule, 66,980, or almost twice as many under Liberal rule as under Conservative rule. The showing would have been very much worse had I taken the first four years of Liberal rule instead of six, for that would have shown the average to be 127,000 instead of 111,000. The emigration has eased down a little in the last two years, firstly because conditions have improved in this country, thanks to Providence, and secondly because most of our people who wanted to go to the United States have already gone. You cannot go on draining the life-blood of a man forever.

Mr. DUNNING: Why does my hon. friend start his calculation from the fiscal year 1918? Perhaps he would give the figures separately for the different years.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend would hardly expect me to take the war years. I have left them out of my calculations altogether.

Mr. DUNNING: But why start with that particular year? Why not one year later?

Mr. MANION: I do not think it would make any difference. I took 1919 because the war was over. I had no ulterior motive at all in taking that year. I should like to point out to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) who has asked that question, that during the four years we were in power hundreds of thousands of soldiers were being disbanded in this country, and in spite of that we lost only 267,000, or an average of about 67,000 a year, while in the year 1922, all the soldiers had been disbanded and the Liberals since that time have been losing Canadians at the rate of 111,000 a year to the United States.

I did not intend to take quite as long as I have done, but these interruptions have delayed me. Our problems at the present time I consider are four. First, and this is most important, we should retain our own Canadian people in this Dominion.

Mr. FORKE: I happened to read an article in the Dalhousie Review recently in which it was stated that immigration to the United States started in 1830 and has continued ever since. I only hope it will stop in a short time.

Mr. MANION: Nobody ever questions that a great big country like the United States will always act as a magnet to some of our Canadian people, but I state without any possibility of disproof that never in the history of our country from long before confederation—and I say this after looking up the figures—have we had six years in which we lost so many people to the United States as we lost during the six years under Liberal rule to which I have referred. I say that without any fear of contradiction.

Mr. FORKE: But the population is now greater. It is nine and a half millions as compared with five millions in those earlier days, and so the percentage must be taken into account.

Mr. MANION: The population of this country has not been increasing anything like as rapidly as it should have done, so that the percentage is not a factor of very much importance.

I was saying that our first aim should be to keep our own Canadian people in this country. That is most important because, with all due respect for the immigrants from other lands, our own Canadian people are more valuable to us than any other people who are coming here.

Secondly, our aim should be to get British immigrants because they understand our institutions, our history, our language and our laws. They are the first people we should attempt to get from outside.

Thirdly, I should say that the next group we should attempt to get are the Americans, who next best understand our institutions, our language and our laws. Finally, Europeans. And I have no quarrel with the minister's division of them into preferred and non-preferred countries.

This should be our aim, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that with a proper fiscal policy we would get this immigration. This policy would help the 2,000,000 farmers in Ontario and Quebec who are selling from 90 to 95 per cent of their products to the industrial centres of their respective provinces; it would aid our dairy farmers; it would assist our fruit producers; and it would so aid our industrial life that we could absorb immigrants as we did before the war at the rate of 300,000 to 400,000 under the Laurier regime and the Borden regime. A proper fiscal policy,—whether my friends agree with it or not, I am entirely sincere,—a proper fiscal policy would enable this country to produce in Canada hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of commodities which are now being produced in other countries and imported by us. In other words, it means wages, work and prosperity,—not a fictitious, spotty prosperity such as we have to-day, but a real prosperity.

Some of my hon. friends opposite argue continually that under free trade we get cheaper goods. I do not dispute that that may be true, but there are many exceptions, and I have put them on Hansard in years gone by. Under protection prices have been reduced in some cases 75 per cent. Take, for instance, the price of steel rails in the United States. Under free trade they were four times as high as they now are under protection with proper competition in the home market. But, anyhow, even if we admitted that cheap goods were the be all and end all of our existence, we must not forget that the cheapest countries in the world to-day are the poorest countries —for instance, China and India.

The prosperity brought about by a proper fiscal policy would act as the greatest magnet that we could have to draw people from the other countries of the world. Our land, I repeat, should be the mecca for all the desirable people from all the overcrowded portions of the earth.

Apparently nobody in this country is satisfied with the immigration policy of the government. Perhaps one or two in the house may express satisfaction, and some even seem to think we are getting too many immigrants. The minister himself gave me that impression.

Mr. FORKE: No.

Mr. MANION: Well I do not wish to be unfair, but his speech was the most despairing effort that I have heard for a long time; it was almost a funereal wail. But it is common knowledge that the people generally are not satisfied with present immigration conditions. The railways are not satisfied. I have before me the joint statement of Sir Henry Thornton and Mr. Beatty expressing their dissatisfaction, but I have not time to read it. I also have under my hand a statement from the Saskatchewan section of the United Farmers of Canada which I got in my mail this morning. Apparently they are not satisfied. But the "most unkindest cut of all" is Mr. W. T. R. Preston. He is absolutely disgusted and dissatisfied with immigration conditions as they are to-day. I like him so much, and his authority has been so often quoted in this house on behalf of the Liberals, that I am going to read his letter.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Who is he?

Mr. MANION: For years he was the organizer of the Liberal party and a lifelong Liberal. I never heard of him making a speech or writing a letter in support of the Conservative party. On January 19 last, only a few months ago, he wrote a letter to the Manitoba Free Press. I am going to read the last two or three paragraphs which sum up his idea. He says:

> Since the Liberals assumed power in 1921 the aggregate expenditure by the government and the Canadian National railway on immigration propaganda exceeds $25,000,000. The addition to the population by immigration scarcely overshadows the volume of the exodus of our own people to the United States. Public bodies, regardless of politics, have requested the government to spend hundreds of millions in a wide immigration propaganda. But supineness, lethargy and indifference has been the official reply.
> I know that I am expressing the judgment of a large number of lifelong Liberals when I say that the present declared policy of the government will fail to establish an abiding confidence in their political leaders at Ottawa. The future is fraught with serious consequences to Liberalism, but that is a minor consideration in comparison with the greater and more serious consequences to the Dominion at large, if the sponsors of the openly declared immigration policy continue to dominate the situation.

Mr. CHAPLIN: They had better give him another job.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member for Lincoln has struck the nail on the head all right.

Mr. MANION: I hope Mr. Preston will observe the minister's remark that all he needs is another job to keep him quiet.

It is obvious to my mind that the government has not a satisfactory immigration policy. If Canada is to grow, prosper, and progress, it is the duty of this government to awaken to its responsibilities and really try to bring down an immigration policy adequate to the needs of this Dominion.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, as one who thirty odd years ago in the province of Alberta took up the class of land mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. McRae), and who had nothing to start with except a couple of cows and an old team of horses, I may be allowed the indulgence of the house for a moment or two while I make a few observations on the immigration proposition that my hon. friend has put forward. I am afraid that I shall have to disagree with him, and possibly I shall also have to disagree with a good many things in connection with the administration of the Immigration department.

It seems that the basic idea at the root of my hon. friend's proposition is that Canada needs more population in order to make her prosperous. My hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) stated that Canada had only about 10,000,000 of population as against Europe with its 300,000,000 to sustain. I wonder if he implied that the prosperity of Europe with its 300,000,000 population is the kind of prosperity he would like to see in Canada. I want to say that population is not an indication of prosperity. It requires something more than population to create prosperity. Great Britain has a large population but she is not prosperous. There is an infinitely larger population in China, but that country is not prosperous and is seeking means to bring about prosperity. That population is the basis of prosperity is an entirely false doctrine.

The question arises, why do you want a greater population in the north land, in the Peace River country. Is it for the purpose of raising more wheat in order to depreciate the present price which is already too low? Our farmers are not particularly desirous of having greater competition in marketing their wheat, for at the present low level of prices they can hardly live on the returns. The fact is that if you would make our farmers themselves prosperous you would need no immigration policy. It is quite true that last year we raised somewhere in the neighbourhood of 400,000,000 bushels of wheat, but our farmers, the primary producers, are not necessarily prosperous as a consequence. True, that tremendous crop brought prosperity to Canada, as pointed out by hon. members in the budget debate. But who are they who are really prosperous? The gentlemen whom my hon. friend from Fort William indicated, those who live on the backs of the primary producers, the railway companies and other great corporations; they do not touch the primary producers' product unless at a profit, and the farmer has to take what is left.

I submit that if the farmers of this country were prosperous you would have no trouble in attracting desirable immigrants. In fact you would not be able to keep them out with a five barred gate if every farmer in this country was able to produce and sell his product on a cost plus basis as the manufacturers are doing. That is the secret of our lack of prosperity. That is the secret of the lack of immigrants. Population, I repeat, is not a criterion of success, because the people who are contented and happy are those who are prosperous irrespective of whether our population be 10,000,000 or 20,000,000. True, it is prosperous for a few. I think it was Stanley Baldwin who gave this advice to Canada: Don't be in a hurry to settle your land; there is plenty of time for that. Let those within your gates become prosperous and you will have no need for a rush of population. So far as I am concerned, and I believe I am speaking for those whom I represent, we are absolutely opposed to spending money to coax people to come to Canada. Canada was a good enough country for me to come to as a boy fifty years ago. At that time I came here and went into the wilds of Ontario, and I have managed to survive. Similarly, it was good enough for the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) and several others who came to this country and were not at all spoon-fed; they were not treated as though they were babies; they had to make their own way. It is men of that type who will make good citizens of Canada.

My hon. friend from North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) this afternoon made a fine reference to our forefathers of long ago in Ontario. I do not know whether he was referring to the United Empire Loyalists, the old forefathers of whom he is so proud. But I would ask him this question: Does he suppose that those men were spoon-fed? When they came to Canada did they find a ready-made farm, a well built house, a stove burning, the tea kettle steaming, and someone greeting them with, "Come in and have a cup of tea and a piece of cake"? Not at all. They were men who had to hew their homes in the wilds of the province, and it was such men that made Upper Canada what it became. Any man who knows the conditions which will confront him when he comes to this country and who has grit and determination enough, knowing those conditions, to come to the country and to remain in it, is the sort of man whom we will heartily welcome with open arms, giving him all we can. He is the man who will make a good citizen of this country. But, I repeat, we may not look for good citizens among those who expect to be spoon-fed.

Now, of course, I come to the question which I have raised in this connection, and that is, that prospective immigrants should know the conditions they are to face when they come here. One of the great failures of immigration to Canada, especially in recent years, has been the fact that immigrants have not been aware of the conditions which they were to expect. And worse than that—this is where I address myself to my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration—the truth has been only partly revealed to them. We have all had to face difficulties; I have had to face difficulties. I am not ashamed to say that there have been times when I was not able to buy a pair of rubbers to go to the woods; I had to put on a pair of gunny sacks and go out with a sleigh when I wanted to get logs with which to build my house. I am not ashamed to admit it. But my complaint is that immigrants are not given the facts by the Department of Immigration. I have evidence in my hand to support that charge. If I were a real estate agent, anxious to sell land in Canada, eager to dispose of town lots, this literature which I have in my hand—Canada's descriptive atlas, published by the Department of Immigration and sent to all parts of the empire—is the very thing I would use. Now I say that this is wrong because it is only partly true.

Mr. FORKE: Will the hon. member read a paragraph that is not true?

Mr. ADSHEAD: I did not say that there was nothing true in it; I merely said that it was only partly true, and that is the worst form of deception—putting the bright side of the situation before people and leaving the other side for them to find out when they get here. I will demonstrate to the minister from this atlas and from letters I have in my hand that intending immigrants from Great Britain and other parts of the world are told only half the truth. They are induced to come here by the stories they hear about the place and when they arrive in Canada and see things with their own eyes they say, "We did not know that these were the conditions"; and they become discontented, with the result that we have very often to deport them.

I have here, for example, the description of a scene in Alberta. It is fine; it is perfectly true as far as it goes. Here is the homestead to begin with, and turning over a few pages you come at length to a different picture—a transformed homestead, a beautiful house like a modern city residence, with splendid barns and so forth. These are the pictures presented to immigrants before they come out. But the conditions which they will have to face in the interval, before this rosy picture is realized, are not made known to them. They are not told that they may have to live in a little shack—and I have lived in a sod-roofed shack when it rained harder inside than it did outside. I have seen this happen in a farm in Alberta—and my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer), my hon. friend from Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) and many others can testify to the same thing: A man goes into the field, looks the wheat over, and congratulates himself on the fine crop which he will harvest He says, "In a few days I shall cut that wheat and shall have food and sustenance for my family during the winter; I shall be able to pay my debts". But within twenty-four hours—in less time than that—the sky clouds over, and before very long there is not one kernel of wheat left in that field; the whole crop is gone for the year. But these things are not told the people; they are told only half the truth.

Let me mention something else—and I invite the attention of my hon. friend for Yale (Mr. Stirling) to this. Here is depicted a beautiful scene in the Okanagan; there are beautiful trees, with lovely sweet-smelling blossoms; the apples are quite tempting. This is all perfectly true. But what is there that is not true about this picture? Well, I have a letter from a friend in Kelowna in which he tells me about his crop of McIntosh Reds, from which he expected a handsome return. But what happens? He tells me that he has received a red ink invoice, the significance of which my hon. friends from British Columbia will realize. What does it mean? It means that he is out of pocket to the extent of 7 cents a box; in other words, for the privilege of growing those apples he incurs a deficit of 7 cents a box, so that he would have been better off had he left the apples on the trees.

Mr. BENNETT: Swamped by the Americans.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I wish to impress upon the Minister of Immigration the importance, in pamphlets issued by the department, of telling the people the whole truth and nothing but the truth. And that is not done.

Mr. FORKE: I may tell my hon. friend that I have received from Mr. Woods, the proprietor of a Calgary newspaper—I do not know which newspaper it is— a letter in which he informs me about an essay competition which he has been holding among the settlers in western Canada. He has received eighty essays in reply.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It is a wonder he did not receive eight hundred.

Mr. FORKE: Perhaps the hon. member will wait until I am through. He writes telling me that he is delighted with the replies he has received, and the one fact that stands out prominently in every one of these replies is that these settlers were told the truth in England; they formed a fair conception of what they had to face when coming here. This fact appears in eighty different letters forwarded by people in the three thousand family scheme. When the soldier settlement estimates are under consideration I will read some extracts from these letters and my hon. friend will see that things are not being misrepresented all the time.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I did not accuse the department of misrepresenting things all the time; but what I have stated I know to be true; I have given the facts. As it happened, I was in Kelowna this year when the delegation appeared in the western prairie provinces trying to obtain an increased tariff, and Mr. Woods was one of those who met them in Calgary. They were not all fruit growers who came there; there was a newspaper man, there was a real estate man, there was the proprietor or manager of a packing plant. These were the men who represented the farmers, and when they wanted an increased duty on their fruit they met the Calgary board of trade in the board of trade rooms. The farmers' convention was held in Calgary about the same time—two days afterwards. We said. "We want you to meet the farmers whom you want to induce to have a little extra tariff on their fruit." We asked them to stay only two days, but they would not do so; instead they published a statement that the whole of the west was in favour of an increased tariff on fruit.

Now let me proceed further, and I do not make these statements because I do not like the Minister of Immigration; I have a very great regard for him. He may bow sarcastically; I cannot help that. I believe him to be an honourable gentleman who is doing his best, but while I like and respect the Minister of Immigration I like Canada better, and I must deal with things as I find them. I want to say that it is not merely immigrants we want; it is people of the right character.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Conservatives.

Mr. ADSHEAD: All Conservatives are not of the right character, any more than members of other parties. I am not concerned about this party fight but I am very much concerned about some of the people we are getting in Canada. Last fall, before I came to this house, Colonel Saunders, the police magistrate of Calgary, called me to his office and said: "Here is a very serious situation and I wish you would try to do something about it." I asked what he meant, and he said. "To-day three men were convicted of a certain crime, and these men are all recent immigrants who came to Calgary. These men were convicted of the very same crime in the country from which they came." The point I want to bring out is that we want not only men with brawn, muscle and money; we want men of character, not escaped convicts. I would not say that this condition is general, but I hold in my hand the report of the proceedings of the convention of the Chief Constables' Association of Canada, held in Toronto last August, and I desire to read a few statements contained therein. One of the papers read at that convention contained the following statements:

> My attention has been drawn repeatedly of recent years to the number of ex-convicts who are coming to Canada from. . . whose names figure on our dockets and who help to fill our gaols.

I will not read the names of the countries, but hon. members may read this report at any time. The paper continues:

> It will be a surprise to many people that criminals should come to Canada from these countries, because of all the nations that contribute to the immigration totals of Canada there is none more suitable by blood and training to assimilate with Canadian stock than the hardy people who hail from. . . Despite this, it is a fact that quite a large number of criminals are yearly arriving in Canada from there, and a remedy must be obtained for it.

Towards the end of the paper I find the following statement:

> During the war years and for a few years following, the criminals from northern Europe did not cause the police departments much worry, there being no new arrivals to speak of.

But with the influx commencing in 1925 they have been coming to the fore, and unless that influx is checked, Canada will continue to be a haven for the liberated criminal or the wanted one.

I might quote a number of paragraphs from this paper, but there is one statement in particular wihch seems to apply to the present situation:

As was said at the beginning, there is no attack on patriotic citizens and we can do with more of them, provided they do not send any more of their bad eggs as well. The Canadian Chief Constables' Association may be able, in a diplomatic way, to draw the attention of the Department of Immigration to a better way of selection than at present employed. The problem is a tremendous one and it would be quite unfair to attack the Department of Immigration for the oversight or cupidity of some shipping agents abroad.

I do not desire to read the whole paper, but it is worth reading and I draw it to the attention of hon. members of this house and of the Department of Immigration. A better supervision should be maintained of those who come to Canada; we should require something more than merely brawn, muscle or money.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think the hon. member wants to be unfair, but perhaps he does not know that any immigrant convicted of a crime within one year or perhaps within five years of his arrival in Canada is immediately deported.

Mr. ADSHEAD: That may be so, but the point is that they are deported after they have come here, and they should never be permitted to enter the country. If we knew the records of these immigrants and were able to find out their criminal records we would be able to stop them from entering the country.

Mr. FORKE: I am afraid I am delaying my own estimates, but every hon. member knows the complaints which are made continually with regard to asking too many questions of intending immigrants in Great Britain That whole scheme is intended to prevent just this sort of thing.

Mr. ADSHEAD: There you have the statement made at that convention, and I would suggest that the minister read the entire proceedings.

Mr. FORKE: I believe this association recommended that every man entering Canada should be finger-printed, and I want the house to imagine the feelings of any decent Englishman who may be required to have his finger-prints taken before he is allowed to enter the country.

Mr. ADSHEAD: There are other ways of finding out these things, but in the short time at my disposal I am not going to discuss them. Surely the minister will not say that the entry of these men cannot be prevented; I do not want him to leave that impression upon the house, because there are other methods.

Mr. FORKE: Was not that the recommendation of the Chief Constables' Association?

Mr. ADSHEAD: I did not say that. The minister wants me to read the entire report, but I think I have put enough on Hansard now.

My next point, Mr. Speaker, is this: As far as I am concerned and as far as those whom I represent are concerned, I do not believe the railway companies should have carte blanche to bring immigrants to Canada. Time and again in this house I have asked the minister with regard to immigrants from southeastern Europe, and he has told me in all sincerity and good faith that these men are coming to Canada to work on farms. The first year I was here I asked such a question; I did the same thing in my second year, and what happened? As soon as I reached home I found that the Czechoslovakians and others who had arrived in the city of Calgary were taking jobs at lower wages than were being paid other men, thus depriving Canadians of employment and lowering the standard of living. That sort of thing must stop. I do not know whether or not there will be any such trouble this year, but I would cancel the agreements with the railway companies under which they bring to Canada whatever people they desire.

Finally, I believe the provinces should be consulted with regard to the bringing of immigrants to Canada; indeed, I believe their consent should be obtained as well. At present no one is responsible for the immigrants entering this country; I have questioned immigrants who arrived in Calgary broke. When they were asked who brought them there they said, "the Department of Immigration." As far as I could find out, however, the province had nothing to say about it, yet we have to keep them or let them starve. I have on file a hospital bill for over $1,000 for the care of Czechoslovakians who have come to Calgary broke and ill, requiring hospital attention. We have had to pay for this care, but the province did not bring those immigrants there, and the Department of Immigration said there was no column in their ledger for that sort of thing. So we have had to pay the bill; no one accepted any responsibility and we had to look after these people or let them die in the street. I say that responsibility for immigration to any province should rest somewhere and the provinces should be consulted and assume at least a partial responsibility.

My hon. friend from North Vancouver has proposed an immigration scheme under which ready-made farms will be provided for these people. Why does he not go to the province of Ontario and find out whether the Ferguson government will settle the farms in northern Ontario under his scheme?

I have represented things as I have seen them and I do not do it from any motive of factious criticism. As I said before, I have done this because I wanted to discuss some of the abuses I see in the system. I do it not because I dislike the Minister of Immigration but because I like Canada much beter. I hope that what I have said will produce some good results and bring forth an immigration policy which will be satisfactory to Canada and to all concerned.

Mr. JAMES A. GLEN (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, last year I had occasion to take an active part in the discussion which took place in the immigration committee, and as I remember that discussion it dealt more or less largely with the kind of immigration we were receiving rather than the numbers. The question of British immigration was taken up, and I certainly expected that when this amendment came before the house we should find in it some reference to the question of British immigration. But far from that, we find no reference other than these words:

—that men and women have, during recent months, been setled on western crown lands at great distances from transportation, educationa,l hospital and other necessary facilities, thereby making it almost impossible for them to achieve success and happiness in their new surroundings, and is of the opinion that such conditions can only be remedied by an immediate reorganization of the Department of Immigration and Colonization.

Not a word about what happened during the last session of the house; nothing with regard to the fiscal policy which was then stated as a means whereby immigration could be increased; nothing as to means of holding immigrants once they come here. The hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) discussed only the conditions pertaining in a certain portion of Canada, and he applied that principle to the whole of Canada. These gentlemen who are presumed to be connected with the big business interests are in the habit of dealing with mass production, and I think the hon. member for North Vancouver has been considering this question from the that viewpoint and has not given any consideration to the human element. Let me point out to the hon. member, and also to the house, that any scheme in connection with immigration to be successful must be considered from the human standpoint. All the hon. member seemed to want was that millions of men should be placed upon farms, farms improved at the expense of the whole Dominion. I would certainly not be in accord with that proposition in its entirety without considerably more information than the hon. member gives. He did not take into consideration the tremendous cost which would have to be incurred by this government and by the country in providing railways, roads and the social relations which must be maintained in the gathering in of these immigrants. And above and beyond all he did not take into consideration, as did the hon. member who has just taken his seat, the question of the provincial relationship. I agree entirely with the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Adshead) who states that no immigration policy can have any possible hope of success unless it is carried out with the consent and cooperation of the provincial governments. I do not think it is fair that the provincial governments should be saddled with a scheme without their being active cooperators in it.

I do not intend to deal at any great length with the amendment as introduced by the hon. member for North Vancouver, but I should like to refer to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). He gave us one of his characteristic, genial speeches which always seem to me to have somewhat of an edge in them. He referred, as I assume other speakers from the other side of the house will refer, to the question of protection as an aid to immigration. Members of the house will remember that that was the principal subject of the amendment moved last year by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), namely, that unless we had the protection of industries in this country we could not hope to have any large immigration and the immigration could not be held here when it did come. The hon. member came to that policy towards the end of his speech and he said that we must have a proper policy, and then he mentioned the fiscal policy. If one considers the other statements made by the same hon. gentleman, one must realize that he means a fiscal policy of higher protection more in conformity with that which is followed in the country to the south.

I should like to read a despatch taken from a paper which published an article with reference to a country somewhat similar to our own in that it is a new British colony, and therefore its problems are in some degree similar to ours—namely, Australia. Australia has adopted a definite policy with regard to immigration, a white policy, as we all know. They have had many inquiries with regard to immigrants coming into their country, and it would appear that they cannot get enough of them. In the Morning Post, published in London, England, the issue of April 20, 1929, there is an article to this effect:

Retarded Migration

Industrial Conditions in Australia

The report of the British economic mission to Australia, of which some details have already been published, was officially issued yesterday. The members were Sir Arthur Duckham, leader of the mission, Sir Hugo Hirst, Sir Ernest Clark, and Mr. Dougal Malcolm, none of whom had previously visited Australia.

It is stated in the report that the problem of migration from Great Britain to Australia requires special attention. "We are faced with the fact" the mission observed, "that while Australia's door remains wide open to any British subject who cares to pass through it, the total numbers of assisted migrants have in recent years shown a sensible decline."

Figures are given showing that, whereas in 1923 the total number of requisitioned and nominated migrants was 26,511, the number had dropped in 1928 to 22,299.

This diminution is accounted for by the fiscal and financial system and the industrial conditions of Australia and the high level of prices resulting from them, which it is stated "may not be conducive to migration."

"We have felt much force in the oft-repeated complaint," the report adds, "that successive increases in the tariff, which affect prices and the cost of living, following upon or being followed by successive advances in the cost of labour as the result of decisions under the Arbitration Acts, have involved Australia in a vicious circle of ever-ascending costs and prices, and that this condition of affairs is crippling Australia's progress and her power of supporting increased population."

The mission points out that there lies no task before the Australian people more urgent than that of in some way breaking the vicious circle, and of bringing down costs of production as is being done in other industrial countries of the world, without lowering the standard of living of the workers as measured not by money but by real wages, which are the reward of labour in the form of goods and services.

I know that hon. members would expect me to make that statement with regard to fiscal policy but I do not think they thought they would find in the Morning Post of London, England, that famous old family journal, a report which so strongly bears out the contention which I make, namely, that anything which increases the cost of production in a given country must necessarily mean a diminution in the number who come in to that country.

I do not believe that the hon. member for Fort William intended to convey a wrong impression with regard to the circular which he had received from the Saskatchewan section of the United Farmers of Canada. I have a copy of that resolution; it reads as follows:

Whereas this convention is opposed to the present method of securing immigrants;

Therefore be it resolved that we urge the federal government to appoint a national commission of inquiry with just representation thereon from organized labour and organized agriculture, that shall study the problem of immigration and assimilation from every possible angle, such commission to conduct public hearings to make provision for the attendance of representative witnesses whose testimony shall be taken under oath, and to report to parliament the conclusion reached by it and make such recommendations as in its judgment it may deem proper,—

This is the vital clause.

—and that pending the findings of such a commission, no further agreement shall be entered into by the federal government with the railroads after the present agreement has expired.

The meaning of that is that there was a considerable debate last year in the house and also in the committee with regard to the operations of the railway companies under that agreement. Everybody was satisfied that they had abused the provisions of that agreement, and the committee was unanimous that the agreement should be abolished or, at all events, modified. The last clause means that nothing should be done in order to bring in immigration without further inquiries being made.

Mr. BENNETT: No further agreement with the railways.

Mr. GLEN: They say:

No further agreement shall be entered into by the federal government with the railroads after the present agreement has expired.

I wish to deal with some of the phases of immigration as the department is faced with it. I have been reading recently an article taken from the Queen's Quarterly, a very authoritative journal, and the figures given in it are somewhat startling and will probably be of interest to the house. In connection with the question of British immigration, as to which we have heard no word to-night, I wish to refer to some of the facts given in that article in order to show why we do not have from Great Britain the immigration that we expect and hope for.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Who is the writer?

Mr. GLEN: The writer is not mentioned

Mr. FORKE: Professor McArthur.

Mr. GLEN: They say the reasons for non-immigration of British are as follows: The steamship fares now are three times what they were in previous days. Conditions in Canada have changed; there is a decreased supply of homestead and cheap land, and lack of railway construction comparable with pre-war days, the post-war agricultural depression and the greater use of machinery in agriculture, all affect immigration to Canada. There has also been a change in the social and economic structure of Britain. State insurance against unemployment, sickness and old age, until recent years had not become important. Young unmarried men, who constituted and still constitute the main portion of Canada's British immigrants, now form a relatively smaller proportion of the population than ever before. Only slightly more than a million are now engaged in agriculture. In 1851, one in four of the population was engaged in agriculture, while to-day the number is one in ten. There is no surplus of agriculturists. Three out of four of all occupied persons in Great Britain now follow indoor callings and the number is increasing. There are, broadly speaking, over 1,000,000 old age pensioners; two and a half million persons, or nearly 15 per cent of all occupied persons, are engaged in commerce, finance, insurance and clerical work, and nearly one million and a half, or 10 per cent of all occupied persons, are engaged in public or civil service. A further 5 per cent of the population are in receipt of some form of annuity other than old age pensions. These represent classes to which Canada can obviously make little or no appeal. The manual workers' class from which emigration to Canada has been recruited, constitutes about 50 per cent of the total occupied population. The increasing protection afforded to the worker by state insurance is a further bar to emigration. This is perhaps not fully appreciated in Canada. The moderately skilled workman makes comparatively small contributions to his trade union and the various schemes of state insurance. The employer as well as the state is compelled to contribute to these schemes. The worker is thus ensured against a reduction of his wage. He is insured against sickness, unemployment and old age. When he reaches the age of sixty-five, and if his wife is sixty-five or more, he is entitled to a pension of £1 per week on his own behalf and on that of his wife. In the event of his death his widow receives ten shillings per week for life, and smaller weekly sums to the children until they reach the age of fourteen.

These facts lead to the inescapable conclusion that we have in the old land only a limited number of people to whom we can appeal to come to this country, because, if the worker wishes anything, he wishes security in employment. He is getting that to-day as never before in the history of the old land, and as a consequence he is loath to take the risk of bringing his wife and family into a new country with all that that might involve.

Some mention has been made of restrictions placed upon immigration from the old land. The country generally does not really appreciate the fact that there are fewer restrictions on British immigrants under this regime and under the administration of the present minister than there have been for many years. Of course, where the government is paying part of the person's passage on the ground of his actual or intended occupation, there must be some inquiry to determine his occupational and other fitness for the assisted passage. This, however, is not a restriction. For the Britisher who pays his own way and is in good mental and physical health, there are absolutely no restrictions at all. He can go to a booking agency and buy his ticket to Canada without asking any person's leave. He does not require even a passport, while, on the other hand, no Britisher in this country can visit the mother country without one.

Mr. ADSHEAD: No character test?

Mr. GLEN: No. The British immigrant requires to be medically examined before he leaves his country, but this is a convenience rather than a restriction.

Mr. FORKE: One of the questions is: Have you ever been convicted?

Mr. GLEN: I presume that is what my hon. friend is referring to.

For the agricultural and domestic servant classes the ocean rate from the British Isles is £2, and children of agricultural families come free. All other British immigrants ordinarily resident in Great Britain or northern Ireland travel on a £10 ocean rate. In addition to passage assistance, every effort is made to attract British immigration, and it may surprise you to know that Canada receives more British immigrants year by year than any other country, not even excluding the United States. There is a popular notion that most of the British immigrants go to Australia and New Zealand, but this is not correct. During the last calendar year, out of a total assisted movement of 50,973 from the British isles to all parts of the empire, Canada assisted 29,196, or nearly 8,000 more than all other parts of the empire put together. According to figures presented last session to the committee on agriculture and colonization, the federal government expended an average of $16.67 on British immigrants as against 11 cents per capita for continental immigrants. If, therefore, the flow of continental immigrants is unduly large, it is certainly not because the federal government is spending money to attract them.

It is interesting to note the tremendous difference between continental immigrants and a British farmer. The fare of an immigrant from Antwerp to Winnipeg is $137.50, while the British farmer can travel the same distance in the same or greater comfort for slightly over $20, and all his children under 19 years travel free.

I have under my hand a table here which I shall ask the permission of the house to put on Hansard for the years from 1921 to 1928, showing the emigration from Great Britain (excluding departures from the Irish Free State from 1923 to 1928). These figures have been taken from the board of trade returns and demonstrate conclusively that Canada receives and has received more emigrants from Britain than any other country, including Australia, New Zealand and the United States.

The statement is as follows:

Emigration from United Kingdom

The following figures which have been taken from the Board of Trade returns show the total emigration from the United Kingdom to British North America, Australia, New Zealand, British South Africa, India and other parts of the empire: the United States and other foreign countries, for each of the years mentioned,—

—	1921	1922	1923	1924	1925	1926	1927	1928	Total
British North America	84,145	69,690	121,941	99,717	70,810	49,632	52,916	54,709	603,560
Australia / New Zealand	77,934	56,851	55,156	58,500	55,920	61,078	48,832	33,689	447,960
British South Africa	28,138	21,414	18,938	22,452	21,144	8,295	7,572	7,095	135,048
India and other parts of the empire	30,196	24,520	23,748	26,555	28,001	13,301	13,413	13,489	173,223
United States	67,499	61,826	101,063	39,057	54,898	28,740	25,662	22,345	401,090
Elsewhere	12,208	13,986	16,721	17,199	19,541	5,555	5,110	5,507	95,827

N.B.—From 1923 to 1928, the figures do not include departures from the Irish Free State.

I will now give the figures of British immigration, assisted passages and regular fare immigrants. They are as follows:

British Immigration—Assisted Passages and Regular Fare

Fiscal year	Assisted passage	Regular fare	Total	Harvesters who returned	Net
1923–24	3,639	69,280	72,919
1924–25	8,558	44,620	53,178
1925–26	8,442	29,127	37,569
1926–27	20,248	30,130	50,378
1927–28	24,889	26,663	51,552
1928–29	23,575	35,305	58,880	−6,455	=52,425

The increase of approximately 150% of assisted migrants as between 1925–26 and 1926–27 was due to what is known as the £3 ocean rate which became effective on the 1st January 1926 and which was subsequently reduced to £2.

The above figures show that during the first three years covered by the assisted passage agreement, the large majority of British migrants paid the regular fare of £18–15–0, and that during 1926–27 when the £3 rate was in effect, there was an increase of approximately 150% of assisted migrants and a corresponding reduction of those who paid the regular fare. During 1927–28 when the £2 rate was in effect, there was a still further increase of those who received the assisted passage, and a corresponding decrease of those who paid the regular fare.

Mr. KELLNER: By "regular fare" does my hon. friend mean that anyone who was not coming here as a land settler would pay the regular fare or the special fare for settlers?

Mr. GLEN: By regular fare I mean the regular fare paid by anyone coming to this country.

Mr. JACOBS: The special rate applies only to British people. None but the brave deserve the fare.

Mr. GLEN: I do not wish to be understood that I am in favour of assisted passages because I agree with the hon. member for East Calgary that Canada is big enough and good enough for people to come to without being assisted at all.

I wish to state a few facts which seem to be necessary with regard to continental immigrants.

The immigrant from non-preferred countries is subject to a passport regulation and an occupational or a relationship test. He too must be medically examined before sailing. It has been stated or, at all events, there is an impression, that the medical examination and the facilities are much poorer in the British isles than they are on the continent. The reverse of this is true. In the British isles the intending immigrant has never to go more than a few miles to find a doctor by whom be can be examined. We have Canadian doctors at all the ports of sailing, and we have several hundreds of British doctors called roster doctors scattered all through the British isles who also examine. The Britisher may go at any time within four months of sailing to be examined. He does not need to break up his home or make any arrangements for sailing before being examined. If he passes the examination he is given a medical card which is valid for four months. He does not pay a cent for the medical examination whether it is done by Canadian doctors or by roster doctors. All this expense is borne by the government.

On the continent we have medical officers at Paris, Antwerp, Rotterdam, Hamburg, Danzig and Riga. Medical examination of continental immigrants is conducted only at these ports. The continental immigrant cannot go to a doctor in his own country before sailing and obtain the Canadian medical examination. He can get it only at the port of sailing. He must go to the port some days before sailing takes place in order to give plenty of time for the examination. The difference in the medical examination itself certainly does not favour the continental. If British migrants had to go through the same form of medical examination as central Europeans go through at the ports of sailing, I can assure you that we would have very little British immigration. If the continental immigrants are not fit they are returned, so that if the immigrant has sold his place and has paid his fare for himself and his family to these ports, and then is found medically unfit, he can be turned right back at these ports.

In comparing non-preferred country immigration with British immigration it is necessary to call attention to the fact that the only immigrants admissible to Canada from non-preferred countries are:—

1. Agricultural families coming for land settlement.

2. Farm labourers.

3. Domestic servants, and the following relatives who are admitted on the ground of relationship apart altogether from the question of occupation: wives and unmarried children, and parents and unmarried brothers and sisters, of immigrants legally domiciled in Canada who are in a position to receive and care for their relatives.

In conformity with the requirements of the committee on immigration last year it was thought that some reduction should be made in the non-preferred immigration coming to this country, and there has accordingly been a limitation made by the department, under the railway agreement, restricting the non-preferred immigration to thirty per cent of the total movement of that class brought to Canada last year, which I am told amounts to about 11,000. This surely does not look like a preference in favour of the continental immigrant.

The total immigration figure for the fiscal year which ended the 31st March last was 167,722, made up of immigrants of the following origins:—

British	58,880
United States	30,560
Preferred countries	29,579
All others	48,703

I have a table showing the racial origins of all these immigrants, which has I think much interest for the house and the country, and if the house permits, I will place it on Hansard:

Statement showing how the Policy has worked out for the past three Years as shown in the Racial Origin of Immigrants

There are certain things that should be asked of those who are dealing with the immigration question. In view of the agitation that took place in this country during the last year since the immigration committee sat, I think a statement should be made in this house as to what is being done and as to what we actually want in the matter of immigration.

I would ask what interests are most concerned with and clamouring for an open door policy in immigration? The answer is that most of the criticisms of any policy of restriction in any direction come directly or indirectly from interests which profit by the transport of immigrants.

What provinces are urging more immigration? The answer is, not one of the provinces is asking for more general immigration. I differ entirely from the hon. member for Fort William when he says that this whole country is asking for immigration; for I am satisfied that I speak for the three western provinces when I say that not a single organization there, except those who profit by the transportation of the immigrants, is asking for more immigrants. I know that some other hon. members will be able to corroborate what I say. It is an absolute fact that in the three prairie provinces there is no demand for immigrants except those who can come into this country with capital and, after landing, can maintain themselves.

Now, thirdly, if the labour situation in Canada is not being fairly met there will be an evident shortage of: (a) farm labour; (b) skilled and other industrial labour; (c) general unskilled labour. Is it true that an unhealthy shortage actually exists?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. GLEN: The answer is that it is not true. At the beginning of the present month, May, 1929, reports from western Canada showed a surplus of labour in almost every centre of the west. At Prince Albert continental immigrants were offering to work as general labourers at $1 per day and board themselves.

It is not reasonable to expect that immigration should provide ample labour for the peak of the seasonal demand such as occurs annually in August and September, nor is it fair to hold that immigration should be reduced so as to prevent any unemployment at the other end of the scale during midwinter when seasonal labour is not in demand. It is necessary to avoid either of these extremes.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we recognize that Canada requires increased population. But no one will deny that in this stage of our development the governing factor shall be quality and not quantity. I think our department recognizes this factor in insisting upon the examinations, mental and physical, and, if you will, moral, which have been in practice for some time.

The efforts of the department to stimulate and primarily encourage British immigration into this British dominion, the house and the country will support. But with immigration there must of necessity be given instruction, care and assistance in the period of colonization, and, as I said at the outset, this work cannot be better performed than by the provinces and their units, the municipalities.

These are general principles, but I am satisfied of this, Mr. Speaker. Nothing has been said so far in the debate in condemnation of the policy of the Minister of Immigration during the past year. He has followed up entirely the recommendations made by the committee on immigration which sat last session, with one exception, the granting of homeseekers' fares from eastern to western Canada. I understand from the Passengers' Association that they did not think it was proper to make this concession. I think he has administered his department admirably, and he and his officials are entitled to a considerable amount of credit. I believe that but for the cry for purely British as against any other immigration we would have no amendment offered at the present time. Therefore I wish to give to the minister that meed of praise to which I think he is entitled for carrying out the recommendations of the immigration committee. I believe that the sound, sane policy pursued by the department to-day will be found to be the best for Canada in the long run.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): There is, Mr. Speaker, probably no question of a political nature that requires greater thought than this question of immigration. If we are going to carry on a policy of immigration, some valid reason should be given to the country. Yet I think there is no question so badly neglected by social workers, by statesmen and by the public generally than this great question.

To-day seemingly the government follows a policy which has been outlined by the directors of industries in our cities whose chief aim seems to be to direct great waves of human beings to this country for the sake of cheap labour, with the idea of exploiting their capabilities for labour and low living standards so that urban industry may be the better carried on.

Now, the material or monetary value of a multitude of human beings is perhaps the lowest conception we can have of the value of our immigrants. It is the very lowest conception of a movement on which we are spending millions of dollars each year to bring in people from Europe, the United States, and other parts of the world. Immigration is a failure as far as the increase in the values of land go, if that is the policy we have in mind. It might be a factor in increasing mass production in our cities, that is if mass production depends on the export of goods and the exploitation of the immigrants' ability to live on low wages, coupled with the fact that to-day all our export trade is carried on because the home consumer is paying prices for all manufactured goods that insures a profit over the whole output.

Agriculture can no longer carry the burden of urban industry, but that seems to be the reason to-day for the advocacy of a vigorous immigration policy. If that is what we are doing, then I say we are piling up wrath against the day of wrath, because artificiality in trade sooner or later must be reckoned with. To-day the United States government is face to face with the result of its own policy. The concentration of wealth has gone forward in that country with such acceleration as to render necessary direct aid to their millions of farmers. I want to warn our government that through a false fiscal policy we have brought about an unstable condition in the industry of agriculture in Canada. That is, urban industry is fast destroying agricultural industries, and also it is destroying community life in our rural areas.

But to return again to land values. If that was the idea of immigration, I want to say it is the development of a community life which increases the value of land. I do not think we can afford lightly to pass over the facts as they face us to-day. First, let us be sure what is the purpose of this nation in spending many millions of dollars to bring in millions of human beings, whom, I am sure, under present conditions it will be impossible for us to absorb in our social and economic life, under our present fiscal system. It is a thorough insight into actual facts and forces with recognition of their bearing upon what makes life worth living that constitutes the true foundation of national life. Woodrow Wilson, not long before he died, said:

> All this country needs,—
> Speaking of the United States.
> —is a new and sincere thought in politics coherently and distinctly uttered by men who are sure of their ground.

President Wilson was conscious that something was wrong, that something was needed in the national life of the United States to offset the selfish attitude of those who at that time not only completely controlled industry and credit—and credit particularly to the agriculturist—but controlled the government of the United States as well. Let me say that practically speaking Canadian urban industry has been built up on the same sort of selfishness, which is ruining the agricultural life of the country to-day and making necessary a policy of immigration. It is destructive of rural life because it drives the virile and what should be the contented farmer, or the farmer's sons and daughters, into the city. If we are going to carry on an active immigration policy for the one purpose of filling our vacant lands, then let us do first things first; and the first thing to do is to find out that farming can be carried on in such a way as to justify our placing on the land an immigrant with the average capital and ability which immigrants have. Those of us in this house who know most about farming can come to only one conclusion on this whole matter: You cannot make farming pay to-day, either in eastern or in western Canada, unless it is carried on on a large scale. The farmer who is going to be successful in Canada must now be a real capitalist himself. This is why I say that to bring in working people to make homes on the land is a useless policy for the government to pursue; all it can do is to provide cheap labour for urban industry. These industries are controlled by a class of people who admit that they cannot live except by class privilege. They must therefore live by exploiting their workers and the rest of the population. Through high prices this policy has made it impossible to carry on and to compete in world's markets. But the farmer has to compete against the cheap labour of the whole world, and were agriculture to-day to be treated as other industries are treated, if it were possible to do so, you could not keep people off the land wherever there was a farm to be got. It is because of our false economic and fiscal policy that immigration proves to be so futile.

I come now to another point which is bound to create some concern and which the government is bound to take note of sooner or later if our immigrants are to be settled on the land to any great extent by educational and financial aid. I want to ask: What is to be done with the product? Will the government of this country have to undertake to guarantee a price in the market for agricultural produce if raised in much greater quantities than it is to-day? That has already become necessary, seemingly, in the United States; direct aid there has become essential to the agriculturist. But why do we blindly follow the same policy, as we are doing, without considering the consequences that are bound to ensue? For many years past we have listened to the fatuous argument of the protected interests about creating a home market for agricultural products. This is perhaps the most stupid argument ever put forth to get the agriculturist population to vote for class privilege. Now before you put forth a plea for immigration, I repeat that farming cannot be carried on to-day without large capital. Let me ask this question of those who are urging a policy of immigration: Will they undertake to provide work for all who come? Will each undertake to provide employment for a given number? Since the country is guaranteeing profits to urban industries, will they take care of the labour which they advocate we should bring in from other countries? I should like, too, to hear what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) has to say on this question. Will he say now how many workers are needed—workers whom Canada cannot supply at the present time? So far as I can find out, there was a surplus of labour in every city this spring throughout Canada. The argument put forth to-day is this: we need immigration to make Canada prosperous. The policy evidently is to fill up the vacant lands much further north than we have already done. Will the government, let me ask, take the produce then from the farmer's hands at a profit and treat the agriculturist as we are now treating the capitalist, ensuring a dividend to all expended capital each year? And, indeed, not only invested capital but watered stock, on which the public is expected to pay dividends but which drives prices away out of line with world's markets. All our urban industries are waterlogged, and we give to the capitalist and the industrialist the privilege of fleecing the consumer to pay dividends on this watered stock.

There would be no need of an immigration policy to-day if the agriculturist were treated as he ought to be and the burden of urban industry taken off his back. Now last August —on August 14, 1928—there was a conference in Saskatoon among the United Farmers of Canada and the women's section of that institution, the Canadian Legion, the Saskatoon Trades and Labour Council and the rural municipalities of Saskatchewan, and they were all unanimous in opposing the present immigration policy of this government. They urged in a resolution, passed unanimously there, that the government appoint a commission to inquire into the need or otherwise of immigration, and that the commission report here before any policy of the kind be followed.

I want to deal with one or two things in connection with what the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) has said. He says that the question is of great importance and, further, that matters are not very satisfactorily carried on; in fact, he says that the government's policy has been a failure. He says that we have in Canada three and a half millions of square miles filled with natural resources which need to be developed. Yet he himself has repeatedly, even this session, advocated a policy that fleeces every inhabitant in that great area to provide a living for those who choose to live in a very small area in Quebec and Ontario and who admittedly must have special privilege before they can exist, not having the initiative to go into these great areas where these natural resources are to be found and to develop them and this country, as the hon. member advocates.

Then the hon. member said we could take many more people of all kinds, and I was glad to hear him make that statement. In answer I want to say that what Canada needs most is a group of business men who will invest capital in industry without first linking up with the politicians as the one essential to going into business in Canada. We want a group of business men who can carry on by their own industry and ability without coming here to seek a special privilege which places an unjust burden upon the whole population. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Fort William put forth that argument.

The hon. member doubted the statement of the Minister of Immigration with regard to prosperity. I want to say that if the wealth in Canada to-day were properly distributed we all would be able to feel something of the prosperity which is said to be prevalent throughout the country. However, the class for which the hon. member speaks does not care to develop the natural resources of this country with their own earnings; they prefer to invest their money in foreign countries. To-day we have invested in foreign countries over $1,700,000,000 of Canadian money, the earnings of our agriculturists and others, taken out of their pockets by high prices and high rates of interest, yet those who are concentrating our wealth in the hands of the few do not see fit to put their money back into the development of their own country. That is why we need a policy of immigration; that is why our people are leaving the land, and for one I wish to protest to-night against an immigration policy under which the government brings in peasants from central Europe to take our places when, under present conditions, we cannot live on the land. These are facts we must face, and I want this house to face them squarely.

The hon. member spoke about sheep raising; he said there were twenty-six million sheep in Great Britain, and the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) interjected that those sheep were raised in that small area without protection. The hon. member for Fort William replied that this was the case because England is the greatest cloth-producing country in the world. Why is that so? Why cannot Canada be, in proportion, an equally great cloth-producing country? The reason is that our false fiscal policy has driven the cost of manufacturing cloth entirely out of line with world prices and we are unable to compete in the markets of the world except by placing the burden upon the agriculturists and workers of this country. Our policy of trade penalties has so driven the cost of production out of line with world prices that we cannot compete in world markets. The labourer and the mechanic, through proper organization, to some extent have raised their wages to meet the high cost of living, but that is something the agriculturist cannot do; he must accept world prices. We have an object lesson today in the United States, where the farmers are calling for direct aid; and what about our own maritime provinces? Even they need direct aid to-day; they cannot live without such aid. Why is that necessary? It is necessary because the cost of manufacture and distribution is such that those who are now producing the greatest part of the national income, the agriculturists, fail to stay on the land and make their permanent homes there.

Again, the hon. member said he wants to keep our young people in our own country, but in my opinion before we can do that we must keep our own money here to develop our natural resources. You cannot take the money out of the pockets of the agriculturists through high prices and high rates of interest and invest it in foreign countries, and at the same time expect our young men to remain in Canada. Of those who have claimed for many years to have a monopoly of patriotism I would ask if they consider it a patriotic act to invest over $1,700,000,000 of Canadian money in foreign countries and then bring in from southern Europe immigrants who are accustomed to a lower standard of living and who work for lower wages. Is that reasonable? We must face first things first; let those who advocate a policy of immigration be consistent in what they say and do.

The hon. member for Fort William also said that cheap countries are poor countries. Canada is not a cheap country, but I venture to say that the average worker in Canada to-day is no better off than the average worker in any other country, particularly countries such as Denmark and Holland. The United States is not a cheap country; it is not a country of low prices. We have been advised by every advocate of protection in this house to follow the policy of the United States, but to-day the farmers of that country are at their wits' end; they are at the end of their tether and they can go no further until aid is given. President Hoover was elected on his promise of agricultural aid.

I merely desired to place some of these ideas before the house, particularly since the hon. member for Fort William did the same thing in a very passionate speech. I want to warn this house that a vigorous immigration policy is not suited to Canada at present. We have plenty of farmers and we appear to have plenty of workers, and unless the government will face this question of finding markets and finding work for all immigrants I think we should be very careful of the class and quantity of people we bring to this country.

Mr. M. J. MALONEY (South Renfrew): I should like to say a few words in connection with this very important matter, but before doing so I might mention that I was very much struck by the speech of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen). In that connection I might report a rumour which I am sure will bring joy to the heart of the Minister of Immigration and at the same time consternation to the hearts of many hon. gentlemen from the western provinces who for some years have stood solidly behind the government. The rumour is that my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) is about to be raised to the dignity of a senatorship and that his successor in the cabinet as Minister of Immigration will be the hon. member for Marquette.

An hon. MEMBER: Either of them would be good.

Mr. MALONEY: If that is the intention of the government, I do not think the selection will secure for this country an adequate supply of immigrants, and that is very unfortunate indeed. After hearing the hon. member for Marquette I was struck by the fact that you could not tell whether he favoured bringing immigrants into the country or keeping them out. There is one thing I will say for him, he was honest in many of his declarations. He stated that in various sections of western Canada there were men who were willing and ready to work for a dollar a day and board themselves. If that is the fact, can that be considered as a strong advertisement to induce the outsider to come here and seek a home in Canada? What a sad commentary on the efficiency of the present government!

The question of immigration has been dormant throughout this present session; nothing has been heard of it until to-day. This seems all the more significant in view of the fact that last session it was perhaps the most important of all topics discussed by the house. It was a topic which engaged the attention of a very important committee of members of the House of Commons, men who sat day after day, week after week, taking evidence from every part of the country. They had before them men of science, men of everyday walks of life, men who are at the head of our great industrial organizations and transportation systems. They all told their story and it was all taken down. Their evidence was aimed at the one point, that increased immigration would be the salvation of this country. What has become of the labours of that committee? All this evidence has been pigeon-holed and carefully hidden away in some obscure government office, resting side by side with many other abortions which may be laid at the door of the present government. What a sad disappointment it is to those people of Canada who had the high hope, after hearing of the extensive investigations of that committee, that this question of immigration was about to be definitely settled for all time to come. What a disappointment there must be in the hearts of the people of Canada when they consider the attitude of the government in connection with that matter.

How different is the attitude of the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae). He brings forth a bold, advanced scheme, remembering as he does that we in this country have stupendous resources as well as staggering liabilities. The hon. member realizes that we require men and women of the right type to assist us in developing and exploiting those resources but who will be willing to share the liabilities with us. Realizing that fact, the hon. member presented a bold and advanced plan for the colonizing of this country. Right at this point I beg to extend to him my very sincere congratulations on the magnificent effort which he put forth this afternoon. He spoke because of personal contacts; he depicted the possibilities of that section as perhaps few members of this house would be able to do. He had confidence in his argument, and I for one see much of merit in what he had to say because I believe his project would solve many of the difficulties now confronting the people of Canada in the matter not only of provision for future immigrants but also of providing occupations for those who are now here.

I believe that people of the right type, no matter where they come from, are the most desirable for Canada at the present time. There is one phase which strikes me more forcibly than any other in connection with the problem of immigration, and that is the bringing back to this country of those of our sons and daughters who are to-day living outside of Canada and earning a living away from home. The most important aspect of the whole immigration question is that which has to do with the repatriation of our fellow Canadians who are now living in the United States. Our population to-day is estimated at about 9,500,000. Consider the fact that at least half as many more are residing outside of Canada; almost 5,000,000 Canadian people are to-day living in the United States. That is a very pathetic condition. Our every effort should be bent in endeavouring to recover those who have gone from our shores, but up to the present we see no evidence of any improvement so far as that phase of the question is concerned. It is true that the Minister of Immigration quoted figures; it is true that he haggled for two or three minutes on the figures of some 25,000 Americans who had come here and some 30,000 Canadians who had returned. They came back, but for a visit only. More than half of those he mentioned stayed here for two or three weeks with the old people at home and then returned to the United States with a brother or sister for whom they had procured employment. During the last seven years we have lost 240,000 more than our total immigration for the same period. During that period 962,000 immigrants entered Canada; in other words, we lost 1,200,000 people in the last seven years. Where did they go to? In looking over a monograph issued by the Department of Commerce of the United States I find that French-Canadians comprise 33.1 per cent of the foreign-born white population of the state of Maine; they comprise 42 per cent of the foreign-born white population of the state of New Hampshire; and they comprise 31.8 per cent of the foreign-born white population of the state of Vermont. The French-Canadians are our greatest colonizers, and we have allowed them to escape from Canada, their native home, to settle in a foreign land. Why should that be? These men and women should be back here in Canada and to that end our every effort should be bent. The same thing applies to Canadians who are not of French extraction. That class of Canadians comprise 35.9 per cent of the foreign-born white population of the state of Maine, 15.3 per cent of the foreign-born white population of the state of New Hampshire, and 24 per cent of the foreign-born white population of the state of Vermont. Take the totals: Canadians as a whole comprise 69 per cent of the foreign-born white population of the state of Maine, 57.3 per cent of the foreign-born white population of the state of New Hampshire, and 55.8 per cent of the foreign-born white population of the state of Vermont.

If we go farther west we find that the border states from New York right through to the Pacific coast are filled with our sons and daughters. That is a pathetic situation. Why should it exist? It has been said here to-day, and it has been said before, that the attraction of the larger for the smaller body may have something to do with the situation. In other words, the force of gravity comes into operation, but for the benefit of those who reason in that way I would say that there is another physical law, another physical force greater even in its application, its might, than is the great force of gravity. I refer to the force of cohesion, that force which binds and holds together the various units of any body. The Canadians who are now in the United States are bound to us by that power of cohesion. They cherish the land of their birth; the years of their childhood days are ever before them. They are our own flesh, blood and bone; why should we not make every effort to have them return?

It is said that population depends greatly on subsistence; that wherever we have the most food suitable for sustaining the human race, there we find the greatest congregations of people. It is said that the people in those sections are happy in proportion to the quantity of food which a day's labour will procure. If that be a correct statement, why should Canada not be filled from end to end with the very best type of citizens selected from all over the world? Here we have a country independent economically of the rest of the whole, wide world; no other country on the face of the earth is more independent economically than is the great Dominion of Canada. We can, if we so desire, live within ourselves for all time; we do not have to depend for our existence on any other nation, and yet when the Hawley-Smoot proposals were laid before the congress of the United States a short time ago, the comments made thereon by some of our citizens were somewhat perturbing. We had for example our good Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), when he heard the news of what the proposals meant to the people of Canada, reported by the newspapers as shouting: "Good cheer, we shall survive." Of course we shall survive. We shall survive in spite of the Hawley-Smoot proposals. We shall survive in spite of the inaction of the government in the matter. Let me say that the worm will turn some day; the farmer of Canada who is to-day the under-dog will, just as soon as there is a change of government in this country, come into the position which is his, namely, a position of prosperity. The minister must feel that, had our friends to the south gone further and imposed a little extra tariff in addition to that which they have proposed, they would have crushed us out of existence; that we are dependent on them almost completely. Has it come to this, that a country situated and endowed as ours is to feel that it is dependent on any foreign power? Has it come to this, that we, free men of Canada, are compelled to turn the other cheek and say to those of our competitors who see fit to impose trade barriers against us: If you do not increase the tariff too greatly, we shall survive. Such an attitude of mind on the part of our statesmen is sufficient to make any Canadian's red blood boil. I submit that is a condition which should be remedied by the government of this country.

The United States of America had their immigration problem just as we have ours. In 1810 the population of the United States was 8,000,000. In 1812 a war which broke out forced that nation to fall back on their own resources and to manufacture that which they needed for themselves. The result was a tremendous advance in industry in that country, and with that advance and growth of industry there occurred an accompanying development and opening up of new lands. It is a positive fact that during almost three-quarters of the last century the United States of America absorbed more than 30,000,000 unassisted immigrants, men, women and children. Why? Because the immigrants followed prosperity; with the industrial and agricultural development which took place after the war of 1812, the trend of immigration could not be stopped. The result was that in a comparatively brief period more than 30,000,000 people came into that country unassisted. There is in this a very striking lesson for our own country. The population of Canada to-day compares with that of the United States of a century ago. We have in our possession to-day resources which perhaps they did not have in those days, resources which are superior in many respects to those possessed by the United States. We must do what the United States did after the war of 1812, namely, manufacture our own raw products in our own country and import raw materials to manufacture for our own use as required instead of exporting to the United States and other foreign countries hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of raw or semi-raw products to be manufactured abroad, bringing work, comfort and happiness to men and women of a foreign nation rather than our own. Let us manufacture these products at home: let us give that work to the boys and girls of this country; let us increase our population as the United States did theirs after 1812, and then Canada will not require any government assistance in regard to immigration. If conditions such as these were brought about, among the first to return to Canada would be many of the 5,000,000 Canadians who are to-day south of the line, men and women who can never forget the old home ties, who are looking longingly to Canada, their home, awaiting an opportunity to come back and better themselves.

This government has never made an honest effort to aid immigration; in fact, on the other hand, it has apparently done what it could, without too much publicity about it, to impede immigration. The Minister of Immigration and his prospective successor spoke in the house this afternoon and evening, and yet we cannot honestly say whether they are prepared to receive immigration or whether they are anxious to keep it out. They are marking time. That is not what we desire in Canada. As a matter of fact, the whole history of this government has been against bringing immigrants to Canada. I notice in the Hansard of March 20, 1923, a statement quoted that was made by the Minister of the Interior. He said:

> What is the use of bringing people to this country if they cannot exist?

That was a fine advertisement for this great Dominion of Canada, coming from the lips of an important member of the government. If he held those views in 1923, they must of necessity be greatly accentuated at the present time because conditions in Canada to-day are less favourable for the ordinary individual than they were in 1923. Take agriculture, for instance. The position of the farmer in this country is not an enviable one.

[Mr. Maloney.]

Let me read a short extract from a speech delivered by Captain John D. Cameron, of the Canadian Pacific Railway colonization department. Speaking a few weeks ago in this city he said:

> He had recently surveyed old Ontario and he was amazed to find rural figures in many places now stood lower than they did before confederation. The rural population of Oxford county was 40,969 before confederation, and now was only 23,342.

That is in Oxford county, the garden of the great province of Ontario. If the farming population of the county of Oxford has become depleted to that extent, surely the government should take heed and do something to remedy the conditions. What has the government done to encourage the farmer? What has it done to encourage the young men and the young women to stay on the farm? What has it done to make farming more profitable and more pleasant? Has it done a solitary thing to aid the farmers? It did do one thing. By order in council, passed without the sanction of parliament and without the consent of the people, the government entered into an agreement with New Zealand under which thirty million pounds of New Zealand butter were brought in last year, thousands of tons of beef and lamb, and at the same time millions and millions of dozens of eggs were allowed to come in from the United States and China, all of which were thrown on the open markets of this country to come into competition with the produce of the Canadian farmer. Is it any wonder that the rural population of the great county of Oxford has become rapidly depleted, as shown by the statement of Captain Cameron? The farmer who works from early morning till late at night will, I am sure, appreciate the fact that the government has allowed one of his competitors seven thousand miles away from here to ship in his produce almost free of duty—the very products that the Canadian farmer is endeavouring to supply.

If the scheme proposed by my hon. friend for North Vancouver should go into effect it would relieve the situation to a considerable extent. It would, in the first place, apply to our Canadians, something which no scheme brought forward by this government up to the present time has done. It would give the farmer and the farmer's sons in eastern Canada and in western Canada the right to take advantage of the privileges which this scheme offers. It would give to our Canadian boys in the United States who are to-day anxious to get home an opportunity to return and start life on the farm in this great western country. It would relieve the unemployment situation to a great extent. It would repatriate many of our citizens. It would bring happiness to a great many of the citizens of this country.

If we want immigration we must improve conditions. We must make Canada a country fit to live in, a country which will attract the better elements from all over the world. To do that we must have a complete change of front on the part of our government.

In the first place, to be prosperous and happy and to attract immigrants to our shores, we must manufacture our raw materials at home. We must bring in raw materials to manufacture for our own purposes where required. We must preserve the home market for our farmers; we must preserve the home market for our industrialists. We must make Canada the greatest producing nation on earth, and when we have accomplished that let us see to it that markets are found throughout the length and breadth of the world. When these conditions are brought about Canada will have no need of a minister of immigration and no need of an immigration policy, for immigration will flow to us, unsolicited, from all sides.

Mr. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the constructive suggestions that have been offered from this side of the house and the criticism that has been made of the Department of Immigration, I feel that I must confine my observations to a very limited time.

Probably one of the most fundamental problems affecting the growth of a young country is that which relates to immigration. The keen interest that the Canadian people have taken in this great problem is indicated by the comment and continued criticism of the public press, the churches, societies of various kinds, organized business interests—not the least among which have been the two great transportation systems in Canada—as well as criticism by the opposition party which sits to your left, Mr. Speaker, in this house. We have indeed a real problem on our hands. Lack of interest in it has been shown by the inactivity, dire neglect, and stagnant attitude of the present administration. Since they came into power they have talked of unbounded prosperity. They have received proposals of assistance from the British government, which has set aside $225,000,000 to assist the emigration of the unemployed in Great Britain to the British dominions. During all these years the government of Canada has been jostling about this Department of Immigration, letting it grow daily weaker and weaker like an illegitimate child crying for adoption. In 1922, when this government came into power, immigration and colonization was thrown into the Department of the Interior, under the careful management of the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). In 1924-25, the department for a while was taken care of by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). Afterwards it was taken care of for a time by the Hon. Mr. Low, and later, in 1925, just prior to the election, it was loaned for a time to the Hon. Mr. Gordon, the then member for West Peterborough, afterwards sadly defeated in that riding. In 1926 it was again thrown into a corner of the Department of the Interior, under the tender care of the present Minister of the Interior. In 1926, when this great ship of state set out to sea, the department was used as a political lifebuoy to pick up the then drifting captain of the Progressive boat. We find that he had with him in these stormy waters the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) as first mate.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. gentleman has missed one minister of immigration.

Mr. LAPOINTE: A minister for two months.

Mr. ROWE: He was in just as long as the Hon. Mr. Gordon, in fact a little longer. I thought probably the Minister of Immigration was going to deny that the member for Lisgar was his first mate in the old Progressive boat. He has drawn my attention to another feature. I have been looking through this little red book which gives a record of the members of this house. I find that the Hon. Mr. Forke is listed here as a Progressive. Then I recall those days when the right hon. Prime Minister, in answer to a question by the then leader of the opposition as to what kind of cabinet he was going to form, stated emphatically across the floor: No member will join my cabinet unless he is a straight out-and-out Liberal. This book was printed in 1929—this year. I pause for a moment to ask the Minister of Immigration whether he sits in this house as a Liberal-Progressive or as a Liberal.

Mr. FORKE: I was nominated in the city of Brandon by a Liberal convention.

Mr. BENNETT: Following the Progressive convention.

Mr. LAPOINTE: A good combination.

Mr. ROWE: Then I will pass this book across to the Minister of Immigration for revision. I well remember the occasion when in the city of Toronto he declared himself in these words: I am not only a Progressive, I am an advanced Liberal. So I could scarcely understand how he was elected as a Liberal-Progressive in the last election. However, this red book shows that he was elected a Progressive in September 1926, and on November 2, 1926, he was nominated as a Liberal-Progressive candidate and reelected. Apparently there are grave errors in this red book. I have no doubt that his friends on this side of the house who followed him so loyally through those years will be satisfied with his declaration that he no longer wishes to bear their name.

While, Mr. Speaker, we have had no lack of schemes proposed in the immigration department, those schemes have never been put into execution. Since this government came into power we have had eight speeches from the throne enunciating six different policies on immigration; in two years there was no policy set forth. In 1922 the speech from the throne contained this pronouncement: We must have a renewal of effort on the part of the Immigration department in order to bring in an increased number of immigrants. In 1923 the speech from the throne contained this statement: We must have a wide expansion, a new publicity program, a program to reach throughout the empire and also into the United States and other foreign countries. In 1924 there were two or three changes of ministers and no policy. In 1925 the speech from the throne contained another pronouncement on immigration. In that year we on this side of the house recall the manufacture of that famous phrase "The high cost of living". It was discovered that the only relief for this condition was greater production, and that the only way to bring this about was to increase the flow of immigration. Therefore the government decided that efforts must be made to increase immigration to bring about that greater production, and incidentally to extend the settlement of crown lands, with special consideration of the Peace River district. In 1926 the speech from the throne stated that in view of the favourable conditions prevailing in the Dominion the government had formed a new and comprehensive immigration policy, and as a corollary the government proposed a broad repatriation scheme by way of rural credits and other benefits to the country districts. In 1927, although six new ministers had been appointed since 1921, the then holder of the portfolio started the year without any policy at all. But in 1928 another new policy was announced. The speech from the throne stated: We must have cooperation with the different provinces, we must pass the responsibility on to the provincial authorities, and we are now going to make a definite attempt to bring in British youths under a special settlement scheme. In the speech from the throne this session, in pursuance of the recommendations of the committee on immigration and colonization, we were to enter into an arrangement with the different provinces to bring to Canada juvenile immigrants who were to be strictly selected for their adaptability as settlers with a view to promoting general prosperity throughout the Dominion.

Now, after all this publicity, after six years with programs announced and two years without any at all, we find the Minister of Immigration still drifting peacefully on the quiet waters of government inactivity. To-day we realize that the government of Canada has practically no immigration policy. It is not much wonder that through all this confusion we have the present stagnation in immigration. Illuminating figures have been placed on Hansard to-night. Everyone throughout the Dominion realizes that the flow of immigration has been changed almost to a flow of emigration; tens of thousands of our best sons and daughters have left their native land for the United States. I venture to say that in the New England states to-day there are almost as many French Canadians as there are, Mr. Speaker, in your native province. We have heard supporters of the government state to-night that they do not want any more immigration. They are prepared to concede that Canada needs a few more of the right class, a few "hand-picked" immigrants. I submit that while they are hand-picking those immigrants the department will have no time for any other activities. In fact the real work of the department will stagnate as usual.

On motion of Mr. Rowe the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, May 23, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 309, respecting The Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company, and to change its name to "The Dominion of Canada General Insurance Company."—Mr. Geary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Twelfth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Brown.

Twelfth report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. —Mr. Cahill.

Seventh report of the select standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Morin (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville).

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

REFUND OF FEES AND CHARGES

Mr. F. S. CAHILL (Pontiac): With the leave of the house I would move, seconded by Mr. Neill:

That the recommendation contained in the twelfth report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines respecting refund of fees and charges, less the cost of printing and translation, of Bill No. 40 to incorporate the Montreal Underground Terminal Company, be concurred in.

This is merely to enable the promoters of the bill to have the fees refunded to them.

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course that money must be voted by the house because the moment the money is deposited with the officers of the house and the bill does not pass, the money automatically goes back to the receiver general.

Mr. CAHILL: The motion is to refund the money.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would say: Stand.

Mr. CAHILL: Why should it stand? I think it has been the custom to make a motion of this kind in the past.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

Motion stands.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. GEORGES BOUCHARD (Kamouraska) moved:

That the select standing committee on the printing of parliament be given leave to sit while the house is in session.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough) moved:

That the select standing committee on marine and fisheries be given leave to sit while the house is in session.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMITTEE'S REPORT

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I beg to move:

That the recommendations contained in the second report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations presented to the house on May 1st last be concurred in.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that should stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand? Notice has been given.

Mr. McINTOSH: Notice of this motion has been given since May 1, and I think it has stood long enough. I am ready to go on with this motion to-day.

The report presented to the house by the committee on industrial and international relations on the first day of May, and printed in the votes and proceedings of May 1, No. 52, is a report based on a resolution adopted by this house on February 14. That resolution, after adoption by the house, was sent to the committee for investigation and report, the committee being instructed to investigate and report on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity. The house will remember that last year this same resolution was before the committee on industrial and international relations, and last year's report was adopted by the house on June 6th. That report is of importance at the present time.

Before entering into an analysis of last year's report, I should like to say on behalf of the committee of which I am chairman that we have done our best during the last two years to unravel this complicated question and bring in a report that would be favoured by the house. If there is any fault to find with the report I believe that it can be traced to the fact that the resolution which was before the house was not considered seriously enough before being sent on to the committee. I believe the committee has done excellent work. I am not speaking for myself as chairman of the committee, but I believe that we have given to the resolution all the time, care and study that was possible. Lord Disraeli once said that man has been made to adore and obey. I do not know about the adoration so far as this committee's work is concerned, but I do know that the committee has tried to obey the instructions of the house, to investigate and report on a very difficult question, one of the most technical questions that can come before any committee of the house. There is more than one viewpoint to consider when examining a question of this kind. It needs not only vision to see the problem in hand, but a little sentiment also to warm up to a resolution of that nature, and then it is for the committee to do its best in an executive way to bring in a report that will be satisfactory to the house and to the country.

Hon. members will notice that in the treaty of Peace, in section 1 of part XIII, dealing with labour and the question of universal peace, the statement is made, and I believe it is true, that if we want universal peace in the world it must be based on social justice. If we are to have social justice we must pay attention to some of the fundamentals of labour.

The preamble of this labour section of the treaty of peace first of all deals with a number of important questions affecting labour. It speaks of the injustice and hardship surrounding, for instance, the control of labour; secondly, of insurance against unemployment, sickness, invalidity and old age; thirdly, of the necessary organization and association to bring labour problems before the public; it also deals with the special need for vocational and technical education. These are some of the labour problems that we must face if we are to solve the problems of the labour world and do social justice to all in need in order to bring about national and international peace. They are ideas which concern the justice of labour, and must be carried into effect if humanity is to play its part in solving problems of this kind.

The report that was presented to the house last year was divided into numerous parts. The committee took the stand, in the first place, that unemployment is an important national problem, and a problem that must be faced and solved if we are to solve the problems of the labour world during the next few years. We cannot dodge the issue; we must face it provincially and nationally. Some hon. members may think that a resolution of this kind is not very important, but it is bound to assume more and more importance as the years pass by.

In the second clause of last year's report the committee took a square stand on the question of unemployment insurance; that is, insurance against unemployment based on compulsory contributions by the employer, the employee, and the state. The next clause in that report, which was adopted by the house on June 6th last year, places the responsibility for unemployment insurance upon the different provinces. It was a question that the committee considered to be one of provincial jurisdiction.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

The committee next drew attention to the fact that in Canada we have not got the necessary data upon which to base the approximate cost of an unemployment insurance scheme in Canada, and it asked the Labour department at Ottawa to get to work during the ensuing year and do its best to provide that data.

The other clause in the report was to the effect that the committee would like to reinvestigate the question this session. We have spent one or two months on this work.

The resolution this year again deals with insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity. The report presented a few days ago to a large extent covers the same ground as the report of last session, with one or two new features.

The committee, after investigating as far as possible the subject matter of the resolution, took pretty much the same ground as I have mentioned, last year, that insurance against unemployment should be based on a compuulsory foundation. Since the matter is one of provincial jurisdiction, and since all the provinces last year were notified of the report of the committee and replied that they were not ready to take any action, the present committee recommended: that the Department of National Health be asked to initiate a comprehensive health program by cooperating with the provincial and municipal health departments; that in the forthcoming census provision be made to register all unemployment and sickness in Canada, and that when that data is secured it should be compiled and published as quickly as possible; that when the next provincial-federal conference is held, the Dominion government should invite the representatives of organized labour and of organized industry to be present to discuss the subject matter of the report.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the present report to a large extent follows the lines of that presented last year; they have certain points in common. Briefly, both recommend compulsory contributions from the state, the employer and the employee. As the subject matter falls within the competency of the provincial authorities, the committee recommends that action be taken by the legislatures of the respective provinces. The committee recognizes the importance of securing all the data possible on sickness insurance.

This is a very important problem, Mr. Speaker, and the time has now arrived when the report of the committee should be concurred in by the house or rejected. I believe that many hon. members may not be cognizant of the subject matter of the investigation, but I believe there are others who are quite anxious to see something tangible result from it, and the sooner this report is thoroughly debated so the country and parliament may know where we are at, the better it will be for all concerned.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): With the hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. McIntosh), Mr. Speaker, I realize the very great importance of the subject matter of this report. I have followed the chairman of the committee with a great deal of interest and the closest atention in the hope that he might give the house a little more enlightenment as to what is really contained in the report.

I am one of those in this house who do not feel satisfied with the recommendations embodied in the report. I have gone into the matter rather carefully, I have attended as many of the meetings as I possibly could, and although I am not a member of the committee I appreciate the many courtesies that were extended to me by its members. They went about their work in the most diligent manner, they examined a great many witnesses, and I had hoped that after the recommendations presented last year, we might have had something more tangible as a result of their labours this session.

There has been, I believe, a great deal of unfair criticism levelled against the work of that committee. With such criticism I have absolutely no sympathy whatsoever. Nevertheless, I do think that constructive criticism —and that is the form I wish to employ on this particular question—is the kind that the chairman of the committee and the whole house will welcome.

The state has a certain responsibility to the man or woman who happens to be out of work. I believe the employer has also a certain amount of responsibility. As recorded in the report last year, it was the intention of that committee that a form of such insurance should be compulsory and be participated in by the state, the employer and the employee. With that suggestion I have no quarrel, because it follows the practice of other countries which have had similar schemes in operation for a number of years.

Last session the house accepted the principle of compulsory unemployment and sickness insurance. We are asked this year to adopt the principle once again. Personally I do not see the necessity of asking the house to endorse the same principle twice. When the committee was asked this year again to consider the question, the intention behind the resolution was for them to bring forward something more concrete than they submitted last year. In this case I must disagree with what the chairman has had to say. I regard this report as a step backwards, and I shall try to prove this to the house.

Now, the chairman of the committee in bringing this matter before the house, stated that the question was a national problem. With that statement I am in hearty agreement. If it is a national program, then I think it must be dealt with in a national manner, and not in a provincial manner. In section 3 of the report of last year, dated June 1, 1928—and the report was adopted by the house—the following recommendation is contained:

> That the evidence of the Justice department makes it clear that the responsibility for such legislation rests on the provincial authorities, it being within their jurisdiction under the provisions of the British North America Act, but that it would be within the power of parliament to contribute, by grant, to such provinces as adopted such legislation, following the precedent set in the matter of technical education, highway construction, and, more recently, the Old Age Pension Act.

Now that was the recommendation of the committee last year and it was unanimously adopted by the house. This year what do the committee recommend? A comparison of the two recommendations will show my hon. friend the chairman of the committee (Mr. McIntosh), and hon. members of the house generally, just why I regard the present report as a backward step. Paragraph 2 of the report this year has the following to say with reference to the question of jurisdiction:

> Your committee recognizes that while it is highly desirable that such legislation should be uniform in all the provinces, and while social insurance has a federal aspect, nevertheless, according to the Department of Justice, under our constitution legislative jurisdiction in relation to the establishment of a compulsory system of unemployment insurance is vested exclusively in the provincial legislatures.

And it stops there. Hon. members will here observe the difference between the report of the committee last year and the report submitted this year: last year they stated that the Dominion parliament might, if it so desired, assist in some way in the matter of legislation of this character, just as it has assisted under the Old Age Pensions Act; this year they claim in the report that the matter is entirely one within provincial jurisdiction. Now if we were to depend entirely upon the strict letter of the British North America Act, there are a great many things which this parliament has undertaken which would never have been put into force. The fact is that we have tried to find ways and means of overcoming some obstacles in the British North America Act in order that we might be able to put certain legislation into effect. Let us suppose, Mr. Speaker, that this parliament had taken, in respect to the question of old age pensions, the attitude which the committee has taken on the question of social insurance: there would never have been any Old Age Pensions Act on the statutes of this Dominion.

Again, in its report this year, the committee states that the provincial legislatures were not anxious to come within the provisions of such legislation. Let me once more refer to the question of old age pensions. If we had waited until all the provinces had signified their intention to take advantage of that legislation there would be to-day no Old Age Pensions Act on the statute books of Canada. Well, the very same thing applies now to social insurances. In this regard I venture to make this observation. Since last year, and since the beginning of this session, there seems to have been a change of opinion on the part of certain ministers of the crown. A few months ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) described as a vicious principle what he regarded as an encroachment by the federal authorities into the provincial sphere; he said that there should be a clear line of demarcation between the work of the provinces and the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. I am just wondering whether the report submitted by the committee this year does not carry out that view indicated by the Prime Minister in this house some months ago in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. However, I hope I am wrong in that surmise. Personally I hold that the questions of unemployment, sickness and invalidity insurance should be mainly a Dominion responsibility, and I believe that if the government is willing it can find ways and means of overcoming any obstacle in the way of jurisdiction as between the provinces and the Dominion. In this connection I wish to read a paragraph from the platform of the Liberal party—I am sure the government is not going to go back on its own platform of 1921.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is only a chart.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, I regard this as a very good chart, exactly as I am going to regard the Conservative party's platform of 1927 on the same question. Reading from this chart or platform I find at page 9 the following reference to this matter:

> That in so far as may be practicable, having regard for Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions, and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces; and that on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the Dominion and the provinces by effective cooperation between the several governments.

I hope I am not asking too much of the government when I suggest to them on this occasion that they put into effect their own platform of 1921 just on the eve of the election. And having read that particular plank in the Liberal party's platform, I turn now to the more recent convention held by the Conservative party in the city of Winnipeg. I do not know whether the environment of Winnipeg made them think of social insurance, but if it did I am glad that the Conservative party's convention was held in that city. Let me read just one or two paragraphs from their platform in regard to what they term capital and labour. Beginning with paragraph 9, they say:

> So far as is practicable—

Mark you, exactly the same words as used by the Liberal party in 1921. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asks me whether this is a chart. No doubt they are both charts, but at any rate I am going to ask that legislation be enacted along the lines charted by both parties:

> So far as is practicable, to support social legislation designed to conserve human life, health and temperance, to relieve distress during periods of unemployment, sickness and old age.

This is substantially, in effect, the same as the resolution adopted by the Liberal party in 1921. On a previous occasion I expressed the opinion that when the house is too unanimous on a question we generally get nowhere. I hope I am not justified in that opinion and I trust that on this occasion, in view of the unanimity of the Liberal and Conservative parties on this question, something in the way of definite legislation will result from the present committee's deliberations.

To the working people of this country this is probably the most important question that has come before the house this year; I do not think I am exaggerating in the slightest degree when I say that in the report submitted this afternoon at least 25 per cent of the people of Canada are vitally interested. Legislation along the lines I have suggested would affect that proportion of the population. Of course, I realize the difficulties in the way of enacting such legislation; but the average man and woman are not very much concerned with difficulties of jurisdiction as between the provinces and the Dominion. We overcame one difficulty in 1926 in connection with old age pensions and there is no reason why we cannot ovecome the same difficulty in relation to legislation of this character. It appears to me that if the house adopts, as it stands, the report of this committee it will be shirking its responsibility, because the whole responsibility will then rest on the provinces; and if we asked the provinces to enact such legislation it would mean that no legislation would be enacted. I cannot imagine that one province would enact a scheme of insurances while neighbouring provinces did not pass similar legislation. I can understand the situation in regard to old age pensions legislation, which is on a basis entirely different from that of a scheme of social insurances. No question of insurance is involved in the old age pension legislation; it is entirely a contribution by the state to aged persons requiring assistance. Therefore in one sense it is not such a great hardship if persons in one province do not obtain old age pensions while persons in another province are given that assistance, but in the case of social insurance in which unemployment, sickness and invalidity are involved, and where there is compulsory contribution to such a scheme by the employees, that is on an entirely different basis. Let us imagine for a moment that in the province of Ontario it was desired to adopt such a scheme; we can understand how difficult it would be for a man living in Ottawa and working in Hull. It would be almost impossible to work out such a scheme unless there was uniform legislation in all the provinces. In order to obtain the uniformity which is necessary there must be some central and responsible body to enact that legislation, and the only responsible and central body is this Dominion parliament.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if possible I would like to help the committee out on this question. According to this motion they now wish to put the whole responsibility on the provinces, but in this country we cannot have nine different schemes of social insurance; I would much prefer one scheme enacted by the federal parliament, and I believe there is a way out of the difficulty. It is a debatable question whether or not this parliament has sufficient jurisdiction in this matter, but assuming we have not that jurisdiction we can do in this matter just as we did in connection with the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. Under that act the powers vested in some of the provinces have been handed over by them to the Dominion parliament, and now this parliament has the full right to legislate with regard to industrial disputes in those provinces, under the provisions of the act to which I have just referred.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see this report referred back to the committee. I know that by so doing at this stage of the session it will mean that the report is dead so far as this year is concerned, but I will take full responsibility for such action. I would much prefer to have this report killed than to have this house adopt a report which means practically nothing to the vast majority of the working people in this country. I think if the report went back and the committee considered the suggestion I now make, that the provincial authorities vest in the Dominion authority the right to legislate in connection with unemployment, sickness and invalidity insurance, we would be taking a step forward. Even in this report it is claimed that this should be a matter for federal legislation, in order that the legislation might be uniform, and if this is the case I think we should at least try to bring into being such uniform legislation by a federal enactment.

Therefore I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill):

> That the said report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations be not now concurred in but that it be referred back to the select standing committee on industrial and international relations with instructions that they have power to amend the same by adding thereto a clause recommending that all the provinces of the Dominion be requested to pass legislation under which the jurisdiction in relation to legislation providing for unemployment, sickness and invalidity insurance based on compulsory contribution and which is now claimed to be within or subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces be vested in the Dominion government.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in a rather ambiguous position with regard to this matter; I am seconding a resolution moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) asking to amend the report of a committee of which I was a member, and in whose report I acquiesced. However, I am prepared to take the full responsibility for my action; I could not think of a better solution of the problem before us, and somewhat shamefacedly I am compelled to say to my hon. friend from North Winnipeg, in the words of Kipling, "You're a better man than I am, Gunga Din." I only hope this condition will not become habitual.

The report of the committee deals with the question of unemployment in three sections; first it endorses the principle which we endorsed last year and then it says that the provinces, on being consulted, apparently were not prepared for immediate action. The provinces were very wishy-washy in their answers; some of them merely acknowledged receipt of the letter, and no province exhibited the slightest interest in the matter. The third and the only active suggestion contained in this report is that in the forthcoming census provision should be made for the securing of the fullest possible data with regard to the extent of unemployment and sickness, and that this information should be compiled and published as soon as possible. I must confess that when we drew up that report I felt this to be quite inadequate, because the census will not be taken for another two years, and two or three years more will elapse before that information is compiled, tabulated and published, so it will be practically useless.

If I remember correctly, in the report of this committee last year it was suggested that the Labour department should take steps to ascertain by practical methods, from month to month, the extent of unemployment in Canada. Some of the officials of that department appeared before the committee this year and stated that this was practically impossible. I do not think it is impossible, and I believe a better attempt could and should have been made to obtain that information. The officials did not say it was absolutely impossible; they said it would involve enormous expense, but I do not agree with that contention either.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg has stated that the adoption of this amendment would mean the abandonment of any report from this committee this year. Seeing the nature of the report I think no great hardship will result if the matter is held over for another year, because the census will not be held for two years, and that is the only practical suggestion contained in the report. This amendment does contain a practical, concrete suggestion, and it does seem to clear the air of this continual miasma which we meet at every turn, as to the respective jurisdiction of the Dominion and of the provinces. We have been travelling around and around that question for the last two years in this committee; we have had reports and opinions from the legal officers and so on, but we do not seem to go ahead. As the hon. member stated, a precedent exists for this action; a similar policy was adopted when the provinces waived their rights under the Industrial Disputes Act, turning them over to the Dominion. That gave the Dominion full jurisdiction; that appears to have worked well and I see no reason why it should not work well in this case also.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does my hon. friend think the provinces have the right to do that without an amendment to the British North America Act?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, because whatever divergence of opinion there may be as to the rights of the provinces, we must accept the fact that they have some rights, and if the provinces pass legislation turning over these rights, whatever they may be, to the Dominion, certainly I think that would be constitutional.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does not my hon. friend think it would be more intelligent to proceed in this way: Have the federal parliament pass the legislation which is desired and make it operative only after concurrent legislation has been passed by the respective provinces?

Mr. NEILL: No, that principle was adopted in the Old Age Pension Act and it was made permissive to each province. The general scheme of unemployment, owing to its very nature, could not be made provincially permissive; it would have to be universal, and for that reason we would desire to have it handled by the one federal authority.

Mr. CAHAN: The amendment is:

That the said report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations be not now concurred in but that it be referred back to the select standing committee on industrial and international relations with instructions that they have power to amend the same by adding thereto a clause recommending that all the provinces of the Dominion be requested to pass legislation under which the jurisdiction in relation to legislation providing for unemployment, sickness and invalidity insurance, based on compulsory contribution and which is now claimed to be within or subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, be vested in the Dominion government.

Does the hon. gentleman suggest that, when specific jurisdiction is vested under the constitution in the provinces, the provinces by any conceivable legislation could revest that jurisdiction in the Dominion parliament? It seems to me to be the most extraordinary suggestion I have heard for some time.

Mr. NEILL: That was the belief of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) and myself, and we have the precedent of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. However, the recommendation was merely that it be referred back to the committee with instructions along those lines. This is not an enactment and it was drawn by men who are not constitutional lawyers like my hon. friend. When it is sent back to the committee we hope to avail ourselves of the opportunity of putting it in the precise legal phraseology.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am bound to object to the amendment of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) as I believe that it could not be adopted by this parliament, as is suggested by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). The amendment proposes:

that all the provinces of the Dominion be requested to pass legislation under which the jurisdiction in relation to legislation providing for unemployment, sickness and invalidity insurance based on compulsory contribution and which is now claimed to be within or subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces be vested in the Dominion government.

We would be asking the provinces to do something which they have no right, no power and no authority to do.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the hon. minister explain how the authority was given under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is quite different. The hon. member proposes in his amendment that it would of necessity be a compulsory contribution. A compulsory contribution by employers and by employees, as has been said in the house, is undoubtedly a matter of civil rights as it affects the civil rights of both the employers and the employees, and it comes clearly and exclusively within the scope of the matters assigned to the provinces for legislation under the British North America Act.

Mr. HEAPS: Are there no civil rights under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There was no compulsion placed upon anyone. That act had to be changed in order to make it constitutional, as my hon. friend knows. That act was declared unconstitutional by the Privy Council and we had to change it and limit it to federal matters which came within the powers of this federal legislature. We offered the machinery of the Labour department and of this enactment to the provinces who might ask this parliament to put that machinery at their disposal in the case of industrial disputes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Did not the provinces surrender certain rights which they claimed to be provincial?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They passed enabling legislation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am quite sure that the provinces would never agree to this parliament imposing contributions and taxation on their citizens in matters which were undoubtedly provincial; they would not agree to that, and even if they did agree I do not think they would have the right to do so. The provinces have the right to delegate certain powers to municipalities, to commissions and to bodies which are of their own creation, and those bodies have the right to pass regulations and by-laws, but the provinces under the provisions of the British North America Act cannot delegate those powers to the federal parliament. That act is a charter—it is not a chart as explained by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) a few minutes ago—of the provinces and a charter of the Dominion, and neither one has the right to change it. If my hon. friend will not accept my views in this matter perhaps he will accept the views of the Privy Council. I have here the words of Lord Watson, given in a case reported in Lefroy's Canada's Federal System, in which he said:

The Dominion cannot give jurisdiction, or leave jurisdiction, with the province. The provincial parliament cannot give legislative jurisdiction to the Dominion parliament. If they have it, either one or the other of them, they have it by virtue of the act of 1867. I think we must get rid of the idea that either one or the other can enlarge the jurisdiction of the other or surrender jurisdiction.

To these remarks Lord Davey added, "or curtail."

Mr. CAHAN: Have you the reference from which you are quoting?

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is in the course of the argument in Canadian Pacific R. W. Co. versus Bonsecours, (1899) A.C. 367.

Sir John Thompson, when Minister of Justice in 1889—the house will find his words on page 218 of the same book—said that he had to express his dissent from the view:

—that the interpretation of the British North America Act can in any way be affected by subsequent legislation by parliament, or the legislatures, or by any action of the government. No legislative body can, by legislation, increase or diminish the authority conferred upon it by the constitution, nor can any expression of opinion or course of legislative action by either afford any conclusive or even satisfactory guide to its interpretation.

No person in Canada can be bound by acquiescence in unconstitutional legislation on the on the part of governments, even if such acquiescence has occurred.

It is an elementary principle that governments, no more than individuals, can do indirectly what they cannot do directly. In that regard I will read two leading propositions of Lefroy in his book entitled Canada's Federal System. They are propositions Nos. 17 and 18, as follows:

17. The parliament of Canada cannot under colour of general legislation deal with what are provincial matters only, and conversely provincial legislatures cannot under the mere pretence of legislating upon one of the matters enumerated in section 92, really legislate upon a matter assigned to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

18. If the Dominion parliament or the provincial legislatures have no power to legislate directly upon a given subject matter, neither may they do so indirectly.

This is not new; the desire of going beyond the jurisdiction of a parliament is not peculiar to this one nor to the provincial legislatures in certain matters. Experience shows that all bodies are rather impatient of the limitations imposed upon their jurisdiction and powers, but in the case of a confederation like Canada, which by a contract binds every part of it together, we ought not to enter lightly upon any steps or make any move which would be an encroachment upon the powers of one or another of the legislative bodies created by that act.

There are, I believe, only two matters which clearly, under the British North America Act, come under the joint jurisdiction of the Dominion and the provinces. These are agriculture and immigration. As regards anything which concerns agriculture or immigration the federal parliament has the right to legislate and so have the provinces. In regard to health there are certain matters which the British North America Act gives to the federal government to supervise, for instance, matters concerning seamen. As a matter of fact, hospitals, with the exception of marine hospitals are placed under provincial jurisdiction. Matters concerning quarantine, inspection of immigrants and that sort of thing come under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. When parliament created the Department of Health, there were some who entertained the view that it was rather doubtful whether parliament had the authority to do so, but if my hon. friend will read the act he will see that the Canadian parliament was very careful to say that the department has no control over matters which are under provincial control. They took care to say that they would not have any control whatever of provincial bodies, and the federal acts which are to be administered by that Department of Health are specially mentioned. They also say that one of the duties of the department would be to collect information and as far as this goes I have no objection to the report of the committee in respect of the matter which we are now discussing, because it is identical to the power given to the Department of Health, to collect information, to endeavour to obtain the cooperation of the various provinces with regard to matters of health which in certain emergencies might become national in their scope. But I repeat that the amendment of my hon. friend, which specifically states that unemployment insurance would have to be established by way of compulsory contributions by the persons concerned, both employers and employees, in the provinces, it is entirely outside of our jurisdiction and we would be asking the provinces to do something which they would have no right to do by transferring their powers to the federal parliament.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Personally I endorse the principle stated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) but it seems to me to have a wider application than that which he has given to it. The first clause of this report which is found on page 338 of the votes and proceedings of May 1, 1929, reads:

> That your committee accept and endorse the principle of unemployment insurance, based on compulsory contributions derived from the state, employer and employees.

Obviously, according to the opinion given by the law officers of the government, reaffirmed to-day by the Minister of Justice, unemployment insurance which is based on compulsory contributions from the state, employer and employees, is a matter within the legislative and administrative jurisdiction of each of the several provinces of Canada. That being admitted, why should the parliament of Canada express a gratuitous opinion upon a public matter which is not within the legislative jurisdiction of parliament or the administrative jurisdiction of the government responsible to parliament? Why should we in this parliament, who have very extended duties and obligations to the public, set ourselves up as the judges of the duties and responsibilities of members of the several legislatures, and attempt, by adopting a report of a nature which I have read, to superimpose our gratuitous opinions upon the legislatures of the provinces and the governments which are responsible to those legislatures? Even if we adopt the report of the committee in its present form, we are going far outside of any jurisdiction committed to the parliament of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: It is eyewash.

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps it might be so termed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will permit me, perhaps it is a reciprocal act of courtesy, because it occasionally happens that the legislatures offer views to this parliament on certain matters.

Mr. CAHAN: I doubt whether the Prime Minister and his colleagues appreciate the courtesy of the provincial governments when they seek to impose provincial duties and responsibilities upon the government represented by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice, and such returns of courtesies of that nature simply lead us into grave and almost irremedial difficulties, or at the least they lead us into confusion of thought always. Speaking for myself, because I do not know that this report has ever been considered by the other members of the party to which I belong, and as I have no right to express their opinions, and my opinions are therefore wholly personal, I could not endorse this report containing that clause; I could not even vote for the adoption of the report. I admit that there are several other matters mentioned in the report which are within our jurisdiction; that the census, for instance, is within our jurisdiction, and it is perfectly proper for this committee to recommend to the house and for this house to recommend to the government that in the taking of the new census certain additional information should be sought by means of that census, information which is useful to this parliament and which may be particularly useful to the legislatures of the several provinces. Therefore, I would support some of the recommendations under clause 4, but I am not able personally to endorse and accept the report as a whole. I also find great difficulty in accepting the amending resolution moved by my hon. friend.

The amendment that the report should not now be concurred in I can support in its entirety. That it should be referred back to the committee for further consideration I would endorse most heartily, but that it should be sent back to that committee with a precise recommendation of this house that the committee should add to the report a clause which is not within the purview of the committee and which deals with matters that are not within the legislative jurisdiction of this house—a clause which presupposes that we are assuming powers that are not vested in this parliament under the constitution of the country—is something that I certainly could not support.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is the amendment imperative on the committee?

Mr. CAHAN: An amendment is always expressed in the courteous terms, "that the committee have power to add," such and such a clause, but it leaves the assumption that that particular clause is the matter which the commitee should consider, and that parliament anticipates and expects that the recommendation which the committee will subsequently make will be in line with the recommendation of this parliament.

First, this amendment says that the report shall be referred back to the select standing committee on industrial and international relations, "with instructions that they have power." Now when we state by our instructions to the committee that they have power to do something which is utterly beyond the powers of this parliament under the constitution of the country, we are making what is obviously not a true statement of fact or of law. We are stating to the committee that they have power, and we all know that they have no such power.

Mr. HEAPS: I would take exception to that statement. There are other authorities to the contrary which might be quoted.

Mr. CAHAN: If my hon. friend wishes to argue that issue, he can do so in his proper turn. This resolution says that "they have power to amend the same by adding a clause," but I think the implications are that the committee, a committee of this house, has power to recommend. Now what are the recommendations? First, that all the provinces of the Dominion be requested to pass legislation under which the jurisdiction—that means the jurisdiction now vested in each of the provincial legislatures—

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member says that he has just quoted the assumed instructions to the committee which request the provinces to do something. He has stated before that the committee has no power and this parliament has no power to do so. We surely have power to request the provinces to do something, whether they do it or have power to do it or not. Certainly we in this house and in that committee have power to make the request, and that is all we ask.

Mr. CAHAN: Suppose we examine that statement. The word power may be used with various meanings. I was dealing with the use that expresses the legislative and administrative powers of parliament and of the government responsible to this parliament. We can make requests, it is true. We can pass a resolution to-morrow to request the states of the United States to take certain action with regard to national prohibition. Not long ago I was paying a visit to one of the states of the American union and I went to the counter of the hotel to buy a package of cigarettes, and I was told that it was criminal to sell cigarettes in that jurisdiction. Of course, I might have come back to parliament and have asked this parliament to request that the legislature of that state should amend its laws so that foreign visitors like myself might indulge in their ordinary liberties while in that state.

Mr. NEILL: Does my hon. friend suggest that that is a parallel in any sense?

Mr. CAHAN: I think it would be regarded as equally discourteous as for us to pass a resolution requesting the provinces to revest in this parliament certain powers which they now have or which they are assumed to have under the British North America Act, because they themselves might make the retort courteous, that powers vested in those legislatures cannot be revested by them in the parliament of Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: The Prime Minister of Alberta has made this request.

Mr. CAHAN: What request?

Mr. HEAPS: He says that the question of unemployment insurance is one of federal jurisdiction.

Mr. CAHAN: That may be so. If it is a question of federal jurisdiction, then make that clear to this house, and let this house after argument and on due persuasion exercise that jurisdiction. This amendment assumes that that jurisdiction is vested in the legislatures, and we are asking the legislatures to transfer to the parliament of Canada powers which we assume are already vested in those several legislatures, and we all know that that is a constitutional impossibility.

I was referring to the amendment. It says:

that they have power to amend the same by adding thereto a clause recommending that all the provinces of the Dominion be requested to pass legislation under which the jurisdiction—in relation to unemployment, sickness and invalidity insurance, —based on compulsory contribution, and which is now claimed to be within or subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, be vested in the Dominion government.

Mr. HEAPS: Read what is in between.

Mr. CAHAN: I will read the whole thing again, although I have put this whole clause on the record once. It says:

That the said report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations be not now concurred in,—

That is the first. The second is:

—but that it be referred back to the select standing committee on industrial and international relations with instructions that they have power—

That is that the committee have power.

—to amend the same—

[Mr. Cahan.]

That is, the report.

—by adding thereto a clause recommending that all the provinces of the Dominion be requested to pass legislation under which the jurisdiction in relation to legislation providing for unemployment, sickness and invalidity insurance based on compulsory contribution, and which is now claimed to be within or subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, be vested in the Dominion government.

I think I am correct in my construction, that what the provinces are asked to do is to pass legislation vesting in the Dominion government—not even in the parliament of Canada—

Mr. HEAPS: It is merely claimed to be.

Mr. CAHAN: If it is claimed to be, and is not, then the request is ridiculous. If it is justly claimed to be within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and this resolution so assumes, then it requests that that jurisdiction shall be retransferred—at first I thought it was to the parliament of Canada, but now I find that it is to the government of Canada. In other words, that the legislative power of the provinces is to be delegated by their respective legislatures, by legislation passed by them, to the government of Canada, and that hereafter a legislative jurisdiction which is now vested in the provincial legislatures shall be exercised, not even by the parliament of Canada but by a government responsible to this parliament. Now, I suggest, with all deference to my hon. friend who proposed this resolution, that he really must see the absurdity of it, and, rather than ask us to deal with so great an absurdity, I suggest he should withdraw the resolution in its present form.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, if a layman may venture to intervene between the legal lights of this house, I may say that I find myself in a position somewhat similar to that of my neighbour who supports an amendment to a report to which he previously agreed. My position is this. I feel like supporting an amendment which I think has been unfortunately worded. From my humble point of view, the purely technical objection made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and supported by the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) is incontrovertible. It is obviously against the spirit and the letter of the constitution that the provinces should by any form of legislation divest themselves of a jurisdiction which they exercise in order to vest that jurisdiction in this parliament. Likewise, I do not think this parliament can make matters any better by inviting the provincial legislatures to do so.

But if one goes beyond the wording of any resolution or report of a committee, one must come to the conclusion that this is another exemplification of what is coming to us from year to year as a growing truth, that we have outgrown the literal bounds of the written constitution under which we live. There is not the slightest doubt that when this constitution was framed neither the upholders of legislative union nor the defenders of provincial rights ever anticipated the immense importance which labour problems would assume. They never anticipated that this question of social insurance, whether applying to unemployment, to sickness, or to any other form of social suffering, would be of such importance that it is now one of the national problems with which we have to deal.

If we take this factor as existing to-day in this year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine, a factor which is growing fast upon us, which will be more important next year and the year following than it is now, we cannot solve the problem by looking into this or that clause, or word, or semicolon of the charter under which we are governed. We must find some means to adjust those problems, and we must devise a way to come to an agreement with the various provinces wherever provincial jurisdiction is an obstacle to the exercise of national jurisdiction by the federal parliament. It seems to me that it is an imperative duty upon us.

To claim that because civil rights and property are under provincial jurisdiction this parliament is debarred, legally and constitutionally, from the accomplishment of its duty to the people of Canada at large in regard to those great social problems—I cannot agree to that. Whether or not we could by some means legislate upon this question of social insurance without an amendment to the constitution I do not know. I do not pretend to the legal knowledge and experience that may be necessary to settle that first point. But I know this, that on many other questions of state and legislation, experience has proven that the general jurisdiction exercised by the parliament of Canada for the good of Canada at large, or according to the usual phraseology "for the general advantage of Canada," has in many instances overcome the objection of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. May I quote one or two examples? With regard to the law of bankruptcy, it was questioned for many years in the province of Quebec whether this parliament had the right or the jurisdiction to legislate upon that matter, because once a law of bankruptcy was enacted by this parliament it would of necessity amend, directly or indirectly, the civil code with regard to the application of many articles of that code, promissory notes, interest, and so forth.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will allow me. Section 91, which gives the powers to the federal parliament, mentioned specifically bankruptcy and insolvency.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so; I do not dispute that. I am simply saying that once this parliament exercised its jurisdiction on matters of bankruptcy, its legislation came into conflict with many articles of the civil code, and constituted an amendment to that code without any cooperation on the part of the provincial legislature.

Now, with regard to railways, I remember a famous case in the province of Quebec a case which was pleaded by one of the most eminent lawyers of that province, the late Sir Lomer Gouin, who became premier of Quebec and afterwards Minister of Justice in this government. It was a case in which the sole issue was a conflict between the right exercised by the individual, under a certain article of the civil code, to enjoy his property as against damages sustained through the acts, whether culpable or not, of another party, and, on the other hand, the jurisdiction granted by this parliament to the railway company to operate its railways as a common conveyance, whatever might be the consequences to individuals. The question of fact was not disputed; it was admitted that the railway company had done all it could to ensure the preservation of private properties along the roads traversed by its railways. Fire was set to the individual's building by the engine of one of the company's trains and that individual sued the company. He pleaded that article of the civil code under which he was entitled to enjoy his property and under which he claimed that the railway company was responsible for all its acts. But the Privy Council decided that, parliament having granted, for the general advantage of Canada, the power to that company to run its trains throughout Canada, the right of the individual under the civil code must yield to the right of the company under that federal legislation. I cite this not as a legal point touching the matter now under discussion, but simply by way of illustration of the problems that arise day by day, placing us in the position of having to choose between the discharge of our duty to the people of Canada at large, and a scrupulous respect for the letter of the constitution

I am second to none in my respect for the basic principles of the constitution. But, I repeat, we must go ahead. This country must face its duties and the problems that arise from year to year. We cannot remain shackled by the strict letter of a constitution which was written some sixty years ago and which no longer corresponds to all the needs of the people. It is from that point of view particularly, leaving aside the wording either of the committee's report or of the proposed amendment, that I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) that this matter should be referred back to the committee for more careful consideration at another session; because if we go on at this rate, many problems that ought to be seriously studied and ultimately solved by this parliament or by the various legislatures of the country will remain unsolved, or will be delayed to the detriment of all the provinces and of the whole population at large.

We cannot divide this country into nine compartments labelled Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and so on, for the simple reason that each compartment or province has its raison d'être. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has said, this is a confederacy and ought to remain a confederacy. But Canada is also a nation; it is one country and ought to be broad enough, with a constitution flexible enough, to meet the needs of all classes of the population irrespective of province, race or any other consideration. Now these labour problems, these social insurance problems, are essentially national questions. If you wait for the nine legislatures of Canada all to deal with the situation, you will wait a long time. The reason is obvious: the labour problem may be a rural problem in one province; it may be an industrial problem in another province; or it may affect a large proportion of the population in one province and a small proportion of the population in another. We have to admit, human nature being what it is, that governments and legislatures are mainly concerned with those problems that are sufficiently acute to force themselves upon public opinion in the respective provinces. And if this social question is not of immediate concern to the government of one or another of the nine provinces, that government will take no stock in it inasmuch as the question will have no bearing upon the next provincial election. The result is that that particular province will stand as an obstacle to the action of the Dominion or of the other provinces that happen to be more concerned in the matter. I submit, therefore, that if we have to wait until the nine provinces are of one accord on every single aspect of this question we shall wait a long time; and in that event we shall remain far in the rear of all those countries which, having to face these social problems, have at least taken some action—action which, while not always leading to perfection, has at any rate brought such countries nearer a solution of their difficulties.

I do not think we should shelter ourselves for any length of time under the protection of constitutional rights, thus refraining from dealing with these problems. I must confess, as a member of the committee, that I was not as faithful and constant an attendant at its meetings as I should have been had I not been otherwise busily engaged. I may say, however, that I have followed its proceedings with sufficient care, and have read sufficiently in various publications appearing not only in this country and the United States but in Europe as well, to realize that we are far behind most other countries in dealing with social problems; and largely as a result of this situation which has presented itself to-day, as it has done on many other occasions in relation to social and other problems, whenever the question has arisen as to the respective jurisdiction of the provinces and of the federal government, we find ourselves taking the attitude that we cannot deal with the matter for the reason that it affects provincial rights. Some province will say. "We will not deal with it because, irrespective of what the people of the other provinces may feel, our people are not interested in the question." Another province will say, "Let the federal government deal with the situation."

What the hon. member for North Winnipeg has said is absolutely true. I have read the correspondence exchanged between this government and the various provincial governments in respect to this question, and the same thing applies to family allowances. We have had practically no replies from any of the provincial governments. Are we going to leave this matter at a standstill because provincial politicians, busy with other questions, refuse rightly or wrongly to deal with it? No; we must face the situation. I think, therefore, that the question ought to be referred back to the committee, not to adopt the wording of this or that clause of the amendment, or of the report itself, but to study the broad question, if necessary, of an amendment to the constitution of Canada to enable these problems to be considered in a proper and practical manner. So far as the language is concerned, I should be inclined to agree with my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). If anyone objects to the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg because of the suggestion contained therein, I do not see how that person could accept the report of the committee itself; because, as the hon. member says, the first paragraph of the report lays down in a different form the very same principle indicated in the amendment of the hon. member for North Winnipeg. If we have no right to request the provincial legislatures to enact legislation enabling this parliament to deal with the question, then how can we lay down, as is done in the first paragraph of the report, the principle that compulsory contributions to unemployment insurance ought to be the basis of such legislation? If we have no right to request the legislature to agree to that, how can we agree to it ourselves? On the other hand, if we leave aside for the time being the narrow letter of the law; if we simply desire to express broadly an opinion as to the desirability of doing something in the matter and referring the question back to the committee in order to have this aspect of the question studied, that is, the possibility of enacting legislation which will apply to the whole of Canada, then I think the amendment moved by the hon member for North Winnipeg should be supported, not because of its wording but because of its spirit.

Mr. CAHAN: Why not move an amendment to the amendment referring the question back for full consideration?

Mr. BOURASSA: I am not sufficiently apt in these things to get the proper wording for such a motion.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in a rather peculiar position in regard to this matter, since I was a member of the committee and also of the subcommittee which drew up the report. I may say frankly that the suggestion contained in the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg had not occurred to me before we drew up that report or I should have endeavoured, with what success I do not know, to have something of the kind inserted in the report. However, we are now faced with the question of dealing with this amendment.

May I recall what was stated by the mover of this motion, that under the treaty of Versailles we are already under certain obligations, and if the federal government assumed certain powers at that time and signed a treaty, later assuming the responsibility for carrying out certain conventions involving this question of unemployment insurance, it does seem to me that there is a continued responsibility laid upon us to solve the problem in some way. Apparently in this house it is very easy to raise all sorts of legal objections; technically they may be quite correct but, as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has said, we must look beyond these technicalities to the great reforms which some of us at least have in view.

Back in 1919 you will recall, Mr. Speaker, a royal commission was appointed to consider industrial relations, and I desire to read paragraph 21 from the report:

> The chief causes of unrest may be enumerated as follows:
> 1. Unemployment and the fear of unemployment.
> 2. High cost of living in relation to wages and the desire of the worker for a larger share of the product of his labour.
> 3. Desire for shorter hours of labour.
> 4. Denial of the right to organize and refusal to recognize unions.
> 5. Denial of collective bargaining.
> 6. Lack of confidence in constituted government.
> 7. Insufficient and poor housing.
> 8. Restrictions upon the freedom of speech and press.
> 9. Ostentatious display of wealth.
> 10. Lack of equal educational opportunities.

Further, the report states:

> We have placed unemployment first because we found that there was the greatest unrest where there were the most unemployed.

The commission recommended:

> We recommend immediate inquiry by expert boards into the following subjects, with a view to early legislation:
> (a) State insurance against unemployment, sickness, invalidity and old age.

That was ten years ago, but so far as I know nothing has been done in a legislative way to meet any of these evils complained about, and we are still quarrelling over the question of jurisdiction. In 1920 the Privy Council adopted the report of a committee of council which is P.C. 2722, in which I find references to this matter. With regard to the draft conventions concerning unemployment, the report states:

> The minister is further of opinion, seeing that the principal object of this convention is the establishment of a national system of employment agencies under the control of a central authority, that the Dominion is the proper authority to give effect to the proposals of the convention.

I may say that a system of federal employment agencies, carried on in conjunction with the provincial governments, has been put into effect. Then I pass on to paragraph 3 of this report, which deals with unemployment further:

> The minister observes that the experience of other countries has demonstrated that a system of unemployment insurance, in order to be effective and successful, must be merely ancillary or complementary to a system of labour exchanges, the whole being adapted to the principal function of finding work for unemployed insured workmen.

I would direct this to the attention of the present Minister of Justice, as the opinion of the Minister of Justice at that time. I am quoting from the report of the Privy Council, which I presume represented the considered findings of the government of that day. I proceed:

> In this view, unemployment insurance has a pronounced federal aspect, and on the whole, the minister thinks the establishment of a system of unemployment insurance is competent to the Dominion in the exercise of its residuary legislative power with relation to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

Of course, it is easy for the the Minister of Justice to repudiate that position and establish a new one of his own.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, because the Privy Council has repudiated it in its judgment with regard to the Industrial Disputes Act.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, the Privy Council can now repudiate what a previous Privy Council did.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am referring to the judicial committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will discuss that in a moment. It is rather curious to note the development which has been going on in Canada during the past few years, as contrasted with the developments which have taken place in the United States. In that country the different states started out with a great deal of authority while the federal body had very little, but gradually there has been an increase in authority on the part of the federal government. Curiously enough, in this country the reverse has been the case; residual powers were held originally by the federal government, but there seems to have been a tendency to lop off, if I may use the phrase, different powers from the federal government, and state that these are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

In this respect I agree absolutely with the hon. member for Labelle. I am sorely tempted to go into the question of the British North America Act, but I will refrain from so doing. However, it does seem to me that we must face this question before long; we cannot forever continue to be tied down by an instrument which was drawn up sixty years ago and which is absolutely inadequate to carry on the functions of government and meet the needs of this country as we find them today.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But so long as it is there we cannot get around it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is quite true, and that is what led me to sign that report. Here is what we are faced with: Last year the committee recommended, and this year the recommendation was endorsed, that the only possible, effective system was one of compulsory insurance. We start with that. The second point is that the Department of Justice tells us that under the British North America Act it is not within our power to do anything, that we have not jurisdiction. Then, as far as I could see, putting those two things together there was only one conclusion to which we could come. The conclusion was that we would simply refer this to the provinces; give the scheme our blessing and refer it to them. That is the only thing I can see which can be done short of a revision of the British North America Act. All of us who have been in this house for some time know how difficult it is to start any movement towards the revision of that act. When we had the federal-provincial conference a year or two ago the sentiment along that line was not very encouraging, but if we have failed once we will have to try again. The possibility of having a revision of the British North America Act was so remote that we hardly thought it worth while to mention it in the report of the committee, but the suggestion which has been embodied in the amendment of the member for North Winnipeg would give to us a modus operandi. Both the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) have said that this cannot be done. I do not profess to be able to dispute legal points with these eminent authorities, but I do believe that there was an effort made to get around this point in the legislation connected with the Industrial Disputes Act. I agree with the hon. Minister of Justice that this act was unconstitutional, and we had to get around it in some way. It was imperative that some sort of expedient be arrived at; so finally a number of the provinces passed enabling legislation. I should like to read the act which was passed by the Manitoba legislature. This act is entitled "An Act respecting the Investigation of Industrial Disputes within the Province," and is as follows:

> Whereas the provisions of The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, chapter 20 of the Acts of the Parliament of Canada, 1907, have been held not to apply to industrial disputes which are within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of any province of Canada; and

Whereas it was enacted by chapter 14 of the Acts of the Parliament of Canada, 1925, entitled An Act to amend The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, that the said act shall apply to, among other things, "any dispute which is within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of any province and which by the legislation of the province is made subject to the provisions of this act"; and

Whereas it is deemed expedient, in view of the amendment recited above, that the provisions of the said act, with amendments, shall be made to apply to industrial disputes of the nature defined in the said act, which are within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the province:

Therefore, His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the legislative assembly of Manitoba, enacts as follows:

1. This act may be cited as "The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act (Manitoba)".

2. The provisions of The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, chapter 20 of the statutes of the parliament of Canada, 1907, and all amendments thereto up to and including the said chapter 14 of 1925, shall apply to every industrial dispute of the nature therein defined which is within or subject to the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of this province.

3. This act shall come into force on the day it is assented to.

That act was assented to on March 31, 1926.

Whether or not that legislation is good I am not in a position to say, but surely it must be admitted that powers which were regarded as being exclusively provincial were turned over to the federal authorities; I do not think that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George or the Minister of Justice will deny that. We have been getting along tolerably well under that makeshift legislation and it occurred to some of us that it might be possible to use that as a precedent. Until such time as a conference can be called at which there could be a discussion of the revision of the British North America Act we might utilize this expedient to relieve the situation and at least get something moving along the lines of unemployment insurance.

Mr. BOURASSA: The Manitoba legislature enacted as its own law a law which had been adopted by the federal parliament; that would be coming to the same end but by a different process.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is quite true, and I am quite prepared that we should take the initiative. But when we suggest proceeding along those lines in this parliament we are immediately met with the statement that such action would be ultra vires; so we cannot act. We simply ask that if we cannot get started in one way we be allowed to get started in another. We are quite prepared humbly to request the provinces to consent to giving us jurisdiction and then we shall be free to take action.

Mr. BOURASSA: I think it is better to pass a law here.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the Minister of Justice and the government will consent to that I shall be very happy indeed. They have always protested that it is impossible to proceed in that way, but I should like to see us get away from these technicalities. There is a great deal of industrial trouble in this country and, as we said in our report last year, there is very little doubt but that industrial insurance would do a great deal to prevent the troubles which are occurring in the industrial field at the present time and would prove to be at least a partial solution of some of the most outstanding problems in the industrial world. I would ask that this question be treated in a generous way. Being a member of the committee I dislike asking that the report be amended, but I think that my colleague is perhaps right when he says that it would be better to defer this matter to another year rather than to pass a motion which, after all, is no much more than a pious hope that something will happen some time.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD: (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the house very long, but as a labour member I must say something with respect to this matter. Unemployment has been a plank of the Labour party in all parts of Canada and organized labour, no matter of what affiliation, is extremely interested in this matter. I am not concerned about the legal entanglements of the British North America Act, because when anything occurs which relates to labour or other matters which it is the part of the government to look after, as the hon. members for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) have both said, we are always met with these legal entanglements.

My hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) read a part of the plank of the Liberal party which distinctly stated that they were to institute under the federal government, in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces, unemployment insurance. Perhaps it was a foolish thing to do, but I believed that proposition; I believed that they would do what they said they would do in 1921, but we have waited for eight years and nothing has been done as yet.

A short time ago the right hon. the Prime Minister was charged with saying that the principle of old age pensions was a vicious one. As far as I am concerned I am willing to defend the right hon. the Prime Minister and say that he did not say that, but he did say something which was of equal importance. He said that for one government to collect taxes for another government to spend was a vicious principle. I hope he did not mean to repudiate the plank in the Liberal platform when he said that he was going to act in conjunction with the provinces in connection with unemployment insurance, whereby the government of the province would contribute part and the federal government would contribute the balance. If he did mean that, he cuts from under his feet the plank contained in the Liberal platform for 1921. If he did mean that, then there is the next proposition that he must make it a federal platform altogether, if the federal authorities are not going to act in conjunction with the provincial authorities, then there is the last proposition, which I do not like, namely that he intends to abandon the matter entirely.

So far as I am concerned, I do not care what the committee do; that is up to them. But it is for the Dominion government themselves to say, as a plank in their platform, what they are going to do now after waiting for eight years to deal with the matter. They have implemented the plank in regard to old age pensions: they have done a good deal along the lines of social insurance, and I think I may put this question to the Prime Minister and the government: What are you going to do in connection with this matter regardless of what the committee says or what is to be found in the British North America Act? We laymen seem to be a lot of flies when the legal authorities start speaking; we get tangled up in a web of various things and we do not know where we stand. It is not my business to clear these things up. The lawyers themselves who enacted this plank must have known how far the British North America Act went. They knew the various difficulties in the way. Let them clear away their own difficulties and tell us where we stand and what they are going to do in regard to what they promised eight years ago. Will the Prime Minister say something along this line?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I just inquire, before the question is put, whether the amendment is in order or not?

Mr. SPEAKER: In my view, this is a constitutional question. Bourinot, in defining the powers of the Speaker, says at page 180:

[Mr Adshead.]

He will not give a decision upon a constitutional question, nor decide a question of law, though the same be raised on a point of order or privilege.

I have no doubt that this question is constitutional; that is to say, it involves a change in connection with the respective powers of the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures. To make such a change in the constitution requires a joint address of both houses of parliament to the Imperial parliament.

A similar question arose some years ago, in 1903, when I was a young member of the House of Commons. After the census of 1901, the province of Prince Edward Island lost two members, and when the new redistribution based on the census was being put through the house, a motion was made in the House of Commons by Mr. Hackett, one of the members from Prince Edward Island, seconded by the hon. member for Lincoln, Ontario, Mr. Lancaster, to the effect that in spite of the census the representation of Prince Edward Island should be six members instead of four. Thereupon the Prime Minister of the day said:

I submit that this amendment is out of order, because it is contrary to the constitution. The constitution provides for representation by population between the provinces. The very question raised in this amendment has been submitted to the supreme court, which has decided that the province of Prince Edward Island and all the other provinces are entitled to the number of members which are mentioned in this bill. The British North America Act provides that the representation of the other provinces shall be based upon the unit fixed by the representation of Quebec, and this amendment would violate that provision of the British North America Act.

Just as this amendment violates one of the provisions of the British North America Act, as was pointed out by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). The Speaker of that day gave this ruling:

The question which has been raised in regard to the amendment is a very difficult one, and I am very sorry that I have not had more time at my disposal to give it the fullest consideration. It would appear, as has been stated before the house, that this parliament has not the necessary legislative authority to grant Prince Edward Island the number of members asked for by this amendment and the supreme court, having been consulted upon the matter, declared that the British North America Act does not give to the province the right to have more than four members.

He goes on:

According to rule 37 of the House of Commons, the Speaker has the right to declare out of order any motion contrary to the rules and privileges of parliament. I see that there is a very serious doubt, whether under our rules of procedure the Speaker has the right on his own authority to interfere and declare irregular and out of order a motion of this kind. May, at page 331, says:

"But doubtful cases may arise, upon which the rules of the house are indistinct or obsolete, or do not apply strictly to the point at issue; when the Speaker, being left without specific directions, refers the matter to the judgment of the house."

I am of the opinion, under the circumstances, that, on account of the serious doubt which may arise as to the irregularity of the motion made by the hon. member for West Prince, I should leave it to the house to determine whether this motion is irregular or not, or whether it should be accepted or not.

In my own mind, I have no doubt as to the unconstitutionality of the amendment if it were carried, but Bourinot says that the Speaker cannot decide on constitutional questions. and therefore I think the best way is for the house to pronounce on the amendment now that the members have been called in.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I say one word on the point of order ? In the case to which Your Honour referred, namely, the case with respect to the redistribution in Prince Edward Island in 1903, the issue there was somewhat different from what it is here. There was a question of doubt and it was referred to the courts, and I believe an appeal was pending to the Privy Council, but it does seem to me, if I may direct Your Honour's attention to the last words of this amendment, that it is so clearly in violation of the constitution that this house should not even consider it. While Bourinot's opinion was as Your Honour has quoted, nevertheless it is pointed out in May, as in the rules of the house, that when the matter is clearly a subject that this house should not pronounce upon, it should not be asked to do so, because by so doing the house would be pronouncing on something over which it had no jurisdiction. The last part of the amendment asks that the legislative powers—the legislative powers, mark you—of the provinces, which are defined by section 92 of the British North America Act, shall be vested in the Dominion government.

Mr. DUNNING: Not in the Dominion parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not in parliament at all, and I do submit that there is quite a clear distinction between this case and the one with which the Speaker had to deal in 1903. The question that I think, with all deference, Your Honour should leave to this house is: Is this amendment in order? Let us decide that as a preliminary question. That is what the Speaker said in that other case, but they discussed it further. I submit to Your Honour, having taken the course you have, that the proper matter now to be submitted to the house is whether this amendment is in order, and we can vote on that because this house makes its own rules in a matter of this kind, and we can declare once for all that an amendment to a motion submitted to the house that involves the amendment of the constitution of Canada which would divest the provinces of Canada of their legislative powers which have been granted under the British North America Act is wholly beyond the power of this parliament to deal with.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I do not think that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has stated the case quite clearly. He has quoted only one portion of the amendment. One portion of the amendment is not binding on anyone at all. It is just an expression of opinion. I am asking the house to refer this report back to the select standing committee, but it is wholly within the power of that committee to bring in a completely new report, and this may be the last we shall ever hear of this motion.

Mr. STEVENS: That is just what they cannot do.

Mr. HEAPS: Oh yes, they can. Although I have not the 1903 case before me, I am of the opinion that the motion in that case must have been completely different from the motion that I have made this afternoon.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given my own personal opinion as to the constitutionality of this amendment, but I am guided by Bourinot; he is my master. He says that the Speaker, > will not give a decision upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law, though the same be raised on a point of order or privilege—as in the present instance.

But the house by pronouncing immediately on the amendment will decide whether it is constitutional or unconstitutional.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Heaps) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. MARCIL: I was paired with the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the amendment lost. The question is now on the main motion.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I want to add just a few words to the main motion. Before doing so, may I congratulate the intelligentsia of the house on the moral victory we have just achieved. How often is the old saying true, Mr. Speaker, "Right forever on the footstool; Wrong forever on the throne."

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the correct rendering.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. NEILL: I remind my fellow victims that fewer than our number once saved Sodom and Gomorrha, and possibly there is hope yet for something better even within these walls. While the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was following the Minister of Justice in the early part of his argument, he was talking with his usual sound constitutional ability, but as he warmed up and threw the ponderous weight of his legal attainments upon the humble amendment presented by the hon. member for North Winnipeg and myself he termed it absurd, ridiculous, and used other such unparliamentary language; but I noticed that he had to resort to a play upon words to arrive at that vicious state of mind. In the amendment we used the words "Dominion government" when we should have said "Dominion parliament."

Mr. SPEAKER: Might I remind the hon. gentleman that he must speak now to the main motion. The amendment has been lost.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I think I can connect my remarks with the main motion. Of course, sir, I shall be subject to your discretion as I go along, but certainly what I am about to say is all part of my argument on the main motion, and I say so in all seriousness. I noticed that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George tried to draw a parallel—and this is where I am coming to the motion—he tried to cinch his argument by drawing a parallel—I do not think it was a parallel, and I so told him, but he said it was—between the desperate condition of women and children suffering in Canada from want of employment and sickness with some grievance of his own when he went to the States and could not buy a cigarette. I shudder to think of the place he was in where it was an offence to buy cigarettes. But I rather think his whole later argument savoured of the reductio ad absurdum.

Now I come to what I wanted to bring before the house. I presume this report will pass. While along with other members of the committee I share my full responsibility for the report, I must confess it is rather a poor production. I cannot see that it is going to bring about any tangible results. But I want to tell the government and this house that we cannot evade this situation by taking refuge behind technical objections. I admit that the argument of the Minister of Justice was probably sound when he urged that the provinces cannot do what we suggest they should do. He ought to know, and his argument appeared to be sound. But, I repeat, we cannot get rid of this subject by having recourse to technical objections or points of order. The question of unemployment and sickness insurance will be more and more a burning question in Canada with our modern methods. We are abundantly prosperous in Canada to-day, that is not denied, but with our modern methods of rapid production, as soon as there is a demand for a certain article scientific methods rush in to fill that demand, and they fill it with such tremendous facility that overproduction results. Prosperity or no prosperity, we are always going to have an increasing measure of unemployment, and trouble resulting from sickness. Other countries have recognized this and have taken steps to meet the situation. Now, it seems that we have a tendency to travel in a circle, in connection with questions of this sort, and we always find ourselves finally running into the great wall of the British North America Act. But I would suggest that the British North America Act is not an act of God; it is not one of the natural laws, such as the laws of astronomy, which cannot be upset or changed. The day is coming, indeed it has passed, when we should be taking steps to consider an amendment to that act not only in regard to the question now before us but in connection with several other matters that come up from time to time and which clamour for a change in the act. From time to time the Dominion holds conferences with the provinces and I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to give us some encouragement now to hope that when next we have a conference with the provinces he will take up with them the question of amending the British North America Act—adopting, of course, regular procedure—such as will enable us to deal finally and decidedly with this question of jurisdiction, not only as regards unemployment, sickness and so forth, but in connection with various other matters which are causing us more and more trouble, unrest and difficulty as between the provinces and the Dominion, both in our judicial and in our social relations. That is a subject that might well engage the attention of the government at the next provincial conference.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. BENNETT: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

RETURNS TO ORDERS OF THE HOUSE

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

1. When orders are issued by the house for the original files, or copies of the same, regarding appointments under the Civil Service Commission, as has been the case in several instances lately in connection with the Post Office Department; are all the papers on the files of the Civil Service Commission brought down, including the reports or recommendations of the senior officials, any observations or opinions of the commissioners, and generally, everything on the files that appertains to the appointment in question?

2. If not: (a) what is the practice, by whom and on what basis is the selection made of the papers that are brought down; (b) why is not everything brought down in accordance with the order of the house?

Mr. RINFRET: Order for return.

Mr. BENNETT: The Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) will agree, I think, that this question is not one that should stand as an order for return. The questions are specific. For example, there is the question:

What is the practice, by whom and on what basis is the selection made of the papers that are brought down?

Possibly the hon. gentleman confuses this with another question.

Mr. RINFRET: The only reason for making the question an order for return is that I shall have to bring down considerable correspondence in connection with the question. The Civil Service Commission has made an official reply. The chairman of the commission has written a separate letter and I have had to write him with a view to clearing up a certain point. There will be no delay in bringing down the correspondence.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you.

Mr. RINFRET: It will be all produced.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. NEILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I wish to rise to a question of privilege. It is not a question of privilege so far as the house is concerned but one touching me personally in my position as a member of parliament in this house. In this regard I wish to cite the authority of Bourinot, at page 303.

There it is stated that many questions of privilege are permitted in the Canadian house, the category embracing:

Reflections or libels in books and newspapers on the house or members thereof.

I wish to discuss a reflection on myself as a member of parliament, in association with other persons, and the circumstances are very similar to those under which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) rose to a question of privilege some weeks ago. In an almost identical case that hon. member was allowed to speak for some thirty minutes, no objection having been raised on this side of the house. He spoke as a prominent member of his party. I hope I shall receive the same courtesy, although I am an insignificant member and cannot claim the allegiance or support of any party.

The article of which I wish to complain is to be found in The Mail and Empire of Toronto, of Tuesday, May 21, 1929. The article is accompanied by a large map of the province of British Columbia. I shall read certain portions of the article, those that I omit being quite immaterial to the main argument. The article, written by The Mail and Empire staff writer, reads:

Ottawa, May 20.—By the Pacific fisheries treaty negotiated by the King government with the United States and now before parliament for approval, it is proposed to give the United States equal control with Canada in the immense territory in British Columbia outlined in the map above.

The map takes in practically the whole or greater part of British Columbia.

This treaty is to preserve the sockeye salmon industry, almost ruined by the United States, and would place the watershed of the Fraser river under the control of a joint international commission—three from the United States and three from Canada.

Now I come to the point at issue:

This immense area, over which the King government proposed to give the United States equal control with Canada regarding lakes, rivers and improvements thereon, is about 100,000 square miles, equal in area to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island combined. . .

This treaty is viewed with grave suspicion by British Columbia members—

Of whom I am one.

—as giving the United States an economic partnership in half of that province. International joint commissions have been disastrous to Canada.

Then, after some further remarks about international commissions, it concludes in this way:

It is felt the proposed treaty in giving the United States equal authority in Canadian territory is creating a precedent that may strike a deadly blow at Canadian independence.

Think of that, Mr. Speaker; it may strike a deadly blow at Canadian independence.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order; this cannot possibly be a question of privilege affecting the hon. member. What he is now reading may hereafter become the subject matter of a very complicated debate, and this question is now before a committee of this house.

I think Your Honour pointed out not many days ago that if it is felt by a member that he has been libelled, the proper course is for him to place the paper on the table of the house and make the proper comment. I dare say Your Honour will recall the case in which that was done and the author of the article brought to the bar of the house. When the hon. gentleman stated that certain British Columbia members viewed with suspicion a certain course of action, and that he was one of them—

Mr. NEILL: I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: When he said that, he was within his rights as a matter of privilege in saying, "I was not one of those who took that view."

Mr. NEILL: You did not give me time.

Mr. BENNETT: No, for the simple and obvious reason that the hon. gentleman was discussing something else that had nothing whatever to do with him, and I submit that when we get into a discussion as to what that treaty involves we are on ground which should not be entertained as a matter of privilege with respect to any individual member. Your Honour laid down the rules I think the other day; I looked up the authorities and I believe Your Honour gave the correct ruling. The question of privilege is only a question where reference is made to British Columbia members; the moment my hon. friend went beyond that he was traversing ground he should not have traversed on a question of privilege.

Mr. NEILL: I had not finished reading the article of which I complained and which attributed to me, along with other members from British Columbia, sentiments which are entirely false. I do not see how I can be out of order yet. I would direct attention to page 303 of Bourinot:

In the Canadian house, questions of privilege take a wide range, but it may be stated in general terms that they refer to all matters affecting the rights and immunities of the house collectively, or to the position and conduct of members in their representative character. In this category may be placed: motions touching the seat or election of members (a); reflections or libels in books and newspapers on the house or members thereof...

The article in question touches my position and conduct in my representative character; it is a reflection on my standing and reputation in British Columbia if I endorse or allow to go uncontradicted that scandalous libel, which is a tissue of falsehoods from beginning to end. I have every right to defend my character, which is being assailed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other member wish to speak on the point of order?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): All I wish to say is that if such a statement and presentation as my hon. friend is making on a question of privilege is to be permitted, then other hon. members whose opinions may differ as to the article certainly should have a similar right to discuss that question.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition was perfectly right when he stated that any matter which has been referred to a committee cannot be the subject of discussion in this house until that committee has reported. However, if I understand the point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, it is a question of privilege in that, being a member of the house, he draws the attention of the house to the fact that a newspaper, commenting on a matter which is now before parliament, has misrepresented the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he complains that his position has been misrepresented.

Mr. CANNON: He wishes to show that there has been misrepresentation. If that be the case, and if the hon. member succeeds in putting before the Chair such a case, certainly the privileges of the house generally and those of the hon. member particularly have been invaded.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni should have been allowed to make his statement, but I have not yet gathered where the point of privilege arises. However, I might remind the house that even if it were not strictly a question of privilege, at page 304 of Bourinot I find the following:

Members sometimes correct reports of their speeches, or inaccurate statements in the press on the ground of privilege; but these are personal explanations, not matters of privilege, and are allowed only by the indulgence of the house

I have not yet seen the point at issue, so I would ask the hon. gentleman to state exactly where the question of privilege arises.

Mr. NEILL: I should think I might be allowed to finish the quotation of which I complain:

> It is felt the proposed treaty in giving the United States equal authority in Canadian territory is creating a precedent that may strike a deadly blow at Canadian independence. It is argued if this is done in British Columbia, United States partnership and control may be extended to areas in every province.

The question of privilege is this: I do not want to be associated with a statement so utterly and absolutely removed from the truth. The writer of this article suggests that he has obtained his information from, or that it has been inspired by, the members from British Columbia. Where else could he get the views of those members? After the great latitude which was allowed the member for St. Lawrence-St. George I think I should be allowed to explain where this statement is wrong. That is not a question of argument; it is a question of fact.

Mr. BENNETT: Again I raise the point of order. Look at the clock; surely the rules of this house must be obeyed. The hon. member has made two misstatements in the last five minutes. I apprehend that this is all a by-play between the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has no right to bring me into this matter at all.

Mr. BENNETT: The anxiety of the Prime Minister was such that I apprehended that this was a by-play between him and the hon. member; if the Prime Minister says I am wrong that settles it. He says he has nothing to do with it.

Mr. NEILL: You are also wrong in saying that I made two misstatements.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni said a moment ago that the members from British Columbia had made certain statements.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Pardon me. He said further—

Mr. DUNNING: He denies it.

Mr. BENNETT: That only makes it worse. He also said that it was felt that so and so was the case, but the article does not say that this was felt to be so by the members from British Columbia.

Mr. NEILL: The article states that the treaty is viewed with grave suspicion by British Columbia members and then says a little further on "It is felt"—

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and when the hon. member says that as a British Columbia member he desires entirely to dissociate himself from that statement, he has discharged his duty and his right in claiming his question of privilege. That is the whole point. He said that he was not one of those members from British Columbia who share those opinions, and a moment ago he was discussing whether or not this meant independence. The record will show that he started to discuss that when I raised the question of order, and now he reads on again. The point is this: Are we going to traverse and argue and discuss the merits of a matter which is now before a committee on a question of privilege raised by the hon. gentleman, or are we going to permit him to say, as it is plainly and clearly his duty to say, that the statements thus made incorrectly indicate his position? He has a right to do that, but he used language which was wholly unparliamentary in describing it a moment ago—wholly unparliamentary as defined by Bourinot—and I merely suggest that we should have some regard for the rules.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman might state briefly the question of privilege which he raised this afternoon. I understand that a certain paper published an article wherein the members of a certain province were said to have apparently sacrificed the interests of Canada to the United States.

Mr. STEVENS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is what I inferred from the remarks of the hon. gentleman. He dissociates himself from that group of members who had sacrificed Canada. That article was in connection with the salmon treaty, and having said that, I think he has used his right as a member in claiming his privilege, but now he desires to say more.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, I have used it, but I do not think I have exhausted it. I do not think the house has clearly grasped the situation and perhaps I had better begin again. As it is close to six o'clock perhaps we might call it six o'clock so that the opposition may have an opportunity to grasp my views.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): By leave of the house, I beg to present the fourth report of the special committee appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. NEILL

Mr. NEILL: Just before six o'clock, in the few intermittent moments that I was allowed to speak, I thought I had put on Hansard all of the article of which I was complaining, but I find that in one of the interruptions I had lost my place and left out a sentence which I would ask permission to read now. It is only a sentence and Hansard can insert it at the proper place or it can go in now. It makes no difference. This is the sentence I wish to insert:

> In the territory is included Canada's great Pacific port of Vancouver, which may be subjected to certain control by this international commission.

That suggests to me a view which is more than my personal grievance; it opens up a wider sphere.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman who is an experienced member and who is not ignorant of the rules of the house, knows that on a question of privilege he is not permitted to discuss the question whether the port of Vancouver is or is not included.

Mr. NEILL: I am not going to speak about the port of Vancouver.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the hon. member has just started to do.

Mr. NEILL: If the hon. member was not quite so previous, and would allow me to develop my argument then he could find fault with it. Surely it is not necessary to find fault with what I am saying before I say it.

Mr. BENNETT: I will make my point clear. The hon. member said: I now propose to make an argument. The question of privilege does not permit argument. Your Honour has so declared so frequently that I am not going to trespass upon the time of the house in making further reference to it. The hon. gentleman has a perfect right to say, after reading that article: I am not one of the members from British Columbia who think so and the references which are made to myself are incorrect or not founded upon fact. But he must not enter into a discussion or an argument respecting the matter.

Mr. NEILL: I am not making an argument and surely I should be allowed to indicate what my stand is going to be before I am checked up. I have for the moment not abandoned but simply sidestepped the situation as regards myself. I want to lay before the house a question of privilege, of all our privileges, of the dignity of parliament itself. On the 20th May the Prime Minister of Canada asked the house to send to the marine and fisheries committee this treaty that was mentioned in the article. That committee consists of thirty-five members of whom ten constitute a quorum. Naturally those members are drawn from the provinces fronting on the Pacific or the Atlantic ocean. Consequently the committee is very largely composed of members from the maritime provinces who live a long way from British Columbia. Those men are in the position of a jury; they are going to deal with this question. That occurred on the 20th May. On the 21st May, the next day, comes out this malignant, treacherous, disloyal piece of propaganda. That is all parliamentary, for I have looked the matter up. I do not often prate about loyalty in the house, but that is disloyal to everyone in British Columbia, and to Canada and every member who cherishes ideals of truth, honour and decency in our political relations.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely this is not a question of privilege. If the hon. member is not to observe the rules of the house, where is this to end?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I may say just a word, the hon. member is speaking about an article which reflects upon parliament as a whole and upon the honour of parliament. I have the article in my hand and the first sentence of it reads:

> By the Pacific fisheries treaty negotiated by the King government with the United States and now before parliament for approval, it is proposed to give the United States equal control with Canada in the immense territory in British Columbia outlined in the map above.

That is an absolute untruth.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is true. That is the difference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is absolutely untrue.

Mr. BENNETT: I say it is absolutely true.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is before us is an article referring to parliament and an international treaty which is before a committee of parliament. No newspaper has a right in these circumstances to make the statement that the treaty means something which it does not mean.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. gentleman continue and state his point?

Mr. NEILL: The point I was wanting to make at this moment was that the publication of this document was highly calculated, intentionally or otherwise, to influence the members of the marine and fisheries committee who act as judges or jury in the consideration of the treaty which is now before them. How can they be unbiased when a journal by which at least some of the members swear politically, comes out with definite statements, fortified by a map and supported by what is alleged to be the views of British Columbia members who are supposed to know? How can they give a fair and honest judgment to the consideration of the treaty when it comes before them? That is the point I want to make which affects the honour, dignity and rights of us all. Supposing it was a jury and a man was being tried for his life, and the counsel for the prisoner discovered that the jury had been secretly, or publicly, if you like, served with an extremely ex parte statement of the man's guilt. What would the prisoner's counsel's position be? Would he not ask for a new jury that had not seen and was not privy to this propaganda? That is the point of order which I submit. The Prime Minister said it was false and I understood the leader of the opposition to say it was not false.

Mr. BENNETT: It is absolutely correct that under the terms of that treaty nearly 100,000 square miles is handed over to the joint control of the United States and Canada for fisheries purposes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Fisheries purposes is a very limited phrase, and even that is not correct.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder who is discussing the terms of the treaty now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT: That is trifling with the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think if the hon. gentleman was allowed to make his statement as briefly and concisely as possible, there would not be any trifling, but he must not make any contentious argument. He must simply state what in that article reflects on his dignity or on his honour as a member of the House of Commons, and having said that, he has said enough.

Mr. NEILL: And until he has said that, he has not said enough.

Mr. McGIBBON: Are you going to rule this house, Mr. Speaker, or is the hon. member for Comox-Alberni?

Mr. STEVENS: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that before the six o'clock recess the hon. member for Comox-Alberni had dissociated himself absolutely from this article and repudiated all responsibility for it, and now he is attempting to read and discuss the article and to malign the party who wrote it and the paper in which it is printed. Furthermore, I submit that he is introducing an opinion of his own regarding the terms of the treaty to which we shall be precluded from replying by the rules of the house, and as to which treaty we hold diametrically opposite views from those he is expressing. That is utterly unfair. We have a right to claim the privilege of replying to the hon. gentleman if he, the Prime Minister, and others are going to be permitted to comment on the treaty. If that is to be permitted, although we are not asking for that privilege because the matter is before the fisheries committee, we claim the right to reply. But if the matter is to be introduced we claim the right of expressing our views because this is one of the most important matters before parliament.

Mr. NEILL: There is a good deal of truth in what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has said, only he has begun at the wrong place. It is not he that demands the right to reply; I am demanding the right to reply. They have had their innings in the Mail and Empire.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman cannot impute motives to hon. members.

Mr. BENNETT: Take that back now. He said they have had their innings in the Mail and Empire. I ask that that be withdrawn, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. gentleman will withdraw that statement.

Mr. NEILL: Which statement?

Mr. SPEAKER: That they have had their innings in the Mail and Empire. He is accusing hon. members of having written that article—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: By inference, yes.

Mr. NEILL: I will withdraw it and put it this way.

Mr. BENNETT: That is more offensive still.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Wait till you hear it.

Mr. NEILL: The first statements that came out in connection with this matter appeared in the Mail and Empire, did they not? For the honour of parliament and myself and in the interests of British Columbia I want a chance to reply. My hon. friend wants a chance to reply to me. I am only replying to the statements in the Mail and Empire. But we will leave aside their origin.

Mr. BENNETT: Now the hon. gentleman is clearly out of order. He has no right to reply. The debate will afford that opportunity. The house must be deeply grateful to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, in the absence of any effort being made by others, for protecting its honour. Usually the Prime Minister is looked upon as the leader of the House of Commons, but in this instance the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is protecting its honour. The question is a very simple one, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman says: I now claim the right to reply to what appeared in the Mail and Empire. Surely, once he dissociates himself from the article the question of privilege is done, and he has his opportunity to reply when the treaty comes back from the committee and is debated in this house.

Mr. NEILL: I am not going to reply to the Mail and Empire. I was following up the line of argument that was used by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, who asked the right to reply to me.

Mr. McGIBBON: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. NEILL: Oh come, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. gentleman rising to a point of order?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes. I say that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has twice defied your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: In what respect?

Mr. McGIBBON: You asked him to withdraw and he refused.

Mr. SPEAKER: He withdrew the statement and wished to qualify it but was not allowed to do it. The hon. gentleman will proceed.

Mr. CLARK: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has spoken on this question of privilege on more than one occasion. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that while you are in the chair a member can speak to a question of privilege only once. The hon. member had spoken before dinner, and he chose to discontinue before six o'clock. He called it six o'clock to suit himself, but you, Mr. Speaker, did not call it six o'clock, and after the hon. member from Comox-Alberni took his seat from his own choice the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) proceeded with an entirely different matter. As you, Mr. Speaker, permitted the hon. member for Quebec South to proceed, thereby the question of privilege was closed and I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, that this matter is now definitely closed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand that the question was closed at six o'clock. By unanimous consent it was declared six o'clock.

Mr. CLARK: There was no unanimous consent because another matter was proceeded with and it was not six o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: Everybody understood that it was six o'clock. I saw the hands of the clock at six just before hon. members left their seats, and the hon. member for Quebec South asked the leave of the house to lay documents on the table. I must say this, that the hon. member since he rose has been so frequently interrupted that he has not been able to make his point clear. Speaking from the chair I have said that he must be allowed some latitude in placing his question of privilege before the house. I think that if he was allowed to point out without interruptions what he complains of, it would take very much less time.

Mr. CLARK: I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that your ruling has been based upon a decision of this house given by unanimous consent. There was no such unanimous consent. So far as I personally was concerned, when the hon. member sat down and presumed to call it six o'clock, I personally did not consent to any such proceeding, and I dissent from it now. There was no unanimous consent of the house asked by the hon. member or by the Chair of the right to proceed after six. It was not six o'clock, and you ruled, Mr. Speaker, that it was not six, because you permitted another member to another member to introduce an entirely different subject which was proceeded with and disposed of.

Mr. SPEAKER: Every day at eleven o'clock I allow the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and others to ask questions of the Prime Minister, to which he replies. That is done every day. It is true there was no unanimous consent given, but tacit consent is tantamount to unanimous consent.

Mr. NEILL: Dire indeed must be their need when they take refuge—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. NEILL: —in such a quibble.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, we are going to have some semblance of fair play in this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I bring to your attention certain facts in connection with this matter. I have the article complained of before me—

Mr. SPEAKER: It seems that we cannot proceed very regularly in this way. I can direct the hon .gentleman to send the article to the Clerk of the House so that it may be read, and then action may be taken on it by proper notice being given, when the whole question can be debated. Otherwise it is trifling with the time of the house.

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely.

Mr. NEILL: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. NEILL: I have the floor.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. NEILL: Did I understand you, sir, to rule that I must send the article to the Clerk of the House, or was it only a suggestion?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes. We shall not have order in the house unless this is done properly.

Mr. NEILL: On that one point, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CLARK: The ruling has been given.

Mr. NEILL: Am I to be howled down?

Mr. CLARK: You ought to be put out for disregarding the ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. We shall not have order unless we proceed regularly. Generally great latitude is given on a question of this nature, but I see this evening it is impossible to proceed except regularly. Therefore I rule that the strict procedure must be followed. The article must be sent to the clerk to be read in English and in French. Then notice will have to be given and action taken on the article.

The newspaper article having been handed to the clerk, the Clerk Assistant read as follows:

United States Partnership in Canadian Territory.
From T. H. Blacklock
Mail and Empire Staff writer

Ottawa, May 20. By the Pacific fisheries treaty negotiated by the King government with the United States and now before parliament for approval—

Mr. SPEAKER: A motion should be made by the hon. gentleman that the article be read.

Mr. NEILL: In deference to your ruling, sir—because I would be quite prepared to go on with my remarks—I make a motion that the article complained of be read by the Clerk of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Thereupon the Clerk Assistant read as follows:

United States Partnership in Canadian Territory
From T. H. Blacklock
Mail and Empire Staff Writer

Ottawa, May 20. By the Pacific fisheries treaty negotiated by the King government with the United States and now before parliament for approval, it is proposed to give the United States equal control with Canada in the immense territory in British Columbia outlined in the map above.—

Mr. BENNETT: That is true.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

The Clerk Assistant resumed the reading of the article as follows:

This treaty is to preserve the sockeye salmon industry, almost ruined by the United States, and would place the watershed of the Fraser River under the control of a joint international commission—three from the United States and three from Canada.

This immense area, over which the King government proposed to give the United States equal control with Canada regarding lakes, rivers and improvements thereon, is about 100,000 square miles, equal in area to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island combined, and also equal in area to that part of Ontario between Ottawa on the east, Windsor on the west, Niagara Falls on the south and Sudbury on the north. In the territory is included Canada's great Pacific port of Vancouver, which may be subjected to certain control by this international commission.

The treaty is viewed with grave suspicion by British Columbia members as giving the United States an economic partnership in half of that province. International joint commissions have been disastrous to Canada. The St. Lawrence power diversion was secured by a Canadian commissioner joining with the American members of the International Joint Commission. Fortunately that Canadien representative has been retired, but not before he did irretrievable harm. The international joint engineering board on the St. Lawrence development recommended the power plant on the international section be placed in the American territory. This was done by a member of the Canadian section joining with the American section.

It is felt the proposed treaty in giving the United States equal authority in Canadian territory is creating a precedent that may strike a deadly blow at Canadian independence. It is argued if this is done in British Columbia, United States partnership and control may be extended to areas in every province.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Tory propaganda.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I ask that the article be translated into French.

Mr. SPEAKER: The article will have to be sent to the translators before it can be read.

Mr. PERRAS (Translation): Why, sir? Is it not possible to translate it immediately?

Mr. SPEAKER (Translation): There are no translators here, in the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Number 13.

Mr. BENNETT: But, Mr. Speaker, there is a motion pending. We cannot have two motions before the house at the same time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are not going to wait until the article is translated. I understood Mr. Speaker to say that the article is to be sent to the translator.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely we are not going to wait until the article is translated.

Mr. BENNETT: The motion must be disposed of.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Then everybody will understand it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The motion was to the effect that the article be read.

Mr. BENNETT: Forthwith.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And it has been read. Now Mr. Speaker says it is to be sent to the translator. I presume in the meantime we had better proceed with other business.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, we can go on.

RETURNED SOLDIERS' INSURANCE ACT

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR RECEIVING APPLICATIONS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved that the time for receiving applications for insurance under the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act be extended for one year from the 31st August, 1929.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the Chair.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister might explain the circumstances.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, last year the special committee on pensions and returned soldiers' problems considered the question of insurance, and part of their report reads as follows:

It was strongly represented to your committee by returned soldiers' organizations that their members and returned soldiers generally should again be afforded the opportunity of applying for and receiving insurance under the provisions of the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act, under which no applications have been receivable since September, 1923.

In accordance with the recommendation of the committee a bill was presented in the House of Commons and passed extending the time for applications for insurance until 1933. In the senate the bill was amended so that the extended time will expire in September, 1929. Under this measure we propose to extend the time for another year.

Mr. CLARK: To refresh the memories of the members of the committee, would the Minister of Finance read the provisions of the act which extended the insurance? It was amended, as I recall, by the senate; consequently we are not very familiar with the provisions.

Mr. ROBB: As compared with the original measure we introduced—is that what my hon. friend means?

Mr. CLARK: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: The act was amended, by recommendation of the parliamentary committee, in 1922, to provide an extension of one year in which applications for insurance might be made. When this extension was granted certain special cases were made non-insurable. These special cases are: (1) Applicants without dependents seriously ill; (2) Applicants with dependents, who had no expectancy of life and where disability was not due to war service; (3) Applicants who had suffered impairment of health due to immoral conduct. These are no longer admitted to insurance under the act.

Mr. CLARK: I wished to get the actual amending provision passed last year by the house.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the section which now appears in the bill, with the exception that 1929 is now being made 1930.

Mr. ROBB: That is all; application for insurance may be received under this legislation up to and including October 31, 1930, but shall not be received thereafter.

Mr. BENNETT: Previously it was 1929 and you are now changing it to 1930?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That answers the question as to the date. But what I should like to know is this. The committee last year recommended 1933 and the Senate changed that. Is it not desirable, if we are going to extend the time now, to extend it to 1933 and be done with it?

Mr. ROBB: All we are asked to do at the moment is to extend it one year; that is all that the representative of the legion requests.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the actuarial effect of it?

Mr. ROBB: The applications received between June, 1928, and April, 1929, were 5,222.

Mr. BENNETT: New applications?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. Of these, 4,530 were accepted. There have been refused 604, and outstanding, not reported on, there are 88. The total applications accepted, 4,530, represent insurance to the amount of $11,018,000.

Mr. McGIBBON: What has been the loss, if any, on this scheme?

Mr. ROBB: It is difficult to tell what the actuarial loss is; some have not yet matured. The financial statement as of March 31, 1929, shows a balance of funds on hand of $7,651,878.18. Out of that we paid $540,044.93 in death claims, surrender values to the amount of $239,366.72, disability claims amounting to $5,555.40, leaving a balance of $6,866,911.13.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. BENNETT: What would be the amount necessary to hold as reserve, under actuarial life insurance figures, to meet the liability?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friends will recall that this scheme was introduced with the idea of giving the soldier reasonable insurance at moderate cost.

Mr. McGIBBON: Last year it was stated that the scheme was self-supporting and that the government would not be called upon to shoulder any liability.

Mr. ROBB: We always hope that these schemes are self-supporting. I should not like to go on record as saying that this scheme is self-supporting, but it is not in an unhealthy condition at the moment.

Mr. CLARK: What was the general ground on which the 600 applications were refused?

Mr. ROBB: I cannot say. The applications are passed on by the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Mr. GEARY: Do you set up a reserve as provided for in the insurance act? Is the scheme actuarially sound by means of an ordinary reserve at 3½ per cent or whatever the rate may be?

Mr. ROBB: The scheme was introduced in 1920 but I should not care to say that it was actuarially sound. It is probably not far enough advanced yet to warrant that statement.

Mr. GEARY: If the policy is not loaded too heavily for expenses it can be made actuarially sound by setting up the required reserve at the rate of interest called for by the department, and I understand that is actually done. It is only a question of loading or not loading for expenses.

Mr. ROBB: There are no expenses.

Mr. GEARY: And that is why we can make it sound. I do not think the government wants the impression to get abroad that this is not sound insurance. It is not a gratuity; I hope it is not regarded as charity to the soldiers. The soldier is paying insurance that carries small loading for expenses and that is why the rate is lower than corresponding rates in line companies. I consider the proposition a good one and I should like the soldier to feel that he is getting something worth while by reason of the fact that the government is carrying it at cost; he is getting insurance at a good deal less than he would if he went to an ordinary line company. I believe such to be the case. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but my impression is that there is no examination of any rigidity; the 600 applicants who were refused are in all likelihood those coming under the three classes of exceptions referred to by the minister and therefore not entitled to insurance. But so long as a man is under a disability, I do not care whether it be 100 per cent, the government should grant the insurance practically without examination. Perhaps the minister will enlighten us on that point. It is something that should be brought clearly to the attention of the soldiers, because they can obtain this insurance at much lower cost than they can outside.

Mr. ROBB: I am glad to have my hon. friend express those views. If the government did not believe it was a good scheme for the soldiers they would not to-night be asking that it be extended another year. As I have said, all that the legion asks is that we extend it a year, and that we are granting.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: While in the west during the last recess, I was approached by some veterans of the South African war. They pointed out to me that almost all our other legislation dealing with returned men had been so amended as to give to veterans of the South African war practically the same terms, in every respect, as were conceded to veterans of the Great war. In the matter of pensions, in the matter of hospitalization, in practically every measure introduced in relation to the reestablishment of returned soldiers of the last war, the South African veterans, it was stated, had been placed on a parity with their brothers. But it was pointed out to me that in this one particular there was an exception, and it was urged upon me with a good deal of force and, I may say, quite convincingly by a man with whom I am very well acquainted, that this entailed a real hardship. A South African veteran who had lost his leg as the result of services at that time had volunteered for service in the expeditionary force in the Great war but naturally was not accepted on account of his physical condition. He has a pension with which, in addition to what he can earn, he supports himself, an invalid and widowed mother and one or two helpless members of the family. Not long ago he made an attempt to obtain insurance under this act which would enable his mother and other dependents to carry on in case of his death. He made his application in good faith, enclosing the amount required as a premium for a $3,000 policy, but of course he was informed that this act did not include South African veterans but only veterans of the Great war. He spoke to me on the subject and I must say he was very convincing, so much so that at least I saw the justice of his contention, particularly as this would affect comparatively few men. So I told him that as far as I could see the matter was fair and that I would bring it to the attention of the minister having charge of the act and all the members of the cabinet, who are anxious to see justice done to all returned soldiers so far as that is possible.

I would like to know from the minister if he would consider the extension of the benefits of this insurance act to that comparatively small handful of veterans who remain from the South African war, who as I said before have been placed on a parity with other veterans in everything except this matter. If they could come in under this act they would come under exactly the same terms, regulations and laws under which the veterans of the Great war now carry on, and I would be very glad if this question could be considered. I do not feel that it would involve a great deal of money; there are not very many of these men left, and those men who were crippled in the South African war and who have lived up to the present time obviously were not those who were in immediate danger of death.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the minister replies I might state that representations were made to me by a substantial number of South African returned men on this particular question, and I had intended to bring up the matter. The hon. member for Red Deer has covered the position so thoroughly that I will not go over it again. I believe the matter was considered in this house on a previous occasion, and I understand that the government bears part of the cost of this insurance. It is not, as my hon. friend has stated, upon a self-sustaining actuarial basis; if that were the case the matter would not be here. The government bears a portion of the cost for the simple reason that many of these men were not insurable risks, as was explained by the Minister of National Defence previously, and as the matter now stands we do not quite know what the ultimate responsibility may be. I understand that the officials of the insurance department say it is quite impossible, having regard to the type of risks carried and the difficulty of fixing any adequate premium, to indicate with certainty what the actuarial responsibility will be. Some of these men who returned from the South African war are in fairly good physical condition; some of them would not be accepted by line insurance companies but were hoping they might be permitted to come in under this act before they became entirely too old to enable them to make some provision for their families.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister say whether any favours at all have been granted the South African veterans? I happen to be one myself and I am approaching that period when favours may be required. It strikes me that the contingent which went from Canada to South Africa was sent under the Liberal party, and we were paid by Canada up to the time we got on the boat. From then on the poor old mother country had to pay us and bring us home, and as a matter of fact I believe all the pensions which are paid in Canada as a result of that war are paid by the mother country. So if any favours are being distributed I think this suggestion might be well considered.

Mr. ROBB: This is the first time politics have been injected into this debate; I thought this was a non-political question.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is that not true?

Mr. ROBB: I am not going into that question now, but I have some recollection that the South African veterans were given some privileges with regard to grants of land. However, I would not like to delay this bill by referring it back to the committee for consideration of this South African question. The bill now before the house is the result of an inquiry by a joint committee representing all parties, and the insurance is based upon the report of that committee. If at that time the South African veterans thought they had a claim, that claim should have been considered by the committee, and possibly that was done. My hon. friend from Red Deer was a member of that committee and he knows more about that matter than I do, but at this late stage all we propose to do is to extend for another year the benefits of an insurance scheme which has been recommended by a joint committee of the house.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 310, to amend the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

[Mr. Bennett.]

On section 1—Time extended one year for receiving applications.

Mr. CLARK: I would like to have a short statement, perhaps from the Minister of Pensions, giving the reasons for the refusal of so many applications for insurance. The reason I ask for this statement is because during the past year I have had many complaints from returned soldiers and returned soldiers' organizations that applications for insurance have been refused. My personal impression is that the great majority of these applications were refused because of the serious state of health of the applicants, but I have been assured that in some cases the matter was looked into by counsel on behalf of these applicants and that in their opinion the insurance should legally issue. I have never seen a case in which I could have given a similar opinion because I have not had the facts of these cases before me. I am not aware of the real reasons for these refusals, but I think it would clarify the situation throughout the country if the minister could give a short statement as to the general reason, if there is a general reason, for the refusal of so many applications for insurance.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Of course, that is rather a difficult question to answer, because the adjudication of these cases is entirely under the jurisdiction of the Board of Pension Commissioners. They have a medical officer who is in possession of the file of the applicant. An inquiry is made as to the present condition of the applicant and where there is a reasonable expectancy of life he obtains his insurance; that is according to the act. There was probably some delay last fall with regard to rejections, but that has been adjusted and I think that many of the applications which were held up have been adjudicated on since. Out of six thousand applications something over four thousand have been favourably considered, which would indicate that a fair number are receiving consideration. As to those claims which the commission would not grant, that is a matter which is entirely out of my hands.

Mr. CLARK: Do the pensions board doctors examine each applicant?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. CLARK: How do they come to the conclusion whether or not he is a man suffering from a disability?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In nearly every case the medical history of the applicant is well known; the file is in the office and it may be adjudicated upon from the records. If there is any doubt there is a medical officer in each locality and he can inquire and report directly upon the applicants.

WAR REPARATIONS

AUTHORITY TO PLACE $2,500,000 TO CREDIT OF CUSTODIAN FOR PAYMENT OF CLAIMS

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 285 to provide for the payment of claims for compensation for loss sustained by the civil population of Canada during the late war.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. RINFRET: I have a suggested amendment to this section. When the resolution was before the house I indicated the reasons why the government had limited its proposed award to $2,500,000, but during the course of the present session considerable pressure was brought to bear upon the government to increase that award. Representations were made that the recommendations of Commissioner Friel be carried out, including his recommendation for the payment of interest. When the resolution was before the house I invited the fullest discussion on the matter and I indicated that the government had no intention to impose any policy in this matter. As you are aware, Mr. Chairman, every hon. member who spoke on that occasion took the stand that full payment should be made of all awards recommended by Commissioner Friel, and that we should take into consideration his recommendation as regards interest. The government has reconsidered the whole matter in the light of the discussion which took place in the house, and also in the light of representations which have come from all quarters of the country and which have appeared in the Canadian press. It is the intention of the government to recommend to this house, partly by means of this bill and partly through the supplementary estimates, the full payment of the awards made by Commissioner Friel and the payment of interest on same. As the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has pointed out, it is not possible for a money bill to go beyond the amount stated in the resolution, and, therefore, it is not my intention to recommend an amendment to this bill as regards the amount of money. The amendment I intend to recommend will make it conform to the intention of the government in this respect. If this bill passes the house, and is adopted by the senate, the government will include in the supplementary estimates an amount to make up the difference between $2,500,000 and the full award of Commissioner Friel.

Mr. BENNETT: And with interest?

Mr. RINFRET: With interest.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence) moved:

That subsection (b) of section 2 be amended by striking out all the words after the word "claim".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Commissioner's report.

Mr. RINFRET: I have an amendment to suggest in connection with this section. This section refers to the appointment of the commissioner under the provisions of the Inquiries Act, and the fourth line reads:

for the purpose of inquiry and report upon claims for compensation.

As there have been several commissioners appointed, I propose that the section be amended by striking out the words "inquiry and report" in the fourth line and substituting therefor "continuing and completing an inquiry and reporting." The section will then read:

The report of the commissioner appointed under the provisions of the Inquiries Act, chapter one hundred and four of the revised statutes of Canada, 1906, and amending act, for the purpose of continuing and completing an inquiry and reporting upon claims for compensation.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Ralston moves:

That section 3 be amended by striking out the words "inquiry and report" in the fourth line and substituting therefor the words "continuing and completing inquiry.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GEARY: Many claims were passed upon but not allowed. I have read the report and the evidence that was adduced and I cannot say that I would altogether agree with the action of the commissioner in regard to certain claims. Perhaps this is not the appropriate place to bring the matter up, but I suggest to the minister that he consider the advisability of having an appeal in regard to certain claims.

Mr. RINFRET: I intend to move later on that a clause be inserted covering that point.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Appropriation for payment.

Mr. BENNETT: The only thing about this section is that it does not say when payment is to be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It means right away.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Method of payment.

Mr. RINFRET: In this section it was intended in the first place not only to have a scale of payments but to limit the maximum amount to $25,000. Again, in order to avoid any confusion with what we intend to do in the supplementary estimates, I suggest that the last paragraph be struck out, as follows:

In any instance in which the amount payable under these scales would exceed $25,000, payment shall be limited to that figure.

Mr. BENNETT: I was wondering whether or not the sum of $2,500,000 might not be ample to meet all claims up to $25,000 with interest and thus the difficulty to which the minister has alluded would vanish. That is, if the $2,500,000 will pay this in full, the minister need not be bothered about paying a part. The section provides for a payment of 25 per cent on any excess of $15,000 up to $25,000. That involves a great deal of bookkeeping. Could the minister not provide that the payments be made up to a certain sum so that under this bill those payments could be made in full and there would not be a shortage? Supposing the maximum amount, instead of being $25,000, was made $20,000, because the minister is going to put in the supplementary estimates sufficient money to make the payments in full; this would obviate a great deal of bookkeeping.

Mr. RINFRET: I must admit the difficulty which is created by the way in which we have approached this question, but if this bill passes and the supplementary estimates are also put through, I think we can well consider both this bill and the resolution in the estimates as one measure. Unless I should find any technical difficulty in the matter, it is the intention of the department and of the minister in charge, when the $15,000 assessments are paid, to include the interest at once, although the interest is not provided for in this bill but will be in the supplementary estimates. It is also our intention to meet all the claims in the same way, making one payment, and not dividing it up into two or three payments.

Mr. BENNETT: But might we not deal wth the matter in this way by making section 5 read:

The custodian shall pay out of the aforesaid moneys the assessments made by the commissioner upon the following scale:—
Up to $20,000 with interest in full.

And just stop there, because the sum of $2,500,000 will cover that and the supplementary estimates will provide a sum sufficient to pay all amounts in excess of $20,000 with interest. The difficulty I see, when you get to the Auditor General, is that you have a statutory authority. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre said you might put two authorities in the same voucher. This is a statutory enactment that directs the payment of a percentage. If you strike out the balance of the section and say: We will pay claims up to $20,000 in full with interest as reported by the commission, will the $2,500,000 cover that?

Mr. RINFRET: I do not think we could go that far. The sum of $2,500,000 will practically meet the $15,000 assessments with interest.

Mr. BENNETT: Then if so, strike the rest of the section out.

Mr. RINFRET: The interest will be computed until the date of payment.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that.

Mr. RINFRET: It may just happen that we shall be short a certain amount. That is why I propose to leave it as it was so that the $2,500,000 would assuredly cover it, but we add just a small margin to cover the difference between the maximum of $25,000 and the 10 per cent payments.

Mr. CLARK: Under the amendment that the minister has made to section 2, there will now be authority to pay interest under this bill, will there not?

Mr. RINFRET: This bill does not allow any payment of interest. That will have to be provided for in the supplementaries and mentioned in the resolution in the supplementaries.

Mr. CLARK: Then I have misunderstood the effect of the minister's amendment. Perhaps I have not got it clearly, but paragraph (b) of section 2 is struck out. When that is struck out, there is then nothing to preclude the minister from paying interest.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Only the last part of the paragraph is struck out.

Mr. RINFRET: I think I made it clear that the definition had been made for the bill, but my object in striking out the reference to interest is only to avoid confusion.

Mr. CLARK: The effect of the amendment is to strike out the words:

Exclusive of his recommendation for the payment of interest thereon.

The very moment the minister strikes out those words, there is authority under this bill to pay interest, because a portion of the commissioner's assessment consists of interest.

Mr. BENNETT: The judgment so declares.

Mr. RINFRET: That difficulty also came to my mind, but I think it will suffice that the interpretation be given in the committee as to what this definition means. It reads:

The word "assessment" means the amount allowed by the commissioner in respect of any claim.

This is the way in which the commissioner made his assesments. He stated a certain amount which he made specific, and then he said that to that amount should be added interest from such and such a date.

Mr. CLARK: Then the interest becomes a portion of the assessment. The very moment something is added, it becomes a portion of it. I suggest again that the very moment the minister strikes out the words—

Exclusive of his recommendation for the payment of interest thereon.

—the bill provides for the payment of the full assessment made by the commissioner consisting of a certain principal sum plus interest. That is the commissioner's assessment, and if these words are struck out, then under this bill we are bound to pay all the claims of $15,000 including interest. There might be a claim of $8,000 plus $7,000 interest. This would be a claim or an assessment of $15,000 which, under this bill, we would be bound to pay. There will be confusion if, with interest added to these various principal sums, the amount of $2,500,000 does not suffice to pay the total amount of the claims provided for in section 5.

Mr. RINFRET: I think this is very much a matter of interpretation. It all depends upon the meaning that is attached to the word, "amount". If I may be permitted to revert to section 2, my purpose in amending it was to avoid confusion. If we leave in the bill a definition in which are mentioned the words—

Exclusive of his recommendation for the payment of interest thereon.

—there might be confusion between the bill and the resolution in the estimates. The definition, without these words and just reading—

"Assessment" means the amount allowed by the commissioner in respect of any claim.

—is clear enough, especially if in committee the interpretation is given to it that it is meant to indicate only the amount without the interest.

Mr. CLARK: Assume that the minister is one of those to whom an award has been made; if he puts himself in the position of the claimant he will see the difficulty that might arise under the act as it now stands. If he has been awarded $8,000 in principal, plus $7,000 in interest, he will assert that the amount awarded him was $15,000, not $8,000 at all, and he will claim $15,000, and I suggest claim it rightly.

Secondly, I suggest that any interpretation put upon this bill by the committee is quite useless because that will not preclude the claimant who has been awarded the $15,000 from claiming that amount, and it will not deprive him of the right to dispute the payment of $8,000 because this committee has no right to interpret this act. It is not the body which interprets the act after we have passed it. We may express here unanimously our intention to provide that it is $8,000, but if the bill bears the construction of $15,000 the courts will award $15,000.

May I point out, in the third place, that the minister is assuming, and probably the chances are one hundred to one that he is correct, that there will be a supplementary estimate to provide for the payment of this interest, but there is no certainty that the supplementary estimate will pass this parliament; there is no certainty that it will be introduced, and if it is not introduced, then we shall have this act which will be impossible if the principal sum named in section 4 is not sufficient to take care of the claims mentioned in section 5.

Mr. BENNETT: May I offer this suggestion to the minister and to the Solicitor General sitting beside him? Amend this bill by taking out the two and a half millions altogether, and then pass the bill, merely providing for the payment to the custodian by the minister of the awards made by the commissioner with interest, as provided in his report. Then a supplementary estimate will be all that will be needed to meet the requirements.

Mr. CANNON: That would be going beyond the scope of the resolution.

Mr. BENNETT: No, because it does not touch the resolution at all. The supplementary estimates have to be preceded by a message.

Mr. CANNON: The resolution mentioned an amount.

Mr. BENNETT: I say, drop the resolution altogether.

Mr. CANNON: If we drop the resolution, how can we pass a money bill?

Mr. BENNETT: We do not deal with money; simply say that the award shall be paid out of any moneys provided by the minister for the custodian, and bring down the amount in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why not drop the resolution and this bill altogether and bring in a new one? It could be done much more expeditiously in that way because it is a matter of agreement and consent now.

Mr. RINFRET: I think the objection taken by my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard is merely a technical one. He says that one of the claimants may say that he is entitled under this bill not only to the principal of his award, $8,000, but also the interest on it. I could see the difficulty if we did not intend to supplement this bill by the necessary vote in the estimates in order to meet both the award and the interest. My hon. friend says that there is no certainty that the supplementary estimates will be brought down. I am giving him the assurance that we will certainly bring them down. My hon. friend says that they might not be adopted. I wish he would give me the assurance that he and his friends will not object to the supplementary estimates.

Mr. CLARK: In reply to the minister I would draw his attention to the attitude of this opposition over a period of years in urging the government to do what we are again asking them to do. In other words, make sure that the amount will be brought down and that all the claims will be paid.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the Solicitor General will agree that it is a matter of law. If we drop this bill and the resolution, then on the supplementary estimates being introduced we will undertake, so far as we sitting here are concerned, to assist in the passing of the bill based on what you say, and the whole thing will go through and that will be the end of it.

Mr. CANNON: Suppose we did that, immediately the senate would say that we had passed our legislation in such a way as to prevent the senate from discussing it. This is a matter of some importance which the senate should be allowed to discuss, but if it is done by way of the supplementary estimates, the senate will have to pass it whether they like it or not.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the objection to dropping the resolution and the bill and bringing in a new resolution on Monday and a new bill? We could pass it in a few minutes and it would avoid the question of the supplementary estimates altogether.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Amongst others, we are trying to meet the wishes of hon. gentlemen opposite, and if they are not satisfied with this we can move that the committee rise, and not proceed any further.

Mr. CLARK: That is not what we ask at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the situation.

Mr. CLARK: Not at all. What we are asking is that it be made clear that the claims as awarded by the commissioner will surely be met under this bill; that is all. I think that if the suggestion of the hon. member for South Wellington is adopted, and the assurance is given that the claims will be paid, that would be far the simplest way of dealing with the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would say to mp hon. friends opposite that the government in this matter have sought to take the whole question out of the realm of political discussion. We are seeking to meet what we believe to be the general opinion of the house. If hon. gentlemen oposite are not satisfied with the method, we can move that the committee rise and report progress, and leave the matter at that. We have told the house that if this bill passes the house and passes the Senate, we will bring in a supplementary estimate making good the additional amount required together with interest. If this bill does not pass the Senate, we will not bring in the supplementary estimate. We wish this bill to pass both houses before we take further action.

Mr. BENNETT: If the Prime Minister had said that a little while ago we would not have had so much difficulty. We were endeavouring to assist the Prime Minister and trying to simplify the matter by having one payment instead of two. As section 5 now stands the Prime Minister will appreciate the difficulty. I do not think it is quite in keeping with the Prime Minister's usual attitude to suggest in the way of a threat that the committee will rise. I am quite satisfied that this legislation has as many friends in the administration as it has in this party. We are only eighty-nine of ninety in number, and their numbers are greater than ours. It is not a question of political friendship, however, at all; it is a question of dealing with this matter in a businesslike way, and the suggestion we made was made in good faith.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a question of getting through with the business of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: The situation is complicated by reason of the government's attitude in connection with the resolution. Now, yielding to the views of the house, the method is somewhat different, and if the Prime Minister says that the government will accept responsibility for this question being settled satisfactorily, I for one am quite content.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by the Minister of National Defence that all the words in the last paragraph of section 5 be struck out, beginning with the words "In any instance" and ending with the words "to that figure."

Amendment agreed to.

On section 7—Report.

Mr. RINFRET: I have an amendment to move and as it is quite extensive I will hand a copy to the leader of the opposition and to the leader of the Progressive party. In his report Commissioner Friel points out that a certain number of claims had been assessed by Commissioner Pugsley, the former commissioner, and signed by him, and later on either not concurred in or else varied by Commissioner Friel. It has been represented that in such cases you really have the decisions of two commissioners. It seemed only equitable that the two decisions be referred to some proper authority for final adjudication. That is the purpose of the amendment which I now move:

(1) Notwithstanding any of the provisions of this act, the custodian may refer to a judge of the exchequer court of Canada any assessment or assessments set out in the report of the said commissioner which was dealt with by a previous commissioner and was not concurred in or was varied in the said report, and upon such reference the said judge of the exchequer court is empowered to review any such assessment or claim and to report thereon, and upon receipt of such report the custodian shall pay the amount so reported by the judge in each case.

(2) For the purposes of such adjudication the judge of the exchequer court may, in his discretion, rely upon, either in whole or in part, any of the evidence taken by either commissioner, or upon the conclusions of either commissioner, and may receive such other evidence by affidavit or otherwise as may be further adduced in support of such claim and otherwise fix and determine any procedure necessary or requisite in the premises.

It is proposed to refer these awards to a judge of the exchequer court for final adjudication and to devise machinery for the inquiry.

Mr. HARRIS: Would this amendment cover a case where Commissioner Friel in disallowing a claim adds this rider? I would disallow this claim as not falling within any of the categories of the annex. Before the minister answers that question I should like to put this particular case before him—

Mr. RINFRET: Will my hon. friend allow me to interrupt him? If I should tell him that the amendment will certainly cover a case like that, perhaps he will be satisfied.

Mr. HARRIS: In view of this particular clause which says that the attention of the government is called to the decision of Commissioner Friel's predecessor, I asked the minister if he would be good enough to let me have the decision of the late Commissioner Pugsley, and in reply he wrote me saying that the government did not feel disposed to let me have the information. I pursued the matter a little further, and the minister said it was up to parliament. I want to know, is this matter up to parliament or is it up to the government?

Mr. RINFRET: If my recollection is correct, it was a case where the late Dr. Pugsley had prepared a draft decision and initialled it, but Commissioner Friel, evidently not considering it as a final judgment, has not seen fit to embody it in his report, as he has in every case where he has differed from the final decision rendered by his predecessor. Where there has been a serious conflict of opinion between any work done by the late Dr. Pugsley and that done by Commissioner Friel, I shall use the authority granted by this clause and give the most ample interpretation to the powers that it grants to the Secretary of State.

Mr. HARRIS: I take it then that the matter is up to the government rather than up to parliament?

Mr. RINFRET: It is one that my hon. friend can look forward to with the greatest of confidence.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I suppose if this passes the statement of claims up to $15,000 that we have received from the King's Printer will be paid immediately?

Mr. RINFRET: Oh yes, those will be paid without delay.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Those included in the King's Printer's document which we have received?

Mr. RINFRET: I do not know exactly what my hon. friend means by the King's Printer's list. Does he refer to Commissioner Friel's report?

Mr. ADSHEAD: The list containing the names of certain persons.

Mr. RINFRET: Those are the awards made by the commissioner. They will be paid at once.

Mr. GEARY: The amendment provides for cases where there has been disagreement between the late Dr. Pugsley and the commissioner subsequently appointed. But the minister has not provided for those cases where the parties are dissatisfied with the original finding by Dr. Pugsley and concurred in by Commissioner Friel. Is it intended to leave open for appeal such cases?

Mr. RINFRET: No.

Mr. GEARY: On the principle that the two commissioners concurring it is evident the adjudication must be right?

Mr. RINFRET: Perhaps my hon. friend is aware that the former commissioner, Dr. Pugsley, rendered only 280 decisions, while Commissioner Friel has passed upon 1,613 cases. In the majority of the 280 cases the decision rendered by Dr. Pugsley was confirmed by Commissioner Friel; but in 21 of the cases he has dissented from the decision given by his predecessor. It is not contemplated to allow an appeal where both commissioners have dismissed the case, or where it was heard by Commissioner Friel and dismissed.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Mr. HARRIS: Can the minister give the house some idea as to the length of time it will take for the necessary machinery to be set up to take advantage of this particular amendment? It is not necessary to draw to the attention of the house that this matter has been before the Canadian people since 1921. It has been delayed, most unnecessarily in my opinion, particularly since this government came into power. The people who are interested in these reparation payments are becoming older, and if they have to wait much longer they will be very seriously inconvenienced. I trust the minister will put some speed on now and get results.

Mr. RINFRET: As regards the awards made by Commissioner Friel, there will be no delay after the close of the session. If the bill is adopted by both houses and the estimate passes, it is the intention of the department immediately to circularize the claimants and issue the cheques. As to those claims regarding which there is a difference of opinion, it is my intention to refer them at once to a judge of the exchequer court. How long that judge will take to dispose of them I cannot tell, but we will try to see that the matter is expedited so far as they are concerned.

Mr. HARRIS: These people were first circularized on October 17, 1921. After they have been circularized on this occasion how long will it take to get action?

Mr. RINFRET: My hon. friend is not clear as to whether he refers to the awards made by Commissioner Friel, but so far as they are concerned they will be paid in full and in that case there will be no delay. This particular section deals with cases involving a difference of opinion as between Commissioners Friel and Pugsley. These claims, as I say, will be referred at once to a judge of the exchequer court. I cannot guarantee how long it will take him to pass upon them, but they are only 21 out of some 1,600.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RINFRET: Section 7 will now become section 8.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

On the title.

Mr. GEARY: Is it the intention of the department to allow parties to appear before that judge?

Mr. RINFRET: That has been left entirely to the judge.

Mr. GEARY: As a matter of procedure; but I would suggest to the minister that it might be well to have the parties appear.

Mr. RINFRET: Perhaps I might point out that we have taken a wide step from the initial resolution to the principle of paying awards in full with interest, together with the undertaking to refer a certain number of cases to a judge of the exchequer court.

Mr. GEARY: I am finding no fault, but I think it would be wise to let the parties appear and have the matter satisfactorily disposed of.

Mr. RINFRET: That is left to the judge.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. NEILL

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), I will now direct that the clerk read to the house a translation of the article to which the hon. member took exception.

The translation was read by the Clerk of the House as follows:

Ottawa, 20 mai.—Par le traité des pêcheries du Pacifique que le gouvernement King a négocié avec les Etats-Unis et pour lequel on demande maintenant l'approbation du Parlement, on se propose de donner aux Etats-Unis une juridiction égale à celle du Canada dans ce territoire immense de la Colombie-Britannique esquissé sur la carte ci-dessus. Ce traité a pour fin de conserver l'industrie du saumon sockeye, presque ruinée par les Etats-Unis, et placerait le bassin de la rivière Fraser sous la juridiction d'une commission conjointe internationale, —trois personnes des Etats-Unis et trois du Canada.

Ce territoire immense sur lequel le gouvernement King propose de donner aux Etats-Unis une juridiction égale à celle du Canada sur les lacs, les rivières et les améliorations à y introduire, couvre environ 100,000 milles carrés, d'une étendue égale à celles des provinces de la Nouvelle-Ecosse, du Nouveau-Brunswick et de l'Ile du Prince-Edouard, réunies, d'une étendue égale aussi à cette partie de l'Ontario située entre Ottawa à l'est, Windsor à l'ouest, Niagara Falls au sud et Sudbury au nord. Et dans ce territoire se trouve encore compris le grand port canadien du Pacifique, Vancouver, qui peut être sujet à une certaine juridiction de cette commission internationale.

Les députés de la Colombie-Britannique considèrent le traité avec une sérieuse alarme parce qu'il donne aux Etats-Unis un contrôle économique de la moité de la province. Les commissions conjointes internationales ont été désastreuses au Canada. C'est parce qu'un membre canadien de la commission internationale s'est allié aux membres américains que la diversion des eaux du St-Laurent a été rendue possible. Heureusement, ce représentant canadien a été destitué, mais non avant qu'il accomplisse un mal irrévocable. Le Bureau conjoint international des ingénieurs qui a étudié la canalisation du Saint-Laurent a recommandé que les stations génératrices de la section internationale soient placées en territoire américain. Et cette recommandation n'a été faite que parce qu'un des membres du comité canadien s'est associé à la section américaine.

On croit que le traité projeté, en donnant aux Etats-Unis une juridiction égale à la nôtre sur un territoire canadien, crée un précédent qui peut porter à l'indépendance canadienne un coup funeste. Et l'on plaide que si l'on fait ceci pour la Colombie-Britannique, la juridiction et le contrôle des Etats-Unis pourra également s'étendre à des territoires dans chaque province.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Care of patients and medical examination of pensioners, $2,600,000.

Mr. McGIBBON: As it has been customary to discuss things generally on the first item, and as the two departments are linked together, I wish to say something regarding the Department of Health. I feel like apologising for taking up the time of the house at this late date in the session, but, as I remarked the other night, in the last ten years these estimates have always appeared on the last day of the week and generally at the last hour of the day. By way of preface to the remarks I am going to make I wish to read something from the act. Section 4 of chapter 90 of the Revised Statutes of Canada is as follows:

The duties and powers of the minister administering the Department of Health shall extend to and include all matters and questions relating to the promotion or preservation of the health of the people of Canada over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, particularly the following matters and subjects:

(a) Cooperation with the provincial, territorial, and other health authorities with a view to the coordination of the efforts proposed or made for preserving and improving the public health, the conservation of child life and the promotion of child welfare;

(b) The establishment and maintenance of a national laboratory for public health and research work;

That is the basis upon which I wish to speak for a few moments, in order to direct attention to what might be accomplished if we had a real, live Department of Health. I think it is grossly unfair to this country that a department which is offered such opportunities should be administered in the inefficient manner of the last few years. If we were to cast our eyes eastward we would see what has been done in Great Britain, where Mr. Stanley Baldwin picked no less a man than Mr. Neville Chamberlain to preside over the department of health, where he has done perhaps the best work of his career.

For a moment or two I would like to direct the attention of the house to the great wastage of life in this country, and I would like to preface my remarks with the statement that while it is impossible to put a valuation upon human life, just as it is impossible to put a valuation upon the services rendered by a wife and mother, still the value of the people of a country is very much in excess of the value of all industry. I shall refer to that a little later; at this point I would like to direct the attention of the house to the life expectancy in Canada as compared with other countries of the world, as follows:

	Years
New Zealand	62
Australia	58
Denmark	58
Norway	58
England	58
Canada	55–6
France	45–48
Italy	45–48
Japan	45–48

What does that mean to a country? Let us consider it in relation to the increase of wealth per year. The wealth of Canada has been increasing at the rate of about $100 per capita per year, and I think the increase in the United States is almost the same. If we could advance the life expectancy in Canada by two years, with our 9,000,000 people and figuring the increase in wealth at $100 per year per capita, we would add to the wealth of the country the huge sum of $1,800,000,000. If we could bring our standard up to 62 years, which is the life expectancy in New Zealand, the additional wealth would be very much greater, and surely that is not an unreasonable thing to expect. In that one particular, therefore, we have a loss of almost two billion dollars yearly, which is almost equal to the amount added to our national debt because of the war. I think this is one direction in which this department could demonstrate its usefulness to the great advantage of this country.

Then there are other ways in which this department could be of service. Let us consider the work which has been done by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. About fifteen years ago they started to expend $1,000,000 yearly for the preservation of the health of their policyholders. To date they have spent $15,000,000, but they claim to have saved no less than $43,000,000 in death payments because of the fact that the lives of their policyholders have been prolonged. If that result can be attained by an insurance company through the expenditure of $15,000,000, what could be done in this country by an active Department of Health? The other day I ran across another good example which may appeal to my hon. friends from Quebec. In Bedford Mines, through the expenditure of some $30,000 over a period of years, the mortality rate was reduced from 300 per thousand to 96, and this reduction was effected largely in infant mortality. That shows what can be done by well-directed efforts along this line.

Now let us consider this question in another way. According to the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company an investigator examined a large number of wage earners who were receiving $2,500 a year; after going over thousands of cases he estimated the lifetime earnings of a man of that class at $41,000. His expenditure was estimated at only $13,000, which left an asset to the state of $28,000 per man. It is easy to figure out what that would mean even in a country with a population of 9,000,000 people, if the death rate could be cut down as we all know can be done.

For just a moment I would like to refer to the death rate in Canada; first I will give the infant mortality, and I would ask my hon. friends from Quebec to pay particular attention. I find that the infant mortality of Canada as compared with other countries is as follows:

Canada	94
England and Wales	69
Irish Free State	70
Northern Ireland	78
Australia	54
New Zealand	38
Switzerland	56
Netherlands	58

When we consider that this country has a wastage of 94 per thousand compared with 38 per thousand in New Zealand we can see the possibilities of a real active health organization. I would like to give the death rates of children in different cities in Canada as compared with cities in other parts of the world. In Canada the death rate per thousand living births was as follows:

Montreal	132
Toronto	71
Winnipeg	61
Vancouver	52
Ottawa	95
Quebec	148

The death rates per thousand in different cities in the old land are as follows:

London	59
Bristol	58
Manchester	86
Nottingham	84
Liverpool	95
Leeds	81

The figures by provinces are as follows:

Quebec	129
New Brunswick	96
Nova Scotia	92·3
Saskatchewan	74·5
Manitoba	72·2
Ontario	71·1
Prince Edward Island	66·6
British Columbia	60·1

I give these figures, Mr. Chairman, in order to prove the great necessity of health work. We have a terrible wastage in this country which can be corrected by a properly organized effort by the Dominion Department of Health and the provincial departments of health.

I would like to give some figures which show the decline in infant mortality in England and Wales. For the period from 1871 to 1875 the death rate per thousand births of children up to the first year of age was 153; that had been reduced to 70 in 1927. The death rate of children from the age of one to two years was reduced from 59 to 20. In this country we still have an infant mortality of some 15,000, annually. Syphilis is carrying off from 7,000 to 15,000 per year; tuberculosis accounts for 5,000; diphtheria, a purely preventable disease, accounts for something like 1,200. There is another side to the picture which is beginning to loom up, the new diseases connected with the new industries and occupations. We have carbon monoxide poisoning, but so far no department, either provincial or federal, has seen fit to consider this matter. When we look at the analyses of the different causes of death we find an astonishing increase in such diseases as cancer, nephritis and the circulatory diseases. I would like to give some figures showing the increase in deaths per 100,000 from cancer, as follows:

	1881-85	1921-25
Ages 40 to 49	36	88
Ages 50 to 59	81	213
Ages 60 to 69	128	473
Ages 70 to 79	200	816
Ages 80 and over	210	1,000

The figures are almost as startling in connection with nephritis. They are as follows:

	1881-85	1921-25
Ages 40 to 49	17	34
Ages 50 to 59	24	69
Ages 60 to 69	58	177
Ages 70 to 79	109	403
Ages 80 and over	114	740

We find the following increases in connection with the circulatory diseases:

	1881-85	1921-25
Ages 40 to 49	60	89
Ages 50 to 59	124	256
Ages 60 to 69	278	823
Ages 70 to 79	490	2,500
Ages 80 and over	430	5,730

These figures show that there is a remarkable increase in these diseases and this should have the attention of some active public health organization.

I find that the death rate from purpural sepsis has increased from 1.43 per cent in 1911 to 1.57 per cent in 1927.

Let us look at what has been done in the way of preventive medicine. Von Behring brought out his anti-diphtheric serum in 1890. In that year the death rate from diphtheria was 160 per 100,000 of population, and to-day it is down to 11. The house knows that serum was discovered by injecting the poisons of diphtheria into a horse and the anti-toxin was formed in its blood; after a sufficient quantity had formed it was bled and the serum was purified and kept in a ready condition to be administered to children or anyone who got the disease. In connection with typhoid fever it was discovered that by sterilizing the bacillus typhus and injecting it into a human being an anti-toxin could be obtained which would practically prevent the disease. That disease is practically extinct to-day. I looked up the records of twenty-four of the largest cities in the United States and I found that the death rate had fallen from 58 per 100,000 down to 8. This is a disease which could be wiped out with proper sanitation and a proper water supply. Many scientists predict that by 1930 diphtheria will be practically a disease of the past. By immunizing children who are susceptible to this disease they feel that it will be practically eliminated in four or five years.

Let us consider the venereal diseases for a moment, and in this connection I would like to quote from a report issued by Justice Hodgins in 1917. He said:

> Speaking generally the evil is so great and so underspread that nothing would be gained, but rather the reverse by attempting at once too drastic action.

The statistics available at that time show that of the admissions to the Toronto General Hospital in the first three months of that year 12 per cent showed a positive Wasserman reaction; 25 per cent of the male patients at the Toronto hospital for the insane had syphilis; and 26 per cent of the inmates of the Montreal general hospital were in the same condition. The percentage with reference to the admissions to the general hospital to-day has dropped to five, while in the case of the admissions to the Sick Children's hospital it is down to less than one per cent. That shows the result of the intensive campaign which has been carried on during the last ten years.

It might be interesting to know, as regards typhoid fever, that prior to and during the South African war, about 85 per cent of war casualities were from disease, principally typhoid fever. In the last war those figures were just about reversed, and it was estimated that from 5 to 10 per cent of the war casualities were from disease and the balance from wounds.

Let us consider for a moment the way in which life expectancy has been increased in other countries. I have under my hand the London Life table, from 1841 to 1922, and the expectancy of life according to that table has increased in males from 34·6 years to 53·8 years, and in females from 38·3 to 59·1 years. This has been brought about largely by preventive measures. If you compute the value of human life even in dollars and cents according to the large increase which has taken place in the expectancy of life, you will see what it is possible to accomplish in this country.

There is another side of the question that I should like to draw to the attention of the committee for a moment, and I should be glad if the Prime Minister would be good enough to take cognizance of the figures I am going to give. Based on the investigation of Professors Winslow and Fisher of Yale university, who with Mr. Doublin of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, made in connection with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, a complete survey of the health of the United States in regard to the prevention of accidents, sickness and death, and applying the same statistics to Canada—and I think this would be reasonable—we find that the wastage is simply enormous, unbelievable, as I shall show in a moment. These investigations showed that there was a yearly death rate in Canada of 96,000 to 100,000, forty per cent of which was claimed to be preventable. Forty per cent of 96,000 is equivalent to a waste of 38,000 deaths per annum. If you place a valuation of, say $2,500 per annum per life, we have the enormous wastage of $96,000,000. Cutting this in half to make allowance for children, we have a total economic wastage of preventable or postponable deaths of $48,000,000. This applies to preventable deaths alone.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Applying the same principle to illness, we find that two per cent of the population are continuously ill. This means that 180,000 people are continuously ill; of these 30 per cent or 54,000 are adult males and 30 per cent, or 54,000 adult females. The ratio of employment of women to that of men is as 6 is to 20, so we get a total wastage in this way of 16,200 females and 54,000 males, or a total loss of 70,200 people continuously. Allowing 300 working days to the year, we have a total wastage of 21,060,000 days, 50 per cent of which is preventable, or in other words 10,530,000 days. If we take this at a wastage of say $3 per day from each of these workers, we have a further wastage of $31,590,000 from preventable illness. If we could just save that and apply the saving to reducing our national debt, I wonder how soon we could relieve our citizens of the burden of taxation.

But that is not all. They also found there was an inefficiency due to advanced impairment to health of some 10 to 24 per cent of the working population, while those suffering from minor illnesses range from 18 to 40 per cent. Let us take a fair average of 20 per cent. There are in Canada 3,510,000 wage earners at an average of $750 per annum, giving a total earning capacity of $2,632,500,000. On the above basis 20 per cent of these are inefficient to an extent of 25 per cent inefficiency, or a wastage of $131,625,000. I sometimes think we get into the habit of rolling millions off our tongues so easily that we lose the significance of these figures.

We have invested in hospitals $120,000,000, in sanitoria $50,000,000 and in asylums, $7,500,000, or a total of $177,500,000. The cost of upkeep of these institutions is $50,000,000 a year. Of the patients treated in these institutions 40 per cent are suffering from diseases that are preventable.

Adding all these totals, without wearying the house with the figures—and I have cut them in half—we get a total wastage from preventable death, illness, accident and disease, of about $126,530,000 per annum. I should like to direct this to the attention of the house and the committee for the consideration of the Department of Health. This opens up a possible field for active work in this country. How is this wastage to be prevented? It can be prevented in two ways which are outlined in the act which brought this department into existence, first by coordinating all the health efforts of the country, provincial, Dominion and those connected with the insurance companies, so as to reduce the death rate and the preventable illness and accidents to the lowest possible minimum; second by increasing scientific research. It is almost inconceivable that the government would stay in power for so many years, with a Department of Health going on year after year, and never creating a department of scientific research. Scientific research is the very basis, the lifeblood of any country. For instance, the work of Pasteur in France in connection with wines, silkworms and anthrax in sheep, brought such a saving to that country that Professor Huxley said that the saving from those three discoveries made by one man would have paid off the Franco-Prussian war debt. I was reading only yesterday the life of Mark Carlton, who turned the state of Kansas into a great wheat-growing country. Away back in the nineties when they struck the wheat rust there, he took his microscope and examined the soil and the grain and travelled all over the world. Finally in Siberia he got a wheat that he brought back and started to grow in the United States, and not many years after that the United States was producing between seven and eight hundred million bushels of wheat a year. He practically put the state of Kansas on the map as a wheat-growing state.

One of the greatest tales of modern times I think is connected with the work of Doctor Gorges, the man who eliminated yellow fever. He got the idea, simply as a general practitioner, that the mosquito was responsible for transmitting yellow fever. Being a man of keen observation he noticed that the higher he went up into the mountains the fewer cases of yellow fever there were, until finally he reached an elevation where a particular kind of mosquito disappeared. The fever disappeared also. He came back and started his experiments. Some people were of the opinion that the yellow fever was due to insanitary conditions. They cleaned up the insanitary conditions, but the yellow fever prevailed just the same. Still working on his theory that the mosquito was responsible, he built some rooms and covered them with fine netting so that the mosquitoes could not get in, and he lived there. He took the clothes from the beds of people who had died of yellow fever and slept on them; he put on their clothes, and still he came out untouched by the disease. Then he took some mosquitoes and let them bite him, and in a few days he discovered that he had yellow fever. But working on that hypothesis, a remedy was found, and millions of people have been freed from that disease, and almost half a continent has been reclaimed. As was stated here the other night, the Panama canal could never have been built had this discovery not been made.

What, for instance, would a cure for cancer be worth to this country? I have just read that the death rate from cancer is increasing by leaps and bounds. This country cannot have too many men working in the unknown. The more men we have engaged in original research, the more likely we are to make discoveries of great benefit to humanity. It is only by delving into the unknown and making discoveries such as Doctor Banting made that you will achieve something that will prolong human life and make the human race happier. What, for example, has Doctor Banting's discovery been worth? Take the insurance companies. Every life that is prolonged means just that much found money for the insurance companies, and expressed in terms of dollars and cents it would no doubt run into billions of dollars in a short time.

I might go on and speak of the discovery of the use of liver extract in curing pernicious anaemia. That was discovered by Doctors Minott and Lea. All these discoveries have helped to prolong human life and have meant greater happiness and greater prosperity for mankind. That is a work that I think this department has been very lax in since it has been organized. I urged upon the minister, when he brought this department into existence, to have research work of this kind started at once, and I got his promise; but shortly after the Liberal government went out of power, and nothing along that line has been done since. If you want expressed in concrete form the results of scientific investigations, I would refer you to the evidence taken by a committee of this house some years ago on scientific and industrial research. We find that one discovery in the Mellon institute, on behalf of a baking firm in the United States, has saved them $500,000 a year. The Eastman Kodak Company has been spending millions every year on research, and they have got the business of the world. It is the same with the Dupont Powder and Paint Company. That firm stands in a place by itself to-day. I think the future of this young country with all its vast natural resources is absolutely bound up with and dependent upon industrial and scientific research. I appeal to the Minister of National Health and to the Prime Minister to-night to do something to give this young country a chance with her competitors throughout the world. We have the men, we have the natural resources, we have the opportunity. All we lack is courage on the part of the government to establish in the city of Ottawa a laboratory that will give our young men of ideas a chance to come here and engage in this all-important research work under able direction.

I have a lot more statistics here bearing on the same subjects that I might give if time permitted. The point I want to bring home is that there is no department of government in this or any other country that offers such opportunities for the creation of wealth, for the saving of waste, for bettering the welfare and increasing the happiness of our people than the Department of Health. It should be the biggest department in the government. As I have already said, Mr. Baldwin took one of the ablest men in Great Britain, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, and put him in charge of their Department of Health, where he has done the best work of his life. I hope that before another session ends we shall have in Canada a Department of Health that will be of some use to the country.

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): It is rather a strange thing that the moment a member speaks on either one of two subjects this house immediately empties itself. Those two subjects are bad whiskey and good health. Either of these subjects just melts the house away. Either will stop a riot and disperse a crowd anywhere. It is unfortunate, but it is so.

We hear a good deal about what is being done in the matter of public health in this country. We have a national Department of Health which was established in 1919. In that year this national institution first saw the light of day; it had an easy birth and the circumstances surrounding its arrival were auspicious. But under the guidance of this government, and with the kindly nutrition handed out to it by the present administration, we find that the poor baby to-day is the same weight and size, and has all the peculiar features which characterized it, as on the day of its birth. In other words, in relation to the Department of Health, the government has stood still for ten years; and what is more, it will stand still for twenty years longer unless someone comes along and wakes it up.

Is it not strange that we should have a Department of Health costing between $900,000 and $1,000,000 a year for the purpose of safeguarding the health of the people, while this government should be spending more than one half—two thirds—of that money on the heads of the department and in administration? Out of this $900,000 per annum spent by the government in the last ten years we find, in 1926, $427,000; in 1927, $393,000; in 1928, $472,000, expended on matters which by no stretch of the imagination can be regarded as conducing to public health. Most of the money comprises grants to the institution.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

The government are not spending the money in the way parliament intends that it should be spent; the amount spent on public health as such is absolutely inadequate to accomplish any results. It might as well be wasted. Look at the national budgets of other countries and you will find that in these places, in order to secure anything like a proper standard of public health, it requires an expenditure of $2.50 per capita. But what are we doing in Canada? Instead of spending anything like a reasonable proportion on public health our per capita expenditure amounts to 7½ cents. And if we take all the money spent by the Dominion, by the provinces and by the municipalities together, we find that it comes to the magnificent sum of 37½ cents per head of population. We are spending in Canada 37½ cents per head to accomplish what other countries are spending $2.50 to do. Can we ever dream of having anything like sound national health when such a parsimonious effort is put forth to that end?

It is commonly said that the Dominion government have no authority to act in the matter of public health in Canada. Medical men who have looked into the constitution know that this is not correct. In 1867 when the British North America Act was passed there was no such thing as public health in the sense that we use that term to-day. The only reference to public health was the matter of quarantine, and under section 91 of the act this was assigned to the Dominion government. We know also that matters which are not specifically assigned to any province come, under the British North America Act, within the domain of the Dominion government. Health officers and students in Canada came to the conclusion some time ago that under the constitution matters of public health should rest with the Dominion. We say, therefore, that the government have not been spending the money granted by parliament in the way that it should be spent. Under the act of 1919 it was provided that the government of the Dominion might publish literature, might disseminate propaganda, and might undertake to educate the people of the country in matters appertaining to public health. Well, they have done so, because we have here a magnificent sheet known as an abstract of current public health literature, and blazoned at the head of it is the intimation that it is issued by this government. But what has it to say with reference to public health? We find that it contains extracts from the Journal of Medical Health of the United States. It tells us how to tackle the plague in India, how to grapple with cholera in South Africa, and so on. But there is not a word as to what should be done in Canada. It reminds me of a trip I made some fifteen years ago on the Mississippi. Someone pointed out to me one of the old fashioned boats which had plied on the river long years ago—and what did I find? There was so much space taken up by the whistle that there was no room left for the passengers, and in the front of the boat there was a magnificent leather cushioned chair for the captain. Well, we have a chair for the captain to repose in—a captain who draws $15,000 a year but has not been worth ten cents in the ten years he has been guilding the ship in this department.

I want to pay tribute to a gentleman whom we all respect in this house, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson), who gave us an excellent discourse the other evening in which he pointed out what could be accomplished in the way of scientific research. We have also heard a splendid address tonight from my hon. friend (Mr. McGibbon). I am not going to enter into the phase of the subject with which these hon. gentlemen dealt, but I want to say that the Department of National Health is condemned by every man in Canada who has ever read three lines about public health. If you want to find out what is being done in this direction you have only to take up the last journal published by those in this country who are studying the question, and every line is a condemnation of what is being done by the government. It is pointed out that if the government were alive to the situation it would move forward and do things that are being done in other countries. Why is it that France, England and the United States, acting as a federal unit, have all moved forward along really progressive lines? The United States government has divided the country into sections and over every section there is a full time health officer paid by the federal government.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. KAISER: This is one of the things we ask for. This Dominion should be divided into health sections, over every one of which should be placed a full time officer paid partly by this government, partly by the province and partly by the municipality. This is one of the things which the public health people of the Dominion are asking the government to do and it is one of the things that are absolutely necessary if we hope to obtain satisfactory results. If the minister wishes to know what can really be accomplished let him read what has been done in the province of Quebec, which has been divided in the manner I have stated. There full time men are devoting their whole time and all their energies to the work of caring for the public health. See what they have done in relation to infantile mortality and in the matter of saving the lives of women in maternal trouble. See what has been done in grappling with epidemics; it is a credit to the province. They lead the way in this regard. And we have done the same in Ontario. For fifteen years I served as a member of the provincial board of Ontario and I have travelled throughout the province, so that I think I have the right to stand here and say that I speak with some authority on this question. Fifteen years ago in Ontario fifty persons out of every one hundred thousand of the population died of typhoid. The provincial government then grappled with the question and instituted a thorough investigation. We investigated the water supply of the province and looked into the situation from every angle. The result is that we have reduced the death rate in the province, from this particular cause, from 50 to 3.5 per hundred thousand. Such facts as these are pointed out to the government; and to find them, in the face of all this, sitting dumb and motionless is to me a marvel. The people will hold them responsible and get behind those who have progressive ideas with an insistent demand that we advance.

The last issue of the Canadian Public Health Journal, word by word, line by line, page by page, makes this demand of the government; yet we see the government of Canada hanging on away at the tail end of the hunt, the people a great distance ahead of them. The medical men of the country are miles ahead of the department. We find hon. gentlemen sitting quietly by, doing nothing but smoking fifty-cent cigars and drawing $15,000 a year. As an immediate step in the direction of progress we demand that the government make a move in the apointment of a council of epidemiologists. Does the minister mean to tell this committee that if we had a council such as this, a few men who studied nothing but epidemics in Canada, who could move from one section of the country to another whenever there was an outbreak of any epidemic, very satisfactory results would not ensue? Two years ago there was a typhoid epidemic in Montreal when five hundred people were carried to the grave, while some five thousand were down in the hospitals. This cost between two and three millions. I have no hesitation in saying that if we had had in the Dominion at that time a few men trained in the study of epidemics there would not have been ten deaths in Montreal as a result of that outbreak; the epidemic would have been successfully met. But there was not a word spoken, not a voice raised in this house, not a voice raised in Canada against it until it was found that someone was losing five or ten cents a gallon on cream or milk. As soon as people began to lose a few dollars the cry went up that something should be done. Now this obviously is discreditable; surely the health of the people should be placed above dollars and cents.

In these two particulars we charge the government with dereliction of duty. They have no conception of the task that confronts them; they do not understand the question with which they are supposed to cope. If you were to engage a few men who really appreciated the value of such measures as I have mentioned, you would see a progressive move made in the matter of public health in Canada. Let me quote something to show what is being done in England in regard to whole time officers. We read that the full time plan is in operation in England, where 351 out of some 1,200 part time officers have been replaced by full time officials in combined areas. In the United States also, since 1911, over 400 county health officers have been appointed on full time. In New York state half the cost is borne by the state. This gives you an idea of what is taking place throughout the civilized world wherever the authorities are alive to the importance of public health, wherever they place a proper value on human life, wherever they have an adequate conception as to what public health implies. In these countries public health work is divided into two great sections—one, the prevention of disease, and the other the combating of epidemics. In this regard disease and epidemics are fought pretty much as an up to date fire brigade tackles any conflagration. What should we think if we went into a large city and saw a great fire being attacked by volunteer firemen, while someone was paid a salary of $15,000 to look on at the show, occasionally to ring a bell, and once in a while to blow a whistle?

I make the charge that Canada, in the field of public health, is more backward than any other country on the face of the earth; the government are silent, they are dead. I do not hesitate to say that. There should be more activity in the department. In 1919 a council of health was created, and they come together every year, bringing scientific minds to bear upon the health problems that confront the country. Their conclusions they pass on to the Minister of National Health (Mr. King Kootenay). But the minister puts on glasses that will not read, he looks the thing over, and he says, "Oh, well, the pigeon hole is good enough for this; the Dominion cannot take action in this matter". I say, the people of Canada demand that we have some genuine national health work done by this government, and done before another year goes by. Now, I will not detain the house longer—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KAISER: Hon. gentlemen opposite clap their hands. My hon. friend from Saskatoon (Mr. Young) and others know, however, that what I am saying is true. I know they do not like to hear me or anyone else refer in these terms to the government, but there are in Canada ten million people who think pretty much as I do, and I want to tell the minister that the people of the country are demanding more and more that real public health work be done by this government. You have never yet seen a city criticized for spending money to take care of the health of its people. The people will support any such expenditure, and all I ask is that Canada get in line with other countries and take a proper view of the importance of public health.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am sure we have all been greatly interested in the addresses delivered by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) and the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Kaiser).

Mr. McGIBBON: Not "hon." yet.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, quite honourable, I hope. Now, it is rather surprising that our friends should have made the criticism we have heard to-night and on a previous occasion. It is well known that the national department of health was brought into being in 1919. Prior to that, the services that were then set aside as proper health services for the Dominion to undertake were administered by various departments of government. I refer to the quarantine service, the medical inspection of immigrants and the treatment of sick mariners. These were the services which our constitution laid down as coming within the purview of the Dominion government. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), speaking to-day on another question, made that very plain. But we do not need to emphasize it, because if we take the act that was passed in 1919 we find that the government of that day realized the extent to which they should go in establishing a department of health. In the act there are two clauses—it was not set out in one but in two definite sections—which limit the activities of the department. The first, section 4, provides:

> The duties and powers of the minister administering the Department of Health, shall extend to and include all matters and questions relating to the promotion or preservation of the health of the people of Canada over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, particularly the following matters and subjects.

I shall deal with these matters in a moment. Then there is section 7, which the parliament of that day considered necessary:

> Nothing in this act or in any regulations made hereunder shall authorize the minister or any officer of the department to exercise any jurisdiction or control over any provincial or municipal board of health or other health authority operating under the laws of any province.

Just a moment ago my good friend from Ontario complained because the Dominion government was not in a position to go into Montreal during the recent epidemic and take charge of the health situation. That argument is absolutely absurd; it was not received by members of the house and it will not be received throughout the country, because everyone knows that at all times the provinces have insisted that they have local control with regard to health as they have with regard to education and other matters.

It is rather surprising to find hon. gentlemen opposite belittling the efforts which are being made by health authorities and by those who have charge of the health of this country; listening to hon. gentlemen opposite tonight the impression might go abroad that no health measures are being carried out in Canada. That is not true; it is well known to be untrue. In each province we have live health organizations under the control of the provincial governments in addition to the municipal health organizations, and generally speaking our municipal health organizations are not inferior to those in other cities on this continent or anywhere in the world. In health matters the city of Toronto is probably as well equipped as any similar city anywhere in the world. It is true there was an outbreak of typhoid in Montreal a year or two ago, due to an infected milk supply and also to the fact that the laboratories were improperly equipped and insufficiently staffed, but now conditions are different. The hon. member for Muskoka indicated that nothing was being done in Canada and especially in Quebec, but he did not tell this committee that to-day in health matters Quebec is leading all the provinces of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, he said that.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They have gone ahead and established health units under their provincial law, and that is being done in other provinces throughout Canada. It is being done in my own province and in Saskatchewan and Manitoba; I do not think Ontario has adopted that system as yet. We were told that the federal government of the United States was in control in that country and had divided the country into health units, which it was subsidizing. That is not so; that is done by the state authorities as is the case in Canada. It is true that after the great flood in the Mississippi valley a year or so ago the United States government did go in and take care of the health situation during that period of disaster; it is true that since the flood health units have been established in order to assist the victims of that disaster, but generally speaking the health units throughout the United States are established by state authority, and that system is in vogue also in Great Britain and in other countries.

Now I wish to refer to the matters which parliament saw fit to place under the control of the federal Department of Health. Section 4, subsection (a) of the act states:

> Cooperation with the provincial, territorial, and other health authorities with a view to the coordination of the efforts proposed or made for preserving and improving the public health, the conservation of child life and the promotion of child welfare;

I might also read section 6:

> There shall be a Dominion council of health consisting of the deputy minister of health, who shall be chairman, the chief executive officer of the provincial department or board of health of each province, and such other persons, not to exceed five in number, as may be appointed by the governor in council, who shall hold office for three years.
> 2. Such Dominion council shall meet at such times and places as the minister may direct, and shall be charged with such duties and powers in respect to this act as the governor in council may prescribe.

Through this Dominion council of health which was brought into being under this act the cooperation between the provinces and the different health authorities can be and is being brought about.

Mr. BENNETT: What has been done by this council?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It has done a great deal. It has been able to bring about uniform local quarantine laws in the various provinces; it has made a study of and reported on the matter of infection and contagion; we have uniformity in many of our health laws which did not exist before, and generally this council has been of great benefit to the people of Canada. Before I finish I intend to deal with some of the particular work which has been done and to show the character of the discussions which have taken place and the action which has followed these discussions. The character of the board itself is essential; we take the chairman or secretary of the various provincial health boards—

Mr. McGIBBON: That is laid down in the act.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, and I say it is essential. In addition, five other members are selected representing various groups such as the farmer group, the labour group, the women of Canada and so on. I do not know where we could get a committee which would be better informed and better able to coordinate health efforts throughout Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: How many times have they met?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They meet usually twice a year, in the spring and fall; they have a three-day session, for which the agenda is properly prepared and very thoroughly discussed. The sole object of the formation of this Dominion council was to bring about cooperation with the provinces and other health authorities, as specified in the act. The Department of Health cannot, nor can the Dominion Council of Health, lay down any authoritative rule or regulation for the control of these various health bodies; it is well understood that members of the Dominion council can only report back to their governments, who must put through the legislation.

Now I might mention some of the subjects which have been under discussion from time to time: Maternal mortality; community hospitals; quarantine regulations; vaccination and quarantine; malignant growths; oral hygiene; carbon monoxide poisoning; trachoma among Indians; health therapeutics and home nursing; diphtheria, scarlet fever and measles; control of respiratory diseases; cyanide disinfection of ships; institutional treatment for drug addicts and so on.

Mr. McGIBBON: Can the minister tell us what practical results have come about?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I told my hon. friend that the quarantine laws throughout Canada have been made uniform and there has been a coordination, generally speaking, of the health laws as between the different provinces. Carbon monoxide poisoning has been discussed but there is no authority in the Dominion council, any more than there is in this parliament, to say to the people of Canada, "This is what we will do for carbon monoxide poisoning or this is what we will do for typhoid."

Mr. BENNETT: The province of Alberta enacted legislation at the last session.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is quite true, but my hon. friend cannot claim for a moment that this committee, composed as it was and with an agenda of this kind, did not produce some good after three days of discussion.

Mr. McGIBBON: The trouble is that we cannot see it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend seemed to think that the establishment and maintenance of a national laboratory for public health and research work should be the whole thing; that the Health department should be an incident to that section and not that section an incident to the Health department.

Mr. McGIBBON: I did not say that.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is the way the hon. member has talked.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is the biggest thing in the department.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The establishment of that laboratory for public health and research work is an important thing, but the department is doing other work which is not being done elsewhere in Canada. These various services were within other departments and we have established research laboratories and testing laboratories to deal with all questions relating to our food products. The best of chemists procurable have been employed and the work being done is equal to that being carried out in any laboratory of like character in the world.

Mr. BENNETT: The Excise department used to do that.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They did, but we do not think that they did it as well as we are doing it at the present time. We have very excellent men in Doctor Harris and Mr. Lancaster. They are recognized authorities on this subject and if anyone would take the time to go through these laboratories and see the class of work which is being done in relation to our food and drug products, he would realize the class of research work which is being carried on.

Mr. McGIBBON: It has always been done.

Mr. BENNETT: The Excise department used to do it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend speaks of the United States with some apparent appreciation of their greatness; does he know that it is only within the last few years that that great country has established a laboratory of health research.

Mr. BENNETT: Doctor Wiley has been doing the food work for over fifteen years.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He has been doing it for years and doing it very effectively. Previous to the establishment of a health laboratory in Canada very little of that work had been done.

I will have something further to say before the discussion in regard to public health and research work closes. It would seem to my hon. friend that the establishment of a laboratory such as he speaks of requires only the expenditure of money. Money is about the least requirement for a laboratory of that character; personnel is the main and important one.

Mr. McGIBBON: The government has not got it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): During the last one hundred years there have been only a few men with the talent for research who have made great discoveries. It is hard to say just where we could get the research men to go into a laboratory of that kind; we certainly would not get them by putting applications through the Civil Service Commission asking for men to apply for positions in a research laboratory. In the development of the laboratory work which is now being done we hope to train the men who will do the research work of the future.

The government is not opposed in any way to a laboratory for health research, and it is well known to parliament and to Canada that the government is giving considerable thought to research along other lines. Buildings are being constructed and it is hoped that we will soon have our own laboratories and our own personnel for the research work of the Health department, and I believe that some day we will be able to create a laboratory and do the work which my hon. friend is desirous that we should rush into at once.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister must be careful and not duplicate the work which is being done in the Connaught laboratories, for instance, and other places of that kind.

78594—179½

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This class of research work has not been done, as a rule, by governments. The work of Pasteur and of other great scientists has been carried on under very unfavourable conditions. Work of that character is being done in laboratories such as those of the Rockefeller institute and of our universities. Men are continually in training and the faculty knows the men who have the proper qualifications for research work and they endeavour to retain those men. It is well known that the Rockefeller institute does not go to the universities with a view to taking that class of men away, because they know that such a procedure is resented. Where they find a man with those qualifications they arrange with the university authorities to relieve him of some of his other duties which he may be doing within the university.

Mr. BENNETT: They give him a fellowship.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He is permitted to devote his entire time to the problem he may be studying.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned until 11 a.m. Monday May 27, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, May 27, 1929

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PENNY BANK ACT AMENDMENT

Hon J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the order for the second reading of Bill No. 297 (Letter A8 of the Senate), intituled: "An Act to amend the Penny Bank Act" be transferred on the order paper from private bills to government orders as said bill is a government measure and not a private bill.

Motion agreed to.

DEBATE ON IMMIGRATION POLICY

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Pursuant to notice I desire to move:

That the debate on the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. McRae) to the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of supply be resumed whenever the said motion is made by a member of the government.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

On the motion of Mr. Fafard for Mr. Morin (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville), the seventh report of the select standing committee on standing orders was concurred in.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

On the motion of Mr. C. G. Power (Quebec South) the fourth report of the special committee appointed to consider the Dominion Elections Act and the Corrupt Practices Inquiry Act was concurred in.

PEACE RIVER RAILWAY OUTLET

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I desire to table a report by the engineers and surveyors of the department with respect to certain surveys made in the Peace River district. This report was asked for by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy).

PENSION PAYMENTS

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): The hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross) on the 22nd of May referred to the production of an order in council for which he said he had asked. I cannot find any record of his having asked for it before, and I have consulted the Department of the Secretary of State. So far as I have been able to ascertain, no motion for a return has appeared in the votes and proceedings, but perhaps it will serve my hon. friend's purpose if I send a copy of the order in council across to him.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Thank you. It was a verbal request that I had made of the Minister of Pensions (Mr. King).

NATURAL RESOURCES OF WESTERN PROVINCES

ADMINISTRATION OF WATERPOWERS IN ALBERTA, SASKATCHEWAN AND MANITOBA

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 311, respecting waterpower in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This bill is being introduced in response to the resolution of the house asking that the administration of the waterpowers of these three provinces be undertaken by the provincial governments. I shall make a more extended explanation on the second reading of the bill, but I might just say here that the resolution requested that the Waterpowers Act under which the British Columbia government administers the waterpowers in the railway belt and Peace River block be applied in the administration of the waterpowers of the three prairie provinces. We find this rather difficult. We are just asking authority to deal with the provinces, and we will embody at the same time all the provisions of the British Columbia Waterpowers Act that will apply to the provincial governments, owing to the peculiar situation that exists between the federal government and the provinces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. A. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Might I ask the Minister of the Interior a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is not debatable on the first reading.

SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 312 to amend the Supreme Court Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of the Supreme Court Act a judge having heard a case, being absent when the judgment is delivered, may hand his notes to one of the judges who is present and who is delivering the judgment on his behalf, and these notes may form part of the record. The present bill is for the purpose of extending these provisions to a judge who has resigned or who has retired under the new age limit provision put in the statute two years ago.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

NEW BRUNSWICK HAY CROP AND MARKETS

Mr. PRICE:

1. What tonnage of hay is available for market purposes in the province of New Brunswick?
2. Has the department any information concerning the demand for hay in the markets of Great Britain?

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. No statistics available. From the 1928 crop of 796,000 tons probably 200,000 tons available for market of which it is estimated less than 10 per cent is still in producers hands. Seed branch inspectors report that bulk of hay unmarketed is of inferior quality.

2. Imports of hay into the United Kingdom are reported as 29,371 tons for the calendar year 1923; 13,187 tons for 1924; 23,566 tons for 1925; 23,427 tons for 1926; 43,099 tons for 1927. Canadian exports to the United Kingdom were 23,775 tons for the fiscal year 1923-24; 21,837 tons for 1924-25; 36,317 tons for 1925-26; 20,110 tons for 1926-27; 58,400 tons for 1927-28.

There is a good demand for hay in the British market at the present time. Stocks in farmers hands are reported to be low with early spring weather unfavourable to the present season's crop. Prices offered for hay in the British market are usually low and, in the past, have not been such as to attract the best grades of Canadian hay to the British market in any great quantity. Most shipments from Canada to the United Kingdom are made from Montreal while that port remains open.

HISTORIC SITES—ANNAPOLIS ROYAL

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Has the government been requested to acquire the site of the first fort and habitation, built in 1605 by Champlain and his associates, near Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia?

2. Is the money required for the restoration of this fort and habitation, in accordance with drawings left by Champlain, available from other than governmental sources?

3. What persons and what historical and tourist associations have requested that the government assist in this project?

4. What action has been taken or is contemplated by the government?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Yes.

2. The president of the Annapolis Royal Historical Association advises he has an offer of $10,000 in aid of the proposal.

3. The Historical Association of Annapolis Royal.

4. None.

GUS CARRIER—PRINCE ALBERT PENITENTIARY

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents relating to Gus Carrier, Prince Albert penitentiary, from January 1, 1925, to date.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): When this matter came up the first time I said that there were objections to tabling the documents, some of them in any event. The matter is under consideration by the department. As a matter of fact, I expect a report from an officer whom I have instructed to look into this case. The whole record consists of confidential documents, exchanged between the officers of the penitentiary branch and I do not think that, under the practice, these documents should be tabled. However, I think that in a couple of days I will be able to tell my hon. friend the result of the investigation.

Mr. CLARK: We will let it stand then.

Motion stands.

On the order to go into committee on Bill No. 214, for the relief of Eva Alexander Grayson Smith:

Mr. HEAPS: My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked me to say on his behalf that members in whose names private bills stand should be in the house when motions are made.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not catch what the hon. member said. There is objection?

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has asked me to say on his behalf that the members should be in the house when motions are moved.

Mr. GEARY: The member for Winnipeg North Centre cannot be heard, he is not in the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Both sponsors and objectors ought to be here.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) is unavoidably absent, and does not expect to be present this session.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the circumstances I would say by unanimous consent, Mr. Young (Saskatoon), for Mr. McPhee, moves, seconded by Mr. McIntosh, that the house go into committee on Bill No. 214, for the relief of Eva Alexandra Grayson Smith.

CENTRAL FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin; for Mr. Lang) moved the second reading of Bill No. 283, respecting Central Finance Corporation.

Mr. SPENCER: Will the sponsor of this bill kindly explain?

Mr. HEPBURN: Last year the Central Finance Corporation was given a charter by this parliament. This year it is asking for certain amendments. Unfortunately the sponsor of the bill is not present. The fact that the bill has passed the senate would indicate that there was certain merit to it. All I ask is that it be sent to the banking and commerce committee.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): The officers of my department have gone over this bill and they find no objection to it. As my hon. friend has stated, a slight amendment has been made by the banking and commerce committee of the senate. It just adds certain clauses regarding chattel mortgages.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE PROSECUTIONS —MR. HARRY BRONFMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): On May 5th an order of the house was passed for the production of papers regarding the prosecution of Harry Bronfman. The papers that were brought down refer only to the Department of National Revenue and the evidence on which the investigating commission found a prima facie case against Harry Bronfman. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) informed the house that the other papers were confidential and could not be furnished. Will the Minister of Justice now furnish those papers, or will he say why the crown was not in a position to make out a good case at law, to use his own words in answer to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine)?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): As the hon. gentleman says, the return was prepared by the Department of National Revenue, and apparently they tabled everything except the legal opinions sent to that department by the Deputy Minister of Justice. Those legal opinions, under the practice that has always prevailed, are as a matter of fact private documents and are never made public. My hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) tells me that another hon. member, I think the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), asked for the same papers, and the minister communicated them to him personally and he was satisfied. Perhaps my hon. friend from Rosetown will be satisfied if the Minister of National Revenue shows him the report of the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. EVANS: I do not think that that would satisfy me because it is only the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, and the Minister of Justice has already given his decision in the matter. What we want to know is why the crown was not in a position to make out a good case at law.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That will be indicated in the opinion.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The question which the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) has asked is not in form just what I proposed to ask the minister, having read in Hansard the reply he gave the other day, namely, that the crown in right of the Dominion had concluded that there was not sufficient evidence on which to predicate a prosecution being taken against a certain person.

My understanding is that that is a matter that must rest with the provincial authorities. Time and time again the Dominion government has declined to exercise the power because it can exercise it only through the attorney general's department in the respective provinces. For instance, the crown in right of the Dominion, cannot prosecute a case in the provinces. The crown can assist by having somebody act with the attorney general of the province, but it is perfectly obvious that the crown in right of the Dominion cannot carry on the prosecution. I could not help overhearing a remark on the other side as to the Saskatchewan election, but this has nothing whatever to do with the Saskatchewan election. In connection with prosecutions under the Combines Act in regard to the fruit industry, counsel for the Dominion came into the provinces, and the only method by which the prosecution was carried on was by the indictment being preferred through the department of the attorney general of the province. Counsel for the Dominion assisted or acted on behalf of the provincial authorities in carrying forward the prosecution. It has never been competent, in my judgment, for this Dominion or for the Minister of Justice to determine whether or not proceedings should be taken against anybody. That rests with the provincial authorities, because the administration of justice rests with them only, and all the power in this parliament could not enter a nolle prosequi against an individual in connection with criminal proceedings. That must come from the attorney general of the province If my memory serves me—I intended to look it up, but as my hon. friend from Rosetown has brought the question up, I may now state my recollection—Sir John Thompson considered this point very carefully at one time in connection with certain prosecutions that arose out of the McGreevy-Connolly difficulties, and the conclusions that were arrived at then were approved by such eminent jurists as the Hon. David Mills and Mr. afterwards, Sir Louis Davies. I am speaking wholly from memory and subject to correction, but my memory is that the principle is there emphatically laid down that there is no power in the Dominion to declare that a prosecution shall or shall not be taken against any alleged offender against the law, but that power rests in the attorney general of the province, the provincial authorities alone being the power charged with the administration of criminal justice. Even although the Minister of Justice thought that the case in question was not a good case for criminal prosecution and so advised the Department of National Revenue, the duty of the department is to transmit the documents to the attorneys general in the respective provinces affected, and have the appropriate attorneys general take such proceedings as may be necessary, first determining either not to prosecute or to proceed with the case. I dare say that my friend the Minister of Justice and certainly the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will remember that the former member for South York (Mr. Maclean), always urged that there should be power in this parliament under our constitution, as there is in the United States, for the federal prosecuting officers and federal marshals to prosecute and carry on proceedings in the several courts for the purpose of enforcing justice. We have not that power under our constitution. He used to point out with a great wealth of learning that the effect of that lack of power was to render the enforcement of many of our federal statutes ineffective and inefficient, and he suggested from time to time that our constitution should be so amended as to provide beyond peradventure that this Dominion could itself institute and carry forward criminal proceedings. Certainly the federal government has no power to enter a nolle prosequi and no officer of our Dominion, the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice, can discontinue criminal proceedings or, in the sense in which the word is properly used, initiate or continue them in the criminal courts of the provinces.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I quite agree with my hon. friend that there is no power on the part of this government to file a nolle prosequi, but there is power to refrain from laying a charge—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is exactly what has been done in this case. The officers of the Department of Justice, after having received the evidence taken before the royal commission, came to the conclusion that in law we had not a good case against Bronfman, and the Department of National Revenue was so advised.

As far as the attorney general of the province is concerned I quite agree, too, that all indictments must be proffered by the attorney general, but surely there must be somebody to initiate something. Especially when it comes from the federal authorities, the attorney general of the province never acts unless some federal officer lays a complaint against somebody, and then it becomes the duty of the attorney general to prosecute. But when the federal authorities come to the conclusion that they cannot prosecute and do not lay any complaint or charge against the man before the provincial authorities, I do not think the provincial authorities can be blamed for not prosecuting.

Mr. EVANS: Then am I to understand that the whole responsibility rests on the Justice department at Ottawa?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Responsibility only so far as I have indicated. When a legal opinion is asked of the Department of Justice by any of the departments of the government, certainly we are responsible for the answer, but that is all.

Mr. BENNETT: The value of that opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice is only this, that it expresses the view of a responsible minister of the crown, a federal minister, that such a prosecution would not succeed, but it cannot in any sense stay or bind or limit or restrict the duty of the attorney general of the province to enforce the laws of the country if charges are brought before the court for that purpose.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If charges are brought. May I add that any citizen of Canada can lay a complaint if anybody is not satisfied. If my hon. friend from Rosetown is not satisfied, he can lay a complaint himself.

Mr. EVANS: Did not the commission itself lay a charge?

Mr. LAPOINTE: They sent on the facts.

PENNY BANK ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 297, to amend the Penny Bank Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On Section 1, subsection 2—Withdrawals for investment on other approved securities.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the general purpose of this bill?

Mr. ROBB: Penny banks are purely philanthropic in purpose. The Penny Bank of Ontario serves a school population of 170,000 children in 360 schools in 85 municipalities throughout the country, all the chartered banks acting as local agents of the Penny Bank. Under the charter as they have it now, Mr. Chairman, they may invest their funds only in Dominion of Canada securities. This bill is to widen their powers so that they may invest in Dominion of Canada guaranteed securities, or securities of, or guaranteed by, any province of Canada, or of the government of the United Kingdom, or of any municipal corporation in Canada, including debentures issued for public school purposes or guaranteed by any such municipal corporation, as the minister may approve. The board may also invest, to an amount not exceeding 50 per cent of the funds at the credit of the bank as aforesaid, in first mortgages on improved real estate in the Dominion of Canada not exceeding 50 per cent of the value thereof.

Mr. SPENCER: I would like to ask the Minister of Finance how this bank differs from any other bank; how is it able to use the word "bank" which is more or less of a monopoly?

Mr. ROBB: I have just given my hon. friend and the house the information as to their loaning privileges. Heretofore, they have only been able to invest money in Dominion government securities. Many of those securities will mature shortly. They desire now to widen their powers so that they may invest in guaranteed securities of the Dominion of Canada, in guaranteed securities of the provinces, or of the United Kingdom, or any of the municipalities, and an amount not to exceed 50 per cent may be invested in first mortgages on improved real estate in the Dominion of Canada subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance. It is purely a philanthropic organization. There are no shareholders and the directors receive no fees.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the resources at the moment?

Mr. ROBB: They now have $1,250,000 in round figures.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister think it sound to permit the investment of any part of that money in mortgages?

Mr. ROBB: Well, not exceeding 50 per cent of the value, and it is subject to the approval of the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the very point I am making, because it must be clear to the Minister of Finance that that is making the Dominion government liable for the mortgage. That is the real truth about it.

Mr. ROBB: As my hon. friend knows, you could not proceed with that argument very far, because all the life insurance companies invest funds in mortgages, subject to the approval of the treasury board.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but not to this extent. The banks are precluded from making loans on real estate. I only put it to the minister, if he does not think it desirable to eliminate that for the reason that it suggests a moral obligation on the part of the minister to become responsible for the validity and sufficiency of those loans, and I do not think that is quite sound.

Mr. ROBB: I think there is very much in what my hon. friend says. I move to strike out from line 20 the words:

> The board may also invest, to an amount not exceeding 50 per cent of the funds at the credit of the bank as aforesaid, in first mortgages on improved real estate in the Dominion of Canada, not exceeding 50 per cent of the value thereof.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That eliminates the right to loan on mortgages.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On subsection 4—Securities deposited with minister; proceeds credited to bank.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest that subsection 4 be amended also because that has reference to mortgages.

Mr. ROBB: I move to strike out the words in the second line "other than mortgages."

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

Section agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER: Under what particular department does this bank come? Does it come under the supervision of the superintendent of insurance, or under that of the general inspector of banks?

Mr. ROBB: I should say the inspector of banks. It was to the inspector of banks that I referred their application for consideration.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MONTREAL TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 254, respecting the construction by the Canadian National Railway Company of certain terminal facilities with grade separation and other works at and in the vicinity of the city of Montreal.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I would like that to stand if possible. There is certain information I desire and I propose to make some observations in connection with this bill when I get that information. We should think very carefully about certain matters connected with the bill, and I propose possibly to offer an amendment in the way of a section to be added. As this bill was before the committee for a few hours the other day, and involves an enormous sum of money, I think we should proceed carefully with it.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no objection to letting it stand, but perhaps it would facilitate matters if my hon. friend would mention the points touching which he wishes information. If he does so I shall be glad, if possible, to supply that information.

Mr. BENNETT: Very well, we can go into committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 2—Power to construct and build works described in the schedule.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will recall that by statute we validated an agreement made between the Canadian Northern Terminal Company and the Canadian Northern Railway Company, whereby this country became obligated, as conditions now are, to pay a certain annual sum in interest and sinking fund with respect to securities involved in the construction of the old Canadian Northern terminal. I have not had an opportunity to investigate the matter, but I was in the house when it went through and I took occasion then to go into the question with a good deal of care. That is why I suggest that it would be well for us to look into the matter thoroughly; personally I should like to find out, first of all, what annual charge there is now against Canada in connection with the construction of the old terminal—that is, the tunnel terminal. It involves the payment of a fixed sum for a certain number of years by way of rental, being equivalent to interest and sinking fund on securities issued for the purpose of constructing the terminal. Of course, I am speaking now only from memory; I have not had a chance to verify the facts. The other day I attended a meeting of the railway committee and I may observe that I can find no record of the proceedings. I thought that minutes of that meeting were being taken, but so far as I can find out, there was no shorthand report of it. Is that correct?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know of any, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Two or three observations were then made which in my judgment should be carefully considered. One was that at the end of ten years the property would pay 6 per cent on investments. Some of the members of the committee thought that meant the whole terminal investment; obviously all that was meant was as respects the passenger station. I spoke to one of the directors of the system afterwards and he told me that this interpretation which I placed upon the matter was correct. There are no buildings contemplated by this bill apart from terminal buildings as such, and any buildings which would yield revenue, such as comes from the New York Central properties like the Biltmore hotel, for example, would have to be provided for by private capital or from the resources of the public. Whit respect to this matter I should like to have some more definite idea. I listened also to the estimates that were given as to cost of construction, but they were so vague and general that I decided to ask the minister—not being a member of the committee I could not discuss the matter there—whether he would be able to give us a more detailed idea of just what was involved.

Lastly, it apparently is contemplated that we should continue the Bonaventure station. A high level construction from that station would carry the rails into St. Henri to connect with the inner belt line, if I may use that term; because the system contemplates two belt lines, an outer and an inner, which of course is something in the nature of the scheme that now prevails in England with respect to the Metropolitan—an inner and an outer belt line. At one time the old Bonaventure street station was to be abandoned; that is how I understood the plans, as I could gather them.

Mr. DUNNING: It still is, as a station.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is not being abandoned, in this sense, that it is now being utilized under the new scheme, and there will be an enormous expenditure in connection with carrying the rails at high level from that station through St. Henri. That was the impression I formed, listening the other day to the explanation. Is it correct?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is under some misapprehension which I shall clear up.

Mr. BENNETT: At any rate that was what I gathered. I gathered further that this was because of the recommendations made by Mr. Palmer. My understanding was that the first plans prepared by the Canadian National engineers did not contemplate that, but that the recommendations of Mr. Palmer contemplated the connecting up of the tunnel lines with the Bonaventure street station, by means of high level rails from Bonaventure to St. Henri, thereby making that a circle of the inner belt line—the inner circle, as they call it in England. I could not hear very well all that was said, but that was what I gathered would be the effect of the proposal. I could hear the answers given to some questions asked by the hon. member for St. Henri (Mr. Mercier), but I could not catch the questions themselves. Perhaps the minister would give us some information in this regard.

Some observations were made also with respect to other reports which, I understood, had been made by engineers employed by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I suggest that these reports be made available to hon. members who may wish to consult them. I could not gather what the names of the engineers were, but I thought one was Smith. I made inquiries of one of the Canadian Pacific Railway representatives and he informed me that such a report had been made, but I have not seen it, and I fancy that possibly the minister will let us have access to it.

I wish to be frank with the minister. Apparently the state of public opinion in this country is pretty much what it was prior to 1914; we are willing to spend money regardless of where it comes from or where it may lead us to. Twenty-one years ago this fall I ventured to express rather a strong opinion with respect to railway expenditures in Canada, and I am bound to say that I received little support at that time; but ten years later everyone said I had been right. Now I am not suggesting that I am right in this instance inasmuch as I have not arrived at any definite conclusion, but I do desire to point out to the committee—at least I shall do so on the third reading of the bill—where I think this leads to, and how serious it is that we should involve ourselves in the expenditure of such enormous amounts without having before us more detailed information as to the causes that necessitate these expenditures. As I have said, I speak now only what occurs to me at the moment, but both the province of Saskatchewan and the province of Alberta were called upon, under guarantee in connection with the old roads, to pay money, and the guarantees in those cases amounted to only $13,000 a mile.

Mr. DUNNING: Fifteen thousand.

Mr. BENNETT: Fifteen thousand in Saskatchewan and thirteen thousand on some lines in Alberta. And when it is recalled that the interest rate was low, that money was cheap, and that they did not earn that much money, it becomes of considerable importance that we regard this not as an isolated transaction but in relation to the whole problem; for I am firmly of the opinion that terminals must be provided in Montreal. It is discreditable to the Dominion that the great system of railways which it owns should not have better terminals than it has now in Montreal; they are hardly worthy of the name terminals at Montreal.

Mr. DUNNING: They are not, in fact.

Mr. BENNETT: No. I have frequently urged on the powers that be the necessity of providing something better in this regard, but I must say that never in the wildest flights of imagination did I contemplate a sum of money so vast as that provided in this bill; nor did I think it possible that we should ever reach the stage where parliament would be willing to commit itself to so vast an expenditure without at least a few more safeguards. It was with these considerations in mind that I desired to look into the situation more fully than I have done. I am speaking, again, from memory—and my memory may not serve me correctly, because as one gets older ones memory does not—but I recall distinctly the circumstances in connection with that first terminal bill, and the expenditures made under it, and I think it might assist me in arriving at conclusions, if the minister has other reports of the engineers, to be able to read those reports during the evening. In the meantime, we could go on with other sections of the bill. If the facts are as I think, I have a suggestion to make with regard to an amendment which might be made to this bill.

Mr. DUNNING: In connection with the tunnel?

Mr. BENNETT: No, in connection with the expenditure. That is predicated entirely upon my being able to satisfy myself about certain facts, because anxious as I am that there should be a terminal at Montreal that will adequately meet every demand which may be made by traffic both for the present and for the future as far as we can reasonably foresee, I am still more anxious that we should not bring about a condition such as followed the vast expenditures of what were really public moneys in this country, the guaranteed securities under the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Pacific railway schemes. If the minister has not these reports I may be able to obtain them from other sources, although I have not sought to do so, in order to ascertain just what has been said about these terminals.

Mr. DUNNING: Let me say at once that in a matter of such importance and such magnitude as that dealt with by the present bill, I certainly do not want to rush matters and I will undertake to leave the bill in committee until such information as may be desired by any member can be secured. As my hon. friend has said, the proceedings before the railway committee, while they provided a wealth of material, could only deal with specific questions arising in the minds of individuals, if those questions were asked. I am only sorry that he did not avail himself of the privilege which was accorded several other members of this house, who were not members of the committee, but who did ask several questions.

Mr. BENNETT: The room was crowded; delegations were present from Montreal, and I did not desire to do so.

Mr. DUNNING: I can quite understand that attitude. Now, with regard to the magnitude of this proposal, we must bear in mind the present situation in Montreal as far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned. I think it can be said that we are starting to deal with the problem in Montreal from a much more difficult standpoint than existed in Toronto; we are under very considerably greater handicaps in trying to develop adequate terminal facilities in Montreal than was the case when the start was made in Toronto, and I think hon. members from Toronto will agree that to say the least the situation there was bad enough. In that connection I might point out that the total estimated aggregate expenditure at Toronto by all parties, is $33,000,000; that is the complete layout, including the expenditure by all companies, but that only deals with the waterfront and does not include the expenditure by the railway companies individually outside that area. These terminal schemes do cost a lot of money.

Mr. GEARY: Of course, that expenditure was largely occasioned by the separation of grades.

Mr. DUNNING: That is also the case in this connection.

Mr. GEARY: But not to the same extent.

Mr. DUNNING: If my memory serves me, we are eliminating over 100 grade crossings by this terminal scheme in Montreal. However, be that as it may, it must be remembered that in Montreal we now have three separate passenger terminals and three separate freight yards, and you cannot get from one to the other by rail except by going around about one hundred miles. The importance of improvement immediately strikes one when these facts are brought out.

Mr. BENNETT: Is not that statement just a little strong, with regard to the three separate terminals?

Mr. DUNNING: Out to Joliette.

Mr. BENNETT: You said you must travel over one hundred miles to get from one station to another.

Mr. DUNNING: In order to deliver anything from the Moreau street station to the Turcotte station or the Bonaventure station requires a journey of over one hundred miles at present; that is, out to Joliette. That is the instance I had in mind. It would be a little shorter to get to the tunnel station, but of course at present there is no freight yard at the tunnel.

With respect to the matter of grade separation west of Bonaventure station, apparently my hon. friend was under the impression that if provision were not made for an inner and outer belt line, that grade separation might not be needed. In that regard I want to assure him that of all the alternative plans which have been developed, none has been brought forward which does not involve the continuous use of the Bonaventure terminal as a freight terminal, and for many years past the great burden of the complaint in Montreal has been the number of grade crossings west of Bonaventure. Grade separation being necessary in any event to accommodate the freight terminal, as I understand it, the suggestion was made that we might use one or two of the tracks coming in over the separated grade in order to develop suburban inner and outer circles which would serve the large outlying suburban sections of Montreal. Comparatively little extra expense would be involved; the utilization of the existing tracks coming into the freight yards is all that is necessary to accomplish it and give a connection from Bonaventure to the tunnel station. As I understand Mr. Palmer's report, he did not recommend that connection; I am relying on memory at the moment in making that statement, but he did recommend an inner and outer belt line system nearer the river than via Bonaventure. That is to say, under Mr. Palmer's scheme as I recall it, the inner belt suburban line would follow up the harbour tracks from the tunnel station to the harbour, then turn west through the yards and up on the south side of the Bonaventure tracks, joining them in the neighbourhood of St. Henri.

Mr. BENNETT: A very large expenditure was intended to connect the tunnel station with the harbour and with Bonaventure.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and in that connection I might point out that the original tunnel scheme of the Canadian Northern contemplated such connection from the tunnel station to the harbour tracks; in fact the Canadian Northern did acquire quite a bit of property for right of way down there, which the Canadian National inherited.

Now, with respect to the obligations of the country in regard to the tunnel station, I will gladly get for my hon. friend such information as we have with regard to the present standing of that obligation, but I am sure that any existing obligation is now a part of the general Canadian National obligation in that connection.

Mr. BENNETT: This is covered by a special statute. I could send out and get it, but since the meeting of the committee I have not had an opportunity to do so. My hon. friend will remember that we passed a statute validating an agreement made between the tunnel company of the Canadian Northern and the railway by which, if my memory serves me right, the rental to be paid by the Canadian Northern represented the interest on the terminal securities plus provision for a sinking fund. I thought perhaps the minister would have the information before him, but I can send for it.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry I have not it here, but I will be glad to get it and see what bearing it has on the situation, if any.

Mr. BENNETT: It means a fixed charge on terminal facilities.

Mr. DUNNING: In any case that still exists and is part of the Canadian National obligation, and whatever we do in Montreal I am afraid it would not affect the monetary situation with respect to that obligation. However, I will be glad to look into that matter and leave the bill in committee in order that we may have an opportunity to examine all phases of the question.

With regard to the engineering inquiry which has been going on for years, I can only say that certainly the government has not pressed this matter unduly. The position of the minister throughout my experience, and I believe former ministers had the same view, has been that, with regard to a project of this magnitude, every possible investigation should be made before deciding on a course of action. It is only because the situation has now reached the stage of acuteness which, to my mind, forbids any further postponement, that the government determined to bring the matter forward this year. In connection with great engineering enterprises the minister is naturally a layman and must rely upon a commonsense examination by himself and his officers of the reports of the experts and engineers who have made years of study of the problem involved.

Mr. McGIBBON: How about the policy?

Mr. DUNNING: The minister and the government must take the responsibility, and do take the responsibility with regard to policy. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was not making any complaint about the policy; he was questioning rather whether we could not at this time solve the problem with a smaller expenditure.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. DUNNING: In the matter of policy, I think he will agree with me that the Canadian National system must have adequate terminal facilities in the city of Montreal.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree with that view.

Mr. DUNNING: The Canadian National has not only inadequate terminals in Montreal at the present time, but they are well-night impossible from the point of view of the handling of traffic. During my personal study of this matter one thing struck me with much force in connection with the experience of great cities in their dealing with terminal problems; I found that that in no single case had the plan been sufficiently broad and sufficiently large. It developed time after time in American cities that the most generous plan, apparently extravagant plan, proved to be inadequate by the time it was carried out, due to the growth of traffic in great terminals. Within the last few months I was told by an officer of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company that the new Pennsylvania terminal in the city of New York, upon which over $100,000,000 was expended, was too small the day it was finished and that further expenditures had to be made because of factors which could not possibly be taken into account at the time the terminal was devised. It has been found necessary to make changes in connection with the Toronto terminal, but in that connection there would be the factor of the lengthened number of years which have intervened since the work was commenced.

Mr. BENNETT: There was dead interest for nearly ten years.

Mr. DUNNING: But in addition to that, a greater expenditure has been found necessary than was originally contemplated would have to be made. Montreal is not only a great city to-day, but it is apparently destined to be very much greater than it is at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: Ten per cent of all the people of Canada live on the island.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a very large population there. I will say quite frankly that I have been looking for criticisms based upon the inadequacy of this scheme and a criticism based upon the engineers' failure to envisage a Montreal sufficiently large. With regard to the reports made to the other railway company, I am not in position to speak. The Canadian Pacific management have supplied me with copies of the reports submitted to them. This was a matter of courtesy and I appreciate it very much and the study of those plans has been very useful to me. I will be very glad to let my hon. friend see what I have in that connection.

Mr. BENNETT: I will be greatly obliged.

Mr. DUNNING: It will be understood that just as the Canadian National approached this matter from the point of view of the interests of the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific approaches it from the point of view of the best interests of the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. BENNETT: I approached the matter from the standpoint of one who has to do with both, and whether or not there could be a joint terminal. Toronto has a joint terminal which provides for the old Grand Trunk, the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Pacific and the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo railways.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member will appreciate that there is nothing in the scheme now being propounded by the Canadian National which would prevent it being used for a union terminal should the parties agree upon that scheme at any time in the future. I do not think I will be giving away any secrets when I say that the Canadian Pacific very naturally think that the Windsor street station would provide more suitable union terminal facilities than the tunnel station of the Canadian National; the Canadian National believe that the tunnel station would make a more suitable union station than the Windsor street station. I cannot pretend that there is any agreement between the two companies on that point, but the railway companies are agreeing with respect to other points having to do with the broader matter of terminal facilities such as economies and joint facilities at various places in and around the city of Montreal; a degree of cooperation which I am satisfied will increase as time passes. There still remains that broad difference between them; both are agreeable to union station facilities but both believe that the best facilities are provided by the stations which they own at the present time. The Canadian Pacific would be quite willing to negotiate for union terminal facilties at the Windsor street station.

Mr. MATTHEWS: How much money would that take?

Mr. DUNNING: The Canadian National would be willing to negotiate for union terminal facilities at the tunnel station; each railway company is convinced that the scheme which they suggest would make for the best interests of their particular railway system.

Mr. MATTHEWS: If the Canadian Pacific view were adopted what would be the saving in expenditure?

Mr. DUNNING: That question did not arise because the Canadian National were able to demonstrate to me that such a terminal would not be adequate or satisfactory for their purposes.

Mr. MATTHEWS: The Canadian Pacific would have such a scheme in contemplation before they would make a suggestion of that character?

Mr. DUNNING: I am not aware that any concrete suggestion was made.

Mr. MATTHEWS: You say that they hold that view.

Mr. DUNNING: It was rather a matter of conference between the parties at my request in order that it might be determined whether or not the best interests of the city of Montreal and the best interests of both railway systems would be better served by a union terminal. There has been a good deal of argument as to whether or not union terminal facilities would be better for the city of Montreal, and I have no doubt that both railway companies went thoroughly into the matter, but, as I say, neither one is agreed as to the economic practicability from their point of view of going into the other's union terminal.

Mr. McGIBBON: In view of the statement made by the Minister of Railways, should not the government obtain the assistance of competent authorities in order that that question may be decided before such a huge expenditure is made?

Mr. DUNNING: Because of the great importance of the issues involved, the government made arrangements to secure the services of Mr. Palmer. The government wanted the problem to be considered in an unbiased way, taking into account the viewpoints of both railway companies and the viewpoint of the people to be served. Mr. Palmer's report has been published and every member of the house has been supplied with a copy. I would point out to the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) that if the government were of the opinion that the tunnel station should be used as a union terminal by both railways. there is no power by which the minister or the government could enforce that view with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am very doubtful whether it would be wise to place such power in the hands of any minister or any government. The Canadian Pacific is spending its shareholders' money and must be allowed a reasonable latitude to decide for itself what is best in connection with a matter of that kind.

As to the other point, why should we not compel the Canadian National to go into the Canadian Pacific terminal—

Mr. McGIBBON: I did not ask that.

Mr. DUNNING: No, but I am looking at the question from both sides. My hon. friend asked why the minister did not insist upon a union terminal.

Mr. McGIBBON: No; I asked why the government did not investigate the matter on behalf of the people of Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: My reply to that is that the government did investigate. There is no doubt parliament could, if it so desired, force the Canadian National into the Canadian Pacific terminal or into a Canadian Pacific union terminal, but in that regard I doubt very much the wisdom of the government or of parliament overriding the unanimous opinion or judgment, based upon years of study, of the responsible officers of the Canadian National railway system. In other words, I take, in a matter of this kind, the same view of the position of one railway as I do of that of the other. It is very difficult for those of us who are not technical railroad experts to do other than to ensure that the fullest and most independent inquiry possible has been made and then to take the advice of the responsible officers of the railway system in regard to the solution of the problem.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did I understand the minister to say that he had outside opinion and advice in regard to the Canadian Pacific matter?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, Mr. Palmer's report which has been printed and distributed amongst the members.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Mr. Palmer's report is the one to which the minister refers?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. As to the other reports secured by the Canadian Pacific, I am quite sure if I do not have them, I can get them.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Palmer's report is the only one the government secured?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, from outside sources.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I mean.

Mr. DUNNING: I may say that the business of securing reports from outside authorities is rather difficult when we have in Canada just two great railway corporations. It is hard to get within Canada eminent opinion which is not associated with one or other of the two great systems.

Mr. BENNETT: It cannot be done.

Mr. DUNNING: It is also difficult to secure that advice from the United States for reasons that will occur to my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: It occurred to me, while I was listening to the minister, that it is possible to get expert opinion from the United States. I recall the following terminals: the St. Louis terminal, the Washington terminal. There are certainly three great railway terminals in Chicago, and there is the St. Paul terminal through which every train that goes in or out of St. Paul passes. I think there is a train in and out of that terminal every four minutes of every day in the year.

Mr. MATTHEWS: There is a new terminal in Cleveland.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And a new one in Buffalo.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS: I wonder if the minister would give some explanation of section 2 and its relation to section 7, for the two sections are very closely related, having in mind at the moment simply the power of the Board of Railway Commissioners. Section 7, to which I must go to interpret what I am going to say in regard to section 2, provides for two powers that shall exercise the right of approval of plans. It reads:

The general plan or plans of the said works and amendments or additions to such general plan at any time made, shall, on the recommendation of the Minister of Railways and Canals, be subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Then next:

Detail plans affecting any canal or other property controlled by the Department of Railways and Canals shall be subject to the approval of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Then come these words:

Detail plans of crossings of railways and crossings by the railway of streets or highways shall be subject to the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

And lastly:

Detail plans affecting the property of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal shall be subject to the approval of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

I am for the moment concerned only as to the power of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I have not under my hand the section of the Railway Act, but the minister may be able to direct me to it. I understand that under the general act the board now has power not only with regard to approving plans of crossings of railway on streets and other railways, but has power also over station locations. That is exempted by the phraseology of this bill. For instance, in section 2 we are giving power to construct terminal stations, local stations, station grounds, yards, and so forth, and all these plans are subject to the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners, including highway crossings. I would ask, in the second place, if it is clear in this bill, and if so where, that the Board of Railway Commissioners have the power to pass upon a division of cost where the question of grade construction arises.

Mr. DUNNING: First let me send to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition the report made to the Canadian Pacific Railway by C. E. Smith and Company, consulting engineers, St. Louis. It is a report on level crossings construction and railway passenger terminals in the city of Montreal, made in the month of March, 1928. My hon. friend also spoke of some other report.

Mr. BENNETT: I was only speaking of what I saw in the paper.

Mr. DUNNING: I believe there is another report, and we will look that up if my hon. friend desires it.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand that the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway was submitted and filed with the Board of Railway Commissioners. Is this the particular report so submitted?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot say whether this particular report was submitted to the board. I cannot think of any reason why it should be, but it is available.

With reference to the questions raised by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre, they really relate to section 7 rather than to section 2, as he indicated. We must bear in mind in considering bills of this character that we are acting in two capacities. We are acting as the shareholders of an enterprise, authorizing capital expenditure by that enterprise.

Mr. CAHAN: Who are the shareholders?

Mr. DUNNING: We represent them.

Mr. CAHAN: I think we represent a very large body of electors, but not necessarily are we the representatives of the shareholders.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I can only answer my hon. friend's interjection in a negative way. If we do not represent the shareholders, they have no representation. We are the only body under the law which can occupy the position of the shareholders of an ordinary company in relation to this particular company. We are the only body which can authorize capital expenditures which in the case of an ordinary company would be authorized by the shareholders.

Mr. CAHAN: That is better.

Mr. DUNNING: We are acting in that capacity, and of course we not only have responsibility for this enterprise but must consider also the general transportation interests of the Dominion in enacting legislation.

Section 7 in no particular departs from the practice with respect to the Canadian National enterprise generally in so far as control by the Board of Railway Commissioners is concerned. Under the general legislation creating the Canadian National Railways, the company at the present time does not go to the board for approval of their route maps, but it goes instead to the Minister of Railways. That has been the position since the company was created and is a part of its fundamental legislation.

Mr. STEVENS: Except in so far as the location of stations is concerned.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no exception even in that regard. In that connection may I point out that the place where the Canadian National purposes putting a station in Montreal is already the site of a railway station? They are not proposing to build a station where none now exists, but a larger station on the site of an existing station. For that reason it was not deemed necessary to set out that the Board of Railway Commissioners should pass on the station location. The whole matter was given very considerable thought both by the legal staff of the Canadian National and by the departmental legal staff, and the reason for section 7 being in its present form is, first, to safeguard this institution, parliament, as representing the shareholders in the matter of controlling the management in the expenditure of a large sum of money; second, to have the same provision with respect to the crossing of canals as would exist in connection with any similar legislation affecting any other railway; third, the same provision respecting the powers of the Board of Railway Commissioners as exists with respect to any other Canadian National enterprise; and fourth, to deal with the harbour commissioners in the only way in which the harbour commissioners can be dealt with so far as ministerial approval is concerned. That is the only answer I think I can give.

Mr. GEARY: I am afraid I shall have to differ a little with the Minister of Railways. As far as I can see it, this section 7 introduces something entirely new in regard to one of the matters covered by it, and that is in regard to the separation of grades, the crossing under or over a highway or a railway. True it is that in 1919 when the act was passed it contained a provision, section 23, which exempted, in effect, the Canadian National Railways from the provisions in regard to the location of stations, for instance. That section says:

> With the approval of the governor in council and upon any location sanctioned by the Minister of Railways and Canals, the company may from time to time construct and operate railway lines, branches and extensions, or railway facilities or properties of any description—

So that probably the minister is justified in the statement that so far as location of structure or facilities, such as a station, is concerned, the Board of Railway Commissioners may be said to have been left out to some extent.

[Mr. Dunning.]

I do not know the reason for putting it in; possibly it was because the Canadian National Railways was a publicly owned enterprise, but the section was put in the act. Section 13 says:

> All the provisions of the Railway Act (excepting those provisions which are inconsistent with this act, and excepting also the provisions of the Railway Act relating to the location of lines of railway—

Mr. DUNNING: That is the only exception.

Mr. GEARY: That is the point to which the minister was referring, that you were not, as a privately owned railway, required to submit your location, or right of way, plan. The right was given to the governor in council to determine or approve the location but that does not apply to railway and highway crossing plans.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite right.

Mr. GEARY: The governor in council may not approve under the act. The practice of the railway board is to hear the application and distribute the costs in regard to separation of grades, amongst the parties interested or affected. It may be a municipality or a street railway. That provision, Mr. Chairman, still applies to the Canadian National Railways. Under this section 7 no question of location of subway, or of under crossing or over crossing, or of the distribution of costs of such works is referred to the Board of Railway Commissioners; it is only the detailed plans of the crossing that shall be subject to the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I think the bill goes too far in that respect. I think it may be very soundly argued that when you come to a highway crossing determined upon by the railway, or by the railway in conjunction with the municipality, the Board of Railway Commissioners are concerned not with who shall bear the cost of it but simply and solely with the detailed plan. I think that is a change in the practice which should be considered very carefully. To begin with, as I understood and read the plans, and noted the models in the railway committee room they provide for certain level crossings and certain streets to be closed, and that without, nominally at all events, the approval or consent of the city of Montreal; it may be that the parties have got together and have said those are the ones we shall apply for. It seems to me that questions respecting the closing of streets and the diversion of traffic come solely within the powers of the Board of Railway Commissioners and that any plan touching the separation of grades that we approve here at the moment should not be final. Each case should be taken up separately before the Board of Railway Commissioners, or all of them, so that the general plans may be left out, and the railway commisioners in approving satisfactory locations, must determine who is to bear the cost. If you go to the board, as is the usual practice, and have the costs distributed between the parties interested or affected, and if either party is dissatisfied there is an appeal to the governor in council; but the governor in council will not as a rule, unless there is some principle involved, upset the judgment of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

You are reversing the procedure; you are saying the governor in council shall determine all these matters, but that the governor in council, may of course, refer them to the Board of Railway Commissioners. However, "may" does not mean that you are necessarily bound to refer to them. Under the language of the section I think you have taken from the Board of Railway Commissioners a function which from the beginning has been exercised in regard to the Canadian National Railways and which should be exercised in connection with this great work in the city of Montreal.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, it would probably facilitate matters if we dealt with the sections when we came to them, but I should like to answer my hon. friend now, and to say that generally I agree with him in his contention as to what should be the function of the Board of Railway Commissioners with respect to grade crossings in a scheme like this. The only difficulty I have is as to the legal interpretation of what has been put in this bill. The point was raised, I think by my hon. friend himself in the railway committee, and as a consequence of his having been kind enough to raise it there I have, of course, taken it up very thoroughly with the law officers in order to discover whether this bill does what my hon. friend fears in that regard. The answer that is given to me is this, that with respect to all the general powers of the Board of Railway Commissioners in relation to legal crossings and grade separations, as contained in the Railway Act, this bill does not interfere but that section 7 deals with the approval of plans. It must be remembered that this whole bill is an enabling bill. Section 2 ends with the words: —and a short description whereof for the information of parliament but not intended to be exhaustive, being set out in the schedule hereto.

Section 7 is intended to provide the machinery whereby the actual details of the general plan set out in the schedule shall be approved. The Board of Railway Commissioners, according to my legal advice, will have just the same powers with respect to the level crossings and grade separations contemplated under this scheme as they have with respect to the same matters in connection with any other railway project anywhere in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not provided in the Bill.

Mr. GEARY: With the greatest respect, I differ with the law officers who have advised my hon. friend. By implication at least this excludes the very matters which the Board of Railway Commissioners would ordinarily deal with. I think there is an implication there, and a strong one. It is suggested to me that that is the intention of the Canadian National Railways—I am not speaking as though it were any wicked intention—but that it is the intention of the company under the bill to have an arrangement with the city of Montreal as to whether each one of these streets shall be separated as to grades and how the cost is to be borne between the railway company and the city.

Mr. DUNNING: It is the intention of the railway company and the government to have the grade separation matter dealt with in exactly the same way as any other grade separation is dealt with by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. GEARY: Of course, my hon. friend's assurance carries with it, so far as I am concerned, the conviction that that is what will be done. But I think he should put it within the four corners of the act so clearly that there would be no mistake, and I do suggest, with all possible respect to those who have advised him, that perhaps they may not all have looked at the matter from the point of view from which I venture now to present it to the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: The matter is so important that I shall certainly not take the bill out of committee without affording an opportunity for further consideration of that point. Frankly, however, I wish it had been pressed a little further in the railway committee, for the reason that the vice president, in charge of legal affairs of the Canadian National, was there and answered that very point—and answered it substantially in the language which I have used to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: Not so emphatically.

Mr. DUNNING: I expect to get straightforward advice from the legal officers and I believe I do get it; and my advice is that the bill carries out the intention of the railway as well as of the minister. However, I intend, in view of my hon. friend's representations, to make doubly sure of that.

Mr. GEARY: You have one hundred grade crossings separated.

Mr. DUNNING: Eighty-one. When we come to section 7 I shall be prepared to let it stand if that is deemed necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: In support of the contention made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens)) and the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) may I direct attention to these words in section 2:

> The governor in council may provide for the construction and completion by the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called "the company") of—

Then the terminals are described.

> —for any purpose. . . . and improvements, works, plant, apparatus and appliances for the movement, handling or convenient accommodation of every kind of traffic, also street and highway diversions and widenings, new streets and highways, subway and overhead streets, and also approaches, lanes, alleyways, and other means of passage.

Then follows the description. Now that section as it stands excludes the power of any authority in the world other than the governor in council—absolutely. I think my hon. friend will agree with that; because after all in the construing of a legal document the first principle is that it must be read in its ordinary, commonplace, everyday significance. And that is clear from section 2. At this point I would put this to the minister: I wonder if he thinks it is sound to provide that the governor in council should have control of this whole expenditure. The very opening words of that section are at variance with every principle under which we have heretofore conducted our business. When we vote money for branch lines we authorize the construction of a branch line by the railway company, we guarantee the securities, and they spend the money. Now this leaves it with the governor in council, and in the course of the little consideration I have been able to give to the matter one thought has been in my mind. I will mention it now to the minister. Should we not add to the statute a provision that this act shall come into force on proclamation after approval has been secured from the Board of Railway Commissioners with respect to general plans and matters of that sort? In other words, I think the minister actually desires to lift this matter out of the realm of politics. But the governor in council is a political body, as the minister will agree, being composed of the government and the government only. Before this vast expenditure is undertaken should there not be, therefore, some body not the government that will approve of the scheme for the government? For, notwithstanding the general observation that has been made, the only representation which the shareholders have here is the representation provided by this parliament; there can be no dealing with the affairs of the railway, from the standpoint of the shareholders, except it be by this parliament; and for the purpose of the statute parliament becomes the governor in council. That is what I had in mind when speaking this morning. There are involved in this matter a large number of questions arising out of that principle, and the first question that presents itself is this: What is the relation of the Board of Railway Commissioners to this enterprise? I want to assure the minister that the vice president in charge of legal matters connected with the Canadian National Railways does not believe much in having the railway commission interfere in any way with what he or his officials wish to do. I think my hon. friend will recall an answer he gave, the sense of which was, "We do not use the railway commission."

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is not saying that I said that?

Mr. BENNETT: No, but the officer to whom I am referring. And he did not make that statement in any offensive sense; he was simply contending that under the provisions of the statute of 1919 it was not necessary for him to consult the commission as though the railway had been the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Northern. Which is perfectly true. The statute of 1919 gives exceptional rights and privileges to this railway as distinguished from privately owned enterprises. That is abundantly clear. The hon. member for South Toronto has made so clear the position with respect to crossings that I will not say more than this—and the minister will agree with me; I am merely amplifying what was said by my learned and hon. friend from South Toronto: If this matter rests in the first instance with the governor in council, and that political authority alone is to determine what contribution shall be made by the railway and by the municipality, then of course we are creating a situation which will be fraught with grave difficulty.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend think that the minister would want to be in that position? Surely not.

Mr. BENNETT: I am endeavouring to suggest to the minister a method by which he will be certain he will not be in that position; that is the whole purpose of my rising. As it stands, this would be an exception to any other city similarly situated. For instance, Toronto was compelled in connection with its grade separations to pay one third, the Canadian Pacific one-third and the other party one-third. So I am informed by my hon. friend from South Toronto, who was interested on behalf of the corporation. Now we come to a very large number of grade separations here. The deputy minister estimates the number at eighty, but judging from what the president said the other day, that number may be greatly exceeded.

Mr. DUNNING: Ultimately, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; and under these circumstances I can only urge upon the minister the desirability of providing in this measure beyond peradventure that the matter of grade separations shall be dealt with by the Board of Railway Commissioners so far as respects the adjusting of contributions to be made by the railway and the municipality. To do otherwise is to make an invidious distinction; to do otherwise is to discriminate in favour of this railway as against others and in favour of this city as against other municipalities not so fortunately situated. In other words, it is my desire that this legislation should make it clear that the matter is not in any sense to be adjusted by a political authority but by that authority which has been set up by law and which was at one time a much more important body in public esteem than it now is. Certainly, as section 2 reads, with the succeeding sections, the Board of Railway Commissioners will have no more authority to deal with this matter than some other body not named at all. The language is not adequate, and after listening to the addresses the other day I certainly came away with the clear impression that it was not the intention of the management of the railway system that the Board of Railway Commissioners should have anything to do with the matter except in so far as is mentioned in section 7. This is all I have to say in connection with this important matter, apart from what I desire to allude to in connection with the terminals. I had occasion during the recess to look up the statutes since 1914 and I find that there was involved the payment of about $600,000 as an initial instalment. What I was endeavouring to find out was what the payments now were.

Mr. DUNNINIG: With respect to the earlier portion of my hon. friend's remarks I can only repeat what I have previously said: It never was my intention, and I am assured it never was the intention of the railway, that grade separations in the Montreal scheme should be dealt with any way different from that in which grade separations elsewhere are dealt with. I have already said I will be glad to allow section 7 or any other relevant section to stand in order to again take up that matter with the legal officers. Really the dispute which has arisen is not a dispute between my hon. friends opposite and myself; I agree entirely that the intention which has been expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite should be embodied in the law. The quarrel is rather between lawyers, as to whether or not the bill, considered in conjunction with the railway act, does now create that condition. I can just give my hon. friends the assurance that the relevant sections will be held up until I have a further opportunity to take legal advice on the matter. I am quite clear as to the intention both of myself and of the officers of the company, but will consider the matter further. Now, with regard to the other question regarding the bonds issued with respect to the Canadian Northern Railway Company, I find that a statute was passed on June 12, 1914, but that only a small amount of the bonds in question ever were issued. The principal outstanding at present is shown at page 29 of this year's annual report of the Canadian National Railway system, and amounts to only $1,501,000. Apparently it proved difficult or impossible for the old Canadian Northern to finance in the manner contemplated by this bill, and the necessary money apparently was secured from other sources. I am now having inquiries made as to where the money did come from. My own impression is that the money used in the Canadian Northern tunnel terminal construction at Montreal came primarily from government advances subsequently made to the old Canadian Northern Railway Company.

Mr. BENNETT: This statute was passed in 1914, and during that session they got $45,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and the total amount of debentures issued and presently outstanding under this statute is $1,501,000. Obviously that is a very small portion of the expenditure which I believe was made by the old Canadian Northern, which I understand amounted to £2,500,000.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is covered by securities in some form.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I think my hon. friend, through his previous studies, is somewhat familiar with the tangle of old Canadian Northern finances. I am now having inquiries made to find out from what sources the money necessary for that expenditure was derived, but only $1,501,000 of securities were issued under that statute, and they appear in the Canadian National statement as part of the funded debt of the railway.

Mr. HEAPS: There is just one matter on which I would like a little information. I agree with what the leader of the opposition has just stated in regard to putting more power into the hands of the railway commission. With regard to this new terminal I would like to ask whether the city of Montreal, through the city council, approved of the plans as we saw them in the railway committee last Thursday.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, the city has given its approval.

Mr. HEAPS: There has been no opposition from any section of Montreal?

Mr. DUNNING: I think I can say that the only objection has come from individuals or institutions which are interested in the development of some alternative plan. For instance, there appeared before the committee a number of gentlemen promoting what was called the Montreal tunnel terminal scheme, which was an entirely different plan and a privately owned project which was finally withdrawn. I know of no organized opposition of any kind from any source in the city of Montreal. It must be remembered that this scheme was not evolved over night; a great many interests in Montreal, including different city councils from time to time and representative public bodies of all kinds, have been engaged in discussions with the Canadian National for years past with regard to this matter. Gradually difficulties have been ironed out, and I may say that as minister I told the Canadian National authorities that they would be very wise to attempt to eliminate by discussion, by reasoning and by meeting opposition, all these problems before they came to parliament at all. I must congratulate the management of the Canadian National railways on the extent to which they apparently have met the needs and the wishes of the citizens of Montreal.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Perhaps this question is not altogether relevant, but I would like to ask the minister if any arrangements have been made by the department with regard to the laying out of the yards at Fort Churchill?

Mr. DUNNING: I wish my hon. friend would deal with Fort Churchill when I get to Fort Churchill in the estimates. This bill refers entirely to Montreal, and I assure my hon. friend that my ability to keep information in my head is restricted to the matter before the house, when the matter is as large and important as this question. At the moment I am prepared for Montreal, and to be quite frank I am not prepared for Fort Churchill, but I will be glad to give that information when the estimates are up.

Mr. STEVENS: Coming back to the point we were discussing, together with other hon. members who have spoken I appreciate the frankness of the minister's statement of his understanding and intention, but I would also direct his attention to section 8 of the bill, and I would suggest that sections 7, 8 and 2 should stand. Section 8 is as follows:

> Where streets or highways are affected by the works but are not crossed by the company's tracks or diverted incidental to any such crossing, the company may with the approval of the governor in council enter into agreements, where desirable, with the city of Montreal or any other municipalities with respect thereto, or with respect to the opening of new streets, the closing of existing streets and ways, to the making of diversions or widenings, and the making of sub-streets, subways or overhead facilities in connection with the said works and the apportionment of the cost thereof.

That makes it specifically a matter for agreement between the governor in council and the city of Montreal.

Mr. DUNNING: No, for agreement between the company and the city of Montreal, with the approval of the government.

Mr. STEVENS: My point is, and has been, that these are matters which should be subject to reference to the Board of Railway Commissioners, because the adjustment or apportionment of the cost thereof is peculiarly and specially a duty of that board.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely my hon. friend is mistaken. If the Canadian Pacific Railway were doing the exact thing contemplated in section 8 they would not have to go to the Board of Railway Commissioners, because no crossing of the railway by a highway or of a highway by a railway is involved. Section 8 is in this bill because the Railway Act does not contain authority for the Board of Railway Commissioners to deal with such matters.

Mr. STEVENS: It goes on to say:

—the making of sub-streets, subways and overhead facilities—

Mr. DUNNING: But it is all qualified by the first sentence:

Where streets or highways are affected by the works but are not crossed by the company's tracks or diverted incidental to any such crossing—

That is the whole point.

Mr. STEVENS: If it is limited in that way perhaps that section would not be affected, but sections 2 and 7 are those to which I have referred already, and I think they should stand until this point is made quite clear, and I think it should be drafted so that there can be no question about it, particularly having reference to the power of the Board of Railway Commissioners to apportion the cost, whatever that may be.

Mr. DUNNING: I am willing to let sections 2 and 7 stand, as I indicated some time ago.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George directed my attention just now to section 259 of the Railway Act as possibly the section upon which the minister and his legal advisers rely:

Notwithstanding anything in this act, or in any other act, the board may, subject to the provisions of the next following section of this act, order what portion, if any, of cost is to be borne respectively by the company, municipal or other corporation, or person in respect of any order made by the board, under any of the last three preceding sections, and such order shall be binding on and enforceable against any railway company, municipal or other corporation or person named in such order.

The difficulty is that the three preceding sections do not in their entirety refer to this enterprise by reason of the special exceptions made in connection with the Canadian National undertakings, and it is in order to prevent any possible difficulty arising hereafter in the interpretation by the courts or otherwise that we suggest the desirability of carrying into effect the very clear statement made by the minister

Mr. DUNNING: The question is purely a matter of language and I shall be glad to have it considered. I always endeavour not to get between lawyers when they are arguing about matters of language; I am quite clear as to the intention and wanted to have that intention expressed.

Section stands.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Nature and form of securities.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the standard section which appears in similar acts.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Tenders.

Mr. BENNETT: What has been the practice of the company in connection with matters of this kind?

Mr. DUNNING: The practice has been just exactly as is outlined in section 5. This section is similar to the section which we endeavour to incorporate in every act providing for the sale of Canadian National securities for specific works and for the carrying out of the works themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: I wanted to know how it works out in practice; how do the tenders work out?

Mr. DUNNING: My understanding is that there is no difficulty about it. In the case of bonds, it is necessary sometimes when competitive bids are secured to do a little negotiating; my hon. friend knows what can happen in connection with tenders for bonds. With regard to competitive bids or tenders for work generally, there is no question but that the management desires to adopt in every case, except in very rare instances where it is not practicable, the principle of competitive tenders, and I have no hesitation in saying that this works out very satisfactorily.

Mr. BENNETT: The only point there is that the company would call for tenders for the securities; why not the governor in council or the Minister of Finance to whom the money will come? The company really has nothing to do with that at all, because it is the country which is raising the money. In this particular bill you will observe that you have the governor in council in one instance, the company in another and the Minister of Finance in another. Why should not the Minister of Finance be the person who calls for the sale of these securities, in view of the provisions contained in the other two sections?

Mr. GEARY: I asked a question of Sir Henry Thornton in the committee, as to why the governor in council should not, where a tender is rejected, decide on whether a contract by day labour or otherwise should be entered into. To my very great surprise I was given the answer that in three cases only had it been found necessary to depart from the lowest tender. If there have been three cases only during Sir Henry's time, it would not be very much trouble to the governor in council to take care of that matter. In some cases the work must be done by day labour and in other cases it is necessary to go to the contractors and offer the work at day labour or at a lower price than that contained in the tender; but in view of Sir Henry's answer I think the governor in council might very well take over this responsibility.

Mr. DUNNING: Frankly, I do not like imposing upon a management which has by law free control over very large matters, conditions which appear to indicate that we have not confidence in them with respect to very small matters.

Mr. GEARY: I think there is a good deal of strength in what the minister says.

Mr. DUNNING: As to the answer which Sir Henry Thornton gave to my hon. friend with respect to the small number of tenders accepted by the management which were other than the lowest tenders, I cannot speak on that matter as no report is necessary. I could call for a report, but I venture to say that Sir Henry Thornton himself would find it difficult, in view of the multitudinous matters for which tenders are called, to give an answer offhand. I feel sure that there must have been a misunderstanding between my hon. friend and Sir Henry as to the purport of the question which he was answering, because it would be unreasonable to expect that in such large undertakings, involving tens of thousands of transactions, there would be only three cases of that nature.

Mr. GEARY: At all events, we threshed it out in committee.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Proceeds of securities deposited to credit of Minister of Finance in trust for company.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It is a well known fact that bonds guaranteed by the Dominion government will not sell at as favourable a price as a direct obligation of the Dominion government. In provincial undertakings guaranteed by the province the spread is often as much as a quarter a half a point. Why could not advantage be taken of this well known situation in a matter involving such a large sum of money, where every cent will count? It is a way of saving public money.

[Mr. Geary.]

Mr. DUNNING: The public interested in the ownership of bonds of this character is steadily learning the intrinsic value of Canadian National bonds guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada, and any disparity such as my hon. friend referred to would be difficult to demonstrate in recent cases. I am familiar with the general rule to which he referred, but there are exceptions to it which occur even in the provincial field. I am not disagreeing with what the hon. member has said as to the difference in value of provincial securities and securities guaranteed by the province, but there does not appear to be the difference between Dominion guaranteed securities and direct Dominion securities. I would point out that it is well to have the Canadian National, in connection with its future financial structure, in the position of a company obligated to pay the moneys involved in making capital expenditures which relate directly to the company. In the reorganization of the capital structure which we hope to deal with at the next session of parliament, the Canadian National capital structure will have to be represented by obligations of the company in some for or other, very largely obligations to the public, and I think that as a matter of policy we should deal with these obligations as being obligations of the railway to the public rather than to the government. Our railway debt should be considered as being allocated to and expended for the railways, and should be treated as a railway obligation and not as an obligation of the country. That does not mean that I am under any delusions that any of these securities will not, in fact, be finally payable by the Dominion of Canada if the railway company itself should not pay. Of course, everyone recognizes that. Indeed, I will go further and say that so long as the Dominion of Canada owns these railways, any security issued by the railway company while it is owned by the Dominion would be the responsibility of the Dominion. We cannot escape the moral obligation involved. Putting the guarantee on the bonds places it beyond peradventure of doubt to the purchaser that the Dominion is behind the securities. There might be an element of doubt if no guarantee were given in specific terms, but in my opinion the obligation would exist so long as the railways were controlled by the Dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: May I direct the attention of the minister to section 6? This section contemplates the expenditure of money on property belonging to several companies, but these are the closing words:

Upon the property owned or taken by His Majesty, the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada.

Surely it is intended that not the Dominion of Canada but rather the railway company should own the property.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that a well drawn section?

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will look at the subsequent sections, for instance section 9 and so forth, I think they will be found to cover that.

Mr. BENNETT: I appreciate that, but it does not clarify this section. These are lands on which you may spend your money and still they are described as lands that may be owned by half a dozen companies. The section reads:

With the approval of the governor in council evidenced by the approval of plans under the provisions of section 7 of this act, upon the property owned or taken by His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada.

If the minister will refer to the very first words of section 2, this whole matter is one in which the governor in council is doing the providing. In other words, instead of this being in any sense an enterprise in which somebody else assists in giving direction, it is purely a political matter.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend cannot get away from the first few words of section 2. The whole matter of the expenditure of $50,000,000 is purely a political enterprise and so stated. Section 2 commences:

The governor in council may provide—

Mr. DUNNING: I do not like my hon. friend's use of the term "political enterprise." This has nothing to do with politics.

Mr. BENNETT: What I mean is that the governor in council is the political party in power. The governor in council means the ministers of the crown and nobody else, and to that extent it is purely political. That is what I am endeavouring to say and exactly similar words are used elsewhere. The governor in council may provide for these terminals. In other words, as an act of executive government, provision is made for this matter. Then His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion expropriates land and part of the money may be spent on these lands provided that the governor in council so approves, approval being evidenced by approval of the plans under the provisions of section 7, which reads:

The general plan or plans of the said works and amendments or additions to such general plan at any time made, shall, on the recommendation of the Minister of Railways and Canals, be subject to the approval of the governor in council.

All I am trying to suggest is that in the interest of the country and of everybody connected with this great national railway system, there should be some approval between the government and this scheme, and in the absence of any better suggestion, I think that approval should be by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. Is that an unfair suggestion to make in view of the fact that under section 2 the whole launching of the enterprise is placed in the hands of the governor in council? In other words, we are giving a blank cheque for $50,000,000 to the governor in council.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what it means. That may not be my hon. friend's intention, but all he has to do is to look at the language of the statute. The courts will determine what it means if there is any doubt about the matter. The point is that under section 2 we have conferrred this enormous power upon the governor in council. I am sure my hon. friend will agree with that. Then we provide for the expropriation of lands by the crown, and third, we provide that the money must be spent in doing work on lands or property of all those railways and terminal companies plus lands acquired by the crown. But according to section 7 the whole must be subject to the approval of the governor in council. My suggestion—and it was the only one that it struck me could be reasonably made since we have no other authority to whom we can refer the matter—is that it should be approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners. Certainly, if this were a private company, any expenditures of this kind would have to be approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. DUNNING: Not if they were building on the site of an existing station; not an addition to or an enlargement of an existing station.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not that; this is a brand new scheme, and if the Canadian Pacific or the Algoma Central—there are only a few private railways left—were to undertake this, they would have to have the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners. My hon. friend will remember the section.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish my hon. friend would read the section and then with his legal acumen tell me whether, if the Canadian Pacific desired to-day to build a terminal at the tunnel terminals in Montreal they would have to go to the railway board for approval of the site. I am not a lawyer, and I am at a great disadvantage in this discussion. I should like to get the best legal opinion possible. Would he give me a legal opinion on the question?

Mr. BENNETT: Any disadvantage the hon. gentleman may be under is more imaginary than real. Section 188 of the Railway Act reads:

> Before the company proceeds to erect any station upon its railway, the location of such station shall be approved of by the board.
> 2. Every station of the company shall be erected, operated and maintained with good and sufficient accommodation and facilities for traffic.
> 3. The company shall erect, maintain and operate stations at any points on the railway designated by the board, and shall provide such accommodation and facilities in connection therewith as the board directs.

Then there is provision for railways that are subsidized by parliament. The theory upon which the railways are required to secure approval is that the question of adequate facilities must be considered.

Mr. DUNNING: If the Canadian Pacific were proposing to build the tunnel station, my hon. friend would not say that under that section they would have to go to the railway board for approval of that site.

Mr. BENNETT: I think they would because they are not building on the site of their present station.

Mr. DUNNING: Assuming the Canadian Pacific were the company involved instead of the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific coming under all the terms of the Railway Act, would they, in my hon. friend's opinion, require to go to the railway board for approval of the tunnel site in connection with a scheme of this kind?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend has asked me his question in too narrow a sense. Would they have to go to the board to carry out this plan of extension? I have no doubt that the answer would be yes.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend from South Toronto points out that the board may tell them where the station is to be put, and has frequently done so. When there is a question as to the adequacy of their facilities they go to the board for approval of their plans for extension.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is not sticking to the section.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes. This statute —the railway act—is intended to be so simple that one who runs may read and wayfaring men though fools need not err therein. That is the reason the act was administered so informally by previous chairmen. Any person could appear before the board. I can recall very distinctly an application being made for a station by a number of residents in a place in southern Alberta and the railway company would not build them a station because it was pointed out that the revenues were less than $15,000, and an informal discussion took place. I put this to the minister, the very question that he put to me: Could the Canadian Pacific construct these works without the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners?

Mr. DUNNING: I will answer that in the light of such knowledge as I have, although I am afraid my hon. friend has not clearly answered the question which I put to him. If the Canadian Pacific railway were making a proposal of this kind they could determine themselves to go ahead with their passenger terminal assuming that they owned the existing properties. The only difference between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National under the existing law would be that the Canadian Pacific would have to go to the Board of Railway Commissioners with their route maps for any lines around the city or in connection with the general plan for new lines. The Canadian National is by its own act, passed in 1919, exempted from the necessity of so doing, and can and does secure ministerial approval instead. That is the only difference. My contention, and again I am in a legal argument, is that this is the only difference between the two companies in a project of this kind, that the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National are absolutely on all fours so far as the station locations are concerned and the jurisdiction of the Railway Act with respect thereto, and that they are on all fours with respect to other matters except the approval of route maps and detailed plans of that kind.

My hon. friend spoke in addition of the concluding words of section 6:

—and, with the approval of the governor in council evidenced by the approval of plans under the provisions of section seven of this act, upon the property owned or taken by His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada.

I am sure my hon. friend did not read that closely because the only lands owned by His Majesty the King and mentioned in section 7 are lands which are being used by His Majesty the King for canal purposes, and the concluding words of section 6 apply only to the use of any lands presently owned by His Majesty for canal purposes. In other words, they are in the same position in regard to the crossing of such property as the Canadian Pacific or any other railway and they have to get the approval of the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend cannot have read that carefully. It does not say upon the property owned or taken by His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada. It is just the opposite of what my hon. friend says. You see, it is property owned or taken by His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion, and clearly it must be for this project.

Mr. DUNNING: For this project, but perhaps my hon. friend will read the previous words:

evidenced by the approval of plans under the provisions of section 7 of this act.

Section 7 relates to detailed plans affecting any canal or other property controlled by the Department of Railways and Canals, which plans have to be subject to the approval of the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: No. The minister has left out three words of the section. It says "the general plan or plans of the said works and amendments or additions to such general plant at any time made, shall, on the recommendation of the Minister of Railways and Canals, be subject to the approval of the governor in council."

The rest of it refers particularly to canals or Indian lands and other properties. It is the first three words of section 7 that the provisions of section 6 refer to.

Mr. DUNNING: I think we are talking at cross-purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: No, my point is this, that this act provides that part of this money may be spent in putting buildings on lands owned by His Majesty the King. I say that there is no adequate provision that the land shall be land acquired or owned by His Majesty for the purpose of this railway and vested in this railway. I think that is reasonably clear.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is, of course, aware that in addition to the lands owned in Montreal by the several companies mentioned, the Canadian Northern Railway Company, the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company, the Canadian Northern Terminal Company and the Canadian National Realties, the crown owns land in Montreal in the right of the old Intercolonial railway, which is land held by His Majesty the King, but for railway purposes. The intention of the lawyers—again I do not know whether they have carried it out or not—was to provide that land which has been held in Montreal for Intercolonial railway purposes may be used by the Canadian National Railways for the purposes of this act, and that structures may be erected upon it. Again my hon. friend's criticism is one of draughtsmanship, and I shall be glad to hold the section up.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend has answered the very question I put, and exactly as I think it should be answered. There may be lands there belonging to the old Intercolonial railway and they are held in the right of the crown. They certainly should be vested in this railway company before we put our money into this scheme, having regard to the fact that we are issuing securities and guaranteeing them. That is the only reason why I question the section at all.

Mr. DUNNING: Section 9 should be read together with it.

Mr. BENNETT: But leaving these words as they stand conveys an erroneous impression.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend would like the section to stand—

Mr. BENNETT: I would like it cleared up. That is all I am interested in.

Section stands.

Section 7 stands.

On section 8—Agreements with municipalities.

Mr. STEVENS: I have looked this over very carefully and I think the draughtsmanship is bad. The first part of the section down to the word "thereto" in the 47th line of page 3, certainly is subject to the interpretation which the minister places upon it, but let me read the balance:

—or with respect to the opening of new streets, the closing of existing streets and ways, to the making of diversions or widenings, and the making of sub-streets, subways or overhead facilities in connection with the said works—

Mr. DUNNING: The "said works"—

Mr. STEVENS: Just a moment. The said works are defined in section 2 in this way:

The whole being hereinafter referred to as the "said works".

Furthermore, the Railway Act does provide for reference to the Board of Railway Commissioners for even diversions and deviations and changes, and not necessarily crossings only.

Mr. DUNNING: Wherever there is a crossing of a railway by a highway or of a highway by a railway; and the intention of section 8 is to provide for situations where no such crossing exists.

Mr. STEVENS: But this places it entirely in the hands of the governor in council, which is obviously not the intention of the minister.

Mr. GEARY: In the last line of section 8 you use the words "the said works," which the minister says refers to the first line of the section, but "said works" is defined in section 2, and unfortunately the same words are used in section 8 with a different meaning.

Mr. DUNNING: I will let that section stand.

Mr. BENNETT: The suggestions have been made only for the purposes of clarification. Where you have a section that defines the meaning that is to be given to two words, wherever those two words are used together in the act, it must be taken that they import the meaning given to them by the statute, and the words "said works" mean all the works mentioned in section 2.

Mr. DUNNING: I have got the point, and it is on the record.

Section stands.

On section 9—Expropriation.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will turn back to section 6 he will observe that it says "upon the property owned or taken by His Majesty in the right of the Dominion of Canada," and I would add "transferred by His Majesty to the company." Having taken the land this section enables you to alienate, and the alienation is to take place in the manner indicated and compensation is to be fixed in the manner stated. Unless and until that transfer takes place, the moneys to be raised under this statute should not be used except on that land. You cannot put your own money on land belonging to the crown and then create a security of the company that is to be binding against that particular property. And the closing words of section 6—

Mr. DUNNING: The securities will not be mortgage securities—

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know what kind they will be. The principle is just the same. You should not spend your money on property you do not own. I think my hon. friend will realize how great the difficulty is, and that is the reason that section 9 is there and provides in the last words:

—shall upon request be transferred by His Majesty to the company.

These words in section 6 contemplate the moneys or a portion of them being spent upon land so acquired; and if you say:

—upon the property owned or taken by His Majesty and transferred by His Majesty to the company.

—then you have the matter complete.

Mr. DUNNING: We can pass section 9, and the relationship of my friend's remarks to section 6 can be taken into account in examining the matter.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Lands for purpose of undertaking of company.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a section which I think the minister will hesitate to ask this parliament to pass.

Mr. DUNNING: I hesitated, indeed I did.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister indicate to us the reasons that were sufficient to overcome his scruples? Perhaps they may have some effect on us.

Mr. DUNNING: It is to avoid the possibility of litigation in any matter which is covered by the schedule. The schedule of the act clearly sets out what is required and what is for the purposes of the company. It is for the purpose of avoiding litigation with regard to the work which parliament by this act is authorizing in a general way that the section is put in. I do not like sections which rather appear to me to have as their object the debarring of a subject from his ordinary right of going to court to prove something which he deems to be in his interest. On the other hand there are considerations of great magnitude involved, and what might be called petty litigation should be as far as possible discouraged, especially when parliament is passing upon the project as a whole, especially when the lands have been placed under expropriation already in order that there may be sufficient room to deal with the projects outlined in the plans and models considered by the railway committee the other day.

It is on the advice of the legal officers that section 10 is included, and certainly no government would attempt to say that certain lands or undertakings were required for the purposes of the company if they were not. I do not think there is any question of arbitrary use of the power, but it is advantageous in the prevention of vexatious litigation on petty, small grounds.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure that that answer would hardly be sufficient to convince the minister as to the desirability of it. This enables a railway company to take a strip of land a thousand feet wide, if it so desires, instead of sixty or one hundred feet. It enables the railway company to take land to any extent it may desire for the purposes of the railway without limitation or restriction. The minister has indicated that he is governed very largely by the reports made by the technical advisers of the railway. They find themselves dealing with a situation in connection with which they say: "Why waste time negotiating any longer over one hundred feet? Let us take the whole area of 500 feet, and we can deal with the matter afterwards." I recall railway companies attempting to acquire larger areas than might be required for their particular undertaking, in which case the compulsory powers were at once cut down, owing to the fact that they are not allowed to acquire more than they could use for their undertaking. The minister will remember the circumstances under which railways at times have endeavoured compulsorily to take somewhat larger areas than might be required for right of way and station grounds, and the Board of Railway Commissioners has refused it and held them down exactly to what the statute says. This section confers enormous powers. I say let the minister protect himself, to get away from the political side of it, by utilizing the Board of Railway Commissioners and adding a provision to that effect. I get his point exactly. It might be a desirable thing to take the whole area rather than split it up. That is really what is behind it all. In its present form this section affords an intolerable opportunity for the exercising of pressure upon the government, and I say that in the same way I expect the minister would say it to me if I were similarly situated. It is not fair to the government; it is not fair to the minister. It seems to me it should be subject to the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners instead of the governor in council. I put this to the minister: Is it fair to the members from Montreal if someone whose land has partly been taken, says—advised by his solicitor—"There is not trouble about this; all you have to do is go to your member and get him to bring the matter to the attention of the government." As long as governments are human, as long as members and their supporters are human, whether it be the government of to-day or of some other day, it is not right or fitting that that section should stand as it is. It is not fair to the public; it is not fair to members of parliament; it is not fair to the minister himself.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend knows that no railway company in Canada is subject to such a provision as he now proposes.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend quote the section?

Mr. GEARY: I think my leader refers to section 199 of the act, which has to do with the extent of lands that may be taken, first 100 feet for right of way, then up to 500 feet for station grounds, including the width of the right of way, 100 feet. Then section 200 reads:

—should the company require, at any point on the railway more ample space than it possesses or may take under the last preceding section—

It must go to the railway board for authority to take the same for such purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: And section 201.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course my hon. friend from Toronto is familiar with some of the difficulties that arose in that city, in connection with the union terminal scheme, on account of that section he has just read. There have been very extensive difficulties, not the kind of difficulties mentioned by the leader of the opposition, but the kind of difficulty which does involve considerable hardship to the railway undertaking itself. I cannot conceive of the kind of difficulty arising to which the leader of the opposition refers. As a matter of fact, in connection with this matter all the lands necessary to carry out the scheme as propounded by the railway officers to the railway committee are now under expropriation.

Mr. BENNETT: Then that gives the complete reason why this section should go out.

Mr. DUNNING: I may tell my hon. friends opposite quite frankly the reason why I approved of putting them under expropriation—and, in fact, it is crown and not railway expropriation. The reason I approved of it was to get away from just that kind of accusation of political interference in connection with the valuation of lands and so forth. I thought that if they were placed under expropriation no question would arise in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite or anywhere else regarding this railway, in its purchases of land, being used politically by anyone.

Mr. BENNETT: The values must still be settled by the exchequer court.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely my hon. friend is not implying that the exchequer court could be politically influenced in the way he fears.

Mr. BENNETT: Sometimes the parties have been induced to withdraw and to make private settlement.

Mr. DUNNING: I suppose that in many cases private settlements are made and may be made in connection with this matter. But this matter, by virtue of a section which we shall come to later on, is continuously and consistently under the review of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true anyway; we find the money and have a right to review the matter.

Mr. DUNNING: It is true anyway, but it is true in a specific sense in relation to this enterprise with which we are dealing. I did try to put all the safeguards I possibly could around the matter—safeguards not only from the point of view of protecting the public treasury in a proper manner as well as of protecting the railway, but also, I may frankly say, from the point of view of protecting myself against insinuations from the other side of the house that this or that or the next thing could or might or would happen.

Mr. BENNETT: Why say "from the other side of the house?"

Mr. DUNNING: That is where insinuations usually come from.

Mr. BENNETT: They have not to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: With regard to myself, no.

Mr. BENNETT: What insinuations have been made now or at any other time in this session of parliament?

Mr. DUNNING: The occasion for that comment, I will tell my hon. friend frankly, was his own last remark with reference to what might be done under this section. He assumed a case where more land had been taken by the railway company than they actually required for the undertaking, and he pictured a member coming around and exercising some pressure in this way or that way. To my mind such a thing is wholly imaginary—

Mr. BENNETT: Is it?

Mr. DUNNING: —and is inclined to convey the impression that a member could come to the Minister of Railways, in the interests of a client, and get something done which was irregular and improper. I want to say that this minister of railways does not propose to do that sort of thing. I am not resentful of my hon. friend, but I am resentful rather of the idea. I do not think I ought to be treated as though I should be likely to do that sort of thing, because it would be so plainly wrong and bad, to me, for an expropriation to be filed with respect to a piece of property and then for back door influence to come along and in some way or other get it shifted out of the way for political purposes.

Mr. McGIBBON: There might be another minister of railways later.

Mr. DUNNING: I would not do it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad to hear the minister say all these things—

Mr. DUNNING: There again.

Mr. BENNETT: He says that on this side of the house we made insinuations.

Mr. BRADETTE: I listened very attentively to the hon. leader of the opposition and I feel positive that he was insinuating political interference on the part of the Minister of Railways.

Mr. BENNETT: I would give the hon. gentleman credit for having more intelligence. There was no insinuation made with respect—

Mr. BRADETTE: There was an insinuation and I have no lesson of intelligence to take from the leader of the opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad my hon. friend thinks so, because I know of no one who would be more likely to exercise it than he. No man would be more ready to press upon the minister the desirability of looking after his constituents than my hon. friend if he thought it would advance their interests—if he thought it would keep them out of courts of law. The case I took had no reference to the minister or to any particular matter. I do say, however, that I know something about the democratic system of government. I have held office under the crown for a very short time, but I have held office long enough to know that Conservatives are not vastly different from Liberals nor Liberals from Conservatives in that regard, and where—

Mr. DUNNING: Don't forget the gentlemen in the corner; they claim to be of superior clay.

Mr. BENNETT: I have seen striking evidence in my time that they too are exactly the same. I live in a province where there is a very progressive government which looks after the affairs of the country very carefully; yet members have been known to press matters on the attention of the executive with considerable force for the purpose of advancing the interests of their constituents. And I take it that this will always be so. Speaking for those about me, and in good part, I suggested to the minister that this might create an intolerable condition, and when I said that I had in mind the history of this country. There have been expropriations, and settlements have been made before the cases ever went to court; and there have been in court cases in which all the evidence that might be led by the crown has not been led. That has happened. I can show my hon. friend records of proceedings in the courts of the country which bear out this assertion. There have been cases in which the classifications have not been all that they might have been. For example, the building of the Transcontinental railway: the subsequent investigation that took place would indicate that with respect to these classifications millions were spent that should not have been spent simply because the classifications were made as they were. We know that under day's work grave scandals have arisen. A committee has been investigating a matter in which certain work under contract was farmed out by the contractor. All these are matters about which every thoughtful man interested in the welfare of the country is thinking.

Mr. DUNNING: If that was the extent of my hon. friend's remarks—

Mr. BENNETT: Did I say anything more? But the minister gets up and charges this side with making insinuations against his integrity or his probity or his ability—

Mr. DUNNING: Now my hon. friend is misunderstanding me.

Mr. BENNETT: There can be no misunderstanding of what the minister said. His language is clear, unequivocal and unambiguous with respect to that. And one of his supporters, rushing to his defence, says, "Of course, it is an insinuation against the minister." If the time has come when we cannot by illustration direct attention to the conditions that exist in the country, then all I can say is that parliament has come to a pretty pass. I wonder if the house realizes that the conditions that prevail here could not prevail for a minute in the United States with the powers of investigation which they put into operation. We know what happens in relation to contracts, and no one must think that we are all fools or children. When, therefore, we say to the minister that we desire to safeguard the public interest, it is not to be supposed that there is any ulterior object in such a statement so far as the minister himself is concerned. The minister is only a servant of the crown at the moment, and for that reason we say that it is not fair, it is not right, it is not just that the governor in council should be charged with the responsibility here contemplated; for the governor in council means the cabinet of the day, and the cabinet of the day very often means the exigencies of the politics of the day. I heard one hon. member, desiring to improve the Election Act, make the statement that he wished to do so for a certain well defined purpose and for a well defined reason. And I gave him credit for his frankness.

Now we are merely suggesting to the minister that this power should not vest in the governor in council, and I gave an illustration to support this contention. There is not a member of this house, whether he be Liberal or Conservative, who will not say that if a constituent presses him hard enough he in turn will press the matter on the government. And there have been the gravest complaints as to the extent to which such pressure has been brought to bear in the last twenty-five years, resulting in favourites getting things they would not otherwise receive; they have been favoured merely because they had the power, the strength, the influence, the determination and often the willingness to assist the government of the day or its candidates. We are not blind to these things, and it will not do for the minister to make cheap remarks with reference to insinuations against himself, when we suggest the substitution for the governor in council of the Board of Railway Commissioners, a body which was created by the Liberal party in parliament in years gone by, for the purpose of preserving some semblance of decency in the conduct of public business in relation to these matters. It is for that reason that we make the suggestion, and not with a view to making any insinuations against the minister. There is no reason why the minister should dismiss the matter with a wave of the hand and the statement. "You cannot make these suggestions about me." No one is talking about the minister; we are discussing a principle. The hon. gentleman's estimate of his own virtue may be correct; he may be the Simon Pure, the one virtuous minister the country has ever known. That well may be. But there is no reason why he should parade the fact before the public this afternoon when we are endeavouring to suggest some method whereby we may more properly safeguard the public interest.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite content that the public of Canada shall see my remarks side by side with those of my hon. friend in Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. BENNETT: So am I.

Mr. DUNNING: With that I leave the matter. Let me say this, however. There is one reason why too much reference to the Board of Railway Commissioners should not be made in a statute of this kind, and that reason is that the law's delays may be used to prevent the Canadian National getting along with something which this bill has authorized them to proceed with. My hon. friend is familiar with the extent to which the law's delays may be used to prevent an enterprise from getting along with something which has been authorized.

Mr. STEVENS: Not in this instance.

Mr. DUNNING: In this instance the law's delays have not yet had a chance to intervene to the extent to which my hon. friend referred. All the law's delays will be called into requisition should this matter be before the Board of Railway Commissioners, which is really a court to that extent, by those who are desirous of delaying or preventing this project going through. Having said that I am prepared to meet my hon. friend to the extent of allowing section 10 to stand for consideration. As I said at the outset, it was a rather arbitrary power for the Canadian National to take unto itself, and my hon. friend had no need to take offence there.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not.

Mr. DUNNING: Possibly I misunderstood his line of argument.

Mr. BENNETT: I had not a thought in the world of the minister.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry if I have misunderstood him. I do not pretend to be any more virtuous than my hon. friend pretends to be; I am just an ordinary man, as he is, but at the same time I have tried to render some public service in this country and I do not propose to take what I assume to be an attack. In view of my hon. friend's explanation probably he did not intend that attack, but I do not propose to take that kind of thing lying down from any man; it is merely a matter of self defence with me.

Mr. BENNETT: Do not make faces over it.

Mr. DUNNING: In view of my hon. friend's later remarks, I admit that he did not intend his remarks as I understood them, and I will let it go at that.

Mr. GEARY: The only trouble with the minister's attitude of self-defence is that he adopts also the principle of the Monroe doctrine, and fights everybody in self defence.

Mr. DUNNING: I frankly admit that my preference is for defence by attack.

Mr. GEARY: That is what I said.

Mr. MANION: Even when you are not attacked yourself.

Mr. STEVENS: I have very strong objection to this section because it is removed from the realm of the court. The minister referred to the railway commission as "even the railway commission," and while I admit that in recent years that body has not had the confidence of the people which it enjoyed some years ago, nevertheless it has always been my effort to sustain its authority, which during the major portion of its history has been a very excellent one. It does strike me as being exceedingly dangerous to place in the hands of the governor in council, without an appeal to the exchequer court or any other court or to the Board of Railway Commissioners, the power of deciding whether or not lands are properly being taken for railway purposes. The minister knows that the moment expropriation proceedings are filed you can proceed with the utilization of the lands for railway purposes.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend suggest that the railway could go ahead if it had notice that a hearing was pending before the Board of Railway Commissioners for a decision that the land being taken was not required for railway purposes?

Mr. STEVENS: If the Canadian Pacific was putting this scheme through they would have to go to the railway board for their expropriation.

Mr. DUNNING: I would ask my hon. friend to read the sections as the hon. leader of the opposition did.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not want to reread the sections, but section 200 reads:

Should the company require, at any point on the railway, more ample space than it possesses or may take under the last preceding section, for the convenient accommodation of the public, or for the traffic on its railway, or for protection against snowdrifts, or for the diversion of a highway, or for the substitution of one highway for another—

And then the section goes on to describe that the company shall give ten days' notice of such application, and shall furnish the board with the plans, and so forth, of what it intends to do. There is no reason in the world why the Canadian National Railways should not follow that procedure. There would be a great deal more confidence in the whole scheme and considerably more satisfaction and lack of apprehension if the railway board's jurisdiction was preserved in this matter.

Mr. RYCKMAN: As the minister has intimated that he will permit this section to stand, when the matter is next brought before us I should like to be informed as to whether or not the advice of the law officers of the crown has been received on the question whether the provision here made is intra vires of parliament. Having regard to recent cases before the privy council it seems to me that where land is required by a railway for the purposes of its operation, and the railway itself requires it, it can then be expropriated for the benefit of the railway. This point was decided in a recent case in connection with the railway running into Rouyn. If a determination of the question whether or not the land was necessary for railway purposes was left to a board, if I may so call it, such as the governor in council, and that board was given the power finally to decide, righty or wrongly, I think it would be ultra vires of this legislature as determined by privy council decisions.

Mr. DUNNING: I will be very glad to see that consideration is given to the point raised by my hon. friend. Of course before this bill came to the house it was submitted to the Department of Justice, but I will call special attention to that point.

Section stands.

Sections 11 and 12 agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. GEARY: Subsections (d) and (e) of the schedule refer to grade separations, and I should like to mention the statement of Sir Henry Thornton that the whole proposal originated in the question of the separating of the existing level crossings, and that that was what urged him to press forward to some sort of completion the plans which we have before us. Grade separation itself is a very important part of this whole proposition. I might refer to one grade separation with which I am very familiar, that in the city of Toronto. This proposition will cost some $33,000,000, and I understand that the city of Toronto will pay about $10,000,000, or almost a third. Even though it is only a quarter, I think it should be so arranged that there can be no doubt that the city of Montreal will contribute its fair share of the cost of the separation of grades. A very large saving will be made if you take good care that the act provides that the allocation of the costs will be attended to.

Mr. DUNNING: I can assure my hon. friend that there was no thought in anyone's mind that any other body than the railway commission would settle the matter of the allocation of the costs of the grade separations. I should like to move the following amendments:

That subsection (d) be amended by adding after the word "separation" the following words:

by means of elevated, or depressed, or underground tracks, or streets,

That subsection (e) be amended by adding after the word "separation" the following words:

by means of elevated, or depressed, or underground tracks, or streets,

That subsection (k) be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

(k) Connections and transfer facilities to the tracks of the Montreal harbour commission near Longue Pointe, and/or at a point further east, and connections and transfer facilities to the C.P.R. east and south of the Lachine canal, and at other points, except at Forsythe (now Rouen) street. The company to pay part cost, to be determined, of facilities jointly owned or jointly used.

Amendments agreed to.

SUPPLY—IMMIGRATION POLICY

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 22, consideration of the proposed amendment of Mr. McRae:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

this house regrets the failure of the government to profit by Canadian experience in the colonization and settlement of the country and deplores the fact that men and women have, during recent months, been settled on western crown lands at great distances from transportation, educational, hospital and other necesary facilities, thereby making it almost impossible for them to achieve success and happiness in their new surroundings, and is of the opinion that such conditions can only be remedied by an immediate reorganization of the Department of Immigration and Colonization.

Mr. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): When I was speaking at eleven o'clock on Wednesday night in reference to the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke), I believe at that time I referred to the French-Canadians, Canadians from your part of Canada, Mr. Speaker, who had gone to the United States on account of lack of a national policy on the part of the government. To-day I had handed to me this telegram addressed to the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Maloney):

Boston, Mass.,
May 26, 1929.

Doctor Maloney,
Member for South Renfrew,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Read your speech carefully. Congratulations. Hope that you endeavour to obtain some government help and thousands will be ready to go west from here.

Jean Gissely.

This is a sample of how Canadians who have left this country are anxiously waiting for some policy that will enable them to return. Anything that I may say with reference to the incapacity of the Minister of Immigration is not in any way a reflection on him personally. I believe he is a man of very lovable character and of strict integrity, but throughout this country we realize that his department, so far as progress is concerned, is in a most pitiable position. We realize also that from now on we need not so much a department of immigration as a department of repatriation. Canadians are leaving this country faster than foreigners are coming in. They are leaving at a loss to themselves through head tax, and a benefit to the treasury of the United States, while the government spends almost $5,000,000 annually to bring fewer numbers into Canada from abroad to be assimilated to our conditions and customs.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is much more generous in his suggestions to the Minister of Immigration to relieve him of his responsibilities than he is in offering him direction in the matter of an immigration policy. Some time ago in the city of Ottawa the Prime Minister said that the Minister of Immigration was one of the best ministers he had, and that he was entirely satisfied with the progress of his department. In one of the press reports a few days later I noticed that the Prime Minister had invited the Minister of Immigration to accept a high and dignified post left vacant through the death of the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. This was certainly a high and glowing tribute to the honourable career of the Minister of Immigration, had he accepted it it would have been a dignified retreat from an unfinished task. I realize, however, as many others do, that the canny judgment of the Minister of Immigration, despite the lure and thrill of such a dignified honour, could still discern the difference between a resource and a liability, and therefore he is still in charge of the Department of Immigration.

Mr. FORKE: That is small potatoes—peanuts, in fact.

Mr. ROWE: I realize that the minister's administration has been pretty small potatoes.

Mr. FORKE: Go on talking about the administration. Damn it all you like.

Mr. ROWE: I realize that the minister's struggle to maintain population by means of immigration has been pretty small potatoes and peanuts, if the minister wishes to put it in that way. His struggle between details and constructive policy is certainly a small activity in a very weak administration. I will say to the minister that I wish him good luck and Godspeed to any vacancy that may be left still waiting through recent senate vacancies in his province and that may be more attractive to him. I think he will then be well remunerated for his party inconsistency and administrative incapacity.

We have in this country a big problem in the matter of immigration. The house has heard from this side a constructive proposal to deal with that problem. It is high time that we had some government leadership, some signs of activity that will mean something for the progress of Canada. Ever since this government came into power in 1921, when they were elected on a defined policy that was later on called a chart, they have been drifting from one line of policy to another as though they didn't even have a compass. Just recently in Windsor I read a newspaper report of remarks made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) speaking, I presume, as a minister of the crown on behalf of the government when he discussed the United States threats of a higher tariff. He said:

We face a serious problem with our neighbours. When the Liberal govenment is faced with a problem it has handled it and never shirked its responsibilities. It stands for Canadian interests and it will solve any problem in Canada's interest and in Canada's interest alone. We'll see to it that Canada is amply protected. We are not looking for a fight, but we certainly won't run away from it.

They are almost adopting the red-blooded attitude of the hon. member for Fort William. It seems to me we have by this party in time of peace a war policy and in time of war a peaceful policy. We hear talk about the great prosperity of Canada and its satisfactory trade conditions, but we find that our gold reserves are lower than ever before and that we have a growing adverse balance of trade. British immigration is growing less and foreign trade is increasing. Our British trade is decreasing, foreign trade is increasing and our balance of trade is decreasing all the way down the line. It is high time that the government gave to the Department of Immigration as well as to other departments a well defined policy. I do not want to charge them with instability, but they are open to a charge of theft so far as policies are concerned, when we hear a minister of a free trade government declaring that we are going to amply protect Canada, when we have the Department of Immigration administered by a man who not long ago said that he was not only a free trader, but a freer trader, an advanced Liberal in a free trade government. We should have in this department, if any change is contemplated, one of the several protectionists in the cabinet, because if there is any department that depends on a national policy of protecting labour in Canada for the Canadian people, for the development of our own resources within our own country, it should be the Department of Immigration. If the government would devise a national policy that would develop our own resources within our own country and preserve our markets for our own people, we would have a larger population, a higher standard of living and a more contented people. As long as we call for cheaper goods, we also cheapen our standard of living. When we cheapen our standard of living, it is hopeless to talk about high class immigration.

I realize that the western wing of the party opposite has had, as regards policy, a change of heart that is very noticeable. Some years ago we heard in this house how they worried about rural depopulation and they wanted more people and more wheat. To-day they want less wheat and fewer people because of congested markets due to an unbalanced production. We heard the Prime Minister say that no industry, whether agricultural or manufacturing, would be hurt by the policies of his government, and that if it was hurt, a change in our trade policy or our trade treaties would at once be made; but it is to be noted that 25,000,000 pounds of dairy butter came into Canada during the year ended the last of last month. We have had many differently defined policies, but it is high time that we had some policy that would promote the development of the country. I am heartily in accord with the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) as I believe it to be a big constructive idea for a big and growing country.

Mr. O. L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse): I believe I have criticized the prevailing immigration policy enough to have the right to call attention to one respect in which an improvement has been made. This new feature of the immigration policy of Canada consists in the vote of $1,300,000 which the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) will ask of parliament, and which is described at page 22 of the estimates as follows:

No. 55. Immigration contingencies and general expenses, including grants to immigration societies, women's hostels, provinces, and loans for stock, equipment, et cetera, for Canadian boys, as may be authorized by the governor general in council.

I wish to see in this vote a recognition by the government of the principle that in matters of colonization in Canada, Canadian citizens should be entitled to the same advantages as are offered to immigrants. This is a move which will help greatly to satisfy public opinion in this country, and the government deserve to be congratulated upon it. The public will see in this move the beginning of a new national policy of colonization in the interest and for the advantage of Canada first, not in the interest and for the advantage of another country or in the interest and for the advantage of certain classes of citizens of another country.

The Minister of Immigration and Colonization has not yet explained how he proposes to spend that sum of $1,300,000 in order to promote the colonization by Canadians of the vacant lands of Canada, which are of great extent according to what has been said in the house. I suppose that he will do so when his estimates come up for discussion. In the meantime might I suggest that he set up for the assistance of Canadian settlers some of the schemes which have been devised for the assistance of immigrant settlers. These schemes are fairly numerous and can be summarized as follows:

1. Assisted passage agreement between the Canadian and Imperial governments whereby members of British agricultural families over nineteen years of age and houseworkers over seventeen years of age pay to come from England to Canada the following rates:

Halifax, St. John or Quebec	£2.0s.
Montreal	3.0
Toronto	3.10
Winnipeg	4.10
Regina, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon	5.0
Calgary or Edmonton	5.10
Vancouver	8.0

The difference between the rates paid by the immigrants and the regular third-class rate of £10 now charged by the steamship companies is paid half by the Canadian government and half by the Imperial government.

2. Free passages for boys from fourteen to nineteen years of age coming to earn their livelihood on the land in Canada. Their entire transportation is paid half by the Canadian and half by the Imperial government.

3. Free passages for girls from fourteen to seventeen coming to Canada to engage in housework under the auspices of the Canadian government or of an approved immigration society. Their entire fare is paid by the governments of Great Britain and Canada.

4. The reunion of families scheme, providing reduced passages rates for the reunion of non-agricultural families. A wife eligible for assistance under this scheme pays £3 for her passage, and children under seventeen receive free transportation. The Canadian and Imperial governments pay the balance, or the whole of the regular passage rates, as the case may be.

5. The £10 ocean rates granted at the request of both governments by the steamship companies to all British immigrants not of the classes above mentioned.

6. Reception and distributing farms run at the expense of the Imperial, Dominion and provincial governments, where the British boys are received, trained and distributed among farmers in the district where such farms are located. Cash contributions are made as follows for the operation of the reception and distributing farms. The provincial government pays $10 per boy, the Dominion government $10 per boy, and the British government $20 per boy.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

7. The placing of boys with farmers, providing for the selection of suitable homes for the above-mentioned boys by the provincial governments, which furnish after care, protection, and what supervision is required for the welfare of the boys for a period of three years after their arrival in Canada, and also take care of their savings.

8. The boys' land settlement scheme whereby the British and Canadian governments propose jointly to loan a total of $5,000,000 over a period of ten years to assist suitable British youths to take up farming in Canada on their own account.

9. Grants to immigration societies, provinces, women's hostels, and so forth, and the furtherance of the British Empire settlement scheme.

10. Loans where considered necessary and advisable to immigrants accepted under the three-thousand family scheme and to household workers, the loan being free of interest and repayable in instalments, to cover that part of the ocean passage which the immigrant has to pay under the other schemes.

11. After care which the government undertakes to give to immigrants for a period of five years after their arrival in Canada.

12. The three-thousand family settlement scheme, which is almost completed whereby the government undertook to assist financially in the bringing over and establishing on Canadian land of that number of British families. During the three years up to January 31, 1929, 2,999 families have been settled under this scheme. Of this number there have been 520 withdrawals and cancellations.

According to the report of the Department of Immigration and Colonization for the year ending March 31, 1929, at page 56, I find:

> The land settlement schemes which have been briefly described above involved an estimated expenditure of $24,000,000, excluding settlement or administration expenses and cost of transportation.

I have been informed that an average British immigrant family costs this government something between $80 and $100. This is the cost under those schemes which have been adopted to assist immigrants to come and settle in Canada. I sincerely believe that schemes such as those which I have described should be tried by the government to assist in the settlement of Canadian citizens on the land. If those schemes have proved good in the case of immigrants, they should also prove good in the case of Canadian settlers. Therefore I suggest that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization employ the sum of $1,300,000 which he is asking parliament to grant him, in assisting in the transportation of Canadian settlers from the congested older districts to the virgin good lands of which we have heard so much; in the providing of loans to settlers without capital for the purpose of land, stock and equipment, in helping in the establishment of boys on the land, in encouraging the return to the land from the cities, in stimulating to a greater extent the return of Canadians from the United States, and in cooperating with colonization societies and provinces which have land to settle and colonize, just as the minister is doing for certain classes of immigrants. If it is well and good to do that for immigrants, it should be equally well and good to do it for our own Canadian citizens. It is claimed that we have to assist immigrants to come here because we need more people to share our national debt with the present population and to help us produce more revenue for our railways, and it is said that assisted colonization by Canadian settlers will not produce that desirable increase of population. I confess humbly that I fail to see how the national debt can be decreased appreciably if we use the taxpayers money to buy immigrants by the boatload at the cost indicated in the report of the Department of Immigration and Colonization. I also fail to see how the railways can be helped materially if it is true that they do not receive governmental assistance in the transportation of immigrants, as I see from the figures which I have just quoted that the only difference in the cost of transportation of immigrants between Quebec, the usual port of landing, and Montreal is £1, between Quebec and Toronto £1 10s., between Quebec and Winnipeg, £2 10s., between Quebec and Regina, Moose Jaw and Saskatoon, £3, between Quebec and Calgary and Edmonton, £3 10s., between Quebec and Vancouver, £6. Please remember that these rates apply only to adults, as children of nineteen and under are transported free from the point of departure to the point of destination.

The Montreal Star related some time ago the story of a Scotchman—of course, he had to be a Scotchman—who by taking advantage of all possible schemes of assistance brought his family consisting of himself, his wife and eleven children, to this country for 20 cents a piece, whereas it would cost a family of the same size to go from say Quebec to Edmonton close to $1,200. The assistance of Canadian settlers, if it does not immediately produce an increase in the present population of Canada, will at least stop our population from decreasing by preventing to a great extent the emigration of Canadians to the neighbouring country, and if we keep our people here the next census will not be so disappointing with regard to the natural increase of the native born population.

It has been argued that assisting the settlement of Canada by the sons of Canada by way of transportation aid and in other ways is not to be advocated, because it is not the business of the central government to help shift people from one province to another. However, I read in a pamphlet published by the British government, and called "Report of the Oversea Settlement Committee for the year ended 31st December, 1928," page 5, the following:

> The object of empire settlement is to distribute the white population of the British commonwealth in the most efficient manner as between all its parts. But, in view of the conditions which at present exist in parts of this country, there is a widespread wish that the policy should be made use of so far as possible to find openings in other parts of the empire for those who cannot find work at home.
> In these circumstances, it is very desirable to make clear to what extent and within what limits this can be done. In a recently published press statement, the Secretary of State has expressed the view that coupling unemployment and migration together is calculated to give a wholly misleading idea of the government's policy in regard to migration both at home and in the dominions. "The object", he has written, "of a policy of empire migration is first and foremost to build up the strength and wealth of the empire as a whole by the better distribution of its population, and to increase the openings for success in life and the development of character of all our people. Such a policy obviously offers great opportunities of better employment, of a more independent and varied life, and of increased prospects for the children, as far as concerns the individual family that goes overseas. It also creates more employment at home for those who remain, because those who go out help to build up our best markets, which are those of the empire. These are the main reasons which justify a policy of empire migration. They apply all the time, and with just as much force when the state of employment is good at home as when it is bad. Incidently, and accidentally, the actual movement of migration may help to relieve the labour market in times of industrial depression, and many of those who migrate, and make a success of their adventure in a new country, may actually be unemployed at the moment of their deciding to go. But it is the probability of their succeeding which is the one factor which must weigh with the government, and not the fact that they are unemployed."

If a better distribution of population is desirable for the empire, it is just as desirable for Canada, in which there is congestion in the older settled parts and vast areas of vacant lands in other parts. If it is desirable to shift at the public expense to another part of the empire people who cannot find land o· employment in their present environment, it should be just as desirable to shift from one Canadian province to another, Canadians who cannot find land or work where they happen to have been born or raised. It seems to me that assisted colonization by Canadian settlers will be commendable just as long as the surplus farmer population of older Canada has to go to the cities, or to the United States to earn their livelihood. Until we have provided for our own young farmers, until we have stopped the flow of the farmer's sons to the cities, or across the border, I fail to see the utility or necessity of bringing immigrants from a country which is mainly industrial, and where the farming population has dwindled from about 1,149 000 in 1881 to about 930,000 in 1921.

Australia and New Zealand have stopped that business, and I see in that very same report from which I quoted a moment ago that Australia and New Zealand have practically discontinued the policy of buying immigrants. At page 13 of that report it is stated:

> At the present time, nominations for industrial workers are allowed by Australia and New Zealand, but unfortunately economic and other circumstances seem for the present to point to a further reduction in the immediate future of the flow of population from this country into those two dominions.

And at page 23 that same report mentions another report made by Sir Arthur Duckham, K.C.B., as follows:

> Whilst the report is, generally speaking, optimistic as regards the prospects of Australia, reference is made to the "vicious circle of ever ascending costs and prices." This is described as crippling Australia's progress and her power of supporting increased population.

And at page 26 the British report sums up in the following words:

> In present economic circumstances in Australia and New Zealand, it is unlikely that any schemes will be arranged in the near future in these dominions which will provide directly for the settlement of families from this country excepting those with capital.

Incidentally, we might take a lesson from what is happening in Australia, and that lesson is this, that high tariffs and high protection are not conducive to increase of population. New Zealand and Australia are highly protected countries, and in this connection I might read something which is reproduced from the Manchester Daily Despatch, a British paper, relating to conditions in high tariff Australia:

> (The Australian tariff board recently warned the commonwealth that tariffs were being raised to such a height that costs would inevitably go up and make selling difficult.) The War Office has given an order for a million tins of "bully beef" to South America. The desire of the authorities has always been, and rightly so, to place such orders within the empire. But Australian prices have militated this time against such a course. The British taxpayer cannot be mulcted in order to bolster up the internal policies of the commonwealth, some of which hit the working classes of this country.

I sincerely believe that we would do well to follow the example of Australia and New Zealand at least as long as the supply of Canadian settlers lasts. When it stops it will be time to look elsewhere for settlers who can never be as good as our own people, no matter where they come from. This morning on the train I happened to read the Montreal Gazette, and on one page of that paper, page 4, there is a rather curious picture of the immigration situation in Canada. It consists of three items of news which are set up side by side, and which I will ask the permission of the house to read:

> English Settlers Arrive
> 900 Girls and Young Boys Arrive at Quebec
> (Special to The Gazette.)
> Quebec, May 25.—Two special trains were required here to-day to carry away from Quebec nine hundred of the choicest class of settlers, who made their way to Canada from different parts of Great Britain and northern Europe aboard the Duchess of York. Salvation Army lassies, with the familiar red-tipped blue uniforms, sturdy youths with the glow of health upon their cheeks, youngsters who proudly announced that they were going to Canada, and many others went to make up this heterogeneous lot, and the dialects of Northumberland and Cumberland, Warwickshire and Yorkshire, the drawl of London and the burr of Scotland in addition to the brogue of Ireland were all to be heard.

Now, we have the other side of the picture:

> Demonstration by Hungry Newcomers
> Six Immigrants Who Broke Restaurant Windows Will Be Deported
>
> Six young recent immigrants from the British Isles who did not find conditions in Canada to their liking will be sent back to their native shores after serving two months in jail with hard labour, Chief Justice Perrault ordered on Saturday morning, after the men had pleaded guilty to smashing two plateglass windows of a restaurant on Empire day.
> The prisoners, all hardy types from England, Ireland and Scotland, gathered in front of the establishment of Aird and Bowen, Ltd., at 750 St. Peter street, on Friday afternoon, and hurled several stones at the windows of the place. They admitted they were merely trying to attract attention to the fact that they were in need of money and wanted food.
> Damage of $150 was done by the angry half dozen young men. Some of them told police they were anxious to return to the old country and did not care how they got there. One at least had been out to western Canada and was dissatisfied with the wages offered him.
>
> Each was asked by the Judge how long he had been in the Dominion. Two at least had been here only a week. Of the others none had been on this side of the Atlantic longer than a month. All claimed to have been unable to procure work of any kind in Montreal and elsewhere.

They pleaded guilty to the damages to property charge and smiled broadly when they heard the sentence. None had local addresses. They said they had joined forces on Empire day and decided to demonstrate to mark the holiday celebration.

The next article is:

Youth to Be Deported
(Special to The Gazette.)

Brockville, May 25.—After pleading guilty in police court here to the theft of jewellery from his employer, Harry Foster, aged 19, who arrived in Canada two months ago under the auspices of a Montreal immigration society, and who has since been employed by Gordon Loney at Lansdowne, is being held in jail here awaiting the arrival of an officer of the society which will return him to England.

Another picture of the immigration situation is contained in a news item of La Liberte of Winnipeg, which recounts what took place on May day in that city. I translate part of the article as follows:

In the parade held in Winnipeg on May 1 there were 2,500 participants, three-quarters of them foreigners, and they carried banners emblematic of revolution. These banners bore the following slogan: "Only a world proletarian dictatorship will bring peace to the workers and victory to socialism. Long live the soviet union. Free Arvo Varra and all political prisoners". The band of the Ukrainian labour temple played the Internationale, which was joined in by three hundred school children. These good little fellows had also a rally yell which went as follows: "Everybody listen, everybody yell, capitalist, capitalist, all to go hell". On the market square orators preached the overthrow of the present social structure and a girl of fourteen made a speech which ended with these words: "Let us all march, to the world of revolution".

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the best way of keeping our people at home on the farms, instead of having to bring in strangers whom we are inducing to come to Canada to engage in agriculture, is to make life on the Canadian farm more attractive and profitable than any other calling; and with that end in view I would go so far as to advocate spending all the money which at present we devote to immigration for the purpose of improving the conditions of farm life. If our people leave the country it is because they expect to do better elsewhere, and they will return if farm life is made more attractive and more remunerative. The key to our colonization problem is to make farming a sufficiently paying proposition by helping the farmers to improve and modernize their methods, by creating an efficient buying and selling organization for them, by enabling them to produce more and to better advantage, by finding markets for them, and so forth. I would gladly see the government spend for this purpose all the millions set aside to promote immigration. I do not believe that anyone can do better on Canadian land than the Canadian farmer. If, therefore, we improve the conditions in the farming industry in Canada, not only will the rural population remain on the land but I believe that we shall see a large number of expatriated Canadians returning home; from the cities men of rural ancestry will go back to the country, and immigrants, seeing the happiness and prosperity enjoyed by these Canadians, will themselves make an effort to come to Canada without having to be coaxed, or bought, or pampered or coddled.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): I understand that the amendment to which we are now speaking is the following, which was moved by the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) and seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

this house regrets the failure of the government to profit by Canadian experience in the colonization and settlement of the country and deplores the fact that men and women have, during recent months, been settled on western crown lands at great distances from transportation, educational, hospital and other necessary facilities, thereby making it almost impossible for them to achieve success and happiness in their new surroundings, and is of the opinion that such conditions can only be remedied by an immediate reorganization of the Department of Immigration and Colonization.

Certainly one of the districts affected in the manner to which my hon. friend refers in his speech is that area in the Peace River where settlers went in last year, and I may as well say at once that I cannot support the amendment because it asks me to endorse the statement that it is impossible for these settlers to make a success. I have had some experience in pioneering. In the year 1911 I went three hundred miles from a railway to take up a homestead. Nearly everyone told us in those days that we were crazy and that we could not make it go. Well, we settled up something like one million acres in the Peace River district, ranging from two to three hundred miles from a railway, and I do not know of any country or new district anywhere which has retained a greater percentage of its original settlers.

The hon. member in his speech, at page 2737, quoted the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) as having made the following statement in a speech which that hon. gentleman delivered last March:

In the Grand Prairie and Peace River country, 5,216 homesteads were taken up, a gain of 450 per cent over the previous year.

Commenting on this, the hon. member for North Vancouver made this statement:

> The minister did not say to the house where he was placing these 5,000 new settlers; that part of the story was left for me to tell. Perhaps he does not know.

Then he goes on for a column or two of his speech to explain that a large number had settled twenty, forty, sixty, eighty and a hundred miles from a railway; which is perfectly true. I have here some information regarding these 5,000 homesteaders and it certainly has some bearing on the question. Just a little over 1,000 of these are second homesteads. Most hon. members will recall that last session there was introduced into this house by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), and passed, a bill providing that certain persons might take up second homesteads. I believe that 1,200, or at any rate something over 1,000 of the 5,000 filed in Peace River last year were second homesteads. In that case it was mostly settlers who had already been established in the Peace River country and who knew what they were doing, whether they went twenty, forty or sixty miles from a railway. And as regards the other 4,000, they are for the most part people who have already had homesteading experience, or the sons of people who have already farmed in the three western provinces and in British Columbia. I do not believe that 10 per cent of the people who went in to take up homesteads in Peace River last year could be regarded as immigrants in the strict sense of the word—people asking the Department of Immigration for information as to where to go in order to find homesteads. I am subject to correction, but the people whom I met on their way in and out were people who had had experience in farming in western Canada and who knew, therefore, what they were doing.

Having offered that criticism by way of explanation as to why I cannot accept the amendment, I wish to observe that there are some constructive ideas in the speech delivered by the hon. member for North Vancouver. I do not know that I can follow him in all the details of his settlement scheme, for reasons which I will give in due course. I read the speech twice over and there are in it some things that are not clear to me yet. But the hon. member did bring out this fact, that unless we take into consideration in connection with settlement the questions of transportation, the clearing of lands and the selection of lands on which we shall encourage settlement, we are apt to cause settlers a tremendous amount of hardship and difficulty which could be avoided.

[Mr. Kennedy.]

Most hon. members of this house know that I have been urging for a survey of a coast outlet, not because I expected to get that outlet immediately, but because the people want to know just where the branch lines will be built in the Peace River in order to fit in with the outlet when it is ultimately constructed. We have got somewhere in connection with the survey of a possible location of railway branch lines. This I believe to be primarily the responsibility of the federal government. Undoubtedly the control of the location and the construction of railways will be in the hands of the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific and the federal government. Some years ago we were building railways in Canada ahead of the settlers. In some cases we made mistakes in connection with the location of the railways; in other cases we had duplications, and in other cases we permitted the settlers to go on lands which should never have been settled at all. To-day we are asking the settlers to go out and prove the country before we go ahead with railway construction; we are erring in the other direction. If we adopt the policy of bringing immigrants to this country and expecting them to go out and settle in the newer districts, we have a bounden duty as the federal parliament to see that the settlers obtain railway transportation just as quickly as possible. The same would apply to our own people who are asked to settle on these lands.

I have some criticism to make of the heads of our two railway systems who have been shouting for immigration. I think there will be time enough to shout for immigration when they have provided the last permanent settlement in western Canada with a reasonable amount of railway service, and they have not done that as yet. Settlement in this country is three or four hundred miles ahead of railway development, epecially in the Peace River district. I am not blaming the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific for that, because they have just recently taken over the Peace River railway from the Alberta government. The immediate problem to be solved is to provide railway transportation for the five thousand settlers who took up land there last year, and another possible five thousand who will go in this year. In a new country it is absolutely impossible to do anything with regard to the permanent location of schools, hospitals, and so on, until you have the railway into the country or until you know exactly where it is going to be. We cannot avoid hardships and difficulties, but by a wise policy of railway development we can bring that suffering down to a minimum. In the Peace River block we have an intensely settled district, but it cannot be fully settled until it is supplied with railway facilities. That district is intensely settled sixty miles from a railway, and it justifies the extension of the railway.

As I said a little while ago, I had some difficulty in understanding the proposal offered by the hon. member for North Vancouver. At page 2730 of Hansard, he says:

As to the percentage of the 100,000,000 acres available for agriculture, probably 10 per cent should be allowed for land covered by water. In many districts there is no waste at all. A conservative estimate is 75,000,000 acres of good agricultural land.

Then at page 2731 he makes this statement:

Besides, the best of our districts awaiting settlement to-day are more or less covered with timber of varying density, from open park-life country, light brush or scrub, to the so-called timber land, little of it giving promise of ever becoming of commercial value so far as the timber is concerned. Peace River district is very fortunate. About 50 per cent of that country is what is termed park-like land, and of this at least half is open prairie. Our problem is to make this land available for settlers with the least cost at the earliest possible date.

I do not know whether there are 75,000,000 acres of good land in the Peace River district, but putting these two statements together, it would appear that the hon. member claims that there are 75,000,000 acres of good agricultural land, fifty per cent of which is prairie and park-like land. Prairie land is open land practically ready for the plough and requires no drainage. Then the hon. member states that the other fifty per cent is park-like land. According to these two paragraphs it would appear as though we had 36,000,000 acres of that sort of land in the Peace River district. There have been only about 4,000,000 acres alienated altogether, according to the report which I received from the Department of the Interior. In the Grande Prairie district we have 517,600 acres homesteaded, and we have 1,203,360 acres in the Peace River district.

I would like to read what the hon. member had to say with regard to the question of financing new settlers. At page 2733 of Hansard he says:

It would not require any great administrative ability to assemble and equip clearing units, which might be located at several points, in number sufficient to clear and make available along the lines I have indicated homes for at least 2,000 new settlers a year.

At page 2735 he says:

I proposed last year that the government issue land bonds against their expenditure on such a development. I gave as the maximum required $300,000,000 for a ten year programme, an average of $30,000,000 per year.

Again on the same page he says:

When the settlement of a district is complete, a land value of $30 an acre would be in keeping with the present Peace River values. This means that the homesteader who gets a partially improved homestead for the amount spent on it by the government (which I estimated last year not to exceed $1,500) would not be long in seeing that at $30 per acre for his 160 acre homestead he would have a prospective value of $4,800,

Two thousand homesteads per year at $1,500 each amounts to $3,000,000, but the program suggested amounts to $30,000,000, which would mean 20,000 homesteads per year. I am a little confused when I consider those figures. The hon. member seems to have dropped or added a cipher in one of these statements. I am in accord with his suggestion that transportation is absolutely essential and must be brought close to the settlers, and that we should develop some scheme of financing the settler. In 1926 two bills were presented to the house which, although not along the line of the proposition recommended by the hon. member for North Vancouver, had that very matter in view.

I am also in sympathy with the proposition of clearing the land by fire. I agree with the hon. member's statement that a large percentage of the park-like land could be handled for about $12 per acre. I speak from experience in connection with that because I had some cleared and turned over last year which cost me just about that much; yet I do not see why we should go ahead with a scheme involving an expenditure of $6 per acre for clearing when we can handle it by fire for less than $1 per acre.

The amendment directs the whole criticism at the Minister of Immigration, and to me that seems to be striking the wrong head. We should criticize three or four departments if we come to the conclusion that it is necessary to accept a scheme of that kind in order to have a government which is right up to the standard of what Canada needs. It would require the cooperation of the Railway department, and the railways as well, both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National; it would require the cooperation of the Department of the Interior, the department which demonstrated conclusively in 1919 that land could be cleared cheaply by fire but which has not gone ahead with a development in that way. It would require the cooperation of the Department of Immigration as well.

I am heartily in accord with the Minister of Immigration when he takes the stand that immigration brought into this country must be controlled in relation to the needs of labour and the conditions prevailing in the country and that we should not bring in any immgrants whom we cannot place or for whom we cannot find work. I do not believe that it is feasible to bring in a large number of new immigrants and place them away out on the frontier in a block by themselves. The immigrant should come here and obtain his experience by working for some other farmer for two, three or five years. Then he would be in a position to go and select his land or buy his farm. By that time he would have formed a pretty good idea of the kind of farm he wanted and the price he could pay for it. If you put a block of green Scotchmen, Englishmen or any other class away out on the prairies by themselves, especially in a year when there is a crop failure, you have not in your settlement the element that can take the long view and steady the settlement through to the good years which are sure to come. In the new settlements what you want are people of experience in doing the kinds of farming necessary in a new district, or a very liberal mixture of them in order to guide and steady the newcomers. For that reason, while I have not been altogether satisfied with everything the government has done and while I am also not prepared to condemn the scheme advanced by the hon. member for North Vancouver, because there are a number of good ideas in his speech, I feel that his amendment does not fit in with the constructive ideas in his speech, and therefore I cannot support the amendment.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): I should like to make a few remarks in regard to the immigration policy of this government. We have been spending in the neighbourhood of five to six million dollars a year in order to secure immigrants whom we consider are necessary. It does not appear from the general criticism which has been directed toward the government and its immigration policy that that money has been as well spent as it should have been, or that we are getting the service that we should be getting for our expenditure on immigration in general. I take it that we are all agreed that if the Immigration department were functioning with full efficiency we would be getting better results. I am going to quote from the report of the Department of Immigration for the year ending March 31, 1928, in order to show that some of the remarks of the minister and his department hardly fit in. For instance, at page 59 I find the following remark from the commissioner in regard to the publicity work in his department. It is headed "Films":

> Films—There is an increasing demand for the use of films, and during the year the supply at the London office was frequently insufficient to meet the demand. The film "Twenty Minutes in Canada" has been in use for such a prolonged period that the request is usually for something new, which as yet we are unable to supply.

That is, notwithstanding the amount of money we are giving the minister to spend on these services, the services he is giving to the public are antiquated. We find the same thing again on page 75, and I want to read from the department's own publication what they say in regard to literature which has been distributed:

> A booklet to which very wide distribution is given is called "Canada West". As its name suggests, it deals with the western provinces of Canada—Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia. It contains maps of each province and text and illustrations giving information particularly along the line of agricultural opportunities. This booklet is printed in three editions: one designed for distribution in Great Britain, one for the United States, and one printed in French, used mainly for repatriation purposes in French-speaking communities in the New England states. New British and United States editions were compiled, but the printing was not completed during the year. A sufficient number of the French edition were on hand so that no reprinting was required. The "Eastern Canada" booklet deals with the eastern provinces in much the same way as "Canada West" does with those lying west of the great lakes. It, too, is issued in three editions—British, United States, and French. Orders for British and United States editions were placed during the year but were not completed. The French edition on hand was sufficient to supply the year's requirements.

Again I say that instances the fact that the Immigration department, for some reason or another, is not sufficiently coordinated or working in proper cooperation to keep even a supply of the films and literature which are necessary for distribution in the countries in which we are soliciting immigrants. That shows beyond any question of doubt—and it is reflected throughout the whole of the criticism of the Immigration department—that within the department itself there is a certain amount of disorganization which could easily be remedied by efficient cooperation. These weaknesses within the organization amply demonstrate why we are not getting satisfactory service from the department throughout the whole Dominion.

As regards the question that is immediately before us, the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae), I was rather surprised and startled to hear the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) say that he could not agree with the scheme outlined by the hon. member for North Vancouver. But after listening to what he had to say on the matter, I came to the conclusion that he was not very far from agreeing with the hon. member for North Vancouver. His argument to prove that it is not exactly the scheme we must have seemed to me to prove that it was a pretty efficient scheme and its adoption provided that the details were worked out by men with the proper spirit for the task, would result in much greater efficiency in the Department of Immigration than we have at the present time.

After listening to the information which has been given to the house during the last three or four sessions in regard to the Peace River country, one cannot doubt that we have in that section of Canada a very large area—whether it is 75,000,000 or 50,000,000 acres does not alter the question very much—which is capable of vast development. The Canadian people by their characteristics are well qualified for the task of bringing that large area under settlement, and, given proper direction, of making it productive. What we require is an administration which as a whole has caught the vision of that northern country and its possibilities, and which will lay down policies and courageously follow them out in order that the development of that country may proceed with some degree of rapidity.

It has been stated time and again in the house that the proper way to develop that northen country is to give it an outlet to the Pacific coast, and until that outlet is given the Peace River country cannot develop as it properly should. The reason is plain to any person who will take into consideration the location of the district. The whole land is situated not more than 800 or 900 miles from the Pacific coast, whereas there is a haul of 3,000 miles at the very least in order to bring the produce to the eastern seaboard. Therefore we do not need any argument to prove that it is necessary to connect that district by the shortest line possible with the Pacific coast. It is in that respect, and in that alone, that I find most fault with the present Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) and the present government. The hon. member for Peace River did not like to unload the whole responsibility on the Minister of Immigration, and perhaps I should not attempt to unload on him the lack of railway facilities in that section, but at the same time, had we in the position of Minister of Immigration a man who had caught the vision of that section, who was seized of its possibilities and who had made up his mind to develop it, I feel certain that the railway development there would have progressed further than it has so far. To that extent I must hold the Minister of Immigration responsible for lack of railway development in the Peace River country. As a matter of fact, the western prairies have been settled and brought to their present stage of production because behind the organization of effort in that territory there were men who had caught the vision, who were seized of the possibilities and who were determined to give the country the opportunity to develop. At the present time I believe that the responsible officials of the government are not properly seized of the possibilities in that country, that they have not caught the vision, and are not evolving and following out progressive policies which would reflect credit on the Canadian people in the development of an empire such as we have in that part of the country.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FRASER: At six o'clock I think I had shown to the satisfaction of every reasonable person that the Department of Immigration and Colonization was not achieving the results that it should. It may be well to review for a few minutes some of the statements that have been made by the present government through its ministers and by officials connected therewith, having to do with the matter now under consideration.

In the first place, I would like to remind the house of the promises made by the present Prime Minister during the election campaign of 1925. I think it will be recalled by most hon. members that during his campaign in western Canada, referring to the immigration policy of the government which he hoped then to lead, he made or is reported to have made the statement that the spearhead of his immigration policy would be directed towards the Peace River country. Well, since then we have had four or five years of government under his leadership, and what has been the result? What has happened to that spearhead? It seems to me that it is very badly blunted and bent. It looks to me as if the platform then laid down was pretty much the same as that on which he was supposed to attain office in 1919. If that was not so, certain it is that the policy which has been directed towards the colonization of the northern country has not been a very energetic one, and the results achieved have been feeble and futile.

Strong men and women have gone to that country to help in its development, they have pointed out the possibilities of that country if proper opportunities are afforded for its development. Yet the present government has not supplemented as it should the efforts of those early pioneers, nor does it look as though they may expect to get much assistance from the present administration.

Then we have the president of the Canadian National Railways, who, when he visited the Peace River country in 1925 to inspect it at first hand and examine into its possibilities made the statement that if the people in that district would produce 10,000,000 bushels of grain he would be prepared to give consideration to their railway problems. The people of the Peace River country took him at his word. They went diligently to work, and in the year 1927 they not only raised 10,000,000 bushels of grain but actually shipped out over the railways 11,000,000 bushels, thus carrying out their part of the bargain in full measure. And what has the president of the Canadian National Railways since that time done to carry out his part of the bargain? When he was asked the other day in the railway committee what the situation was in regard to the implementing of that promise he said "Well, just the same answer as you get from this government when you ask them on any vital question—it is still under consideration." In 1925 the promise was made. The people accepted it in good faith. They did their part, and now in 1929, four years later, the answer of the president of the Canadian National Railways is that the matter is "still under consideration."

The Minister of Immigration says we are doing very well so far as immigration is concerned. Perhaps we are. The members of the cabinet draw very comfortable salaries. They spend about half a million dollars on motor cars and gasoline in travelling around the country looking after official business—

Mr. DUNNING: That is terrible.

Mr. FRASER: Awful.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Some was spent in Europe.

Mr. FRASER: —while the farmers in the Peace River country producing their crops are despoiled of $6,500,000 for lack of railway facilities which should be provided by this government. I arrive at that conclusion in this way: the Peace River country in 1927 produced 11,000,000 bushels of grain. I presume they produced as much in 1928. It cost the people in the Peace River block 30 cents per bushel to haul that grain to railhead; if you multiply the 30 cents by the 22,000,000 bushels, you will find it amounts to about $6,500,000. In view of that condition, it is not astonishing that we should ask what is the horizon of the Minister of Immigration. Is he giving consideration to those areas which are a considerable distance from his own little corner of Manitoba called Pipestone? If he is thinking only, of his own little district of Pipestone then he is merely indulging in a kind of pipe dream.

The Prime Minister's spearhead is bent and blunt. The Minister of Immigration sobs, with drooping head, "It is well enough", and the president of the Canadian National Railways says he is "giving consideration" to the cry of the people. Surely it is time the development of such areas should be placed in stronger hands, under the direction of people who have a clear vision of the possibilities of that great country and an appreciation of what we expect of them in relation to the development of this country.

But there is another angle to this immigration policy to which I wish for a few minutes to direct the minister's attention. What has the Department of Immigration and Colonization done towards the colonizing of their own lands in the province of British Columbia? They have in that province, in the Peace River block and along the railway belt, large areas of very good land. Will the Minister of Immigration tell me what well organized, well directed effort they have ever made to colonize those areas, outside of the colonization effort under the Soldier Settlement Board; whether they have ever made any effort, whether they have had a colonization agent in any part of those areas? Not only that, but they have very important interests also in British Columbia so far as the Grand Trunk Pacific is concerned. Along that line of railway they have never made any effort to help colonization. All along that line there is good land, there are industrious people, an excellent climate, and as good soil as you can find anywhere in the world; yet this country is not as prosperous as it should be, and a line built to the highest standard of any railway in the Dominion of Canada, with the best possible grades, is being operated as a second class branch line. During the summer they operate a railway service six days in the week, but they provide the business people along that line with a mail service only three days weekly. That does not assist in the colonization of an area of that kind. The minister says that he is willing to cooperate with any of the provincial governments in assisting immigration, but I say he has made no effort to colonize that part of the country with which I am acquainted.

Mr. WARD: Will the hon. member tell the house what advantages he hopes to gain for Canada by the immediate settlement of this last virgin district we have left?

Mr. FRASER: I suppose it will have to remain unsettled so long as this government is in power and so long as the hon. member keeps it in power. But I understood that what this country required was a greater population, and I do not know where you will find a country in which the people have a better chance to make a living than in the area I have described. I say that all the necessary materials for the proper colonization of that country, and for making it prosperous, will be found along the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway; and will not the prosperity of each and every individual along that line add to the prosperity of the property which the government itself owns? Every contented settler helps in the unkeep and building up of the railways, and I submit it would be money and effort well spent if the government did a little more in the way of colonizing that district. In addition to the colonization department of this government, which is neglecting that country, we have also a very expensive colonization department in connection with the Canadian National Railways, and it is making absolutely no effort to colonize that country along the Grand Trunk Pacific line.

I said a moment ago that we had in Canada, if we went about it in the proper way, all the materials for a satisfactory colonization of that great country. Now, someone might ask where the people would come from. Well, the first thing to which I would direct the attention of the minister would be the number of people annually leaving Canada. I find from the records that something over 50,000 Canadians left this country during the last fiscal year of the Immigration department. I submit with all sincerity that if proper efforts were directed to these new districts these 50,000 people would be very glad to remain in Canada and find employment here instead of going across the line to look for work. If the colonization of the western country, and particularly that northern district to which we are directing attention at the present moment, were undertaken under a comprehensive scheme, the people who find it necessary to leave Canada annually would, I am sure, be very willing and ready to turn their energies in the direction of developing that northern country, instead of going over into the United States. The Minister of Immigration says that Canadians do not leave this country to go to the United States for the purpose of farming. It is admitted that they do not. But I am pointing out that if you filled up that section of Canada you would create a demand for all kinds of necessities which farmers require for the development of the land, and those people intending to leave, even supposing they did not want to go on the land, would remain in the towns, engaged in the production of commodities required for the development of that country.

I think it would be well if a good deal of the money spent in sending officials to the United States and to countries overseas were spent in Canada, along proper colonization lines. If I had anything to do with it, I would suggest that these men be brought home from Europe and the United States and be asked to turn their attention to the northern country and to develop some proper scheme of colonization which would assist the efforts of settlers after their arrival in Canada. Let these men earn their money at home rather than abroad.

Mr. FORKE: I may inform the hon. member that we have no immigration agents in Europe.

Mr. FRASER: Colonization agents then.

Mr. FORKE: There is no one seeking immigrants on the continent of Europe; we do not pay anyone.

Mr. FRASER: You are paying out large sums of money in Europe.

Mr. FORKE: We are paying no officials for immigration work in Europe except the inspectors at ports of sailing; that is all.

Mr. FRASER: Does the minister mean to tell this house that he is not paying a substantial sum of money in Great Britain and on the continent in the work of looking after colonization and immigration?

Mr. FORKE: We do in Great Britain.

Mr. FRASER: Well, Great Britain is a part of Europe.

Mr. FORKE: A little information would go a long way sometimes and save a whole lot of talking.

Mr. FRASER: If the minister would talk a little more the house would have a little more information.

Mr. FORKE: Wind up and I shall have a chance.

Mr. FRASER: Not in this debate, I am afraid. Now I find, with some consternation, that this government has a colonization policy for the province of British Columbia, to a certain very limited extent—and limited, I am glad to say, it is. But I find that, notwithstanding the antipathy of the people of British Columbia to oriental immigration, we have, according to the Auditor General's report, a colonization or an immigration agent stationed at Hong Kong. I find that this man costs the Dominion of Canada the sum of $8,075 per annum. Now I suggest that this is not a very popular thing from the standpoint of the people of British Columbia. British Columbians are not seeking immigration from oriental countries; indeed, we prohibit immigration from the orient, especially from China. But, as I say, there is this immigration agent stationed at Hong Kong. The Minister of National Health (Mr. King, Kootenay) has just taken his seat, I see. I suggest to him that he have a little quiet talk with the Minister of Immigration and point out to him how unpopular it is to invite immigration from these oriental countries.

Mr. FORKE: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but it is absurd to suggest that we have an immigration agent in Japan or China, seeking immigrants, when as a matter of fact we actually prohibit Chinese from coming to the country, and allow only a very limited number of Japanese to enter. To say that we are seeking immigrants in those countries is therefore so absurd that the statement should not be made.

Mr. FRASER: You do not deny that you pay $8,075 for an immigration agent in Hong Kong.

Mr. FORKE: He is certainly not seeking immigrants.

Mr. FRASER: But you pay him $8,075.

Mr. FORKE: I will look into the matter; I did not know there was such an official. He is not an immigration agent; I do not think there is such a man. I think the hon. member is entirely wrong.

Mr. FRASER: No, I am not wrong; I am not quoting anything wrong; I am absolutely within the facts. I will give the minister some names, good Chinese names, to support my statement. You can find these names in the Auditor General's reports. In those reports I find these two: Li Kam Hi and Fung Choy. Now what are these men being paid for? Why are we disbursing this money in this way?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Both friends of the minister.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. FRASER: I submit that so long as our people are crossing the line on the present scale it is obvious that conditions are not what they ought to be, the Minister of Immigration to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. FORKE: With reference to that man in China, I would point out that we have to have a man there to vise the passports of people coming to this country. But that man is not seeking immigrants; he is there to prevent emigration of his own kind.

Mr. BENNETT: But there must be people coming if there are passports to vise.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not for immigrants.

Mr. FORKE: That applies only to students or to visitors.

Mr. FRASER: Is there such immigration agent in India or Japan?

Mr. FORKE: No.

Mr. FRASER: Why in China then?

Mr. STEVENS: That was to find a job for a lame duck.

Mr. FRASER: To find a job for a lame duck? Well, I will take that explanation.

Mr. STEVENS: That was in 1922.

Mr. FRASER: As a matter of fact the line of our population in Canada requires broadening, and there is no section of the Dominion where the opportunities to broaden this line are as favourable as they are in northern Alberta and northern British Columbia. I submit, therefore, it is time that serious attention were given to the matter; action has been too long delayed. It is all very well to point to the number of homestead entries there are in the northern country. It is encouraging to see so many homestead entries. But it must be remembered also that the responsibility of this government does not cease when they grant a homestead entry to an intending settler. I submit, therefore, with all due respect that the homesteader should be followed up with modern facilities which will enable him to carry on in that country with a reasonable degree of efficiency so that he may be able to make a success of his labours and become prosperous.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am taking advantage of the opportunity offered by the amendment of the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) to refer for a few moments to this matter of colonization and immigration. In doing so I intend to speak as a settler and workingman. It has been said that Canada needs a larger population, but I believe I am voicing the sentiment of the majority of the people of northern Ontario when I say that this country is not in need of an unlimited immigration. Political leaders have expressed the thought that the prosperity of a country is directly related to the number of people within its borders; in other words, that an increased population is a good thing of itself irrespective of the conditions which result through that growth in population. When a new census is issued many people are pleased to see an increase in the number of inhabitants within our borders, and they do not take into consideration the social and economic condition of the population as a whole. Seldom do we stop to consider whether the well being of the inhabitants is improving in accordance with the increased population and the country's progress.

We are asked to pride ourselves upon our increased population, and we point to the United States as an example. In 1790 the population of the United States was 4,000,000 people; in 1929 it had increased to 120,000,000. A lot of people in Canada would like to see a similar increase take place here during the same period of time. In 1820 the population of the United States was practically the same as it is in Canada to-day. It took that country some twenty-three years to double its population, and the same rate of growth would give Canada a population of 19,000,000 in 1952. We must not forget that conditions are not identical with those existing about a century ago. The social and economic situation to-day does not warrant our expecting as rapid an increase in population.

Canadian industry has greatly benefited through its inventiveness, coupled with the inventiveness of the American people to the south of us; and I do not think anyone will contradict me when I say that conditions to-day cannot be compared with what they were fifty or seventy-five years ago. I have pointed out that our present population of 9,600,000 people is about equal to the population of the United States in 1820. There is no similarity between those two periods; conditions to-day are entirely different from what they were a hundred years ago. It is a well known fact that our agricultural population is strongly opposed to a rapid increase in our rural population; it is also a well established fact that the big industrial leaders and the city dwellers are always asking for a larger population. The transportation interests have been asking for an increased immigration from eastern and southern Europe, and certain politicians have been asking for the men with the sheepskin coats. Economically and socially Canada cannot absorb a too rapid increase in population, such as occurred in the country to the south of us.

To refute the argument of those who say that Canada should follow the American development, there is a wealth of information to be found in the reports of the Agriculture department in the United States. Conditions which developed in that country should be carefully considered if we are to avoid the difficulties which they encountered. During the past twenty years the farm population of the United States has decreased nearly 5,500,000. The figures of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics show that the farm population in the United States was 32,000,000 in 1909; in 1929 this had decreased to 27,511,000. About 1,960,000 left the farms last year; 1,978,000 left in 1927 and 2,155,000 left in 1926. It will be readily seen by these figures that the great increase in the agricultural population in the last century in the United States resulted in a decrease during the present century. The transportation companies, the financial interests, the distribution agencies and others concerned all made their profits during the years when the west was being peopled, but the farmers were not permanently benefited and we find that their successors are now leaving the farms.

The argument may be adduced that the Canadian farmer does not live under the same conditions as the American farmer, that the Canadian farmer must rely more and more on the export market. The figures show that during 1909, 14.8 per cent of the agricultural production of the United States was exported; in 1923 the exportations amounted to 16 per cent, and in 1925 they had increased to 18.2 per cent. In other words the American farmer was no less dependent upon foreign trade in 1925 than he was in 1909.

The second factor in the agricultural problem is the relation of efficiency in production to the farming population. The above figures show that there has been a great decrease in the farm population of the United States; and yet this is what Dr. O. E. Baker of the United States Department of Agriculture, has to say regarding agricultural production. His department has been working on an index of farm production which is now fairly complete, and he says:

—to show that at no time since 1900, and probably since 1890 has agricultural production increased at so rapid a rate as in the years since the world war. This is very remarkable in view of the decrease between 1919 and 1924 in farm land, in crop land, in number of farm animals, in number of farms and in farm population, as shown by the census. . . This increase in production has continued during 1927 and 1928, and it appears likely that agricultural production will increase for several years at about the present rate.

The reasons for the opposition of the agriculturists to a rapid increase of their number have been stated already. The opening up of new farm areas, improved methods of cultivation and other factors have resulted in an increase of production which has been more rapid than the increase of population. We must realize that most of the countries in Europe are satisfied to have a population which remains stationary.

I read with a great deal of interest the several articles by the ex-premier of Ontario, the Hon. E. C. Drury, which appeared in MacLean's Magazine. Mr. Drury stated that the agricultural sections of the country could not possibly absorb a large increase in population, and also pointed out that on account of the improved conditions in industrial activity more and more immigration would be absorbed in that way. I am absolutely in accord, Mr. Speaker, with what Mr. Drury said when he argued that an increase of immigration would practically clog the agricultural centres, but I do not agree with the ex-premier of Ontario when he states that the industrial centres could absorb quite a large number of immigrants. I believe that industry has a duty to perform in absorbing, first of all, the domestic population. It is a well known fact that there is a strong trend from the farm to the larger centres of population and our industries could easily find practically all the employees they require from that source.

A great improvement has taken place on the farm with regard to machinery. To-day we have the combine which cuts and threshes the wheat at the same time, taking the place of dozens of men. Our rural sections are able to produce a much larger quantity of their products with a smaller number of men. The same principle can be applied to the industrial centres. During the last seven years there has been a reduction of almost 2,000,000 workers in the United States industries, but in spite of that the production per worker is to-day some 43 per cent greater than it was in 1920. This has created a tremendous unemployment problem despite the general prosperous conditions which prevail, and the surplus of labour which is now seeking employment is the result of the years of tremendous immigration. In my section of the country a modern paper mill was built about 4 years ago; an up-to-date mill was erected there just recently, and it has been found that five or six men can do the work which it required fifteen men to do ten years ago. We are not in the same position to-day which the United States faced fifty years ago, economically, agriculturally and industrially, and we are all aware of the fact that at the present time the United States is confronted with a great unemployment situation which will be unavoidable in Canada if we follow the principle of unlimited immigration.

It surprises me to hear criticism from the other side as to unemployment in this country. If we permit unlimited immigration we will be faced with an unemployment situation which will be incapable of solution. Just to give a concrete example to show that in the industrial centres they have an unemployment problem, let me take for instance the United States Steel Corporation, the largest producer of steel products in that country, the production of whose plants may be taken as a good indication of business conditions. In 1923 it employed 260,000 men in all its undertakings, whereas in 1928 it employed only 222,000 men. In five years it had been able to reduce its labour force by about 40,000, and at the same time to maintain as high or a higher production of steel. In the manufacturing plants the displacement of labour is most marked, as it is possible to correlate the production and the working force. In 1926 the plants of the United States Steel Corporation produced 14,300,000 tons of rolled and finished steel products, and employed about 184,000 people. Last year they produced 14,000,000 tons, but employed 160,000 men. Labour, it appears, is assuming a less and less important role in manufacturing, and for that reason the need of immigration grows steadily less. This is characteristic of all the industries in the United States, and as all are displacing labour, it becomes increasingly difficult for the men to find work. Of course new industries are being developed, but notwithstanding their demands for labour there is still a surplus of workers.

We could apply the same principle to the automobile industry in Canada, which during the last few years has increased its output but at the same time has decreased the number of men employed. Canadian development is patterned on United States lines. Efficiency in production is almost as great in Canadian as in United States plants. The output of automobiles in Canadian plants has been greatly increased, and yet some of the factories find they need fewer employees. Canada to-day is in a far different position from that occupied by the United States fifty years ago. At that time the United States had no industrial rival to attract its citizens, and those who desired to leave the country were forced to take an ardous journey at great expense. Canada cannot afford to reduce the standard of living or its wages in any field, because of the ease with which a native-born Canadian can cross over into the United States to seek a higher standard of living. Let me quote a sentence written by Mr. A. S. Whitely in a recent issue of Saturday Night. He said:

> Necessity forces us to conform to American standards in our economic life and this in turn means that we can adopt no economic policy that would tend to prejudice our present standards. The immigration of peoples to our country must be guided very carefully so that no class of workers will find that they are being subjected to severe competition whether in the field or in the factory. Any modification of our present policy of immigration should be undertaken only with the greatest safeguards for the Canadian people.

I may be a little parochial in my viewpoint, but one thing that has always surprised me in a discussion of this nature is that we speak in terms of the western prairies. I should be the last man to wish any harm to the western prairies, because I realize they constitute one of the biggest factors of our present prosperity. But coming from a part of the country which also needs a colonization scheme—and I believe the proposed scheme involves some $300,000,000—it seems to me that the hon. member for North Vancouver should include northern Ontario in his proposal. It seems strange to me also, coming from the northern section of Ontario, that any of those schemes should take in only one section of the country. British Columbia has a very large section to be colonized; Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, northern Ontario and Quebec have large sections and the maritime provinces have also a section that could be colonized. That is why I believe that in a discussion of this nature we should generalize our experience and include every section of the country.

Another thing that surprises me is the falsity of some of the statements. I listened with a good deal of interest the other night to the well prepared speech of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). He mentioned that Canada had a total area of 3,500,000 square miles—and that is true—but at the same time he did not say that four-fifths of that area is not fit for colonization purposes. We often say that a hundred years from now we should have the same number of people as they have in the United States. But we forget our climatic conditions. We seem to follow a policy of hush-hush, of not mentioning the climatic conditions which constitute an important factor in regard to colonization and other schemes. We all know it is an historic fact that the Labrador coast and the Hudson bay were discovered at the same time as the great lakes, but if one looks at the map he will see that the southern section of Ontario contains practically one-third of the population of Canada, while on the Labrador coast and the Hudson bay region there are only a few thousand people. Let us visualize this point in another way. Suppose Canada had the same climatic conditions as exist in the United States: I would guarantee an exodus of millions of people from the United States within the next few years. We have good healthy climatic conditions in Canada, but if you look at the map you will see that most of our colonization and settlement is on the southern part of the country. It is true that we have a wonderful north, and coming from there I believe in its future, but it is absolutely impossible for the north to maintain a dense population at any time. Therefore we must follow some of the principles that the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Adshead) gave utterance to the other night, namely, that when we speak about immigration and colonization we should tell the truth and the whole truth in respect to all these matters. In northern Ontario we have a winter that lasts from five to seven months, and every hon. member present knows that we never dread spring, but we are all more or less afraid of the winter. This is a condition of affairs that we do not publish to the world, and when the immigrants come here they are disillusioned during their first winter, and in fact cannot accommodate themselves to these conditions.

Our climatic conditions give us seasonal employment. We all know that there are dozens of industries which work full time during the summer months and which have to close part of the time during the winter. Our agricultural activities are also not as great in the winter as in the summer. Construction work, railroad work, and so forth, are more active in the summer than in the winter. Practically only mining and lumbering are as active, if not more so, in the winter than in the summer. So we have there a situation which must be dealt with. If we have seasonal employment we should also have seasonal immigration. By that I mean that no immigrant should be allowed to enter Canada from the first of September to the first of March of the following year. I speak feelingly about this matter because I remember that as a young man working in the lumber camps we received $35 to $40 a month, and early in the fall many immigrants would come out and underbid us by working for $25 a month, thus taking the bread from the mouths of the Canadian people. In the fall we should be very careful about admitting immigrants and the wonder is that we do not have more unemployment during the winter months. Everyone knows that industrial activities in Canada are not as great in the winter as they are in the summer, and to be fair to our own Canadian people as well as to the prospective immigrant we should provide that no immigrant be allowed to enter this country from the first of September to the first of March of the following year. People who have done manual work, who have to compete with immigrants to earn bread and butter, will fully appreciate my suggestion in this regard.

I do not believe in paternalism, in spoon-feeding. We had a wonderful example of government paternalism in our section of the country; I allude to the Kapuskasing settlement. With the best intentions in the world, the provincial government spent in that section hundreds of thousands of dollars to assist some returned soldiers to settle on the land. Certainly the land was opened up, cottages were built, and a certain amount of capital was furnished; but because the people who were put into that section of the country were not familiar with the climatic conditions, they were unable to succeed, the result being that eventually the provincial government had to send trains there to bring them out. We must realize that farming is not a trade; it is a vocation, a profession, a calling, and no matter what department tries to do the work, you cannot make a farmer overnight. Farming has to come as a training from boyhood, or one has to have a certain amount of training that will make him familiar with the agricultural situation. I am not in favour of helping any prospective immigrant, but if that principle is to be maintained, it should be made generally applicable to our Canadian people who want to migrate from one province to another—although, as I say, I am not in favour of such a scheme.

Subsidies for the clearing of the land is the solution of the problem as I see it in my section of the country. It is not so hard for a person to leave the section in which he lives, whether it be in Europe or in Canada. His trouble begins when he starts to prepare the land for cultivation, and it is when men show themselves to be bona fide settlers that the government should step in and subsidize them. I read with a good deal of interest last week in a report of the provincial government of Quebec that it has spent nearly a quarter of a million dollars in subsidies for the settlers in that province. That is the best investment the province could make, and I say that this principle should be applied generally throughout Canada. Cut out any other spoon-feeding grants that you will, but help the man who is actually settled on the land and is or intends to become a farmer.

I listened with a good deal of interest to the scheme that was outlined by the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae). The poor settlers that would locate in the part of the country to which he referred would be loaded with debt, and new settlers would only get discouraged. There is another phase to be considered. We ask for more and more agriculturists and farm hands in this country, but it is a known fact that in the part of the country I represent only a very small percentage of the people actually remain on the farm. The man you want to help is not the one who travels from one section of the country to the other. Rather you should help the man who is making sacrifices and doing real pioneer work. Some people say: Why do they not do like our forefathers, hew a home for themselves out of the forest? Social and economic conditions to-day are quite different from what they were many years ago, and I am convinced that if the government would see fit to subsidize the farmer in the actual clearing of his land, that would be the solution of our immigration and colonization problem. The best immigration and colonization agent in this country is the satisfied worker and the satisfied settler. I have in my constituency several communities that are prosperous. These people came from Scotland and England, from the province of Quebec and other parts of the province of Ontario. A few of them found that the land was good and decided to settle there. They have that community spirit which is absolutely necessary for successful colonization, and they have been doing better colonization work than has been done under any other government scheme that I have so far seen.

Just a few words in regard to the colonization situation in northern Ontario; and in this connection I wish to make a special appeal to the representatives, whether Liberal or Conservative, from Ontario. I am not going to make any criticism of the provincial administration in Ontario. I have said previously in this house, and I say it again, that I believe Premier Ferguson is a friend of the north, but for the last ten years we have had no colonization policies emanating from the present provincial government. Whether it is because of ignorance or some other reason, I do not know. It seems to me that the provincial government's activities are centered mostly on the newsprint and mining industries. That is a good thing for the northern part of the province, but what applies to the rest of Canada is applicable also to northern Ontario; its primary industry is, and always will remain, agriculture. I am saying this not in any spirit of bitterness, but because I know that our section of the country is well situated for settlement purposes.

Northern Ontario consists of nine districts —Nipissing, Timiskaming, Sudbury, Algoma, Thunder Bay, Rainy River, Kenora, Patricia and Cochrane. These districts cover an area of 330,000 square miles, of which 20,000,000 acres is good land. The clay belt, which starts from the Quebec border and runs west a distance of 350 miles, and is from 25 to 150 miles in depth, comprises about 16,000,000 acres, of which 75 or 80 per cent is suitable for agricultural purposes. I have often read statements by the premiers of the different provinces that they are willing and ready to receive a large immigration. I must say in all sincerity that northern Ontario is not prepared to receive a larger immigration. The present Premier of the province of British Columbia, during the visit of the Empire Parliamentary Association last fall, stated to that body that he was willing to receive more and more immigrants for British Columbia from the British Isles. I do not know the exact situation in British Columbia, but I believe it is the same in Ontario—no provincial government is in a position to-day to receive a very large number of immigrants. If Ontario were suddenly called on to take care of 10,000 new immigrants we would not have the facilities which would be necessary properly to receive them, and they could not make a livelihood.

Three or four years ago, without any reason whatever so far as we could see, and without consulting anyone residing in the northern section of Ontario, the provincial government saw fit to reduce the size of our farms from 160 to 80 acres. Let me ask hon. members: would anybody leave the older sections of Ontario and Quebec or Europe to settle on eighty acres in northern Ontario when they could just as well go out west and get a quarter or half section to settle on even to-day? I believe that this reduction in the size of our farms is prejudicial to any colonization scheme in northern Ontario, and members on all sides of the house should use whatever influence they have to make the provincial government of Ontario realize the anomalies that exist to-day in that northern part of the country.

I read a very interesting interview by the Premier of Ontario last fall, in the Monthly Review, in which he expressed his surprise at the size of the farms in Denmark. If this new ruling in regard to the size of the farms in northern Ontario had been made after the premier had visited Denmark, I would have been inclined to think he was trying to copy in northern Ontario the pocket edition farms that are to be found in Denmark, but the provincial ruling came out before the premier's visit overseas. I intend to protest against it at every opportunity and to ask the provincial administration in Ontario to make the size of our farms what they were three or four years ago. No farmers will leave the older provinces to settle on a farm of eighty acres in northern Ontario, because we have a lot of waste land and a lot of low land, and the settler must necessarily have a larger holding if he is going to settle and attract population to that section of the country. I could give the names of people who have resided on their farms in northern Ontario for the last fifteen years and still have no transportation facilities. They have no road facilities. About twenty years ago the provincial government opened the land along the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway and along the Canadian Northern railway, comprising an area of 5,000 square miles. I believe that that was a very bad scheme, but the provincial government is yearly spending a considerable sum of money on it. The northern development branch department spends nearly $5,000,000 a year on it, but even with that enormous expenditure, on account of the thinly settled population and the very large areas to be settled there are still many people suffering under the present colonization scheme that we have in that section.

I believe we should have two separate departments in the provincial government, one dealing with lands and the other with forests. The two departments are at present combined, but I think it would be much better for northern Ontario to have them divided so that more attention could be given to all the problems pertaining to colonization. I am making these points as clearly as I can so that the house will realize that colonization or immigration schemes, as was said by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Adshead), are almost a provincial matter. The provinces should have something to say about bringing a large immigration into any section of the country.

Coming to the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for North Vancouver, I believe that his proposal is the very negation of his amendment. In his amendment he mentions that in some sections of Alberta people are settled far away from transportation facilities and do not enjoy the benefits of schools and hospitals, but almost in the very same breath he delivers a speech in which he wants the government to spend $30,000,000 a year for the next ten years to maintain a situation which he considers bad. I know that it is a bad situation to place the farmers away from the facilities of civilization, schools, hospitals, good roads and the like. I think the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver North defeated its own end because his proposal would simply continue the present anomaly. It has been proven that Canada to-day is not able to receive a very large number of agricultural immigrants, nor are the industrial centres able to receive a very large immigration.

The new sections of our country always have great problems. In my speech on the budget I made allusion to the fact that last fall the premiers of Ontario and Quebec called a conference of the newsprint interests to see what could be done for the industry. We are all familiar with the fact that in that industry there has been surplus production, and one of the first results of that over-production was that the prices were reduced to the producer. One thing that surprised me was that the pulpwood producer was not present at these conferences. Immediately the price of newsprint was lowered, the price of pulpwood paid to the settler was lowered, and last winter we had this anomaly, that in one section companies were cutting their own wood at a cost of $12 a cord and at the same time were paying $5.75 a cord to the settler. I should be the last man to advocate price fixing, but there is too much of a spread between the actual price paid to the settler and the actual cost to these big industries. If the government see fit to protect industry, I think they could also see fit to protect the primary producer, who is the settler. Pulpwood is the first crop in our section. In the last fifteen years I do not remember a year, unless it was at the end of the war, when farmers were making a dollar out of their pulpwood. Statements have been made in the provincial house that the settler is the enemy of the forest. He is not. He wants eventually to get at the land. and if in the meantime he received a fair remuneration for cutting pulpwood he would be the first man to protect the forest; but in order to get at his land so as to make a living off it as soon as possible, he destroys the forest as fast as he can. There is also the fact that in our pulwood industry and in our lumber camps a lot of men are receiving only $40 and $45 a month. The father of a family cannot live on such a wage. After paying rent and clothing for his family there is nothing left. I have seen a good many settlers in northern Ontario leave on account of the fact that they could not make a living wage, and having done so they spread the rumour that that section of the country is not fit for cultivation.

It has been mentioned quite often—I believe it was stated during the discussion—that the solution of our colonization problem will be brought about by the imposition of a higher tariff. I do not believe that our friends opposite are quite serious when they say that, especially applying it to a new country such as new Ontario. It must be realized that our settlers cannot be expected to manufacture their products and ship them and compete in the markets of the world with a high tariff. Surely our friends opposite do not realize the situation. Would they like to have a higher tariff against newsprint, or against the mining industry? I believe they are simply talking about something to which they have not given very careful consideration. One of the things that has kept many people away from that country is the cost of manufacture of the goods which they have to buy. The same thing applies to the agricultural population. We cannot expect in this country to bring in hundreds and thousands of people every year and place them on farms and enable them to have fair prices for their products. We read that we have shiploads of wheat all ready to be unloaded but that on account of over-production they cannot be unloaded. We know that last year western farmers produced a very heavy crop, but to-day they are getting a lower price for it than they did the previous year. The policy of the government should not be for larger immigration, but for quality rather than quantity.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, while I cannot agree with the amendment that has been placed before the house by the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae), I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating him on giving to the house a well thought out scheme of dealing with our very important immigration problem. I think the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) stated during his debate that while he has been the subject of a great deal of criticism from time to time, the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for North Vancouver is the first constructive suggestion that he has received. I am sure the house will agree with me when I say that the hon. member for North Vancouver must have given a great deal of time and thought to this question, and must have gone to a great deal of expense to develop the scheme which he has placed before us.

So far as I am concerned, I must say that I cannot agree with that scheme, first because we are still quite young out in Alberta, and we have hopes that if we live to a reasonable age we will some time in the not too distant future get control of our natural resources. I am not in favour of delegating to the Dominion government the control of a vast area in the province of Alberta for the purposes of colonization. That is something about which the province should have a great deal to say, especially with regard to the number and class of settlers that they admit. In the second place, I think the member for North Vancouver was wrong in directing his amendment only against the Department of Immigration. If we had to deal only with the amendment it might be very hard to vote against it, but it is the scheme that is outlined in connection with the amendment to which I take objection. The amendment says in part:

> This house regrets the failure of the government to profit by Canadian experience in the colonization and settlement of the country and deplores the fact that men and women have, during recent months, been settled on western Crown lands at great distances from transportation, educational, hospital and other facilities, thereby making it almost impossible for them to achieve success and happiness in their new surroundings.

With that part of the amendment I think every hon. member will heartily agree, and if that policy had been adopted in the early settlement of the country I am sure we would have met with a great deal more success. It is too late now to go back to the older settled portions of the country in order to apply some of the ideas which the hon. member for North Vancouver has laid before the house. However, some of them might be adopted yet, by applying block settlement in the undeveloped sections of our country. I do not believe it is fair to the new settler to allow him to go at random hundreds of miles from the railway and then leave him stranded there, because if that is done he will not be able to make a success.

Coming now to the latter part of the amendment:

> —and is of the opinion that such conditions can only be remedied by immediate reorganization of the Department of Immigration and Colonization.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the reorganization of the Department of Immigration and Colonization will not remedy the situation. This amendment should have been directed either against the whole government, or against the Department of the Interior, which has the mapping and blocking out of the homesteads. Once those lands are blocked out and put on the market, as it were, for settlers, I take it that the Immigration and Colonization Department is not responsible.

The hon. member for North Vancouver in outlining this scheme, as I understood him, said that in this block settlement a settler would receive a homestead at possibly a valuation of $1,500 for improvements; that with concentration this territory would develop very rapidly, the land would soon reach the value of improved land in older settled districts, and I think he mentioned a sum of approximately $30 an acre. In my opinion Mr. Speaker, if that plan were adopted it would mean an exodus from our older settled districts, because the man who was heavily involved, who had a heavy debt hanging over him, would be certainly well advised to throw up his farm, go into this new district and take up land where he would have an overhead of only $1,500 to start with, in the knowledge that within a very short time, because of this concentrated development, the value of the land would increase to approximately $30 an acre.

If there is any criticism to make in regard to the government, I would say that they have not attributed to this immigration problem the importance it deserves, because until the present minister was appointed the Department of Immigration and Colonization did not have a minister of its own. It was treated more or less as a subsidiary.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the immigration question in Canada is one of the most important problems that we are faced with to-day. When we consider Canada as a young, practically undeveloped country, covering a vast area, in fact greater in area than that of the United States, with immense natural resources, capable of sustaining a population of almost unlimited numbers and at the present time with only nine or ten million people. We are now laying a foundation for the future of this country. On the foundation we are laying to-day will depend the future, and therefore to my mind the matter assumes a very great importance. With reference to criticisms of the government, I want to give credit where it is due, and I believe the present Minister of Immigration has perhaps a greater conception of what the farmer is up against than any other minister who has held that portfolio. I can say that our farm organization passed resolutions congratulating him on having limited the number of settlers brought in under the railway agreement, and I am sure that from this corner of the house at any rate he will not be criticised, at least for maintaining some restrictions on the numbers and classes of immigrants coming into the country.

There is hardly a public man in Canada to-day who, in making a speech, does not refer to the great natural resources with which this Dominion is blessed, and anyone who cares to go into that subject can certainly make a very fine presentation. But I sometimes wonder whether we are honest with ourselves, whether we are sincere when making these statements, whether we really believe them, when after boasting about these great natural resources we turn around and offer people inducements to come to the country and share those resources with us. It seems to me to be something like the man trying to sell gold dollars for pennies; because if we write and tell these people about our great natural resources and then offer them inducements to come to Canada, the first thought that occurs to them is this: If those people are so anxious to get rid of those resources there must be something wrong.

We hear a good deal these days about keeping the present farm population on the farms, and this has reference very largely to the desire to retain the boys and girls in the rural communities. Well, one of the most important things that can contribute to bringing this about is the raising of the standard of living on the farm, and unless we are able to do this it is difficult to keep the boys and girls from drifting into the cities. Our organizations in the west have been doing a great deal in an endeavour to raise the standard of the social and economic life of the farmers, just so that we may do what every person is anxious to do, namely, to keep on the old homestead those who are best fitted to develop the country. But while we are doing that, on the one hand, there is on the other a tendency on the part of certain interests in the country to flood Canada with a type of people from certain parts of Europe who have a much lower standard of living than we are accustomed to here. The result is that what we are doing with one hand we are undoing with the other. I do not think we shall ever make much progress by following such a system.

[Mr. Lucas.]

The idea seems to prevail in many quarters that we need an increased population in Canada. With that idea I have no quarrel. But I am throroughly convinced that we are never going to increase the population of this country very rapidly by specializing in the immigration of farmers. The whole trend at the present time is from rural to urban life and industry. During the last twenty years in the United States the rural population has decreased 5,500,000 in number. According to the Bureau of Agricultural Economy, the farm population of the United States in 1909 was 32,000,000, and in 1929, 27,511,000. Now let us take the figures in Canada. Going back to the year 1870, we find that the percentage of rural population was at that time 69; in 1901, it had decreased to 63 per cent, and in 1925 it was 50½ per cent. But in the United States while the farming population has decreased in such large numbers we find nevertheless that the proportion of agricultural exports has greatly increased. The same authority informs us that in 1909 the percentage of exportable agricultural products was 14.8; in 1923 it was 16 per cent, and in 1925, 18.2 per cent.

I am of the opinion, with reference to increasing production in Canada, that with the present farm population we have, and with the increased efficiency of machinery—because we are rapidly approaching the power farming age—our farmers, if given fair markets, could very materially increase their production of wheat; and when we consider that we produced this year over 500,000,000 bushels of wheat, it seems to me that we are going to increase this product at a more rapid rate than consumption will take care of. Our problem is the relation of efficiency in production to farm population.

What I object to in connection with this immigration question is the fact that everyone seems to be anxious to increase the population by bringing in more farmers, but no one wants to bring in anyone who will compete in other walks of life. So far as the immigration policy is concerned, I should be willing to throw it open to those people who would like to come here and share the country with us; but certainly no discrimination should be shown in endeavouring to bring farmers alone. We notice in the papers today that the price of wheat for the first time in years has dropped below the dollar mark on the American market, and if the scheme is put into force, which the hon. member for North Vancouver has laid before the house, for bringing in another few million farmers for settlement within a few years in the Peace River country, one can readily visualize the result. And I feel it would not be fair to those farmers whom we have at the present time.

I think our federal government should take full control of the immigration policy and not delegate it to any other organization such as the railways. There is no doubt about it that the railways are anxious to bring in more immigrants. Increased production means increased business for them; and they get the same cost for hauling a bushel of wheat, irrespective of what the farmer gets for it, whether he gets any profit, or what quality of wheat is shipped. We can therefore readily understand why the railway companies are anxious to bring in new settlers. But if we flood this country with agriculturists and the price of farm produce drops below a remunerative basis, then it simply means that these people will move into the cities and we shall be in a worse position than when we started. I believe that the very best immigration policy any country can have is one that produces a prosperous, contented settler. We are spending at least five million dollars through the department, and there are other organizations, such as the railways and the provincial governments, which are also spending large sums. But our Dominion government is spending this year approximately $5,000,000. The figures are $3,462,000 in the regular immigration estimates, and under the item "soldier and general land settlement" we have $1,400,000 for general settlement, advances and cost of administration. That is given as the expenditure in connection with the colonization of the settlers brought to this country. My contention is that if a sufficient amount of that $5,000,000 was expended to place fairly before the world the possibilities of the resources of Canada—

Mr. FORKE: When the estimates come up I will be able to show that the amount expended in securing immigrants is only $1,404,483.

An hon. MEMBER: Is the rest for salaries of officials?

Mr. LUCAS: In that case the minister must have a tremendous overhead in his department.

Mr. FORKE: There are many other services besides immigration.

Mr. LUCAS: We have endeavoured to reestablish our soldiers by placing them on the land, and as the minister knows, many of them are struggling along and it is very doubtful whether many of them will ever be able to come through. I believe that if the government would spend a sufficient amount of money to place properly before the world the advantages which Canada offers, and leave it at that, and then spend this $5,000,000 in order to reduce the soldiers' indebtedness, it would go a long way towards keeping many of the returned men upon the land. They would be there permanently and I believe it would be much more advantageous to spend the money in that way than practically to throw it away as we are doing at the present time.

Mr. HARRY J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to deal with this question of immigration in a general way or to direct general criticisms against the department. We all remember the opening remarks of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) when he undertook to reply to the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae). He said that one of the peculiarities of his department was that he had no idea from what quarter he might expect an attack. I think he realizes, as we all do, that the Department of Immigration is open to strong criticism from almost every quarter. This afternoon an hon. gentleman opposite directed criticism towards the plans or schemes evolved by this government during the last four or five years, and I intend to confine my remarks to one of those suggested plans or schemes.

There is a natural desire on the part of Canadians to settle this country, as far as possible, with people of British origin, and I am sure many hoped that success would follow the adoption of the plan known as the three thousand family scheme, which was backed by the British government. I do not say that that scheme has entirely failed, but I do claim that it would have been more successful had it been fairly and wisely administered. This plan or any plan will be successful only so long as we keep faith with the people who are brought to this country. Through letters and interviews I have had directed to my attention the conditions which surround some twenty or more families in my district, and I do not think my district is different from any other in Canada. From the evidence produced in these cases I have come to the conclusion that people have been brought to this country under misrepresentations, and that the conditions which surround them at the present time are almost unbearable. I should like the house to bear with me for a moment while I read what some of these families have to say. Just note the reception this family received:

We arrived in Canada in May, 1926, our destination unknown, other than somewhere round Vancouver; arrived at Winnipeg, informed destination Haney—arrived at Haney—taken to Whonnock—10 miles east—to the property known as "Reid property", we being the fourth since the board took it over, one of these being a Jap. Needless to say what a Jap could not make go, a Britisher need not try in the line adopted. The holding was 6¼ acres including buildings, house, creek and bush. Mostly gravel—not quite what one would suggest as suitable for mixed farming (what we came out to do) and keep a family of five.

That is the experience of one of the families which were brought out by this department under the three thousand family scheme. The problems which have been placed before these people are practically unworkable. Another man writes and says:

I have got about 25 acres of cleared land, 20 acres of lake, which is no good at all, and 59 acres second grown bush and stumps. I might say the 25 acres of cleared land is entirely run out and it will take qute five years to get it back into shape. The price is $5,800, which I am sure is twice its value.

Another man writes:

I have erected a silo and also spent upwards of $3,000, never leaving the place. The description of place is 25 acres of lake, which is no earthly good and only 25 acres cleared, and 54 acres are bush and stump. The price is $4,800, which I am sure is twice its value. The cleared land being completely run out. With luck and no failure of crop at a big reduced price we could perhaps struggle through.

Another man writes:

Well my trouble is that the land we are settled on is far above the value that was stated in the old country and I find it impossible to make a living on the farm at the present price as we do not get returns for our produce to meet the payments by half.

Those are a few of the many letters which I have received. There is another settlement to which I wish to refer, and one which I think the minister is well acquainted with; the Scotch settlement on the Amiens farm near Gifford, British Columbia. Fifteen families are located on this farm, having been brought to this country under the scheme during the years 1925, 1926 and 1927. These settlers were no doubt proud of the fact that a brother Scot was the head of the department of the government which had brought them to this country. They felt that under those conditions they would at least receive a square deal. They are of a very intelligent class, and realizing the position in which they have been placed they organized themselves into a body and conducted their negotiations with the department in a businesslike manner. I have before me a number of letters directed to the minister, and I should like to refer to one written in February, 1928, and directed to the land settlement branch. In my opening remarks I mentioned that I was convinced that a number of people had been brought to this country under misrepresentations, and the statements made in these letters verify that charge. This letter reads as follows:

We would refer you to a memo headed, "memo re settlement of fifteen Scottish families in dairy farming, British Columbia", a copy of which was given to several of our number by your agents in Glasgow. There are a number of statements in this memo which are absolutely false and others are grossly misleading. We would refer to them in detail.

The statement was made: "This farm was successfully operated as a dairy farm along modern lines by the Hygienic Dairy Company of Vancouver." This was absolutely untrue as any who were shareholders in the concern can testify. It so happens that two of our number are acquainted with people in the old country who put money into it and got nothing out of it.

Another part says: "The property has been subdivided into fifteen farms of approximately thirty acres each & etc." This is untrue and would lead one to believe that all boundary fences had been erected, whereas the settlers after coming here had to erect all the boundary fences between the different holdings, as well as build bridges to carry farm wagons and loads.

Under the heading of "Soils and Crops", it says: "The soil is uniform throughout", and that it is "very fertile" and produces large yields of grain, hay, potatoes & etc.". Some of us have had two crops and others one crop off the land and it is beyond our comprehension how anyone with even the most elementary knowledge of agriculture can say such things. The crops have not even been average crops with the possible exception of Timothy hay and that is of little use as a feed for dairy cows. With regard to the statement that the "soil is uniform throughout", we should like to know how it is that the prices per acre of different holdings vary so much, and if, as the Superintendent of the Vancouver office says, these holdings were valued by an independent advisory committee, why, with such information as to prices, was such a statement put in the memo?

It futher states "Drainage is provided by the creek which runs through the farm and large exterior ditches which are maintained by the provincial government. Isolated small parts of the farm requiring additional drainage can readily be remedied." Care is taken that no information is given that the cost of the ditches & etc., are a direct charge against the land and amount to fully $1.50 per acre. In this connection also it has been noted that the dyking charges amount to $1.90 per acre in addition to above. This information also was carefully left out. The statement that isolated small parts requiring additional drainage can readily be remedied is untrue. The whole place needs drainage. The enclosed photographs were taken on 12/1/1928. The holdings below the water are valued at $190 and $195 per acre and taxes (dyking, drainage and municipal) amount to $5.20 per acre per annum.

Then again:

The statement is also made that the British Columbia Electric Railway provides an hourly service to Vancouver. That is untrue. There are only three trains each way daily.

And further:

We would draw your attention particularly to the following:—land prices and taxation.

Land is valued to us at far above its economic value. Prices of holdings range from $153 to $200 per acre. The combined municipal, dyking and drainage taxes work out at fully $5 per acre per anum and these are more likely to increase than decrease. Holdings in this vicinity can be rented easily for $10 per acre.

. . . This land with taxes works out at about $20 per acre per anum, inclusive of stock and equipment loan and insurance.

In regard to the £300 which is advanced by the British government this is what they say:

The loans of £300 per settler granted by the British government are not being unfairly disbursed. All booklets et cetera issued at home indicated that this sum would be available for each settler but we now find that not more than $7,500 can be debited to any settler's account. This means that settlers with larger holdings or higher priced land get a smaller loan for stock and equipment than those with cheaper or smaller holdings. The maximum accommodation supplied is for eight cows and two horses per holding and no settler however competent can ever hope to make full anual payments, purchase necessary feed and live, off that stock.

They conclude their letter by saying:

In conclusion, we would again urge you strongly to set up an inquiry into the matters here. This would reveal a state of affairs which goes to make land settlement under Dominion government auspices at least in British Columbia one of the foulest blots on the union jack since slavery was abolished. If you cannot undertake to have this done in face of all the facts we have put before you, would you kindly make transportation arrangements for ten or twelve families from this settlement back to the old land where we know we can get everything fair and aboveboard and without any deceitful practices.

They have written a number of letters, and they complain that they have not had a reply to many of them. They have pressed continually for some kind of investigation. In a letter dated March 5 last, they draw to my attention the following:

In Colonel Rattray's letter of 3rd March, 1928, he made mention of a plan which he was formulating for the purpose of assisting us, and again, in Overseas Settlement Department's letter, dated 5th April, 1928 and Lord Lovat's letter of 23rd April, 1928, the statement is made that the Land Settlement branch had prepared a plan for putting this settlement on a successful basis. That plan has never been divulged to us.

On June 8 of last year, while these estimates were under consideration, I drew to the attention of the minister the condition of this settlement and he promised me that an officer of the department would be sent immediately to British Columbia and that these matters would be adjusted. Major Ashton arrived about the latter part of July for the purpose of making a report. About two weeks ago I asked the minister for a copy of the report which I received along with a letter from the minister dated May 13. This report is headed "An up-to-date statement of conditions regarding the Scots settlement". Still in that report no plan of relief has been disclosed, so that the situation has not been relieved up to the present time. The minister points out in his letter that these settlers have already received preferential treatment as compared with Canadian citizens purchasing adjoining property at Amiens. I should like to point out that they have not received what might be termed preferential treatment, apart from the fact that their payments of principal and interest of 5 per cent are amortized and spread equally over twenty-five years, whereas Canadian citizens pay 10 per cent of the purchase price down, the balance bearing interest at 6 per cent and being repayable in equal instalments spread over a period of twenty years. Then the minister points out that it might be interesting to note that a certain gentleman has purchased one of these holdings of 38.5 acres and has paid $10,000 cash for it. This happens in almost every community. Some man may come along who has a good deal of money and can afford to pay more then than the man who intends to pay for the land out of the production. I happen to know of this Mr. Menaul who paid the $10,000. He was an Irishman who had accumulated considerable wealth retailing milk in Pasadena, California. He was born under the union jack and he declared that he was going to die under it. He came into this country to live in his retirement and he wanted to farm as a hobby, at a profit if possible. This is the man who purchased this land and whom the minister points out to me in comparison with these men who have settled on holdings on this particular piece of property. But the report of the real estate man to the minister is not quite correct. I find that in the purchase of this property by this gentleman there were included sixty tons of hay at a value of $14 a ton, also $500 worth of equipment under the bill of sale and a house on the property costing over $2,500. This house is quite modern, has electric light, hot and cold water, bathroom, cistern, sinks, water filters, and so forth. Such facilities are hardly comparable with those on the property for the accommodation of these settlers. The commissioner's report states:

> Regarding the Scots settlement on the old hygienic dairy farm (Amiens), near Gifford, B.C., I would report that though these holdings are sound farm units; the situation there is unsatisfactory; particularly with regard to the attitude of the Scots settlers towards the financial responsibilities they have undertaken in connection with their holdings. This situation is clearly indicated by the action of a number of these settlers who had live stock purchased for them on the under standing that specified amounts from their monthly cream cheques were paid to our Vancouver office in reduction of their indebtedness and had made specific assignments to that end.

In reply to that I should like to point out that no settler was made aware by the Soldier Settlement Board, before signing a land agreement or purchasing a family cow, that such assignment was required, nor did he understand fully what was really meant; otherwise not one of those land agreements would have been signed. In most cases settlers had three or four cows and were then confronted with a demand for an assignment before further stock and equipment would be purchased. They point out that clause 2 of the agreement of sale states quite explicitly that no demand for payment would be made until the 2nd October following the settler signing the agreement. One man points out that he came out in 1926 and a demand was made in September 1926, when it should not have been made until October, 1927. The commissioner says that the general attitude of these families is based on the old adage, that "the wheel that squeaks the most gets the most grease." I have known this community, I have visited them and been in touch with them ever since I first heard of their troubles, and I find that their general attitude is this: "Right is might" and "British justice shall prevail."

The commissioner in his report shows that these people were induced to come to Canada through misrepresentation. That was one of the charges that this community made to the minister. I should like to quote what the commissioner says in regard to that. Referring to these memoranda which were supplied to them overseas, he says:

> There are statements in the letter and pamphlet that are capable of an interpretation which is not in keeping with the facts. Unfortunately, too, other statements are incorrect.

The commissioner, therefore, who was sent out to investigate this settlement, corroborates the charges made in these letters which I have read. The charge of misrepresentation is backed up by the minister's own commissioner whom he sent out to investigate.

[Mr. Barber.]

In regard to the properties on which these people are placed, they are valued too high, and as a result the settlers cannot hope to pay for them. The whole question comes down to this, that the minister cannot expect to place these settlers on property that is valued simply from a real estate standpoint. The property should be valued on the basis of production.

I have pointed out that these men have been brought in under this scheme through misrepresentation. They are expected to meet total charges against their land amounting to from $20 to $21 an acre per year and keep their families. Many of them have suffered great hardships in order to meet their obligations. One man told me that he had a wife and seven children—

Mr. FORKE: Surely the hon. member knows that these men are not paying anything at the present time.

Mr. BARBER: And they are not going to pay until they get a settlement.

Mr. FORKE: They cannot be undergoing very great hardship when they are not paying anything at all.

Mr. BARBER: These payments ceased only last spring.

Mr. FORKE: They should be doing fairly well.

Mr. BARBER: One man, a real good Scot right from the minister's own country, with a wife and seven children, came out under the minister's scheme and the assignment of his milk cheque left him only three or four dollars a month. He told me with tears in his eyes that he and his family had lived on bread and tea for weeks at a time. Another man told me that in 1927 he paid $483 to the board and received a credit of $34 on principal, the balance going for interest and other charges, and he had records to show this.

In view of all these conditions, the commissioner still says that their attitude is based on the old adage, that "the wheel that squeaks the most gets the most grease". If the minister —who has boasted that he is a Scotch settler, and I am sure we are proud of that fact were himself obliged to experience the conditions under which these men are trying to make good, and were loaded down with the burdens that they bear, he would certainly do some spuealing too.

In conclusion I would say that the cases which I have dealt with prove that people are being brought to this country under conditions that are not desirable and not in the best interests of immigration. It is, in other words, mighty poor advertising. These people write to their friends in the old country describing the conditions under which they are suffering, and this is bound largely to counteract any benefit that might come from the expenditure set aside by the minister each year for publicity.

While the minister was in my district last year I suggested that he call in and see these settlers at the Amiens farm settlement on his way to Vancouver, but he refused. There was only one conclusion I could come to, and that was that while he was perhaps proud of his race, at the same time he feared them.

In order to establish settlers satisfactorily in this country it is necessary that we should do so on a sound economic basis. That brings me to a resolution which was passed just the other day at the convention of the provincial branch of the Canadian Legion held at Chilliwack. It deals with the settlers under the Soldier Settlement Board, and reads:

> That as the Soldier Settlement Board has failed to establish settlers on an economic basis, we do ask that the appointment of a royal commission to enquire into the reasons for failure and find out a remedy for this condition. We would point out that the total abolition of interest is an integral part of such a remedy, interest already paid to be applied to wiping out the principal and such further relief as equity and fair dealing would show to be necessary as to the unpaid principal. And this convention goes on record as pledging its support to the soldier settler problem both morally, financially and aggressively until such time as a committee to be appointed by the Canadian Legion is satisfied that a sufficient measure of relief has been granted.

I hope the minister will take into consideration the importance of dealing with these people in a fair and honest way so that they may become good and satisfied citizens of our country.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I think the speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Barber) is the best possible argument against the adoption of the scheme proposed by the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae).

Mr. BARBER: It is already adopted.

Miss MACPHAIL: Then why get into another? If we can get out of the thing we are in, let us not try it again. I thought on Sunday that I would read something that was heavy and yet something with humour, and so I read the speech of the hon. member for North Vancouver containing his proposal and the minister's reply, and in them I got both food for thought and a good deal of amusement. The hon. member for North Vancouver has certainly studied the subject, but he has studied it as some people have studied farming—from an arm chair. He talks like a promoter to me. His speech read like a prospectus. It would almost convince one who knew that the thing would not work. I have no doubt at all that the hon. member for North Vancouver is very honest, very clever, and a very estimable gentleman, but he talks of these farmers as though they were inanimate objects, and sometimes I think that farmers must be almost inanimate objects or they would do something to this House of Commons. I wish they could sit in the galleries and hear the words of wisdom that drop frm the lips of hon. members. It seems a pity that such wisdom should be entirely lost. At least the farmers would learn from them a lot about farming that they never learn in actual experience. By listening to the speech of the hon. member for North Vancouver—a lengthy and careful speech, which I did not hear as I was not in the house, and I do not know whether or not he read it; there seems to have been some question about that—they would certainly have heard much about farming that they had never heard before. I say again that the arguments made by the member for Fraser Valley are the best possible arguments that could be made against his scheme. After having read his argument carefully and having read the amendment I could not see that the one bore any relation to the other. That may be because I am stupid, or because there was no relation between them. When I vote against the amendment it is not that I am voting against the amendment but against the scheme.

I am very glad that we still have some unsettled fertile land in Canada that has not yet been broken up and is overgrown with weeds. Let us have it there until we can make good use of it. I am not in too great a hurry to do it. I say that the farm is not a paying proposition and anybody who believes it is should try it and see whether it is the paying proposition that these clever gentlemen think it is before we bring in more farmers to compete with those already here. To do so is not sound sense. To-day farming is a hobby which is pursued by about three classes of people—by the class of people who have made a lot of money out of other people which they do not know what to do with; by people who farm because they like it so much that they would rather do that and make less money than do something else and make more; by people who are caught by force of circumstances from which they cannot free themselves. I think that covers the lot. As a farm representative I could not sit silent while a lot of what I think was poor twaddle was being talked. I had prepared a speech on immigration, and I filed it away so carefully that I cannot now locate it, so I shall only speak briefly and say what I feel should be said.

As a farmer representative I cannot help to put over a scheme which will still further lower the standard of living on farms. If we want to make Canada more prosperous, then let us bring in lawyers. I do not know of anything we need more in order that their services will not cost so much. Let us bring in more doctors; let us bring in bricklayers and carpenters; let us bring in judges; let us bring in people who are well paid, and let us share our prosperity with them. But let us not bring in people and try to put them on farms where people like my people, who are pioneers, cannot make a decent living on the land, and every one in the house who knows anything about farming knows that that is true. What is the use of bringing in more people to put them in a condition like that? What we are actually doing through our general policy in Canada is to over-industrialize Canada instead of trying to help agriculture. The manufacturers, transportation people and bankers are the people who get the best break in Canada. Our immigration policy reminds me of a person who is constantly having a hemorrhage of his purest blood and trying to keep his health up by having a blood infusion. It is poor preventive medicine, but that is the kind of thing we are doing in the Dominion of Canada.

Who are the people who want immigrants? The railways want immigrants. The banks want immigrants. The manufacturers want immigrants, and there are a few farmers who want cheap labour and think they can get it that way. These people who want immigrants want to bring in more and more of them, and the greener the immigrant the richer the harvest. I think if your take those groups of people out you would not have anybody who wanted to pour immigrants into this country.

I had the privilege of addressing some sixty gatherings in western Canada last year, and twenty odd in Ontario, and I found that the people were more interested in this subject than any other. If you could have heard some of the real farmers laugh at the members of parliament over this subject, and at the government—well it was refreshing to my soul.

I want to propose an immigration policy for the Minister of Immigration. I do not want to be destructive, so I will attempt to be constructive. I would not spend one dollar of state money on immigration—not a dollar. I would do nothing to induce people to come to this country. The Minister of Immigration has stated that the most of what he heard was destructive, not constructive. I should like to recall to the mind of the minister this very proposal that was made time without number in our own caucuses and at our own conferences before he saw fit to cross the floor of the house, and had he taken with him the wisdom he found there he would be even a better minister of immigration than he is—and at that he is better than the one we had before. That is the opinion that is held by farmers throughout Canada. They do not want to see money spent on immigration. I remember a speech that was made one time, quite near morning, by the member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). I am not sure whether it was in 1922 or 1923, but if the Minister of Immigration wants to read about farm conditions let him get that speech and read it. I have not heard as good a speech on the subject since.

If I were going to spend any money on immigration I would spend every bit of it on inspection, inpecting those who come into Canada, in order to see that we got the very best. And I would not go fishing for those, either, telling them a whole lot of things that have not even a resemblance to the truth. I remember last year the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) stating that domestics were induced to come to Canada by telling them there were three hundred thousand surplus men in Canada. What a terrible disappointment must have awaited some of the new women! But if we are to have immigrants coming into this country I would have a very rigid examination of them to see that they were physically healthy and that they were mentally sound, We have not had a careful enough or rigid enough inspection of the people that we have let into Canada in the last few years, although I think it has been a little more rigid than it was before. But even yet, if some of the specimens I have seen coming in this year are general, then all the worse for Canada. And so I would be very, very careful about the kind of people that we let in. But as a farmer representative in this house I must again protest about having only farmers and domestics come in. Let all classes come in who want to come if they are physically and mentally fit, and I would not restrict it to any one nation. What we need in this country is a virile people, people who are not afraid to face the climate we have or afraid to face any condition, and who can adapt themselves to new environment.

The wheat crop of the world for 1928 exceeded the crop of 1923, which was a bumper crop by 300,000,000 bushels. We need not go on thinking that we can continue increasing our output of wheat without affecting the price of wheat, as I think wheat prices are beginning to show. I want to quote very briefly from a speech made by George McIvor, who is the general sales manager of the Canadian wheat pool. He says:

> I do not wish to overemphasize the large production of grains in 1928, as the other side of the picture, namely, the very heavy consumption of wheat this year, is very important, but I do wish to make it perfectly clear that the supply of bread grains relative to the demand for same is considerably larger than last year and, of course, it naturally follows that the supply will be disposed of at lower prices than those prevailing a year ago.

Any sensible person who knows that if you increase and increase your production you will finally decrease or lower your prices. People after all can eat only so much, and while it is true that when the standard of living begins to rise in the oriental countries there will be more bread grains consumed there, it is also true that as the standard of living goes even higher, as it is in this country and some other countries, less bread grains are consumed. The people use other things, and do not consume as much wheat as they did before.

A farmer who lives in my constituency was telling of an amusing experience he had with immigrants, and as a matter of fact this experience was rather coming to him. Last winter we had a long discussion on this subject of immigration. He still thought that it was a very good thing for the man who owned the land to bring in immigrants in order that he might get someone cheap to work for him, and so he proceeded to test out his own theory. He got quite a good looking and really clever fellow, an immigrant. He was to stay a year. He came in the fall, stayed until the beginning of seeding and then left. He tried for another, and one came to his town and he went out to get him. It was a cold and blue sort of day. The farmer met the boy, for he was nothing more than that, and brought him to where his team and wagon were and told him he would be back in a moment. When he came back the boy was missing. They instituted a search and located him. When they got near him he took to his heels and fled, and that was the last of him. So he tried a third one, and he told me without any hesitation at all that he wished heartily this last one would follow the example of his predecessor. That is his experience, and he is now coming round to my position on the immigration problem.

I am not going to quote resolutions passed by farm organizations; the Minister of Immigration is familiar with them. He knows the position of agriculture in the matter, and as this is an immigration policy that affects agriculture, then agriculture should be consulted; they should have the say as to what is to be done. As soon as other classes are willing that their numbers should be added to from other countries then they have the right to say what is to be done, but not until then.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, before the question is put there are a few things that I desire to say, more particularly as this question of immigration has been one of great interest to the farmers of the west, and especially to the farmers of Alberta. They have taken such a keen interest in this question that they have never failed to notify the department from time to time, through their conventions, as to what their ideas in respect to the matter were, and I am going to take a few minutes before the question is put to emphasize to the minister and to the house one or two of the points which perhaps have not been brought out by previous speakers as definitely as they might have been.

I note, of course, that the minister is saying that he has had no constructive suggestions. I think he made an exception of the suggestion which came from the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae). But I venture to observe that certain constructive suggestions have come from the United Farmers of the west. They may have been suggestions with which he did not agree, or he may be in a position to-night or some other time to reveal the weaknesses of those suggestions. But that they were constructive there can be no doubt, and I hope if he has overlooked them so far he will take them into his serious consideration in the immediate future. One of these constructive suggestions I can put in a very brief form.

I am not certain just exactly how much is being expended on immigration. I know we are about to vote in this house approximately $7,000,000. Some of this goes to one thing and some to another; I do not know how much goes to immigration and how much to something else. Now the minister assures us to-night, in an aside, that we shall not spend much more than slightly over $1,000,000 directly on immigration. But certain it is that we are going to vote over $3,000,000 having to do with immigration. If only $1,000,000 of this sum is expended in the actual work of immigration and $2,000,000 close by or near to immigration, then the minister, I am sure, will have considerable explaining to do. But I do not think we can go beyond the vote of $3,500,000 in the estimates directly accounted for by immigration expenditures. Now here is a constructive suggestion which I would offer the minister—and it comes direct from the lips of the farmers of the west. Instead of continuing to spend that $3,500,000 in an immigration policy which, for a number of reasons, is absolutely futile, it would be far better political economy and far better for Canada as a nation if that amount were expended in assisting young Canadians who desire to take up agriculture. That, I submit, is a constructive suggestion. The minister may find some reasons why it should not be adopted; he may be able to show us its faults. So far he has not done so; so far as we can see, that $3,500,000 will continue to be spent in bringing to this country people who go out as fast as they come in. The minister has not said to us that he has given the suggestion consideration and finds it cannot be seriously entertained. However, I leave it with him as one constructive suggestion and I hope he will give us a reply, either now or during the discussion of his estimates. Before I am through I shall place on Hansard a number of resolutions passed by organizations in my own riding, as well as resolutions passed by larger organized agricultural bodies, to indicate that the question of immigration is one of great importance to them and that they do think they have at least some constructive suggestions to put forward.

May I for a moment digress to say that I am not levelling any criticism at the Department of Immigration; I fancy that department is just as efficiently run as any other. I am criticising the policy of immigration as such and I shall try to show to the minister and the house that that immigration policy does not belong to the immediate present; it is an immigration policy which had its origin in narrow class desire. There was perhaps a time in the history of Canada when that immigration policy was a great deal more serviceable than it is at the present moment, but I shall try to show that, in the light of certain developments which are now taking place in the country, to continue the present policy is utter folly.

The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) emphasized the fact that this immigration policy is a class policy. It is a class policy in its origin. It is actually believed, I understand, fairly sincerely by land speculators, that Canada will become more prosperous if more people come into the country; it is believed by railroad companies that Canada will become more prosperous if more people come in; it is believed by banks and ordinary business concerns that Canada will increase in prosperity with an increase in population. Well, we can understand these people, and perhaps from their narrow point of view it would appear to them that greater prosperity must result from an increase in population. Of course, there will be more railway tickets sold; there will be perhaps a little increase in banking; there will be more potatoes and beef and biscuits and so forth sold if our population increases in number. But looking at the question from the national point of view, it will be seen at once that this is after all a narrow class view to take of it, and those who have advocated that policy and who advocate it to-day have obviously not taken all the factors into consideration. The present immigration policy is furthermore a class policy in its effects. The Canadian policy to-day, as it is applied, is strictly speaking a class policy.

Again, the hon. member for Southeast Grey has gone so far as to point out specifically that we would not object if the Immigration department should undertake to bring in a large number of lawyers or doctors. We can apply exactly the same argument to doctors which the hon. member for North Vancouver used in reference to the prairies. The hon. member points out, and quite properly, that there are vast areas of land that can be put under cultivation, that there is a great deal of brush that might be cut, that machines could do the cutting, with immigrants to operate those machines. No one will question that; the hon. member's analysis is perfect in this respect. But might I not point out that annually we have great waves of measles, great waves of whooping cough, great waves of flu, providing any amount of work for doctors—far more doctors than we now have in Canada. It would be as wise to advocate that we should increase the number of our doctors by means of immigration because of periodic attacks of flu as it is to say that because we have large stretches of uncultivated land we should have more immigrants. That is not sound reasoning from the economic point of view; it is perfectly logical from any other standpoint, but absolutely meaningless from the economic. I suggest, then, that some consideration must be given Canada's immigration policy strictly from the economic point of view, and before I am through I shall indicate something of my meaning in that regard. It is assumed—for what reason I am at a loss to know—that agriculture can absorb almost any number of people; I believe the hon. member for North Vancouver went so far as to suggest 2,000,000 people more for the Peace River district alone. Why not make it 4,000,000? I do not see why anyone should stop at 2,000,000. If we are sure of placing 2,000,000 may we not stretch a point and make it 4,000,000?

I say it is assumed, apparently without any reason whatever, that agriculture can absorb an indefinite number of immigrants, and it is assumed, I take it, on this basis: that inasmuch as there are a great many millions of acres of land yet untilled, and many hundreds of millions of pigs yet unborn, which farmers could look after, therefore there is work for any number of farmers to do. That is the reasoning. But there cannot be an unlimited number of anything in connection with any industrial enterprise; we cannot have an unlimited number of miners, and unlimited number of carpenters, an unlimited of doctors, notwithstanding what I said a moment ago about the periodic breaking out of diseases which might provide employment, temporarily at any rate, for many more doctors than we have. These professions and classes and industrial groups cannot be increased indefinitely. How, then, is it assumed that agricultural pursuits have no limit? Who is the oracle who insists upon that philosophy? Since when has agriculture been outside the laws of supply and demand any more than carpentry or medicine? Surely no one will seriously entertain that idea. Yet there can be no other basis for such an argument. Well, if it is not true that agriculture is beyond the law of supply and demand, by what reasoning do those who advocate a continued increase in immigration, and particularly in agricultural help and agriculturists generally, come to such a conclusion as I have indicated? Just because there is land not yet cultivated? Just because there are millions of pigs yet unborn? Just because there are some places where scrub still grows? Is that an economic reason why more people should be brought in at public expense? The time has come when there should be a little more clear thinking on this question, and particularly on the part of men who come from western Canada.

Let me come now to what I regard as the important phase of the present situation. No one will deny that agriculture is passing, and indeed passing swiftly, through a period of development. When that development has been completed we will have an agricultural industry which will not be recognized when compared with what it is to-day. Agriculture is gradually becoming industrialized, and that process is always followed by organization, copitalization and specialization. I do not believe that any advice of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) or any advice out of the profound farming experience of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) will stay the natural evolutionary process of this great industry. Let me give the Minister of Immigration an illustration. I can take him to one of the most beautiful valleys in Canada.

Mr. FORKE: Is that Pipestone?

Mr. IRVINE: It is one much more beautiful than Pipestone.

An hon. MEMBER: Pipe dream.

Mr. IRVINE: And I can show him one hundred farmers who have settled along the river there. On a cold winter's morning those one hundred farmers will get up, early of course, and they start one hundred gasoline engines to pump a few buckets of water to one hundred little groups of pigs—one gasoline engine would drown every pig in the whole valley. The industry is overcapitalized and every individual farmer is impoverished. He is endeavouring to industrialize himself and at the same time to hold on to the conditions of peasantry from which the industry has evolved. I suggest that agriculture is standing at the parting of the ways. It must follow the views of the Minister of Agriculture and go back to peasantry by the route of mixed farming, or else it must go forward to organization, centralization and specialization. Which of the two is it going to follow? If we are to go forward to centralization and specialization, as I believe will be the inevitable tendency, then to bring in more farmers will either put a stress upon those whom you bring in as well as upon those who are already here, or will drag the whole thing back to the days of peasantry. It may be all very well to put another one hundred farmers into that valley and have every one of them start with a few cattle and pigs and a gasoline engine; that may be all right for the manufacturers of gasoline engines but it is not good business and it is not following the natural order of events in respect to the industrial development which is taking place before our very eyes. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that with proper organization, capitalization and specialization there is a sufficient number of farmers in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta properly to farm every foot of land in those three provinces. Instead of trying to fill up these so-called vacant lands with individuals without money and without experience or knowledge either of the country or of agriculture, if the ministers of immigration and agriculture would lend their best intelligence and direct the country's best efforts toward encouraging better organization, sounder finance, closer specialization, greater centralization and increased output with the resultant reduction in overhead, they would be filling a long-felt want of the western agriculturist. The western farmer is in the position to-day which the small business interests were in during the time of keen competition before the great mergers took place and before industrialism was so well established. I think the Minister of Immigration said something; would he kindly say it loudly enough so that I can understand him? If it is not meant for me, of course I do not want to hear it.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member has been reading Harper's Magazine.

Mr. IRVINE: No, I have not; but if it was anything like what I am saying it was very good. I commend Mr. Harper, or whoever it was wrote the article, on having been able to appreciate the situation. That is the situation as I see it with respect to agriculture in the west, and I believe that specialization and proper organization has scarcely begun.

Then there is the question of production itself. There is no doubt that if a boot and shoe factory in Canada increased its output there would be great danger of blocking the market unless the purchasing power could be increased to an amount which would equal the increase of production. The same is true of live stock, of dairy products, of horticultural products and of agricultural products, because none of them are immune from the law of supply and demand. It may be all very well for the railway companies, the banks, or organized business to make a great hip-hurrah about getting more people to come to Canada and go on the farms, but in doing that they are, first, reducing the standard of living of every farmer by increasing the supply of goods without increasing the demand; and second, the country will be flooded with immigrants, progress will be blocked and we will be back to the old Russian peasantry days. If we follow our present immigration policy we will be going towards the days of peasantry, whereas if we follow the other we will be striving for proper organization.

[Mr. Irvine.]

I should like to read to the house a few of the resolutions which have been passed within the last month or so in the riding of Wetaskiwin. The first one, passed by Pleasant Hill Local No. 608 of the United Farmers of Alberta, reads as follows:

> Resolved, that whereas, through the years we have all known cases of capable, promising, Canadian young men who wish to follow farming, but for lack of means were compelled to leave the country;
> Therefore, in our opinion, while our government is evolving plans to aid British immigrants, we believe it would be wise and fair to include in such plans as much help for Canadian boys and men who desire and possess the qualifications to settle on farms.

The organization authorized the gentleman who signed this resolution, Mr. J. P. Beach, the secretary, to forward the resolution to the Minister of Immigration, and a copy was sent to myself. A similar resolution was passed by the Lacombe Women's Institute, and is signed by Mrs. E. L. Misener, secretary. Practically the same resolution was passed by the Progressive local of the United Farmers of Alberta and was forwarded here. Another resolution was sent through the Lacombe Local. This was passed by the Lakeside Woman's Institute and is signed by Mrs. Arthur Bauer.

I have another resolution which was passed at the annual convention of the United Farmers of Canada. No doubt the minister has received a copy of this, but I do not know whether or not he regards it as a constructive suggestion. I am not going to read it as a constructive suggestion, but rather as indicating that the farmers of Saskatchewan as well as of Alberta, are not satisfied with what might be called the blind immigration policy now being followed in Canada. The resolution reads:

> Whereas this convention is opposed to the present method of securing immigrants;
> Therefore be it resolved that we urge the federal government to appoint a national commission of inquiry with just representation thereon from organized labour and organized agriculture, that shall study the problem of immigration and assimilation from every possible angle, such commission to conduct public hearings to make provision for the attendance of representative witnesses whose testimony shall be taken under oath, and to report to parliament the conclusion reached by it and make such recommendations as in its judgment it may deem proper, and that pending the findings of such a commission, no further agreement shall be entered into by the federal government with the railroads after the present agreement has expired.

In conjunction with that resolution I would make one final constructive suggestion and offer it for the minister's consideration, namely, that he drop the present immigration policy entirely. He may regard that as a destructive suggestion, but it would save a considerable amount of money even if nothing were done. As I suggested in my opening remarks, Canada would be better off from an economic point of view. Moreover, we would escape the difficulties which result from assisting immigration out of the taxes paid by the people, whose burden is now as heavy as they can bear without our bringing others here to compete with them in what they are actually producing, thus lowering their standard of living. I hope the minister will give due consideration to the suggestions that have come from this section of the house, and that the immigration policy which is now calling for at least $3,500,000, will be discontinued until such time as the government knows what is the best kind of policy to pursue.

Mr. B. W. FANSHER (East Lambton): I cannot understand why the amendment should have been moved, unless it was that the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) wished to launch a new immigration and colonization scheme, because to my mind the amendment has no bearing whatever on the argument advanced in its behalf. Why the hon. member for North Vancouver should have spent a good deal of last summer away north in the Peace River district in order to study out a scheme and find a place where assisted immigration and colonization might be put into practice, I do not understand, I think his time would have been better employed had he spent his summer vacation in old Ontario in the constituency in which he was born and brought up, West Middlesex, and there used his talents to devise ways and means to keep many of the farmers on the land in some of those older districts. But he goes away into that northern area and devises a scheme which would cost the government millions of dollars, to say nothing about the railway facilities or the roads that it would be necessary to provide.

In the old province of Ontario, where we have splendid highways and railway facilities, rural depopulation is nevertheless taking place. Why, then, should the hon. member feel it necessary to go into the remote parts of the north country in order to devise a scheme of this kind when agriculture to-day is in such a position that the farmer's son cannot establish himself upon the land in the community in which he was born and raised? In fact, agriculture in this country has never been able to establish itself upon land that it had to purchase. The first settlements in Canada were not made under the conditions of immigration that we have to-day. The early pioneers did not receive assisted passages to come to this country. They came here with the idea of establishing homes. It is true that they got free land. The first generation born upon that land had to move a little further west in order to obtain free homesteads and thus it was that settlement was effected over Ontario, thence into Michigan and the western states. The rising generation born upon the land was compelled to proceed a little further westward and there establish itself upon free land again. Hence many farmers' sons born in Ontario went to Michigan, Illinois, Iowa and other states of the union. This took place about the middle of last century. Later on, in the seventies of last century, many farmers' sons proceeded to the northwestern states, the Dakotas and Montana, and there established themselves upon free land.

In the beginning of this century hundreds of farmers' sons from Ontario, in order to carry out their desire to become farmers, had to go to the Canadian northwest in order to obtain free land. The time has now come in this Dominion when the available free land has become pretty well taken up except in the far northern areas, and to-day we are up against a new problem, one that we have never before faced in connection with immigration and colonization. Any farmer's son wishing to establish himself to-day cannot do so by obtaining free land. He has to go out into the market in order to purchase his farm. With the remuneration that is received from the industry it is almost impossible now for a farmer's son to establish himself upon a farm. Hence even in old Ontario, where we have all the facilities, hundreds of farmers' sons will not undertake the risk of going into debt to the extent of the purchase price of a farm and equipment, thus conscripting themselves, as it were, to a heavy debt for the major portion of their lives. They will rather choose other occupations where the initial cost is not so great. Thus it is that hundreds are migrating towards the cities and towns. This new condition that we are up against might as well be faced now as at any other time. We are compelled to realize that sooner or later we must make conditions such that the farmer's son who wishes to buy a farm and establish himself thereon will have some prospect of making that occupation pay. To-day the oldest or any other son of the family who wishes to get married and start upon a farm, when he counts the cost and realizes that he cannot get much financial assistance from his parents, does not care to burden himself with the mortgage necessary to purchase a farm and equipment. We must somehow or another make agriculture so profitable that the farmer's son will be prepared to undertake the purchase of a farm and implements, and until we do that it is idle to talk of any immigration scheme involving the expenditure of millions in bringing from foreign countries people who are not acquainted with our ways, climate or soil conditions.

The government of the day announced in its platform of 1919 the best immigration policy that I have ever heard announced, either in this house or out of it, but I am sorry to say that they have never carried it out. This country was hardly settled when there was placed a load on agriculture to assist every other industry under the sun. That load is there to-day, and agriculture is falling down under it. The Liberal party in 1919 had a platform which, as regards tariff planks, constituted the best immigration policy ever put forward in this country, but they failed to carry it out. If they would to-day scrap the Immigration department and, so to speak, step on the gas in implementing the tariff policy enunciated in that platform, they would do more to stimulate immigration of the agricultural classes than anything else they could undertake. The farmer is up against it to-day at every turn owing to the assisting of industry in other lines, industries that will permit no competition whatever, that will not have immigration that may affect their industry, but that are willing that the farmer shall have all the competition they can give him. At the same time the farmer must provide assistance for industry to the tune of 20, 25 or 30 per cent. Let us relieve agriculture of some of this burden. Agricultural machinery, it is true, is not taxed to any great extent, perhaps an average of 10 per cent, but many articles that are used on the farm are taxed 25 or 30 per cent and even more. Even the rough clothing that the farmer and his family wear about the farm is taxed from 30 to 35 per cent; yet the government revised the schedules only last session and left them at these ridiculously high levels. If we want to assist agriculture let us relieve it of some of the burdens it now carries for the assistance of all the other industries of this country, and we shall have done something which agriculture can appreciate and from which it will benefit. I hope the government will realize that if they would put into effect their tariff platform of 1919 they could give some relief to the farmer, and it would prove to be one of the best immigration policies that has been presented to this country in years.

Amendment negatived, on division.

Main motion (Mr. Robb) agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

[Mr. B. W. Fansher.]

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

Civil government—immigration and colonization salaries, $314,505; contingencies, $45,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the minister give us some explanation of this item?

Mr. FORKE: The details will be found on page 82. The number of employees provided for 1929-30 is 184; for 1928-29 it was 179, representing an increase of 5.

Mr. SPENCER: What are these five new employees doing?

Mr. FORKE: The increase both in the number of employees and in the amount provided for is accounted for as follows:

1 — Assistant commissioner of immigration	$ 3,120
1 — Stenographer Grade (3)	1,380
3 — Stenographers Grade (2)	3,240
5
Difference between salary voted in 1928-1929 estimates for a head clerk and salary of a chief clerk	600
Provision for annual increases	3,450
Additional salary for Deputy Minister	1,000
Total gross increase	$12,790
Less:—
Amount of adjustments due to deaths, resignations, etc., in the minor classes	3,855
Total net increase for 1929-1930	$8,935

Mr. GARDINER: May I inquire the reason for the appointment of an assistant commissioner, and what will his duties be?

Mr. FORKE: His duties will be to assist the Commissioner of Immigration. We have always had assistant commissioners.

Mr. GARDINER: Not last year.

Mr. FORKE: Oh yes. We have three, and it has been found necessary on account of the increase in the work to appoint this assistant commisisoner.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not see any provision in the estimates for an assistant commissioner last year. This is a new appointment, and I should like to know the reason for it, and what the duties of the assistant commissioner will be.

Mr. FORKE: The commissioner sometimes works twelve and fourteen hours a day, and sometimes on Sundays. He requires an assistant to help him. He has been very much overworked during the past year.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the assistant commissioner be located at Ottawa?

Mr. FORKE: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Who is the present commissioner?

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Little.

Mr. GARDINER: What does the commissioner do when the assistant is to assist?

Mr. FORKE: Of course I am not in a position to give details as to all his duties.

Mr. GARDINER: Give us some idea.

Mr. FORKE: He has charge of all the technical work in regard to immigration. We have a commissioner in the west, one in the east, and one located at Ottawa, and this new assistant will be located in Ottawa. The commissioner overlooks the whole work in regard to immigration.

Mr. GARDINER: I thought that work would have been done by the deputy minister and by the assistant deputy. Do not these gentlemen do any work?

Mr. FORKE: Most certainly.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister must have recommended this appointment to council when his estimates were before them, and surely some explanation must have been given to council as to why a new assistant commissioner was required and what his duties will be.

Mr. STEVENS: That would be in writing.

Mr. GARDINER: But the minister would surely have to give the reason for the appointment.

Mr. FORKE: The appointment was made on the recommendation of the deputy minister because of the increased work. At present the staff is overworked. I know that some of them go back after dinner many nights to do their work. The appointment is absolutely necessary.

Mr. SPENCER: What has occurred during the last year to increase the work of the department so that an assistant commissioner is needed?

Mr. FORKE: There has been increased immigration, and if my hon. friend will look through the estimates he will find other services that have brought about an increase of work. New bridges have been opened up, for instance, where immigration work has to be done. It is often overlooked that there is in the Immigration department a preventive service requiring a large number of employees. That is a work that has to be carried on even if no immigrants come in; we still have to have officers along the border for the purpose of examining those who enter the country for any purpose. There are one or two bridges on the St. Lawrence river where we require officials for that purpose. All this has increased the work of the staff.

Mr. SPENCER: Was this appointment made through the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. FORKE: Every appointment is made through the Civil Service Commission.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 28, 1929

The house met at eleven o'clock.

COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

On motion of Mr. L. S. RENE MORIN (St. Hyacinthe) the eighth report of the select standing committee on standing orders was concurred in.

NEW BRUNSWICK RAILWAY COMPANY

On motion of Mr. Morin (St. Hyacinthe): Bill No. 282, respecting the New Brunswick Railway Company was referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are called I would like to ask the Prime Minister when we may expect the supplementary estimates determining to some extent when we may be able to close our labours.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should hope by Friday of this week.

TREATIES AND CONVENTIONS MADE BY OR AFFECTING CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): May I ask the Prime Minister when there will be brought down the return showing imperial treaties and statutes having application to Canada as well as treaties negotiated by Canada herself. In view of the announcement that the committee of experts is to meet in October, some of us would like to be in a position to criticize the actions of the government in dealing with that committee, and the information I ask for forms the basis for such criticism.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my hon. friend that I was told by the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs that the task which had been assigned to the department was a very onerous one, that for some weeks he had had one or two officials of the department at work on the preparation of the material asked for, and when I spoke to him he was very doubtful as to when the work could be completed. But I will be glad to have placed at my hon. friend's disposal anything that we have up to date. His order was a large one.

Mr. CAHAN: It simply indicates the magnitude of the task the Prime Minister and others have undertaken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Quite.

REPORTS OF HARBOUR COMMISSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John-Albert): I wish to ask a question of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin). Perhaps the Prime Minister will kindly convey this question to him. When may we expect to have tabled the reports of harbour commissions? I refer more especially to the report of the harbour commission of St. John.

MOTOR AND PLEASURE BOATS

On the orders of the day:
