tion the fact that this large sum has been expended upon these important public works; when we consider that these works are absolutely necessary in order to open up channels for our trade and commerce, and render the remote portions of the country accessible for settlement, in order to develop the variety of sources of wealth which otherwise would remain dormant and useless, I feel there is no member of the House, no intelligent man in the country, who will maintain that such expenditure was either an unnecessary or an unwise expenditure. We must bear in mind, too, that at this early period in our history we have acquired a large extent of territory; and when it is borne in mind that after the lapse of only twenty years we have done so much to provide for the future growth, development and settlement of the country, it is not a matter of surprise that our debt at present should have assumed the proportions it has assumed. Hon. gentlemen, in referring to the debt of this country, speak of it as a tax which has been imposed for all future time upon the people of this country. It should be properly regarded as borrowed capital, necessary to promote the best interests of the country; it should be regarded as capital absolutely indispensable to enable us to carry on the business of the country, as an investment which will in the future repay its cost tenfold, as an investment that will so stimulate the trade and commerce of the country, so help all the various industries in the country, that it will take but a mere fraction of the vast wealth which will accrue from it in the future to our national resources, to pay both the principal and the interest on that expenditure in a very short space of time. It has been the policy of the present Government to incur a large expenditure; it has been its policy to incur large obligations abroad in order to enable it to provide for the construction of these important works; and I feel, however much hon. gentlemen may oppose this policy and denounce it in speeches here, that it is a policy which will meet with the approval of the majority of this House and the majority of the people of this country in the future as it has in the past. Hon. gentlemen have frequently, during the course of this discussion, compared the position of this country with that of the United States. We have had a variety of figures, in the course of this debate, submitted for our consideration, to show the relative rates of taxation which prevail in the two countries. I do not intend to repeat these figures or to detain the House with them at all, as they have been exhaustively dealt with by the speakers who have preceded me; but on this point I wish to say this: that, if I desired to go abroad to find proof in support of the policy of the present Administration, I should ask for no better evidence than that which is furnished by the history of the United States. From the year 1835, when railway construction first commenced upon this continent, the general government of that country has from time to time lent aid to encourage railway enterprise, and we all know that, in addition to this, it has been the policy of every State in the Union not only to tax its resources, but to pledge its credit, in order to promote the construction of railways and canals, to provide the best possible means of communication between one part of the country and the other, and to unite all the remote inland districts with the towns upon the seaboard; and there is nothing which has contributed more than the adoption of that policy towards the marvellous growth and prosperity which we have witnessed in that country. It is due, in my opinion, to that policy that they are in a position to-day to pay off their national debt with the rapidity with which they are paying it off; it is due to the adoption of that policy so early in the history of that country that they were enabled years ago to maintain for five long years one of the most bloody and exhausting and costly civil wars the world has ever seen, and since its close to liquidate the enormous debt which it caused to be incurred with a rapidity which is without a parallel in the history of the world; and at the same time the burden of taxation which was found necessary in order to enable them to accomplish this has been felt so little by the people of that country that it is borne without a murmur and it has never for a moment checked their continuous and unparalleled prosperity. If I wished to find proofs of the influence of railways and canals in increasing the wealth of and contributing to the general prosperity of a country, I should turn to the history of the State of New York. Far back in the history of that State before the age of railways, the Government of that State at the public expense constructed the Erie Canal. They united the waters of our great lakes with the waters of the Hudson, and thus formed a continuous water communication between the great west and seaboard. And what was the result of that great enterprise? Why, Sir, as soon as that canal was opened, the cost of transportation was reduced from $70 per ton to $10 per ton. A few years later, further reductions were made, until it reached $5 per ton, and the result of opening that means of communication between the west and the east was to contribute so greatly to the trade and commerce of that state that the growth in wealth and the general prosperity which followed has exceeded the most sanguine expectations of the promoters of that scheme. It was estimated that, within a few years after the completion of the Erie Canal, the value of the farm lands in the State of New York alone increased over $100,000,000, and the City of New York, outstripping all its rivals, advanced at once to the foremost position as a great commercial city. The policy which that State adopted at that yearly period in its history has been since continued and with the same results. By repeated expenditures of public money, they have from time to time enlarged and extended their canal system, they have lent liberal aid towards railway construction, and, as the result to-day, they have in the State of New York upwards of seven thousand miles of railway; and, by consolidating and extending their lines and connecting them with those of other States, they now reach to every corner of the fertile wheat fields of the west, they reach the lumber districts of the north, they reach the coal fields in Pennsylvania, they reach the cotton and corn fields in the south, and all that vast territory is made tributary to swell the volume of their trade and commerce. As the result of the policy which was adopted in the State of New York, of lending liberal public aid to the construction of railways and canals and other important public works, that State has, from that time to now, maintained its proud position as the first State in the Union, both in population and in wealth, and the great city which bears its name, has become the centre of railway enterprise upon this continent, and continued from that time to the present to control more than one-half of the entire commerce of the nation. If hon. gentlemen will study the history of the United States, not with a view of making unfair comparisons unfavorable to the position of this country, but for the purpose of seeking the causes which have contributed most largely to that prosperity, they will find there ample proof in support of the policy of the present Administration; they will find that in a new country it is a wise policy to lend liberal aid in order to form the best and most perfect means of internal communication, and that nothing more than this contributes to the rapid growth and prosperity of the country. Now we have in the Dominion of Canada all the elements which are necessary to make a great and progressive people. We have wealth in the fertile prairies of the west, we have wealth in our forests and in our mines, we have wealth in the waters which skirt our shores and fill our bays and rivers and lakes. It is the policy of the present Administration to develop as rapidly as possible these varied sources of wealth and make them all contribute to place us at an early date in a foremost position among the nations of the earth as a great agricultural and commercial people. The success of this policy is already proved by the present position of this country, that the policy of the present Administration has tended to increase wealth in this country is shown by the fact that the deposits in our chartered banks have increased from $72,000,000 in 1878 to $106,000,000 in 1885, while the savings of the poor have increased from $8,500,000 in 1878 to $35,000,000 in 1885. The growth of manufactures, as I have already stated, is amply proved by the large increase in the importations of raw material and the large relative proportion they now bear to our total trade. The increase of inter-provincial trade is shown by the traffic upon our railways, which has increased from 7,000,000 tons in 1878 to upwards of 14,000,000 tons in 1885; while our foreign trade, which, from 1873 during five successive years when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, gradually declined until in 1879 it reached its lowest point, some $64,000,000 less than it was in 1873, has since then gradually risen again, until in 1883 it reached $230,000,000, the highest point reached in the history of this country. Since that time, Sir, notwithstanding the general depression that has prevailed, and the remarkable shrinkage that has taken place throughout the world in the value of both domestic and foreign merchandise, the volume of that trade has not only been maintained, but it has actually been increased. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his remarks, referred to another subject; he referred to the fact that the late rebellion had cost us some $3,500,000, and complained that this had been charged to capital account. He referred, also, to the fact that there was nothing to represent that expenditure except the graves that had been dug on our western prairies. And, Sir, he also called attention to the fact that the population of that country had not increased as rapidly as he considered it should have done. Now, I ask any gentleman who desires to censure the Government for the cost of the late rebellion, or to censure the present Administration because the population of that country has not increased more rapidly, to reflect on this: What would have been the condition of that country at the present time, how many, and how great, would have been the misfortunes into which that country would have been plunged, had the views which hon. gentlemen opposite entertain prevailed, and had the policy which they advocate been adopted? It is well known that during the past few years we have passed through a critical period in the history of this country. For a young country, with its resources undeveloped, we have undertaken public works of enormous magnitude. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company had undertaken the construction of that great national work, and had made fair progress with it when they found it necessary to appeal to the capitalists of New York and London for aid, in addition to the aid granted by this Parliament, to enable them to complete that work. But Sir, they had met there the combined hostility of the great railway corporations upon this continent, and they had found that hostility strengthened by the utterances of hon. gentlemen who occupy seats in this House, and by the whole Liberal press throughout this country, and contrary to every reasonable expectation, no capitalist could be found, in either Europe or America, who was willing to invest in that enterprise. It was under these circumstances that the railway company appealed to this Government for aid, and the present Administration, recognising the importance of that work, recognising the danger of delay, anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity which was then afforded to secure the early completion of that work, came to Parliament with a proposition, first, to loan the company thirty millions from our public funds, and afterwards with a proposition to make a second temporary loan of five millions more. Those loans were granted, but we all remember that those measures met with most determined opposition from the Liberal party in this House and throughout the country. Those measures were denounced as acts of wanton waste upon the part of the present Administration, and the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) only a year ago, in his place in Parliament, declared that that money had been absolutely thrown away. Now, Sir, I ask hon. gentlemen who heard that statement then to reflect to-day what would have been the consequences to this country had those views prevailed in the counsels of this country. Why, Sir, we all know that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would have been compelled to suspend operation; we know the result of that suspension would have been to involve this whole country in a commercial crisis; we know that its effects would have been felt in every branch of trade and industry in this country, and we know that the whole business of this country would have been paralysed, and its progress, growth, development and settlement arrested. But, Sir, that is not all. It would have been under these circumstances that the Government of the day would have been called upon to deal with the late unfortunate rebellion, and who can state the consequences if that rebellion had occurred during a period of general financial depression and disaster? Who can tell what would have been the consequences if its flame had been fanned and its forces had been strengthened by a feeling of insecurity at home and a feeling of distrust abroad. It is scarcely possible to hope that it would have stopped short of a general uprising among the Indians, and we know that would have resulted in a general wholesale massacre of the settlers in the North-West and the destruction of property. Sir, the misfortunes of last year, which we all so deeply regret, would have been multiplied tenfold, and the dark record which is already written upon the latest pages of our history, would have been ten times darker still if the views which hon. gentlemen opposite entertain had prevailed in the counsels of this country. The past few months have proved conclusively that the policy adopted by the present Government has been a wise one, and to-day we are able to present it in most striking contrast to the folly of the policy advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, it is due to the fact that the Government of this country lent aid to that great and important enterprise at a time when that aid could be obtained from no other source, that a great commercial crisis was averted, and we have the satisfaction to-day of seeing that great work practically completed. Notwithstanding that hon. gentlemen, in the course of this discussion, have not expressed appreciation of its value, we find that its commercial value is fully recognised by the capitalists of Europe and America, and the statesmen of Great Britain acknowledge its great national importance, not only to the Dominion of Canada but to the whole British Empire. It is due to the same cause that, instead of being obliged to-day to view the result of a protracted insurrection and the horrors of an Indian war, we have, in a comparative short space of time, at a comparatively trifling cost, at a comparatively small sacrifice of life and property, the rebellion crushed, and peace restored; and Sir, we have demonstrated to the world that the Dominion of Canada has ample resources under her control, and has sufficient loyalty among her sons to enable her to protect both the lives and the property of even the humblest among her people.

Mr. McMULLEN. I expected this debate would have taken a wider range than it has done. I observe that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat made no effort whatever to reply to the very able and very forcible speech delivered by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson). It is somewhat singular that the hon. gentleman should have undertaken to follow the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson). Last year the present Minister of Fisheries took a prominent part in the debate. We had also the member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), who made a very able and powerful address in favor of the National Policy, and we had the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson), who delivered a very long and elaborate argument. Where are those hon. members this year? What is the matter? Was the speech delivered by the hon. member for Brant so forcible and pointed that they are unable to answer it, and so put up an hon. member to occupy a short time in order to drag speeches from other leading members on this side and allow Government supporters to follow after they have studied the speeches of hon. gentlemen on this side for two days and nights? Is that a fair way of dealing with hon. members? Are not the hon. members for King's, N. B., and King's, N. S., going to speak on this question? It must be remembered that this is an important discussion. We are considering the enormous debt of the country, and whether it is in the case of a country or an individual it is the amount of debt that is all important. We have been adding year by year to our debt; in fact, the Government have added a million a month, or $41,166 a day every day since they sat on the Treasury benches. It, therefore, behoves hon. gentlemen opposite to manfully refute the charges made against them and not shrink from meeting them. Our debt is undoubtedly an enormous one. I regret that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) was forced to admit that our debt per capita is in excess of that of the United States, as well as our taxes. I should like to ask the people of this Dominion whether we, with the drawbacks arising from our severe winter and other causes, are in as favorable a position to pay a per capita tax as the people of the United States, who have great diversity of climate and produce everything under the sun? I say we are not. Would anyone coming to this continent to reside, and studying the speech of that hon. gentleman, decide to stay in this country rather than go to the Western States? No; he would decide to go to a better climate. Of course we cannot help the climate we have. Hon. members will say that we are decrying the country. We cannot help pointing out the unfortunate conditions in which we are placed. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they introduced the National Policy, declared that it would cure all ills and remove our financial difficulties. Every man was going to be made rich, our farmers were to grow larger crops and obtain better prices and working people were to get higher wages for their labor. Such promises have not been realised. Public affairs, during the last seven or eight years, have been conducted on principles of humbug. The whole people have been humbugged. The Finance Minister started a gigantic humbug, and his henchmen from every platform heralded the humbug, that through the National Policy people would be made rich. The truth is that nothing would tend to improve our condition more than to allow the people to obtain what they require, at the lowest possible point, and to keep down the burden of indebtedness. It is a very serious matter, that hon. gentlemen opposite have gone on and increased the debt to the enormous extent they have increased it. They reply that Mr. Mackenzie's Government increased the debt. We admit they did. When they took office, they found the Government were committed to certain contracts, which they were obliged to carry out; and yet when they subsequently appeared before the people, hon. gentleman pointed out the increased expenditure made by the Government, and they had the brazenness to do this, although they were themselves responsible for that increased expenditure. Reference was made by the hon. member for Cardwell, to the Australian colonies, and the hon. gentleman tried to show that their debt was greater than that of Canada. The Australian colonies are, however, in the same position as the United States. They have a climate very much more desirable than ours. In consequence of the shortness of the seasons here a farmer is obliged to have a large force of horses and machinery, whereas in countries with a more favorable climate they are able to work almost all the year round. As I have said, the people have been humbugged by the National Policy. I challenge any hon. member to point out a village where there has not been over production within the last few years. Men invested in the manufacture of agricultural implements and other goods in my own section of country and we have had over production and disaster. The hon. member for King's, N. B., in 1883, gave an illustration of what he considered the Government could do for this country. He said:

"A simile occurs to me, and I think it is a true one. Government cannot create the water that flows in a mighty river, but the Government can take the water out of the mighty river and by appliances and machinery can carry it through acres and acres of arid soil, and by a proper system of irrigation can make the desert bloom like a rose, and cover the sands with fertility and an abundant harvest. There is this distinction: That which causes this fertility is the gift of nature, but the duty of utilising it rests with man, and it is the same thing with the prosperity of the country. The great river in a country's prosperity is that which comes out of the soil, the sea and the mine; but that is powerless to do what it may do unless the Government provides proper conditions and unless they foster and care for and direct the energies to be applied to it. That is the distinction I would make, and it is one which, if carried in our minds, would very much lighten up that often muddling and perplexing assertion that the Government cannot make good crops and cannot cause the fish to multiply in the sea."

The Government should now remedy the unfortunate condition of things we have in this country. Business is dull and in a disturbed condition. Why, Sir, the people of the country at the present time are paying more for everything they buy over the counter of retailers than the people of the United States. The facts alluded to by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) with regard to the smuggling of goods from the United States is the most positive evidence that such is the case. Hon. gentlemen talk about free trade, but I say it is impossible for a country like this to have free trade with the enormous burdens which the Government has to impose on the people in the way of taxation to meet their expenses. The Finance Minister is in such a state of desperation that he feels that he must raise the taxes from 20 to 30 per cent. on dolls, so it is certain that he has been searching over every single article to find something upon which to replenish his depleted Treasury. I say that this is a deplorable condition of things, and I hold that it is the duty of this House and the duty of the people to take seriously into consideration the whole question of our financial position, and exact from the Government an honest, true, fair and impartial statement of the condition of things in this Dominion. Every time a Budget speech is delivered, we are presented with calculations and figures which are calculated to mislead. I believe that if those figures were sifted to the bottom they would not bear investigation. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) said the interest paid on our debt last year was $7,000,000, but I find by the Auditor General's report that he puts it at $9,419,482.19. I cannot understand how the member for Cardwell says it is only $7,000,000, but perhaps he has some peculiar way of his own so as to try and mislead the House, and it is just the same with other hon. gentlemen. Year after year they are trying to persuade the people of the country that the interest on the debt, per capita, is increasing very slightly, but when you consider that at Confederation we had a debt of $93,000,000, and that now it is $282,000,000; that our population then was 3,416,000, while now it is 4,700,000, according to the statement of the Finance Minister, I say it is impossible to reconcile these statements. Then the hon. member for Cardwell told us that wheat on the Canadian Pacific Railway is worth more than what it is on the Northern Pacific. Now, I am strongly inclined to doubt that statement, because I have friends who live in Manitoba with whom I have continuous communication with regard to prices, and I have also friends in Minnesota. I have received letters from these friends of mine since I came here, and I am satisfied that wheat is higher in Minnesota than it is in Manitoba, and for this reason: There is no doubt that Liverpool is the great market for flour, and you can ship a barrel of flour from Minneapolis or St. Paul to Liverpool as low as you can from Montreal to Liverpool, and as St. Paul is as far north-west as Winnipeg, and as you cannot ship a bushel of wheat or a barrel of flour from Winnipeg at as low a rate as you can from St. Paul, it must be worth more there than it is in Winnipeg by at least the difference in the cost of shipment. With regard to North-West wheat coming down to Ontario and Quebec, I really fear that the opening up of the North-West is going to have a very serious effect on the receipts from the growth of wheat by the farmers of the older Provinces. The farmers of the North-West can grow a larger amount, and they can grow and reap it more cheaply, and the result will be that it will seriously interfere with the price of wheat in the older Provinces. I believe that when you consider the fact that the older Provinces will have to compete in the production of wheat with the North-West, they will find that in place of being taxed to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, to open up that country they should not be asked to contribute a cent towards it. I would have no objection if the entire lands in the North-West were set aside for the purpose of producing that railway to the Pacific, but I hold that it is unjust and unfair to tax the people of Ontario and Quebec for that purpose, and I say that they should not pay a farthing. They have produced all their own lines and they have taxed themselves and granted bonuses to the different lines of railways, and to ask them to pay the interest on the money invested in the Canadian Pacific Railway is unfair. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), said that 2,300 applications had been sent to the Minister of Interior asking that certain timber limits should be granted to them. I think that we have here the explanation of the difficulty in the North-West. The Minister of Interior had to attend to all these applications by friends and supporters who were pressing for themselves and their friends and their relations of all kinds, and the result is that they are responsible for these troubles as well as the Ministry. The entire party are responsible, because by constantly boring and worrying at the Minister of Interior to get timber limits and colonisation companies, they so took up the poor man's time that they almost worried him to death, and he could do nothing else, and at last he had to get up and run away from the Department. The result of this is that they are responsible for these troubles, for the increased amount of debt produced by those troubles and for the 200 of our subjects who have been shot in them. This is a serious matter. In my humble opinion the affairs of this country have not been conducted in a proper way. I say that if our people will not wake up to the fact that their resources have been flitted away and that this Government have been enormously increasing their annual outlay, the result will be a serious one. Why, in 1877-78, we spent the sum of $23,000,000 annually, and I can well remember Sir Charles Tupper, in an address delivered in this House before the general election, state that any Government who would dare to ask more than $22,000,000 annually did not deserve the confidence of the people. To-day we have about $35,000,000 of annual outlay, and this year the sum is about to be largely increased, and no doubt if hon. gentlemen remain in office, it will go up to $40,000,000 and to $50,000,000. The result is that our people will be reduced to absolute financial slavery if they do not wake up to the fact that they are being dragged into debt, which is going to be a serious burden to them, and to those who follow them. I did not intend to speak on this question, only I thought it would be well that I should offer a few remarks before the debate closed. Now, I say it is full time that we should seriously consider our true position. Is it any wonder that we should be disposed to resent the mean, unjust, unfair and un-British advantages that hon. gentlemen opposite have sought to take of their opponents? Take the Gerry-mander Act of 1882, by which almost every constituency, in the Province of Ontario, was changed to make its political complexion suit hon. gentlemen opposite. I say it was a disgraceful act to the men who inaugurated it. It is as bad as the Pacific scandal, and I do not know but that it is worse. Then, take the Franchise Bill. We are now having some little experience of the trouble and annoyance that the people of this country are going to have in getting enrolled under that Act. We placed the expenditure which it would involve at $500,000, but from what I have learned I have no doubt it will add at least $1,000,000 to the expenditure of the Dominion in the coming year. Apart from that, the Statute is unfair and unjust, and no people who claim to exercise the rights and liberties of a free people should quietly submit to such an unjust Act. I believe the people of this country are beginning to see through all the transactions hon. gentlemen opposite are guilty of. I notice an exposure that took place in the Railway Committee room the other day in connection with a railway charter; and I believe the people are going to see whether matters of that kind are allowed to take place and to be winked at by the Government of this country. The hon. leader of the Government evidently made up his mind years ago that everything that could be got would be distributed among his followers. He has acted like an old barnyard hen that scrapes everything together that she can find and divides among her chickens. Land grants, grazing leases, timber limits, coal lands, everything that can be got is divided among his followers. We have had enough of this sort of thing, and it is time it was stopped, and I hope the people will put a stop to it. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but the people of the Dominion are beginning to realise the true condition of this country. They are beginning to think that after all, notwithstanding the professions of this Government, there is a certain amount of rottenness, and they are bound to find out what that rottenness amounts to; and I am satisfied that when these hon. gentlemen go before the people of this Dominion, they will be called on to give a strict account of how the country's affairs have been managed. Unless the people do this, it is going to be a deplorable thing for the younger people who will have to take our places. I will not detain the House any longer. I simply rose to make these few remarks, because I was surprised that no hon. member opposite was willing to reply to the able and eloquent speech of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson). I hope we shall yet be favored with some explanation of the very serious charges that hon. gentleman has made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose the hon. Minister of Finance will enter into some general explanations before proceeding with the discussion of the details of the tariff changes.

Mr. McLELAN. I understood that some other hon. gentleman wished to continue the debate on Tuesday. If it be the wish of the House, I will refer to a few of the items to-night. I stated, in submitting them, that the object was mainly to substitute specific for ad valorem duties. The first item is shelled almonds and nuts. The change made there slightly increased the duties. On baking powder there is a change to specific duty, which will yield about $5,000 additional revenue. The great difference in the prices and values of the baking powder imported has led to confusion and difficulties in the Custom houses, and we propose to place upon that a specific duty of 6 cents per pound, which, taking the average value of that imported, will give us about $5,000 additional revenue. Then, on fancy goods, we increased the duty to 30 per cent. from 20 per cent., the value imported and entered in 1885 being very much below that of 1883. We concluded that addition to the ad valorem duty would about enable us to receive about the same amount of duty that we received in 1882 and 1883. Then, of fruit, take the article of raisins. In 1882 and 1883 we had less weight of raisins imported and yielding us a revenue of $108,326, while last year we had 750,000 pounds more imported, yielding but $70,691; and we propose to place a specific duty that will about produce the amount received in 1882 and 1883. On other fruits, we expect to reach about the same revenue that we had in previous years. On green fruits we have made the change mainly on the imported fruit of the early descriptions; it is found they ripen earlier across the line by a week or ten days; the market is in the hands of the importer at very high prices during that period, and the importation is continued until they fall below the value that will pay duty and leave anything for importation. We have, therefore, placed the duty at 4 cents per lb., instead of 2 cents a quart as previously, in order that our fruit growers will receive some benefits from that protection. On fancy goods we have added 30 per cent., because value have fallen since 1882-1883, and we think we should collect on that class of goods about as much duty as we did in those years. In 1883, we collected $241,000 under the 20 per cent. tariff, and in the present year, while we imported a larger quantity, the duty collected has fallen to $191,000. By the increase of duty we expect to receive about $240,000, or the same as we received in 1883. Lead pipe and shot: we shall not receive so much under this change, as the importation had largely increased last year owing to the great decline in value. By putting this rate, we will come back to the same percentage, and on the quantity we will perhaps get less as there will not be so much imported. As regards oleomargarine, we are unable to say how much is imported. Our object is to prevent its importation and manufacture, as far as possible, so that we hope not to receive any revenue from that source. Printed cottons and fabrics: the present rates upon cottons is 27½ per cent., and a difficulty has arisen among the appraisers and the Customs house officers as to what should be classed as printed cottons. Importations are now made of a description of goods, which are really printed cotton, and yet are entered under some other name at a lower rate. To prevent confusion and misunderstanding, it is proposed to use these terms "printed or dyed cottons, not elsewhere specified, 27½ per cent." Spirits and strong waters were not particularly described, so the Customs officers reported that they were not able to determine whether high wines should come in under the same rates as spirits or not. It was claimed they should not pay additional duty for the additional strength over a certain strength fixed, and in the alteration made last year in the duty on spirits and gin, old tom was omitted. When we go into committee, we may propose some alterations to make the duty more in harmony with the other duties on spirits and gin. On sugar we have taken what we think is about the average duty that has been charged upon sugar for five years. The great decline in the price has, of course, under the ad valorem duty, lessened very much what we have been receiving on sugar. In 1878, the average rate was $2.39 per 100 lbs; take the quantity we imported in 1885, and at that rate we should have received over $5,000,000 duty, whereas we only received $2,544,921. In 1881, the rate was $1.80 per 100 lbs; in 1882, $1.69; in 1883, $1.61; in 1884, $1.50; in 1885, $1.29. We propose to take what will be an average of those years, and from that we expect to receive between $300,000 and $400,000 additional revenue. If we took the tariff of 1884, we would lose on it; but taking the average of five years, we shall gain about $400,000 more than last year. As last year sugar fell very low, averaging only $1.27 per 100 lbs., under the rates now proposed it will average between $1.50 and $1.60, giving us about $400,000 additional, providing we import the same quantity. But perhaps we shall not, in this coming year, import quite so largely as in the past, as the stocks in the country are so heavy. The calculation which we make is based upon a polariscope test of from 85 to 87, as being about the average of what is imported.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total revenue expected from all sources?

Mr. McLELAN. From all sources we expect an increase of about $700,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the effect of the alteration of the duty on cordage?

Mr. McLELAN. That will not make any change in the receipts. I am informed by the manufacturers that it will not give any additional protection. The hon. gentleman knows that there is a great difference in the value of cordage imported, as in consequence of the adulteration of the sisal in it, the values change, and, by making part of the duty specific the collection will be simplified somewhat. The ordinary qualities will not be affected; it may affect the poorer qualities, but it is expected that it will reduce the amount on the better quality, and taking the whole we do not expect any additional revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is there any increase in spirits?

Mr. McLELAN. No, except on old tom. On gloves and mitts of all kinds, we hope to get back to the amount we collected in 1883, which reached $204,000, while last year upon an equal quantity imported, we collected only $179,000. By the increase we expect to receive as much as we did in 1883.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What alteration is made in the item of gas and water pipes?

Mr. McLELAN. There is an increased duty of 5 per cent., but we shall probably not receive any more, if as much, as there will not be as large an importation as there was in 1885, owing to the decline in the cost of that class of goods abroad, and our own manufacturers say they are prepared to increase the output very largely so that we do not expect any increase from the change on either the wrought iron or the cast iron tubing. When we take up the several items, I shall be prepared to give more details as to what is imported and what we expect to receive from each of them. We expect to receive about $750,000 on the whole.

Resolutions read the second time.

Mr. McLELAN moved that concurrence in the resolutions be postponed until Tuesday.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11:35, p.m.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 81) to incorporate the Lennox Passage Bridge Company.—(Mr. Paint.)

Bill (No. 80) further to amend the Interpretation Act (from the Senate).—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

FINES AND FORFEITURES.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 82) in relation to certain fines and forfeitures. He said: I dare say most hon. members of this House are aware that the statutory provisions of Canada relating to fines and penalties, and their appropriation are in a somewhat unsatisfactory condition. A number of the Statutes which make provision for the imposition of fines and penalties have no provision as to the application of such forfeitures, excepting the provision in 31 Victoria, chapter 1, section 7, sub-section 22, which I will read to the House. It is in the Interpretation Act and reads as follows:—

“Whenever any pecuniary penalty or any forfeiture is imposed for any contravention of any act,—then if no other mode be prescribed for the recovery thereof, such penalty or forfeiture shall be recoverable with costs by civil action or proceeding at the suit of the Crown only, or of any private party suing as well for the Crown as for himself,—in any form allowed in such case by the law of that Province where it is brought,—before any Court having jurisdiction to the amount of the penalty in cases of simple contract,—upon the evidence of any one credible witness, other than the plaintiff or party interested; and if no other provision be made for the appropriation of such penalty or forfeiture, one half thereof shall belong to the Crown, and the other half shall belong to the private plaintiff, if any there be, and if there be none, the whole shall belong to the Crown.”

By a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada it has been held that this provision only extends to the recovery of penalties or forfeitures in a civil action to recover them, and therefore the cases remain unprovided for as to the appropriation of penalties recoverable in criminal proceedings, or quasi-criminal proceedings. The amendment, therefore, which I propose to make is as follows:—

Where no other provision is made by any law of Canada for the application of any fine, penalty or forfeiture, imposed for the violation of any such law, the same shall belong to the Crown for the public uses of Canada.

The Governor in Council may from time to time direct that any fines, penalties or forfeitures, or any portion thereof which would otherwise belong to the Crown for the public uses of Canada, be paid to any Provincial, municipal or local authority which wholly or in part bears the expenses of administering the law under which such fines, penalties or forfeitures are imposed, or that the same be applied in any other manner deemed best adapted to attain the objects of such law and to secure its due administration.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read first time.

PRINCE ALBERT COLONISATION COMPANY.

Mr. BOWELL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to draw the attention of the House to a motion placed upon the Order paper for the first time to-day by the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), in which certain charges are insinuated against myself. This motion asks for the appointment of a special committee to investigate all matters connected with the formation and organisation of the Prince Albert Colonisation Company, in which motion the following paragraph is to be found:—

“That the affair was conducted with the knowledge of the Honorable Mackenzie Bowell, then and now member for North Hastings, and Minister of Customs, the father-in-law and associate in business of the said James C. Jamieson; and Mr. Bowell was consulted during its progress, and when Mr. Jamieson ultimately sold his ‘blind share’ Mr. Bowell received from Mr. Jamieson, upon some transaction between them relating to the affair, $500 out of the price of the said ‘blind share.’”

As these statements affect not only my position as a Minister of the Crown, but my reputation as a public man, I respectfully ask the House to waive all rules and allow the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) to make the motion at once; as it would be a grave wrong to me to allow it to remain upon the notice paper one moment longer than was necessary to grant the committee. I therefore claim, not as a matter of courtesy, but of justice, that the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) should be given the opportunity, at the earliest possible moment, to place himself in a position to substantiate, if he can, the accusations insinuated in his motion. In the paragraph which I have read, it is stated: First, that I am the father-in-law and associate in business of the said James C. Jamieson. It is true that I am the father-in-law of Mr. James C. Jamieson. I have yet to learn, however, that that is a crime, or a breach of the privileges of this House; but it is not true that I am now, or ever have been, directly or indirectly, his associate in business. It is stated, secondly, that I was consulted during the progress of the formation and organisation of the said Prince Albert Colonisation Company, thereby implying that I was personally interested in the success of the company. This is not true, in the sense in which the insinuation is made; I was not consulted. Mr. White did, in casual conversation, as did others, speak to me of their intention to organise colonisation companies, but I had no conversation or correspondence with Mr. James C. Jamieson upon the subject, as he had nothing, so far as I know, to do with the matter until the lands had been selected, and the Department of the Interior had agreed to allot them to a company which might be formed by Mr. White and his associates, upon the terms which lands for colonisation purposes were granted. Thirdly, it is stated that Mr. Jamieson ultimately sold what the motion terms his “blind share.” Mr. Bowell received from Mr. Jamieson, upon some transaction between them relating to the affair, $500 out of the price of the said “blind share.” If it is intended by this to imply that I had an interest in the Prince Albert Colonisation Company, and that $500 was given to me by Mr. Jamieson as my proportion of the amount received by him, after selling what interest he had in the said colonisation company, I give it the most emphatic and positive denial. I have not now, nor did I ever have, any pecuniary or other interest in the said company, either directly, indirectly, inferentially, or otherwise. Any moneys received by me from Mr. Jamieson at any time was to repay that which had been loaned by me to him—an accommodation and assistance which he has received from me, to a greater or less extent, as he might require it, for the past ten or twelve years. But I am not aware that these transactions concern this House, or should become a subject for a special committee to investigate; still I am quite willing, even in this particular, to satisfy the prurient curiosity of the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), and then leave it to the committee about to be appointed, and to the House, to judge of the character of the imputations implied in the motion, and of the motives which have actuated the mover of the resolution, in placing it upon the notice paper. I desire, Mr. Speaker, again to pronounce in the strongest possible language, that the insinuations contained in the motion of the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), so far as they relate to me, are untrue and false in every particular; and therefore urge that the House consents to the motion being made the first Order of the Day, so as to enable the mover, at the earliest possible moment, to produce the evidence upon which he has ventured to state his belief, that he can establish the truth of the imputations embodied in said motion. I may add that any assistance I can give the gentleman in order to procure whatever evidence he has at hand, or to facilitate the action of the committee, I shall most readily give.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Before the hon. gentleman makes his statement to the House, I hope he will have the manly honesty to tell the conversation that passed between himself and Mr. Hugh Sutherland, a member of this House, concerning my connection with the Prince Albert Colonisation Company.

Mr. EDGAR. I quite agree with the hon. Minister of Customs that this is a matter which should be brought up at the earliest possible moment. And I shall, with the permission of the House, do so at once, as I did not put this motion on the paper without being ready to go on with my proofs at the shortest possible notice. I beg, Sir, to state in my place as a member :

That I am credibly informed and believe that I can establish, by satisfactory evidence, that in the year 1882 John White, Esquire, then and now member for East Hastings, who was associated in the transaction with James C. Jamieson, of Belleville, journalist, used his influence with the Government of which he was a parliamentary supporter, to obtain, and did obtain—

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). That is not true.

Mr. EDGAR—

An Order in Council and an agreement for a grant, for colonisation purposes, of 51,200 acres of choice lands near Batoche, in the North-West Territories, with the intention of trafficking with such grant, by the formation of a colonisation company, the members of which should give the said White and Jamieson special advantages and profits in consideration of the procuring of the said order and agreement, and of assistance and promotion of the interests of the company in the past and in the future ;

That subsequently they formed the company called the Prince Albert Colonisation Company, and got the other shareholders to agree that for the said considerations each of them, Messrs. White and Jamieson, should be entitled, without payment out of their own pockets of any money, to a free gift or bonus of one-twelfth part of the expected profits, which were estimated to be very great ; and they each accordingly received what were called "blind shares" to the amount of $33,000 nominal value, on which they were not to pay and did not pay any sum out of their own pockets to the company or otherwise than out of the expected profits, while the other shareholders were to pay and did pay their calls in cash, to the extent of $20,000 and upwards ;

That the affair was conducted with the knowledge of the Honorable Mackenzie Bowell, then and now member for North Hastings, and Minister of Customs, the father-in-law and associate in business of the said James C. Jamieson ;—

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). That is not true.

Mr. EDGAR—

and Mr. Bowell was consulted during its progress, and when Mr. Jamieson ultimately sold his "blind shares" Mr. Bowell received from Mr. Jamieson, upon some transaction between them relating to the affair, $500 out of the price of the said "blind shares" ;

That Messrs. White and Jamieson fulfilled their agreement further to promote the interests of the company, and the company subsequently obtained from the Government an Order in Council for a very favorable exchange of part of their land for other land on the shore of the South Saskatchewan, in what is known as the parish of St. Louis de Langevin ;

That in 1882 Mr. White applied to the Government for another lot of choice lands near Edmonton, in the North-West Territories, which he subsequently offered to procure from the Government for the paying stockholders of the Prince Albert Colonisation Company upon the same system of the allowance to him of a profit or "blind share" for his services ;

That in 1882 Messrs. White and Jamieson procured from the Government an agreement for another lot of choice lands in the North-West Territories for the Shell River Colonisation Company, on the same system of the allowance to them of profits or "blind shares" for their services.

Now, according to the notice I gave, I beg to move :

That a select committee be appointed to enquire fully into the said allegations, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation, with instructions to report the evidence and all proceedings of the said committee, and that the said committee be composed of Messrs. McCarthy, Laurier, Hall, Weldon, Tupper, Davies, Girouard, Patterson (Essex), and Lister.

In making this motion, Mr. Speaker, I do so with regret.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDGAR. I regret that the necessity has arisen for proclaiming to the world that such a state of things exists. It is never pleasant to have to bring charges against a fellow member ; but when I have information which convinces me of the truth of these charges, the House will feel, and what is more, the country will feel, that my duty is clear—that I could do nothing else than I have done. I have made specific statements of facts which can readily be investigated by a committee. Assuming that the House will order that investigation, I propose to make no comment whatever upon my allegations further than to say, that they so far compromise the honor of the House and of some of its members as to call for a prompt and thorough enquiry. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White), in which he called upon me to state to this House the words of a conversation which he says took place between the hon. member for Selkirk

(Mr. Sutherland) and myself upon this subject, I can only say that no conversation which I had with Mr. Sutherland, or with anybody else, was at all inconsistent with, but was entirely corroborative of the facts which I have set out in these statements. I beg to make the motion as a matter of privilege, if it is necessary, although, with the consent of the House, I suppose I can do it in the ordinary course.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. After the declaration of the hon. Minister of Customs, I think that nothing was left to the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) but to put the motion before the House. It is a matter which should, of course, be investigated now, as the statement has been made by the hon. gentleman on his responsibility as a member of this House. The charge is one which affects the standing of two hon. members of this House, one of whom is a Minister of the Crown ; and as it is not a mere matter of curiosity, but is a charge or an insinuation against those hon. gentlemen, I think, under the circumstances, the House will see that it is a matter of privilege, as the hon. gentleman himself stated just now, and should therefore be investigated by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Besides, I think the House will agree with me that there are not only two members of this House who are on their trial. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman who made the motion has felt that he is on his trial also in making these charges against these hon. gentlemen ; and therefore, having done so, it is important that he should have the fullest opportunity before an impartial tribunal to present his case, and to bring his witnesses and the documents he has to produce in support of his charges. If the hon. gentleman cannot prove his charges, of course he knows perfectly well that he must abide by the consequences. Therefore, without going further into this matter, which, of course, we should not now discuss except to refer it to the committee, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Thompson) :

That the last paragraph be expunged and the following substituted : The above statements be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions to report the evidence and all proceedings of the said committee and their finding thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Before that amendment is put, as far as I am personally concerned, I would much rather this matter would go to the committee moved for by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). The reason I would like it to go there is this : In conversation with the hon. gentleman some time ago, I said I was quite prepared that he should move a committee of one, consisting of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), or the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)—any one of those gentlemen, or all four ; that I had done nothing I believed was wrong or against the law, or my honor as a member of the House. If the matter goes to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, it will take too long ; let us know the whole truth and have it at once. I have nothing to fear. This is the seventeenth Session I have been a member of the House, and, I believe, I have as many well-wishers in it as any other member ; I am satisfied I have as many personal friends in the House as any other member. The conversation which passed between the president of the company and myself—and I have not written to him, I have not communicated with him, by myself or any other party, until I saw him the night, if I mistake not, when he left for England. I said : "Mr. Sutherland, Mr. Edgar talks of a motion of enquiry for papers ; and I advised him to get a committee consisting of one and to name the committee." He said : "I have just had a conversation with Mr. Edgar, and I said to him : 'Edgar, what do you mean ? So far as John White is concerned, he has done nothing but what any gentleman could do; he has neither directly nor indirectly received one cent of benefit by the Prince Albert Colonisation Company.' So Mr. Sutherland informed me he said to Mr. Edgar. We will live to meet Mr. Sutherland in this House, because I hope he will be successful and come back with money enough from the English market to build the Hudson Bay road. We will meet him face to face in the House of Commons; I hope we will all live to do that, unless the seat be taken away from me, which no person has yet succeeded in doing. So far as the resolution is concerned, it is well written and astutely prepared. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) will not be offended if I say that, though he has been ambassador to British Columbia and his ambassadorship cost the country $6,000, he had not the intelligence to write that document; for all that he was an ambassador on matters affecting gas at the Champ de Mars meeting at Montreal, to associate with men who were finding fault with the Government because they allowed the law to take its course, and who are insulting the noble-hearted people that sorrowed for the deaths of dear ones—for all that he went there and was not successful; he never, in my opinion, wrote the document. This document was written by my dear, kind, large-hearted, sympathetic Irish brother, friend Blake. My dear brother, every line is yours. When parties in difficulty need sympathy, I always look, and I find it is a good thing, for the sympathy of the ladies. In my misfortune on this occasion—if it is a misfortune—I will have the sympathy of two; I will name them, if you will excuse me. When I am out of order, Mr. Speaker, you will call me to order. One is my partner, who has fought the hard battle of life with me, Mr. Speaker, and she is the mother of a large family, which, I think, is something very beneficial to this country, and she has had to stay at home to nurse and take care of them. The documents written by the correspondent of the Globe, whom I have never injured, the correspondence in the Globe by the editors and others connected with that paper, whom I have never injured by word, act, or deed, and I hope I never will—every document they wrote, every editorial they wrote, was copied into the Belleville Grits newspaper, a paper that, when I for seven years was member of the County Council as Reeve, I insisted on getting an equal amount of printing with the Conservative paper—a gentleman to whose brother-in-law, when I had an important gift in my power, I gave it, instead of to one of my friends.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You ought to have given it to your son-in-law.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Now, doctor, keep cool; I will battle my own way. She has had to read these matters over, and has had to notice the cowardly, mean and contemptible correspondents that attack a man, and have not the moral courage and independence to put their names to the attack. She has had to read all these things, but I said to her: "All right, Esther, take it quietly, it is all right. I never surrendered, and I never will; I will be all right." That I have her sympathy to-day, I am sure; I am sure I have another kind-hearted lady's sympathy, and that is the sympathy of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake's) good lady. I will tell you how I got that: You remember, Sir, when we were fellow passengers crossing the ocean, and on the Sunday morning, the first after we left Lough Foyle, I remember the late hon. member for Leeds and myself were walking up and down the vessel, trying to fight against that dread disease, sea-sickness; you remember, Mr. Speaker, when with your portly form you went to the side of the ship and cast up your accounts, and when the said hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Jones) said: "Go it, George, there is lots of room." We landed upon a beautiful Sunday morning in August at Point Lévis.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings).

Of course, the Minister of Justice was very anxious then to see his native Canada, to breathe once more its fresh air, and, when he got his foot on Canadian soil, he walked off and left alone Mrs. Blake, letting her do as she will, letting her look after the luggage. The sailors were pulling the luggage here and there, and then the officers of the Minister of Customs came to look after the smugglers, and one man in particular was trying to interfere with Mrs. Blake, when I came up to the fellow and I hit him on the shoulder, and I said: "What is the matter?" "Leave that alone; that belongs to the Minister of Justice; if you insult Mrs. Blake again, I will tramp you where you stand." And added: "When the Minister of Justice comes back, after he has got the fresh air, when he gets the keys, you can do as you please." Well, Sir, after the Minister of Justice had got the fresh air, he came back, and he said: "Well, my dear, how are you getting along?" She said: "Yes, I am getting along, thanks to Mr. White." So you will see, Mr. Speaker, that I have the sympathy of two good ladies, my own good partner, and the partner of the man who penned this accusation. I am not going to discuss the question now with the hon. gentleman, with all his legal ability, with his general ability, with his honesty of character, with his love of country, with his patriotism, because he is composed of that from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot. So far as he is concerned, let him come on with his evidence, and he will find that, as far as I am concerned, I am prepared, here, there, or in any other place, to take my own part. I neither fear his eloquence, nor his size, nor his muscle, nor his honesty, nor his statesmanship. I do not fear him or anybody else. I do what is correct. This is brought on all for this little seat, this seat for East Hastings. There is one thing I can say, it has never been purchased for me by any Minister or anybody else. No man had ever to write a letter to ask the people of East Hastings to elect me. They know who I am. They have known me for thirty-eight years. I am not ashamed to state that I landed in the town of Belleville thirty-eight years ago with a York shilling, and that I worked on a farm for $3 and $4 a month in that county. My hon. friend, Mr. Paterson, of Brant, knows the people of my county, and those people know who I am. I got the seat in 1872 independent of the influence of the member for East York—whom I highly respect, because he was managing the affairs of the party for the member for Durham, who was then conveniently absent. I admit, I acknowledge and I say that I am the follower of the First Minister, and that I have been his follower through evil and through good report, and, if he goes into Opposition, I will go with him. At the time I speak of, it was thought that it would not answer for me to try unless the seven or eight hundred Roman Catholic voters went for me, and I only got two out of those seven hundred voters. I had the banks against me, I had the commercial men against me, I had the Tories under Sir John Macdonald against me, and I had the Grits against me, but I got the seat and I will hold it. I might go on and say many things that might not be acceptable or pleasing, but I will not. I do not say these things to create amusement. Not at all. It is serious. The hon. gentleman has made his charge; he will try to prove it; and, no matter what the consequence may be, I will have to take it. I have yet to learn that I have not the right to make an agreement with any gentleman, if I do it in the light of day and within the laws of the country. As far as the Minister of Customs is concerned, I knew nothing of him in the transaction. If I wanted a favor from any member in the Cabinet, I would rather go to any Minister than to the Minister of Customs. I got no favors from the Minister of Customs, and I asked none. I got no favors from any member of the Cabinet, and I asked none. I have had a great deal of business in the Indian Department, because the most important township in the county I have the honor to represent was once an Indian township, and a great number of patents were not got out. You can apply to Mr. Van-koughnet to find out if I ever asked him to do wrong. I have had a great deal of business with Mr. Lindsay Russell. Ask him if I have ever done wrong. You can ask the present Deputy Minister of the Interior, and you can ask those gentlemen who are under him if I ever tried to do wrong. I do not thank the Government for passing any Orders in Council. I am not ashamed to say that the Prince Albert Colonisation Company paid $20,000 in cash into the treasury of this country; and when it is circulated and reported that that company insulted or crushed the half-breeds at Batoche, it is untrue. No living man can prove that anyone was insulted or injured, directly or indirectly, by that company. So soon as that company found from Mr. Stephenson's report that there were half-breeds settled on their lands, a committee of four, of whom I was one, went to the Minister of the Interior and said that when we found that these half-breeds were settled on the land, we would have nothing to do with the half-breeds, or with the land; but we would take back the money or take the land in some other place. If any Frenchman, or any Englishman, or any Scotchman, or any Irishman, or anyone else says that we injured the half-breeds there, he says what is not true. We never injured a half-breed, and I thank God we never will. With reference to the Shell River Colonisation Company, it has built a saw mill and a grist mill, and has expended money to the extent of $25,000 or $26,000. If I have done wrong, tell me where. Very few members of this House have done more or tried to do more than I have done for the benefit of the North-West. I would like to give the history of the timber limits, but that does not come in here. I hope that the hon. member (Mr. Edgar) who went into the front door of an Orange lodge and out of the back door, and who insulted the Orange society, will get this committee; I hope he will get his investigation; I hope he will get it to his heart's content, to his honest heart's content, to his religious heart's content, until the whole of him will be contented; but then this will not be settled, for I will give him a Roland for his Oliver. I will tell him candidly that I will fight my battle through evil and through good report. He, Sir, will have to meet me face to face. The chaps that have propped this up—I beg pardon, that is not the term—that wrote this document, the members of this House that wrote this document, that bring these charges, before they are through with John White will find that they have woke up the wrong passenger. If there is to be any dirt-slinging, they will get it to their hearts' content. I think I have a tongue—perhaps it is owing to my education—that will help me to do it, and I will try to supply it. I thank you for your kindness, I thank you for your sympathy, I thank you for your courtesy. Now let us have the investigation. Let that great and good man have his investigation; and, Sir, I can say to him, that before he is through he will find out this fact, that he will regret that he ever undertook it.

Mr. BLAKE. As the hon. Minister of Public Works has proposed this amendment, I do not intend to delay the House by any lengthened argument upon it. I will say, however, that when I was sitting upon the other side of the House in the majority, as I am sitting on this side in a minority, I recognised the fact, and acted upon the view, that a small select committee was a much more appropriate tribunal for the investigation of facts than the large Committee on Privileges and Elections. I remain of that opinion, and, therefore, I regret much—and I sympathise with that portion of the speech of the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. White), though I cannot profess to any great sympathy to a good deal of what he said—I am sorry that it is proposed to alter the tribunal, and for my part I must vote against the amendment.

Mr. HAGGART. Let me draw attention to the fact that there is no charge against the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. White) in this statement of Mr. Edgar. Suppose that everything proved true before the committee, which the hon. gentleman charges, what action is the House going to take? There is no charge of corrupt practices, or anything. I think that before a committee is appointed the charges should be such that if they are found to be true, some punishment should be visited upon the member, either unseated, or something else. There is not the slightest charge of a corrupt practice in all this statement.

Amendment (Sir Hector Langevin) agreed to on division.
House divided on main motion of Mr. Edgar, as amended.

NAYS :

Haggart.—1.

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest to the House that the practice followed in England on similar occasions should be adopted on this occasion. I find that in England when such charges are made it is usual to add to the committee charged with the investigation, the mover of the resolution, but without power of voting, and in like manner it is usual for the gentleman accused to name someone to represent him on that committee, but also without power of voting. I would refer the House on this question to a precedent in the English House of Commons in 1858. Mr. Roebuck made a charge against Mr. Butt, and a committee was granted composed of Sir James Graham, Mr. Sidney Herbert, Mr. Bright, Mr. Sergeant Kinglake, Mr. Bouverie, General Codrington and Colonel Wilson Patten. Thereupon Mr. Roebuck and others spoke as follows:—

"The petition which I have presented is about to be referred to this select committee. I suppose there must be somebody to take charge of it. Now, I am not very anxious to undertake so disagreeable a task, but having presented the petition, I feel bound to present myself to the House.

"SIR JAMES GRAHAM said that in conformity with precedent and the claims of justice, Mr. Butt ought to be at liberty to nominate an hon. member to attend the committee on his behalf.

"MR. SPEAKER said that the House had on former occasions, as the right hon. Baronet had stated, nominated two members to serve on the committee for the purpose of conducting the enquiry, on either side, but without having a vote.

"MR. FAGAN, on the part of Mr. Butt, named Mr. Serjeant Deasy.

"Ordered—That Mr. Roebuck and Mr. Serjeant Deasy be appointed to serve upon the said committee, and to take part in its proceedings, but without the power of voting."

I would therefore suggest, Mr. Speaker, in conformity with this precedent, that the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) should be appointed on the committee to conduct the enquiry, but without the power of voting, and in like manner, that the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. White) should suggest someone to be appointed on the committee on his own behalf.

MR. THOMPSON (Antigonish). What was the charge in the case you quote?

MR. LAURIER. The charge was that Mr. Butt had taken a money consideration to promote the interests of a certain Indian prince. The petition states:

"That Isaac Butt, Esq., M.P., on or about the month of July, 1856, entered into a corrupt agreement with the Rajah Ali Moorad Khan, or his agents, the effect of which was that the said Isaac Butt, for a sum of money stipulated to be paid to him, should advocate and prosecute in the House of Commons the claim of his Highness for the recovery of the territory of which he had been deprived by annexation by the East India Company."

I therefore move, accordingly, that Mr. Edgar should be appointed on that committee, and that the hon. member for Hastings be given the option of naming someone to serve on the committee in his behalf, but neither to have a vote.

MR. SPEAKER. We have no precedent for adding members without power to vote.

MR. BLAKE. In unprovided cases we follow the practice of the English House of Commons.

MR. WHITE (Hastings). So far as I am concerned, I think I can do that job myself as well as anyone. I am not a lawyer, but I think I can fight my way through without anybody to help me. I thank the hon. gentleman for his kindness and his goodness, but I will ask nobody to represent me.

MR. LAURIER. Although there is no precedent in our own proceedings, we follow in all unprovided cases the practice of the English House, as suggested by my hon. friend. It is certainly a matter of justice that someone should, as stated by Mr. Roebuck, attend to prosecute the enquiry.

MR. SPEAKER. In the English case it was a select committee—this is a standing committee. In that case a select committee was specially appointed, and all parties interested were to attend. This is a new practice.

MR. BLAKE. Quite true; but the requisitions of justice must be the same, whether the committee be a select committee or the Committee on Privileges and Elections. If it is according to the principle of justice that the person who makes the charges, and the person who has to answer them, should have the convenience, one of being on the committee, and the other of being represented on the committee, it is quite clear that this practice must apply to the standing committee as well as to a select committee. There is no difference in that. The principal question on which the committee are supposed to be consulted, and are supposed to act, is that they act judicially on these matters; that there is not among the members of the committee a prosecutor or a defender; that the members of the committee are there to hear what is said on each side, with, of course, the privilege, wherever they see it necessary to the ends of justice, of asking further questions for the purpose of making the investigation thorough and satisfactory, so that the truth may be reached. An hon. member who is not on the committee—as the hon. member for Hastings, I believe, is not on it, and as the hon. member for West Ontario is not on it—would, of course, not be in the position of being able to ask a single question or make a single suggestion in the way in which a member of the committee would be. In England by nominating the hon. member who makes the charge a member of the committee, he has the same privileges as other members, except that of voting on the question. He is, therefore, able to say, for example: Mr. Chairman, I move that Mr. so-and-so be summoned as a witness; and the committee, except himself, decide whether the person be summoned. He also, for instance, proposes that such and such questions be asked; and the committee decide the matter. But the hon. member for West Ontario and the hon. member for East Hastings would not have the right to make any motion, either of them, before the committee. The English practice, therefore, seems to me the more convenient practice. We have no practice contrary to the English practice. Our rule has been in parallel cases to adopt the English practice, and, even if it has not been our rule, it is certainly calculated to meet the demands of justice.

MR. THOMPSON (Antigonish): So far as the requirements of justice are concerned, they are safe, I take it, in the hands of the committee. As regards the suggestion with respect to what witnesses should be summoned and what documents produced, both as regards the charge and the defence, the committee will decide that from day to day. But the mover of the committee in the resolution which has just been carried, put to the House his own sense of what practice should be adopted when he nominated a committee of which he was not himself a member, either for speaking, moving or voting. I think, therefore, we have, at least, an indication from the mover of the resolution that nothing of this kind was desired on his part. We have the further distinction which has been suggested by yourself, Mr. Speaker, that the committee has already been appointed and the will of the House already declared, that it should be the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. It is proposed by this motion to turn it into a special committee, entirely differently organised from the standing committee. Besides, Mr. Speaker, while there is no question, I presume, that the House has the right to depart from its ordinary practice and follow the English practice on this subject if it pleases, this much is certain: that both this House and the Provincial Legislatures, if it be proper to refer to them for precedents, have a well defined and established practice with respect to this very matter. In 1876 a charge was brought against a member of this House—not exactly a charge, but circumstances were brought to the notice of this House which, it was alleged, affected the right of the member to his seat. That matter was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections as originally constituted, and no application was made to the House by the promoter of the charge or those who were interested in the defence to be added to the Committee with any privileges whatever. In 1877, the House will remember, day after day, the House entertained charges, not only with respect to members having violated the Independence of Parliament Act, but as to members of the Government having allowed such members to violate the Independence of Parliament Act, and those matters were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the Committee sending for witnesses and documents; and yet in not one of the long list of cases, involving Messrs. Anglin, Currier, Norris, Burpee, Moffat, Workman, Desjardins, was the English practice, which has been appealed to now, followed, a practice which is not in any sense obligatory in the English Parliament but is entirely optional, as appears from the citation of the hon. member for Quebec East. In 1877, it will be remembered, a question was brought before this House as an amendment to go into Committee of Supply; it was an application to have the House affirm the principle that members of Parliament, and especially the Speaker of the House, should not be interested in contracts with the Government; and that motion was steadfastly refused by the hon. gentlemen who were then controlling this House, on the ground that while it might be proper to affirm such a general principle, the case was one which should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the case was subsequently referred to that committee; both sides, of course, were heard, witnesses, I presume, were examined, the case was reported on. But no intimation was given that the English practice should be adopted of having the matter go to a committee composed in part of the mover of the motion and the defender. The same practice existed in the Local Legislatures. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) will remember a case in which an imputation was made against himself in the Legislature of his own Province, and a proposition was made to the House that a committee should be appointed to investigate the charge, which was indirectly made. The hon. member, in the first place, required that the charge should be made more specific; then he required a further modification to be made, viz., that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The practice that has grown up in the Local Legislatures and in this Parliament, the House should not be called upon to depart from now for the purpose of following what is really not established to be the English rule on the subject, but a practice which occasionally is adopted in the Mother Country.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister of Justice is under a misapprehension when he suggests that, because I adopted the form I did of moving a committee without adding my own name to it, I did not think such a motion as has been moved by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) was necessary. In fact, the reason why I left my name off the committee was, that I considered such a motion as has been moved was necessary in order to supplement my resolution. For I think in a case of this kind it is as well, if it can be avoided, that the person who is in the position of a quasi prosecutor should not be acting as a judge upon the committee; but, at the same time, there is a manifest inconvenience which has already been pointed out, in his not being on the committee for the purpose of conducting the prosecution, if it may be so called. Now, in the cases to which the hon. Minister of Justice has referred as being referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections without any name being added in this way, I think, in nearly all these cases, the hon. member who made the charge or brought the matter before the House, or pressed it on the attention of the House, was already upon that committee. At all events, the Minister will not find that any application of this kind was refused when it was made; and I think it is more a matter for this House to decide than for me to press upon it. I have taken the responsibility of making this statement and moving for this committee; and as Mr. Roebuck said in the case of Mr. Butt, already quoted: I am sure I do not wish to press my services upon the committee unduly; but I am ready, whether I am allowed the privilege of appearing on the committee with a vote or not, to attend every day when requested, or every day the committee sits, until the matter is fully and thoroughly investigated. I would prefer to be on the committee and vote, so that my opportunity for usefulness might be increased, but if the Government do not wish that, of course I will have to submit.

Mr. HESSON. The informer is always examined.

Mr. SPEAKER. I perfectly agree that there is no rule against such a proceeding in the practice of the House, and that it is in the power of the House, as it is in accordance with English practice, to appoint additional members to a committee.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would like to ask why the name of the hon. Minister of Customs has been left off the committee. Can my hon. friend explain that?

Mr. LAURIER. I took it for granted that he was on the committee, and I shall be glad to have his name added.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Is not notice required for a motion of this kind?

Mr. IVES. I rise to a point of order. This motion is not really a motion to increase the membership of a standing committee, but simply a motion to add special members to a special committee—because this committee has been made a special committee for this purpose—and therefore I hold it is not in order.

Mr. BLAKE. The standing committees of this House—
Some hon. MEMBERS. Spoke, spoke.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not aware that I have spoken on the point of order. I was about to say that every standing committee was a select committee, for we have a special order under which we are bound to appoint seven, eight or nine standing committees in the early part of the Session, and the regulations with reference to them are no more cast-iron—are no more like the laws of the Medes and Persians, than those with reference to any other select committee. You have just now ruled, Sir, in accordance with the rules of the House, and alike in accordance with good sense. I think that it is quite in our power to modify the constitution of our ordinary committees under the limits provided by the English practice. It is simply a question of convenience whether it should be done in particular cases. If this be true, as laid down by the English practice, and as was plainly a requisite of justice and of the judicial attitude of the committees of the House, I think it applies as much in the case of this committee as in the case of all other committees, with regard to what the Minister of Justice has said as to the proceedings in the Ontario Legislature. I may say I have not looked at those proceedings for a long time, but my memory does not verify his statement that the motion he referred to in the Ontario Legislature was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BOWELL. Is that a point of order?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I did not say it was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but that the hon. gentleman said that he would require that it should be so sent. At a subsequent stage he carried an amendment in the Ontario Legislature which entirely changed the nature of the charge, in the view of those who were promoting it.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). What I stated was that the hon. gentleman required, before he moved his amendment, that the matter should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but when he was so fortunate as to get the charge made to suit himself, then he changed his mind.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) takes the point that this motion is not in order. The question is somewhat difficult, but it appears to me that the question of privilege which has brought up the question now before the House, has been disposed of by the motion which has just been carried. It seems to me, therefore, that this motion should have been moved as an amendment to the main motion, as amended when the motion of the hon. Minister of Public Works was carried, referring the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The question of privilege has been decided; this is now a question to add members to a committee, and as such motion requires notice, for that reason I think the motion is not in order.

SABLE AND SPANISH BOOM AND SLIDE COMPANY.

On the Order, House in Committee on Bill (No. 36) to grant certain powers to the Sable and Spanish Boom and Slide Company of Algoma, Limited.—(Mr. Sutherland, Oxford.)

Mr. CHARLTON. Information has been received today which makes it desirable that this Bill should stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). I do not know any reason why the Bill should stand. I allowed it to stand for a week, and if it stands from week to week, it may not be passed at all. There was an amendment asked to be made in the Bill which the promoters were perfectly willing to accept. If the hon. gentleman would state the nature of the amendment, it might be accepted at once.

Mr. CHARLTON. The company ask power to obstruct the navigation of a navigable river. We have not a diagram to show in what way this would be done, and I could not intelligently draw the amendment we desire to-day. The postponement of the Bill is desired for one day, in order that we may understand more fully the topography of the region, and the nature of the amendment we wish to draw, in order to leave the river unobstructed for rafts and vessels.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). Documents and surveys were submitted to the Committee on Private Bills and a provision to that end was inserted in the Bill and approved of. The promoters do not wish in any way to obstruct navigation; and if the hon. member would only suggest any amendment he desires, we would be quite willing to accept it now, although I should think the provision in the Bill would be quite satisfactory.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not notice that the Bill had been referred to the Private Bills Committee. I thought it would have been referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. Though not a canal, the river it relates to is between the two counties, and is in the nature of a canal. Therefore I had an amendment or two to propose when the Bill should come before that committee relating to the tariff of rates to be charged by the company. I thought we might insert in the Bill the same clause we have put in Bills for the incorporation of two or three companies of the same nature—for instance, in the Upper Ottawa Boom Company's Bill. Perhaps, therefore, the hon. promoter of the Bill will allow it to stand for a couple of days until I can confer with him, and I have no doubt he will accept an amendment which will put his Bill on the same footing in that regard as other Bills that have become law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). I certainly accept the proposition, and I am quite sure we shall be willing to accept the amendment.

Order allowed to stand.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish).

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 18) to incorporate the Midland Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Ward.)

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Medicine Hat Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 38) relating to the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Baker, Victoria.)

Bill (No. 40) relating to the Canada Southern Bridge Company.—(Mr. Baker, Victoria.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 73) to incorporate the North Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Haggart.)

Bill (No. 74) to incorporate the Ste. Ursule, Mattawan and Lake Temiscamingue Railway Company.—(Mr. Hurteau.)

CARAQUET RAILWAY COMPANY SUBSIDY.

Mr. WELDON asked, What amount has been paid to the Caraqueet Railway Company on account of the subsidy granted by this Parliament? What is the estimated cost per mile of such railway?

Mr. POPE. The subsidy paid is $105,200. From my recollection, the estimated cost is about $12,500 per mile.

RICHIBUCTO AND ST. LOUIS RAILWAY SUBSIDY.

Mr. WELDON asked, What amount has been paid on account of the subsidy granted by this Parliament for the railway from Richibucto to St. Louis, in the county of Kent, N.B., and to whom paid; and what is the estimated cost per mile of the said railway?

Mr. POPE. The sum paid on that railway is $22,400. A rough estimate of the cost is about $8,000 per mile. The sum was paid to the St. Louis and Richibucto Railway Company.

PROTECTION OF SEA FISHERIES.

Mr. DAVIES asked, Whether any instructions have been issued to the officials charged with the protection of the Sea Fisheries under the Treaty of 1818? If so, what those instructions are, and will the Minister of Marine and Fisheries lay a copy of the same upon the Table of the House?

Mr. FOSTER. Instructions have been issued, but it is not considered advisable in the public interests to bring them down at present.

TREATY OF 1818—CO-OPERATION OF NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. DAVIES asked, Whether any, and what steps have been taken to obtain the co-operation of the Newfoundland Government in the carrying out of the provisions of the Treaty of 1818?

Mr. FOSTER. Certain negotiations have been going on or some time, but are not yet completed.

CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. CURRAN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to continue the canal tolls at the reduced rate fixed last season?

Mr. POPE. The Government have received some information about these tolls and are now considering the matter.

OBSTRUCTION IN THE ST. LAWRENCE CHANNEL NEAR THE BOUCHERVILLE ISLANDS.

Mr. BENOIT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to induce the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal to cease depositing the clay, &c., raised in deepening the Harbor of Montreal and the channel of the St. Lawrence, in the channels of the Boucherville Islands, and obstructing by so doing the flow of the waters of the St. Lawrence, and causing disastrous inundations from Boucherville upwards to Montreal?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In answer to the hon. member I must tell him that the attention of the Government having been called upon that question by the hon. member, we will communicate with the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal to induce them to cease obstructing the flow of the waters of the St. Lawrence, by depositing the clay and gravel which is raised from the bottom of the river and afterwards dumped near the Boucherville Islands.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BONDS.

Mr. JACKSON asked, Has the Government, in anticipation of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company paying them twenty millions of dollars within the next few months, given up to said company the twenty millions of bonds held by the Government as security for said twenty million dollars, to allow said railroad company to sell these same bonds to raise the money to pay to the Government? If so, did the Government endorse or guarantee the payment of said bonds? If not, do they intend to do so?

Mr. McLELAN. They have not given up the bonds, and they do not intend to endorse them.

IMPROVEMENTS ON ST. ANDREW'S RAPIDS, RED RIVER.

Mr. ROSS asked, Is it the intention of the Government to make improvements on St. Andrew's Rapids, Red River; and if so, what will be done this year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. During the past year an examination was made of the Red River between Winnipeg and Selkirk, of that portion known as the Rapids, relative to improving the channel to permit the boats plying on Lake Winnipeg to reach Winnipeg throughout the season of navigation. To dredge a channel one hundred feet in width to nine feet at low water the distance required, viz., ten miles, would require the removal of 905,000 cubic yards of material, to do which would be both tedious and expensive: first, because the current is very strong; second, boulders are very large and numerous; third, that solid rock may be met with; and fourth, the whole of the dredged stuff would have to be towed below the foot of the rapids and deposited in the deep holes of the river. The cost has been approximately estimated at $600,000. This is the scheme proposed to me by Mr. Assistant Gouin, who made the examination. But I believe that by the creation of two locks and movable dams, known as the "Chaudiere Dam," the navigation can be maintained at the period of low water, and as during high water the dams can be thrown, the river would have a free and uninterrupted course, and that these improvements would cost less and be executed more speedily than dredging.

WHARF AT SELKIRK.

Mr. ROSS asked, Do the Government intend placing a sum in the Estimates this year to erect a wharf at Selkirk?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to answer that question, whether we will put a sum in the Estimates and ask Parliament to vote it, but the matter is now receiving the attention of my Department. I understand the wharf would cost something like $10,000 or $15,000.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND MAILS.

Mr. McINTYRE (for Mr. YEO) asked, 1st. Whether the tender of Muncey Irvine for carrying the mails from the ice boats was accepted? 2nd. Whether such acceptance was subsequently cancelled, and if so, on what grounds?

Mr. FOSTER. The tender of Muncey Irvine for carrying the mails from the ice boats was not accepted.

PUBLIC DEBT OF CANADA.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, 1. The gross public debt of Canada on April 1st, 1886. 2. The net public debt of Canada on April 1st, 1886.

Mr. McLELAN. The gross public debt on the 1st April was $280,837,812.84, being $176,720 less than on the 1st March. The net public debt on the 1st April, 1886, is $205,025,890, being $3,496,805 less than on the 1st March.

DEPOSITS IN GOVERNMENT SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. MULLOCK asked, What is the largest sum on deposit in any one person's name, at any time during the year 1885, in the Government Savings Bank or Post Office Savings Bank?

Mr. McLELAN. The largest sum received in any one person's name during the year 1885 in the Dominion Government Savings Banks was $3,000.

Mr. MULLOCK. The question was what was the largest amount on deposit, not how much was received in any one person's name.

Mr. McLELAN. The largest sum on deposit, I think, is $3,000. There may be some sums added for interest from the previous year, but this is the answer to the question as it appears.

Mr. MULLOCK. I see that the question is incorrectly printed "What is the largest sum or deposit?" instead of "What is the largest sum on deposit?" Perhaps the hon. gentleman might give the answer on a subsequent day.

Mr. McLELAN. I cannot give it at present.

BRITISH COLUMBIA DEEP-WATER FISHERIES.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of British Columbia, or any person, and the Dominion Government, with regard to the deep-water fisheries on the coast of British Columbia.

He said: I think this subject is one of great importance to this Dominion. The developing of these fisheries means increase of trade, increase of revenue, and increased avenue of labor. I am bound to say that the Government have taken a deep interest in developing and fostering the fisheries in some parts of the Dominion, and we would desire that, as British Columbia is a part of the Dominion, the Government should give some attention in that direction. We have our unsurpassed salmon fisheries, the commercial value of which is at least $1,500,000 a year, but I believe that if our deep-water fisheries were developed, they would prove as valuable, if not more so. This matter was brought to the notice of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for the past two years, both by the Provincial Government and by some, if not all, of our representatives in this House; and the promise was made on the part of the Minister that some action would be taken; but I am not aware that, up to the present time, any action has been taken in that direction. I have no doubt whatever that we have valuable codfish banks, and other valuable fish deposits in those waters hitherto unknown. About a year ago, beautiful specimens were brought down from the west coast of Queen Charlotte Islands, and I am told they were of excellent quality; but we have no knowledge whether they can be taken in large quantities or not. Captain Swan, of the United States, in a trip to the north coast of Vancouver Island, obtained a large quantity of this class of fish, and sent a large number to Washington and other places in the United States, and it is said that he received more letters of enquiry in reference to the locality in which this class of fish was caught than in reference to any other question raised by his trip. Beautiful specimens of this class of fish have been caught on other parts of the west coast of Vancouver Island. It is to be regretted that, though we have over a thousand miles of coast line, with bays, rivers, and rivulets innumerable, nothing has been done to search for fishing banks for deep-water fish. This is a matter of great importance, and one which, it seems to me, the Government ought to take a deep interest in. I sincerely trust that, the matter having been brought under the notice of the House and the Government, some means will be adopted by which the deep-water fisheries of our coast will be developed.

Mr. FOSTER. The papers that are in the possession of the Department will be brought down. I think the House will agree with my hon. friend as to the importance and necessity of developing those treasures of the sea of which he speaks. As to the promise given a year or two ago by the Department, I think it was conditional on private enterprise co-operating with the instruments that would be placed at their disposal by the Government; and private enterprise did not seem to be equal to the occasion. I am very glad my hon. friend has brought this question to the attention of the House and the Government, and whatever can be done will be done by the Department.

Motion agreed to.

SETTLEMENT OF LANDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the British Columbia Government and the Dominion Government respecting the fulfilment of agreement on the part of the Dominion Government in the matter of opening up the lands in British Columbia for settlement.

He said: It will be remembered that for some years previous to 1884 there were disputes between the Provincial Government of our Province and the Dominion Government. At length a settlement was arrived at, and the result was that an Act was passed in this House two years ago. I am sorry to say, however, that so far as the Dominion Government are concerned, I think they have failed to carry out their agreement; the Provincial Government, however, I think, have carried out their part to the very letter. I desire to call the attention of the House to a clause in the agreement as follows:—

“The Government of Canada shall, with all convenient speed, offer for sale the lands within the railway belt upon the mainland, upon liberal terms to actual settlers.”

Now, Sir, up to the present time little or nothing has been done in this direction towards carrying out this obligation on the part of this Government. The lands referred to are practically withheld from settlement, and actual settlers, who have located, some of them, on these lands in good faith, are still unable to obtain the patents to which they are justly entitled. I am informed that some 3,000 applications are on record in the office of the Agent of the Dominion Government in British Columbia, and not one, that I am aware of, has received any satisfaction. This, to my mind, is very unsatisfactory, and the result is that people are much dissatisfied. Nothing has tended to retard settlement in that Province more than the withholding of the patents to these lands from people who have located upon them. Many of these people became so discouraged that they left the Province. I will refer the House to the last report of the Agent of this Government which he sent to the Minister of the Interior, where he says:

“The statement made in my report to you of 10th December, 1884, that a large percentage of the applications then made would probably be abandoned or withdrawn, has been verified by the communications and applications received during the past twelve months, some of the applications then referred to having since been abandoned by letter, and in many instances the lands comprised in such previous applications have been re-applied for by other persons, who state that the previous applicants have left the country, or that the lands are unoccupied and unimproved.”

Now, Sir, such a fact is calculated to do an immense injury to the Province of British Columbia, a Province which, in reality, is just opening up, and where great inducements have been held out to people to go in and locate upon these lands, and to whom assurance was given at the time by the Dominion Government that these lands should be thrown open at one dollar an acre. That promise, I am sorry to say, has not been carried out. In calling for these papers I desire that the House should see what applications have been made, and what remonstrances have been made by the Provincial Government and other persons in reference to this matter. I sincerely trust the matter will receive immediate attention; in fact, I feel satisfied that while the Department is under the management of the present Minister of the Interior, greater justice will be done to that Province than has been done in the past.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There is no objection whatever to the motion, and to the papers being brought down. I may say that I regret as much as the hon. gentleman does the delays that have taken place. I believe that immediately after the lands were handed over to the Dominion Government an officer, formerly in the employ of the Government of British Columbia, Mr. Aikman, was appointed as our agent at Vancouver to look after the lands on the mainland. He has been engaged in making copies of the pre-emption records and surveys in the offices of the Provincial Government in Victoria. Latterly some mistake, I believe, occurred in connection with these copies, but they were rectified, and the last information I have is that the local Minister specially charged with these matters, owing to the commencement of the session of the Provincial Legislature, was unable to find time to certify, as he required to do, these plans for the use of the agent. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I have, within a short time past, about four weeks ago, given instructions to our agent at Victoria at once to remove to Westminster where he would be of more easy access to settlers who desired to get their patents, and that arrangements were made through the Department of Public Works for the use of a couple of rooms in one of the public buildings at that point. Communication with British Columbia, as you are aware, Mr. Speaker, is still not very rapid, and I have not yet an answer from Mr. Trutch or Mr. Aikman as to whether the latter has moved. I am in daily expectation of receiving an answer to my communication with Mr. Trutch on this subject. I regret much that I was not able last fall to have gone to British Columbia myself so as to make enquiry about these matters on the spot, where, I believe, more information can be obtained than is possible by letter. My intention is, if Parliament continues its confidence to us, and my life is spared, in addition to going to some other parts of the North-West, which I was not able to reach last year, to go to British Columbia, and on the spot try to make such arrangements as may facilitate the immediate settlement of all these matters in which settlers are interested, so that they may get their lands at once. I can assure the hon. gentleman that every effort will be made to accomplish that result at the earliest moment, and that the officer is now under instructions to remove to Westminster, where he will be of more easy access to settlers who desire their land.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). Who is really in charge of the lands out there, representing the Department of the Interior? Is it Mr. Trutch or Mr. Aikman? And who will be acting at Westminster?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. Aikman is the ordinary agent of the Department, but communications to him pass through Mr. Trutch as the general agent of the Government. I am going to ask Parliament this Session to transfer the management of the lands in British Columbia to our ordinary Land Board at Winnipeg, where we will be able very much more satisfactorily to settle all these matters, and I say that without the slightest reflection upon Mr. Trutch. Mr. Aikman is the agent who has been moved to Westminster.

Mr. HOMER. The policy pursued by the Government in relation to land in the railway belt of British Columbia has been, although one of delay, the means of placing those lands in the hands of actual settlers, a result which, I think, we all hope may be secured in other parts of the Dominion where a large quantity of public lands is now held by the Government. If a different policy, or a more hasty policy, had been pursued by which those lands would have been put on the market for sale, the probability is they would now have been in the hands of a few speculators, and that result would have proved very detrimental to the settlement of the Province. No doubt there are some grievances, and I would like to know where there are not some land grievances at the present time, and British Columbia cannot expect to be exempt; but, whatever those grievances are, I feel confident that under the energetic administration of the Minister of the Interior they will be speedily removed.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THE NORTH-WEST REBELLION.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to move the motion of which I gave notice some time ago, as follows:—

That it is the duty of the Government without further delay to bring down further papers relating to North-West affairs, and throwing light on the situation prior to, during and subsequent to the late rebellion.

I do not think it is necessary for me at this stage to trespass at any length on the time of the House in support of this motion. I have already stated upon former occasions, I stated last Session and I have restated this Session, what I conceive to be the general aspects of this question, the principles upon which we ought to deal with it and the facts which are material to a judgment. We all know, to our sorrow, that a very serious revolt occurred in March of last year, involving the loss of millions of treasure, many sorrows and many lives and involving also consequences to the future of our country, material and moral, which it is difficult at this time to estimate. When in our age of the world and with our system of Government such an outbreak occurs, the prima facie presumption of mankind is that there must have been something wrong on the part of those who had control of the administration of affairs. The prima facie presumption is that there will be no rising, with all the risk and troubles which that involves, without some cause, inadequate it may be, but still without some cause or without some default on the part of those who govern. That presumption is, of course, capable of being rebutted; but nevertheless it exists; it is founded upon common sense; and it involves this consequence, that the Government which has the administration of affairs, which has full control, is bound to vindicate itself under such circumstances; when the public peace has been broken, when public order has been disturbed, it becomes the bounden duty of the Government to set forth a vindication of itself and a rebuttal of that presumption which arises from those facts. Another material proposition is this: That the Government is in possession of all the evidence and the facts, and is bound from that circumstance to lay them before the House and the country as materials for its judgment. So much, Sir, for the general propositions which I have advanced, and which I restate to-night as applicable to the case of a rising in our times. But in the present case there are special reasons why these duties to which I have referred devolved upon the Government of the day. In the first place, there were long standing, unsettled claims and grievances; substantial or unsubstantial, there were yet long standing unsettled claims and grievances. Why, Sir, the leader of the Government last Session and members of the Government since have declared that there was culpable neglect on the part of the late Administration, which ceased to hold office in the fall of 1878, with respect to some of those North-West claims. That proposition is denied. But supposing it to be admitted, supposing the statement to be true, supposing the allegation of hon. gentlemen opposite which with a perversity which is almost ridiculous, they assert in their defence were true, does not that prove conclusively how aggravated is that guilt, how intense is that guilt, which left unsettled and undealt with claims in respect of which there had been culpable neglect so long ago as the fall of 1878? How are we to account for 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884 under those circumstances? Then, Sir, there was in this case also a long continued agitation which renders the neglect and delay the less excusable. Again, there was a serious warning and a crisis in the position when, in June, 1884, Riel came, after which time there were nine months for action before the actual outbreak, and the circumstance of his arrival and all the concomitant circumstances add enormously to the responsibility of the Government for diligence, promptness and liberality in their action. Again, there was in this case the special circumstances of danger arising from the large savage Indian population in the Territories, from the relation of the half-breeds to the Indians and from the isolated and defenceless position of the settlements in that country—circumstances known to the Government, circumstances so well known to the Government that the First Minister declared last Session that the wonder was there had not been an outbreak long before 1885, long before the outbreak last year, when he told the House that the Indians were desperate, starving and in a condition of irritation and discontent. Those were circumstances which certainly were calculated to heighten to an incalculable degree the responsibility of the Government, and therefore to call into display in the highest measure diligence and earnestness in the settlement of all grievances. Now, the Government acknowledges theoretically its duty of diligence and fair treatment. It acknowledges also its accountability to Parliament, and it has challenged and courted—I use the phrase of the First Minister himself—enquiry into these transactions. But it has alleged, first of all, that there were no complaints from the half-breeds before the rising. The First Minister stated on 26th March, 1885:

“Before Riel came in they (the half-breeds) had never sent in a bill of rights to us; they had never sent any complaints to the Government.”

Sir David Macpherson, the late Minister of the Interior, in the Senate during last Session said:

“No half-breed delegation came to Ottawa to complain of ill-treatment or to make complaints in relation to their land.”

Then the Government alleges by the mouth of the late Minister of the Interior—I quote again from his speech of last Session—that:

"There never was any reason to apprehend an outbreak; there was not the slightest apprehension of the discontent taking any form more serious than words until the outbreak took place."

So that having alleged there were no despatches embodying the grievances of the half-breeds before the rebellion, they allege there was no warning or apprehension of the outbreak until the outbreak occurred. Then they allege that there has been no negligence and no delay, neglect or mismanagement; that all things were done well, wisely, promptly, liberally, and that there were no grievances. The First Minister repeated during the course of last Session these statements, if not these words, their substance; and Sir David Macpherson stated in the Senate last Session:

"The half-breeds had no grievances whatever in relation to the lands or as to any other matters."

In truth the allegation of the Government is that there were no grievances connected with the half-breed Indian rights, with the rights of the unenumerated half-breeds of Manitoba, with the rights in connection with surveys, river fronts, patents, reserves, colonisation companies, wood rights, and other rights. Then, the Government alleges that white men were at the bottom of it all. The First Minister said last year in this House that there "was a deep laid conspiracy; that it is to white men, to men of our race and lineage, and not to the half-breeds, nor yet to the Indians, that we are to attribute the war, the loss of life and the loss of money." And Sir David Macpherson said in the Senate:

"I fear there will be found among them (the guilty parties) more than redskins. I fear that unfriendly whites, disloyal whites, men of the farmers' union class have had a good deal to do with precipitating the half-breed rebellion."

Then the Government alleges that until they came in, until the period at which they assumed office, in 1878, the half-breeds were happy, that they were contented and did not complain. What said the First Minister last Session? He said in substance:

The Government alleges that till they came in the half-breeds were happy, contented and did not complain; and it was after they came in that the half-breeds, taught by the Opposition in Parliament and by the Reform press that they were oppressed; and the Government charges on the Liberal party in this House and out of it, the responsibility and the consequences of the rebellion.

Now, Sir, the distance which exists between Ottawa and the North-West Territories rendered it necessary that the dealings of the Government with that country, and the communications between local officials and the governed parties of that country and Ottawa, should be almost entirely in writing. They have been almost entirely in writing and there are, therefore, records of the course of events. "What is written remains." And that evidence is in the hands of the incriminated Government. If it has been guilty of no neglect, delay, or mismanagement, the papers will show it. If there were no grievances, the documents will prove it. If there were no complaints, the production of the documents will show that. If there were no warnings of danger the papers will show that. If there was a conspiracy amongst the whites and they are the guilty people, the written evidence will establish it. And if the Liberal party in and out of the House fomented discontent and raised the rebellion, the evidence will doom them to the fate they deserve. It is then the duty of the Government to give us the full information. These papers are not their papers; they are the country's papers. The Government have been pressed to perform this duty in Parliament since the year 1883, in March of which year I moved my motion with reference to the grievances of the people of Prince Albert, and you heard this afternoon, a few moments before it was expected this motion would come on, a supplementary return to the order of 1883, brought down to Parliament. Since March, 1885, the pressure upon them has been constant and continuous; they have been asked time and again, from day to day, to produce the papers. They have acknowledged their liability to produce them. They have acknowledged their obligation to produce them, but they delayed last Session on these grounds: First, they said it was dangerous to the public interest during the rising to produce certain papers, the existence of which was acknowledged, the materiality of which was acknowledged, and they were detained for that reason. Secondly, they said it was dangerous to private interests during the rebellion to produce certain papers the existence of which was acknowledged, the materiality of which was acknowledged, but which were not to be produced while the uprising continued. Thirdly, they said that they had not clerks enough to copy them; that we asked for so many papers, that they could not possibly get the time; that they were embarrassed by these demands, that time must be given. And lastly, towards the close of the Session, they promised that these papers would be collated and laid on the Table of the House at the opening of this Session. I asked for them at the opening of the House this Session and was told that they were to be brought down. I asked when they were to be brought down, and I was told that they were in course of preparation, and here we are in the fifth or sixth week of the Session without these papers yet. I say it is time for this House to assert its dignity, and to teach the Government its duty by declaring that it is its duty—as I move that the House shall now declare it to be their duty—to bring down these papers.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman has tried to do the best he could with his motion; he has tried to show that the Government had failed in their duty in bringing down papers to this House. The hon. gentleman will forgive me, I have no doubt, if I do not agree with him on that head. The Government have brought down, from time to time, the papers that were asked by the addresses of this House or the Orders of this House. We have, in certain cases, delayed bringing down papers, because it was not in the interests of the country that they should be brought down. That is a responsibility which the Government had to take, and which, as long as we occupy these benches, we intend taking. In the position we hold, of course there are matters which we know, and which hon. gentlemen around us and opposite us are not in a position to know, and we have to protect the public interests, even against the curiosity, the laudable curiosity, of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side. The hon. gentleman says that there were addresses passed by this House calling upon us, in 1883, for certain papers, and that they were not produced. We produced a number of papers from time to time—large numbers of papers—and I have no doubt that with the exception of the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, I do not suppose we could find another member of this House who has gone through those papers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, yes.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A few, but not all, I am sure. I am sure there is not one member that will say that, and I do not expect it either; nobody expects it from them. Those papers were so numerous that it was a task to go over them. But the leader of the Opposition thought it was his duty to do so and has done so, as he does I have no doubt with all other papers brought down to this House.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh, no.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Well, when I see the hon. gentleman so unwell at his seat, I begin to think that he is doing a little too much in that direction, and that if he did a little less the country would not suffer for it. The hon. gentleman says that even to day we brought down certain papers. Well, that shows how far we are disposed to go and how ready we were to bring these papers down. From the beginning of the Session every day, every second or third day, we have brought down voluminous papers, large numbers of papers in accordance with the instructions of the House and others have been laid on the Table of the House without being asked for by the House. Our disposition has always been to bring down papers in accordance with the direction of the House. We have brought all the papers we thought we could bring consistently with our duty towards the country and saving the interests of the country; and the House may be assured that any further papers that the House may order or may require shall be brought down if they are of the same kind—if we can bring them down with safety to the country. But we cannot, and I have no doubt hon. gentlemen, when they think about it, cannot expect us to bring down papers that the interest of the country requires should not be brought down; but on the contrary will agree that we should not communicate them to the House or the country. We are here as custodians of these papers; we have been put here as the executive of the country for the purpose of guarding its interests; and if on our responsibility as Ministers of the Crown we think any of the papers asked by the House are such as we should keep, we must take that responsibility, and I have no doubt the House will sustain us in that course. I repeat that all the papers we could bring down, consistently with the interests of the country, have been brought down, and our intention is to continue in the same course.

Mr. BLAKE. If it is possible to be surprised, I am surprised at the line the hon. gentleman has taken. He has now made the declaration that the Government have brought down all the papers connected with this matter, which, consistently with the public interest, they could bring down—that there are no papers not before us except such as are retained in view of the public interests—

Sir HECTOR LANGÉVIN. I did not say that.

Mr. BLAKE,—secret interests, which we cannot learn. The hon. gentleman has said that they have brought down the papers which have been moved for. You have heard him speak of the diligence with which they have brought them down. It was but this afternoon that they brought down papers which were ordered three years ago; that is the diligence the hon. gentleman boasts of. In April, 1886, they bring down the papers setting forth the grievances complained of by the settlers in the year 1882, for which an order of this House was made in the spring of 1883; and the hon. gentleman says: "See how diligent we have been; and I ask that confidence should be reposed in us by the House and the country that we will promptly bring down what papers ought to be brought down." Now, after the hon. gentleman's statement, I am only going to refer some of the papers which I declare and believe to exist, as to many of them from information furnished in papers already brought down, as to others from the public journals and other sources, and as to others from statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite; and I will show you that the ground the hon. gentleman takes is entirely inconsistent with and contradictory of the statement of the leader of the Government made last Session on this subject. If that ground was to have been taken, we ought to have known it last Session; we ought to have known it at the beginning of this Session. But to-night we hear the Government declare that it has discharged the duty which the First Minister acknowledged last Session repeatedly was incumbent upon them—not to wait for an address or an order of the House under circumstances of this kind, because we had not the particulars; we cannot be expected to have the particulars; we are outside; hon. gentlemen are inside; the secrets of the prison house are with them; it is they who know the papers and the correspondence and the documents are which were to be brought forward; and the First Minister, in recognition of the obligation of the Government, two or three times last Session brought down large numbers of papers which were not moved for or ordered, because he felt and admitted that it was his duty to bring down those papers spontaneously. So this Session I asked him: "Am I not to understand that the Government are going to bring down papers spontaneously?" "Yes," he said. "When?" I asked. He said: "They are in course of preparation." The duty was acknowledged last Session and this Session; but under the pretence of the public interest, documents, material to a judgment, are retained. Now, I repeat, as applicable to the condition of things, the statement I read at the opening of this Session made by a former colleague of hon. gentlemen who knew their methods of transacting business:

"I knew that you and the majority of your colleagues would not hesitate to garble or suppress important State papers, even when demanded by Parliament, if their production was likely to expose or embarrass the Government."

It is time, Sir, that this farce of treating the public interest and the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite as synonymous, of treating the defence of an incriminated Government as a public interest, should cease, or if it is not to cease, that it should be exposed; and I declare that I am informed and believe that there are, and that it can be proved that there are, under the control of this Government, material documents affecting the question of their neglect, delay and mismanagement of North-West matters prior to the late rebellion. That is my statement on this subject, and if this House will give us the opportunity of proving that, we shall be prepared to establish it. Sir, it has already been established by the discussions which have taken place and by the papers which have thus far been brought down, in the first place, and in the general, that there were a large number of papers brought down which were on the face of them imperfect, in that they did not disclose the answers of the Government to the demands made on them in correspondence and in petitions to them. I do not detail these demands; I state this to be the case—that there are numerous letters which appear to have been received, the receipt of which is admitted, but in respect of which there is nothing to show the action of the Government. I am to assume, I suppose, that there was no action taken, there being no further papers brought down. Now, I will go through a list, which I have hurriedly made, of some of these documents, the existence of which appear to have been established. The letter of Bishop Grandin to the Governor General in September, 1873; the reply to that letter sent to the Lieutenant Governor; the despatch to the Lieutenant Governor with that reply; the despatch to the Lieutenant Governor of the 2nd of April, 1884; a report of Colonel Dennis enclosed in the Lieutenant Governor's despatch; further despatches of Lieutenant Governor Morris, 50 N, 154 N, and 159 N; the instructions as to surveys, and correspondence about surveys, and reports of surveyors as to those districts relating to which questions have arisen—Prince Albert, St. Laurent, Carlton, Duck Lake, the scenes of the troubles, Edmonton, Battleford, St. Albert, and Qu'Appelle, orders approving of the surveys, and letters despatching surveys to land offices, &c., from 1875 down to 1886. There are the orders and regulations and correspondence as to the river lots and the system of surveys on rivers. There is Russell's report on the surveys and settlements of Prince Albert and neighborhood, about 1877 or 1878. There are the special reports of Aldous on surveys of 1878 and 1879. There are Russell's instructions for his visit to the district in 1878 or thereabouts, and report thereon. There is the petition of settlers east of the main settlement of Prince Albert, put into the Surveyor General's hands before 14th January, 1879; and the action taken thereon. There is Duck's report on the half-breed claims in Battleford of 1879. There are Ryan's and the other reports on the unenumerated half-breed claims, the action on these reports and the correspondence. There is the information on Pearce's statement of 11th March, 1882, that the settlers on the south branch, near St. Laurent, took lands before the survey on river system, and that a resurvey was wanted. There are the reports showing how much land was surveyed when the change of system was adopted. There is Nolin's letter accompanying the petition of the half-breeds, of 11th September, 1882. There is the answer to Sir David Macpherson's letter of 23rd April, 1883. There is very important correspondence referred to in report of Mr. Pearce of 12th March, 1885. There is the copy of the resolutions of Prince Albert, of October, 1883, and of the letter enclosing those to Sir John Macdonald, which I saw in a newspaper, and to which I drew the attention of the Government. There is the petition of the residents of St. Louis de Langevin to the Minister of the Interior, in the fall of 1880. There are several further petitions from the same parties between that date and November, 1883. There are the correspondence and action of Messrs. Royal, Macdougall, Clark, Bishop Grandin, and Father Leduc, on the same subject. There are Mr. Duck's letters on the same subject referred to by him. There is the action of Mr. Walsh on the reference to him of Qu'Appelle half-breeds case of 6th July, 1882. There is the petition brought down by Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney; the papers submitted by them, the answers given and the action ordered and the action taken. There is the report of the President of the Council and the Minister of Interior on the Privy Council's reference to them of the memorandum of the North-West Council dated 9th October, 1883. There are the representations of the North-West Council not brought down, and correspondence with them. All the papers and full reports from all officers as to the Prince Albert Colonisation Company, up to date of rebellion. The petitions or resolutions and correspondence of the St. Catherines settlers, about the 21st January, 1884, which I showed, last Session, took place, by a reference to a newspaper. The petition and correspondence of settlers of Red Deer Hill, of January, 1884. The petition and correspondence of settlers of Halero Settlement, South Branch, in January, 1884. The petition and correspondence of settlers at Colleston, of February, 1884. The resolution of the North-West Council, of 21st July, 1884. The telegram to the Government of the Lieutenant-Governor thereupon, and the telegram in reply. The despatch of the Lieutenant-Governor and the reply, and the action taken thereupon. The petitions forwarded to Ottawa, prior to 1880, as mentioned by Mr. Montour at the meeting held by Father André, which was reported in a newspaper. The correspondence with Bishop Grandin referred to in his speech on the 5th February, 1884, which I read last Session. Bishop Grandin said:

"As to the other propositions, I have busied myself already for a long time with these in your special interest. I have put upon the Federal Government all possible pressure to obtain justice; I have even obtained promises, which I believed to be official, but which I have the pain of seeing to-day forgotten. I have felt the same discontent which you have also felt, and I have not failed to complain upon the subject at high quarters."

The report of Col. Houghton in the summer of 1884, referred to in the Militia report, a part of the facts contained in which were disclosed in the Winnipeg Sun. The letter of Bishop Grandin to the First Minister in the summer of 1884; that letter which I asked about last Session, and the existence of which has since been proved by the letter of Bishop Grandin to Archbishop Taché, which I read, in which the bishop says that learning the archbishop is desirous of getting copies of the letters he wrote to members of the Government, he sends to him copies. The letter of Bishop Grandin to the Minister of Public Works in the summer of 1884. The directions, and action thereon, as shown by Pearce, on 19th September, 1883, as to the inspection of the half-breeds' lands. The letter from Mr. Deville, of 23rd, November 1883, as to rivers and river lots, and the correspondence on that. The petitions of settlers in St. Catherines, presented to Pearce early in 1884. The many letters sent to Ottawa, through Mr. Duck, before 1883, by Father Vegreville, as stated by him on the 19th January, 1884. The letters of which Mr. Duck speaks also in the same correspondence. The promise of a survey in the fall of 1883, made by Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney and shown Father Vegreville. The revocation of river lot order announced in the Saskatchewan Herald on 9th May, 1884, and all action thereon. The various orders and correspondence as to wood rights. The letter of Mr. Jackson to the Minister of Public Works, of 3rd September, 1884, shown in the telegram to the chairman of the Half-breed Commission to exist, and referred to by me as indicating what was required to be done. The report of the Minister of Public Works on his visit, and in pursuance of his pledge to the half-breeds of Qu'Appelle. On that occasion he is reported in Le Manitoba as follows:--

"After mass, Sir Hector Langevin addressed the Metis. They asked that the Government should give them scrip, as it did to those of Manitoba. Sir Hector considered the request reasonable, and promised to submit it to his colleagues."

There were other things stated in my speech on this subject last Session. I pointed out that not merely the Minister of Public Works, but also the Minister of Railways, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the Postmaster General visited the North-West; that then there were the deputies who went there, the Deputy Minister of Interior, the Comptroller of the Mounted Police, and that year or the year before, the Deputy Superintendent of Indian Affairs. I referred also to the Lieutenant-Governor, the Indian agents, the farm instructors, the Crown land agents, the Crown timber agents, the registrars, the Land Board, the inspector of local colonization companies, the inspectors of agencies, the stipendiary magistrates, the Mounted Police, the militia, the school masters, the North-West council; and besides these, as pointed out, there were the non-officials, but men interested in the prosperity of the country, and to whom hon. gentlemen have frequently and properly appealed for advice, assistance and information, the officers of the Hudson Bay Company and the clergy of the country. Then I referred to another class of information which we also required to obtain; the information connected with the appointments to office of those who were taking an active part in the movements of 1884. There was Louis Schmidt, the secretary of the Riel invitation meeting, appointed an assistant land agent; Mr. Dumais was offered the position of Indian instructor; Mr. Isbester's case; and that of Gabriel Dumont. I also said that, during that summer, I had reason to believe that amongst the unofficial persons who yet were clothed with great authority and responsibility in this matter, and who communicated with the Government, was Bishop Grandin. I believed, he wrote more than once, saying, in substance, that the half-breeds were greatly dissatisfied; that he and his clergy were losing all influence with them; that they were no longer respected; that they were frequently accused of having no real sympathy with the half-breeds and their grievances; that it was said that, on the contrary, the clergy's sympathy was always sure to be with the Government; adding, that unless a prompt settlement of their just claims was affected, serious troubles were sure to come soon; and pointing out that the half-breeds being the link between the whites and the Indians, it was important that all cause of dissatisfaction should be removed, as if trouble should arise with the half-breeds, it would spread to the Indians, and the consequences would be terrible. I stated that I had reason to believe, also, from other information, that Archbishop Taché himself wrote, that Mr. McDowell wrote, that Father André and others wrote, and

I could hardly believe otherwise than that Mr. Duck and Mr. Pierce wrote. Then, there was Sheriff Chapleau, who was interviewed in the fall of 1884, and expressed his opinion of the condition of things. There was also Judge Rouleau, who wrote twice to Mr. Dewdney about the disaffection of the half-breeds, urging prompt redress, and Mr. Dewdney answered that he had forwarded his letters and urged prompt settlement. That in the latter part of 1884 Judge Rouleau wrote to the First Minister himself, directly and strongly on the question. I said that after the July sitting of the North-West Council, Judge Rouleau, Mr. Hayter Reed, and Mr. Forget went to Duck Lake. The ostensible mission of the first two was to select the site for a court, and that of Mr. Forget to inspect ferries and schools; but according to my information, their main object was to ascertain the feeling of the half-breeds on the situation, and certainly, if it was not, it ought to have been, after all the warnings the Government had received. A report of this mission was, I believed, made to Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney, and through him to the Government, that there existed considerable dissatisfaction, which might lead to serious consequences, unless promptly remedied, and the views of Bishop Grandin, and probably of Father André and others, were, as I believed, obtained. But none of these papers have been communicated to us. I had also been informed that Mr. Forget has stated that Mr. Dewdney had repeatedly warned the Government, and could clear himself from the heavy load of responsibility which unquestionably devolved upon him if he did not give any warning. Where are these warnings? Then there are the missing Mounted Police reports, some of which are proved to exist, by the statements I have made, and there is the missing report of Col. Houghton, the existence of which I have proved, and then, in the month of October, as I pointed out, Governor Dewdney himself visited St. Albert and various places near that country, perhaps, not in the immediate neighborhood of the disturbed region, but a neighborhood which would give him naturally the opportunity of communication with men of great importance, and I could hardly conceive that after that visit he should not have acquired and communicated much information. Then there is the report of Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney as to his evil reception by the half-breeds in this very district, which, I believe, is referred to by Bishop Grandin in one of the letters which the Government declines to bring down. There is the report of Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney on his visit to Edmonton and Stobart, in October, 1884. There is the correspondence with the resolutions of the meeting at Moosomin, in December, 1884, which I proved last Session by the authority of the local paper; there is the correspondence as to the memorial under signature in 1884 and 1885, of which a copy was sent down to the Government, it appears, though the original document had not reached them before the rebellion; there is the answer to Mr. Hall's letter to Mr. Deville in February, 1884, the answer of the Chief Inspector of Surveys to the Secretary of the Interior Department, and the letter of the latter to Mr. Pearce, indicated in his letter to Pearce of February, 1884; there is the communication of Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney on which the telegram of the Minister of the Interior of the 4th February, 1885, was sent; there are the orders to Governor Dewdney and others to inform the half-breeds, and the action thereon. There is the report of the Deputy Minister of the Interior of the 9th of May, 1884, on the settlement of the claims of the Manitoba half-breeds. I stated last Session, and it is established that, on the 9th May, 1884, the Deputy Minister of the Interior reported as to the proved claims of the Manitoba half-breeds, and recommended their settlement, but it was only on the 26th April, 1885, that action was taken on that report. There is the report of the same officer of March, 1885, on the same subject. There are the letters of Bishop Grandin referred to in Sir John Macdonald's reply to me on the 16th

July, 1885, and the answers thereto. On the 16th July, I asked:

"Whether the Government received any, and if so, how many communications, and at what dates, from Bishop Grandin, relating to North-West affairs, and not brought down?"

Sir John Macdonald said:

"There is no correspondence of record in the Department of the Interior from Bishop Grandin since that which he addressed to Mr. Laird, in 1876, already laid on the Table of the House, except a communication dated the 19th March, 1882, in which he asks for assistance in the construction of a hospital, a subsidy for the hospital, and help for the orphanages, and one (not dated) received on the 30th September, 1882."

Then he added:

"I may as well say there are a great many letters, I'dare say, addressed to individual members of the Government, which are not considered official"—

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE—

"but they will be collated as fast as they can be"—

Cheered too soon; quite too soon; better wait till the full stop comes before cheering—

"but they will be collated as fast as they can be, and laid on the Table of the House at the beginning of next Session."

The House has begun. The House has gone on. The collation, I presume, has taken place. But the collation, when it took place, was not to the taste of the hon. gentlemen before whom it was set, and they determined that they would not set it before us, as they did not like the taste of it themselves. So there were a great many letters addressed to individual members of the Government, which were to be collated as fast as possible and laid on the Table of the House at the beginning of this Session, not one of which has been brought forward. What is the meaning of a pledge made by the First Minister of the country to Parliament assembled, and violated in this fashion? What reason is there for it? What excuse is there for it? It is a sacred pledge which is thus violated. The hon. gentleman says it is not in the interest of the country to produce these letters. He dare not produce Bishop Grandin's letter to the First Minister—the public interest would forbid it, because it would prove that he had neglected his duty. He dare not produce Bishop Grandin's letter to himself or Mr. Jackson's letter. The public interests, forsooth, forbid it; it would damage the country, because it would damage the hon. gentleman's hold upon the country.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). It will not benefit yours very much.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BLAKE. We must give every excuse to the prisoner on trial. Then I asked, on the same 6th July last:

"Whether the Government addressed any, and if so, how many communications, and at what date, to Bishop Grandin, relating to North-West affairs, and not brought down?"

Sir John Macdonald says that, in reply to his letter of 1882, the Bishop was informed that instructions had been given for the survey of lands in the settlement; but we did not get the letter, though Sir John Macdonald states that it is in existence and states, in some part, its purport. Then there are the letters referred to, in answer to my question, by the hon. Acting Minister of the Interior, the present Minister of Finance, I asked:

"Whether the Government received any, and if so, how many communications from inhabitants of St. Albert, Edmonton or Fort Saskatchewan, through Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney, in the winter of 1883, not brought down—whether the Government received any, and if so, how many communications from Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney, or either of them, on the same subjects, not brought down?"

The Minister gives an account of these letters and papers, which are intimately connected—though they concerned directly the district of St. Albert and that neighborhood—with the general management and conduct of the Government in North-West affairs, and also had indirectly to do with the management of the business as to the river lots and surveys in the other districts. They are not brought down, although their existence is admitted. Then I asked:

"Whether any answers were given, not brought down, to any, and if so, to which of the letters or memorials on the subject of North-West grievances, which have been brought down? and at what date were such answers given?"

The hon. Minister answered:

"The answer to that question has not been prepared. Many of these questions involve a search in the whole Department for letters and papers, and they involve a great deal of time."

So that there is no allegation that there are no answers' though, mark you, this was a search in their own letter books, because what I was asking was what answers are there in your own books to papers you have received. The Department had not had time to find the answers which were given by the Government to papers which they had brought down to Parliament, so as to answer my question in July last. They have not since had the time—yes, they have had the time, but they find the public interests require that they should not bring down the answers. Then there is the reply of Mr. Deville to Father Vegreville of the 15th February, 1884, mentioned by the acting Minister of Interior on the 16th July, 1885, as existing; the details of the action on the petition of the 19th November, 1883, from St. Louis de Langevin; the answer of Mr. Burgess of the 6th May, 1885, to Mr. Schmidt, which the acting Minister of Interior stated had been sent on that day; the dates and correspondence connected with the transmission of the plans of the neighborhood of St. Laurent; the communications of Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney referred to by the First Minister on the 16th July, 1885. I then asked:

"Did the Government call on Governor Dewdney for any information as to the state of things with reference to the half-breeds in the Saskatchewan region, in 1884, or in January or in February or early March, 1885, and if so, when? Did the Government receive any communication from Governor Dewdney on the subject; and if so, when?"

The First Minister said:

"I do not know that there have been any special calls on Governor Dewdney on behalf of the Government for information. It is Governor Dewdney's duty to give full information on everything affecting affairs in his jurisdiction, and he has been in continual communication with the Government, or individual members of the Government, on this subject."

Now, one of the charges against the Government is, that they were warned and did not act. We know that Governor Dewdney, who ought to have had the information, has been in "continual communication" with them, but the public interest prevents these communications from being brought down! Then the papers referred to by the First Minister, in reply to my question on the same day:

"Did the Government call on any of the officials in the North-West, and if so, on which and when during 1884 or 1885, or information as to the state of things with reference to the half-breeds in the Saskatchewan region? Did the Government receive any communication from any of the officials in the North-West during 1884 or 1885 as to the state of things with reference to the half-breeds in the Saskatchewan region and if so from whom and when?"

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government and several of the Departments have been in active correspondence with the various officials in the North-West as to the state of affairs with reference to the half-breeds in the Saskatchewan regions, and other matters affecting the North-West. Some of these communications are in the Department, and some are not. They will be brought down."

But they are not brought down, and now we are told that the public interest prevents their being brought down, so that materials for a judgment are denied to us. Then, Sir, the answer of the First Minister to Father André's letter of the 16th January, 1883; I asked was any answer sent, and he replied:

"I am not quite prepared to answer that question, neither as to the receipt of the letter nor as to the answer."

Mr. BLAKE.

He did not know even that the letter had been sent, and I pointed out to him that he had brought the letter down and read it. He said that was all right, but as to the answer he was not prepared to say, and the public interest, I suppose, prevents the answer from being brought down. So with reference to the answer to his letter to Father Vegreville of about the same time. Then the report of Major Crozier mentioned in that of the 27th July, 1884, unless brought down, and I am not certain whether that is amongst the papers brought down, because it is not identified, but if it be not amongst them, that also ought to be brought down. Then the communications from various persons mentioned in reply to me on the same day by the Government. I asked:

"Had the Government received, before the outbreak, any communication as to the half-breed matter containing the views of Mr. Forget, Mr. Hayter Reed, Judge Rouleau, Father André, Mr. L. Clarke, Mr. McDowell, Bishop McLean, or any other prominent citizen of the North-West Territory."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very probably communications have been received from some, if not all, of those gentlemen. Those received will be brought down."

But they are not brought down, and now we are told the public interest prevents their being brought down. Then there are other communications to the Minister of Public Works mentioned on the same day in his reply to me, in which he acknowledged the receipts of a communication from Mr. Jackson. Then there are required papers showing the facts asserted by the First Minister on the 26th March, 1885, in this House, relating to, 1, the plan of survey; 2, the information conveyed to the half-breeds that they would keep or get their lands according to their custom; 3, the frauds alleged to be attempted by the Metis; 4, the claims which had been settled at that date; 5, the small residue, about 50, which alone remained unsettled, for which this commission was appointed; 6, the attempts to get a sick gentleman to accept the commission and his name; 7, the action between January and March as to the commission; 8, the course taken by the Government to assure the people from door to door that their rights would be respected, that not an acre would be taken from them, and that their possession was as good as a deed; 9, the reports on the "litigated claims" between half-breed and half-breed. These are some of those papers which were called for last Session, their obligation to bring down the most important of which was admitted by the Government last Session, their intention to bring down which was stated last Session, their promise and pledge, to bring down which, at the opening of this Session, were given last Session, and now in the sixth week of the Session, we are told the duty has been fully performed, and that we are to have no more papers.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). For an hon. gentleman who declares that he does not know the secrets of the prison house and therefore cannot identify the papers he wants, I think his speech will rather astonish this House and the country. The hon. gentleman, after commencing by telling us that he had not a knowledge that would enable him to specify the particular papers he requires, has given us a long list of papers that he says ought to be before the House but which are not before the House. Now, Mr. Speaker, you will be rather astonished to learn that some of the most important of these, at any rate, are contained in this book, the Sessional Papers of 1885. I take, for instance, almost the last one to which he refers, the correspondence between Father Vegreville and Mr. Deville, and I find that the letter of Father Vegreville is here, dated at Prince Albert, 19th January, 1885, in reference to surveys. I find Mr. Deville's answer to that, in which he suggests the manner in which the surveys may be carried out; I find a letter of Mr. Hall to the commissioner at Winnipeg, indicating that the Minister approved of that mode of carrying them out, and that instructions would be given accordingly. Now, that is one illustration of the manner in which the hon. gentleman has been dealing with the House in connection with this matter. Then he tells us that the report of the proceedings of the meeting at Battleford, sent by Mr. Lawrence Clarke, are not to be found.

Mr. BLAKE. No, I did not.

Mr. WHITE. Well, Mr. Speaker, I certainly would like to know what the hon. gentleman did say. If he meant the meeting at Prince Albert, then that report is here; if he meant the meeting at Battleford, that report is here. But, Sir, the remarkable thing about it is that in relation to that meeting at Prince Albert, one of the finest passages in the speech of his hon. colleague, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), in a former debate—if I may be permitted to allude to a former debate—had relation to a return brought down regarding that very meeting at Prince Albert, which the hon. gentleman tells us we have not brought down. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, last year, made a statement, after a number of returns were brought down here, in which he gave a list of papers which he said were not included in them. I owe to the House an explanation of the reason why certain papers were laid upon the Table here to-day. As will appear from the papers themselves, if any one will look at them, they were prepared and signed by the Secretary of State in the month of June last. They were sent to the House here, and I believe they were in the Clerk's office for a while, but they never appeared to have been formally presented to Parliament. They were shown to me sometime ago, and I looked through them casually to compare them with the papers which were brought down and which are printed in this book. I found a good many of them—this very letter, for instance, of Father Vegreville, this correspondence of Mr. Deville and other matters of that kind, were precisely the same as had been brought down, and I assumed that the papers, as in fact was the case as to some of these papers brought down, were brought in the other returns, and that some mistake had occurred, by which these papers had not been laid upon the Table of the House. It was only to-day that the Deputy Minister informed me that a careful examination and comparison showed that all the papers contained in this return brought down to-day were not contained in former returns, and I therefore brought them down the earliest moment that I could after this information had been communicated to me. Now, Sir, I obtained from the Deputy Minister to-day a statement which was substantially prepared last year, and was on a paper attached to the papers which I submitted to the House to-day. As it was somewhat argumentative in its character I felt, and I am sure the House will agree with me, that it would hardly do to submit to Parliament an elaborate argument against a speech delivered in Parliament by the leader of the Opposition, from the Deputy Head of a Department, and I asked that there might be a simple statement made as to the papers which the hon. gentleman asked for last year, and which are not included in these returns. I find the result to be this :

PAPERS REFERRED TO BY MR. BLAKE
AS NOT BROUGHT DOWN.

Petition from the half-breeds early in 1878, that was sent through Governor Laird in the summer of 1879.

EXPLANATION.

Copy of petition from half-breed residents of St. Laurent, dated 1st February, 1878; copy of letter from Hon. Mr. Laird (then Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories), under cover of which such petition was transmitted to the Hon. Mr. Mills, then Minister of the Interior, and a copy of the reply to the said petition by Mr. Mills, are attached to supplementary return herewith.

I may say that so far as this Government is concerned we certainly had no interest whatever in withholding papers that passed between persons in the North-West and the late Government. I am inclined to think we were rather interested in bringing them down—as many of them as we possibly could bring—as many as we could find—and the probability is that some not asked for may perhaps come down yet, and I do not know that the hon. gentleman will maintain that we had any motive for holding them back. If the hon. gentleman will apply to one of his late colleagues in another place, and particularly read the letter of Father Lacombe addressed to him—perhaps if he got that letter read he would find that what I state is correct, that we, at all events, had no interest in keeping back letters of that kind. The return mentioned in the memorandum was prepared last year, and comes down now, and I do not think one hon. gentleman will find from it that we had any interest in keeping it back.

Statement not brought down as to the Order in Council of 19th of October, 1882.

Copy of the Order in Council of 19th of October, 1882, and copy of memorandum upon which such Order is based are attached to supplementary return herewith, although they do not relate to the claims of half-breeds or other settlers at Prince Albert.

Shown by report of Mr. Lindsay Russell of the 28th of April, 1883, that there had been urgent applications for speedy titles; these applications are not brought down.

There are no applications from settlers in Prince Albert District other than those of which copies have already been sent down in the said return.

They are already in the papers submitted to the House :

The assistant agent, it appears by letter of the 19th of September, 1883, was ordered to take evidence of French half-breed claims, no report of his action brought down.

Agent ordered to discontinue taking entries from French half-breeds until specially instructed. No paper as to such instructions ordered."

Letters of 17th July, and 25th of July, 1883, alluded to in letter of 16th October, 1883."

The instructions given by Mr. Pearce to the agent at Prince Albert, referred to in Mr. Pearce's letter of the 19th September, 1883, to the Commissioner of Dominion Lands, in reference to the settlement of claims of French half-breeds at St. Laurent, are embodied in his letters of the 10th and 16th of October, 1883, addressed to said agent. A copy of each of these two letters and a copy of the Secretary's letter of 19th November, 1883, to the Commissioner on the same subject were included in the return.

These two letters of the 17th July, and 25th (not 25th) contain no reference to claims to lands at Prince Albert or in its vicinity, copies of the same, however, and of letters in answer to which they are written are furnished herewith.

Order in Council, 7th June, 1883.

Copy of the Order in Council attached hereto. It is merely an Order appointing Mr. Lindsay Russell, Surveyor General, and a memorandum to that effect was contained in the return.

Then there is a statement that the date on the telegram is not given; but that is not a matter on which the fate of a Government should depend :

Date of telegram from Mr. Pearce, Prince Albert, to Deputy Minister not given.

The telegram referred to was not dated when received by Department, but in the Deputy Minister's reply, dated 12th of March, 1884, which is the letter immediately afterwards referred to by Mr. Blake. It is stated that it is received here on the 23rd of February.

Date of letter from Mr. Hall to Mr. Deville not given, and reply from Mr. Hall to Mr. Deville not brought down.

Letter from Mr. Hall to Mr. Deville also written on the 12th of March, 1884. Reply from Mr. Deville bears the same date. Copy attached herewith.

Mr. Pearce's report of March 12th, 1884—decision upon it not given.

No papers brought down in reference to resurvey or survey of lands at Stobart, Duck Lake and South Branch of Saskatchewan.

Letter from head office to agent, dated 14th January, 1879, as to survey of river lots.

Petition from settlers as to river frontage and Minister's reply thereto not brought down.

Agent's letter of 11th March, 1882, asking on behalf of settlers for a river lot survey not brought down; nor the reply thereto.

Letter to the agent at Prince Albert relative to opening of land office not brought down. (2nd August, 1881.)

Letter to agent covering instructions of January, 1882, not brought down.

Resolutions sent by Hon. Lawrence Clarke to Minister, of 8th October, 1881, not brought down, nor letter from Mr. Clarke.

Letter of 22nd November, 1881, in reply to Hon. Lawrence Clarke, not brought down.

Mr. Pearce's report did not appear to call for a solution of the question as to half-breeds and Indians therein raised.

An examination of the report shows that Mr. Pearce clearly set forth that equal or nearly equal privileges could be given as a result of subsequent occupation and residence.

That suggestion received the same approval from the Minister as did the other suggestions contained in said report.

Papers regarding the survey of the lands referred to were in use in connection with another return for Parliament at the time the Prince Albert papers were brought down.

A copy of a letter from the Rev. Père Vegreville, dated 19th January, 1884, addressed to the Chief Inspector of Surveys, Mr. Deville, a copy of a letter from Mr. Deville to the Deputy Minister, dated 14th February, 1884, enclosing copy of the said letter of the 19th January, 1884; a copy of the Secretary's letter to the Commissioner, and a copy of the Secretary's letter to Mr. Deville, acknowledging receipt of letter of 14th February are attached hereto.

The correspondence does not shew that the settlers at Duck Lake were expecting a resurvey.

This letter to agent at Prince Albert correctly embodied in Mr. Pearce's report, as is shown by copy of letter attached to supplementary return.

There is no trace of the petition said to have been handed Mr. Russell and referred to by Mr. Pearce.

The Deputy Minister is informed by Mr. Pearce that this petition is alleged to have asked for a rectangular survey, and not a river lot survey.

Mr. Pearce's report contains exactly what was stated in agent's letter of 11th March, 1882, and also contents of the reply from this Department.

A copy of each is attached to the supplementary return herewith.

A copy of Mr. Pearce's letter of the 17th January, 1884, is also attached to the supplementary return.

The other correspondence herewith between the Secretary, the Chief Inspector of surveys and the Commissioner of Dominion Lands shows the action upon Mr. Pearce's letter.

Mr. Pearce's report correctly states in effect the contents of the head office letter of the 2nd August, 1881. Copy of such letter attached herewith.

The circular containing the regulations of January, 1882, a copy of which is herewith attached, was sent to the agent at Prince Albert, as to all the other agents by parcel post. No letter of instructions was necessary.

Mr. Pearce's report contains a copy of the seven resolutions passed at Prince Albert on 8th October, 1881.

The said report also gives substance of the reply from this Department. (Copy attached to return herewith.) On comparing copy of resolutions (copy on return herewith) and copy of the reply, 22nd November of that year, the report will be found to be strictly accurate.

Letter of 14th April, 1882, not brought down.

Mr. Pearce's letter of 12th March, 1884, in reference to claims at Battleford and Edmonton not brought down.

I may say that the officers of the Department did not consider that matters at Edmonton were included in a motion for papers in regard to matters at Prince Albert.

Telegram from Mr. Burgess, 7th April, 1884: No information given as to approval of the schedules referred to.

Telegram from Mr. Hall to Mr. Walsh, to which latter replied 7th May, 1884, not brought down.

If that gentleman can find anything in this last which is of a character to have led the Government to withhold it, he will have succeeded in discovering a mare's nest such as no one else has possessed himself of.

Letter of 1st of August, 1884, from Mr. Walsh to the Minister, in which reference is made of a letter from Minister. This letter is not brought down.

A private letter from the Deputy Minister, dated the 22nd of May, a copy of which is in the return herewith, although it was a private letter, it is now brought down. Now, this explanation will show that so far as the complaints made by the hon. gentleman last year were concerned, in so far as this House could have any knowledge whatever of the papers which he desired, all those papers were either contained in the return brought down last year, and are to be found in the printed Sessional Papers of last year, or they are now on the Table of the House for the use of the hon. gentleman, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that if he will examine them carefully, he will find that there is in them nothing whatever that could add to the case against the Government, which the hon. gentleman made out of the papers which were brought down last year. What one is astonished at, Mr. Speaker, after his seven hours speech last year, based upon the papers that were brought down by the Government, a speech in which the Government were declared to have been responsible for the outbreak in the North-West, after the papers were brought down, which they themselves laid on the Table—that after all this, we should now have the hon. gentleman telling us that he has not "the secrets of the prison house," and therefore he is not able to tell us what papers he requires to have; and he follows that up with a list of papers, including even the private correspondence addressed by reverend gentlemen and others in the North-West, to members of the Government, which he declares have not been brought down, and declares are necessary for the information of the House. With regard to some of those papers, as, for instance, the correspondence with Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney, which he says would indicate that the Government had been remiss in their duty with regard to the requests of these gentlemen,—all I can say is, that, as I have already stated, the officers of the Department did not consider that matters which arose at Edmonton, and related entirely to surveys at Edmonton, could fairly come within the scope of a motion relating to affairs at St. Albert and the adjoining districts. There may be a difference of opinion on that point, but as there are two motions asking for that correspondence, if the House will consider those motions as passed, I have only to state that

Also fully stated in effect in Mr. Pearce's report. The material portion being word for word. (Copy on return herewith.) It was not however observed in transmitting the return that Mr. Pearce had not quoted Mr. Clarke's letter of the 25th January, to which that letter was in reply. The omission is now made good.

Nothing in Order from House calling for correspondence regarding claims at these places.

No approval necessary. Schedules were furnished to office here in order that patents due under each class mentioned might be duly prepared.

Telegram of Mr. Hall of 7th May and one from Deputy Minister of 1st of August following now forwarded.

The letter referred to was a private letter from the Minister to the Deputy Minister, dated 22nd of May, a copy of which is on return herewith.

they are being copied at this moment in anticipation of those motions, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that we will only be too glad to bring down that correspondence, and when it is brought down, it will be found that neither Father Leduc nor Mr. Maloney made any reference whatever to the surveys at St. Louis de Langevin, but that on the contrary, their mission had entire relation to land matters at Edmonton; and so far as their representations referred to land matters, they were every one yielded at once in accordance with the requests they made. These papers like other papers from the North-West, included a number of other matters—matters that are subjects of discussion in relation to public policy, questions of the bay privilege, questions of the wood dues, questions of the reserves, questions of grants to educational institutions, questions of seed grain, questions of grants of agricultural implements, and other matters of that kind, outside altogether of the question of scrip for the extinguishment of the Indian title and surveys of a particular class in regard to the lands. But in so far as they related to these particular matters in relation to which it may be said that these people in the North-West had claims which have since been recognised, the Government yielded every one of them, and the best proof of the statement is to be found in this fact that when the troubles arose in the North-West the half-breeds of St. Albert, in whose behalf Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney came to Ottawa—those half-breeds did not rise in rebellion against the Government, but on the contrary enlisted like loyal subjects on behalf of the Government to do battle for their Queen and country. Under these circumstances, I think we may fairly say that the Government is not open to the charge of concealing or keeping back correspondence which, if produced, would militate against their position, their character or their administrative policy and conduct in connection with the North-West, but that on the contrary the correspondence which the hon. gentleman in his seven hours' speech of last year contended would militate against the Government, has been brought down; and the complaint he now makes, forsooth, is that the answers of the Government which I think we may fairly assume would not incriminate the Government, have not been brought down. Why, Sir, the Government would have the greatest possible interest in bringing down its own side of the correspondence when it brought down the other side of which the hon. gentleman has made so much. I think that the hon. gentleman was hardly ingenuous—and I have to be very careful in my choice of words, because I remember that on one occasion, you, Sir, thought it was not quite right to say that an hon. gentleman was not dealing candidly with the House—I think the hon. gentleman was hardly ingenuous in his statement of the position which the Minister of Public Works has taken at this time. That hon. gentleman did not say, as I understood him, that we declined to bring down any other papers; he did not say that all the papers which were not brought down were necessarily of a confidential character. What he did say, and what everyone must admit he said properly and worthily, was that in connection with matters of this kind there must be in the very nature of things private correspondence. If we want to get information in relation to what is going on in that country, people who communicate with us in order that they may do so, with the greatest possible freedom and fullness, must know that they can write without fear that some day or other, in answer to an address in Parliament, their letters will be given to the public and their names exposed to the public. It is of the greatest importance—having regard to the character of that country, having regard to the elements of which it is composed; I mean the large Indian population there and the influences which are at work, sometimes unfortunately by white men who do no credit to their race and stir up difficulties among those Indians—I say it is a matter of the greatest consequence that Government shall be able to have from its friends in the North-West such communications as the writers can feel sure are confidential and secret, and in relation to which their names and the matters upon which they write, shall never be publicly exposed. And what the Minister of Public Works said was, that he claimed that the Government had the right to determine what correspondence was confidential; to determine what correspondence in the interest of the public it was necessary should be withheld, and that he would take the responsibility of withholding it. I can only say now; after this additional statement of the hon. gentleman that this particular speech of his will be referred to the officers of my own Department, and if they can find any papers in the Department meeting any one of the requests he has put here, I will consider his speech as an order of the House, and those papers will be brought down immediately. We have certainly, at this stage of the proceedings, no reason to conceal anything which is in the public archives in relation to the affair of the North-West, and we are not open to the imputation which the hon. gentleman was good enough to cast on us by reading the passage from a pamphlet written by a former Minister of the Crown in a moment of irritation, that we would not hesitate, if our own interest was at stake, to destroy public documents in our possession. The documents in this book show that there is no disposition whatever to do that, and I can only assure the hon. gentleman and this House that his speech, so far as I am concerned, will be consider as an order of the House, and that every paper he asks for will be enquired for, and if it is found in the Department, will be brought down here for his information and for the information of the House at the very earliest moment at which the documents can be copied.

Mr. HALL. I believe I am correct in the statement that, since the first Session of this Parliament, nearly four years ago, no motion for papers has been made by any member of the minority of this House, which has not received the unanimous support of the House, although in granting that support I am sure the House must often have felt that the papers sought for were unnecessary, and the result has frequently shown that they were not only unnecessary, but that they entailed a large and useless expense on the country. In adopting that uniform course, however, I am sure the majority of this House have intended to convey and have conveyed the impression to the country that there was nothing in the administration of the Government, either in its ministerial or its departmental functions, which would not bear the closest scrutiny; and I am sure that if the motion now before the House were for any additional papers on any specified subject, the House would again give its concurrence to that motion. But the hon. leader of the Opposition comes before the House now in a new rôle. After having exercised his great ingenuity in preparing motions in every conceivable form on every conceivable subject and every sub-division of subject, he now asks the opinion of this House to be given adversely to the Government as to its compliance with motions made for papers, and the exercise of its discretion in withholding certain papers. In my opinion, there is no function of the Government in which greater delicacy and discretion should be exercised than in the selection or withholding of those papers which have come into its hands in a confidential manner in connection with such a subject as that of the North-West; and in the face of the liberality which has been uniformly shown by this House and by the Government in regard to motions for papers, I am sure that the sentiment of this House is that the Government has discharged its duty faithfully and well in this respect. Therefore I move in amendment to the motion:

That all the words after "that" be replaced by the following: "This House is satisfied with the declaration of the Government that all papers relating to North-West affairs throwing light on the situation prior to, during, and subsequent to the late rebellion, which have been asked for, and which can properly be produced, have been laid before the House, and the House accepts the assurance of the Government that all further papers of that character will be brought down when called for or required."

Mr. DAVIES. Before the amendment was moved by my hon. friend I was going to make a few remarks in reply to the speech made by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). Very few will question the liberality with which the Government in most cases assent to motions for papers made by members of this House. I do not understand that the complaint made by the leader of the Opposition is that he has moved for papers and that his motions have been rejected. His complaint is that while motions are made by members of the Opposition for important papers throwing light on one of the most important episodes of our history, while the House endorses those motions, and orders the departmental officers to make the returns, the orders of the House and the pledges made from time to time by Ministers have been wilfully violated. It is not a question of liberality in granting motions; it is a question whether the Government carry out the instructions of the House; and the complaint the leader of the Opposition makes to-day is in that regard, and in that regard almost alone. The hon. member for Cardwell attempted to show that his leader in the House did not express himself to the effect that all the papers which were deemed important should be brought down. I so understood him. But there is no use of cavilling now, because the Minister of the Interior has thrown him over, and has made a promise that the papers demanded by the leader of the Opposition will be brought down. But when we look at the conduct of the Government in this matter we cannot but come to the conclusion that that conduct deserves the severest reprehension, and why? Every one of these papers was mentioned by the leader of the Opposition before Parliament when he made his motion; the Government had notice then that he required these papers. They knew, moreover, that there was great anxiety felt in this House and throughout the country to ascertain what degree of responsibility rested on the Government for the outbreak in the North-West. They were charged with gross dereliction of duty and inattention to the wants and demands of the half-breeds, and with practically causing that rebellion which cost so much blood and treasure; and the country awaited with no small degree of interest the time when they would put themselves on their defence, and place the House and the country in possession of the records relating to the transactions which took place before the rebellion, but they did not do that. More than that, what the hon. gentleman complains of, and has a right to complain of, is not only that he made a demand for papers, but that the leader of the Government officially promised that they would be brought down, and they have not been brought down. We have been told that we have certain papers, which are put in the form of a blue book, relating to the North-West, and the hon. gentleman says he does not believe that any member of the House, except the leader of the Opposition, has read them. The hon. gentleman is greatly mistaken. Many members have read them with an anxious desire to come to some conclusion as to the conduct of the Government; and these papers, so far as one can judge, have been arranged, not chronologically or in such a way that the House can understand them, but they appear to have been arranged for the deliberate purpose of misleading.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman cheers ironically, but he will find returns in the first pages and at the end of the book, connected with each other, and between them are other papers that have nothing to do with them.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The Parliament has nothing to do with the printing.

Mr. BLAKE. They are printed the way they are brought down.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). They were in the hon. gentleman's hands for weeks.

Mr. BLAKE. They were not; I got them copied.

Mr. DAVIES. Does the hon. gentleman say my hon. friend altered the date of the papers or the position in which they were? Was it his duty to arrange them?

Mr. WHITE. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES. Anybody who takes up that book has to spend hours and hours to get an accurate or clear idea of the papers contained and their relation to each other.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). What I mean is this. When a Department brings down papers to the House, the papers go to the Journal office, and after they pass into the hands of the Journal clerks, who detach them and count them, they go to the printers and appear in the form in which they went to the printers, and the Department cannot be held responsible for that, because the papers have, since they left the Department, passed through a number of hands.

Mr. BLAKE. As the hon. gentleman has referred to me as having some share in disarranging the papers, I beg to tell him he is not aware of the practice. The first thing done with the returns is to send them to the Clerk's office in order that they may be paged in red, just in the order in which the Government brings them down, and it is under these pages they are arranged and printed.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). That is not so.

Mr. DAVIES. That being so, we have here the acknowledgment of the present head of the Department that the arrangement is simply disgraceful. The hon. gentleman nods his assent, and any hon. gentleman who spends hours trying to master these papers will find out my statement is not exaggerated.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is quite true.

Mr. DAVIES. The manner in which Parliament is treated is disgraceful. Do the blue books brought down to the Imperial Parliament appear with their contents arranged in such disorder, so that you cannot find out where the answer to a given letter is? Not at all, they are arranged in chronological order for the use of the House. These appear to have been brought down for the purpose of mystifying members in an important matter of this kind. In placing the record of facts before the House and the people, on which the people are asked to judge, not only have the Government deliberately withheld papers, not only have they violated the solemn promise their leader made last Session, but if the statement of the Minister of the Interior is correct, if he asks any man in this House or out of it to believe in the accuracy of his statement that the papers brought down would clear the Government, he takes a singular method of convincing them, by bringing down the papers and having them printed in such a manner that no one can understand them without taking an infinity of trouble. No Government in England would venture to take such a course.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Have they got a printing committee in England?

Mr. DAVIES. I do not care whether they have or not. That does not alter the fact that these papers should have been arranged, printed and brought down so that an ordinary member of the House could understand them. When they are brought down they are in manuscript, so that only one member can use them at a time. The manner in which those papers have been brought down and others deliberately withheld cannot but lead to the conclusion that it is not the intention of the Government to throw light on the question or to disclose the important facts; but as far as possible to hide them. The hon. gentleman has read a reply prepared in his Department to the demand made by the leader of the Opposition last year, and he has told us that this reply is a reply to the speech made by the leader of the Opposition to-day.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES. Let it be understood that it is only a memorandum with reference to papers moved for in 1883, and does not touch the papers the leaders of the Opposition asks for, and which this House wants, in order to form its determination as to the culpability of the Government with respect to the rebellion. It does not touch one of the pledges made by the leader of the Government last Session, when he solemnly pledged his word that when this House opened this Session we would be placed in possession of all the papers. One would imagine, judging from the tone of the hon. gentleman, judging from the airy manner in which he addressed himself to the House, that he was completely answering the demands of the leader of the Opposition, whereas, in fact, he was referring to a particular motion made in 1883, by saying that the papers moved for then, and to which motion the House assented, had been brought down. What wonderful promptness in bringing down in 1886 papers moved for in 1883. Inasmuch as the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) has moved a resolution expressive of the confidence of the House in the ministry, and that we are satisfied with all the papers brought down, let us refer to the facts. The reply of the hon. member for Cardwell does not touch the points in issue, as may be shown clearly. The leader of the Government said there were many letters addressed to individual members of the Government not strictly considered official, which would be collected as fast as possible and laid before the House this Session. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) is satisfied that pledge should not be kept, and that this House should proceed to determine the question of the responsibility of the Government with reference to this rebellion in the absence of official documents, which were promised from time to time to members of the Government in their official capacity. More than that, we have the most important documents of all missing, which the leader of the Opposition asked for last year, such as the official reports of the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West, which cannot be considered in any sense private documents.

An hon. MEMBER. May be they are.

Mr. DAVIES. They were shown not to be private by the express declaration of the First Minister last Session that he would bring them down. Those documents are necessary for the formation of a proper judgment, if hon. gentlemen wish to form a proper judgment, and not desire to be dragged blindly, attached to the chariot wheels of the Government, and the House would stultify itself if it agree to the resolution expressive of satisfaction with the papers before the House, when we know most important official documents which were promised have not been and will not be brought down. The hon. gentleman is very hilarious. Perhaps he will not be quite so hilarious when I repeat the statement of his leader. Mr. Blake asked:

"Did the Government receive communication of the resolution of the North-West Council of 1884, as to the half-breed claims, and when? Did they answer that communication? If so, when?"

"Mr. McLELAN. Yes; on the 19th August, 1884, and since then the subjects referred to in the memorandum of the Council have been dealt with at various times by the Government."

Are we to have no return showing how, when and why they dealt with these important matters? Is the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) satisfied to remain in ignorance, or had he a private peep at the papers? We are entitled to have those documents before us. There is a strong feeling throughout the country, not that the House should investigate and determine upon the question of the Government's responsibility with reference to the execution of Louis Riel alone, but that there should be a fair and impartial investigation of all the facts and causes of the rebellion. We have reason to believe that the Government are responsible for the rebellion, by their negligence, supineness and indifference. They now keep back the documents, and one of their supporters asks us to express confidence in them, and not only that, but gratification that they have kept back the documents. What is the other information like?

"Mr. BLAKE. Did the Government call on Governor Dewdney for any information as to the state of things with reference to the half-breeds in the Saskatchewan region in 1884, or in January, February, or early in March, 1885, and, if so, when?"

What is the answer?

"I do not know that there have been any special calls on Governor Dewdney on behalf of the Government for information. It is Governor Dewdney's duty to give full information on everything affecting affairs in his jurisdiction, and he has been in continual communication with the Government or individual members of the Government on this subject."

Continual communication during the whole year 1884, and during the important three months immediately preceding the outbreak. We have none of these communications before us, and the hon. gentleman asks us to express satisfaction with the action of the Government. I say the House will be derelict in its duty if it does anything of the kind, and, coming from one of the hon. gentleman's intelligence and shrewdness and general impartiality, I was no little surprised at his moving that resolution. Then, Sir John Macdonald goes further. He says:

"The Government and several of the Departments have been in active correspondence with the various officials in the North-West, as to the state of affairs in reference to the half-breeds in the Saskatchewan region and other matters affecting the North-West. Some of these communications are in the Department and some are not. They will be brought down."

They are not brought down. We have no knowledge of them. They are documents official in their character, and I suppose they are, therefore, at any rate, calculated to throw the most light, from an impartial source, upon the causes of the outbreak, upon the grievances which led to the outbreak; and yet we are asked to declare that we, as a Parliament, do not wish to have the information which is necessary in order to form a judgment, the information which the Government promised to bring down, information which has not been brought down, and which I venture to assert would throw a great deal of light upon this much vexed question. I will not weary the House by reading the answers to the other questions, because they have been read already by the hon. gentleman.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. They do not appear to be palatable to the hon. gentleman. He does not want the information. He is prepared to vote blind. But we are not prepared to vote blind, and the country does not desire that we should vote blind. I believe the country from one end to the other is sincerely desirous that this matter should be probed to the bottom. I acknowledge that it is right for a Government at times to withhold certain documents from the public, but the Government have not claimed that right in regard to any of these important documents which, on the contrary, they have pledged themselves to bring down,

They have violated that pledge; they have not brought them down. Even now, in the sixth week of the Session, we had a declaration from the leader of the House which I think everyone understood to show an intention not to bring them down; and to endorse the action of the Government, to state our gratification at that state of things would be, I think, to make ourselves supremely ridiculous. I think, in this important matter, that some steps should be taken to have these documents, if there be any of them that are of a character which might damage the public interest, examined by an impartial committee. The Government have no right to shelter themselves behind that excuse, and to say: "We will give you only those papers that we choose to select." Can there be a fair and impartial trial of the Government, when they, by their own showing, withhold important documents? Is it to be expected that they will give us those documents which will tell against themselves? It is contrary to human nature to suppose anything of that sort. Hon. gentlemen may get a majority to whitewash the Government, and to back them up in their attempts to prevent an examination into this matter, but the people of the country will draw their own conclusions from that, and we can draw the logical conclusion that the documents which they withhold are those which will prove their culpability in this matter.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has spoken with his usual warmth, and, I may say with his usual lack of logic. Towards the closing part of his speech, in answer to some indications of dissent from him on this side of the House, he said that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House did not want any information, because they were willing to vote blindly. The hon. gentleman's whole complaint, if he had a complaint, during the whole speech which he has just finished, has been that the House—and his side of the House particularly—had been kept in utter ignorance, and yet, when he makes that assertion, in the same breath he declares that the Government have been culpable by their supineness, by their neglect, and by their acts, for causing this rebellion, and that they must be held guilty in regard to it. That is the hon. gentleman's logic. He is in blindness, he is in darkness, he wants more information, and yet he began by stating that the Government had caused this rebellion and he ended by stating more vehemently the same thing. I leave the House and the country to judge who it is that is willing to vote blindly, and who it is that is willing to act without further information. I think my hon. friend will admit that the Government must be in every case the judge as to what papers should be brought down and what should not be brought down. He will admit also that there are different kinds of papers, and they have been specified as this discussion has been advancing. There are papers which may be brought down in the public interest and others which may not, and both are public documents which come to the Government as a Government, and which are discussed by the Government, or which come into the Departments as public documents addressed to the Departments. The Government must be the sole judge of which of these should be brought down and which should not be brought down in the public interest of the country. Then, again, there are papers which come to members of the Government, but to them as private members of the Government, and, these being private communications, coming into the possession of members of the Government individually, may be brought down or may not be brought down; they are not necessarily public documents, and if the leader of the Government promised that any of these should be collated and brought down in due time it was rather a matter of grace than a matter of duty, and if some have been brought down, and others are being collated and will be brought down, he has fulfilled his pledge, and such papers as can be given have been or will be given. My hon. friend is strong in his assertions with regard to what is done by the Government. He declares that they have wilfully violated their pledges. He declares, or you would think, to listen to him, any spectator would believe, that of all the different requests which have been made, not one has been complied with, and no papers have been brought down. If hon. gentlemen will look over the list of papers ordered by the House, and will then look at those which have been brought down, they will find that a very large number of those orders have been complied with, and a very large number of papers have been brought down. He acknowledges, and the leader of the Opposition acknowledged, that large numbers of these papers had been brought down, that large number of these papers were brought even last year; but he finds fault that they are not collated in the printed document as well as they should be. Well, that may be a matter of blame to the Department or to those who get up those papers, or it may not, but if the papers are there I know my hon. friend has ingenuity enough to hunt them out and to place them where they will do the most good. I think the proposition embodied in the amendment of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) covers the whole case. The Government has brought down such papers as it considers can be brought down in the public interest, and it is willing to do the same, as has been stated over and over again. I do not think it is either fair or logical to suppose that because papers are not brought down they therefore incriminate the Government, and that the Government do not dare to bring them down. I may say that as this discussion goes on, as this matter with reference to the North-West is sifted more and more, as it will be, it will be found that the Government have not been derelict in its duty in bringing papers down, and that when these papers have been thoroughly examined they will be found not to incriminate the Government, but rather to vindicate the course it has taken.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The conduct of the Administration with reference to papers having relation to North-West affairs, has been consistent throughout. Last Session everybody will recollect that it was with the greatest possible difficulty we could extract from the Government any papers bearing upon that unfortunate outbreak and the conduct of the Administration with respect to the claims of the half-breeds. Day after day, week after week, month after month, the hon. member for West Durham pressed upon the First Minister the necessity of bringing papers down to Parliament to enable us to discuss the causes of the rebellion, and it was only in the closing hours of the Session that we were able to get any papers at all, and many of the papers with respect to the conduct of the Administration and the claims of the half-breeds, were not submitted to the House. We had last Session the extraordinary statements made in the other Chamber that have been made in this Chamber this Session; we had a late Minister of the Interior declaring in the Senate that the half-breeds had no grounds of complaint, had no grievances, and that there were no complaints made. Two days afterwards we had the late Minister of Justice admitting that between the 1st January, 1879, and the 15th March, 1885, a large number of complaints were received from the half-breeds and others in the North-West, setting forth their grievances, and these papers were promised to be brought down. We have this Session the same spectacle. We had one Minister of the Crown intimating there were no papers that had not been submitted to Parliament, and by-and-by verifying his argument by reading copious extracts from documents that had not been submitted to Parliament. We had another Minister of the Crown two or three nights afterwards, declaring that all the papers bearing upon the question had been submitted to Parliament, and still further reading copious extracts from a large number of documents, not a single one of which has yet been submitted to Parliament. We have the leader of the House substantially declaring that they do not intend to bring down any more papers to Parliament, and we have the present Minister of Interior declaring now that after hearing the speech of the hon. member for West Durham, he will instruct the officials in this Department to prepare all documents that they can bring down to Parliament.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If there are any.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Are the papers there, or are they not? If they are, we surely ought to have them, unless they are of the particular character that the last speaker has referred to—confidential papers. Now, will any sensible man tell the House that the documents referred to by my hon. friend are confidential documents—documents that Parliament is not entitled to see, documents that the people of the country are not entitled to see. Why, Sir, we have only to state the proposition to see its absurdity. Are those resolutions confidential that were passed at a score of meetings held in the North-West, just about the spot where the outbreak took place, and where some of the battles were fought? Were those resolutions passed at Halcro's Settlement, at Lindsay's School House, at Prince Albert, and various other places—were they confidential documents? Were the resolutions passed at these meetings, the petitions signed by the half-breeds and transmitted to this Government, confidential documents? Why, Sir, they are public documents, they are documents that we ought to have in our possession before we are called upon to pronounce upon the misconduct of the Administration—if there was misconduct, as I verily believe there was. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries charges my hon. friend with being illogical, because, on a former occasion, both he and others in the House declared that the Administration deserved the censure of Parliament. Well, Sir, we believe from the documents that we have been able to extract from the Government, that there is sufficient to convince any reasonable man, open to conviction, that the whole conduct of the Administration with respect to the claims of the half-breeds for the last seven years has been such as to deserve the censure of this Parliament. But, Sir, we know perfectly well that there are other documents in the possession of this Government, and it is nonsense to tell us that these documents, if brought down, would exculpate the Government instead of incriminating them. Does anybody believe that even the Minister of the Interior, if he had such documents in his possession, would refrain half a minute from bringing them down? We believe that these documents are being withheld because they would prove the guilt of this Government. My hon. friend has read a list of over fifty of these documents. Anybody who sees fit to read the evidence given at the trial of Riel, and the papers published in the blue book for 1885, will see that there are documents not submitted to Parliament that have an important bearing upon the discussion that must take place in this Parliament, and yet these documents are withheld from us. Why are they withheld from us? Because they will exculpate the Government? No, Sir, but because the production of the documents would bring home to this Administration their guilt in the clearest possible way. Now, there are other documents my hon. friend has not mentioned. In fact, they are so numerous that they could hardly be mentioned in a speech of an hour, documents which we believe are in the possession of the Government, and that the Government, to this hour, have not submitted to Parliament. Now, will the hon. gentleman tell us that the report of Superintendent Crozier, of the 13th of July, 1884, with respect to the claims of the half-breeds, is a confidential document. It may be among the Sessional Papers, but it is like looking for a needle in a hay-stack to look for a thing in that Sessional Paper. I have gone over that book half a dozen times, and it is very difficult to trace documents that may be there and which bear upon this question, or rather documents that are omitted from the Sessional Papers of 1885. Is the report of Sergeant Brooks before the House? No. There is the petition from half-breeds of St. Laurent and Batoche mentioned in the report of Superintendent Gagnon, and the letter sent prior to the petition, both of which are mentioned in the papers, but none of which can I find there. Is it maintained that these are confidential documents? Every subject has the right of petition. What were these petitions for? There were resolutions passed at public meetings to petition the Government respecting claims against the Government and regarding the treatment which the Government had meted out to them, and the misconduct of the Administration in dealing with their repeated demands to have their wrongs redressed. Yet we are told that every document, except those of a confidential character, has been brought down! Where is the telegram of 21st February, 1885, mentioned in the mounted police report for this year, and the telegram of Superintendent Gagnon, dated 13th March, 1885, also mentioned in that report? I have not been able to lay my hands on them, if they are among the papers submitted. Hon. members will find in the evidence given at the trial of Louis Riel by Father André that mention is made of several communications he had with the Government. I can only find one or two in the blue book, and I cannot find a single reply by the Government to a single one of the petitions, remonstrances and resolutions sent to them. Hon. members will find further mention of a petition sent to the Government in pursuance of a resolution passed at a meeting of the half-breeds at Duck Lake, held on 23rd February, 1880. I do not find that in the papers. Then we have a petition from the half-breeds at Prince Albert as the result of a meeting held there on the 8th of October, 1881. There is also another petition in 1883 from the half-breeds at Prince Albert; also a petition from half-breeds at St. Catherine's parish, the result of a meeting held on 21st January, 1884. These were referred to by the hon. member for West Durham. Resolutions were passed by the half-breeds at Lindsay's School House at Halcro's Settlement, in January, 1884. All these were sent to the Government; petitions were signed by the half-breeds in pursuance of the resolutions passed. These petitions, in some cases, and resolutions in some other cases, were transmitted to the Government, and yet, so far as I have been able to discover, very few have been brought down. We know that upon the notice paper there is a motion entered by a supporter of the Government, and we know perfectly well that before he did so that supporter of the Government must have ascertained that the documents for which he proposes to ask are not before Parliament. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) proposes to move:

"For copies of petitions and letters from Rev. H. Leduc and Daniel Maloney, in relation to complaints of the people of Edmonton, Fort Saskatchewan and St. Albert, and all correspondence arising out of such petitions."

In the evidence at the trial Father André spoke of a communication sent to the Government in 1882, and a letter sent by him to the Government in 1884. Those letters, so far as I have been able to ascertain, are not among the papers submitted to Parliament. He also referred to another communication sent to the Minister of Public Works after the rebellion broke out. That letter, so far as I am able to find out, is not among the papers brought down. Why are these papers not brought down? Is it to be said that these are confidential communications directed to the Government, or members of the Government, with relation to complaints of the half-breeds, are privileged communications, and that the people shall know nothing about them? The report of Colonel Irvine has been mutilated and is not submitted in its entirety. Why was it not brought down as it was sent by the official from the North-West? It ought to have been so submitted to Parliament. We, the Opposition, have as good a right to see what it contained as have hon. gentlemen opposite, and, therefore, we should be put in possession of it. I was perfectly amazed, although it takes a good deal to surprise me in regard to statements coming from the other side of the House, at what the Minister of Public Works said, that all the documents not brought down were documents which the Government propose to treat as confidential documents, which they would not submit to the House. I was more surprised at the Minister of the Interior, although I need not have been surprised, who, in an elaborate speech, undertook to lead the country to believe that the documents which the hon. member for West Durham wanted had been brought down already. The hon. gentleman read a list, and declared that he was perfectly satisfied that every order of the House and every pledge of the First Minister had been implemented. But the documents to which he referred were not the documents which the member for West Durham called for. They were documents regarding claims at Prince Albert, documents which were asked for last year; but the documents now brought down by the Government are documents to which the member for West Durham made no reference, and that is the answer we receive. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that there is still a mass of documents, comprising petitions, resolutions, remonstrances, communications from the clergy and bishops, scarcely one of which has been submitted up to this hour; yet, hon. gentlemen tell us we have got all the papers they propose to give us. I say there are other documents in the possession of the Government which should be submitted to this House. I say there are documents in the Department which have not yet seen the light of day, documents which would incriminate the Government, documents on file in the Department of the Interior which would bring home guilt to this Administration with respect to the management of the North-West as clear as the noon-day sun. Hon. gentlemen deny it. I offer them the only way in which to settle the dispute, and that is to have an independent investigation. This should take place. Are hon. gentlemen opposite afraid to have the records of the Departments investigated? If they are afraid, the conclusion is simply inevitable that the statement I make is correct, that the Government have documents which if produced would satisfy any reasonable and fair thinking man that the Government have been concealing and are now concealing from the people documents that would bring home guilt to them. In order that this matter may be placed beyond dispute and the Government have an opportunity—and I desire to afford it simply in the interest of the Government—to clean their own skirts from this charge, and if they do that the people will be satisfied—I will be satisfied—I propose giving them an opportunity of relieving themselves from the responsibility and from the odium that now attaches to the Administration by their not producing the documents of which the hon. member for West Durham has spoken, and the existence of which has not been denied by the Government. This is a challenge I throw out to hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me see whether they are prepared to accept it or not. I move in amendment to the amendment:

"That all the words after the word "that" be struck out, and the following inserted:

Mr. Blake a member of this House, having stated in his place that he is informed and believes he can prove that there are in the hands of the Government, documents affecting the question whether the Government was guilty of neglect, delay and mismanagement in North-West affairs before the rebellion; A Select Committee be appointed to enquire fully into the said allegations, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and that the witnesses be examined on oath or affirmation, and that the committee do report in full the evidence taken and the papers produced before them and their proceedings on the reference, and that Messrs. Bossé, Edgar, Coursol, Sriver, Ouimet, Casey, Shanly, Mulock and Patterson (Essex) do compose the said committee."

House divided on amendment to amendment of Mr. Cameron, Huron.

Amendment to amendment negatived.

Mr. MITCHELL. I had not an opportunity of speaking to the amendment as I happened to come in only in time to give my vote; and I therefore feel it to be my duty now to justify the course I intend to pursue—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MITCHELL. Better wait till you see if I am out of order. Perhaps some of these hon. gentlemen would like to speak, and if so I will reply to them. I believe I am in order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER. Certainly; the hon. gentleman is in order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope, these hon. gentlemen will keep quiet. I intend to justify the course which I have pursued and which I intend to pursue in relation to these motions. Hon. gentlemen in this House will recollect the course which I took on a similar motion moved by the hon. member for West Durham when he moved for a committee to enquire into the administration of affairs in the North-West last Session. Sir, it will be recollected that he was followed and replied to by the right hon. Premier on that occasion, and that the third person who spoke in connection with that motion was myself. I stated then that while I believed that maladministration, arising out of the course pursued by the right hon. Premier, when Minister of Interior and by his successor, Sir David MacPherson, had led to a great deal of the trouble in the North-West, yet that in the presence of a rebellion I would not vote to put a Government on its trial until after the rebellion was quelled, but that, if the hon. gentleman would move his motion after the rebellion was over, or would move it the following Session, the principle of his motion would have my support, and it has received my support. It is a conviction with me that there has been maladministration in that country. I speak of it with regret that it should be so, and I do regret that with regard to hon. gentlemen with whom I have acted so frequently on this side of the House, I should find myself compelled from a sense of duty—

Some hon. MEMBERS. O! O! Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. "O! O!" these gentlemen say—men who are pulled up and down by a string. Sir, what I do I do from a sense of duty and not from a desire to sever my connection with gentlemen with whom I have been associated. It is from no desire to do that.

An hon. MEMBER. Good-bye.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I am ready to go if you are ready to have me go. I say I have pursued this course from a sense of duty, from a sense of what I owe to the country, from a sense of my sworn oath here to pursue that course according to my convictions and my judgment of what I think right, and it has been no feeling of to-day, no feeling of this Session. I have expressed once and again, and often during previous Sessions, my conviction of what I believe to be the neglect, the remissness of duty and the maladministration of the persons who presided over the Department of the Interior. Sir, I do not desire to include the present Minister of the Interior in that connection, because we are not dealing with his transactions or his administration of the office. But, Sir, I have a conviction that under the two previous administrations of that Department, delays and neglect and incapacity characterised the conduct of that branch of the public service, and that it was left largely to subordinates, to deputies, to officials who were comparatively irresponsible to the public, and they ran the North-West, and they have brought about a good deal of the trouble. That is my conviction. What do I find? Our Government opposing a motion to bring down papers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; yes, yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say yes. Is it not their duty when they are arraigned to bring down every paper? They talk of private communications. What right have they with private communications? Communications on public questions are public documents, and this Parliament of Canada, the masters of the Government, the men who keep them where they are, have the right to see these papers, so that when the arraignment is made they may have the opportunity of pronouncing whether that arraignment is correct or incorrect. I regret to have to say this, but notwithstanding the sneers of these hon. gentlemen, it is from a sense of public duty, and I regret to have to do it.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Hall.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11:30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 6th April, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 83) to amend the Act incorporating the Board of Trade of the City of Ottawa.—(Mr. Mackintosh.)

CAPE RACE LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Friday next to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to accept the transfer of the lighthouse at Cape Race to Canada on the conditions mentioned in the despatch and papers laid before the House, by order of His Excellency the Governor General, and to provide for the maintenance thereof at the expense of the revenue of the Dominion after transfer.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That Government business shall have precedence on Thursday during the remainder of this Session.

He said: We have thought that it would expedite the business of the Session if the Government took this third day in the week. The two other days will, of course, remain for business in the hands of private members—at all events, until the pressure becomes so great that we shall have to take some other day also for Government business, of course taking care that the measures in the hands of private members will not suffer.

Mr. MITCHELL. I expected a motion of this kind about four weeks ago, when the Government took up over three weeks of the time of private members by anticipating that resolution which excited so much interest. I stated then what now turns out true, that the Government would probably come down in a few weeks and take away from us one of our private days. We have only had four or five private days during the whole of this Session, and I consider it very unfair that the time allotted to private members should be absorbed by the Government to the exclusion of the free discussion of those questions which private members should have the opportunity of discussing. Of course, I am not at all disappointed in this motion; I foretold that it would occur; but I do think it is a little too early in the Session to move it, considering the amount of business on hand and how little business we have done. Scarcely any papers asked for this Session have come down yet, and we are going to be limited to two days in the week for private business. I think it is very unfair, and the House should not approve of it.

Mr. COOK. If the Government are bent upon taking Thursday, I think we should sit on Saturdays, so that private members would have three days still. This sitting only five days in the week is not exactly the thing, and by sitting on Saturdays we would get through more business, and the Government could have their extra day.

Mr. IVES. It may be that the motion of the Government does not please the third party; but from conversations I have had with members on the other side of the House as well as on this side, I am sure that both sides are practically unanimous in the desire that an additional day should be taken by the Government, and that the Session should, if possible, be expedited. There is a feeling that it is almost too much to ask members to sit here continuously, as is coming to be the case; for we only left here at midsummer. I am quite satisfied, from what I know of the sense of the House, that this motion exactly meets the desire of the large majority.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course I have not had the same opportunity of communicating with gentlemen on this side of the House as the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, and, therefore, I am unable to speak as he has spoken. I speak for myself, after his information, and notwithstanding his information, and I say, considering the circumstances to which the hon. member for Northumberland has alluded particularly, and the state of the notice paper, that it is too early in the Session for the Government to take this additional day. We are all anxious to get the Session over, of course; but I suppose our anxiety to get the Session over is not to overcome our desire to do our duty during the Session, and that duty cannot be discharged if, after what has taken place this Session, we are so early precluded by the Government from dealing with the business of private members. The Government insisted, during the early days of the Session, that a particular matter should consume the whole time of the House. The result is that we have had particularly very few days this Session—fewer than I ever remember—for the discharge of private business, up to this time; and I certainly think we ought to have one day more at least; we ought to have next Thursday, at any rate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. BLAKE. I quite understand that those hon. gentlemen who consider their sole duty to be to further the business of the Government, may object to that suggestion. I did not expect their sympathy for it. I am speaking contrary to my own feelings when I make a suggestion that may prolong the Session even a day; but if, in the state of public business, we are called on to give the majority of the days to the Government, and only two days out of the five in the week to private members, it is better to sit the whole six days in the week and get on with our duties. I ask the hon. gentleman, therefore, not to press this motion, at least for next Thursday; and when he does propose that it shall go into operation, to provide it shall after questions which take a very little time and which are a very convenient way of eliciting information that we will be almost precluded from eliciting by giving up so many days to the purposes of the Government.

Mr. DAVIES. No doubt it must be very convenient to those members of Parliament who reside near Ottawa to have Saturday as a holiday, so that they can return home, but there is a large percentage of members who do not live near enough to be able to return home Saturday, whose interests ought to be considered. If private members are to be deprived of the Thursdays, they should be given Saturdays as private days. The Government do not consider the interests of the Maritime members sufficiently, and I am sure I speak for the majority when I say that private members should be given Saturdays to replace Thursdays.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When I make this motion, asking the House to consent to give a third day to the Government during the week, hon. gentlemen must see that it is for them as well as for the Government we are asking it. The measures of the Government are the measures of the House as well; they are to be considered by the House; we are pressing them upon their consideration, and if we have not the necessary time every week the Session will have to be extended beyond its usual length. Two hon. gentlemen have suggested that we should sit on Saturdays as well. I am sure they forget that besides the business of the House, the Executive have to look after the general work of the Government, and the Departments have to be attended to as well; and if we have not Saturdays to dispose in Council of the business of the country, I do not know when that work will be done. It would not, therefore, be practicable to take Saturdays, at all events, for the whole Session. However, if the House wishes it, I have no objection that we should not take next Thursday for the special business of the Government; but I must say hon. gentlemen should not complain that we insisted on the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) being debated from day to day, as it was not a motion on the Government notices, but on the notices of ordinary members of the House. I would ask to modify my motion, if agreeable to the House, by saying that the Government business will take precedence every Thursday after next Thursday.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am sure the Government, after their great liberality to private members in permitting the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny being debated de die in diem for weeks, will agree to the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition that questions should be permitted on Thursdays.

Mr. BLAKE. We used to do it formerly. Sir John has several times consented to it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have no objection, provided the questions come immediately after routine.

Motion, as amended, that Government business shall have precedence on Thursdays on and after the 15th inst., after questions put by members, agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. I congratulate the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe on his accuracy of view.

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. POPE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Friday next to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Act 45 Victoria, chapter 55, and to provide that the term during which a subsidy may be granted thereunder to the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company shall be twenty instead of twenty-five years, and that the amount of such subsidy shall be $170,602 instead of $150,000 a year.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. ORTON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw attention to a paragraph of the Globe of April 2nd:

"Mr. Orton was almost as conspicuous as Capt. Scott on Tuesday, and in the same way. This is a case in which a pair are better than three of a kind, and three of a kind better than a full four."

We have seen, during this Session, several instances in which the press have taken the liberty of traducing and slandering hon. members of this House. It is time some steps should be taken by the House to protect its members from such slanders. There is not an hon. member who will not agree with me that the paragraph I have read is utterly without foundation, that it is a wanton slander circulated against me. We have enough to suffer in public life without having such slanderous statements given to the public. Personally, perhaps, we may care very little about them, and I am sure my constituents, to whom I have been known for twenty-five years, will take no notice of this slander, but it is painful that one's family and friends should have such paragraphs as that put before them. If the House does not preserve its dignity in matters of this kind, if the press are allowed to abuse their privilege, what will be the final result? Hon. members will have to take the law into their own hands, and punish, in the way in which it should be punished, such slanderous attacks, and it will result in bringing into this country the same condition of affairs that we see occasionally occurring across the border, where peremptory steps are taken to punish attacks upon private persons.

THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 9) respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WELDON. Are the Statutes passed last year embodied in this Bill?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Yes.

Mr. WELDON. Then, this is not exactly the report which came from the committee last year?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The volumes which have been distributed this Session embody the Statutes of last Session, and the amendments suggested by the committee, with the exception of the one I mentioned in introducing the Bill, as to the preambles of the different chapters.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it the intention of the Minister that this Bill shall not be referred to a select committee?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It was my view that it need not be referred to a special committee this year, inasmuch as it has already been before a committee, and that committee has reported and made suggestions which will be found running through the whole volume. I certainly thought that the House in Committee of the Whole would be now prepared to deal with the matter.

Mr. BLAKE. I could quite understand the propriety—although, of course, the unfinished proceedings of one year are not considered to be of any value in the next—of dealing differently with a matter of this kind, where a committee did examine into the subject last year; but this is not the same Bill; the Acts of last Session have, as I understand, been consolidated, so that there will be no opportunity of examining the work done by the commissioners since the report of the committee last Session, because that examination cannot take place in Committee of the Whole House—it has only been examined to the extent of the work done last Session—and I alluded, when the hon. gentleman introduced the Bill, to one important measure which was included in the Bill last Session, but, I presume, has been eliminated from it before this Session. The work of last Session was to a great extent an emendatory work, and I think that the suggestions embraced in the report as presented by the committee to the House, as well as the difficulties which have arisen since last Session, would require a certain work of consolidation still further. According to my recollection, all the consolidations which have taken place in the old Province of Canada have never been passed through the House without being submitted to a select committee for revision. The House is always asked to take the consolidation on trust, because it is always so vast a work that it is impossible for the House to go over it clause by clause, or even Bill by Bill. I may say that even the committee is required, to a great extent, to take it on trust, because the committee could not possibly deal with the matter exhaustively, and, therefore, has to deal with the general principles, and the more obvious blemishes, rather than to deal with the measure in detail. To understand the measure even to that extent, there should be, at any rate, that amount of scrutiny involved in a reference to a committee, and I hope the hon. gentleman will go so far as to agree to that, and that we shall have the report of a select committee in regard to the consolidation.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I think the committee of last Session, though, of course, I have no personal knowledge of it, did more than take on trust the report of the commissioners.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly they did.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Some of them, as I am informed, went with great pains through the whole volume, and examined with great particularity the whole work of revision. I should take it for granted, then, that it would not be the desire of any hon. member that the work of the committee of last year should be revised. My idea was that the work of including the Acts of last Session could have been examined between the time when I introduced the Bill and this stage of the measure. I supposed that, before the Bill reached its second reading, members would have examined the revision made since last Session, and would have been prepared to call attention to any defects which might have occurred in that revision. If hon. members are not in a position to do so to-day, I will defer it to a later date, but it does not seem to me to be such a work as to require a select committee.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course, when there has been an invariable practice of referring a consolidation to a select committee, it could hardly be expected that the rule would be departed from in this case. I think the hon. gentleman, upon consideration, will see that it will be inconvenient to take a committee composed of the whole House upon a Bill respecting the Revised Statutes, and to take up two volumes and go over them clause by clause, with a view of having a general discussion of that kind. I admit it is competent to us in a Committee of the Whole to do so, when we have got the printed rolls marked A to be made law—it is competent to engage in a general discussion, even without the report of a select committee; but I do not suppose any of us thinks that much business will be accomplished in that way. Now, my hon. friend behind me tells me that the important Act of last Session, called the Franchise Act, in the preparation of which the hon. gentleman was, fortunately, spared from taking part, while it was passing through this House so laboriously, has been altered and one section has been entirely re-drafted, I am told, and the whole numbering of the Act is altered. I have not myself verified it, but I think we certainly ought to have a sifting process by a select committee. I do not say that if I were upon a select committee I would propose to go over again the work which was done by the committee last Session, except in so far as that work may be affected by the alterations we made in the laws last Session, and that would be a matter for the committee itself to consider. I submit to the hon. gentleman that, in that sense, the labors of a select committee are really the proper and the only efficient guarantee for the work being such as that which ought to take it upon trust. Now, I did not intend to say that the select committee of last Session took the work upon trust. I declared it was impossible for the committee to make a thorough scrutiny of the Acts. The hon. gentleman is under the impression that several members of the committee went over the whole volume. I was on the committee, and I differ from him in that impression. I understand that the committee divided itself into sections and that some of them took up one part and some another, but that no portion of the committee even grappled with the task of going over the whole, and if they did go over the whole I am very sure it would have been in such a cursory manner as that the work could not have been well done. I think, upon the whole, it would really tend to expedition if the hon. gentleman would re-strike that committee or that portion of the committee which belonged to this House last Session, who are familiar with the work of the committee, and who may be able to tell us that the roll as now proposed to us is the work of last Session with the additions properly incorporated of the legislation of last Session, and then let us deal with the Act.

Mr. WELDON. It seems to me that the volume now before us differs, in some respects, very much from the volume before the committee last year. I had the honor of being on that committee, and, of course, we had to divide it up into sub-committees, on one of which I served and did a certain portion of the work. Of course, it was impossible, except to a very few, to go through the whole volume, and we had to take it up in sections; and even in going through the work of the sub-committee we had, to a large extent, to take the statement of the commissioner. To illustrate the difficulty of the work, I may mention that after we had gone through with it I found, during the course of business last summer, a great blunder, which might have had serious consequences. If the hon. member will turn to page 1085, respecting the navigation laws, he will see the following:—

“A steamship shall be provided with a steam whistle or other efficient sound signal, so placed that the sound may not be intercepted by any obstruction, and also with an efficient bell. A sailing ship shall be provided with a similar fog-horn and fog-bell.”

Now, that section of the Bill requires a sailing vessel to have a steam fog-horn. I would call the hon. Minister's attention to the English rule, which is to this effect:

“A steamship shall be provided with a steam whistle or other efficient sound signal, and an efficient fog-horn, to be sounded by a bellows or other mechanical means, and a sailing ship shall be provided with a similar fog-horn or bell.”

The most important part of the section is therefore entirely left out in this article. My attention was called to it last summer, when I found this great blunder had been committed. Now, it seems to me that where other matters are put in, as, for instance, the Electoral Franchise Act of last Session, which was not before the committee at all last Session, and which we found has been altered in the numbering of the sections, it is very desirable to submit the whole volume to the scrutiny of a select committee. I find, for instance, in the interpretation clause transferred to section 16 is the following:—

“Said assessment roll shall, for the purposes of said revision, be taken by the revising officers as prima facie evidence of the value of the property.”

Now, that is marked altogether differently upon the draft, and I think the volume ought to be referred to a select committee to see whether this consolidation is the same as the previous legislation of the country.

Mr. DAVIES. I think the hon. member will see that it would be very injudicious to proceed with this Bill in Committee of the Whole. Last year I had the honor of being one of a select committee to consider the Bill upon the consolidation of the Statutes. It was quite impossible for that committee to have gone entirely through the Consolidated Statutes and examine every section to see whether it was proper or not. The only course open was to appoint sub-committees, to each of whom were allotted certain chapters of the Statutes, with instructions, so far as they could, to go through those Statutes and report to the general committee whether amendments were desirable, whether the sections which had been consolidated were fairly consolidated, and whether any great changes had been made in the existing law. We did our work as well as could be expected, but it was impossible, under the peculiar circumstances of last Session, when we were in the House from one o'clock in the afternoon until two, or three, or four o'clock in the morning, and sometimes all night—to do more than we did do. But when the work was completed and the several reports were made to the general committee, a great many suggestions were made, and it was thought—and I myself fully believed—that the committee would meet to consider in a body the different suggestions made by the sub-committees. I am informed that a majority or a quorum of the general committee did so meet, but it was towards the close of the Session after a large number of members had been obliged to go home, and I and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) had not an opportunity of considering the suggestions made by the other sub-committees. I, therefore, take no responsibility for the work done by the other sub-committees, either as to approving or disapproving the suggestions made by them. I was quite satisfied when the hon. gentleman incorporated in the volume he submitted to the House this Session—I think he acted very wisely—a consolidation of the Statutes of last year; and a sub-committee should be charged with the duty of examining the work done since the committee reported last year, and report as to how far the work has been done, well or ill. We should then have an opportunity of considering more carefully the reports of the other sub-committees. Altogether there were six sub-committees, and the general committee never took all their reports into consideration, for although a formal report was made by a section, or by a quorum, perhaps, of all, still, substantially and practically, it was not the report of the whole committee. Under these circumstances it would be very desirable that this Bill should be referred to a select committee, because it is quite apparent to the House that it is utterly impossible that we should consider it here. Believing such a course would be taken, I did not examine the consolidation of the Acts of last Session with the report of the previous committee on the consolidation of the general laws, and I am not, therefore, in a position to say whether it is accurate or not. The work is a very important one, and it would be very lamentable if, after we passed in a most perfunctory way the work done in the committee, a grievous error should be found to exist.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I had no idea that a committee could possibly have given the revision that amount of attention and particular care which the revisers themselves must be considered to have given it. When I spoke of having done their work with particularity, I meant so far as it is possible for a committee to revise the work of consolidation, and I think, with the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), that that is all we can expect from any committee, and unless the House does eventually take upon credit the work of the committee and the revisers, it will never be able to adopt a consolidation at all. It seems, however, I have been moving in the matter with a misunderstanding as to the position of some of my hon. friends opposite. I was under the impression that, during the interval that elapsed between the first and second reading of the Bill, those hon. members would be good enough to consider the revision and call attention at this stage to any defect they wished to have removed. They seem, on the other hand, to have been under the belief that the Bill would be referred to a special committee. I do not wish, under these circumstances, to proceed with the Bill to-day. I therefore move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again, and between this and to-morrow I will consider what course I will follow to meet the suggestions of hon. gentlemen opposite. I will do one of two things: either refer the consolidation to a special committee with instructions to examine the work done since last Session, or I will allow time to elapse until hon. gentlemen interested in the revision shall have an opportunity to closely examine it.

Mr. BLAKE. The suggestion is one which will, no doubt, meet with universal acceptance. I hope, if it be only for the sake of the precedent, the hon. gentleman will cause the consolidation to be referred to a select committee, for Parliament should not be asked to say that the revision is accurate without having the guarantee of a committee of its own on the work of consolidation.

Committee rose and reported progress.

RAILWAY FROM ESQUIMALT TO NANAIMO.

Mr. POPE moved the second reading of Bill (No. 47) respecting the railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, in British Columbia. He said: The object of this Bill is simply this: The curvature on this particular road was fixed by Statute, and it could not be changed except by this House. For some reason or other this seems to have been misunderstood by Mr. Dunsmuir, who was building the road. He did not seem to understand that he could not change the curvature, but he did so. He changed it from a fixed minimum of 7 degrees very largely indeed; for I find from $4\frac{1}{2}$ to $5\frac{1}{2}$, two curves of 8 degrees; also from 5 to $8\frac{1}{2}$, two curves of 8 degrees; from 37 to 39, two curves of 8 degrees; from 39 to 46—which was a very difficult section—six curves of 8 degrees; 46 to 48, one curve of 8 degrees; 48 to 49, three curves of 9 degrees; 49 to 52, three curves of 8 degrees; 52 to 58, one curve of 8 degrees; 58 to 63, four of 9 degrees, and five of 10 degrees—this being a very difficult portion of the work; from 67 to 68, four curves of 8 degrees; so that we find there are 45 curves exceeding the minimum curve that was fixed by Statute. But in the report of the Chief Engineer it appears that after an examination of the road he states that he thinks there was no fraud intended, and that the road will be more substantial than it would have been if built on the original location, and, upon the whole, he advises the changed curvature. Besides, the work is getting pretty well advanced; some 30 miles are completed, and up to this time the contractors have not received one dollar in any form. It was understood by this House when the contract was entered into that the Government should pay the contractors \$750,000 for the road besides the grant of land which they would get from the Local Legislature. There was joint legislation by the Legislature of British Columbia and this Parliament. In making this change I have asked that the necessary authority be given by the British Columbia Legislature. The Government of that Province sent us, in the first place, a despatch saying that the curvature had been changed by the Governor in Council. Since that time I have had a telegram from Mr. Smith, Premier of the Province, stating that a resolution of the House had been passed agreeing to the proposed change of curvature. These, Sir, are my reasons for introducing this Bill, the second reading of which I now move.

Mr. BLAKE. I have read the papers which the hon. gentleman laid on the Table, and I am not prepared to say—assuming the authority of the British Columbia Legislature properly obtained, which I think to be of very material importance in order to avoid future difficulty—that the Government is, on the whole, wrong in proposing this measure of relief. But I must say that the circumstances appear to me to be very extraordinary. A railway company enter into a contract to construct a railway with two provisions as to the characteristics. One was that the character of the road should be equal to that of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia, but another one was that there was an express limitation as to the curvature and grades which would not be accepted. Well, it is true, I suppose, that at that time—it is certainly true that at one time—it was not contemplated that the curves and grades of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia should be so severe as they now are. They are now more severe, in many instances, than the grades and curves which actually exist on this line; but, of course, the idea that because more severe grades and curves obtain on the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia, that was to be an absolution of the company from their specific engagement that they would not exceed certain grades, or have curves of a radius of less than a particular standard, is absurd. No one could seriously argue that that was the construction to be placed on the contract. It did not require a lawyer to inform the hon. gentleman that those were the governing clauses and that they should not have grades and curves inferior to those which were specified. And yet that is the only pretence the company make. They say that they had a right to make any grade or curve in excess of those which were specified in the contract, if only they were not in excess of those which the Government, in its kindly feeling towards the Canadian Pacific Railway, allowed for that company in British Columbia. No application was made to the Government; they were to send down plans and surveys and descriptions showing a certain alignment and showing the grades and curves. They approved of those grades and curves, and they presume that that road was being constructed according to them, but now they find that different grades and curves were substituted.

Mr. POPE. Not the grades.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, that different curves were substituted, and in some cases, I think, inferior grades, though not beyond the maximum, so that, at any rate, the plans which were laid before the Government were not complied with by the company. Mr. Trutch reports, however, that he is convinced that their action in this respect was not actuated by disingenuous motives; that it was simply the result of a misunderstanding of the conditions of their agreement with the Government, though he correctly characterises their conduct as unwarrantable. He says:

"I desire, however, to remark on the subject generally, that it is, of course, clear that the company have acted wrongly in altering the alignment of their railway without obtaining, or even asking, the approval of the Government, and they are certainly blameable for having so done. It is much to be regretted that they have acted so unwarrantably."

Then I observe that in certain places it is pointed out that alterations were made, and they were made, as it seems to me, without sufficient cause. I think it necessary to say that, because it is that which created the greatest doubt in my mind as to whether we should comply with the hon. gentleman's views. For instance, at page 14 it is said:

"8½ to 11 miles. The only change in line on this portion is at the ninth mile, where two 8 degree curves have been put in with the object of reducing heavy rock cutting."

There it is simply to save a little expense, and you find that curves inferior to those which were prescribed have been put in. Again:

"67 to 68 miles. Considerable changes have been made on this portion and the curvature increased. From station 195 to 213 an alteration was made in order to leave sufficient space between the stream and line to form an embankment and dispense with a very large amount of trestle work. One 8 degree and one 9° 30' curve were put in here, but the latter is now being changed to an 8 degree. From station 160 to 180 two 8 degree curves have been substituted for a 5 degree and a 7 degree curve, with the object of reducing trestle work, but the saving effected is so slight that I do not consider the change was advisable."

There you have a degrading change in the curve, simply for the purpose of effecting a very light saving. Again:

"69 to about 71 miles at Esquimalt. From station 33 to 100 on this portion a deviation has been made from the original line and the curvature considerably increased. The alignment is fair for the locality, but does not compare favorably with the original line. The company's engineer states that this alteration was a necessity in order to enable them to prosecute the rest of the work, as the land owners along this part of the line refused right of way unless this deviation was made and the line carried along the water front to Dead Man's River, as now built; and that arbitration was impossible owing to the retention in Ottawa of the company's land plans."

Well, of course, the land owners could not refuse arbitration except for the reason which is here stated, and which I would like the hon. gentleman to explain—that is, the retention in Ottawa of the company's land plans. In that instance the hon. gentleman appears to be at fault.

Mr. POPE. No; I will explain that. It was the fault of themselves in not sending proper plans that we could accept, and we had to send them back.

Mr. BLAKE. The complaint that is made here is not that the difficulty was created by the hon. gentleman sending back the plans, but that it was created by his not sending them back.

Mr. POPE. In the first place, they sent down only one, and we are obliged to have them in triplicate. This took considerable correspondence, and consequently delayed the matter, no doubt.

Mr. BLAKE. But, of course, the hon. gentleman could not get them in triplicate until the original plan was sent back.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. POPE. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh, I see; the hon. gentleman holds on to what he gets and expects something more. It seems to me, however, to be somewhat an extraordinary course for them to take. But the railway is not to be owned by us; it has been a concession to the Province of British Columbia in settlement of the difficulties between the Dominion and the Province, which was accepted by the Province, and as I stated on the occasion of that acceptance, when the same question was raised as to its propriety, I was disposed to attach great weight to the decision of the Provincial Legislature upon that question. Now, I do not want that we should get into further entanglements. The hon. gentleman stated that his Bill shows that this requires, in his view, concurrent legislation. He now tells us that he has the resolution of the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia, or, rather, a telegraphic advice of such a resolution. That is all we have now. I think the hon. gentleman had better consider before he takes the Bill into Committee of the Whole, with the assistance of the Minister of Justice, whether if it be correct, as the Bill itself declares it is, that we should proceed only on the authority of legislation by the Legislature of British Columbia, it would do to alter the Bill as I understand the hon. gentleman proposes, so that we may assume that legislation has taken place. I think not. Legislation has not taken place. A resolution of the Assembly is not an Act of the Legislature, and, therefore, there is not that complete and final decision on the part of the Legislature of British Columbia, which is necessary in order to our avoiding the possibility of future complications. On the Bill, as it stands, there is no objection, because it says: "May when the Legislature of the Province has passed an Act." To that there is no objection; but if in lieu of that Statute you are about to accept a telegraphic despatch, declaring that a resolution of the Assembly has been passed, you are certainly opening the door to some difficulty in the future. Therefore, I throw out that suggestion for the hon. gentleman's consideration before he takes the next stage of the Bill.

Mr. POPE. Of course, it is quite impossible to get an Act passed in the Legislature of British Columbia this Session. We have received a telegram from the Premier of the Province stating that a resolution has been passed by the House; the Order in Council passed by the Provincial Government has been sent by the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia; and to-day I understand my hon. friend the Secretary of State has received a telegram from the Lieutenant-Governor, also stating that a resolution has passed the Assembly, agreeing to this proposition. We cannot expect more this Session; and I cannot see how we could pass this Bill depending upon the Legislature of British Columbia—for I understand that to be the hon. gentleman's proposition—passing an Act to give effect to this measure, because the whole thing would be delayed until the meeting of the Legislature next year. Almost all the work has been done, and I think we may regard the resolution of the Legislature as a pretty strong indication of its intention, and sufficient to justify us in proceeding with this measure.

Mr. BLAKE. That does not arise on the second reading, at any rate. The Bill as it now stands is all right.

Mr. CHARLTON. If my memory serves me, the company organised for the construction of this road is, practically, the Central Pacific Railway Company of California, one of the wealthiest railway corporations in America—a corporation which, from small beginnings, has amassed a property valued recently at nearly $200,000,000. The company organised for the construction of this road secured unusually favorable terms. It was to receive a bonus of $750,000 and a valuable land grant, while the road was to be only about 75 miles long, together with the concessions which practically gave it a monopoly of the entire coal business of Vancouver Island. It actually received for the construction of this road three or four times the aid which it ought to have received. Therefore it strikes me, considering what has been granted to these American railway speculators, that the Government should not be in haste to modify the contract made with them. I do not see why we should not require the conditions of that contract to be strictly adhered to, and if it is impossible to obtain the necessary Provincial legislation this year, I cannot see why the Government should anticipate the action of the Legislature of British Columbia. I voted against the grant to this company when it was made. I believed it was too much; I believed that the interests of the people of British Columbia were being sacrificed—by themselves, of course, yet this House should exercise supervision over them; and I think when the company apply for relief, they should be held strictly and literally to the conditions of contract without any abatement. This Bill is premature, and the concessions proposed in it are such as the House should not grant under any consideration whatever.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. It is not strictly correct that this road is owned by American capitalists. The principal portion of the stock is owned by residents of the Province of British Columbia. True, there are American capitalists in the company, and I fail to see any objection in that. I think it is an advantage if we can induce foreign capitalists to come in and expend their money in building our public works, if we have not men in our country who will do so. Neither is it true that the people of British Columbia have sacrificed their interests. This railway is a direct benefit to the Province of British Columbia, especially to Vancouver Island. Since the Settlement Bill passed this House two years ago, more settlers have gone in and located on the lands along the line of this road than went in during thirty years before, which certainly cannot be detrimental to the interests of the Province; and they were induced to go there by the fact that this road was commenced for the opening up of the country. I can say from personal observation, having travelled over that road, last year, for the purpose of seeing the nature of the work, that there is not a better road in the Dominion of Canada to-day than that railway. There will be no difficulty in running trains over a large portion of that road thirty miles an hour. With regard to the curves, I am satisfied that the company have expended a larger amount of money in making them sharper than they would have done if they had complied strictly with the specifications. Of course, as the leader of the Opposition has just remarked, this road is to be worked, not by the Government, but by the men who have undertaken to build it, and they naturally desired to build the best road possible. That is the reason why they have deviated somewhat from the specifications. The specifications called for a large amount of trestle work, which would cost less in the construction of the road, but in the long run would cost a great deal more than what they have done. Instead of building trestle work, they have blasted out the mountains, and have made a solid roadbed. I am satisfied that when it is completed there will not be a more substantial railway in any part of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the House will allow me, I will state the names of the projectors and owners of this road. They are Robert Dunsmuir, John Bryden, James Dunsmuir, Charles Crocker, one of the magnates of the Pacific; Charles F. Crocker, Leland Stanford and Collis P. Huntington. Four of these individuals out of the seven are railway kings, interested in the Southern and Central Pacific Railways of California. They are the moving spirits in this enterprise; and I repeat, whether this road is advantageous to British Columbia or not, the people of that Province are paying vastly more than that advantage is worth; and it is necessary that this House should insist on the company carrying out the conditions of the contract.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. Though the gentlemen the hon. gentleman has named are Americans, they do not own the principal interests of this road; the principal interests in it are owned by residents of the Province.

Mr. BAKER. I may state, for the information of the hon. gentlemen opposite who have just spoken, that three-fifths of the stock is owned by Dunsmuir & Son, of British Columbia, and two-fifths by the California stockholders. That I know from Mr. Dunsmuir himself, so that the control of the company is in the hands of Messrs. Dunsmuir & Son entirely.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And also the coal lands, I see.

Mr. BLAKE. I have no objection to the House going into committee without changing the Bill, but I think the hon. gentleman would do well to consult his colleagues as to whether the resolution of the Assembly is to be taken as an authority for this Act, and whether that authority is sufficient.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension as to the nature of the legislation existing on this subject in British Columbia. I regard this as a matter in which the two Governments are principally interested, and that the concession now being made is made on the motion of the Government of British Columbia, in respect of a matter which concerns them very much more than it concerns us. The necessity for adopting the Act here arises from the fact that the terms of the contract are embodied in a statute of Canada. That, however, is not the case in British Columbia. If it were, of course it would be necessary to get much more than a mere resolution of the Legislature, but not being embodied in the terms of a statute there, we can properly act on the motion of the Government of British Columbia, as representing the interests which they have in charge. It would not be desirable that our Orders in Council should be based on a telegram; but on receipt of a proper Order in Council of that Government, it would be proper for us to give consent under the authority of the Statute we are passing.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not investigate the question, whether an Act of the Legislature of British Columbia was necessary or not, but I assumed it was because the Bill mentioned it as a necessary preliminary, and I took it for granted the Bill did not contain any unnecessary condition. I stated that if that condition was correctly put in the Bill, it had not been fulfilled by a resolution. I may say to the Minister of Justice that upon the information he gives to the House that the Legislature of British Columbia have naught to do with this and that the Executive alone has to do with it, that if he consults his colleague he will find the Executive of British Columbia have already acted, and their authority is here, as they have sent us a copy of the Minute in Council. Under these circumstances, I think any change made should be, not to refer to the resolution of the Assembly of British Columbia, but simply to the Order in Council of the British Columbia Government.

Mr. THOMPSON. The amendment of the Minister of Railways is simply to alter the clause so as to give the Governor in Council power to adopt the terms of this contract.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in committee, amended, and reported as amended.

UNION SUSPENSION BRIDGE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 72) respecting the Union Suspension Bridge. He said: The object of the Bill is simply to make the bridge a free bridge, so that the intercourse between the two Provinces, Ontario and Quebec, at that point, will not meet with any restriction.

Mr. BLAKE. Something has been said in the papers of the arrangements between Ottawa and the Government, whereby, in some sort of rough adjustment of its share of municipal taxation, the Government are to give some sort of public conveniences.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. The city of Ottawa for a long time has been complaining that the Government having such large properties in the centre of the city and contributing nothing to the municipality in any way, either to the fire department or road department or the police or anything else connected with the city, it is only just that some compensation should be made, as the city was unable to provide for all these matters in so far as public buildings were concerned. Under these circumstances, it was thought proper that the two bridges here, opposite the Public Buildings, the Sappers' Bridge as well as the Wellington Street Bridge, and the approach to the latter by the street opposite the Public Buildings, should be under the charge of the Government. It was also thought that the Maria Bridge and the two bridges that were built over the slides at the Chaudière, leading to the Union Suspension Bridge, should be under the care of the Government as well. Under those circumstances, we thought that, inasmuch as the Major's Hill Park was put in the hands of the city as a trust, they were not really the proprietors, but only the administrators of the property; that as it was only a burden to them, and a property that the Government believed should remain as a portion of the Government property and under the care of the Government, it should revert to the Crown so as to be in the same position as it was previous to the arrangement with the city; and the city asked that the bridge between the two sides of the river, the Union Suspension Bridge, between Ontario and Quebec, might be made free. That was the only communication by land between the two Provinces here, and they therefore asked that the bridge should be made free, which is the reason why this Bill is brought forward.

Mr. BLAKE. I have always considered it a very proper thing that the Government should not be wholly exempt from a contribution to the local burdens of the places in which their buildings are situated, and in England we know that the Government, though not agreeing to pay taxes to the community in which their buildings are situated, place a lump sum in the Estimates for the purpose of making a contribution to the local rates in those places. Therefore, to the general principle that the city should receive some relief from the Government whose buildings are situated here, I have no objection; nor do I desire to say anything as to the exact plan which the hon. gentleman has adopted. What I have to say is that, inasmuch as it now appears that this is a measure of relief to the city of Ottawa, which is based on the recognition of the general principle that there should be some contribution by the general Government towards the local expenditures, what would seem to be reasonable to my mind is that, when an agreement was entered into, some statement should have been made by which we could understand approximately what obligations we are assuming and what burdens we are undertaking by reason of this equitable arrangement on our part. The hon. gentleman does not supply us with any such statement. We do not know what the repair and renewal fund of this bridge may amount to. It appears to be a pretty old bridge.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish).

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is in a very good state

Mr. BLAKE. I dare say it is; but I am very glad to know that the toll is to be taken off. So, with reference to the other bridges and the other works which we are undertaking, I think a reasonable method of dealing with the matter would have been to lay before the House a statement of what it was supposed by the Government would be a fair compensation for the city of Ottawa, and what the reliefs granted and the burdens assumed by us would represent, so that we might judge whether they were reasonable or not. Upon that question it is utterly impossible, at any rate, for me to form any opinion from the statement of the hon. gentleman.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. My intention is to have a statement of the kind referred to produced when we get to the item in the Estimates.

Mr. BLAKE. Involving this point as well?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; I will explain the whole thing.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would ask the Minister of Public Works if the Government have received the tolls hitherto collected on this bridge?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The tolls were small. The tolls have varied from $2,900 to a little over $3,000. Then we had to pay the gatekeeper and the repairs out of that, so that the profits were not very great. I have an estimate of the revenue of the bridge from 1852, which, I think, is the time when the bridge was built, to 1885. In thirty-three and a half years we have received $57,500, which would make about $1,700 a year.

Bill reported.

THE BURLINGTON CANAL.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved second reading of Bill (No. 76) respecting the Burlington Canal. He said: This work has the big name of a canal, but it is a mere passage from one water to another, without any lock. It is an open canal, if I may call it so, and the tolls have been reduced very much in order to encourage the trade; and we thought that, under the circumstances, it was only fair that the tolls should be abolished altogether. The tolls are small. They vary from $1,700 to $4,000.

Mr. BLAKE. Is that close?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, $4,051. The gross revenue during the last five years, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885, was $14,720, and the net revenue was $11,791. The repairs were very small during those five years, amounting to only $668. We had also to provide a carriage way. The hon. gentleman knows that before the opening of that canal there was a road, and the canal having had to cut the road, the Government were obliged to make a new one.

Mr. GAULT. I think if the hon. Minister of Public Works would include all the canals on the St. Lawrence, it would meet with the approbation of the people of Canada.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the reason the hon. gentleman gave for that portion of this Bill would apply. He said the tolls would be reduced very much so that they ought to be abolished. I think that is the condition of the hon. gentleman's canals, too.

Mr. CURRAN. No doubt that is a symptom of what is going to take place.

Mr. VAIL. While the Government are considering the canals in the Upper Provinces and the tolls levied, I think they should take into consideration the wharfage paid on the public piers and breakwaters in Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 84) respecting summary proceedings before Justices of the Peace and other Magistrates—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Thompson, Antigonish.)

Bill (No. 85) to amend the several Acts relating to the Board of Trade in the city of Toronto—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Small.)

AMENDMENTS TO THE POST OFFICE ACT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 77) to amend the Post Office Act of 1875, said: I understand this Bill is simply to give more time for the depositors in the Post Office Savings Banks before the receipt of the acknowledgment. The ordinary limit is now 10 days; that is found too short, and the limit is extended to 16 days. It applies to Manitoba and British Columbia.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

AMENDMENTS TO THE INTERPRETATION ACT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 80) further to amend the Interpretation Act.

Mr. BLAKE. This is rather an important Bill.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I understand it was only distributed this morning. If the hon. gentleman wishes it to be delayed, we can do so.

Mr. BLAKE. This is a Bill to legalise a whole lot of illegal things, got up by the Minister of Railways.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No doubt we can make it to apply back for eleven years.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps you can. We will deal with the Acts of the present Administration. The others have paid their penalty.

SUPPLY.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. PATERSON. I suppose it is too late to bring up the matter now, but I desire to say that I understood when we closed on Friday night that the business which would come up to-day would be a motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means. I thought I understood the hon. gentleman to say that. When the House adjourned on Friday we had been in committee and were considering some of the items, and the Finance Minister, when his attention was drawn to certain matters, stated that they would stand over till Tuesday.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is so far right, that it was stated that the matter would not be gone on with that evening for the reasons given. I think the leader of the Opposition stated, either openly or across the floor, that it would be a proper thing that time should be given, as the public had not had time to consider well the different changes or additions proposed to the tariff; and under those circumstances it was thought desirable that a little more time should be given. On that suggestion, we stated that the matter would stand over till Tuesday. I did not understand that we were bound to bring it up to-day. We give more time, and, no doubt, later on we may go on with it, though I cannot promise to do so on Tuesday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think it was expressly stated that the matter would be postponed to Tuesday. I will not take upon myself to say that a positive engagement was made, but that was my understanding of the remark made by the Finance Minister that he proposed to go on to-day; and it would have been more convenient, when the matter was fresh on our minds, to have proceeded with it than to have taken up other work in Committee of Supply.

Mr. BLAKE. The statement of the Minister, according to the official report, is this: In reply to a remark by the hon. member for South Huron, he said:

"I understood that some other hon. gentlemen wished to continue the debate on Tuesday. If it be the wish of the House, I will refer to a few of the items to-night."

Mr. McLELAN. I was out of the House when the understanding was reached between the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the House. When I came into the Chamber the Minister of Public Works informed me that it was desired by hon. gentlemen opposite that the matter should stand over till Tuesday, and I should make some explanation respecting the changes proposed, in order that we might hear from the country in the meantime. I may say that some communications have been had with parties interested, and I think, perhaps, it is not desirable that we should proceed to-day. I do not know that we were under any obligation or engagement that the matter should be taken up to-day.

Mr. BLAKE. I would be the last to suggest that if communications are being had with the trade, and the hon. gentleman thinks it possible that some modifications may be made, the discussion should not be postponed; but what I think is a reasonable observation is that there was certainly an understanding that the matter was to proceed on Tuesday; and if the hon. gentleman found last night that the public interest would be better served by taking up something else, the hon. gentleman should have told us that it was their intention to go into Supply. We assumed that the course taken would be that indicated on Friday, and the arrangements made on our side were based on that assumption. We had a right to assume on the basis of the statement of the Minister, that the matter was going to be taken up to-day, and the hon. gentleman should have informed us that the Government intended to take up Supply instead of Ways and Means.

Mr. CHARLTON. The agreement, if not expressed, was implied, that we should go on with the business referred to to-day. There is great force in what the leader of the Opposition has stated, that we were entitled, at least, to notice from the Government last night of their intention not to go on with the ordinary business, but to go into Committee of Supply. It is hardly treating the Opposition fairly to take up business for which we are not prepared and which was not expected.

Mr. McLELAN. I understood subsequently, not being in the House and having a full knowledge of all that occurred, that the debate had reached a close on the general subject and that only remarks on the different items would be made. The result of the postponement has been that we have had several communications from the trade, and I thought it was undesirable that we should to-day take up and conclude a matter, when we might afterwards see some modifications that might be desirable and necessary to make in order to render it as harmonious and acceptable to the general trade as possible. I did not know that we were under any particular obligation to go on with the matter to-day, I not having, as I have said, a full knowledge of all that occurred.

Mr. PATERSON. I should be sorry if Ministers understood me to charge them with breach of faith in this matter. My remarks did not go to that extent; but I simply stated the impression that was so strong on my mind and on the minds of others, and we prepared ourselves accordingly. I do not charge a breach of faith; I say that the impression left was so clear on my mind that we prepared in that direction.

Mr. MILLS. The Minister will see that his own statement was calculated to leave that impression—and it did make that impression on my mind. The hon. gentleman was out of the House and was sent for, and when he arrived he made the statement which has been read by the leader of the Opposition. I understood that some other hon. members wished to continue the debate on Tuesday. Continue what debate? Certainly that in which we were then engaged.

Assistant Financial Inspector..... $1,700

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the meaning of this change? If I understand the matter, this gentleman is to be transferred, as the foot note intimates, from the Department of Finance, and I see he is created Assistant Finance Inspector. I do not remember that we had any such officer under that name in the Finance Department. Probably the hon. gentleman will explain who is going to be appointed, and what his precise duties are going to be.

Mr. McLELAN. I understand the practice has been for several years to send out one of the clerks in the Department to assist the inspector, as owing to the growth of business one officer is unable to undertake the whole work; and that it has been the custom to send out trusty men, such as the chief clerks of the Department, to assist in that business. The deputy reported, however, that it would be better to take a gentleman from the Department and give him that special duty, assigning him the office of Assistant Inspector; and it is proposed to transfer him with the same salary he has been receiving in the Department. The business has very largely increased, extending from British Columbia to the extreme east, so that it often happens that we have occasion to send one inspector east and another west at the same time.

Mr. VAIL. Is this a transfer from one office to another? Is it intended to fill up the other place?

Mr. McLELAN. No. There is a considerable reduction in the Department, part of which arises from this transfer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Whom does the hon. gentleman propose to appoint?

Mr. McLELAN. Mr. Crookshank, who is reported to be able to do the work very efficiently.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What position did he fill before? I notice that there is the same number of first-class clerks.

Mr. McLELAN. He was clerk and private secretary to the late Minister.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This gentleman becomes Mr. Tims' assistant, in fact?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, you add a little. He appears to have been receiving $1,400.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes, $1,400, and $400 as private secretary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; but, of course, you will want a private secretary.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Mr. McLELAN.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What travelling allowances do you propose to give? What is the rule with regard to travelling allowances for these gentlemen, and travelling allowances generally. There was some discussion, when the Estimates were passing before, as to what the Treasury Board proposed to do in the matter of travelling allowances.

Mr. McLELAN. The allowance for travelling has been $3.50 per day, except when travelling in British Columbia and the North-West, when an increased sum is paid.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does that include railway expenses?

Mr. McLELAN. No; that is for board and hotel expenses.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To what classes of officers does that allowance of $3.50 apply? Have the Treasury Board laid down the rule that when any officer is despatched he is to be allowed that amount?

Mr. McLELAN. No. In some of the Departments there are officers who are very frequently on the move, and in these cases the allowance is regulated by the head of the Department, but in no case must it exceed $3.50 per day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Although in certain cases that allowance will not be excessive, still the Minister will see very clearly that these maximum allowances are constantly tending to slide into ordinary allowances, and there are many errands which can be made by officers in the Department at a lower rate for allowances than $3.50. That sum is more than would be allowed by banks and other offices for despatching junior clerks on similar errands. I think that the Treasury Board might better grade them on some fixed standard.

Mr. VAIL. Do they ever send in a bill at a lower rate of allowance than $3.50?

Mr. McLELAN. I do not know as to that, but where the Department as a rule regulate the amount paid to these officers for a particular service, they send in their accounts at that sum.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the rule, for instance, in the Public Works Department, where, no doubt, there are a great many occasions of that kind?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The allowance varies, the maximum being $3.50. If an officer of a certain grade, of a higher position has to travel, he may be allowed the full amount, while a minor officer may receive less—say $1.50 or $2. It is determined by the work performed and the position of the officer.

Mr. VAIL. What is allowed engineers in the Maritime Provinces, for instance?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Well, they are officers of position and they get sometimes $3.50 and sometimes $3. The chief engineer in the Department, or the chief architect or an officer of that kind, if he travels for the Department, is, of course, allowed the maximum amount.

Mr. VAIL. What I would object to would be to allow well-paid officers to supplement their salaries out of allowances for expenses. It is well known that, as a rule, in the country it does not cost these gentlemen $3.50 per day for hotel expenses, and I think they should be allowed just about what covers their expenses, and no more.

Mr. McLELAN. I may say, with respect to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, in which I was for some years, the rule was that officers whose business it was to travel, and who were expected to be on the road very frequently, were allowed the actual expenses of travelling—I mean such officers as inspectors of hulls or inspectors of steamboats, whose business called them out frequently. We pay them their expenses; but when we send a man out for a day or two we grant him an allowance of $3.50 per day, when he is an officer of rank.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). In some of the Departments there are men whose time is largely at their own disposal, and who could charge expenses for time when they are practically not engaged in departmental work. I should like to ask the Minister if there is any check provided, by which the Department may know that such officials are drawing nothing more than their expenses while actually attending to departmental work outside of their offices?

Mr. McLELAN. The officer has to render an account for each day; and to make a statement of the duties he was performing during each day's absence. Upon the good faith of the officer, and the knowledge of the business he had to transact, the account is accepted.

Office of Auditor and Receiver-General, Halifax..... $11,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I perceive a year's rent charged for this. I thought there were Dominion buildings at Halifax where these officers could be put.

Mr. McLELAN. No, there are not sufficient Government buildings there for all the Government departments, and some have to be rented.

Office of Auditor and Receiver General, Winnipeg.... $6,000 do Board allowance..... 900

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There was, no doubt, a time when it was perfectly reasonable that an additional allowance for board should be made to officers residing in Manitoba; but, if I am correctly informed, the prices of all articles there have fallen to such a point that there is very little or no additional expense now incurred by residents of Winnipeg, unless in the articles of fuel, than is incurred by residents of other places; and I do not see that a board allowance which was made while things were at boom prices should continue. If the salaries of the officers were below the salaries of officers in other places, that would be a ground for a distinction. As far as my observation goes—and I paid a visit to Manitoba within the last few months—I should say that in all but one item, living is as cheap there as anywhere else.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Some years ago the rule was adopted of making a special allowance for officers appointed in Manitoba and the North-West at salaries equivalent to those paid in the older Provinces, on account of the additional cost of living in that part of the Dominion. It is quite true, as the hon. gentleman states, that the cost of living has diminished from that time to a considerable extent, and in Winnipeg it has diminished, perhaps, to a greater extent than farther west. It is the intention of the Government to act on that information. In the case of new appointments the information is conveyed to the officers that this will not be continued, and it is intended to remove it entirely at a very early day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What percentage does this represent? What principle is it made on?

Mr. McLELAN. The percentage in this case seems to have been 15 per cent. There is no doubt that some years ago the expense of living there was very much more than it was in other places; but perhaps with the exception of rent and fuel, the expenses are now more generally equalised. As has been stated by the Minister of Inland Revenue, the Government have been considering this question with a view to a reduction of this allowance. In some cases the reduction has been made. I have not had an opportunity to ascertain what reduction could be made, if any, this year; but I have no doubt this allowance will be gradually wiped out, and the officers there placed on the same footing as those in other parts of the Dominion.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I can easily understand that at the time the allowance was first made it was perfectly right and proper. At that time rents were very high in the North-West and the cost of living was almost at famine point. But now the conditions are entirely reversed; rents there are just as low as they are in other parts of the Dominion, and the price of farm produce and everything that goes to make up the cost of living, is lower there than almost anywhere else in the Dominion. It is wrong, therefore, that that charge should be continued when the necessity for it has altogether ceased to exist.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not think the reasons for a reduction have altogether ceased to exist, but I know that some of the Departments have already reduced the extra allowances which have been paid heretofore in consideration of the high price of living—particularly the high cost of fuel and house rent. House rent, I think, has not gone down materially.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It has gone down very much.

Mr. BOWELL. I am speaking only of what I know as to one or two houses rented, of which the rents have not been materially reduced. I believe, however, rent is rapidly going down and that living will soon be as cheap in Winnipeg, apart from house rent and fuel, as elsewhere. Steps have been taken by my hon. friend, the Minister of Inland Revenue, to reduce the allowances which have been made in the past. As Minister of Customs I never make any allowance, so it does not apply to my Department. True, the salaries paid to the appointees who were named at a time when everything was higher, were higher in proportion than those paid to officials of the same grade elsewhere, but when an officer is placed on the list at a certain salary, it is difficult to reduce it.

Mr. WATSON. I believe living is as cheap in Manitoba as in any other portion. So far as house rent is concerned, it is reduced over 50 per cent. since the last three years in Winnipeg, and all other necessaries of life can be procured as cheaply as in any portion of the Dominion. Fuel may be a little more expensive, but with that exception living ought to be as cheap as anywhere else.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can fully endorse that statement. I am satisfied the reduction in house rent is very serious, and I think it is time some reduction should be made in the Civil Service. When an item is passed year after year, those in charge will find some excuse for drawing the money. The Government should undoubtedly look into the matter, and report to the House the facts, for there is no reason now why this item should be continued as it is from year to year. I am cognisant of the reduction in expenses of living, for I have friends out there, and I know that the necessaries of life in Winnipeg can be had as cheaply as in the city of Toronto.

Auditor and Receiver-General of Victoria..... $8,200

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the rule the Minister proposes to adopt with respect to these Receiver-Generals. One man gets one salary in one place, and another a salary 30 per cent. lower in another place. Is there any scale laid out according to the business done, &c., or what is the principle?

Mr. McLELAN. The salaries are generally regulated by the amount of business done at each place.

Mr. VAIL. I do not see why a man in British Columbia should receive $8,000 when those in Halifax and St. John, N.B., receive only $2,200, and in Winnipeg only $2,000. The salaries should be equalised. Is there more work done in British Columbia so as to entitle a man to receive 50 per cent. more salary than one in the same position in Halifax or St. John?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the amount of deposits in Victoria and in Halifax and St. John?

Mr. McLELAN. I have not here the papers giving the particulars, as by some accident they did not reach me, but in British Columbia there is a pretty large business done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is Victoria the only office?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes, except that there are country savings banks at different points.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course, the Estimates do not show us that, but simply give the total amount received in each Province, so that it is not easy to form an opinion. I should be under the impression that both in Halifax and St. John, the amount of business decidedly exceeds that of Victoria.

Mr. McLELAN. It does.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And naturally the officers in those ports will have some ground of complaint, when they see that a man elsewhere, doing the same work, gets 50 per cent. more pay.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). At the time of Confederation the Receiver-General got $3,000, and it is the same man who has been in the office ever since.

Mr. BOWELL. One of the terms of Confederation with British Columbia was that all the Imperial officers should be taken over by the Dominion Government at the salaries they then had. In some of the Customs districts men there get $1,700 or $1,800 for doing what men in old Canada get only $500 for. There would be no saving in discharging these men, because they would have to be superannuated under full salary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If, as the hon. member for Victoria states, Mr. Graham is the same gentleman as was there before, it would make a difference. Does the hon. gentleman know whether the subordinates are also parties who were there before Confederation?

Mr. BAKER. There have been some recent appointments.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Apparently the same rule seems to apply to the other favored individuals as well.

Mr. BAKER. Allowance must be made for the increased cost of living.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. After Confederation?

Mr. BAKER. $1,200 a year in Ontario would be about equivalent to $1,600 in British Columbia.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does my hon. friend mean that the adoption of the Canadian tariff adds 25 per cent. to the cost of living in British Columbia?

Mr. VAIL. The expenditure of last year was $7,759, this year it is $8,200.

Mr. McLELAN. In some years it is absolutely necessary that the estimates should be larger than in other years. All the money may not be expended, or perhaps expended and go into the following year. We have placed the estimates at the sum the proper officers estimated as required to carry on that branch of the service.

Mr. VAIL. I am speaking in the interests of the Government. Very often they are pressed to make appointments because a vote has been taken by the House, when otherwise they might have relieved themselves from that necessity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would just mention to the Minister of Finance that, if he conveniently can, it would be as well to bring with him, when the House meets after recess, the details which were laid on the Table as to the number of depositors, and so forth, in these various savings banks. There are copies of the returns which were moved for and brought down, some last Session and some this, but it would be desirable to have them for the assistance of the House in the discussion which will probably take place under that head.

Mr. McLELAN. I will bring them if I can get them; if not the item may be left over.

It being six o'clock the Committee rose, and Mr Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. McLELAN. The item referred to before recess will stand for the present.

Governor General's Secretary's Office..... $9,750

Mr. McLELAN. There is a decrease in the salary of one third-class clerk, and the statutory increase brings the amount within $140 of last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who is the person appointed?

Mr. McLELAN. I cannot give the name.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There must have been a promotion of a clerk that was a third-class clerk to the second-class, and that must cause the difference.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; apparently some one has left, and a new man has been brought in. Who is he?

Privy Council Office..... $20,677 50

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now, here there seems to have been a considerable increase. I see that four clerks have their salaries collectively raised by $500, which is considerably more than the statutory increase would warrant; and I see also that five messengers appear to be required for the Privy Council Office. I do not know what extra duties have devolved on the Privy Council of late, but I think five messengers would be rather in each other's way in connection with that particular Department.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The chief clerk has the ordinary increase of $50. Then for the first-class clerks there is an increase of $100 for the two, that is $50 each. That is the usual increase. Then, for the second-class clerks there is an increase of $150. That is, for three of them—at the usual rate of $50 each. Then there is the ordinary increase of $50 for the draughtsman and accountant. Then there is the allowance for private secretary as usual. Then for the third-class clerks there is an increase of $500. There are $200 of that for four clerks at the ordinary rate of $50 a year for each clerk, so that there are $300 that I cannot account for now. Then the doorkeeper and messenger is the old doorkeeper who is also now to be a messenger. I suppose the hon. gentleman will remember him. He has been here for a number of years, and the late messenger having died, we thought under the circumstances this man should have $100 increase for the few years he has to live, as a reward for his good and faithful services. As to the messengers, it is perfectly true that there is a messenger more than usual; but the services of the Council required an extra messenger. We found very often that we could not get along. The messengers were sent to different offices, and from one block to another, and we could not get along with the messengers in that office, and we therefore had to take one more at $300. As to the $300 increase for the third-class clerks, I am not in a position to state anything about it now, but I will give it on concurrence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, the hon. gentleman ought to have had these items prepared.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not expect that would come up.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Any more than ourselves on this side. The Minister of Public Works was under the same delusion that we were that supply was not to come up to-day. You can easily let the item stand.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Very well.

Department of Justice $17,815

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see you have saved $15 on this Department. That is such a departure from usual custom and precedent that it ought to be explained. Does the Minister of Justice know that he is departing from all precedent in his Department in thus reducing expenses?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I shall endeavor not to do it again.

Mr. McMULLEN. I hope the hon. gentleman will continue in that direction. That is the direction we want things to go in.

Militia Department..... $41,200

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There have been some changes in this Department apparently. Probably the Minister will explain to us exactly what has been done. I see one or two new names.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The reduction which appears in the estimates has been caused by the decease of Mr. Sherwood, who was receiving a salary of $1,300, and who is replaced by Mr. Davidson, a third class clerk, at $750. Mr. Davidson was employed temporarily in the Department of Agriculture and was transferred to my Department two years ago, and was paid out of contingencies. Now I mean to appoint him as a permanent third-class clerk, receiving the amount he was receiving in the Department of Agriculture, and, if the hon. gentleman looks at the statutory increases, he will find that the reduction is caused by the change I have referred to from $1,300 to $750.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the present maximum of a third class clerk under recent Civil Service regulations?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. $1,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see that a very large proportion of these gentlemen are put down as third-class clerks at $1,000 each.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. They have all been growing up to it.

Mr. BOWELL. Under the present Civil Service Act there are no junior second-class clerks; the minimum of the second-class is $1,100.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a very good illustration of the working of the rules which we have laid down. Practically it resolves itself into this, that these gentlemen, a great many of whom must be doing simply clerical work, are exceedingly highly paid for it. We have thirty-one in all, of whom four are messengers and may be struck out, so that we practically have twenty-seven gentlemen drawing among them a sum of $40,000 or thereabouts; so that the practical result is that pretty nearly every one in the Department of Militia and Defence ranges from about $1,000 to $1,400. I do not think there is any particular difference between the Department of Militia and most of the other Departments, and in all the others there are a considerable number of clerks who are doing simply clerical work, which, in the case of a bank or mercantile establishment, would never entitle them to these large salaries.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that since these clerks were appointed the work of the Department of Militia has very much increased, and the staff of the Department has not increased in the same proportion; and these different clerks have been merely getting the statutory increase, which they were entitled to, the same as any other clerk; and while the law remains as it is there is no reason why that Department should be different from any other. All the increases are statutory increases, and there is a reduction caused by the replacing of a salary of $1,300 by one of $750.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is quite true. I was not speaking of it so much with regard to the hon. gentleman's Department in particular as to the system we have drifted into, which means that we pay exceedingly high for inferior work, while superior work, for which we require men of high calibre is, according to the statements of Ministers themselves, imperfectly paid. We had an illustration of that the other day. The question came up in another place in reference to the junior officer of the Minister of Justice. We found that gentleman had been receiving a very considerable sum of money in addition to his official salary, and the reason given for that was that it was not possible to obtain a lawyer of good standing for the sum assigned. Here you have practically an illustration of the same thing. We have the inferior officers much more highly paid than their services would demand in a mercantile institution, and we find that some of the higher officers are paid below their real value. I call attention to this because it is becoming, and will continue to become a growing evil. You will have the lower and inferior officers at a maximum of $1,000 or perhaps more, while at the same time have the superior officers very indifferently paid.

Mr. BOWELL. That has been the system ever since Confederation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No. The junior clerks, until this recent alteration in the Civil Service Act, were kept at a much lower figure than the maximum of $1,000. I do not remember exactly, but I think $700 or $750 used to be the maximum.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is quite correct, but he forgets that there was another class not now recognised in the Civil Service Act. Formerly there were third-class, the junior second-class, the senior second-class, the first-class, and the chief clerks. The junior second-class has been abolished, and the third-class clerk now goes on to $1,000 as the maximum instead of being promoted from that class at $750 or $800—and like the hon. gentleman I forget the exact sum—to the second class, where he could rise, I think, to $1,200, and then would be promoted again to the senior second-class until the maximum of that class was reached, and then to first-class and chief clerk and so on. So practically there is no difference in the operation of the Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, it makes a considerable difference when there is no occasion for promoting them to another class, that is in practice. Theoretically, I will not dispute what the Minister of Customs says. Who is the gentleman at present employed as the architect, engineers' branch?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The architect is Mr. James, who was selected from the Department of Public Works two years ago, and I must say that he has proved to be a most efficient officer.

Department of the Secretary of State..... $45,630

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here are some considerable increases. We want to know what they are about? And there have been some apparent alterations and promotions.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The increases are, I think, $1,732.50, and there are thirty-five officers, who are, on the average, entitled to $50 statutory increase, which makes a little more than the increase of the year. I daresay the House will not object to the statutory increases. The House knows that for the last three years the expenditure of the Department has been decreasing every year by a few hundred dollars. I might add that for the ordinary work of the Department the increase has been considerable. In 1876 the letters received in the Department numbered 5,800; in 1885, 31,013. In 1884 the number was 18,588, as compared with 31,013 in 1885. The number of letters sent increased from 2,600, in 1876, to 12,646 in 1885. The increase as compared between 1884 and 1885 was from 10,000 to 12,646. Documents engrossed in 1884, 1,445; 1885, 1,980. The increased amount asked is $1,732, and increases to 35 employés at $50 a year would amount to more than that sum.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see there were some alterations and promotions. What were they?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have managed the Department in such a manner as to do away with some of the superior officers and replace them by third-class clerks. I think there are four third-class clerks added and two first-class clerks less than last year.

Mr. VAIL. How many chief clerks are there?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Four or five. In the correspondence department, Mr. Morgan; in the registry department, Mr. Catellier; the Queen's Printer, the Keeper of the Records, and Mr. Young, chief of the stationery branch, who is now on leave of absence from sickness.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who receives $600 as private secretary?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The private secretary is Mr. Taché, who is a temporary clerk.

Mr. LANDERKIN. In 1878 there were twenty-seven clerks in this Department. In 1874 there were twenty-six, an increase of one during that period. Now we have forty-two, an increase of sixteen. I remember the Minister of Customs told us at that time that it was impossible to get through the Departments because of the crowding of the officials into the corridors.

Mr. BOWELL. I never said so. It was the hon. gentleman's late leader who used that expression.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The condition of the public business and the difficulty of obtaining returns would indicate that all these officials are not employed, except perhaps to draw their salaries.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman is mistaken, and his conclusion is not logical. I have given a comparison as between 1878 and to-day; the number of letters written in the Department in 1878 was 6,000, as against 12,346 last year, that being a measure of the routine business of the Department. Those letters have to be written by some persons, they have to be clerks. There is an immense increase of business in the Department on account of the Scott Act, which is assigned to the Secretary of State's Department, and the Franchise Act has also imposed increased business on the Department.

Mr. MULLOCK. As the hon. gentleman refers to additional work cast on his office by the Franchise Act, would Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

he tell the committee what cost will be incurred to the Department by that work.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It will probably add to the expense of the Department this year about $3,000, all counted, which amount is put to contingencies.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the cost of the Scott Act to the Department?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is included with the routine business of the Department.

Department of the Interior..... $110,875

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There is an increase in the Department proper of $1,970. The ordinary statutory increases amount to $2,120; the difference is made by some vacancies which have been created, and the places filled at smaller salaries.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Were there any promotions, or are the officers the same as heretofore?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The officers are the same as heretofore.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the meaning of this foot note touching Mr. King, the Chief Inspector of Surveys?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. King was formerly paid out of the ordinary appropriations for land. He is now put upon the permanent list. That makes an apparent increase in the civil list, but does not increase the expenditure, because formerly he was paid out of the land appropriation.

Mr. VAIL. There are only sixty-two clerks apparently now as against sixty-four the year previous. But there is an increase in the aggregate salaries.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I must explain that the statutory increases alone are more than the aggregate increase of the entire appropriation for the civil list. In the Geological Survey, in which the increase is $2,350, the statutory increases are $1,050. Mr. Lamb, the artist of the branch, has been promoted to the second class with an increase of $100. Mr. Lowe has been promoted to the second class for special services in connection with some surveys at Lake Mistassini. Mr. Lawson and Mr. Chalmers were put upon the civil list at the same time. This involved an apparent increase of $2,200, but as provision was made in the supplementary last year for one officer at $1,100, the actual increase to the civil list is $1,100, making altogether $2,450, which is $100 more than the entire increase, which is thus accounted for: There were votes provided by the estimates last year of $1,200 each for Mr. Coste and Mr. Ingall, who were connected with the mining branch. They each received $1,150, making an apparent saving over the estimates of $100, which accounts for the $2,350 of apparent increase in the Geological Survey branch.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Which Department at present takes charge of the issuing of patents for lands in the North-West?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The Interior Department. I may mention as an illustration of the growth of work that for the months of November, December, January, February and March of 1884-85, the correspondence was 8,423 letters, while for the same months ending the 1st of April of this year, the correspondence was 17,287 letters.

Mr. McMULLEN. When was the office of Chief Inspector of Surveys created?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It was created during the year. He was simply transferred from being paid out of the lands appropriation to the permanent list. There is no actual increase in the charge upon the public.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The correspondence, I notice, is very voluminous. About a year ago I had occasion, on behalf of a man who owned a farm in the District of Algoma, and who was anxious to take out his patent, to enquire of the Department as to the amount of arrears due on his lot. It is over a year since I wrote, and the Department, through pressure of work, has not been able to reply to that letter, and the man does not know the position that he occupies or the amount that he owes, and he has not yet got his patent. I am sorry that the pressure from correspondence is so great in that Department that it takes them about a year and a half to reply to a letter.

Mr. MULOCK. I received a communication a couple of days ago from a gentleman saying that he had the pleasure of meeting the Minister in the North-West, and there had a conference with him in regard to a certain coal mine. He laid his grievances before him and the Minister undertook to investigate the matter and to advise him of his decision. The communication which I have received, and which I shall be happy to show the Minister, states that he has not had any communication from the Minister since, and that is five or six months ago.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I may say to the hon. gentleman that I met a great many people in the North-West and in every case my secretary took a memorandum of what they expected to have done, and the particular matter to which they wished my attention drawn. In every case I asked them to write to me as soon as I got back to Ottawa, because it was quite possible, in such a great number of cases, that some might be overlooked. I have no doubt that the same request was made to the gentleman to whom my hon. friend refers.

Mr. MULOCK. No doubt he made that request, but it is possible that he did not. But I may tell the hon. member that this suitor has not received any communication from the Minister. He claims that he was entitled to a patent to certain lands on the ground that he was the first discoverer of a coal mine. The mine in question, I think, is known as the Cascade mine, and perhaps the hon. gentleman is familiar with the title. At all events, I received a communication from the Department only this day with regard to the land, which states that the land has been patented to a third party within the month of February, and now it is beyond the power of the Department even to consider his case, and I do not know that he will ever get satisfaction.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think I remember something about the case, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that there is another side to it. I will not state the facts from memory, but I do not think the gentleman to whom he refers has very much to complain of.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister must recollect that a question was raised last Session, touching certain frauds alleged to have taken place in the patent office, and an investigation was promised. Has that investigation been made, and what conclusion has been arrived at?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The investigation has made some progress and some proceedings have been taken to annul some of the patents; in other cases, persons who obtained those patents under that fraud have voluntarily surrendered them. The Department is engaged at this moment, in Winnipeg, in the adjustment of claims arising out of these frauds.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I believe those frauds involved several officers of the Department.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think Mr. Lang was the only one, and he has disappeared.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where has he gone?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I would like to know.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. member propose to lay on the Table information about this? The amount of property involved was considerable, and, as a matter of course, those parties who have property imperilled by those frauds should be secured.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If the hon. gentleman moves for the papers, no doubt they will be brought down, but I think that is one of the cases where the Department might very well ask for an order.

Mr. BLAKE. There is a question as to the management of the Department under which these frauds became possible. Has any alteration been made, any check devised, to prevent a recurrence of such transactions?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Yes; checks have been devised. Mr. Lang had charge of certain half-breed claims, these patents issued in connection with certain half-breed claims, and all communications in reference to them, went straight to his office. He had charge of the correspondence connected with them, and also with the issue of patents themselves. He was in the habit of concealing that correspondence, so that patents went out without anybody knowing anything of the correspondence at all. The Deputy Minister assures me, that under the present arrangements it will be almost impossible that these difficulties should occur again.

Mr. BLAKE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how he is going to prevent patents to issue in advance of performance of the conditions, or to persons who are not entitled to them, by alterations in the correspondence branch of the Department. It is a very serious matter for the whole country, engaged as we are in alienating a large extent of territory, that there should be such a defect in the system, as that grants from the Crown could issue to persons not entitled to them, and I think it is a legitimate subject of enquiry, particularly as those frauds were discovered some time ago, to enquire what the old system was and what the present system is.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If the hon. gentleman will defer his enquiry until we come to the second item below, I will promise him to bring down absolutely accurate details as to both the present and the past system.

Mr. DAVIES. According to the report of the Auditor-General, the expenditure on the civil service of this Department was $62,961.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The expenditure was considerably less than the estimate we took, and the Deputy Minister hopes that we will be able to get on this year with somewhat less, though he does not feel at liberty to ask for less, in view of the large increase of correspondence.

Mr. DAVIES. But was the increase from $62,000 to $71,000?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). That is for 1884-85. We are now dealing with 1886-87, and comparing the amount for that year with the amount for 1885-86.

Mr. DAVIES. Yes, I know; but was that the increase?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Well, we expect it to be up to the amount we asked for last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There has been about $9,000 added in two years as between 1885 and 1887?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I dare say the business of the Department has increased but the sales have rather decreased, and it is only too clear that the number of settlers with whom business has to be done in the North-West, has very slightly increased. The white population of the North-West including Manitoba, is hardly more than 150,000 people, and it seems to me that the additional increase ought not to be called for under existing circumstances. I notice that, so far as I have been able to see, there is no reference in the Minister's report to this erroneous issue of patents, and it seems to me that it is a matter that should be referred to, inasmuch as these troubles were known to exist and there was a good deal of uneasiness in the public mind with regard to them.

Mr. DAVIES. I am not quite satisfied yet with the explanation of the hon. gentleman. The Auditor-General, in his report for the only completed year we have before us—the year 1884-85—shows the expenditure to be $62,961. Now, without referring to the current year, the hon. gentleman proposes for the ensuing year to spend $71,000, or $9,000 more than for the last completed year. Now, as I understand, the business of the Department is not increasing. I understand the sales are decreasing instead of increasing, and although the Minister of Customs thinks it is rather unfair to draw the inference that the business will be less because the sales are decreasing, it certainly appears to me that it ought to be so.

Mr. BOWELL. How does the hon. gentleman come to that conclusion? I said nothing about it.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman remarked, "ergo the business decreased."

Mr. BOWELL. I said that to the Minister—reasoning from your remarks.

Mr. DAVIES. I would like to know in what particular branch the increase is, and why there is an increase.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The estimate in 1884-85 was $67,050, but the Department got on with about $5,000 less. The expenditure last year was $69,305, and I believe the Department will get on with less, though, of course, there is no certainty on that point. As to the question of the work of the Department as arising out of the increased number of entries in the North-West, I think the hon. gentleman ought to know that the number of entries may increase very much the work of the agents at different points in the North-West. The three years of homestead duties, which entitle settlers to patents, are now expiring in a great many cases, and the correspondence with regard to them, and as to whether parties have properly fulfilled their duties, involves an enormous increase of correspondence and business connected with the Department, although the actual number of entries may not have increased. As I have pointed out, the correspondence of the Department in five months of this year, as compared with the corresponding five months of last year, has more than doubled, and that certainly involves the necessity of a larger clerical staff for the Department. It cannot at all be inferred from the fact that a smaller number of entries has been made, that the work of the Department has in any way decreased. On the contrary, the correspondence shows that it has not.

Mr. DAVIES. I must say that it hardly satisfies my mind that it requires an increase of $9,000 over that of the last completed year simply to attend to the additional correspondence. It seems to me there must be some other reason for this enormous increase.

Mr. BLAKE. Can the hon. gentleman give us some general explanation of how this correspondence has doubled during these five months, as compared with the corresponding five months of the previous year? Was it because too few letters were written during the previous five months? If the correspondence has doubled, although all the work during the former period has been done that ought to have been done, it would be gratifying to understand it; but if it is because the business was neglected, and the new broom is sweeping clean, let us know it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is no question of the new broom. I do not desire any credit whatever at the expense of my predecessors. I have seen enough in the Department to convince me that both of my predecessors performed their duties well. I know that my immediate predecessor lost his health in the efforts he made, and made successfully, to keep up with the work of the Department; I know that he was engaged at his own house with his private secretary up to 12 and 1 o'clock at night, striving to overcome the work of that Department. What I have to say is that the correspondence has enormously increased, and in the nature of things it must increase as the time approaches when the settlers are looking for their patents. The great proportion of the correspondence refers to the cases of individual settlers. If every settler fulfilled his settlement duties as to residence and other conditions, the work would be easy; but I have seen enough of the Department to know that that is not the case, but that a large number of settlers have been unable for some reason technically to complete all their duties, and a large portion of the correspondence has arisen in connection with that. Then, the large ranching business which has sprung up in the North-West has necessarily caused a large amount of correspondence. In addition to this, many settlers in the Province of Manitoba claim that they should get their land at $1 an acre because they came in just about the time when the price was increased to $2, and an enormous correspondence has taken place in regard to that. All these matters have tended to increase the business of the Department.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose that the large portion of the business connected with claims of individual settlers was being transacted under the improved system adopted sometime ago to avoid acknowledged delays and neglects that took place under the old system, viz., by the Land Board at Winnipeg. I recollect, not his immediate predecessor, but his penultimate predecessor, acknowledging that there were very obvious delays which were about to be avoided by the establishment of a land board which would deal with the settlers nearer the spot than Ottawa. But now, from what the hon. gentleman states, it would appear that there is direct communication between the settlers and Ottawa.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I am sorry to say there is. Although the Land Board at Winnipeg does an enormous amount of work, and although my desire is to throw on that board the responsibility of settling these matters, still the settler often comes to headquarters, where he thinks he will get a better chance; we cannot avoid that; and when the settler applies to us here, we are anxious to do the best we can for him, and if we cannot do more, to give him a courteous answer. In answer to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), I wish to point out that the expenditure in 1884-85 was $63,000; the estimate for 1886-87 is $71,225. Mr. King's salary is $1,650; the statutory increases for 1885-86 amounted to something over $2,000; and the statutory increases for next year will be over $2,000; all of which amount to over $6,000, which I think will show the hon. gentleman that the increase instead of being between $7,000 and $9,000, is only about $2,000.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not think the statutory increases amount to as much as the hon. gentleman states. But even allowing the statement he makes, there is yet $3,000 which he does not explain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the House will do well to consider the total amounts that are being demanded for the Department of the Interior, I am leaving out the Geological Survey branch and the North-West Mounted Police. On page 101 we find $30,000 more for extra clerks at head office, Ottawa, advertising and similar expenses; under the head of contingencies we find $18,000; taken altogether, these make very nearly $120,000. The House will see that this item is an extremely heavy one.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No doubt of it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very nearly $120,000. We can well understand that men who have been applying to the Land Board, under present regulations, and who find that that board, being strictly responsible to headquarters here, cannot give them satisfaction, will, as a matter of course, go to the Department at Ottawa, more particularly as a very large number of them are Ontario people, who think they can bring influence through their friends there. The fact that we have to spend about $125,000 on that Department, is proof enough that the attempt to work our North-West lands at Ottawa is a huge mistake, and that the whole cumbersome machinery we have established at headquarters at Ottawa, costs us two or three times as much as would a board in the North-West, vested with much more full plenary powers. It will be found that the attempt to conduct the affairs of a great country like that, at a distance of 1,200 and in some cases of 1,500 or 2,000 miles, is inherently a vicious system. Without blaming the present Minister or perhaps his immediate predecessor, I think the attempt made to concentrate the whole control of the North-West in one office at Ottawa, has been a mistake from the first, and is daily growing more a mistake.

Mr. HESSON. As a member who has had a good deal of correspondence with the Government on behalf of parties who have gone to the North-West, I have been obliged to correspond with headquarters here, although I did think the business had better be dealt with by the Land Board. Parties who went in 1880, when they supposed they could get land at $1 an acre, have written to me complaining that they could not get their land at that price, because that was cancelled by the Order in Council of 1880. But they claim they had, properly speaking, taken up lands before the Order in Council was passed, or had given notice and were qualified to get their entries on the best terms. The Department, I must say, has always been very courteous in their replies, but the system involved a great deal of correspondence, and I am sure other hon. gentlemen have experienced the same trouble and inconvenience as myself.

Mr. WATSON. If more powers were granted the Land Board at Winnipeg, the difficulties mentioned by the hon. gentleman would not arise. In most cases when letters are written to the deputy at Ottawa they are referred to the land board, and then referred back to Ottawa by the board. I believe a great many parties are under the impression that everything has to be referred to Ottawa. If it was understood that the Land Board had to deal definitely with the cases, people would be satisfied with the reports they received from the board. From what I know of the commissioners, I believe they could well be entrusted with further powers, and be allowed to decide definitely on cases which are now referred to Ottawa, and causing consequently much correspondence and loss of time.

Mr. BLAKE. The question of expenditure connected with our North-West lands is one of considerable consequence. I looked the other day at the result of some of the items of five years operations in North-West lands. During one or two of those years we received very considerable sums, unexampled before or since, for lands. In one year we received as much as $1,700,000, in another year $700,000 or $800,000, and in the five years $3,000,000 or $4,000,000; but the expenditure, including the extra expense in the Department of the Interior, absorbed every shilling we received, with the exception of some $300,000 or $400,000. The expenditure on surveys, capital account, income account, and the expenditure of the Department of the Interior properly attributable to the lands, absorbed the $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, with the exception of $300,000; so that really with all the advantage of a large surplus during two years, and with the larger price we receive now, there is really nothing left to us out of the lands. I am quite aware of the force of the observation that during that period we surveyed an immense quantity of land and were prepared for futurity in that respect, but I am afraid a good deal of that survey, which was conducted with such extreme energy that it left no time to perform some surveying which would have been much more advantageous, has been thrown away and will have to be done over again. In fact, a good deal has been surveyed the second time, and, having regard to the general results, I believe you will find we are getting nothing whatever out of the North-West lands now.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is hardly fair to take the expenditure for surveys and charge it all against the receipts of the year up to this time. Whether the surveys have been well or ill performed I cannot say, but my impression is that they have been well performed. It is my misfortune to know nothing about surveying, but I am told that they have been well performed. No doubt in some cases, monuments disappear and may have to be replaced, when somewhere approaching 60,000,000 acres of land have been surveyed and made ready for settlement. Then as to the large amount we received, and which the hon. gentleman states we ought still to be receiving, he ought to remember that a considerable portion received during one year was the result of large quantities of land being sold by auction during the boom, when they realised nearly three dollars an acre. Those lands to-day are not nearly so valuable as when they were sold. They are in the hands of private holders who bought them. Then the hon. gentleman will remember that there were sales at that time of town sites which realised a considerable sum of money, which were also sold during the boom, and I have no doubt many of the purchasers now regret their purchase. The same feeling of exaltation, the prospect of enormous fortunes which prevailed in 1856 through the whole of Canada, when the Grand Trunk was being built, prevailed there, and indeed all over the continent. All these sums of money came in at that time, not from ordinary settlers at all, but from an exceptional state of things, which is not likely to be repeated, and which I hope will not be repeated. The hon. gentleman, I think, ought to remember that there has been 25,000 people placed in the North-West, outside of Manitoba, in consequence of the surveys and the opening up of the country in one way or another—not in consequence of the conduct of this Government or of another Government—but as the natural result of opening up the country. These settlers ought to count for something, and we have received money enough to meet the outlays that we have made, a large part of that outlay being on capital account, and we have a money basis for future settlement which ought to be worth something to us. I know the hon. gentleman will say that a large number of these settlers went from Ontario, and consequently Ontario loses what the North-West gains, but they were people who wanted to go West, and the chances are that if they had not gone to our North-West they would have gone somewhere else. Then as to the Land Board, I may say that I am giving larger power to the Land Board than it has had before. They will settle every question that comes before them, and their decisions are usually approved without coming here at all. In the vast majority of cases their decisions do not require to come to us in any way whatever, but the misfortune is that if they are not decided in the sense in which the settler thinks they ought to be decided, he thinks that by coming to headquarters he may get a better settlement. The Department is consequently regarded, to a certain extent, as a court of appeal, inasmuch as the Minister of the Interior and the Government must be held responsible for all these things, and it does seem to me that we cannot shirk that responsibility, nor do we wish to shirk it. In Calgary, when I was up there, among the propositions that were made by gentlemen who were kind enough to offer a number of suggestions to improve the land laws, one was that all these disputes should go to the ordinary courts, and that, in fact, the power of the Land Board should be decreased. I get more letters from persons in the North-West asking that the powers of the Land Board be decreased than that they should be increased, and from parties who profess to have a good knowledge of the wants of the settlers. A proposal was made in Calgary at a dinner the people were kind enough to give me, that the Land Board should be abolished altogether, and all these matters left to the ordinary tribunals to decide. I pointed out that that would be a matter of great consequence to the lawyers, but rather a bad proposition to the settlers, and that the very object of referring cases of that kind is not that the settler may be dealt with by the hard and fast rule of the law, with the cold severity of the law, but that the equity of the case may be considered so that we may give him a fair opportunity to continue in the home which he sought for himself when he went into the North-West. Personally, as I have said, my earnest object has been to give as much power as possible to the Land Board, and throw upon it as far as possible the responsibility for the settlement of all questions. In referring cases back to the Land Board, I have written to the parties that I did so with the view of creating the impression among the settlers that the lands must be managed from Winnipeg rather than from Ottawa, although we cannot get rid of the ultimate responsibility of their management here. Experience has shown that the Land Board is steadily increasing in importance, and in the labor connected with it. In the months of November and December last the correspondence of the Department of the Interior was greater than the correspondence of the Department of the Interior in 1877, with the Indian Department added to it at that time. I can assure the hon. gentleman that as regards the transferring of the management of the details of the land system to Winnipeg, I heartily concur in his opinion, and my earnest wish is that it may be so transferred, so far as we can do so considering our ultimate responsibility to Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says that it is unfair to count against the receipts from North-West lands the expenses of the surveys. But the hon. gentleman has answered his own argument, because he told me, when I came to compare the present receipts with the past receipts, that the past receipts were altogether exceptional in their character, that they were the result of the boom and the sale of town sites, and he says I am not to charge the exceptional expenditure for surveys against the exceptional receipts, but must strike the latter out of the account altogether. Then, I ask, what becomes of $58,500,000 which we were told, three years ago, we would receive from the North-West lands before the year 1891? If we are told now that this was all a delusion, that even the modest $1,700,000 was an inflated receipt, where is that vast sum which that hon. gentleman's deputy certified to the Minister, and which the Minister of Railways told us solemnly we were to receive? The fact of the matter is that the receipts have diminished, even if you strike off the Birtle sales, and the odd section sales. I believe there are $1,200 from colonisation companies during the last year, and I remember, upon some occasion, the Minister of Railways stating that we would get $1,000,000 from the colonisation companies alone, that he could not take all the applications that were pressed upon him, but he did not intend to sell the whole North-West to the colonisation companies. The amount received, my hon. friend informs me, was $1,214.22 from the grand colonisation company scheme, which was to give us ten millions, besides creating uncalled blessings for the North-West. The hon. Minister says:

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

"But you must consider that by a survey of those 60,000,000 acres we have got in the few immigrants we have obtained." But we know perfectly well that the immigrants we have got in are far below what the hon. gentleman promised he would secure, what he declared we would have, and what the Government told us we actually had in the country. We know, as a matter of fact, if the accounts of the year's immigration to the North-West, adding a small amount for the natural increase, be correct, there are more than 100,000 people, who, they say, must have gone in. Either they did not go in, and so the accounts of the annual immigration are totally false; or, if they went in, they have left the country—somewhere about 115,000 or 120,000, if you make allowance for the natural increase, is the discrepancy in the figures. Under those circumstances I little expected he would boast of a survey of 60,000,000 of acres as being something which was necessary in order that we might get in this small number of immigrants that have, it turns out, either been got in or arranged to remain in the country. No, the fact of the matter is, we require to consider what the scale of our expenditure is on the North-West lands with reference to the results. A few years ago the hon. gentleman who then presided over the office excused the enormous and growing increase in the departmental expenditure here and at Winnipeg, because the latter is a branch of the same office discharging part of the functions which in their entirety used to be discharged at Ottawa, on the ground of the vast and growing transactions and the necessity of dealing promptly with the settlers and so avoid all complaints and troubles. Now we are face to face with an entirely different state of things in the present and in the future. I quite agree that we must have such a staff as may be necessary in order that the business may be properly done, for we cannot expect to keep settlers in the country if their business is not attended to with reasonable promptness; but I say also that the scale of expenditure which has swollen to its present proportions here and at Winnipeg is not applicable to the present state of things nor to any immediate prospective future that we can count upon. The hon. gentleman has told us, and it is a very reasonable statement, that the correspondence has largely increased, and of course the business of the office has increased by reason of the maturing of a number of the claims for homesteads. I suppose those are the homesteads of the "boom," the results of the large immigration. We are now at the last five months of 1885, carrying us back to the period of 1882 as the period at which most of those people would have come and taken up their lands, thus their claims are about maturing for homesteads and there is a period of activity in the Department on that account; but if immigration has decreased from year to year the number of maturing claims for homesteads will also lessen, and as we are taking a vote not only for the present, but up to July, 1887, the spasm of energy and correspondence is hardly likely to represent the continuous energy of the Department.

Mr. WATSON. The people of Calgary, it appears, have requested that the Land Board be abandoned altogether and that disputes be decided in the usual way. This shows that the people have no confidence in the tribunal at Ottawa as a court to decide disputes. That is probably due to the fact that it is so far away from the people who are directly interested and because influences are liable to be used which are not just to the settlers. In regard to the land at Birtle, where a large quantity of land was sold in the spring of 1882, the Minister says that he hopes such a course will not again be taken, and states that the land, which was sold at $2.50 an acre, is not worth that amount to-day. If they are good lands, and I believe there is no reason to doubt that they are such, the fact mentioned by the Minister is simply due to the policy pursued by the Government of locking up so much land from settlement. The lands are very sparsely settled and a very large quantity is held by speculators. When the Minister says those lands are actually not worth so much to-day as they were when they were sold, that fact is due entirely to the country being very sparsely settled and to the Government pursuing a wrong policy in selling those lands. If the lands were settled they would be worth from $5 to $10 an acre instead of not being worth so much as they were sold for in the spring of 1882. I hope the hon. Minister after his trip to the North-West will see the folly of exposing lands for sale in preference to settlement. If they are open to settlement they are worth more to the country as a whole, and the country derives a revenue from the settlers who occupy them. I hope when the hon. Minister has occasion to dispose of any other lands they will be open entirely for settlement.

Mr. McMULLEN. The arrangement in the Department of the Interior is a double barrelled one, with one Department in Ottawa and another in Winnipeg. If they are to be worked successfully and so far apart, the duties of the Winnipeg Board must be clearly defined as well as the duties of the Department here. If the people of the North-West are to be led to believe that every matter taken up by the Winnipeg Board is subject to an appeal to the Department here, there will be a large increase in the work to be performed here. If that is the case it would be very much better if the Winnipeg Board were abolished or those composing the Board brought here and placed in a room adjoining that of the Minister of the Interior, so that the enormous amount of correspondence that has taken place could be reduced, because the Board could then submit cases of appeal direct to the Minister. Under the present system an application is made to the Minister of the Interior, it is forwarded to the Land Board at Winnipeg for their consideration, that Board acts upon it and notifies the party in the North-West what they have done, and that party, not being satisfied, writes back to the Department at Ottawa and the whole business is to be done over again. The duties of the Winnipeg Land Board should be clearly defined and questions decided by them should not be again raised. The Winnipeg Board costs $30,000, and the Department of the Interior here $90,000 making a total of $120,000. There is no necessity for this double barrel arrangement. I think we should either abolish the Board here and let the Board at Winnipeg do the entire business, or else let the hon. Minister of the Interior go up there and superintend the work or they might be brought down here so that they could be utilised. The hon. Minister paid quite a tribute of respect to his predecessors and spoke of the very efficient manner in which they discharged their duties. The hon. Minister a few days ago told us that he had no less than 2,300 applications with regard to timber limits, to dispose of within, I think, the last two years. Now, that must very largely have increased the correspondence of the Department—also the different representatives communicating with the Department in the interests of themselves and their friends, must have largely increased the volume of business in the Department. I would like to know if anything of that kind is going on now, and if the large increase in correspondence which he says has taken place is in connection with matters of that kind. The Minister was up in that country some time in November or December, and it is very strange that on his return the correspondence should have so largely increased. He must have been holding out inducements to the people there, of some kind, that favors would be granted them; I do not know that they were, but certainly it seems the correspondence has increased. It seems to me that this arrangement between the two Boards is a great farce, and I think it is time that we should see the propriety of cutting down instead of increasing. In connection with the granting of patents, I say there should be some fixed rule by which parties in the North-West should be guided when they make application for patents, for if not, we will find all sorts of influence with the Department, if individual cases are to be dealt with by the Minister. We will hear of cases where perhaps the conditions have not been fully complied with, but it will be said: "O this man has complied with them so nearly that the Minister ought to overlook any incompleteness or defects and grant the patent." If that is going on there will be an enormous amount of work, and you will require many more clerks. That work should be conferred completely on the Board at Winnipeg, if you are going to keep them, instead of being appealed to the Minister; and unless you allow the Board to do that work you had better obliterate the Board altogether and let the Minister and his clerks do it here, because they will have to do it in the end. There is no necessity for all this round-about correspondence. Letters from the Board at Winnipeg to the Department here, and letters back again to the Board, and then letters again to the Department. If that is going on it is no wonder the expenses are increasing, and we may expect the increases to go on. It is evident that hon. gentlemen are not desirous of curtailing the expenses, if things are going on in that shape; on the contrary, we will have continuous increases. I believe the Minister of the Interior is possessed of sufficient ability to do credit to any Department, if he brought these abilities to bear on his Department properly. I hope he will apply his abilities to his Department next year, so that he will be able to tell us, that instead of increasing the expenses, he has decided to obliterate this Board at Winnipeg, and have the work done in his own office, and let the people of the North-West understand that there will be no appeals. I do not think it is necessary that this enormous volume of correspondence should take place, and I can understand after what the Minister has said, that under the present arrangement, the correspondence will continue to increase. There will be a continued going round and round from here to the Board at Winnipeg, and then back again, up and down, and there will be no end of it. I am surprised that the Minister should have found it necessary to make such an admission with regard to the position of things in the Department of the Interior as he has made to-night. I think he should have been able to report that the business has been so adjusted between the Board and the Department, that each will have its specific duties to perform, and that this continuous, everlasting correspondence should be put a stop to. I certainly hope this thing will not be continued.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. gentlemen who last spoke evidently understands very little of the state of things in the North-West, because if he knew anything about it, he would know that the great complaint that has been made there for years back—and under similar circumstances will be made again—is that the settlers found fault because they were dealt with by hard and fast rules; that there was no sympathy evinced for special circumstances. That has been the great cause of trouble, so far as I have had an opportunity of learning the state of affairs in the North-West, and if his rule were carried out, we should have a state of discontent far greater than it has been in the past. I think everything else the hon. gentleman said has been answered in advance by the Minister of the Interior. I would like to ask the Minister if it is necessary that the salary and the allowance for expenses of the inspector of colonisation companies should be continued. His office costs $4,000. Those companies are certainly diminishing and they will continue to diminish, because there never can be money made out of them, as anybody of common sense must have foreseen at the outset, there will be nothing but loss connected with them. I see that the inspectors of homesteads cost the country far less than this officer, and I would ask the Minister if, under the diminished business remaining for the inspector of colonisation companies, his work could not be done by the other inspectors, who, I think, are fully competent to do it.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I may say in reply to the hon. gentleman, that at this moment negotiations are going on—and indeed they have been going on for some time—with the colonisation companies, with a view to the settlement of their contracts with the Government. The Department recently issued a circular to each company, stating the general terms upon which they were disposed to close the contracts, or if the companies were anxious to go on, to allow them to continue their operations. In most cases, the proposal is to close the contracts, which will release immediately a very large area of land that was set aside, not for sale absolutely, but as part of the contract with the companies for colonisation purposes. These arrangements will involve a careful inspection of each of the companies tracts, which was included in the general appropriation for colonisation purposes, and the inspector of colonisation companies will require to perform that work. I have no doubt whatever that when that is done, as I believe it will be done—I hope this spring, because the companies are sending in at this moment these statements, which will have to be verified on the ground—as soon as that is done, that office will, as far as I can see at this moment, be less necessary at any rate than it is at present. The question of the abolition of the office altogether, will then come up for consideration. But until the close of these matters with the colonisation companies, I do not think it is desirable to change the officer, who has had some experience of the work and who knows the ground. At the close of the Session I hope to give two or three weeks, before leaving for the North-West, to the settlement of these questions.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) must remember that the officer is Mr. Rufus Stephenson.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a somewhat important statement which has been made by the Minister of the Interior. I recollect how, three or four years ago, we were informed by the then Minister of the Interior that he had discovered a wonderful means of accomplishing the colonisation of the North-West; how tens of thousands of valuable yeomanry were to be settled there; how capitalists were to come forward and to supply large funds out of their private resources for the purpose of aiding in this colonisation; how from various parts of England and the continent gentlemen, interested in settling this country, were to come forward as members of colonisation companies; and how—what he did not tell us—he had tried to secure some 5,000 or 6,000 assistants in the election of 1882 by distributing promises of grants of land to colonisation companies in which they were interested. I recollect that in the county of Lennox, which the then Minister of the Interior was contesting, I found on one occasion, on examining the names of a certain committee in his interest, that out of 21 gentlemen 15 had shares in some colonisation companies. I found to my still greater disgust that a considerable number of gentlemen on the committee of Mr. Allison, who opposed him, had also shares in colonisation companies; and when information was given to us afterwards of some remarkable transactions which led to the election of the hon. gentleman for Lennox, I myself was approached by a considerable number of gentlemen interested in colonisation companies, some on my side, and some on the other side, who intimated to me that it was a great pity to disturb the Minister of the Interior in the representation of Lennox, because they did not know how, if he was disturbed, they would get on with their colonisation companies. But these matters having run their course, we find, according to the statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior—and I think he is right—that all of these colonisation companies are to be wound up, and the whole thing is acknowledged to be an utter and inexcusable failure. That is the only conclusion to be drawn from the statement of the hon. the Minister of the Interior. Now, with respect to the cost of this Department, over and above the $90,000 required for the Department of the Interior, and the $30,000 to which I called attention, there is $120,000 more wanted under the head of outside service, together with $100,000 for Dominion lands, chargeable to capital; so that about $340,000 is to be expended for the ordinary service of this Department. Now, I see that for the half year we received $101,664. It may be that we shall get a little more during the ensuing year, but I think it is very unlikely that we shall receive more than $200,000 or $300,000 from the sales of lands in the North-West for a considerable time to come; and I am not sure that the country would not be better served by throwing settlers in there, even at some trouble and expense, than by endeavoring to get money from them. It is only too clear that, whereas we were led to expect that a very large amount of money would be obtained from the proceeds of sales in the North-West, the case is even worse than my hon. friend stated, and that there will probably be a deficit between receipts and expenditure for a considerable number of years to come. That is a serious thing, and it seems to me we are not justified in maintaining this enormous expenditure in the present state of the revenue, and under the present prospects of receiving returns from the North-West. $340,000 is a very large amount of money, and we seem to be getting very little for it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would like to enquire of the Minister of the Interior—if it is compatible with the public interest to inform us at this time—on what terms it is proposed to cancel the contracts with these colonisation companies. I am curious to know whether these gentlemen, who have invested in North-West lands and paid one or more instalments, who have been unable to settle their lands, and who find that the speculation is likely to prove a disastrous one, are to be refunded the payments they have made, or whether they will be made to forfeit the moneys they have paid. While on my feet I wish to say a few words as to the general policy of the Government in reference to the management of our public domain in the North-West. We were informed by the Minister of the Interior that 61,000,000 acres of land had been surveyed there. Now it strikes me that is rather an excessive quantity when we consider that the 4,700,000 inhabitants of Canada occupy only about 22,000,000 acres of cultivated land; the census of 1881 gave the quantity as a fraction less than 22,000,000 acres. Yet a sum of money has been expended in surveying the lands of the North-West sufficient to survey nearly three times the quantity of land occupied by all the inhabitants of this Dominion, that seems to be an extravagant and useless expenditure. We have in the North-West about 23,000 inhabitants, which is equivalent, taking five persons to each family, to 4,600 families. If we assume that they are all agriculturists, which they are not, and that they occupy farms of 100 acres each, they would require 460,000 acres of the 61,000,000 acres surveyed. That needs but to be stated to show the absurdity of spending an enormous sum of money to survey that quantity of lands. Then the hon. gentleman made a statement with reference to the magnitude of his correspondence. Among other things, he stated that 2,500 applications had been received for timber limits, and to show the Government had not been guilty of any great extravagance in parcelling out the timber resources of the Dominion, he said that only forty-seven timber licenses had been granted. Now, the fact that 2,500 applications have been made, that a great number of Orders in Council had been passed, and yet only 47 licenses have been granted, shows to what an excess of the requirements of the country the business of granting timber licenses has been carried. The wants of the country have induced but 47 men to take out licenses for the purpose of manufacturing lumber, and yet the department has been flooded by 2,500 applications, and Orders in Council granting licenses have been issued in hundreds, in almost every instance to friends of the Government. All these applications were made by investors, who were not bond fide but speculative investors, and who, in the majority of cases, in which the Orders in Council granting the licenses were passed, have not paid the $5 rental per square mile. There the Orders in Council stand for these gentlemen to avail themselves of when they choose, as the Government have performed their part as far as their functions go. Nothing could illustrate more strikingly the mismanagement by the Government of public affairs in the North-West. Then we have the pasture land leases, which amount, according to a return of three years ago, to 2,700,000 acres.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is wandering from the point under discussion. We are engaged on a discussion of the duties the officials have to perform.

Mr. CHARLTON. That has connection with the question of which I am talking, the granting of timber limits and pasture leases and coal lands, and the general land policy of the Government. With reference to the pasture lands alone 2,700,000 acres were leased, three years ago, at leases of 1 cent an acre being the interest of 7 per cent., at 15 cents an acre. The hon. gentleman says the Government have doubled the rental, and now it is an interest on 30 cents an acre, and he says no partiality is shown in the matter; that the Government are issuing leases every day, and if anybody, not a Conservative, wishes to apply, let him send in his application. This is a nice time to give this invitation, when there is nothing more to go round, when the Government have issued these leases for pasture land covering the whole North-West from the boundary line to the Peace River district. But the point I wish to refer to more particularly is the general land policy of the Government of the North-West.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think that is the question; we are now discussing civil government.

Mr. CHARLTON. I bow to your ruling, Sir, and will only discuss a few items pertaining to that policy. I will only refer to the first regulations issued by the Government with reference to the disposal of public lands. The Government, in the management of our public domain, ought to have been struck by the fact, which would be obvious to any observer of public events, that in our attempts to secure the settlement of that country, we are competing with the United States, who have also a great public domain to settle, and who are endeavoring, like ourselves, to induce settlements of the public lands for the purpose of bringing them under cultivation. That being the case, it seems to me it required but a small modicum even of common sense to see that it was necessary we should at least offer as favorable terms to settlers as the United States. That has not been done by the Government, and the fruits of our short sightedness are apparent in the fact that we have only 23,000 settlers in that vast region—not one-half the Canadian population settled in Minnesota, and not one half the Canadian population settled in Dakota. That is all due to the fact that the Government have pursued a policy to repel rather than to attract settlement; it is due to the fact that they have pursued a policy calculated to keep people from going to that country rather than to draw them to it, people living in Canada and people from Europe seeking homes in the North-West. I may have trespassed on your good nature, Sir, but it strikes me this is a question pertinent to the subject under discussion. To go back to what you might consider more pertinent to the question, I desire to reiterate the enquiry I made to the Minister of the Interior as to what will be the general policy the Government intend pursuing with regard to the defunct or semi-defunct colonisation companies which acquired grants of land under the policy that was to make all men rich who went into the North-West, and who, having failed in their objects, wish to retire from their investment. Will the Government require them to forfeit all sums of money paid? or will the Government refund all or any of the sums of money invested by these companies in our lands?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think this is hardly the time to venture into an elaborate discussion of the general land policy of the Government, nor will the hon. gentleman, on reflection, consider he was quite fair in endeavoring to get in some shots on that subject, when he knows it is impossible, at this particular time, to enter into an elaborate defence of the policy. We will have an opportunity to discuss that question at length before the Session is over, and then I will endeavor to make such a defence as I can make of the policy of the Government. The hon. member for Huron (Sir R. Cartwright) referred to the colonisation companies as being, as he said, a source of corruption used by the First Minister in the elections of 1832. And he illustrated that statement by the fact, that upon the committees of both the Liberal and Conservative candidates in Lennox, were to be found shareholders in colonisation companies. Now, if he had been able to state that the gentlemen on Mr. Allison's committees had all come over and voted for Mr. Prun or for Sir John Macdonald, I could understand that there might be something in it, but certainly the statement that there were gentlemen on both sides of politics who were shareholders in these companies rather implies that the companies were regarded at that time as a good investment by business men, and not that there was any corrupt arrangement with the Government. However, it is not quite accurate to say—and I think this is due to the colonisation companies—that no possible advantage has been derived from the operation of these companies. I had the privilege last summer, and I daresay the hon. gentleman has had the privilege also—at any rate he had the opportunity if he had chosen to take advantage of it when he was in the North-West—of visiting the lands of three of these companies. The Binscarth Company, for instance, has established an excellent settlement. I forget the exact name of the company, but Binscarth is the name of their town. That company has fulfilled, I believe, all its engagements; I mean that it has accomplished all, or nearly all, that it undertook to accomplish when it entered into the contract with the Government. Then I saw the lands of the Saskatchewan Homestead Company. After passing from the Qu'Appelle River some thirty miles without meeting a single settler, I came upon an admirable settlement, altogether the result of the operations of that company. Then there were the lands of the York Farmer's Colonisation Company at Yorkton, and there I found an admirable settlement, with a number of excellent farmers looking forward to homes in the North-West which they were making for themselves, altogether the results of that colonisation company. You can find in other parts of the North-West settlements that would not have been in those localities—though they might possibly, for anything I can tell, have been somewhere else—but for the operations of those colonisation companies. So that it is not quite accurate to say that those companies have not resulted in any advantage to the North-West. The idea was originally to secure the co-operation of capitalists, the co-operation of individual enterprise, in the settlement of the North-West. We know that in the United States the large settlements which have taken place in the Western States have been the results almost exclusively of the operations of railway corporations owning lands and of land companies having lands for sale; and the intention was to inaugurate the same policy here, it was hoped with the same results. The conditions were very onerous, but they were not so onerous but that large numbers of practical, level-headed business men considered them sufficiently promising to invest their money in them; and the amount invested runs up to a very large sum—I think to over half a million of dollars at any rate—I am speaking only from memory—which was invested by hard-headed business men in Canada on the faith of this policy, and in the firm belief that it would result advantageously. It has not resulted in settling the country as rapidly as was expected at that time; but this took place at a time when there was a general boom, when everyone outside of the Government, if not those inside of the Government, looked forward to a continuation of that state of things which unfortunately has not continued. The hon. gentleman has asked on what terms it is proposed by the Government to settle with the colonisation companies. If he desires, I will tell him the terms of the circulars which have been issued to each of these companies. The companies applied for a reduction in the price of their lands. They wanted the Government to give them the lands at $1 an acre. When that was not agreed to they pressed for $1.50 an acre; but the Government determined that the lands should not be reduced in price, but that they should be obliged to pay the same amount of $2 an acre which they were obliged to pay under the company's original contract entered into with the Government. By that contract they were entitled to get a rebate of $160 for every settler they put on the land. They are entitled to that now, and the moneys which they pay into the Government, together with the rebate, will be counted as a payment to the Government, and they will receive lands at $2 an acre for that money and that rebate. It is practically carrying out on a smaller area the contract which they entered into for the colonisation of a larger area. These are substantially the terms upon which it is proposed to settle with the colonisation companies.

Mr. CHARLTON. You propose to let them drop townships where they have no settlers?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Yes; and the Government resumes the lands. It never parted with any lands. The companies simply had a right to colonise them, but they never had a deed given to them; and the result of this will be simply to lessen the area they will have the right to colonise in accordance with the amount of money they have paid, and the settlers they have put on the land.

Mr. BLAKE. I thought the hon. gentleman stated that there were two alternatives presented to the companies?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If they go on, and if they have acted in good faith, and have done their work tolerably well, they may have an extension of time, but that will only be in the case of those companies who have been going on and showing their ability to do the work.

Mr. CHARLTON. In case the colonisation companies drop townships where they have no settlers, and on the lands they drop they have paid an instalment, would they be allowed to apply that on other lands?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). To the extent of $2 an acre. There are two or three colonisation companies who have put on no settlers at all. They will get land at the rate of $2 an acre for the money paid in. No money will be returned.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then the Government will now come into possession of a very considerable quantity of unbroken land?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Nearly a million acres.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. More than that, I fancy.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Perhaps more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I speak from recollection, but I think more than a million acres were taken out of the market, apart from those that were granted, with a view to the possible wants of colonisation companies.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Yes, more than two millions, I think, were taken out of the market and included in the contract with colonisation companies; but I think the result will be to give back to the Government something over a million acres of land.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought the amount the Government would recover would be considerably more. Of course it would not be reasonable to expect, if the matter is new to the Minister's mind, that he should give us any answer to-night, but it seems to me that the whole of this, what may be called chequer-board arrangement in the North-West by which every alternate square mile is reserved from homestead settlement, might be reconsidered, at any rate in the case where property comes back into the hands of the Government. I am disposed to think that a very much more liberal arrangement than we have yet made will have to be resorted to, in order to bring any considerable number of settlers into the North-West, and I suggest, not with a view to getting an answer now, but for the consideration of the Minister, that it would be wise to try the experiment, if the Government get enough lands back, of offering large areas, in an unbroken form, for homestead settlement, so that, instead of finding, as at present, a mile between each homestead, there might be an unbroken range of homestead settlements. There can be no doubt that in the North-West that system, from whatever motive adopted, has worked a great deal of mischief, and that a greater settlement might be looked for if the lands are sufficiently near to a railway, and people were given to understand that the Government would allow them to settle continuously, instead of at intervals of odd numbered sections.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not suppose there is a single point in the respective characteristics of the two Governments, that militates more against our own interest than the fact that in the United States wherever public lands are found there may be a homestead entry and no reserve whatever. Settlers moving into new sections in that country can secure whole townships, which is a great advantage compared with the policy we pursue of obliging them to take isolated locations. There is also the fact that our lands are really held higher than lands in the United States. Within the railway belt and odd sections reserved by the Government, are termed double minimum lands, and are sold at $2.50 an acre, and outside the belts $1.25. Our lands of similar character north of the Canadian Pacific Railway are sold at $2 an acre, or 75 cents higher than in the United States. South of the Canadian Pacific Railway, lands of similar character are sold at $2.50. The Minister can see the influence that these two facts must have in repelling settlement. It is due largely to these two facts that we have but 25,000 people in the North-West, and that Dakota is almost a Canadian State. I do not make these statements in a partisan sense at all, but certainly as a business matter our management of our public lands requires that we should adopt a policy at least as liberal as that of the United States. We are laboring under certain disadvantages, our lands are further away than those of Dakota, and we require to offer superior inducements. The suggestion made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), is well worthy of consideration, that is, to allow a homestead entry everywhere in the North-West. The great desideratum there is to secure a population. It is not the profit we are to make from the sale of those lands that is going to count so much in our national prosperity as the securing of a population in our vast prairies in the North-West. We have to-day, probably, living in the United States 2,500,000 people who ought to be living here, and we want to stop the drain that is going on. We have in the North-West a country of enormous resources, and if we adopt a policy calculated to promote its settlement the result will be seen in a marked manner in the development of the resources of this country within the next ten years. I believe, without any flattery to the Minister of the Interior, that we now have a gentleman in that position who can weigh more correctly the influences that bear upon this whole question than some of his predecessors, and that he will, in comparing our system with that of the United States, see where our weak points are, and see the necessity of adopting a wise policy towards settlers. Certainly such a policy would never contemplate the possibility of such a scheme as the organisation of colonisation companies. It is not correct that the settlement of new countries in the United States has been promoted by colonisation companies. The State of Iowa had 500,000 population before it had half-a-dozen miles of railway. There never has existed in the United States anything comparing with the colonisation schemes. The simple fact is, that in the grants to colonisation companies contemplated under certain circumstances, giving them lands at half price, that lands worth $2 an acre they were to get on certain conditions for $1, and then the companies sold these lands to the actual settler at a much higher price. That is a policy the Government never should have inaugurated. The Government should allow no individual to stand between itself and the settler who cultivates the soil. We should either give the soil or sell the soil at first hands to the settlers, and allow no middleman to buy the land at $1 an acre and turn round and retail it to the settler, perhaps, at $10 an acre. I maintain that the colonisation scheme of the Government was utterly indefensible; it was adopted with no design of promoting the interests of the North-West, but it was an electioneering dodge for the purpose of attaching to the Government the interest of capitalists of all parties, who would thereafter support the Government by their influence. It was a powerful leverage in the elections of 1882, it was designed for that purpose, and it served the purpose, but it also inflicted a great disaster upon the North-West.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). In reference to a remark of the hon. gentleman for South Huron, I would say that these lands granted to colonisation companies were not withdrawn from the market because there never was a time when the settlers could not settle on even sections. They were always open to settlement, and anyone who chose to go there could do so. With reference to the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman of doing away with the system of odd and even sections, and throwing the whole country open to settlement, that is too long a question to discuss at this moment. I may say with regard to the land grant to the Lethbridge Railway, that it has been changed to a land grant of blocks or townships instead of sections, and to that extent we will be able, in the alternate township, to experiment upon that method which the hon. gentleman suggests, and which I have myself had much under consideration. If we can give the railway companies townships instead of sections, the object the hon. gentleman has in view may be carried out, but that is a matter upon which no decision has yet been reached.

Mr. BLAKE. In reference to this very question of the system of odd sections, communications have been addressed to me from settlers in the southern parts of the territories to the effect that large areas in the odd sections in their district have been assigned to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as part of their land grant, though not, of course, within the forty-mile belt, but part of that which could not be given to them within that belt. They say: We have been settled there for some time, we are remote from all railways at present, we do not get the benefit of those who dwell on the odd sections of the Canadian Pacific Railway. On the other hand, we are embarrassed because we are not able to collect municipal taxes or school taxes upon those odd sections, although we understand that they have been sold by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to the North-West land corporations. I want to know—and of course it may be that the hon. gentleman may not be able to answer me at the moment, though perhaps he may—whether the system under which the Department regulates its transactions with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is such that they have a record of sales made by the Canadian Pacific Railway in any way, so that the fact of their lands being sold may become public and thus the lands become subject to taxation. The hon. gentleman will recollect that the provisions of the grant of lands to the Canadian Pacific Railway are that, until sold or occupied, they shall for twenty years after the patent is granted be free from taxation; but the House can readily understand that a scheme might, perhaps, be devised by simply keeping concealed the sale to a great land corporation, like the North-West Land Company, of specific lands in a manner by which those lands sold to a speculative corporation might be kept free from taxation until the time arrived by which the corporation effected a sale to an ultimate buyer or a minor speculator. Thus they might remain, although sold under the name of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the hands of that speculative land corporation, and although sold out of the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the lands might not be subject to taxation. That, of course, is a very serious drawback. The grievance of the odd sections not being open for homesteading has been already adverted to, and I have already spoken of it as a very great practical difficulty. I am not now saying that the Government is largely responsible for it; it is, nevertheless, a practical difficulty that settlers cannot find a place for their relations and friends alongside of themselves. But it is infinitely enhanced when settlers, isolated as they are by the existence of the odd sections, are unable to have their relatives and friends around them. Until some plan can be arranged—and these lands form one of the most favorable portions of the North-West—by which the lands held by the North-West land corporations are made subject to local taxation, you will have the settlers, with all the disadvantage of isolation, laboring under the additional difficulty of having to pay the expense of roads and bridges, the construction of schools and the expense of municipal institutions, for the enhancement of the value, from year to year, of lands which that corporation holds, perhaps for the benefit of individual corporations, for I see they are now establishing a scheme by which the stockholders can select lands in payment of their stock. Thus, half the country enhances the value of the other half for those who hold unsettled lands. I ask the earnest attention of the Minister to this matter, and if he is unable to answer me now, perhaps he will give me a statement at a later date as to what steps have been taken or are to be taken to prevent this, what I consider to be an invasion of the conditions on which we granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway, lands which the instant they are sold ought to become subject to municipal taxation.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I should like to make a suggestion with respect to this matter based on my observations last summer in the North-West. It struck me that one of the great drawbacks in the North-West was the complete isolation of the settlers arising not only from the odd numbered sections, but also from Hudson Bay lots, school lots and Canadian Pacific lots. It is really enough to prevent any man settling in that country to find that he has to place himself one or two miles from his neighbor. In the Qu'Appelle Valley—where it is said that every available lot is taken up—I would be very sorry to settle, if I wished to take up land, no matter how great the advantages were, if I had to put my family in such a state of isolation as the people there must occupy. It struck me particularly at that time, in that particular locality, which, although small compared with the North-West is yet a very large tract, that as there were no less than fifteen Indian reserves around there it was a great drawback that the people were so isolated that any system of defence from devastation by Indians was practicably impossible. If any change could be made in the system so that settlers might take up adjoining lots for self-preservation, or for the purpose of their schools and securing associations in various ways, it would be a very great advantage in those particulars to which I have alluded. There is another matter worthy of the attention of the Minister of the Interior. To compare small things with great I may mention that in the free grant district of Ontario, with which I am very familiar, one of the great drawbacks is that everybody has too much land. Is it not becoming the same in the North-West? If the land is to become profitable it can only be by adopting a system of mixed farming, and 160 acres is as much as a man with small capital can cultivate with advantage. When he burdens himself with the purchase of 320 acres, which he is almost compelled to do under the present system, he commits a mistake. I do not pretend to point out the way in which this difficulty might be obviated, but I do not see why the friend of a man who takes up lot No. 1 should not be allowed to take up lot No. 2 instead of lot No. 3, and if any more lands are to be thrown open for settlement the Minister might try the experiment whether it might prove advantageous for the reasons I have suggested to adopt the plan by which a system of alternate sections would be got rid of.

Mr. WATSON. I can assure the Minister that the suggestions thrown out by the hon. member who has just spoken are good suggestions, and that it would be greatly in the interests of the settlers of the North-West if townships were reserved instead of sections. A great injustice is done to municipalities at present, and a great number of municipalities are in a very serious difficulty from the fact that lands have been taxed for a number of years though not patented, and under the system which prevails in the North-West at tax sales the lands cannot be sold. The municipalities have put down the amounts against those lands as an asset though they cannot realise on them at a tax sale. There should be some arrangement between the Dominion and Local Governments with the municipalities, whereby any unpaid taxes should be chargeable on the lands. It is not right or just to settlers, who have taxed themselves to make improvements, that taxes which have been reckoned as assets for years cannot be realised on. There are a large number of municipalities in difficulties in this respect at present. The Minister's attention was, no doubt, drawn to this matter when he visited Manitoba; if not it should have been, because the municipalities were then aware of the position which they then occupied. As the Minister informed the House the other day that the Government were to make some changes in the Dominion Lands Act, I hope the Government are considering some changes in connection with the land regulations, and I trust they may see fit to try some scheme other than reserving all odd sections for sale. No doubt there will be a very large quantity of land placed on the market for homesteading and other purposes with the abolition of the colonisation companies. I am glad to know that the Government are about to cancel the grants of a large number of these companies. We are told that there are only three or four in existence; very few have done any good to the country, if they have done any good at all. Has the Minister any account of the amount of money which has been spent by any colonisation company in getting immigrants to come to the country; they have had agents through the Province and in Winnipeg and Portage La Prairie to get immigrants to locate on their lands. A settler is worth as much to the country if he is settled on other lands than those of the colonisation company, and the Government actually gives such a company a bonus of $160 for catching each immigrant and inducing him to settle on colonisation lands, and I believe those colonisation companies have been an injury to the country, because two or three years ago—

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Is the Shell River company?

Mr. WATSON. You will have a chance to speak after a while.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I ask a plain question and you as a gentleman should answer it.

Mr. WATSON. I say that those companies—

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Quit talking of those companies; they are all right.

Mr. WATSON. I did not hear the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I asked did you refer to the Shell River Colonisation Company. Did you say that it was an injury to the country?

Mr. WATSON. I do not say it is, but I say that the policy pursued by the Government in locking up large tracts of land in Manitoba and the North-West, has been an injury to the country; and it has been stated by the Minister that only three or four colonisation companies have been able to go on.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I mentioned three or four, but I said there were others.

Mr. WATSON. Well, I do not think there are more than half a dozen that have complied with the regulations. I would like to know from the Minister if he has any report from those companies, showing how many settlers they have brought into the country, and what advertising they have done to bring settlers in. I do not think a settler is worth any more on one of these colonisation tracts than he is anywhere else. I believe the benefit derived by the company has been derived at the expense of the country. They have secured their lands at $1 per acre when $2 was required from others, and the system of selling the odd sections has also proved injurious, as I have already pointed out. A large percentage of the land cannot be sold, and I hope some means may be devised whereby the amount of taxation against those lands will be collected by the municipalities, even if the lands are in the hands of the Crown.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has touched upon a matter which intimately concerns the future settlement of the North-West. Coming down on the train I had a conversation with a farmer who had been settled in the township of Bentinck for thirty-four years. I said: "Where are you going?" and he said: "To the North-West." I asked: "Where are you settled in the North-West?" He said: "I am in Dakota." I said: "How is it that you have settled in Dakota?" "Well," he said: "last summer I went to the North-West; I travelled through it, but when I found a lot that I would like to get,

I found it was owned by some railway company, some colonisation company or some other speculator, and after searching for a length of time, I went through to Dakota and I took up land there." He said, "I would prefer living under the British Government, but the land regulations in the North-West are such that I could not get a suitable location." A short time afterward I met another young man whom I have known from a boy, as well as his relations, a family of eight or ten, who had lived in the township. I said: "Where are your living now?" He said: "in Dakota." I asked: "How is this; you did well in Bentinck?" He replied: "It is true we did for a number of years, but for the last three or four years farming did not pay; grain was low in price; we were getting embarrassed and we had to strike. We went to the North-West desiring to settle there;" and then he went on to tell me the same story over again—that whenever they came to a lot they would like to settle on, that lot was owned by some colonisation company, by the railway company, the Hudson Bay Company, or some other of these corporations. He said it was impossible to get suitable locations, and his family of nine or ten went on to Dakota. One of these men had lived in the county of Grey for thirty-four years, and the other was living in Bentinck twenty-five years ago when I settled there. These are the causes which led them to settle in the United States, though they were British by birth, British by instinct, and desired to live under the British flag. The Minister of Interior says such a thing cannot happen, but here is the practical experience of two men who had no desire or wish to tell anything but the truth. They gave me their actual experience, and from what I know of them I can rely upon what they told me. This is experience—the other is theory. The Minister says he endorses the policy of his two predecessors in the Department. He says he endorses their land policy. Well, that policy has had the effect of settling up the State of Dakota. Because I am telling the Government this, I do not want them to turn around to say you are advertising Dakota. I am telling the practical result of the experience of people who are British in instinct, who desired to remain under the British flag, but who, by arbitrary, despotic and blind regulations, were driven away from Canada to the United States.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Because they had not a place to settle on?

Mr. LANDERKIN. What does the hon. gentleman say?

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I am not at all angry, doctor, but I ask you if it was because they had not a place to settle on?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have given you the reasons, but I will repeat them; that, after finding land, they found it was occupied or owned either by some corporation or other speculator and they could not get it and they were driven over. I can give you this young man's name if you desire. He said to me: "In Dakota one man is as good as another; one man has just as a good chance to get land from the Department as another; he can get it on the same terms as a duke, a knight or a marquis, or any other of those titled gentry who have received lands in the North-West." Now, the admission which was made by the Minister of Interior would seem to sanction the policy of his two predecessors, a policy which has driven many and many a settler from settlement in the North-West. The hon. gentleman visited the North-West; he went there to discover the grievances of the people. I believe he went there to remedy their grievances, and I will read you what a paper published in that district said of his visit:

"He left party politics behind; he assumed no dignity except that of a man who desired to benefit his country and his countrymen; he sought information wherever he went and was best pleased when he came most clearly in contact with those who had experienced what he desired to hear of. He spoke his mind freely as a man to men—not as a Usar to his subjects, as has been the habit in his Department, and in almost every instance agreed most cordially with the views of the people in the matters brought before his notice."

I want him to notice this:

"Almost every word he uttered was a condemnation of the policy heretofore pursued by the Government, but this he did not feel called upon either to apologise for or to allude to."

Now, he tells us here to-night that he endorses the policy of his immediate predecessors in the office, but when he was visiting in the North-West, he heard the grievances of the settlers, and every word he said was a condemnation of those who had gone before him. He condemned the policy of the Premier and the policy of Sir David Macpherson when he was in the North-West, and I presume he did so because it was unsafe for him to attempt to justify their policy, which had been the means of driving settlers from the North-West into the United States. Now, I might go on and show the results of their policy. They have surveyed a large portion of the North-West and sold the lands. They have made glowing estimates of the receipts to be derived from the sale of those lands. I think the First Minister estimated that we would receive $58,000,000 before 1890; I think the late Minister of Railways estimated that we would receive a similar amount; but what has been the result of their policy? Why, Sir, the net amount that we have had from the sale of all the wild lands in the North-West up to to-day is somewhere in the neighborhood of $200,000 or $300,000; and a further result of their policy has been the settlement of a large portion of Dakota almost exclusively with native-born British subjects. I feel strongly on this subject because I can tell the Government of men who went from the riding I represent to settle in the North-West, who desired to maintain their connection with Great Britain, and who, by the blind policy of the Department, were driven from the North-West and are now located in Dakota. I could give the names—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Names.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I can give the names of fifty-five families who have gone from the neighborhood where I live and have settled in the State of Dakota, during the last five years. I can give the names of forty, who went from the township where the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) himself resides.

Mr. SPROULE. I distinctly deny that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, I can give the names.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Names.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have got the list at my lodgings. I am not making this statement unadvisedly; I know of what I speak, and I have made enquiries of those who reside where my hon. friend resides, and they know of what they speak. It may do for the Minister of the Interior to deny these things, and to say they cannot happen; but these things have happened in a great many instances that I know of. It is an alarming state of things to find in this country. We have spent a vast amount of money in the North-West, and we should not tolerate for one day a policy that is calculated to drive settlement from that country. It has been condemned by the Minister of the Interior himself, and yet he comes to-night and justifies the policy of his immediate predecessors. Now, the amount of money to be received from the colonisation companies was estimated to be very large. Well, it has been a mere nominal sum, and at the same time the policy of colonisation companies was calculated to drive many settlers from the North-West; it was a blind policy. The Minister of the Interior said it was calculated to introduce capital in the country. The only capital it introduced was political capital; that is what it was conceived for. If you look into the records of the Department and see the rapid strides which have been made year after year in the expenditure, you can possibly understand where the money received from the sale of public lands has gone. Every year shows an increase in the number of officials without an increase in the sale of the lands. In 1874 the Department of the Interior was managed for $27,000 and with twenty-one officials. How many officials are there in that Department now? There are sixty-four in one branch, twenty-nine in the Geological Survey Branch, six in the North-West Mounted Police Branch, thirty-two in the Department of Indian Affairs—altogether nearly 150 in that Department, which was managed a few years ago with thirty-one. Now, it is something that this country should gravely consider if the proceeds from the sale of our wild lands are to be devoted to the maintenance of a number of camp followers of hon. gentlemen opposite. If this is the way the moneys of this country are to be spent, when times are so depressed as they are now, and if a policy is to be carried out which is calculated to drive settlers away from the country, is it not time for the House to consider when a stop should be put to these things? This Department was better conducted in 1874 than it is now, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite claimed that there was extravagance in that Department at that time. If they were honest then, they are dishonest now. They promised that if they were put in office they would do better, and if we judge them by their performances, we find them to have been false. Where they promised economy, they have been guilty of extravagance; where they promised retrenchment, they have imposed upon us tenfold the cost that existed before. I will not take up the time of the House in this subject further; but in the question of the land I feel a deep interest, and I will have something to say upon it when it comes up at another stage.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I think it is a great pity that hon. gentlemen opposite, before they attack the policy of the Government with regard to colonisation companies, did not acquaint themselves with the regulations under which those companies have existed. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) have stated that these companies have been the cause of disaster to the North-West. I have had connection with one, the York Farmers' Colonisation Company, and I can give the statements of these hon. gentlemen, so far as that one is concerned, most unqualified denial. Of the 231 homesteaders that we were the cause of putting in that country, you will not find three who say that they have not received benefit from the company and that they are better off than if they settled on lands under the control of the Government. With reference to the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), he said that fifty-five families went from his township of Bentinck and settled in Dakota, but of the whole fifty-five he could not name one.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. I named two, and can now name a great many others.

Mr. WALLACE (York). We allowed the hon. gentleman full latitude while he was speaking; I think he should extend the same courtesy to us. He was asked, while on his feet, by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) to name those, and he stumbled around and went back to his desk and was unable to give the name of a single individual.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I wish to explain that I have a list of names in my possession, and will tell you them if you will allow me.

Mr. WALLACE (York). The hon. gentleman told us that these families went to the North-West, that they fixed on some portions of land, that they found in the one case the land was owned by the railway companies and in the other by the colonisation companies, and consequently they could not settle on them. If the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to acquaint himself with the rules and regulations, he would have found it was not necessary to make such an unfair declaration. In fact, he was answered by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) who said these colonisation companies have agencies at Winnipeg, Brandon, and other places all along the line, trying to induce settlers to come on their lands; and yet the hon. member for South Grey says the companies were seeking to prevent settlers going on the lands of the companies. The hon. member for Marquette also stated that these companies got $160 from the Government for every settler they brought into the land, and he asked was that fair, because the settlers would have taken up land in the North-West anyhow. I could tell you, Sir, of hundreds of settlers brought out from the Old Country by these companies, and who did not settle on the lands of the companies, but on other lands in the North-West. We have no control of the settlers; they can settle where they like; and for every one who went in and was picked up, as the hon. member for Marquette said, by a colonisation company and landed on their tract, there were a half-dozen brought in by these companies that scattered over the country and settled close to the railway instead of on the tracts of the companies which were all necessarily many miles from the road. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) asked what money the companies ever spent. I say they have spent tens of thousands of dollars as immigration agents, and have prevented many persons from going to the United States, who would have gone there if they had believed the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite that it is such an attractive country to go to. As regards the York Farmers' Colonisation Company, it has built an excellent steam flour mill at a cost of $17,000, in a tract about seventy-five miles from the railway line; they have attracted 200 or 300 settlers into the country; they have built roads, made ferries and bridges, and put up a steam sawmill, as well as a steam flour mill, and have loaned money to the settlers at 6 per cent., a rate of interest at which no other parties would lend in the North-West. The colonisation companies do everything to assist the settlers by giving them work and assisting them in every way. When we find those gentlemen who do not know anything of the regulations or the onerous conditions under which the companies undertake to settle those lands, indulging in wholesale abuse of them, it is evident they do so without a particle of knowledge of what they are talking about. I am forced to say this, because it is true. These gentlemen have said that the companies "lock up" the land. That expression has been used a good many times to-night, but to my certain knowledge any man going into the North-West can take any unoccupied homestead lot in a company's land, and the companies are anxious to have them do so. More than that, the companies are willing and anxious to get men to locate on their lands as homesteaders and pre-emptionists. More than that, you can buy from the companies cheaper than from the Government, because the Government allow the companies $160 for each settler they put in, and that reduces the price. If the Government allows the companies $160, that would be applied to the reduction of the $2 per acre, and therefore they can afford to sell their land for a trifle less than the Government price of $2, so that instead of driving out homesteaders and pre-emptionists the companies encourage them to come in and settle on their lands. They are willing and anxious that their lands should be settled, and they offer an inducement by selling them at a price lower than the Government's. There is just one other matter to which I will refer. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) says that for merely a nominal sum the companies have obtained immense tracts of land. Well, they have paid the Government in the neighborhood of $750,000 hard cash, and they have not received as yet a patent for one acre of land. In addition to what they have paid to the Government, they spent altogether, I believe, nearly an equal sum in promoting settlement; and if their success has not been so great as they anticipated, it is because circumstances prevented as great a number of people going in as the Government and the railway people expected. But we are hoping for better times. We see this year that the settlement of the North-West is beginning to resume its old proportions, and I have still unbounded faith in the greatness that is in store for us there, and instead of hon. gentlemen running down these colonisation companies, they should direct a little of their energies to building up that great country.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I asked a very simple question of an hon. gentleman (Mr. Watson). Now, you cannot deny that. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a usual thing for all men who are representatives in this House, no matter who belongs to the country, or who holds property in the country, they are always treated, whether they are Reformers or Conservatives, with courtesy. I asked him, has not the Shell River Colonisation Company been good to his county? and he turned round with a sneer and a slur. He had no right to throw a sneer and a slur at me. I have never done anything of that kind to him.

Mr. WATSON. I beg your pardon; I did not.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Yes, you did. You did what your leader did last night, and what neither you nor your leader dare do outside of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I am in order. Don't be too thin-skinned.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Wait, now. I said last night to their leader, that if he got the papers it would do him no good in the country.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman is referring to a previous debate.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I am not. I am referring to what took place last night. He said: "You cannot expect anything better from a criminal before the bar." I am not a criminal. The Shell River Company gave $500 to build a bridge across a river in your county. The Shell River Company have paid $500 in taxes in your county. They have erected a grist mill, to which men are bringing grist from forty and fifty miles to be ground. They have expended $26,000 or $27,000, and they have paid the Government $9,000. I ask, in the name of common sense, how has that company hurt the North-West? Will any gentleman say that they have been an injury to the North-West? That is one company, and I think the hon. gentleman, as the representative in this House from Marquette, has nothing to say against the shareholders of that colonisation company.

Mr. WATSON. Did I say anything against them?

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). You said a great deal about companies.

Mr. WATSON. I exempted four or five.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Speak of the good ones, then. You should speak of the good ones. There is a great deal said, and there are sneers and insults thrown out about the Prince Albert Colonisation Company. That company never received an acre of land; it never put an agent in the North-West; and it paid the Government $20,000 in cash, and it has applied to take its money back without interest. Have they done any harm to the country, or prevented any one from settling on the land? Then, another gentleman says that the titled gentlemen are getting a great deal of the land in the North-West. There is only one titled gentleman that I know of in that connection, and that is Sir Richard Cartwright.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What did I get from the Government?

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I do not wish to say an unkind word of the hon. gentleman, and I have no unkind feelings against him, because he is a gentleman, and he treats men as gentlemen, and I honor and respect him. He owns lands in the North-West and he is a titled gentleman, and I wish he had more titles and honors. I do not begrudge him any of his titles and honors, and I hope he will have more honors and titles. But I say to the hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Watson), that I ask him not to cast slurs at me, I ask you to leave the slurs to your leader; I ask you to leave the cowardly stabs to your leader; and leave your leader in my hands.

Mr. WATSON. I ought to ask the protection of the Sergeant-at-Arms. I do not know what slurs I threw out.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I did more for your county than your leader has ever done.

Mr. GILLMOR. This discussion has taken a very wide range. Coming from the Maritime Provinces, as I do, although we are equally interested with others in the success of the North-West, of course we do not take as much interest in the matter as the Province of Ontario; but I was a little surprised at the tone of the discussion, because the Minister of the Interior himself, to some extent at least, admits that the colonisation companies have been a failure, and he does not seem to agree with his supporters who have just spoken. I have no doubt that some of these companies have resulted in good to the North-West, but it must be admitted from the remarks of the Minister himself, that they have been a failure in the main. As to the discussion which has been going on in regard to Canadians, I was talking with a Canadian yesterday with regard to Minnesota, and he told me that there the settlers were convenient to each other, and that in a new settlement the other day fifty-seven heads of families met together to arrange for a school, and fifty-three of the fifty-seven were Canadians. I was surprised to find that so many Canadians were so convenient to each other, but that is reasonable, because, being Canadians, they would like to settle near each other. I think the Government see that there has been a great mistake somewhere in the management of affairs in the North-West. I heard the representative of colonisation companies who has just now spoken say that they have made great efforts to get settlers into that country, that they have not only induced people from Canada to go there, but that they have brought them even from Europe at their expense. I remember that one great argument that was used in this House in regard to immigration was that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was going to relieve the Government from a great deal of its expense in getting settlers into that country; that that company would be a great immigration agency of vast importance. I expected that myself. I thought there would be a great increase of population from that source. It was also said that these colonisation companies were going to be a great source of immigration, and that the expense to the Government for immigration would be largely done away with. There is something wrong somewhere, I do not know where; I do not know whether it is owing to the boom, or whether the advantages of that country have been exaggerated. I think they have been magnified, and I do not think it was necessary to magnify them.

I think that everything has been boomed and has been exaggerated, and that little common sense or honesty has been shown in the management of the whole affair. I do not wish now to say anything to wound the feelings of those who must feel badly enough, God knows, without our saying anything to them. Their chickens are returning home to roost. They see that their efforts have been an entire failure, but I regret that the five millions of people of this Dominion have had so much money squandered, and that these speeches, which have been doing so much good to those who have had the rule in this country for so long, have been proved fallacious, and a failure in every respect. I do not wish to say anything to make those gentlemen feel worse than they must do, after so many years, after so much money has been spent, after the railway has been built, and we find 23,000 white people in a territory so vast and fertile as that. I do not believe that country is as good as it has been represented. I have never been there. I do not suppose that I ever shall go there. But I am told that more than half, or at least as much as half, of the wheat in that country was destroyed by frost last year. That is one reason why people do not settle there. When I am told that wheat is being sold at 12 and 14 cents a bushel, I say that is a drawback. I am glad now that we are seeing the evil of present management, and I hope we will try to get along in the future on something like common sense principles. It is a serious thing that we have put millions upon millions of the taxes of this country into the North-West and the result has been such as we see before us. I am astonished myself that the population of the North-West is what it is, considering the vast amount of money that has been expended there and the efforts we have made to bring in immigrants. Then where are the immigrants? Sixty per cent. of those now in the North-West are native-born Canadians and have reduced our population at home. Where have the rest gone? The truth is they have gone there, and for some reason or other, either the fiscal policy, or the climate, or the land arrangement, they have gone away again. I hope in the future we shall learn by the experience of the past, and manage affairs in the interest of the taxpayers in this country.

Mr. SPROULE. I am sorry the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) is not in his seat, because I want to say that I think the story he told is very much overdrawn, though I have no doubt it is a piece with the argument, he is in the habit of using in his own riding to convince the people that the country was going to the bad. If as many families as he states have left the township of Bentinck I would attribute it to the fact that the people have been constantly told in the past by him and his friends that Dakota was a better place than Manitoba. He must forget that the very same condition of things exist in Dakota with regard to railway companies as he claims exist in Manitoba. If he has travelled in Dakota he must have seen advertisements of railway companies at every station, who are holding large tracts of land and offering it upon what they claim to be very favorable terms of settlement. It is claimed by Americans that one of the principal causes in settling up their country was the number of railway companies who are competing for and inducing settlers to go in there. My opinion has always been that one of the reasons why many people settled in Dakota and Minnesota instead of the North-West, is the fact that we have been compelled to send our people through that country in going to the North-West, but I hope that will be done away with in future. It is not unreasonable to expect that many people will settle down where there are small villages and railway facilities. The hon. member for South Grey stated that forty families, or forty people, had left the township I reside in and settled in Dakota, as a result of the policy of the present Government. I want to give that a distinct and emphatic denial.

Mr. GILLMOR.

I have travelled through that township a great deal; I am acquainted with almost every family that has left it during the last ten years, and I know the hon. gentleman's statement is not correct. If he will be kind enough to give the names, I can satisfy this House that it is not correct.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can say with regard to North Wellington, that I know of several families in my section of the county, that went to the North-West for the purpose of taking up lands, but finally settled in Dakota. I know two families who settled in Dakota and gave a flattering account of the land regulations, and the result was that from two townships there has gone out quite a settlement into Dakota, where they have settled a township which they called Minto, after the name of their native township which they left in Canada. If the hon. gentlemen doubt my word, I will give him the names. Here they are: Duncan McLellan, H. Perry, C. Perry, H. McKenzie, P. McKenzie, J. McDonald, J. McLarty, W. McKenzie, P. Sinclair, D. Turner, H. McLellan, P. Spence, M. Phalin, John Creighton. Now I am sorry that this state of things exists. I believe the cause is that people in the Old Country, who detest the system of landlordism, have heard of our colonisation companies in the North-West, and believe them to be virtually like the landlords of the Old Country, and consequently they will not settle near them. They want, in the first place, to get their land direct from the Crown. A good many reports have gone across the Atlantic with regard to these colonisation companies, and if there is one thing that people coming to this country abhor, and from which they wish to be removed as far as possible, it is a system of landlordism, and that has unfortunately been established in the North-West by these colonisation companies, which frighten the people from going there. I deplore as much as any man can that our own people have gone to Dakota, but I hope that our Government will make such changes in our land regulations as will prevent that in the future. Unfortunately those who are already in Dakota act as immigration agents in favor of that country by the reports they send home. I know there was one man last year who wished me to advance him a certain sum of money in addition to the sum he had borrowed on his farm. He left the place in my hands to dispose of it if I would advance him the money, and he has gone to Dakota. I have received a letter from him telling me to dispose of the farm for anything I can possibly make out of it and send him the balance above the mortgage, as $400 or $500 is worth more to him now than perhaps $1,000 in the course of a year, and stating that he has no intention of returning to this country. This is a deplorable state of things. We have an enormous territory of our own, and yet our hardy yeomen who are an advantage to the country, who, in the older Provinces rolled up their sleeves and cleared the land, are sent across the border. There must be some reason for this; what is the cause? It must be that our land regulations are wrong and the people are not satisfied with them. There has been railway communication with the North-West, and it can scarcely be for lack of that. Has it been due to the railway monopoly by which the charter given to the Canadian Pacific Railway prevents the possibility of getting railway accommodation such as they require for the next twenty years? Perhaps that may be one of the factors in the cause why the people have gone across the line. Then again there is the unfortunate system of colonisation companies. Notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. member for York, whose company may be an exception to the rule, there is no doubt that there are companies which have proved injurious to the country. I know also many residents who bought large sections which they are not improving or selling, but which they are allowing to lie idle. If the policy enunciated by the leader of the Opposition years ago —the land for the settler and the money for the Crown—had been adopted we would have had hundreds and thousands more than we have to-day; but that policy was not adopted, and in its place a policy ruinous to the country was adopted, a policy which I hope the Minister will reverse and introduce one that is right and just.

Mr. HESSON. This discussion has taken a pretty wide range. I have been struck with the remarks made by hon. gentlemen opposite as to the settlement of Dakota by people leaving this country. It is a most extraordinary fact that in almost every instance brought before this House emigration has been from counties represented by hon. gentlemen opposite. We cannot gather any other inference from the facts stated than that the immigration to the American side instead of the North-West has been almost entirely from counties represented by hon. gentlemen opposite. It appears the influence of those hon. gentlemen upon their constituents is such that from the speeches they deliver and the character they give to settlements in the North-West and the bad management they attribute to the Government and the bad lands which they say exist, the people believe them. I know that so far as my experience goes, I could not trace back any number of families which have gone to the American North-West except when their friends went out there many years ago, and have for years been inducing their friends to join them. We have settlements from Perth and the Hurons and many other counties in the North-West, and the settlers are sending encouraging accounts and inducing their friends to go there. It is most unfortunate that this discussion should have assumed such a wide range, and that it should be represented that emigration from the Dominion is due to the Government's bad land regulations. How can a colonisation company have an injurious effect, when no colonisation company's lands are within fifty miles of the railway? How can an hon. member state that settlers have gone into the country and been unable to find a location, when there are hundreds of miles of land on both sides of the railway not yet settled, and when the Government are offering 160 acres free to every genuine settler, with the privilege of buying 160 acres? It is a most unreasonable and illogical statement, and is devoid of common sense. Settlers on those colonisation grants have exceedingly great difficulties to overcome. Those who settled on the original survey of the Canadian Pacific Railway, have been lamenting over their hard fate, and they are suffering a certain amount of inconvenience. But what is to prevent hundreds of thousands looking for new homes in the great North-West, obtaining homesteads on the line of the railway itself? The Government are not withholding any even sections from settlers, and the immigrant can only hold those homesteads by settling upon them. A comparison of the Government regulations with those of the United States shows that ours are immeasurably superior. There is scarcely an hon. gentleman who has spoken to-night who did not take a very deep interest in framing the Land Act two years ago, and we supposed we had a very satisfactory measure. The member for Marquette rendered advice and assistance and spoke with authority as a resident of the country, and we had the assistance of the hon. member for South Grey, and many others, and those hon. gentlemen should not now claim that our Land Act and regulations are unsatisfactory and are the means of keeping settlers out of the North-West. People have got to realise that they cannot go to any part of the world and establish a new home for themselves without meeting with difficulty, and a man who goes to the North-West to make a fortune must realise that he will have to surmount difficulties. The history of the settlement of Dakota and Minnesota bears out exactly what has occurred in the North-West, but the pioneer settlers of those States had not such good chances as have the settlers of our North-West. No doubt there will be many opportunities of discussing this question at a future time in a more proper shape.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) appeared to get very angry with me, and I thought it might be necessary to call in the protection of the Sergeant-at-Arms, both in and out of the House. As regards the remarks of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), they have endorsed some of the charges I made. He admitted that a large number of the settlers who went into the North-West were induced to settle on colonisation lands, and the country did not receive much benefit from their actions. Now, he admitted all I said about that. I said nothing about colonisation companies who had fulfilled their contracts with the Government. I am glad his colonisation company has succeeded; also that the Shell River Colonisation Company has succeeded, but notwithstanding what the Minister of Interior has stated I say that these lands have been locked up.

Some hon. MEMBERS. How?

Mr. WATSON. They have been locked up inasmuch as no person wishes to go on the lands of these companies when he should acquire land from the Dominion Government at first cost. The member for York stated that the colonisation companies were prepared to sell their lands for less money than the Government. Well, if the Government were going to give these gentlemen territory to make money out of the Government, are they going to place them in a better position to sell Government lands than if they sold it themselves?

Mr. GUILLET. They can settle on the homesteads—on the even sections.

Mr. WATSON. Yes, and they are credited with each settler they place. With regard to what the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) has said about even numbered sections being reserved from settlement, he is entirely mistaken. He should know that the lands south of the Canadian Pacific Railway were reserved from settlement for years. One reason why there are not more settlers there, is on account of the vacillating policy of the Government with regard to the land regulations. Settlers were not certain where they could locate. At one time eighty acres of a homestead were allowed; at another 160. At one time the lands were disposed of at $1 per acre, and at another time $2 per acre. The Government have never had any settled land policy since they departed from the policy of giving 160 acres free and 160 pre-emption at $1 per acre. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) says I took an active part in framing the Land Bill, but if he looks at Hansard, he will find that the Government did not accept my suggestions with regard to that Bill. I am glad to hear that some of these suggestions I then made may now be adopted by the Minister and the Government; but as we will have an opportunity of discussing those changes in the Bill, I will not further refer to them at present.

Mr. ALLEN. There is one matter which I would bring to the attention of the Minister of Interior, and that is that actual settlers going from Canada or elsewhere to the North-West to settle, and taking up farms and making improvements, should be allowed to sell their improved farms to settlers coming, say, from England. I do not see that such a privilege would involve any hardship to the country, to the Government, or to any person concerned. There are many people coming from the Old Country who have capital, and when they go up to the North-West they prefer purchasing improved farms to going on those on which there are no improvements. I understand that the law is that no settler shall take up a homestead, and be allowed to sell it until he has been settled on it for a certain length of time. I would allow any hard-working settler, any poor man, who has gone there, and lived one or two years on his farm, and put up a house, and made improvements, to sell it under certain regulations to actual settlers, and I would allow him then to take another pre-emption in some other part of the country. I have no faith in colonisation companies—no faith in companies of any description who purchase lands with the intention of colonising them. I have watched the effects of those companies for the past thirty-six years. I came to Ontario in 1850, which was then being settled by immigrants from the Old Country, and at that time a great part of the Province of Ontario was taken up by the Canada Landed Company, which turned out afterwards to be the greatest curse that ever afflicted the settlement of Ontario. I know several of my friends who came from the Old Country to settle here, but rather than purchase land from that company at $5, $10 or $12 per acre, they preferred to go to the United States, where they got free homesteads. I believe that colonisation companies in the North-West have had the same effect. If North-West lands had been given to actual settlers and no others, if those men who happened to get land near railway stations or towns at nominal sums were allowed to retain them, and were not placed under the control of the colonisation and other companies, I believe the country would be settled much faster than it is being settled at the present time. If the rank and file of these settlers got wealthy, their influence and advice to their friends in other parts of the world would have the effect of bringing more people in this country than all the colonisation companies in Canada put together and all the immigration agencies. Let it be known all through Europe that the actual settlers in the North-West were getting wealthy and that free homesteads they secured and farms which they have purchased a few months ago for $2 per acre, were now worth $10 or $12, and you would encourage others to come into the country more than any other policy we could adopt. If the Government had adopted a law to force the railway companies to sell their lands at a given price, whether alongside the railway or five or ten miles distant from it, it would be in the interests of the country. I hope that the Government will take the matter into their serious consideration and give every possible assistance to actual settlers to enable them to come into the country, which I believe any poor man deserves, who tries to make a home for himself on those lands which to-day are not worth one cent per acre, and will remain so till these poor fellows, by their indomitable perseverance and industry, bring it under cultivation. These are the men above all others who deserve the sympathy and encouragement of this House, those frontier settlers, who have left the older and more comfortable parts of our Provinces to make a home for themselves and their families, and thereby add to the wealth and greatness of our Dominion.

Mr. FARROW. I wish to say a few words on this question because I believe that the county of Huron has sent more settlers to the North-West than any other in Canada; certainly the counties of Huron and Bruce together have sent more than any two other counties in Ontario. Many of those farmers I knew personally, and from many of them I receive communications day in and day out. I have a letter here which I received only yesterday from a man who had 100 acres in my neighborhood, who sold it for $5,000, who sold his stock for $2,000 more, besides having some other money. I think, altogether, he took to the North-West some $10,000. Unfortunately he settled on an odd lot. He settled there in the year 1881, but what I want to impress on this House is this fact, that in all the cases I know of those farmers have done well. I read their letters; they say they have some drawbacks, but not so many as they had in Huron. They tell me some of their wheat was frozen last year, but not the half of it. About 25 per cent. of the wheat in the whole country would probably cover all that was frozen. What does this man tell me that he has done since he went there? The first year, of course, he could only break up some of his 320 acres. The next year, 1882, he raised in the neighborhood of 700 bushels of wheat; the next year he raised in the neighborhood of 1,400 bushels besides other grain; in 1884 he raised about 1,800 bushels of wheat and more of coarse grain, as well as stock; and last year he raised upwards of 2,000 bushels of wheat, besides oats and barley, and stock. That man's name is William Smith. He lives in Township 2, Range 20, and his post office is Desford. As my hon. friend from the south riding of my county knows, the whole southern border of Manitoba is thickly settled with people from Huron, and they are all doing well and are satisfied. I have heard no complaints. Although hon. gentlemen opposite have asserted over and over again in this House that parties have got dissatisfied with their lot in Manitoba, and have crossed the boundary to Dakota, I must say that I have yet to learn of one single case of a Huron settler who has done that; and if you can give the name of any one family that has done it, name it. Why should they go to Dakota? What inducements are there in Dakota above ours? A young man, if he is eighteen years of age, can take up in our North-West 160 acres of land, and in Dakota he has to wait until he is three years older. If that young man settles in our North-West for six months in each year, after three years, at the age of twenty-one, he will get his deed, whereas if he had gone to Dakota, he would only have started at that age, and after having taken up his land, he could not have got his deed until he was twenty-six, and then he would only get eighty acres instead of 160 acres, which he gets free in Canada. What inducements are there then for people to go to Dakota? When people did go to Dakota, as many from Huron did years ago, why did they go? Because we had no North-West. But now we have a North-West, and like British subjects they are going to our own land. If a man goes to Dakota, what is his success in raising wheat, compared with raising wheat in Manitoba? Just about half a yield per acre. The average yield, in Dakota, is about fifteen or sixteen bushels per acre, while in Manitoba it is from twenty to twenty-five bushels and up in the thirties. My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says the reason things are not going right in Manitoba, is probably the Canadian Pacific Railway. Surely the building of a railroad from the eastern to the western part of a Province would not be the means of driving people out of the country; and when he recollects this, further, that the very wheat from Dakota year in and year out is coming across the line and paying duty to that very Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly, why does he not take that common sense view of it? He shakes his head as if to say it is not so. Well, it is so; and if he will look at the Customs returns, he will find that some of it pays duty, although lots of it, in my opinion, never pays duty; and it is sold to the buyers on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Where is the grinding monopoly in that? Then, the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Landerkin)—and I have great respect for him—said he was against colonisation companies, and I would be too, if they were like the Canada Company. We had an experience of that company in Huron and in Perth, as my hon. friend says, but is there any comparison between the colonisation companies in the North-West and the Canada Company? The Canada Company had in Huron one solid block sixty miles long, and I cannot tell you how deep. When we got the back townships settled up with good farms we had to go through a solid bush of fifteen or sixteen miles without roads; you would think it was a wilderness. If that company had been constituted on the principles of colonisation companies of the North-West, with every other lot reserved for free settlement, there would have been no grinding monopoly at all; but what was the case? So, why does my hon. friend try to mislead this House and this country by saying that the colonisation companies in the North-West were like the old Canada Company? Now, I am in earnest in my desire to see the North-West settled. I have seen very few of our people go to Dakota, but in times gone by when they did go there, I was very sorry to see them go; and if any of our people wanted to move, I advised them to go to our own North-West. In nine cases out of ten they were only too delighted to go there to mingle their fortunes with those of the people who went from their own neighborhood, and I guarantee that in five or ten years all of them will be well off.

Mr. TROW. Some hon. gentlemen who have spoken about that country have evidently not travelled very extensively in it. Many who go there from this and the other Provinces merely travel by rail, and never see the thriving settlements which are not found near the railway line. We must remember that it is, comparatively speaking, a new country. Fifteen or sixteen years ago, when the lands were purchased from the Hudson Bay Company, there were very few white settlers in the country and no communication with the outside world, and no encouragement was given to any of the half-breeds to engage in agriculture. The lands were then not under cultivation to any extent. I heard an expression from the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) which I hope will not go very far from this Chamber, namely, that he thought there must be something radically wrong, either with the climate, or the country, the people, or the policy of the Government. So far as the climate is concerned, I recollect distinctly, though I am not the oldest man in the House, when Perth and the adjoining counties were troubled with summer frosts, and a very large portion of our crops destroyed almost annually by the same cause. Last year the frosts destroyed a large portion of the crops in the North-West, I should judge probably one-third, and in some settlements one-half, but there are settlements in that country—I might instance the settlement from which the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) comes, where the crops cannot be excelled. I never saw such crops in my life as I saw there. You could see an area of twelve by thirty miles in extent of wheat, which would average, in my estimation, from thirty to forty bushels per acre. I never saw the like in Ontario or any other portion of the Dominion. There are many thrifty settlements in the North-West which are not seen by nine-tenths of the travellers, so that you can form no estimation of the country without travelling through it outside of the railway line as well as by railway. I believe it is a good country; I believe it will furnish millions of homes yet for the surplus population of the Old World. True, a good number of our people have gone into Dakota, but I do not pretend to say it is owing to the policy of the Government, though I do say it would be much better if the Government would do what many railway companies do in the United States, that is, have their agents to look after the settlers on their arrival and see that they are properly located. Let an immigrant go to the United States; he is not left to run at large, but is taken in hands and conveyed, at the expense of the Government or the railway company, to his district. The rules and regulations in the United States are much more rigid than with us, so that the only difficulty with us is the want of agents who will take charge of the immigrant immediately on his arrival and see that he is properly located; instead of sending him on an immigrant train to Winnipeg, where he consults the land agent, and is told there is no land in that agency, but to proceed to Turtle Mountain or some other district. That discourages him. A return of every foot of land sold and what is open for sale in every agency monthly should be made to the head office at Winnipeg, so that they would know what lands are in the market, and send the immigrants at once to the right place. I have travelled in Southern Dakota and know there are many Canadians there, and I know you will not restrain Canadians from going there, unless you adopt the plan I suggest. The lands of Dakota are similar to ours, good, rich, alluvial, inexhaustible soil; the climate is not better, but if anything worse, both in Dakota and Minnesota. Along the centre of Minnesota, for instance, the climate is much worse, because that country is about 400 feet in altitude than that of the Red River valley, and consequently more subject to storms. You travel along the line of the railway in Dakota and Minnesota and you will find that country is not as well settled as our own; you will find millions of acres unsettled, as people will go where lands are better adapted for forming little settlements, and sometime the railway runs through inhospitable portions of the country not inviting for settlements, so that we can form no estimate of the population of the country by merely travelling along the line of railway. Unfortunately we had great expectations of our North-West, and made exaggerated calculations of our ability to settle the country in a few years. I have every confidence in the country myself, and I do think without exaggeration or egotism, that I have travelled more through it than any other gentleman in this House or in any of the older Provinces. I have travelled through it six years in succession, three or four months at a time, and always had my own conveyance, so that I could go where I liked, and I know what I am speaking of when I say there are homes for millions in that country yet.

Mr. GUILLET. I will not detain the House long after the very candid, truthful and honorable statement we have had from the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), who, I may say, seems to be out of place on that side of the House. His statements have been of such a character and into such marked contrast to those of his hon. friend, that one is led to believe hon. gentlemen opposite take pleasure in making statements in reference to the North-West calculated to injure it. The statements made by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), seem to have been inspired by anger and prejudice rather than by a desire to help the Government in its very difficult task of administering the affairs of the Government. The hon. gentleman surprised me very much, because the state of things he described are quite opposite from that. As regards people who have left my riding for the North-West, all of them give good accounts of their success. Not one young man of the entire number who went to settle in the North-West from my county left for Dakota. They are all prosperous, happy and contented. One man (Potter, by name) who went out with very little money, came home last month and purchased three car loads of stock for his farm in the Moose-Jaw settlement with money made in the North-West. He told me that his neighbors were all doing well. I might mention the names of some of them: The Shields, the Battles, the Donaldsons, the Hendersons, the Walkers and a large number of others. I do not know one who is there from my riding who has become discontented or dissatisfied with the North-West, and I only know of one or two who went from my section to the Western States in preference to the North-West. As the statements generally on the other side are calculated to injure the country, I felt it my duty to corroborate the statements of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) and of those of the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Farrow).

Mr. WATSON. I wish to state, by permission of the committee—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. This discussion has gone very far.

Mr. WATSON. I simply desire to say a word in reference to the remarks of my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), who spoke of the frozen grain, and his remarks might be supposed to apply to the whole North-West. When speaking of this, it would be better for hon. members to speak of frosted grain and not of frozen grain. I believe that some of the wheat which has been frosted, in Manitoba and the North-West, is as good for milling purposes as most of the wheat produced in the Province of Ontario. Further, I may state that large sections in Manitoba are almost altogether free from frost. I can speak of the section in which I live, and round Portage la Prairie, which was spoken of by my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Trow); and I can state, that in thirteen years, that district has been touched by frost only twice. We hope that, when the country is more thickly settled, the frosts will gradually disappear. I remember when, in the townships of Ontario, frosts were very frequent in summer and in harvest time, and I hope that some means may be devised, and that we will have the good effects of large sections of Manitoba and the North-West being broken up, and that the frost will gradually disappear. The member for East Huron (Mr. Farrow) made a statement that unfortunately his friend, whose letter he read here to-night, had settled on an odd section of land. I suppose there was some reason for his settling there. I suppose he expected that he would have a free grant of that land, but he finds out now that that land is not open for settlement. That is one of the grievances of the people in the North-West. The regulations were not very well defined, and people have settled on those lands not knowing that they were not open for settlement. I have no doubt that that letter asking the hon. member to intercede for the writer, and aid him in obtaining the patent for the land which he had settled on by mistake, refers to a case of that character, and I hope the Minister will take a note of it, and will see that the regulations are sufficiently plain and that settlers will know which lands are open for patent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not a syllable of explanation has been given in reference to the Geological Survey branch, or the North-West Mounted Police.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The North-West Mounted Police is another item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was distinctly understood that this vote would be taken up item by item, and it is not proper that items involving additions of $2,000 or $3,000 should be passed over without remark. It is simply a disgraceful way of voting the public money that items involving an increase of $2,300 should be passed without any remark.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I gave a full explanation as to the Geological Survey.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not a single syllable did the hon. gentleman say in my hearing.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). We shall see the Hansard tomorrow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not hear a single syllable from the hon. gentleman in reference to the Geological Survey. I understood that this discussion was on the $71,000. My hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) rose to ask questions as to the Geological Survey branch, and he was told to wait.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). He was told to go on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, he was told to wait.

Mr. HOLTON. I rose to ask a question. The hon. Minister, it is true, told me to go on, but it was politely hinted to me by some one, probably by hon. members on both sides, that that was not the time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At any rate, no proper explanation was given in reference to the Geological Survey Branch, and it is a disgraceful thing that an increased vote of $2,300 should be demanded without proper explanation. If any explanation was made, I did not hear it, and it must have been of the most meagre kind.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If the hon. gentleman did not hear my explanation, I think he might take my statement that I made the explanation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, then, state the explanation.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think the statement which he made that it is disgraceful to go on without any explanation is unworthy of him; is unworthy of an hon. gentleman who, in Committee of Supply, always conducts the discussions in a manner which we all appreciate very highly, because we have never any reason to complain of the manner in which he conducts those discussions. I will repeat the explanation which I made, and I think, when that hon. gentleman hears it, he will realise and will admit that he did hear it before. I stated that there was an increase of $2,350 in the Geological Survey branch; that the statutory increases were $1,050; that Mr. Lamb, the artist of the branch, had been promoted to the second class, involving an increase of $100; that Mr. Low had been promoted at an increase of $200, on the express recommendation of Dr. Selwyn, because of special services which he has rendered in connection with the exploration of a lake near Lake St. John, the name of which I am not quite sure of, but I think it is Lake Mistassini; that Messrs. Lawson and Chalmers had been put on the civil list at the same salary they had before, making a difference of $2,200 in the civil list; but I stated that, in the Supplementary Estimates last year, there was an amount of $1,100 voted for one gentleman, making altogether $2,450, or $100 more than the aggregate increase, but that $100 is accounted for by the fact that last year we appointed Messrs. Coste and Ingall of the mineral branch, but the amount they received was less, by $50 each, than that voted, so that it leaves $2,350 as the increase which has been made. I think the hon. gentleman will remember that, almost in precisely the same words, I made this explanation before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman says that he stated that, of course I shall accept it, but I certainly did not hear him. It may have been owing to the fact that there was a good deal of conversation going on in regard to the other item, and I understood the only information he gave to refer to the $71,000, which was under discussion. I did not hear him speak of Mr. Low, though, of course, if he says so, it is so; but I understood that all he said had reference to the item of $71,000 and nothing else.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) got up to ask a question in reference to my speaking of Mr. Ingall and Mr. Coste.

Mr. HOLTON. I am glad to be able to corroborate the statement made by the Minister of the Interior. He certainly did offer the information to the House several hours ago, which he has now repeated. I rose at what I considered the proper moment, to ask some questions. I have not any intention of entering into a long discussion, and I simply rose to ask the questions, when, as I already stated, it was intimated to me that I was a little out of season, and I resumed my seat, thinking I should have an opportunity later on.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. HOLTON. The question I wished to ask was with reference to the appointment of Ingall and Coste to the position of mining engineers of the survey. I wished to be informed as to the nature of the work performed by those gentlemen, and also when, and in what form, the result of their labors will be made public?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Messrs. Ingall and Coste were employed by the Government in consequence of a report made by Dr. Selwyn suggesting the importance of adopting a better system of mineral statistics. They have been engaged in the field during the last year, but their special duties are in connection with the mineral branch. Some little difficulty has occurred in that branch in relation to the work these two gentlemen have been doing, in consequence of the issue of some circular by another officer of the department under the direction of Dr. Selwyn. This particular branch, I am bound to say, is not in the condition I would desire to have it. I am asking at this moment a report from the acting director, Dr. Dawson, in relation to the reorganisation, if possible, of the department in connection with which these two gentlemen have been appointed. I hope we may be able so to arrange it as to meet the reasonable popular desire in regard to that particular branch. I had waiting upon me a short time ago a large deputation of members of both sides of the House in reference to this subject, upon which we had a full and friendly discussion. My earnest object is that we may be able to accomplish the results desired at an early date.

Mr. DAVIES. On examining the estimates and the Auditor-General's report of expenditure for the years 1884-85 up to the 30th June, the Geological Survey branch, I find, cost $32,634. Now the hon. gentleman asks here for $39,650, being an increase of some $7,000. Possibly this increase may be satisfactorily accounted for, but certainly it cannot be by reference to the statutory increases given to the officials, because in that Department there are not sixty-two as there are in the Interior Department, but only thirty, and most of these being at high salaries, do not get the increase.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think I must ask the hon. gentlemen to allow me to make that statement very fully upon concurrence. This is a branch with the details of which I am not thoroughly familiar. I am almost ashamed to say that I have not even visited it since I have been Minister of Interior, for the reason that I have been so busy in the other Department. I will give the hon. gentleman on concurrence the fullest possible information. His request is very reasonable, except in this sense, that usually we do not go back for details to the expenditure of a past year in connection with the estimated expenditure of a future year.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12:30 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 7th April, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORTS ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the time for the reception of reports on Private Bills be extended until Thursday, the 29th instant.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 86) to incorporate the North American Telegraph Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD'S ILLNESS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the House will be pleased to have the information conveyed in the following letter, which I received just now from Dr. Powell:—

“April 7th.

“DEAR SIR,—In reply to your enquiries, I may say that Sir John's physical condition is remarkably good, and though his local symptoms have been very obstinate, yet they are now undergoing a rapid change for the better, and I look forward to his complete convalescence at an early day.

“Yours sincerely,

“R. W. POWELL, M.D.”

CARTRIDGE FACTORY AT QUEBEC.

Mr. MULOCK asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to lay before the House, and cause to be printed for circulation, the report of the Board of Officers appointed during the past year to investigate and report upon the working of the cartridge factory at Quebec; and, if so, when?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is the intention of the Government to lay before the House this report. It is now being copied, and it will be brought down as soon as it is finished, within a couple of days.

THE FRANCHISE ACT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to propose any amendment to the Franchise Act affecting the qualification of any class of voters, during the present Session of Parliament?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The Government are now considering the subject to which the question refers, and it is probable that some amendments will be suggested in the Franchise Act. I am not, however, at present able to say that they will be of the kind mentioned in the question.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LANDS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether the Government is aware that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has sold a large quantity of lands south of the railway to the North-West Land Company? Whether the Government has any description of any of the lands so sold? Whether the Government has taken any steps towards the ascertainment of the lands sold by the company, to the end that they may become subject to municipal and territorial taxation?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The lands which have been given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as part of their subsidy for the construction of the road become their property as soon as they are earned. What disposition they may make of them concerns themselves. Under the law, as soon as they sell those lands which become occupied, they become subject to taxation, and it is the duty of the municipal authorities to see that that clause in the law is not in any way evaded.

SCRIP TO ROCKY MOUNTAIN RANGERS.

Mr. IVES asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to issue scrip to the members of the corps that took part in the suppression of the late rebellion, known as the Rocky Mountain Rangers? If yes, for what number of acres, and when must the recipients locate the land?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Scrip is to be issued, in fact has been issued to a large number of the members of this corps. The certificates were sent in by the Militia Department to the Department of the Interior, the 15th December last. Since that, all applications, so far as they are in order, for members of the "Rocky Mountain Rangers," Major Stewart commanding, have been settled. So far, fifteen land warrants, representing 4,800 acres, have been issued, and also sixteen scrip notes of $80 each, equal together to $1,200.

SEPTIMUS PITON.

Mr. LESAGE asked, Was there an enquiry held last summer, in relation to Septimus Piton; what were the complaints, and what was the result of the enquiry?

Mr. POPE. There was an enquiry. The charges were: First, of buying cement and selling it to the Government at advanced price. Second, of allowing the foreman under him to take wood belonging to the Government. Third, of allowing men under him to neglect their work. Fourth, of ordering men paid by the Government to work on his house. The charges were not maintained.

ARLESS SEPTIMUS PITON.

Mr. LESAGE asked, What is the position held by Arless Septimus Piton? What is his salary? By whom was he appointed? Has he furnished sureties for the place he holds? Is he sufficiently educated to make out his reports?

Mr. POPE. His position is foreman and inspector. His salary is $60 per month. He was appointed by the Minister of Railways and Canals, on the recommendation of Dr. Blanchet. Foremen and inspectors are not obliged to find securities. He has a fair education.

ROBERT SMITH, OF QUEBEC.

Mr. LESAGE asked, What quantity of wood has been purchased for the Intercolonial from Robert Smith, of Quebec? Who inspected and received the said wood? How much was paid per foot? How much has been paid to that gentleman for wood purchased from him, within the last two years, for the Intercolonial?

Mr. POPE. 4,905 cubic feet of white pine timber, at 15 cents per cubic foot; 8,803 cubic feet red pine, at 18 cents; 129,810 feet board measure tracks, stringers, and cross-ties, at $34.75 per thousand feet; 6½ standard deals, at $24; 15,000 feet board measure deals, at $9.60; 1,500 white pine boards, at $24; 500 feet board measure spruce, at $14 per thousand feet; 1,285 feet rock elm, at $42 per thousand feet; 2,000 feet rock elm, at $35 per thousand feet; 7,400 lineal feet of red pine, at 4 cents per foot; 920 lineal feet red pine timber piles, at 2 cents; 8,572 lineal feet red pine timber piles, at 11 cents; 2,134 lineal feet pine timber, at 11 cents. Inspected and received by Charles D. Wilson and Piton. Smith was paid $9,635.25 for wood.

WIRE FENCING FROM LÉVIS TO RIVIÈRE DU LOUP.

Mr. GAUDET asked, Whether it is true that the contract for wire fencing from Lévis to Rivière du Loup, has been awarded to Mr. Atkinson?

Mr. POPE. Yes; the contract was offered to him, as being the lowest tenderer for the work.

ELGIN STATION, L'ISLET.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to build a station for passengers and freight at Mr. IVES.

the stopping place on the Intercolonial Railway, called "Elgin Station," in the county of L'Islet?

Mr. POPE. It is not the intention of the Government at present to build a station there.

COAL INTERESTS IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton) moved for:

Statement showing the quantity of coal carried over the Intercolonial Railway each year since 1880, for the Spring Hill and other collieries in the county of Cumberland, Nova Scotia; the stations at which the same has been delivered, and the quantity delivered at each station; the rate per ton per mile at which such coal was carried for the several collieries. Also a similar statement of the quantity of coal carried from each colliery in the county of Pictou. Also a statement showing the number of coal cars built for the Intercolonial Railway coal traffic, and employed thereon, and the cost of such cars."

He said: The information I seek by the motion which I have just read to the House is one of very great importance to the people I have the honor to represent, and I am, therefore, obliged to trouble the House with a few remarks. The coal industry of the older Provinces of the Dominion, as is well known, is principally confined to three counties in the Province of Nova Scotia, the largest proportion of which has been heretofore prosecuted in the county of Cape Breton, the other counties being Cumberland and Pictou. The estimated extent of the coal fields of Nova Scotia now under lease from the Crown is about 245 square miles. Of this there is situate in the county which I have the honor to represent about 130 square miles; in the county of Cumberland, 65 square miles; and in the county of Pictou, 27 square miles. Thus it will be seen that the coal-bearing property in which capital is invested and being developed in the county of Cape Breton is double that of Cumberland and more than four times that of Pictou. In connection with the opening of the coal fields of Cape Breton, the building of railways, the equipment of those railways and the opening of harbors and building of wharves, and such other facilities as have been required in connection with the operation of those mines, there has been about $15,000,000 of private capital expended. In this connection about seventy miles of railway were built and equipped without a single dollar of public aid of any kind. The harbor of Port Caledonia was opened and kept open at a cost of about $160,000; the harbor of Little Glace Bay, likewise, at a cost of upwards of $100,000; the harbor of Lingan at a cost of about $100,000. Several other large piers and wharves were built at a very heavy cost to the coal operators and without any public aid whatever, except in the case of the Cow Bay breakwater, which is now maintained by grants from this Parliament, but which cost the private company who first undertook it upwards of $50,000. In order to further illustrate to the House the extent and importance of the Cape Breton coal field, I will read a short quotation from a report on the "Mineral Resources of Canada:"

"Sydney Coal Field.—Mr. Robb estimates the area of the productive coal measures of the Sydney coal field at 200 square miles, being about 32 miles long and 6 miles wide, limited on three sides by the Atlantic Ocean. This coal field forms the southern extremity of an extensive area for the most part hidden under the ocean, but nearly all the seams can be followed, and mining rights have been taken out covering above 100 square miles of the submarine coal. Mr. Poole, in a report to the Commissioner of Mines, says that, assuming a line of three miles from the shore to be the boundary of profitable working 4,000 feet the available depth, and no seam under three feet thick to be worked, and taking into consideration all geological facts as ascertained from other coal-yielding investigations elsewhere, the submarine coal field of Cape Breton is capable of yielding 1,866,000,000 tons."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the people engaged in this industry of Cape Breton complain that they have not at the hands of this Legislature the consideration to which the peculiar circumstances in which they are placed by reason of the geographical position of their country entitle them, and the comparatively unfavorable position in which they are situate with those engaged in the same industry in the other coal counties of Nova Scotia. The work of the Cape Breton collieries is confined almost entirely to the summer and fall months, the only means by which they can place the product of those mines in the market being only by water; and the navigation of the Cape Breton coast, east and north, and where those mines chiefly lie, being interrupted by ice during the greater part of the winter and spring months, their mines have to remain in comparative idleness during those months, while the mines of the counties of Cumberland and Pictou may be worked every month and every day in the year, as they enjoy the privilege of being able to send their coal to market without interruption, and by a railway built, equipped and operated at the public expense. This railway has been built at the expense of the people of Cape Breton as much as that of the same number of people in any part of the Dominion, and I would say to a much larger extent at their expense than that of any section of Nova Scotia; and what they now complain of is that it is maintained and operated more than, proportionately, at their expense, and to the serious detriment of their interests in the successful development of their collieries. This state of matters does not only affect the people who put their capital in those mines, but it has a most serious effect on the interests of the people who do the work of mining, and who have to maintain themselves and families with the earnings of their hard and arduous labors, as their earnings and employment must largely be governed by the profits or losses of the capitalists who employ them. That the House may better understand the risk to which some of those people are obliged to expose themselves, I will read a paragraph from an article written on this subject and in relation to the working of one of those mines, that of the Sydney Mines:

"The mines have been worked by British capital for nearly a century, and the excavations from which the coal has been removed year after year now extend for several miles underground. The main shaft is situated about the centre of operation, and a rough idea of the extent of the underground works may be formed by the knowledge that the coal cutters and other underground workmen have to travel from four to five miles under ground after they have reached the bottom of the shaft—itsself over 900 feet deep. In sailing into Sydney harbor the mariner seldom recollects that he is passing over a hollow bottom, supported on pillars, and that beneath his ship are hundreds of busy workmen, boys and horses. Yet such is the case, the underground works being pushed out several miles under the ocean. The coal of this mine has long been known as holding a first place amongst the most famous of coals for steam purposes and domestic use. This, together with its peerless harbor, situated in the direct line of the European and North American shipping, is what has made the port of North Sydney the greatest port of call in North America for ships engaged in the trans-Atlantic trade."

The number of men employed in the Nova Scotia coal mines in the year 1884 was 5,012; of this number there were employed in the county which I represent, 2,511. It will thus be seen that more than half the people engaged in this industry are among the constituents of my hon. colleague from Cape Breton and myself; and the successful development of those mines is not only of interest to those who are directly engaged in them, but also, and to a very large extent, to the farming population, who find the principal market for the products of their labor in those mines, and as well to those of our people who are engaged in commercial and mercantile pursuits. My attention has been called to a report of an interview held by representatives of the Board of Trade of Montreal with the hon. Minister of Railways some weeks ago, and published in a Montreal paper, where the hon. Minister is reported to have, in reply to a question asked by a gentleman named McLea, said as follows:—

"It is for the benefit of Montreal and for the benefit of the Dominion that we should bring these goods over our railway, and to do so we have been obliged to carry raw sugars at a lower rate than we could afford to bring them until a year ago. This last year there was 2½ per cent. put on sugars landing at a foreign port and being brought into Canada. That enabled us to get something like a fair rate and secure more of the business of bringing sugars into Canada. It is exactly so with many other articles. For instance, we have in the Lower Provinces large quantities of iron ore. We manufacture iron; we wish to develop those interests, and it is carried at a rate that does not pay us; the rates are too low. It is the same with coal. If we charge a rate on coal that would pay we should not be able to bring any coal, but we bring coal at a low rate because we want to develop that great industry in the Lower Provinces, and you gentlemen in Montreal get the benefit of it."

I appreciate very much the motives by which the hon. Minister of Railways is actuated. I agree with him that every consideration in this respect should be given to an industry of the importance that our coal industry is; but when the application of the policy of the hon. Minister of Railways, as in the present instance, has the effect of largely and seriously discriminating in favor of one section of the people and against another section engaged in the same industry, I say the good intention of the hon. Minister is misplaced, and I, therefore, have to disagree with him. I do not know when the present Intercolonial Railway coal rates were brought into operation, but I presume it is not many years ago; and in order to show to the House the effect which those rates have on the development of those of our mines situate in the county which I represent, I will give the quantity of coal shipped by the Cape Breton and Cumberland collieries respectively during the last three years to the Quebec market:

"In the year 1883, Cape Breton shipped to Quebec (which includes Montreal, all by water), 218,695 tons; in 1884, 152,605 tons; in 1885, 215,254 tons.

"In the year 1883, Cumberland shipped to Quebec and Montreal, 46,483 tons; in 1884, 104,243 tons; in 1885, 163,301 tons."

It will thus be seen that to the present rate at which coal is carried over the Intercolonial Railway from Spring Hill to Quebec and Montreal the large increase in the sales of that mine may be attributed, and to the fact that they have in consequence been able to supply those markets which were principally supplied by the mines in Cape Breton previously—that it has been the means of shutting out the Cape Breton coal to a corresponding extent. Since the adoption of the present duty on foreign coal the shipments from Cape Breton to the Province of Quebec have increased from 28,208 tons in 1878 to 218,695 tons in 1883, and since 1883 they have decreased as I have already shown. It will, therefore, be seen that this decrease may fairly be attributed to the Intercolonial Railway rates which is contended by the hon. Minister of Railways is in the interest of the coal industry of Nova Scotia, while instead it is solely in the interest of the Spring Hill company. I am informed that the loss in the operation of the Intercolonial Railway is caused almost entirely by the carrying of coal at rates which does not meet the expense; and in order to support my contention I will take the liberty of reading to the House a quotation from the report of the "Buffalo, New York and Philadelphia Railway Company":

"The report of this company is for the year ending September 30th, 1885. The report clearly shows that a leading cause of the financial difficulties of the company is the unprofitable nature of the bituminous coal trade, in which it is deeply interested as a carrier and owner of coal properties. It was chiefly on account of the great increase of injurious competition between rival bituminous coal interests that a great reduction in average freight rates occurred. Bituminous coal furnished 944,700 of the 3,417,975 tons moved in 1885, and 1,061,625 of the 2,376,534 tons moved in 1884, and most of this coal is transported over comparatively long distances.

"The number of tons of freight of all classes moved one mile, and earnings per ton of freight per mile, during the last three years have been as follows:—

	Total tons one mile.	Earning per ton of freight per mile.
1885.....	276,994,830	0.691 mills
1883.....	171,975,117	1.050 mills

"The total freight earnings were $1,649,842.83 in 1885, $1,854,114.09 in 1884, and $1,795,737.87 in 1883. So that a rapid increase in the amount of freight carried one mile has been accompanied with a material decline in the freight receipts. If the average rates obtained in 1883 had been received for the freight service in 1885, the freight receipts of that year would have been $2,908,445.71, or $1,258,602.88 more than the sum actually obtained. The deficiency of the company for the fiscal year 1885, as stated in the report, was $554,672.68, or considerably less than half the difference between the freight receipts of 1885 and the sum that would have been earned on the tonnage of that year if the rates of 1883 had been maintained. Similar calculations have often been made in reference to other roads. They possess comparatively little practical significance, but they help to point out one of the most serious difficulties with which many American railway managers are obliged to contend, to explain one of the most prolific causes of railway bankruptcy, and to show why such sudden transitions occasionally occur in the market value of the securities of some of the lines of this country.

"Another reflection suggested by the report of the Buffalo, New York and Philadelphia is that its rates for carrying bituminous coal were presumably much below its low average rate of 0.601 mills per ton per mile. The total amount of freight carried in 1885 is classified as follows:—Anthracite coal, 209,475 tons; bituminous coal, 944,700; stone and lime, 55,183; iron and castings, 92,962; hay and grain, 111,966; merchandise and manufactures, 261,195; lumber, 401,398; crude oil, 195,513; refined oil, 94,538; iron and other ores, 23,104; live stock, 4,041; miscellaneous articles, including bark, 23,930—total, 2,417,975 tons. In referring to miscellaneous freight traffic the report says: 'Fortunately, your miscellaneous local tonnage, which affords better rates, has been developed and improved; the improvement and growth continue steadily, so that the loss on coal traffic is more than met by the revenue from other classes of traffic, as will be seen by comparison of freight earnings, 1884 and 1885, on page 4. This is a healthy sign. It has been the effort of your management to develop, encourage and foster local traffic, thereby placing your road in such position that it can handle its full proportion of competitive coal tonnage at a minimum of cost, and thus retain its tonnage without loss.'

"As these statements show that the bituminous coal was carried at rates considerably below 0.601 mills per ton per mile, and as other statements, made at various times, indicate that even less than half that rate was obtained for some of the bituminous coal movements of last year, intelligent readers are furnished with data for forming an opinion in regard to the justice of the outcry against efforts to improve the condition of the bituminous coal trade, and to ensure for bituminous coal carriers sums that approach a reasonable remuneration for the service they perform."

Applying the same arguments and reasoning to the Inter-colonial Railway, the contention that the loss is caused by the increase in the tonnage of coal carried over the road, is strongly supported, and it is both fair and reasonable that we should expect of the hon. Minister of Railways a different state of things for the future. Our people in Cape Breton have to make up their share of this loss, while it has the effect of crippling the successful prosecution of their own work. Our principal markets are in the Province of Quebec, and we have a right to control a fair share of them, while it is to the advantage of the Dominion generally that the capital invested in those enterprises should be fairly and economically protected. Our sales in 1885 have been, by counties:

	Tons.
Cape Breton, sales.....	517,975
Cumberland ".....	340,535
Pictou ".....	396,000
	<hr/>
	1,254,510

Our principal markets are as follows:—

Nova Scotia.....	444,652
New Brunswick.....	148,634
Newfoundland.....	74,322
Prince Edward Island.....	52,770
Quebec.....	493,917
West Indies.....	5,732
United States.....	34,483

This is not the only instance in which the Spring Hill Company have succeeded in influencing legislation in their own favor to an unreasonable extent and at the same time to the disadvantage of the people of Cape Breton. When they applied to the Parliament of Nova Scotia for a grant towards the construction of a railway in connection with their mine, some years ago, they have received some $144,350 towards that work. This they have received with the consent of the representatives from the Island of Cape Breton, who were at the same time promised a corresponding aid towards their railway; but, unfortunately, the Spring Hill people got their grant and their railway, and the people of Cape Breton did not get one dollar for a mile of railway. This is not all. Only a year ago an investigation was made in the Provincial Legislature of Nova Scotia into the payments made by the different coal companies in Mr. McDougall (Cape Breton).

that Province, on account of the royalties paid into the Provincial treasury, the result of which was to prove that the Spring Hill Company, on a basis of a fraction less than 10 cents per ton, which they were obliged to pay under the Provincial laws, succeeded in getting off with the payment of only 6.55 cents royalty per ton on their coal, while the Cape Breton companies paid at the rate of 8.90 cents. The Cape Breton collieries paid on 613,367 tons the rate of 8.90 cents per ton, while the Spring Hill Company paid on 177,673 tons at the rate of 6.55 cents per ton. This is the manner in which the Spring Hill Company have managed to use the Legislatures of the Province to their own interest, as they are endeavouring to use this Parliament in the same way. I feel it, therefore, to be my duty, on behalf of my constituents, who have such an important interest in this matter, to seek the information which I now ask for, and at the same time to urge on the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways the consideration of those interests, which mean the bread of life to the most of the hard-working, honest, and industrious people I represent in this House—a consideration which, I am sorry to say, they have not had in the past, neither in this House nor in the Provincial Legislature of the Province. This is a state of things which is not only the contention of the people of Cape Breton, but is admitted by people outside of Cape Breton, as I will show from an authority outside of that place, and therefore a disinterested one. A paper published outside of Cape Breton says, under the heading of "Cape Breton's relation to Nova Scotia proper:—"

"In the eastern part of Cape Breton there are a few railways built by coal companies for the purpose of carrying coal. These lines were all built entirely at the expense of the companies themselves; not one dollar did they receive from the public purse. Every ton of coal they sell pays a tax to the Provincial Treasury. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have thus been contributed to the revenue of the Province by Cape Breton companies. Not a dollar of this, however, has any Local Government of Nova Scotia used in building, or in assisting in building, railways in the Island of Cape Breton; nor spent any portion of it in any other manner calculated to develop the vast and varied resources of that Island.

"Now, it is well known that the Local Government of this Province has not still possession of the hundreds of thousands of dollars that in years past were contributed to the Treasury by Cape Breton. Our local rulers are not burdened with the care of the cash collected in other days, for the very good reason that that cash has been spent, chiefly, in building railways throughout Nova Scotia proper, partly in opening up a coal mine in Nova Scotia proper, that its produce might enter into competition with that of Cape Breton!

"From thinking of these and other things that have occurred within our own recollection, the conclusion forces itself upon us that either we in Nova Scotia proper are very unjust towards Cape Breton, or else Cape Breton is very charitable and our public works depend on her alms. If we have been unjust for so many years, we should now make an effort for once to be just to the mineral isle; if we have been living on her alms, it is high time we should show at least the gratitude of respect. As matters have been, it would really seem that the relation of Cape Breton to us has been that of patron to mendicant."

In the face of this condition of matters affecting the coal interests of Cape Breton, I beg to offer the opinion to the hon. Minister of Railways, that the only way by which he can successfully assist in the development of the coal and iron industries—and at this stage I would say that the iron in Cape Breton is unsurpassed for quantity and quality in any part of the Dominion—by means of the powers given him by this Legislature, is by extending into the Island of Cape Breton that system of railway which is so much in the service of the Spring Hill Company. Such a policy will have a general and beneficial effect, and by carrying it out the hon. Minister of Railways will do his duty to the coal and iron industries of the Dominion.

Mr. POPE. I can only say to my hon. friend, so far as the Government are concerned, that they have listened to his speech with very great attention, and it has been very interesting. Many of the points he has brought out I knew very little of before. We feel that the coal interests, not only of the main land, but of Cape Breton, are of great importance to this part of the country, and every consideration will be given to this subject and to the rates to be imposed. My hon. friend said we were to bring the railway to that part of the country. I can only say to him what I have said before, that everything we can do we shall do to facilitate the building of the road in Cape Breton, and I hope that before very long my hon. friend's wish will be realised, and that he will see a railway in his part of the country. I have no objection to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

SUBSTITUTES FOR BUTTER.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to bring in a Bill to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, butterine or other substitutes for butter.

He said: The Bill which I wish to introduce is intended to protect the agriculturists of Canada from one of the most glaring frauds ever perpetrated in this country. While it is intended to afford protection to the farmers and dairymen, it will not in any way injure the consumers of butter and cheese. The dairying industry is one of the largest, if not the largest, of our Canadian industries, to-day. I see by the Trade and Navigation Returns, that the exports of butter and cheese, after supplying the trade of Canada, amounted to the enormous sum of about $10,000,000. We exported last year, of butter, 8,145,310 lbs., amounting in value to $1,577,423, and of cheese 79,655,367 lbs., amounting in value to $8,265,240, making a total value of $9,742,668. I have a table showing the quantity of butter exported from Canada each year since 1874, which, with the permission of the House, I will hand in to the reporter, and save the time of reading it:

Year.	Number of lbs.	Value.
1874.....	12,233,046	$2,620,305
1875.....	9,268,044	2,337,324
1876.....	12,250,066	2,540,894
1877.....	14,691,789	3,073,409
1878.....	13,008,626	2,382,237
1879.....	14,307,977	2,101,897
1880.....	18,535,362	3,058,069
1881.....	17,649,491	3,573,034
1882.....	15,161,839	2,936,156
1883.....	8,106,447	1,705,817
1884.....	8,075,537	1,612,481
1885.....	8,145,310	1,577,428

I have also a table showing the quantity of cheese exported during the last five years, which I will also hand in:

Year.	Value.
1881.....	$6,091,534
1882.....	5,979,537
1883.....	7,025,035
1884.....	7,823,620
1885.....	8,902,115
Total.....	$35,821,841

The total exports of butter for the last five years amounted to $11,404,916, and of cheese to $35,821,844, making a total of $47,226,760; so that, on an average, about $10,000,000 worth of butter and cheese was exported each year during the last five years, after supplying the trade of the country. The exports of animals and their produce for last year—which all largely depend on the dairying industry of the country, besides the great benefit accruing to the land on which cattle for dairying purposes are kept—amounted to the large sum of $26,503,994. This, Mr. Speaker, is the largest money value of any article exported. I see, by the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1885, that the value of animals and their produce was $26,503,994; of the produce of the forest, $22,373,305; of agricultural products, $19,120,366; of the fisheries, $7,976,313; of the mines, $3,836,470, and of manufactures, $3,794,229. It will thus be seen that the dairying industry is one of vital importance to Canada. Up to the present time the dairying industries of Canada have been sufficiently protected against honest competition; but, owing to the enormous quantities of oleomargarine, butterine and other substitutes which are now being manufactured in the United States, the dairy interests of Canada are in danger of being seriously crippled, if not altogether ruined. I will just read the opinions of some excellent authorities on this matter. At the meeting of the National Dairy and Agricultural Convention, held in New York city, on Tuesday, 16th February, 1886, the chairman, Mr. Joseph H. Reall, made the following statements:—

“For ten years the manufacture of artificial butter has been growing until dairymen everywhere find their vocations almost ruined. The 18,000,000 milch cows in the country have depreciated $10 per head, and the land on which they are kept, something over 75,000,000 acres, worth nominally $50 an acre, has declined 25 per cent. These reductions represent a loss of $1,000,000,000. This is not brought about through honest and fair competition, but in consequence of the most outrageous and glaring fraud that can be practiced, for the substitute is not sold to the consumer for what it is, but as butter. The people of New York city alone are paying not less than $10,000,000 for the stuff they suppose to be butter, and which brings to the manufacturer one-half profit. Some 700 grocers of the city have refused to deal in the article. Boston, New York, New Haven, Cleveland, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Louisville and St. Louis have large bogus butter factories, while Chicago manufactures more bogus butter than all the other cities together. Something must be done to stop the encroachment upon the dairy interests of artificial butter.”

Commissioner Coleman, of the United States Agricultural Department, in his report for this year, says:

“The manufacture of injurious compounds of fat, which are being shipped as genuine butter, threatens the legitimate dairy interests of America.”

Mr. Littler, in his annual report, gave statistics of the butter and cheese trade of Chicago. In regard to butterine, the report was only approximate, but his information had come from reliable sources, and were as near correct as possible. From May 1, 1883, to May 1, 1884, the manufacture of butterine amounted to 10,000,000 lbs.; from May 1, 1884, to May 1, 1885, it was 13,000,000 lbs.; and from May 1, 1884, to May 1, 1885, the amount can be safely estimated at 20,000,000 lbs. The Americans are now taking steps to pass stringent laws to protect the dairy interests of their country. This may, and no doubt will, have the effect of forcing the stuff into Canada. In consequence of this glaring fraud which is being carried on, it is the duty of this House to take immediate steps in order to protect our legitimate dairy products. I have given, Sir, some considerable attention to this subject in the interest of the farmers in general and of my constituents in particular, who are largely interested in the manufacture of both butter and cheese. I consequently urged upon the attention of the Government the necessity of moving in the matter and read to them the following letter from the president of the Farmers' Institute and secretary of the Gananoque Cheese Board. Speaking of oleomargarine he says:

“Our farmers and dairymen are very anxious something should be done to prevent the sale of it in Canada except under its true name and not passed off as butter. I was informed that it was, or could be, delivered in Gananoque now at 14 cents per pound—was told by a grocery man that it had been offered him at that price—so you see pure butter cannot compete with it. I am credibly informed that the factory in Chicago manufactured 20,000,000 lbs. last year, and the one about to be built in Montreal by New York men will have a capital of $500,000.”

I asked, at the same time, that an Excise and Customs duty of 10 cents per pound be placed on all oleomargarine, either imported or manufactured in the country; and I am glad to say that the Government, true to its protective policy—the National Policy—came down with a resolution placing a Customs duty of 10 cents and an Excise duty of 8 cents per pound on all these substitutes. For this act I am sure they will receive the thanks of every farmer in Canada. In order that our people may know what they eat when they use this oleomargarine, I will, with your permission, read a few extracts from American papers, because I find, in conversation with hon. members of this House, that they know very little about this oleomargarine business :

"The Ohio State Grange held its 13th annual session at Cincinnati last week, and took hold of the bogus butter question with a vim that promises good results. Mr. F. A. Derthick, the delegate from Portage County, on his return home, last Friday, left with us a copy of the petition adopted, and which on Monday of this week was being circulated in every county of the State. Two thousand copies were printed and the delegates took home enough to supply their respective counties. Following is a copy of the petition, and it is commendable for its comprehensiveness and brevity.

"We, the undersigned, members of the Ohio State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, and Farmers of Ohio, do represent that the dairy interests of our State are being destroyed by the manufacture and sale of fraudulent butter, inasmuch as packages claiming to be, and marked, as pure butter are placed upon the market in direct competition with the pure product, thus deceiving the consumer and perpetrating a great wrong upon the people.

"We therefore petition and ask, as our right, adequate protection and relief from this and all similar unjust and illegal practices.

"We also petition the appointment of a Dairy Commissioner, with proper compensation, whose duty it shall be to see that all laws concerning adulterated food, especially the product of the dairy, are rigidly enforced."

"It will be seen that the petition is worded so that all farmers can sign it, whether members of the Grange or not. The State Grange is to be commended for its prompt and decisive action in behalf of a prostrate industry. Any one desiring a copy of this petition can secure it from any subordinate Grange, or by writing to the Secretary, T. R. Smith, Delaware, O."

Another article says :

"Dairymen need not fear oleomargarine made of pure milk and beeswax. There is absolutely none of it made now. It costs too much. Cheaper grease must be employed—lard, oils of various kinds, gelatine, and even vaseline. The health officer of this city recently analysed a sample of bogus butter, and found it to be composed largely of vaseline, a product of petroleum. A man in Chicago recently showed a Tribune reporter what Chicago butter is made of. It was taken from a box branded 'Wauwatosa Dairy,' that weighed nine pounds, and cost $1.50, or 16½ cents per pound. It had a little pure butter in it, but nine-tenths of it was composed of lard, cracklings, pieces of intestines of hogs, short pieces of bristles and hairs, and pieces of pork. This man, S. H. Long, of 261 South Water street, stated that the men who made this bogus stuff didn't care what kind of offal they put into it. If a hog died of cholera, so much the better. They could buy the carcass cheap, and it would make just as much butter as a healthy carcass. Its manufacture is carried on in Chicago on a large scale, and the profits are enormous. The manufacturers are getting rich at the expense of farmers who are making no effort to protect themselves. Not a factory in this country uses pure beef suet alone. There is not enough of it obtainable to seriously affect the market."

The New York Tribune of December 23rd, 1885, has an editorial showing the quantity that is manufactured in that locality :

"There are five firms in this neighborhood which have prosperous oleomargarine manufactories. They are Van Riper & Co., of Nos. 3 and 5 Front-st.; Morris I. Nathan & Co., of No. 24½ Grove-st.; E. Lanferty & Co., of No. 188 West Houston-st.; Arnsburg & Co., of Brooklyn; and P. H. McGaun, of Brooklyn. These five factories are not running at their full capacity, owing, the firms say, to the unfortunate agitation made by the dealers in pure butter and the State Dairy Commission against the sale of their bogus product. Nevertheless, despite unfavorable circumstances, according to Nathaniel Waterbury, who sells oleomargarine at wholesale at No. 115 Warren-st., these five factories manage to grind out and put upon the market about 1,000 packages of bogus butter a day. In addition to this the receipts of the compound from the enterprising West, especially Chicago, are no small item."

Then, Sir, I would like to read a letter received from Professor Barré, who makes butter and cheese a speciality :

"I am very much pleased to see that you intend to submit to the House a Bill to prevent the illegal sale of butter substitutes. Such laws are now wanted in Canada. I presume you have read the Bill standing now before the United States Congress to regulate the sale of dairy adulterations and substitutes. If you have not, please let me know and I will send you a copy of it. You cannot have a too rigid Bill against such productions. And unless the services of some commissions to enforce the law is available, legislation will have no effect. Wishing you success in your undertaking,

"I remain, Sir,

"Yours very truly,

"S. M. BARRÉ."

I asked him for a copy of the Bill before Congress, and received this reply :

Mr. TAYLOR.

"In reply to your favor of March 31st I would say: I can do nothing better than to send you a scrap book which contains that margarine question drawn pretty fine. You will find three margarine Bills already passed in the Legislature of New York, one new pending in Congress, and also another passed lately in England.

"The oleomargarine war began in the State in 1879. This war has already cost $90,000, and in spite of all legislation there is more bogus butter now sold in the State than ever was before 1879. From a thorough study of this question I am fully convinced that as long as it is allowed to be made it will be palmed off upon the public as dairy butter. You may oblige the manufacturer to brand it, he may sell it for what it is, but the retail grocer buys it, knocks the package and mark to pieces—and there it stands requiring an expert to detect it from butter. Since we cannot legislate direction against such production, I would rise the Excise as high as 10 cents on every pound manufactured—for remember that the profit on the stuff is very large.

"I will mail that scrap book along with appreciation of my book by the next courier.

"Yours very truly,

"S. M. BARRÉ,"

I have not received that yet, but expect it by the next mail. I presume the committee will recommend the Bill, and perhaps appoint a special committee to consider it. I may just say that this bogus butter business not only threatens the butter business of this country, but also the cheese industry, from the fact that they are making bogus cheese, as the secretary of the Gananoque Cheese Board informs me. He writes me :

"I did not notice in your Bill that you had mentioned cheese as well as butter, which should be mentioned, as by that process they manufacture a beautiful curd. I have seen some made in some of the factories; you will see it in our petition, also in the printed slips. Hoping that you will succeed and that the prayer of our petition will be carried out, etc."

Again he says :

"At the present time the New York men are shipping, as stated in Montreal, the oleo products in a fluid state to Holland, where it is manufactured and shipped to England, and there is now a cargo on its way returning to New York."

I hold that Professor Barré is right, and I am glad the Government has given notice that factories manufacturing this stuff must be licensed. But I think that further provision should be made for inspection, both when it comes into the country through the Customs and in the hands of the retail dealers. Such provision has been made in the United States. Mr. Logge writes :

"I may draw your attention to the fact that the New York Legislature have voted the amount of $100,000 to be expended in convicting those that are selling the article as butter. They have paid $50,000 to the commissioner who is doing the work, and I understand there have been over 2,000 convictions already, and some of them are appealing to higher courts."

In order to gather some statistics in reference to this matter, I called upon the Commissioner of Customs, the other day, to enquire as to the amount that was brought into this country, but he told me that he could not answer the question, as most, if not all, of it was imported under the name of grease, lard, oil and other things of that kind; but, since the Government came down with their resolutions, he told me, the day before the resolutions were passed, that a large quantity had been passed through the Customs in Montreal, and I have been informed that three car loads have since been stopped on the way there. I was in hopes that this Bill would meet with universal approval, both in this House and in the country, but, to my surprise, when home on Saturday, I found one of our local papers out with an article in opposition to the action taken by the Government in dealing with this question. I will read the article, because I wish it to go on record. The Gananoque Reporter of Saturday, April 3rd, said :

"A writer in yesterday's Journal under the assumed name of 'Farmer,' takes a whack at the 'bogus' butter makers, and tells the same dismal tale that has been so often told at the agricultural meetings held in this vicinity. Having already discussed this matter in public and private for past three months, we are not disposed at present to go into an argument with 'Farmer,' especially as the result of our discussions, so far, has been to convince us that the farmers are not interested in the subject, and that neither 'Farmer' nor we know much of the matter. But we cannot avoid calling 'Farmer's' attention to the absurdities of his statements. He gives as a reason why the Government should prohibit the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine, that farmers' sons served as volunteers in the North-West last year. That is an idea so 'far fetched' that we wonder he found it even in the North-West. Next he asks what the Canadian dairymen are to do? and says 'they are ruined if they sit still and wait.' The way he claims they are to be ruined is, that factories for making butter will be started in this country, or the butter will be imported. This is absurd, from the fact that farmers here do not follow butter-making as a business, and would not be 'ruined' if the whole supply of butter came from outside parties. Even dairy business, as carried on here, means only the making of cheese; and what little butter is made, is the incidental product of Sunday's milk. A large proportion of farmers do not make butter for their own use during the cheese season, and have none to sell at any time. How, then, can they be 'ruined' by the introduction of butter from other sources? The fact is, that butter-making as a business has been run down. Canadian butter has not a good reputation in foreign markets, because it has not been made on the same systematic principles as cheese, and has no uniformity of look, consistency, flavor, or keeping quality. It is an uncertain article to export, and those who try it are liable to lose money. Then to make exclusively for the home market is unsatisfactory to the farmers, as a very little supplies the demand, and pulls down the price. In the spring the price is generally high, and sometimes, as at present, it is almost impossible to obtain butter at any price. But as the milk increases the price falls, even after the cheese factories commence operations. For these reasons it pays farmers better to devote their attention to cheese and grain and cattle; and this they will do so long as they can make most money at it. Farmers are not going to make butter for mere accommodation of consumers, nor out of spite to the oleomargarine manufacturers. But when the time comes that they can see it to their interest to go into butter-making as a business, they will do it; and we believe when they do, and make butter on the same plan and with similar appliances as cheese is now made, they will attain reputation and prices equal to those enjoyed by cheese makers, and without appreciable interference from oleomargarine.

"In the meantime, we do not see what object can be gained by raving against those who supply a want not otherwise provided for. If one-tenth of the statements of 'Farmer' are true, as to the 'filth' and 'adulterations' of oleomargarine, it should be prohibited of course. But with all the denunciation and clamor, we have never yet seen nor heard anything to show, as a fact, that oleomargarine is not as pure, as healthful, and in every way as proper an article of food as butter is. That it should be labelled by its proper name is only reasonable, as people have a right to know what they are buying. But to stop its sale, and thereby deprive of it those who cannot afford high-priced butter, besides preventing the establishment of factories and employment of hands, and this on plea of protecting an industry that does not exist, seems to be the height of folly."

Now, with the inconsistencies contained in the article I have just read I will not deal at present, having occupied the attention of the House for a considerable length of time; but I will leave it to the farmers in its locality to say whether they are interested in the subject of butter making or not, and whether, after supplying the trade of Canada and exporting over $1,500,000 worth of butter, it is a benefit to them or not, or whether the quality of the butter made by the people in this country is good or not. This I will leave to the farmers to settle. They are as intelligent, on the question of butter, as any newspaper man can possibly be; but I do ask that the committee will recommend a Bill that will have the effect of preventing the fraud that is now about to be perpetrated upon the dairy industry of this country.

Mr. FISHER. I think that nobody who has any connection at all with the farming industries of this country can help being very well aware of the fact that at the present day this question of oleomargarine and butterine is of the utmost importance to the dairy interests of our country. It is true that, in the neighboring Republic to the south of us, a very great agitation is being carried on upon this question, and I have no doubt that, as the trade and commerce of that country reacts upon our own almost immediately, the necessary consequence of that agitation in the United States must be a corresponding, or a somewhat similar agitation in this country. So far as I am aware to day, I do not think that there is at this moment any factory in Canada for the manufacture of oleomargarine or butterine, but I am open to correction on this point, because I have not thoroughly enquired into the matter; but I have no doubt that, in the near future, some such factories will be established; and although we may not know of the existence of any such factories here to-day, there may be such factories for the manufacture of this article which they place upon the market without the public knowing what the article is. I think, however, that perhaps the Bill which the hon. member has proposed, and this committee, is hardly necessary, in view of what I see the Government have themselves undertaken. In the first place, I see that the Government, by resolution in Committee of Ways and Means, have placed a duty of 10 cents a pound on oleomargarine and butterine, and that is practically a prohibitory duty. They have gone further and placed an Excise duty of 8 cents a pound upon the manufacture of these articles in this country. Now, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has stated that these articles can be sold at a certain market which he names in this country, for 14 cents a pound, which, with the duty of 10 cents, would bring it up to 24 cents a pound, and that brings the article immediately into competition, not with second or third-class butter, with which it might, perhaps, successfully compete, but with the higher grades of butter which are sold in the ordinary markets of this country. I do not believe that oleomargarine and butterine will be able successfully to compete with really first-class butter in this country or anywhere else. The public at large will, no doubt, be able to appreciate the difference in the quality between this spurious article and the first-class article which the best dairies and creameries of this country produce. But I see, at the same time that the Government has proposed these duties and Excise, they have also placed a resolution on the Order paper, to be moved by the Minister of Inland Revenue:

That no oleomargarine or other substitute for butter shall be manufactured except by persons duly licensed, and that the Governor in Council may make regulations respecting such manufacture and the supervision thereof.

Now, Sir, this, I confess, is a move on which I congratulate the Government. I was glad to see, the other night, that the Minister of Finance had imposed a duty of 10 per cent. on these articles coming into the country, and an Excise of 8 cents. I am also glad to see this resolution of the Minister of Inland Revenue. I understood some time ago that his Department intended to make such a proposition, and I am fully satisfied that such regulations might be made as would meet the object in view. I do not, of course, know whether the hon. member who has just spoken was aware of this, but I think he must have seen this motion upon the paper. Without knowing the details of the Bill which he proposes to introduce, it still seems to me that this notice practically covers the ground. The hon. member shakes his head—of course, as I said, I cannot speak of the details of this Bill until it is introduced. But, Mr. Speaker, anxious as I am to see the agricultural interests, and especially the dairy interest, of the country carefully guarded—and I say this as representing one of the greatest dairy counties in this Dominion, the county, according to the last census, which made the second greatest amount of butter of any county in the Dominion—still I do not wish to see the dairy interest guarded at the expense of any other interest in the Dominion. If any person chooses to put upon the market an article which is not hurtful in itself, and which is properly stamped and shown to be such an article, if it does compete with the producers of butter it will be merely an extra stimulus to them to make a better article with which this spurious article cannot compete. But I do not believe it would be right or wise for this Parliament absolutely to prevent all the people in this country from producing an article which in itself is not hurtful, and which, at the same time, would be stamped so as to show its true nature. I am quite at one with any gentleman in this House who wishes to see that the butterine or oleomargarine are not sold as butter, and do not take the place of butter, because that would be injurious, not only to the dairy interests of the country, but also to the consumers who might be led into buying the spurious article under the impression that it was the genuine article they wanted. But if these articles are stamped so that the public know what they are buying, and if the oleomargarine or the butterine are composed of materials which are not injurious to the health of the consumer, I do not see why the production of these articles should be forbidden in this country, and if it does work any inconvenience to the dairymen of the country, their true remedy would be to manufacture a still better article of butter. Let the dairymen of the country see to it that they make the very best butter possible, and no butterine or oleomargarine can compete with that article. As a matter of fact we know that in the United States where these articles have been very largely put upon the market, they have competed with and injured the sale of lower grades of butter, but I think they have not at all interfered with the sale of the higher classes of butter. That being the case, and seeing that the Government have proposed this resolution, I am not quite prepared, without further explanation at all events, to support the motion of the hon. gentleman. However, it might be well for us to go into committee and see the details of this Bill, and if it is shown that there is a necessity for something further than the Government propose to undertake, I may support the Bill of the hon. member, if it appears that by his Bill he is going to afford greater safety and advantage to the dairy interest of the country, without at the same time interfering with the rights of the consumers.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) is a little out in his calculation in reference to the cost of oleomargarine and butterine. As I do believe they can be manufactured and sold with a reasonable profit at from 10 to 12 cents a pound, and if so, they must come into competition with the lower grades of butter. I understand that the competition is not with the higher grades of butter. They can be manufactured very cheaply, because all kinds of fats are used, whether they be clean or unclean; they are mixed together and purified, and oleomargarine or butterine is one of the products. Now, considering the great interest of the butter market of this country, and the great number of people engaged in it, the competition between our own and other countries in that line, and the gradual falling off in the value of butter, upon which the farmers largely depend for their living, I think that a Bill should be introduced imposing such restrictions as would tend to enhance the value of butter to the farmers of this country. It is a known fact that this article is being introduced into this country in large quantities, that it is to-day in competition with butter, and that it is taking the place of butter in a great many parts of the country. This being the case, I think it is high time that the Legislature should endeavor to remedy the evil. Already the farmers find it difficult to make a living. The manufacture of cheese is not paying them, and the price of butter is going down just in proportion as oleomargarine is brought into the country to take its place. Now, while the restrictions proposed by the Minister of Inland Revenue may be sufficient in one direction to remove this evil, I think they will hardly be sufficient to entirely control this article. I believe they are in the right direction, and if there are those in the country who wish to buy and use oleomargarine and butterine instead of butter, I think they should have the right to do so, but let it be distinctly understood that they know what they are buying; let a stamp and the name be put on each package, so as to clearly show what it is. There is another point upon which I take issue with the hon. member for Brome, when he contends that this article is not injurious to health. I hold the very reverse opinion. As a medical man who has sometimes to consider this question, I believe strongly that many diseases, when closely analysed, are attributable to the articles of food that are used for consumption, about which we know but very little. This article is manufactured from all kinds of fat, it matters not whether tainted or vitiated, because when it is purified it can be used for this purpose. In many instances it may be found upon close investigation that injurious diseases have been conveyed to the human economy through this source. The hon. member who has introduced the resolution which he intends to follow with a Bill is doing great good in the interests of a large number of Canadian people, and the farmers will approve his action. I have had several communications, not only from the farmers, but from influential farmers of the country, expressing the hope that the Bill would be passed, and wondering that a step was not taken earlier for the purpose of protecting the agricultural interests of the country in this direction. I hope the resolution will be adopted, and that such a Bill will be introduced and passed as will give the necessary protection to the large class engaged in the manufacture of butter in the Dominion.

Mr. CASEY. I must agree with both hon. members who have preceded me in thinking that the hon. gentleman who has proposed this resolution is attempting to accomplish a useful work. But I must express my surprise that this action has had to be taken in the first instance by a private member.

Mr. SPROULE. Has not a private member the same right as anybody else?

Mr. CASEY. Undoubtedly he has. But there are other members whose duty it is to attend to such matters without leaving the initiative to private members. We have a Minister of Agriculture, a gentleman specially charged with the duty of looking after the interests of the farmers; and although I am glad the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has taken sufficient interest in the farmers to introduce this motion, I must express my surprise that the Minister of Agriculture, whose duty it is specially to attend to such matters, had not previously brought in a similar resolution and Bill. Of course some of the regulations affect both the Departments of Customs and Excise. Those Departments discharged their duty when their attention was called to the matter by the proposer of the resolution; but the Department of Agriculture, the one primarily interested, does not appear to have taken any steps in regard to the question, but allowed it to be introduced by a private member. I cannot agree, on the other hand, with all that has fallen from the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher). He is right in theory, as a free trader and a political economist, in arguing that we should allow the sale of everything that is not injurious to the public health, providing the consumer knows what he is getting. But we cannot look at the matter properly from the point of view of political economy and free trade, under the present circumstances. The hon. gentleman's argument would be perfectly sound if we were enjoying a system of free trade, and if our tariff was framed according to the rules of political economy. But when that is far from being the case, we have to take matters as they are, and the most we can do is to see that all classes of the community are treated with equal fairness. It was the boast of the promoters of the National Policy, when it was first formulated before the House, that it would protect the agricultural, manufacturing and mining interests, and promote them equally and with absolute fair play to all. As far as that policy has been in operation we have found that great care has been taken of the manufacturing and mining interests. But we have found that equal care has not been taken of the agricultural interests, and I contend that, considering the great advantages that have been given to manufacturers and miners, we, even those of us who are free traders in theory and principle, who do not believe that favors had been justly and properly divided, contend that, having protected and encouraged manufacturing and mining, the Government should apply the same principles of protection and encouragement to the agricultural industry. Holding such views, I wish to urge upon the House that the mere regulation of the trade in oleomargarine and butterine is not sufficient, and that we should also prohibit both the manufacture and importation of those articles in this country. Admittedly the duty of 10 cents per pound on imported oleomargarine will bring it up to about the price of fairly good butter—it may possibly operate as a prohibitive duty. On the other hand the proposed Excise tax of 8 cents per pound would still leave a protection of 2 cents per pound to the Canadian manufacturer of those articles, and although it is not so large as some manufacturers are given, still a profit of 2 cents per pound over and above the natural profit in making those articles would be sufficient to induce the manufacture of the articles in Canada. I understood the mover of the resolution to say that he had heard on good authority that a company was about to start in Montreal with a capital of half a million dollars to manufacture these noxious articles. A company with such a capital will undoubtedly have a large output. Although the bogus article may not compete with the best qualities of butter, still it will compete with the lower, and perhaps with the medium qualities, and the quantity of oleomargarine sold in Canada will displace just that quantity of Canadian-made butter. We have always heard it contended by advocates of the National Policy in regard to all articles, and particularly in regard to butter and perishable articles, that the home market is the best market. We have always been told that the great object of the National Policy was to secure the home market for the home producers. In regard to butter, I want to carry out that principle of the National Policy. We have applied it to manufactures and mines; I want to see it applied all round. Let us give our butter makers the home market; let us secure the best market, the home market, for our farmers, free from competition with those articles I have mentioned, no matter under what name they may go. It has been said that if oleomargarine is labelled the people will not buy it in preference to butter. This argument will not stand. There are people who may be persuaded that oleomargarine is not hurtful to health, and they will buy it in preference to butter if it is cheaper. At all events, those gentlemen who propose to start a large factory in Montreal seem to expect they will be able to sell all they can produce, even if it is marked as such, and every pound of oleomargarine will displace that quantity of second or third-class butter; and as such butter cannot profitably be exported, it will be rendered totally unsaleable. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has given his opinion, as a medical man, that these articles are injurious to health. I hope we shall have further evidence on that point before the question is fully decided. If it can be shown that there is even a reasonable suspicion that these imitation butters are injurious to health, I think their manufacture should be prohibited. My hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) quoted the opinion of Prof. Barré upon the matter, and it strengthens my contention very much. Prof. Barré told him that he was afraid that all attempts to regulate the sale of oleomargarine and have it sold as such and not as butter, must fail, because, although the manufacturer might sell it under its proper name, the retailer who bought it from him would do his best to palm it off as genuine butter. I think there is a great deal in that contention, and I think the opinion of Prof. Barré, as a dairy expert, should have great weight. I quite agree with him, that in all probability all attempts to regulate the sale would fail, and that the stuff would be sold by the retailer to the consumer, at all events, as genuine butter, when it was really one of those horrible compounds of gelatine and petroleum and bristles and other things which the hon. gentleman described. Even at the Customs the hon. gentleman told us deception was practiced, as this stuff was brought in under all sorts of aliases, as grease, lard, oil, etc. The hon. gentleman also gave us some other noteworthy information. He said that the day before the resolution was passed in this House, imposing the new duty on oleomargarine, a large quantity was entered at the Customs—I forget at what port he said—but I think he mentioned several car loads, and he gave as his authority the Commissioner of Customs. If it is a fact that the importers of oleomargarine did in this way take time by the forelock and clear their goods the very day before the duty was put on them, it would almost seem as if they had had some of the same mysterious instincts as to what the Government was going to do that we have seen other importers exercise on former occasions. Those are my views on the question—that seeing we have adopted a protective policy it should be fairly applied all round; that the farmer who produces butter is therefore entitled to protection against the sale of oleomargarine; that, in the opinion of dairy experts, it is impossible to give him that protection by means of any regulation as to inspecting or branding; that even the Customs are, in the present state of things, deceived by the importers as to the real nature of the stuff brought in; that, therefore, the only efficient protection you can give the farmer in this connection, is absolutely to exclude oleomargarine, butterine, etc., from the country and to prevent their manufacture at home. If you begin by licensing an establishment to manufacture oleomargarine, you will find after a time that it is impossible, whatever regulations you may enforce on the manufacturers, to prevent the stuff from getting into circulation as genuine butter. It will be very hard then to withdraw the license and to prohibit the manufacture. If it is to be prohibited at all, it must be done now, while no vested interests have grown up, and when everybody, I believe, is prepared to agree with the proposition that those vested interests should not be allowed to spring up. As showing what the agricultural community have done in the production of butter, and as a reason for giving this protection, I will only call attention to the enterprise which has been exhibited in the establishment of creameries. Both this Government and the Provincial Government have spent large sums of money in instructing the people how to make butter, and the Government of Ontario has established creameries to show by practical experiment how it should be made. The farmers themselves have also clubbed together in some places to establish creameries. I think these industries are entitled to the same consideration at the hands of the House and the Government as other industries in the country which have already received so much consideration.

Mr. HICKEY. I think the speeches which have been made by the mover, as well as by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, show that something should be done in this direction. The butter interest is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, industry in this country; and while we cannot possibly prevent the manufacture of those odious preparations which have been mentioned, I think it is our duty to throw such a protection around the manufacture of butter as may be within our power, such as limiting the manufacture of these articles, as the Government proposes to do, by licensing such establishments. When they are licensed, of course they will see that a proper supervision or inspection is made, I presume, over the articles out of which it is proposed to make these compounds. I think the question of the manufacture of these spurious articles out of hogs or other animals dying of serious diseases, such as cholera or charbon, is an important one, as it is very questionable whether science has been able to discover a method of fully abstracting the deleterious articles which exist in the carcasses of such animals. Take an animal dying, for instance, of charbon. It is impossible, even by burying it several feet under ground, to get rid of the liability of danger, for it is supposed that the grass growing over the carcass will poison other animals. I think, therefore, that it is our duty to protect the people against any risk of this kind. The Bill proposes to regulate the manufacture of these articles, as far as possible, by branding them and making the people who manufacture them sell them for what they are; and if it ranges, as far as price is concerned, with the cheaper classes of butter, the people ought to have the privilege of buying what they choose, but they ought also to be in a position to know whether what they are buying is oleomargarine or pure butter. If it can be made for 6 cents per pound, even, the Excise duty is going to put it below the cheapest kinds of pure butter, and I am told by makers of butter that such is the case. If we always had a good article of oleomargarine, made out of such articles as suet or clean grease, there might be no harm, except as to its coming in conflict with the interests of butter makers. Some hon. gentleman said butter making may not be a necessity to the farmer; he may turn his milk into cheese instead of butter. But I believe a large butter interest will always be of necessity in this country; therefore a Bill, such as the one proposed, is of vast importance to the dairy interest of the country—a Bill providing that these other articles shall be labelled for what they are instead of what they imitate. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) says, why not let the Minister of Agriculture look after this; but I think, from the notices on the paper, that hon. gentleman is looking after the public interests in this matter. While he does not take the ground that it should not be manufactured in the country as it is manufactured in other countries, he proposes to provide that this industry shall be subject to inspection, and that inspection, I suppose, will reach the articles out of which these compounds are made. If they are made out of non-deleterious substances, there cannot be much objection to their getting into the market, the only objection being its coming in competition with butter making. I think, therefore, the Bill is of great importance to the country, and ought to meet, as I believe it will meet, with the concurrence of the House and the assistance of the hon. gentlemen in making it as perfect as possible.

Mr. McMULLEN. The question of regulating the manufacture of butterine, if it is going to be permitted at all, is an important question. The butter interest is a very large one in the Province of Ontario and throughout the entire Dominion, and it is our duty, as far as possible, to protect the farmers from being imposed on with articles of this kind, which are put into competition with second and third qualities of butter. I think the Minister of Agriculture should take up this question; and if the manufacture of these articles is not prohibited altogether, such restrictions should be placed on their manufacture and sale, as would fairly warn buyers exactly what they are buying. If we do not do that, we are going to have an amount of this stuff manufactured and brought into market which will seriously depreciate the value of the product of the farm, and injure the farmers of this Dominion. The raising of cattle and the production of butter and cheese are going to be the principal industries of farmers in the older Provinces. When the North-West is opened up the probabilities are that it will grow almost the entire wheat product of this Dominion, and the farmers of the older Provinces will be compelled to fall back on those industries. While the manufacture of butter imitations is in its infancy, we should restrict it and subject it to such exactions as will prevent it from seriously interfering with agriculturists realising the value of what they produce. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will give his careful attention to this question. The gentleman who brought forward the motion deserves credit for doing so, and I hope every hon. member representing an agricultural constituency will urge on the Government and the House the necessity of protecting the interests of the farming community in the way suggested.

Mr. ALLEN. Being personally interested in the butter interest, and representing an agricultural constituency, I may say that I think the Government ought to prohibit everything in the shape of oleomargarine from coming into the country. The people in the section to which I belong, feel the importance of this matter. We believe that that part of Ontario will shortly have to go largely into the dairy business, therefore the introduction of oleomargarine would be injurious to our people. There is another phase of the question, viz., that there is a large amount of tallow produced in Canada. It sells for from 5 to 6 cents per pound, while it costs from 2 to 3 cents a pound to manufacture it. Oleomargarine can be made in Canada for 8 cents a pound—the best quality for 9 cents. It is made at that cost in the United States at the present time, and it is delivered in Liverpool at 10 to 12 cents a pound for the best quality and 9 cents a pound for fair qualities. That comes into competition there with our butter, which, I am sorry to say, is not always of the best quality. I would not prevent parties in Canada who have tallow on hand, and who desire to make it into butterine, from doing so if they export it; but if they make it to be sold in Canada, I would recommend that the Government should enact such a law as would force the manufacturer to place the name of the material on every package sold, so that the people would know what they are purchasing. I would recommend that the manufacturers, if there are such in Canada, should be allowed to manufacture for export, free of Excise duty. Every encouragement should be given to dairymen to enable them to improve the quality of butter, which is very much needed in Canada. I hope this question will receive the serious consideration of the House. I am glad the hon. member for Leeds has brought the matter before us, and I hope an Act will be passed, based on the resolution, for the benefit of the farmers of Canada.

Mr. GILLMOR. I am really surprised to find so many protectionists on this side of the House. I do not know anything about the component parts of oleomargarine or butterine; I do not know that I ever saw any of it; but I believe this article has come into use from the necessities of the poor in large cities, who are not able to purchase butter, and I do not believe in this measure at all. The only thing we should be careful of is to know whether this article is injurious to health or not. If it is not, I do not know why it should be prohibited. I can understand why hon. gentlemen should be influenced by this principle of protection, because it is going to please the farmers and perhaps some other persons. But I contend that this article does not come into competition with butter among people who buy butter. I do not think any article can be produced which will supplant butter. I think this article is used largely in cities by the very poor, who, if they did not use this, would be unable to buy butter, and would have nothing. If those who use oleomargarine were the electors of this country, you would not find so many to support this proposition, but the classes I speak of are those who get no consideration under protection at all, and no consideration under this measure. I do not want to impute motives to hon. gentlemen, but this is another electioneering dodge. It is another concession to this principle, to my mind, this hateful principle of protection, and therefore I am going to vote against this measure.

Mr. MILLS. It seems to me that when a measure of this sort is made a matter of so much importance, we ought to hear from the hon. gentleman who is supposed to be the patron saint of the farmers, the hon. Minister of Agriculture. Certainly, that hon. gentleman ought to have some information, or be able to express some opinion on behalf of the Government, upon this very important question. Now, we have the proposition on the part of the Government to impose larger duties on oleomargarine and butterine. If the hon. gentleman intended that increased duty for the purpose of preventing the importation and use of an article deleterious to the health of the population, I could understand his position. But that does not appear to be his object. Looking at the action of the Minister of Finance we must conclude that the object of imposing the increased duty on this particular article is to furnish facilities for its production in Canada. If that be true, I would like to know how the Minister of Agriculture can consent to a policy which will tend to encourage the production in Canada of a particular article which is to come most severely in competition with a most important agricultural industry. In a great measure, I agree with the views expressed by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. If this article is not injurious to health, if it can be shown to be harmless, I do not see why we should interfere in the matter at all. It is quite true that parties engaged in various industrial pursuits in Canada may produce articles which come into active competition with each other. That is a necessary consequence. A shoemaker in one village may produce boots and shoes that will come into competition with the boots and shoes produced in another village, and the manufacture of oleomargarine may produce an article which comes into competition with an important article of farm produce. That cannot be helped, but what I object to is that the Government should seek to inhibit the introduction of a particular article, professedly in the interest of the agricultural population, and then promote the manufacture of an article which is to take the place of the inhibited one, and which is equally injurious to our agricultural interests. If the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches have looked into the subject and have become satisfied that the use of oleomargarine is injurious to the health of the population, they should have gone further and prohibited its manufacture and use altogether. Instead of seeking to regulate its manufacture, they ought to inhibit it. Hon. gentlemen are not acting in this matter in the interests of the agricultural population. What they propose to do is to act in the interests of certain parties who wish to invest capital in a particular enterprise, and who proposes to produce in this country an article which the Government say ought not to become an article of general consumption. We are entitled to know the views of the Administration on this question and what policy they intend to pursue.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I had no desire to interrupt what I think has been a very instructive and interesting discussion on the subject raised by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor). For my own part, I feel indebted to the hon. gentleman for the information he has conveyed to me, and I am very glad to see the interest taken in this measure is not confined to this side of the House. With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that if the Government had looked into this matter and become satisfied that this substitute for butter was injurious to health, it was the duty of the Government to prohibit its manufacture as well as its importation, the Government have looked into the matter. They have not come to the conclusion that it is necessarily injurious to health, although it may be made so in the process of manufacture. I would suggest to the mover of the Bill that, inasmuch as I have given notice of dealing with this subject by the resolution which appears upon the notice paper, he should allow me an opportunity, when we reach the resolution, to lay before the House the manner in which the Government intends to deal with the question. I might, while on my feet, state that the Customs duties have been imposed on the foreign article and the Excise duty on what may be manufactured in the country. The question arises as to whether it becomes necessary to treat this as other subjects, and bring it under the inspection of some Department. It does not belong particularly to the Department of Agriculture. If it did simply because it is a product of the farm, we might as well say that the inspection of milk should also belong to that Department. It is just a question of convenience. The Inland Revenue Department has that machinery which is best calculated, at the least increase of expenditure, to secure the inspection of this article. If the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill will be satisfied to leave the matter until the resolution comes up, which, of course, if acceptable to the House, will be followed by a Bill, all the provisions he proposes in his measure, and which will be acceptable to the judgment of the House, might be merged in that Bill, and the Government would undertake the administration of that Act. I do not think, in the first place, there is any reason for the conclusion that this substitute for butter is necessarily injurious to health, but I think it is necessary that, in its manufacture in this country, it should be subject to inspection, not only inspection of the article produced, but of the ingredients from which it is produced. That is the only way by which we can secure a reliable product. I am struck also by the remark from the hon. gentleman from Grey, with regard to an industry which will claim the consideration of this House, as to its privilege of exporting. That is a question which can be easily regulated, because it is well known that on all manufactured goods, subject to Excise duty, an allowance has been made. That point has been considered, and when certain goods are manufactured under the control of the Inland Revenue Department, they may be exported free of duty, by returning the duties in the shape of a drawback. Of course this oleomargarine and all substitutes for butter should be branded, so that the consumer would know exactly what he was buying, but the question still remains open as to whether we should insist that the exporter should brand the article or not, considering that in exporting he goes to a foreign market to compete with the same article there, which is not branded, and therefore has the advantage over him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would spoil the reputation of Canadian butter.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No; it would not go out as butter. With these remarks I would ask the hon. gentleman who introduced this measure, to wait until the resolution on the Order paper comes up.

Mr. CARLING. I feel exceedingly obliged to the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) for the kind attention they have paid to the Department of Agriculture, and the interest they take in agricultural matters. It is the first time I have heard either of those hon. gentlemen take any particular interest in agricultural affairs. I think the hon. gentleman will find that the Minister of Agriculture does take an interest in everything relating to the prosperity of the country, and especially in the prosperity of the agricultural classes. I may have an opportunity before the Session closes of bringing a measure before this House relating to agriculture, in the interests of the farmer, and, as the hon. gentleman takes so great an interest in the Minister of Agriculture, and especially in the Department of Agriculture, I hope he will give me that support which I expect, as he has shown so great an interest in the welfare of the farmer. The matter now before the House is one that has been fully considered by the Government as a whole, and I think they have shown that they take an interest in it by imposing a duty of 10 cents per pound, and an Excise duty of 8 cents per pound. I think they have shown clearly to the House and to the country that they are quite aware of the importance of attending to the introduction of this oleomargarine into the country, and, as this is more particularly connected with the Department of my hon. friend, the Minister of Inland Revenue, I am quite sure that he will see that any adulteration of food in this respect is looked after by his Department. In regard to anything connected with the Department of Agriculture, and the general interests of the country, I am sure that I shall be glad, as the head of that Department, to give it my best attention.

Mr. TAYLOR. After hearing the statements made by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, I am quite willing to accede to the request he has made; but I desire just to refer to an item or two in my Bill, and perhaps I will place the Bill itself in his hands, in order that he may see that the Bill the Government brings in covers all the points. I desire to refer to a statement of the hon. gentleman for Brome (Mr. Fisher), who said I must have seen the notice placed on the paper by the Minister of Inland Revenue at the time that I gave my notice. I think, if my hon. friend will look at the notice paper, he will see that I gave notice on the 12th March, whereas the notice given by the Minister of Inland Revenue is dated, I think, on the 2nd April. My hon. friend the member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) pitched into the hon. Minister of Agriculture for not having dealt with this matter before. Before placing my notice on the paper, I had a consultation with the Minister of Agriculture, and he said: "Perhaps you had better wait until you see what the Government will do." I have yet to learn that private members on this side or on the other side of the House are in the confidence of the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Inland Revenue. I did not know what they would do. I knew what my constituents wanted me to do; and I thought it my duty to move for this committee, and to introduce this Bill. I have yet to learn that a private member has not the privilege of putting that notice on the paper. I am pleased to see that my hon. friends on that side of the House, on the question of protection as well as on all other questions which come before the House, are divided in opinion, as well as their press. I found the press in my county recommending the manufacture and sale of this article in the country. I see that the member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) is surprised to find so many of his friends advocates of protection. In the Bill that I purposed presenting I had made provision that not only the manufacturers and the dealers, but hotel-keepers and others who served this article of food on the table should serve it as some other article than butter, that parties dealing in it should give it some other name; but I am willing to accept the suggestion which has been made, and leave it to be dealt with in the Bill which the Minister will bring in. All I desire is to fully protect the dairy interests of the country.

Mr. BOWELL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

QUEBEC CARTRIDGE FACTORY AMMUNITION.

Mr. CASEY moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Minister of Militia and Defence and any official of the Militia Department, and any officers of Volunteer Corps, whether on active service or not, all officials of Rifle Associations, and other parties, in reference to the character of the ammunition made at the Quebec Cartridge Factory and supplied for use in the field, for practice, or at rifle matches; including reports of all tests of such ammunition made by any such officers or officials of Rifle Associations."

He said: I make this motion for the reason that I have heard during the past season serious complaints from the officials of rifle associations throughout the country as to the character of the ammunition furnished from the Quebec factory. In particular, this was the case with the Ontario Rifle Association. When their annual meeting in Toronto last autumn was about to come off, I was spoken to by some of the gentlemen connected with the association, and was asked to assist them in their application to the Government to have part of the old supply of English ammunition substituted for the supply of Quebec ammunition, which was to be given to them for their matches. I did so in a rather informal way, and I have no doubt that other members of the House were spoken to and did the same, and I understood that afterwards the Government had acceded to their request and had supplied them with the old issue of English ammunition, instead of the new issue of Canadian ammunition. I have also been informed that fault has been found with this ammunition by riflemen who have been engaged in other matches, and also by the officers and men who were engaged on active service in the North-West, that it has been found often to fail in those qualities which are essential to good ammunition. I am sure that the Minister of Militia himself would have been the last man in the world to knowingly supply men who were to risk their lives in face of the enemy with ammunition which was not fit to fulfil its purpose; but I am very much inclined to believe that, notwithstanding this personal inclination on his part, through the fault or negligence of somebody, a great deal of the ammunition sent out was not such as should have been put in the hands of volunteers engaged on active service, and that a great deal of the ammunition supplied for use at rifle matches was not of the best character. When the papers asked for come down—and I have no doubt that, after the long notice which has been given of this motion, the Minister will be able to bring them down very soon—we shall be able to discuss more intelligently the quality of the ammunition supplied. I was not present to-day when my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) asked his question in reference to the report of the commission which was appointed to test the ammunition; but, I hope that report will be brought down at an early date.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have already stated, in answer to a question put by an hon. member, that the report which was the result of an investigation by a commission appointed by myself for the purpose of looking into the complaints which had been made in reference to some of the cartridges manufactured in the Quebec cartridge factory, would be brought down almost immediately. Some complaints, no doubt, have been made. The report which I shall bring down is a very elaborate and voluminous report. It is now being copied, and within a couple of days, as I have said, I think we will be able to place it upon the Table. However, I cannot allow to remain unanswered the hon. gentleman's statement in reference to the cartridges and ammunition sent out to the North-West. I looked into the matter very closely, and all the reports which we received from the commandants of the various corps, from the Major-General commanding the force, show that the ammunition which we served to our troops was as good as could be manufactured anywhere. Some of it was English, and some of it was manufactured in Quebec. But the hon. gentleman must understand, if he has looked into the matter, that a cartridge may be very good for field purposes, and yet, from some error in the detail of the manufacture, may not be quite as perfect as it should be for rifle practice on a target. The difference can be very well understood. The cartridges have not been declared by anybody to be useless—very far from it; yet the deviation from the line of fire has showed it not to be as perfect as it might be. The same experience has been had in other countries, and in England, France, Germany and other countries experiments are going on every day for the purpose of making ammunition as perfect as possible. I shall be very glad to bring down the report and correspondence, as well as the complaints which have been made. The report will show that every possible latitude has been given in the investigation of complaints that have been made, and I think that the report, as a practical result of that commission, is a very valuable one, because it points out the deficiencies which I have referred to, and will enable us, no doubt, to improve the manufacture of our cartridges and make our ammunition as excellent as that of any other country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where is the powder made?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is made by the Hamilton Powder Company, and one of the complaints is against the powder. However, it would be very inconvenient to take up this subject before these papers are down, because there are many technical terms in the report, and the questions are altogether scientific. The matter has been referred to the Royal Military College professors, a staff of the leading riflemen of Canada, and the report, I think, will be very interesting reading.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THE REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The House will remember that yesterday I moved the second reading of a Bill relating to the Revised Statutes of Canada, and a proposition was made and pressed by some of my hon. friends, on the other side of the House especially, that the work should go to a select committee for the purpose of examining the work of revision done since last Session. I propose to acquiesce in that suggestion, and to move to-night that the Bill relating to the Revised Statutes of Canada be referred to a select committee. I think that motion will probably be acquiesced in by members of the House generally, and I am quite aware I can only move it with the consent of the House. But I do so with a view of making progress as rapidly as possible, especially in consideration of the fact that there was some misunderstanding as to the course that would be pursued in relation to this matter. I therefore move:

That the Order of the Day for House again in Committee on Bill No. 9 respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada, be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee composed of Messieurs Thompson (Antigonish), Abbott, Beatty, Davies, Edgar, Girouard, Landry (Kent), Laurier, Royal, Tupper, Weldon and Wood (Brockville), with instructions to examine the work of revision which has been done since last Session.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think the hon. gentleman has taken the proper course. We all know the great difficulty there is in a Committee of the Whole House investigating or examining a proposition of this kind.

Motion agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 18) to incorporate the Anglo-Canadian Bank.
—(Mr. Ward.)

CANADA ATLANTIC RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 43) to amend the Act incorporating the Canada Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Mackintosh.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. HAGGART. I beg to move the addition of a new clause, clause six, as follows:—

That nothing in this Act contained shall be so construed as to alter or affect any of the rights of Stanton and Balch under the said Act, 42 Vic., cap. 57.

The reason for moving the addition of this clause is that I have been informed that Stanton and Balch had a contract with the Montreal and City of Ottawa Junction Railway Company, and also with the Coteau Landing and Province Line Railway Company, and the understanding was that they were to amalgamate and form what is at present called the Canada Atlantic Railway Company; that Stanton and Balch have at present an action against the Canada Atlantic Railway Company now pending in the courts of the Province; that their right of action was confirmed under the Statute of 1879, in which the contract was set out; and the insertion of this clause is for the purpose of protecting them in the rights which they had under the Statute of 1879, and leaving them in the position they occupied before the present Bill was introduced. Their contention is, that this Bill, if passed, would leave them in a far worse position as regards their claim against the company. They state that under the Act of 1879 they had some right of action against the company, of which they would be deprived by the present Bill; that under the Act of 1879 they would, in case of winning their suit, have a perfectly good asset and be able to collect the money, which would not be the case if this Bill was passed in its present form.

Mr. SHANLY. I hope that clause will not be adopted, because its operation will be to nullify the whole of that part of the Bill preceding it which relates to the issue of the new bonds. Those people in whose interest the amendment has just been moved (Daniel Stanton & Co.) made the contract, or the contract came into operation, with the company on the 15th May, 1879, and for a year and a half afterwards they made no attempt to go on with the work; they did nothing whatever; and the company, after having frequently notified them to proceed, let the work to other contractors, and two and a half years afterwards, when the greater part of the road had been completed, they entered a claim and put an injunction on the bonds of the company. They applied to the court in Montreal and obtained an injunction. The company at once applied to the court to have the injunction dissolved, and it was dissolved. Then Stanton & Co. carried the case to appeal, and the injunction that had been granted, and which had been quashed by the Superior Court, was completely and entirely quashed in the Court of Appeal. This is the wording of the judgment in that court:

"And considering that the said appellants, Daniel N. Stanton et al., have shown no legal or sufficient cause or grounds to warrant the issue or maintenance of the said writ of injunction so obtained by them in this cause, and more especially have shown no right of property or direct present interest in the bonds, in respect of which the said injunction was obtained, and have no right to have or maintain the said writ of injunction, nor the conclusion by them taken in respect thereof; and

"Considering that on the cross appeal taken in this cause by the said Canada Atlantic Railway Company, the said last named company have shown that they had a right to have said injunction dissolved and said writ of injunction, in so far as it operates an injunction, quashed, set aside and annulled;

"Considering, therefore, that there is error in said judgment therein rendered by the Superior Court, at Montreal, on the thirteenth day of December, 1883, the Court of Our Lady the Queen now here doth reverse, annul and set aside the said judgment and proceeding to render the judgment which the said Superior Court ought to have rendered, doth dismiss the appeal of the said Daniel N. Stanton et al. with costs; and

"Adjudging upon the cross appeal of the said Canada Atlantic Railway Company doth quash, annul and hold for naught the said writ, in so far as it operates an injunction, as having improvidently issued, and doth condemn the said Daniel N. Stanton, et al., to pay to the Canada Atlantic Railway Company the costs by them incurred, as well in the court below as in this court."

That judgment in the Court of Appeal was rendered in January, 1883. Stanton & Co. then endeavored to carry the case to the Supreme Court here, and that court refused to reverse the decision in the Court of Appeal of Quebec. And yet those men come back now and say they have a vested right—that is what they actually do claim—in the old bonds of the company. Now, Sir, what they ask for here by this amendment, is simply that this high court of Parliament should do what the high court of justice has refused to do, because if it is passed it will operate so that these bonds will actually be under injunction. It will operate so that they will not be marketable, that they will be locked up as long as Stanton & Co. choose to menace this company with litigation. It is clearly asking Parliament to take the extreme course of interfering between this firm and the courts of law. The courts have decided that Daniel Stanton & Co. had no right, title, or interest in these bonds. The Bill as it stands without this amendment does not infringe in any way the rights of Daniel Stanton & Co.; they will have the same rights and the same recourse which they have now. The whole effort seems to have been to keep this matter in menace over the Canada Atlantic Company without desiring to bring it to issue. First of all, they entered an action against the company to recover $300,000 of damages, and subsequently they have applied to the court to be allowed to increase their bill of damages to $700,000; but they make no effort to bring the matter to trial. For these reasons, I say it would be an act of injustice to the company, who are now endeavoring to put the road into an easy financial position, to decide that this Parliament should interfere with the decisions of the courts and give these men the right to prevent the issue and marketing of those bonds.

Mr. BARKER. I entirely agree with the remarks that have been made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. It seems to me this amendment, if passed, would entirely destroy the effect of this Bill. I understand that a contract was entered into between those two companies for the construction of those two pieces of road. They did not proceed with the work, but they claimed under the original contract, which is not before this committee at all, that they had a right in the bonds which the company had a right to issue, under their previous Act of incorporation. Acting all through on that right, they took certain proceedings in the courts to have that right affirmed, but in these proceedings they failed. It would seem to me, Sir, that if the courts had decided that they have not a vested interest in those bonds, this House should not interfere with that decision. The courts decided that they had no such right whatever, and, therefore, by virtue of the legislation which is now sought, no rights of the contractors are interfered with; no right of action that those gentlemen have is interfered with or taken away, inasmuch as the only right they pretended to have has been adjudicated upon by the courts, including the Supreme Court of Canada. Now, if it be affirmed, as it has been affirmed by the section already passed, that it is right that this company should not only have the time extended for completing the work, but also have the right to put on the road an additional sum, then I think there should be nothing added to the Bill, which would interfere with those rights. It is clear to anybody who knows anything about the floating of bonds, that to pass such a section as this would have the effect of practically nullifying the benefits of the legislation now sought, because its effect will be that every investor in bonds of that kind will regard the whole matter with suspicion, and thus the advantage sought by this legislation would be absolutely nullified. I think it would be very unfair indeed to this company, inasmuch as this House has conceded that they are entitled to an extension of their charter and an extension of their right to bond the road, to put a provision of this kind in the Bill.

Mr. SHANLY.

Mr. SCRIVER. I am well aware, Mr. Chairman, and you are well aware, how cautious the committees of this House are in doing anything to interfere with the possible rights of litigants when proceedings are taken in the courts, and this question was fully and carefully discussed in the committee. I need not go into the history of this matter as that has been done pretty fully by the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Shanly); but I may say that when this contract was made between Messrs. Stanton & Balch, and the company preceding the Canada Atlantic Railway Company, it was provided that a certain amount of bonds should be issued to the contractors as the work proceeded.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. SCRIVER. Yes, that was provided. I have a copy of the contract before me. At all events it was provided that the company should issue a certain amount of bonds, and deposit them in a certain chartered bank under charge of trustees to be appointed—those trustees to be acceptable to the company and to the contractors. When the time came for depositing those bonds, the contractors notified the company to issue them and named themselves as trustees. The company replied that the nomination was not satisfactory and that they were not prepared to issue the bonds on those conditions. There the matter rested. Another condition of the contract was, that before these bonds should be issued, and within a certain period named in the contract, these contractors were to iron that portion of the road already graded, between Coteau Landing and Alexandria. The contractors, as the member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) has stated, never expended a cent except what they may have expended in obtaining the charter that was obtained here in 1878. They did no work, though repeatedly notified by the company to proceed with the work, and the company were obliged finally to make arrangements with other parties to build the road. As the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) has stated, some time after that, when the road was nearly completed, these gentlemen commenced a suit at law or obtained an injunction to restrain the company from issuing bonds, and prevented them for some time from doing so. Afterwards, a decision was rendered quashing the judgment; that was carried to the Court of Appeal and the decision was confirmed; and finally a decision of the Supreme Court was obtained, not only confirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, but stating further that these contractors had no right of property in the bonds of $15,000 a mile provided for under the original charter. I will read from a copy of the judgment I have here, which sets that matter clearly at rest:

"And considering that the said applicants, Daniel N. Stanton, et al., have shown no legal or sufficient cause or grounds to warrant the issue or maintenance of the said writ of injunction so obtained by them in this cause, and more especially have shown no right of property or direct present interest in the bonds, in respect of which the said injunction was obtained."

I think that sets that question at rest. These gentlemen represent now that their interests will be imperilled if the privilege the company now apply for, to issue additional bonds, is granted. The Bill empowers the company to issue new bonds to the amount of $10,000 a mile more than the original issue, and provides for an exchange of the original issue for these new bonds. I think I have made it clear that these parties have no rights in the original issue, and their rights cannot be prejudiced if this additional power is granted to the company.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have listened to the discussions which have taken place on this matter, and I must say that I disagree entirely with the statements of the last three gentlemen who have spoken. As I understand, the contractors who oppose this Bill passing in its present form, have asked simply that their position before the courts of law remain unaltered. Now, we are not a court to decide upon Messrs. Stanton & Balch's claims. I do not know who they are, I never saw them, and do not know anything about them, but when I find that these gentlemen, who represent themselves to be contractors, are simply asking that when this Bill is passed it shall reserve any rights they have before the courts of law, I say they ask simply what is common justice from this House. The hon. member from the city of St. John (Mr. Barker), and the hon. gentleman who sits near me (Mr. Shanly), whose opinions I respect very much, have stated a number of facts concerning the relations between Messrs. Stanton & Balch and the proprietors of this road. This House has nothing to do with these facts; we are not at all in a position to enter into the merits of them; we accept the statements of these gentlemen, but we have no evidence whether they are sustained by facts or not. What this Parliament is bound to do is this: When any legislation comes before us affecting private interests which are pending in cases before the courts, our legislation should in no way impair those interests. That is a principle which, I believe, will be sustained by every hon. gentleman in the House. I do not know anything at all of the merits of the case. I do not know these gentlemen, one of whom was spoken of before the Railway Committee as an alien; and it was said that aliens had no rights in this matter. I felt outraged when I heard that statement. We are bound to protect aliens as we are our own citizens, and to consider any pretension they may put before us. What I feel about the matter is this: That if these gentlemen have an action pending in the courts of law, and a measure comes before this House which impairs their security on that railway, as this Bill does impair their security by providing that the road may be bonded for $25,000 a mile instead of $15,000 a mile, we should not allow the measure to pass without saving their rights. That is a principle recognised as one of the fundamental principles of legislation in this country and we should not violate it. We are not here to discuss whether there are any merits in their claim or not, or whether the injunctions obtained by them have been sustained or not. That is not the question. The question is, if this railway company wants facilities to raise additional money for the purposes of the road, while we are prepared to give them those facilities, we should reserve every right of every private individual.

Mr. MACMASTER. My hon. friend has raised two questions. The first is, whether Messrs. Stanton & Balch, being aliens, should have less rights before this House than the people of our own country; and the second is whether those rights are being prejudiced by the proceedings taken before this House. As regards their being aliens, that is like the "flowers in spring," it "has nothing to do with the case."

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg pardon. My hon. friend says I raised the question of aliens in this House. I said it was raised before the committee.

Mr. MACMASTER. I understood the hon. gentleman to adopt an argument which he professes was put before the Railway Committee, that these men had no rights because they were aliens.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not going to allow my hon. friend from Glengarry, for whom I have the greatest respect, to misrepresent me. What I said was that I was present when this Bill was discussed in the Railway Committee, and that one of the arguments put forward by the promoters of the Bill on that occasion was that these men were aliens, and it was alleged they had not the rights others had.

Mr. MACMASTER. I should be very sorry to differ with my hon. friend the Minister of Railways—I mean the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). Whether he acts in that capacity, or whether he has represented aliens in this House or out of it, I always have that respect for his opinions in this House that I have outside in private life. It is seldom I have the honor of differing with the hon. gentleman, but I do not agree with him on this question. Unfortunately, the best of friends must part, and I find he is standing in a somewhat unhappy condition in this argument. I understood the hon. gentleman, either by deduction or direct assertion, put forward before the House the idea that Messrs. Stanton & Balch, who assume to be claimants against this company, are disparaged in their rights by reason of their being aliens.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is so.

Mr. MACMASTER. They are in no way disparaged in their rights. They took an action in the Superior Court in the Province of Quebec for their claim of $300,000 against this railway company, in the nature of damages. Their action was not for an ascertained debt, or an established debt; they simply came into court, and by an ex parte statement claimed $300,000, and asked the court that there should be a temporary restraint put upon the company as regards the issue of bonds. There are two questions involved: First, was there a debt at all? That remains to be determined—

Mr. MITCHELL. Where?

Mr. MACMASTER—before the courts.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is what I want reserved.

Mr. MACMASTER. I am glad the hon. gentleman agrees with me. When the suit is decided, that question will be determined; but what is important to the committee is whether the proceeding we are now about to take is calculated to embarrass the plaintiffs or to prevent them recovering any sum of money which may ultimately be found, before the courts, to be due them. Now, I examined the proceedings, I examined the statement of Messrs. Stanton & Balch, put before the committee the other day; I read the conclusions of their action, because, according to the special forms of pleading prevailing in Quebec, it is necessary, not merely that the party should state his claim in the nature of a direct averment, but that he should state in his conclusions what he wants. Now these parties have stated what their claims are, and they conclude by asking that the railway company should be condemned to pay the $300,000, and that the assets of the company be sold to satisfy that claim. That is the position. There is not one word in the Bill which will prevent the assets of the company being sold to satisfy the debt, if it should eventuate that there is any debt, provided this Bill should pass as has been explained by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Barker). You see, therefore, the question of the debt still remains to be decided, and further that there is nothing in this Bill to prevent Messrs. Stanton & Balch, if they have a just right and get judgment to sustain it, from proceeding against the assets of the company after the passage of the Bill, just as they might have done previously. They took out their action in 1883, and it is still pending. That may appear to be a very long time for an action to be pending, but I do not wish that you should be prejudiced against the claimants on that account, because, unfortunately, an action may be a long time pending in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. MITCHELL. The lawyers keep it up.

Mr. MACMASTER. And down too. There was an incident proceeding connected with the action. They first got an order in the nature of an injunction against the railway company. That order was dissolved. The case went to a higher court, in appeal, in the Province of Quebec, and judgment was rendered there on the injunction proceedings against these gentlemen. And the court of appeal made this declaration, which appears is the official record of the judgment of the court :

"And considering that the said appellants, Daniel N. Stanton et al., have shown no legal or sufficient cause or grounds to warrant the issue or maintenance of the said writ of injunction so obtained by them in this cause, and more especially have shown no right of property or direct present interest in the bonds—"

I hope this will satisfy the scruples of the hon. member for Northumberland—

"in respect of which the said injunction was obtained, and have no right to have or maintain the said writ of injunction, nor the conclusion by them taken in respect thereof—the court dissolves the injunction."

It may be said that the judgment of the Court of Appeals in the court of Quebec merely related to the injunction proceedings, and that is perfectly true; but in rendering that judgment on the injunction proceedings the court declares that the appellants have shown no present interest as regards the bonds, which forms the subject of controversy in the action of the Superior Court. Therefore it does not appear from the legal proceedings, so far as they have been brought before the committee or the House, that there is any direct interest on the part of the claimants that is prejudiced. I should state that from this judgment they appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada; but their application was not allowed, and therefore the judgment of the lower court was affirmed in that respect. The case comes back to this: The injunction proceedings having been set aside, it remains to be seen what right these people have, before the Superior Court, for their claim for damages. As far as I can ascertain, and I am somewhat familiar with the proceedings in the courts, it does not appear to me, if the Bill should pass without the amendment, that their rights will be in the slightest degree prejudiced, and it does not appear to me, as a matter of business investigation, that their rights as against this company are going to be in the slightest degree prejudiced by reason of the fact that we should, as we are assuming to do by this Bill, increase the borrowing powers of the company from $15,000 per mile to $25,000 per mile, and not $25,000,000, as stated by my hon. friend by a lapsus lingue.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). It is a matter of surprise to me, on examining this subject and listening to the arguments advanced, that, hon. gentlemen can differ so honestly and conscientiously in this affair. I cannot at all agree with the opinion expressed by the hon. gentlemen who are opposing the amendment to the Bill. It may be well for me to say at the outset that I know not the gentlemen who are asking this amendment. I know not whether they have rights or not, but I know that the main argument used to induce us to throw out the amendment, is that the Bill, without the amendment will in no way prejudice the rights of Messrs. Stanton & Balch, if they have any rights. If that be the case, will the insertion of this amendment place the matter in a different position? Does not the amendment only say :

"Nothing in this Act contained shall be so construed as to alter or affect any of the rights of Stanton & Balch, under the Act 42 Victoria, chap 57."

Now they say the Bill does not affect the rights of these gentlemen at all. But that is all the amendment asked. All it asks is that this Act will not be so construed as to affect the rights of Messrs. Stanton & Balch. What objection is there then to allowing the amendment to go in?

Mr. SCRIVER. It would affect the power of the company to sell the bonds.

Mr. MACMASTER.

Mr. LANDRY. I had not heard before that the objection to the amendment was that it would affect the company's facility for selling the bonds. But why should it have this effect? Because those to whom the offer of the bonds may be made will be more or less impressed with the idea that these gentlemen have rights? But if they have none, that ought not to affect the value of the bonds. If I had the means of investing and am convinced nobody, under existing laws, had any right to interfere with the bonds, I would not be affected at all by the amendment. Therefore I think my hon. friend when he says it will affect the value of the bonds, admits clearly that these parties have rights.

Mr. SCRIVER. No.

Mr. LANDRY. If they have no rights, how will it affect the bonds?

Mr. SCRIVER. It will affect purchasers who know nothing about it.

Mr. LANDRY. Because they will be impressed that these parties have rights.

Mr. SCRIVER. Yes, they will by the amendment.

Mr. LANDRY. If so why are we not similarly impressed?

Mr. SCRIVER. Because we know the facts.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). Do we know the facts? It is just exactly what I thought was being attempted, to convince us by assertions and escaping the proofs. I do not say there are no proofs. There may be; I cannot tell. But it is attempted to convince us by assertions that these gentlemen have no legal rights, and that they ought not to be considered because they have not fulfilled their part of the agreement under the contract, and have not done what they were bound to do under the conditions of the contract. We are not here to try that. We are not a tribunal for that purpose, and, therefore, it appears to me that the best thing we can do is to give to the company who are asking for this Act, the Act which they ask for, give them the power to issue their bonds, give them all the power they are asking for, and let them take the risk and the responsibility of their action. If they know that these men have no rights, let them try that in the proper way. We are not a tribunal to try that question. On the other hand, if they have any rights, we are here to protect those rights. It is asserted that they have none, but we are not here to try that. I do not assert that they have any, but I think this section cannot be objectionable. We are asked by the amendment to declare that, if there be any rights, they shall be protected. We do not create any rights; we do not assert that there are any rights; but we say that, if there are any rights, those rights shall not be affected by this Act. If there are no rights, of course, they will not be affected. If there are, then these men ought to be protected. Holding these views, I cannot help sympathising with the amendment, and voting for it if it comes to a vote.

Mr. SHANLY. The hon. gentleman from Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry), says he would like to see some proofs brought forward. I am quite certain, as regards the property claimed in the original bonds, the present existing bonds, by these claimants, Stanton & Co., as regards their right of property or their having any right of property, the hon. gentleman will be willing to accept the decision of three courts, commencing with the Superior Court in Quebec, and ending with the Supreme Court in Ottawa, which have decided that Stanton & Co. have no such right of property, and yet they claim that these bonds are their right, and that if you put a further amount of bonded debt on the road, then "our bonds"—for that is the term they use—"of $15,000 a mile are depreciated by that increased issue." I am certain that my hon. friend will not attempt to say that the proof of the judgment given in three courts will not be satisfactory to his conscience. These men are not creditors of this company. If they were creditors of the company, there might be some just reason or cause for putting in this amendment, but they are simply claimants, and I say that, if this amendment is allowed, anyone who chooses to make a claim can come before a committee of the House, and then before the House itself, and say that a clause which will give their claim a shade of right is to be inserted in every Bill. Some people argue that, in putting this large amount of bonds on the road, you depreciate the original bonds. That is not the case. The cost of the road at present will exhaust the whole of the existing bonds; and when the $25,000 a mile of additional bonds is applied, as I know it is intended by the company to apply it, it will make the $25,000 bonds of much more marketable value than the $15,000 are to-day. The present issue of the bonds has been always delayed for the reason that the company perceived that it was absolutely necessary, in order to carry out their improvements, that they should have an increased issue. In the meantime, the promoters, the proprietors, the stockholders, the shareholders, the owners have given the best guarantee which has ever been given by any company in Ontario or Quebec by building one of the best lines of road in this country, and they have done that with their own means, awaiting the time when they could put their property into such a state of forwardness that they could have a really completed property with all the necessary equipment. At present they have no equipment to speak of, and to equip the road properly now will take about half a million of dollars, and that half million of dollars they have got to expend to place the line in a proper money-earning condition, when the $25,000 a mile which they now ask the power to issue will be of a higher value than the $15,000 a mile which they can now issue. I will say one word in personal explanation. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has referred to a matter which I do not think is properly before the House. He says it is claimed that aliens have no rights; and, when I asked him where he heard that stated, he said it was mentioned in committee. I do not know that it is exactly parliamentary that matters which are mentioned in committee should be imported into this House.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was it not so?

Mr. SHANLY. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is all I want.

Mr. SHANLY. I will convince the hon. gentleman to the contrary. He pointed to me as the prime sinner in introducing the word "foreigner." I would co-operate with him in extending even fuller protection to these gentlemen because they are foreigners than if they were from among ourselves, but what I stated in committee was this: When the Bill was called, one of the arguments used by the learned counsel who appeared for these gentlemen was that these gentlemen were in New York, and we ought to postpone the Bill until they chose to come here. Now, it was known that this Bill was to come up; the notice had been on the paper for some time; and I said that, if the wheels of Parliament were to be blocked and the business of the committee arrested because two foreign gentlemen persisted in staying away from Ottawa, I could not see why the Bill should not be proceeded with in committee. That is the only way in which I used the word "foreigner," because the learned counsel who appeared for these two gentlemen made that a reason why we should not proceed.

Mr. DAVIES. I have a difficulty about this amendment which has not been mentioned by any of the hon. members who have spoken, and, as I desire simply to do justice in the matter, I will mention it. It does not appear to me that the committee have anything to do with the fact whether these gentlemen are aliens, or whether the Superior Court has already declared that they have no interest in the bonds which the Act of 1879 allowed to be issued. There are two points with which we have to deal—what rights were secured to them by the Act of 1879, and does this amendment which is proposed still further maintain those rights. When I turn to the Act of 1879, I do not find that they have any rights at all. The Act of 1879 simply confirms an agreement which they had with one of the companies therein amalgamated. It goes no further. It gives them no lien upon the bonds, and it gives them no lien upon the railway.

Mr. HAGGART. It confirms the contract which was entered into.

Mr. DAVIES. This does not do any more. This contract remains confirmed whether this amendment is carried or not.

Mr. HAGGART. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIES. If they have any right, the bonds will still form a first lien upon the railway and upon its assets, notwithstanding the admission of the hon. gentleman. It cannot do any good, and then I am influenced by another argument which has been advanced by those gentlemen who say that it may do a great deal of harm.

Mr. McCALLUM. By the Bill before the House, we give this company the power of issuing $10,000 a mile more bonds on this road. That is the way it strikes me. It is admitted that these gentlemen have a claim to the extent of the legislation got in this House. Now, what assets are these people going to get to pay their claims? In the first place, they must pay the interest on the bonds. Now, as the matter stands before the passage of this Bill, they would only have to pay the interest on $15,000 a mile, but if you pass this legislation they will have to pay the interest on $25,000 a mile, before they can collect a debt, if they had one. That is the way it strikes me. If they will dispense with that I will willingly help to carry this legislation, otherwise, I will vote for the amendment.

Mr. SPROULE. I think, looking at the amendment from a common sense standpoint, it will clearly indicate that Stanton & Balch had some rights. It says:

"Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to alter or affect any of the rights of Stanton & Balch under the Act 42 Vic., Chap. 57."

It does not say "if they have any rights," but it acknowledges that they have rights, and if we bring these rights down and acknowledge them in this Act, and put them with greater force before the world, thereby, I think, we destroy their chances of selling these bonds for what they would otherwise bring in the market.

Mr. HAGGART. I would call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that the time to discuss this matter has already expired, and still there remains a good deal to be said upon it. It will take me half an hour to go into the details in reference to this Bill. I move that the committee do rise.

Motion agreed to, and Committee rose and reported progress.

MARITIME COURT OF ONTARIO.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 5) to extend the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of Ontario.—(Mr. Allen.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. ALLEN. This Bill is the same that I brought in two years since. At that time it included the supplies for coal and provisions, equipments and repairs to ships. Several shipowners and other gentlemen objected to the clause including provisions and coals. A deputation of shipowners waited on me to argue the case, and they agree that if I would leave out provisions and supplies they would consent to allow the Bill to pass including permanent equipment and repairs. According to that agreement the Bill was brought in last Session and passed this House. But when it went to the Senate they amended it so that the equipment and repairs should be done at the instance of the managing owner of the company. When the Bill, as amended, came back to the Commons we were engaged in the celebrated Franchise Bill, and time was not given afterwards for concurrence in the Bill. I now present the Bill as amended by the Senate, that is, that claims for permanent supplies, such as ropes, sails, anchors and other equipments of that description, as well as repairs to ships, shall be placed under the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court. I believe that it is in the interest of shipping generally that this measure should be passed. Some parties have made this complaint: Suppose the repairs came to $1,000 and a mortgagee held a mortgage on the ship for the same amount. They said that if the repairs on the ship were to be a prior claim to theirs, it would be unfair. But, upon arguing the case with those gentlemen, we find they have received good value for the amount of repairs and the permanent supplies, and have no reason to complain. As the law stands now, for instance, if a company who repairs a ship, when the work is done and they have lien upon the ship in their possession, they may hold that ship, perhaps, for three, or four, or five months, until they sue the owners and receive a judgment, and then go through the general course of selling the property which they have in their hands. Now, that is not only an injustice to the parties who have done the repairs, but it is a serious loss to ship-owners. Suppose the ship was repaired in the month of June or July, and that there is a claim of $1,000 against that ship for repairs, and that the parties who did the repairs held that ship for three or four months, until the season was over, then more money would be lost by the owners of that vessel than, perhaps, would pay the whole amount. Nothing is included in my Bill other than permanent equipments and repairs. When we come down to clause 3 of the Bill I have a short amendment to offer, which is as follows:—

And the foregoing claims shall constitute maritime liens on the vessels which shall rank next after claims which now constitute maritime liens, and as among themselves shall rank in the above order.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I should have certainly opposed this Bill at the second reading if I had imagined it to be, what the mover now seeks to make it, a Bill to alter the maritime law. The hon. gentleman introduced his Bill under the title of an Act to extend the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of Ontario, and I understood that he sought to give that court jurisdiction to entertain claims in respect of repairs done to the equipment of the vessel. As such, I saw no very serious objection to his Bill. It appears now that the hon. gentleman seeks to amend it in such a way as not to make it a Bill to amend the maritime law of Canada relating to maritime liens. I think that is very objectionable indeed, for several reasons. First, because the hon. gentleman seeks to introduce an amendment to that law under the title of the Bill which I have read. Second, because the hon. gentleman would make one law for the Province of Ontario, in this respect, and another law for the other sections of the Dominion. If it be deemed at any time desirable on the part of Parliament to review the position of the law regarding liens on shipping,

Mr. ALLEN.

I hope Parliament will do it in connection with some act dealing comprehensively with the whole subject, and not in a measure relating to one Province only. I understand that last Session Parliament declined to pass an Act making liens in favor of repairers of vessels, and declined to do so especially in connection with the consideration of an Act of this kind. I need hardly detain the committee by stating, even in a general way, what the maritime law is with regard to liens. The maritime law recognises liens for supplies and various other claims in respect of vessels, the owners of which are not within the jurisdiction of the court. His Bill proposes to change that with respect to certain classes of creditors, creditors in respect of repairs to the ship, and to give them a lien, notwithstanding the fact that the owners are within the jurisdiction of the court. The Bill is, as I have said, open to various objections. First, it proposes to legislate on the subject of maritime liens under the guise of a title which refers to an entirely different subject. Second, the Bill proposes that there shall be a different law in Ontario from that which exists in other Provinces. Third, it deals partially with the subject of maritime liens and not comprehensively with it.

Mr. WELDON. I do not think this Bill is dealing with the maritime law, because maritime liens are different from those created by Statute. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has drawn a broad distinction between these liens, and has declared that maritime liens will follow a vessel in the hands of new owners, while statutory liens did not. I quite agree with the Minister, that it is rather anomalous that the proposals should apply to only one Province of the Dominion, and not to the others. But the hon. gentleman will recollect there is this peculiarity: The court which exercises jurisdiction in Ontario, is a court created by this Parliament, whereas the court which exercises jurisdiction in Quebec and the Maritime Provinces is an Imperial court, created by Imperial Statute and regulated by the Vice-Admiralty Act of 1863. The United States courts have solved the difficulty which has been raised. The objection made, that admiralty jurisdiction did not extend to the great lakes and rivers of the continent, because they were not within the flow of the tide, has been overcome by the declaration that their admiralty jurisdiction extends over the lakes and great rivers. If legislation could be so framed either by the Imperial Parliament or by this Parliament, by which jurisdiction would be uniform over the whole Dominion, the courts which have jurisdiction over the sea would have jurisdiction over the lakes, it would be practically of great benefit. The Session before last, I moved for the correspondence with respect to the maritime courts constituted under the Vice-Admiralty Act of 1863, and I think it is a great pity that some steps should not be taken to extend the jurisdiction of those courts so as to make them, in Canada, have concurrent and co-extensive jurisdiction with the High Court of Admiralty in England. Under the Admiralty Act of 1861 the High Court of Admiralty has much more extended jurisdiction than that given the Vice-Admiralty Courts by the Act of 1863. With respect to this Bill, I agree with the Minister of Justice that it is unwise to give jurisdiction to the Maritime Court of Ontario which is not given to the Vice-Admiralty courts, either in the Lower Provinces or Quebec. The Admiralty Court has only jurisdiction when the owner or part owner does not reside within the jurisdiction of the court. In Quebec Admiralty Court jurisdiction can be had over a Nova Scotia and New Brunswick vessel when the owners live in those Provinces and no owner lives in Quebec. An improvement might be made in this respect. I do not see why the principle introduced by the mover of the Bill should not be the correct one and why we should not extend the power to the Vice-Admiralty Courts and give them power which they do not now possess. While I favor the principle of the Bill to some extent, it is because I hope the Vice-Admiralty Courts under the Imperial Act, will get equal jurisdiction. I think my hon. friend will find, if he considers the matter, that if the Vice-Admiralty Courts had the same jurisdiction as the High Court of Admiralty, it would be a great advantage to shipping owners and to persons connected with that trade. I do not see why these powers should not be made by statute to the same extent and to the same class of persons selling necessaries to ships in Ontario as where the owners do not live under the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Courts.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). As I understand, the maritime law of the Maritime Provinces is regulated by British law. There was no maritime law for Ontario and we passed this special Act, and from time to time members representing constituencies bordering on our inland waters, desired that the law should be amended in the interests of the mercantile public. Some amendments were passed, and a few years ago it was promised that an attempt would be made to obtain from Great Britain a uniform maritime law for Canada, and we have been looking for some time for a fulfilment of that promise. We have been looking for the correspondence on the subject, but we appear to be getting no nearer to it than ever, and as life is too short to wait longer, the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Allen), in a praiseworthy effort to benefit the interests of the mercantile public, has brought in this Bill. My only fault with the Bill is that it does not go far enough. I think we should assimilate the Ontario maritime law with that of the United States, so that a lien might not only be imposed in the case of repairs, but also for necessary supplies furnished a vessel, such as coal, &c. This method of keeping a mortgage afloat against a vessel, is merely a means of evading the payment of honest debts. I trust the Minister of Justice will not oppose this measure. Its apparent application to the whole Dominion is merely, I understand, a clerical error, which the promoter of the Bill is willing to correct, so as to make it apply only within the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of Ontario.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). This Bill, as I understand, is not pretended to extend beyond the Province of Ontario, and it is in that respect perfectly consistent with the Statute which it proposes to amend. All this Bill proposes to do is simply to extend the jurisdiction of the court within the Province of Ontario to vessels owned by parties who are domiciled in the Province of Ontario. I agree with the Minister of Justice that, as a general rule, it is right and proper that our laws should be made applicable to every portion of the Dominion, that there should be uniformity in this respect, but we know that this has not always been the case in the past. We know that last Session an Act was passed which does not apply in every respect and uniformity to all the Provinces of the Dominion. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the Franchise Act, he will find that the same franchise does not exist in the whole Dominion, and there are many other statutes in our Statute-book, the provisions of which do not extend equally to the whole Dominion. This Bill, as I understand, simply makes applicable to vessels owned in the Province of Ontario a law which was passed some years ago, extending to vessels out of the Province of Ontario, and that being the case, I do not see any reason why it should not become law. Those of us who live on the shores of the great lakes in the west, know that there are hardships which this Bill proposes to cure with respect to claims for repairs to vessels, for equipment, for building, for materials supplied. Is there any reason why claims of this kind should not be claims on the vessel, whether the owner happens to live within the Province or out of it? I think precisely the same rule should apply in both cases. For instance, a vessel may be owned and registered in the port of Kingston; she may go to the extreme west and contract debts for repairs. It might be very difficult to find the owner, and the creditor might have to search all the ports of the lakes to find him, and in that case he would be put to a great disadvantage. It appears to me that such a measure as this is as much in the interest of the owner of the vessel, as of the person doing the repairs or supplying the materials, because, otherwise, a vessel, at a long distance from where the owner lives, will have great difficulty in having repairs done or getting supplies, because there is nothing but a mere personal obligation against the owner. There is no lien against the vessel—no proceeding which can be taken in rem, but the whole matter depends on the personal responsibility of the individual who gives the order. I do not think the objections of the Minister of Justice have any practical bearing on this case, though I agree with the general rule as to the uniform application of our laws. But as this Parliament has passed the present law, surely it has the power of amending so as to make it as effective as possible. I find on enquiring in my own locality, that a great many of the business men are in favor of such a provision, though I was not aware of it when the matter was under discussion before.

Mr. McCALLUM. We had formerly a law in Ontario of this kind, but what we want now is an extension of its provisions. Formerly, in Ontario, before the establishment of the Maritime Court, I have known American vessels changing owners during the winter in order to get rid of paying Canadian debts. Of course, there are now certain claims which can be collected against a vessel, such as claims for towage, wreckage or salvage; but I would like to see the law extended, so that a vessel would be liable for all supplies furnished to her. Any man who wants to pay his honest debts would find this no detriment to him; in fact it would be a benefit to him, because it would enable many vessels to get supplies which could not otherwise get them. I have owned vessels myself, and I have found no inconvenience from the law so far as it goes. The hon. member for North Grey deserves the thanks of the mariners for having introduced this Bill, but I think it should be extended to make the vessel liable for everything.

Mr. LISTER. Living in a county bordering on a lake, some of my constituents are interested in this Bill. I concur in the remark of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) that the Bill does not go far enough. The maritime law of Ontario is a special law passed by this Parliament. The maritime law of England does not apply to the inland lakes, and it was thought, in the interest of supply men, particularly in the Province of Ontario, that this maritime law should extend to them. The same jurisdiction was given to the Maritime Court of Ontario as existed in the courts of the Maritime Provinces, viz., when an owner or part owner of a vessel lived in the Province no lien was given, but if the owner resided outside of the jurisdiction of the court a lien was given. The law recognises the right of a vessel to become a debtor, but why it should stop at the liability, when the owner resides in the country, is more than I can understand. I know from my own experience that very many people who have supplied goods to vessels, in order to enable them to continue their voyages up the lakes, have lost their debts. Only a short time ago a gentleman in the county of Essex lost a very large sum of money. There is a general impression among the commercial people throughout the country that if they furnish any sort of supplies to a vessel, they have a lien against the vessel itself, and they do not consider it necessary to enquire as to who the owners of the vessel are. In many instances, the owners are worth nothing, the vessel being covered by mortgages, and the people who have parted with their goods, find that they have no remedy and cannot recover a debt which has been incurred to enable a vessel to prosecute its voyage and to derive the profit therefrom. In the United States they have not only a general maritime law, which exists on the lakes, but they have also recognised the right of the different States to pass laws, fixing the liability of vessel owners. I think I am right in saying that every State bordering on the lakes has its own particular law, and those State laws give a preference to foreign claims. A Canadian who furnishes goods to an American vessel, has a preference over the American supply man, while our courts do not enforce that sort of claim against a vessel; they have no power to do so. There is no reason why a vessel should not be responsible for every debt that enables the owner of that vessel to prosecute his voyage or to reap the profits of that voyage. Upon what principle or reason can it be said that a vessel shall be liable for wages, towage, or any other claim recognised as a maritime claim, and shall not be liable for goods supplied to enable it to continue its voyage? A vessel was repaired in the county of Grey at a cost of many thousand dollars, and it has been lying in the port, and the supply men having a lien on the vessel have pressed for a decree of the Maritime Court to enable them to sell it for months and months; and it is doubtful if they will receive anything. At least $2,200 will be lost to people living in my neighborhood for goods supplied to vessels, the owners of which have been found to be worth nothing. This state of affairs should not exist. If a vessel is to be responsible in the same way as any individual, then it should be responsible for every debt that vessel contracts; there should be no distinction between what are called maritime liens and liens that are not recognised as such. I believe the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) who has been a large owner of vessels himself, echoes the feeling of most of the vessel owners throughout the country, when he says they have no objection to this law. Because if they are honest men they will pay their debts, and if dishonest, it will give the trader an opportunity to realise what is his due. The hon. Minister of Justice says the present law is the law of England, but I would call his attention to the fact that it has been changed with respect to Ireland. There, while a vessel cannot be seized at her home port for supplies, she can be attached if she is ten miles from that port. So that an exception has been made of Ireland in that regard. I would also call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice, who opposes this Bill, to the fact, that a couple of years ago this matter was referred to a Special Committee of the House of Representatives in the United States, and the report brought in by that committee strongly approved of the principle of giving to the supply man a right of liens, and stated that no strong reason could be given why a person in the country, supplying goods, should not have a lien in the same manner as if the owner lived out of the country. This measure does not go far enough. It ought to include all supplies properly pertaining to a vessel. It is a measure, however, that has been anxiously awaited in Ontario, and I do not believe there is an honest shipowner from one end of the country to the other who would object to it. I trust that the hon. the Minister of Justice will see his way to allow it to pass, and I hope that at some future time it may be extended in the direction I have pointed out.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I find it necessary to say a few words more on this subject, because either my friends who have spoken in favor of the Bill have supplied a great many additional arguments against it, or have entirely misunderstood those I advanced. I have nothing to say as to whether this Bill goes far enough or not. It may be that in the United States the law goes further, but I would ask any hon. member of this House to point to legislation in the United States which makes one law for the State of Maine and another law for States interested in the navigation of the lakes in relation to this subject.

Mr. LISTER. I did not say that.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I know the hon. gentleman did not, but he invited us to follow the legislation of the United States as going much further than this, while the principal objection I make against this Bill is that while Canada is a great maritime country, the Bill proposes to make the maritime law of one of the Provinces different from that of all the other Provinces. Will you find any instance in which the maritime legislation is different in one portion of a country from what it is in another?

Mr. LISTER. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I quite appreciate what the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) said with regard to the necessity for departing from the principles of uniformity in many subjects of legislation; but if there is any subject upon which we should endeavor to make our legislation uniform, it is that which relates to the maritime law. With regard to shipping, Canada has the good fortune to be a great maritime country, now standing third or fourth in rank, but it would be a serious blow to the prestige of Canada as a maritime country, if it were known abroad that the law on this subject is different in one Province from that which prevails in another, notwithstanding the fact that the whole subject is under the jurisdiction of one Parliament. So much for the question of uniformity. I recognise the force of what the hon. member for St. John says, that the maritime liens differ in name at any rate, from the liens created by Statute. But this Bill proposes to establish a new maritime lien in substance, although, perhaps, not in name. I do not agree with my hon. friend that there is any reason whatever why the Parliament of Canada should establish a different maritime law with regard to statutory liens in Ontario from that which prevails in the other Provinces. It is true that the Maritime Court of Ontario, is a court organised under the legislation of this Parliament, whereas the courts which exercise the like jurisdiction in the Lower Provinces are organised under an Imperial Statute; but it is equally competent for this Parliament to say what shall constitute liens in the Maritime Provinces as in the Province of Ontario. Notwithstanding the fact that the judges, and perhaps the officers of the courts, in the Lower Provinces, are appointed by Imperial authority, while in Ontario they are appointed by the authority of this Government, it is quite in the competence of this Parliament to say what shall constitute liens in all the Provinces. Therefore, there is no argument in that contention. But, furthermore with reference to the question as to how the courts are organised in the Maritime Provinces it has been deemed desirable, as one hon. gentleman stated, to obtain Imperial legislation with the view of placing those courts entirely within the control of this Parliament. That legislation has been urged upon the Imperial Parliament year after year, and it has been delayed in consequence of the peculiar circumstances which retarded legislation in Great Britain for the last two or three years. But we have the definite assurance of the Government of that country, conveyed to us during the past summer, that the legislation with regard to these Imperial courts in the Maritime Provinces will be withdrawn by an Act to be passed during the present Session of the British Parliament, and we have reason to expect that before the Session is through, those courts will be placed under our own control. We shall have, in the meantime, if we pass this Bill, made greater, the want of uniformity and the want of proportion between the way in which the jurisdiction of those courts shall be operated in the two classes of Provinces, the Upper and Lower, and we shall establish a different maritime law in one Province notwithstanding the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) may call the one a maritime and the other a statutory lien—from that prevailing in the other four or five sections of the Dominion, with only the excuse that in the one we have the advantage of appointing the judge, registrar and bailiff. My hon. friend on my left (Mr. McCallum), and my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Lister), seem to me not to take into account the primary elements which enter into this question, when they say that there should be no indisposition on the part of this Parliament to enforce the rights of creditors against the ship, and that if the debtor intended to pay his debts he should not object to the Bill. Surely hon. gentlemen know that the fundamental principle lying behind all that, which they seem to ignore, is that creditors are not supposed to give credit on the security of the ship itself, when they are dealing with the owners of the ship, residing perhaps in the same place as themselves, but they sell them supplies and make contracts for repairs, &c., on the credit of the owners themselves, and now it is asked to give them, besides, what they did not bargain for, a lien on the ship itself before all other creditors. With regard to uniformity, it would very much damage the reputation of this Parliament if we have one law for a ship when she enters the Gulf of St. Lawrence and another when she sails up the river and enters the lakes. Hon. gentlemen propose that when in the gulf she shall be governed by the laws of Great Britain, but the moment she passes a certain imaginary line on her way up she shall be governed by a different system of laws. It is time enough to consider whether the law goes far enough, when the intention of Parliament is invited to this subject by a Bill professing to deal with it, and not by a Bill which was carried through two readings in the House under a name that led the House to believe it was dealing with a different subject altogether, that is, enabling the creditors to recover their debts in the Maritime Court of Ontario, but giving them no lien whatever as against the vessel itself.

Mr. MULLOCK. I do not agree with the hon. Minister that this Bill is in the slightest degree misleading. It would be quite unnecessary for any person to apply to the Parliament of Canada for assistance in order to obtain a personal remedy. The courts of Ontario supply that remedy, without our seeking to have an additional court such as the Maritime Court for that purpose. I think this Bill is plain and simple and easily understood, and it purports to declare that the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of Ontario shall be extended, so as to cover liens in respect of certain matters. I cannot understand how the Minister can charge the mover of this Bill with smuggling its two readings through the House on a misleading title. It has been said by every hon. gentleman who has spoken on this question, that it is to the general interests of the shipowners as well as the creditors that this lien should exist—a lien that can be made practicably available. It seems to be conceded generally that this is a most desirable position in which to place the suppliers of these materials and those who supply labor for the purpose of equipping vessels; and, that being the case, it being admitted that that is an end which we should seek to attain; should we not rather seek to attain that end than to defeat that end? The Minister of Justice states, and gives it, as I understand, as his legal opinion, that we can confer jurisdiction upon the various Vice-Admiralty Courts, although they are created by an Imperial Act. If I understood him rightly on that point, it is the simplest possible thing to carry out the principle which has been admitted in argument here by the insertion of a few simple words. This Bill can be made to accomplish all that the Minister of Justice desires somewhat in this way. If you strike out the words in the second line "of Ontario under the Maritime Jurisdiction Act, 1877," and introduce the words "or Vice-Admiralty Court having jurisdiction in any Province," you meet the case.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). And the title, and the second reading, which has already been secured under false pretences?

Mr. MULLOCK. Of course the hon. Minister may not be able to understand this Bill, but I deny that the mover of this Bill is capable of obtaining any decision of the House under false pretences.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). No, I do not mean to say that he has, but he would have if the amendment was made as the hon. gentleman suggests, making this a Bill affecting the whole of Canada. The mover never proposed anything of that kind.

Mr. MULLOCK. It is easy enough to get over the technicalities, if there is no desire to burke the Bill. If another second reading is necessary, let the Bill be referred back again. The amendment proposed is germane to the original motion. The motion is, that the jurisdiction in a particular Province shall be enlarged. It is quite proper for a member to propose that the jurisdiction in an adjoining Province shall be enlarged, or that the jurisdiction in all the Provinces shall be enlarged. Last Session this was often done. I remember that last Session, at the last stage of a Bill, a clause was inserted entirely altering the character of the Bill; and surely if that was done last year, parliamentary practice has not so far changed that it cannot be done this year. If it is not desired to interfere with this Bill so as to defeat it, and if it is admitted, as it has been admitted by the Minister of Justice, that jurisdiction can be conferred upon all the courts which is sought to be conferred upon the one court under consideration, there is no reason why any longer this legislative want should not be met. This is the third year that this Bill has been before Parliament. Last year this House assented to it, and the Senate assented to it with some amendments, and the Bill before us now is the result of the Bill of last year, with the variations suggested by the Senate; so it may be said that this is a surprise to nobody, with the exception, of course, of the Minister of Justice. I think he will be doing an act of injustice if he prevents this measure going through on the mere technical ground that the Bill is partial in its applicability at the present time.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think the hon. gentleman, who has last addressed you, understands the objection of the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice, as I understand, takes this position, that the Bill as introduced—and the title of the Bill tends in the same direction—simply confers jurisdiction on the existing court, whereas the amendment tends to change the law itself, though limiting the change to the Ontario Court. I do not think my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) grasped the point of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. MULLOCK. Yes, I did.

Mr. McCARTHY. If he did, he certainly did not leave that impression on my mind, and I do not think he left it on the minds of other members. I quite agree with the view taken by the Minister of Justice, and I think it would be an extraordinary proposition to accept, which is now presented to us, that the general law should be altered not only as far as one Province is concerned, but in regard to the whole Dominion.

Mr. ALLEN. It is not in the Bill.

Mr. McCARTHY. But the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) desires to make it so, without giving any notice to the Maritime Provinces, which are much more interested in shipping matters than the Province of Ontario. If we agree that we have the power, and I think we are inclined to agree on that point, to alter the law in regard to the Vice-Admiralty Courts as well as in regard to this court of our own creation, and if it is desired to make that law uniform, I do not think the committee would desire that it should be dealt with by this Bill. The members from the Maritime Provinces would, no doubt, desire to consult their constituents before any such radical change was made. I should like to consult the people in my own constituency, who are largely interested in shipping.

Mr. MULOCK. It has been before you for three years.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, the clause which is proposed is not yet printed. The clause without which the Bill is of no particular consequence is not yet printed, and we are asked at the last moment to make the change which is not suggested by the title of the Bill, and which is not found in the Bill at all; and then the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) proposes that we should, by the addition of a word or two, apply the whole Bill to the Maritime Provinces, which are more interested in shipping matters and in regard to this Bill than the Province of Ontario. I think the committee should rise, whether it should ask leave to sit again is a matter which I think the Minister of Justice, as representing the Government, should deal with; but I think that at present we should not pass the amendment, and without that amendment the law would be ineffective, without giving some time to all of us to consult those who are interested in the matter, especially if it is to be made general, as suggested by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WELDON. The Minister of Justice says the law should be uniform. If this Bill is passed as it now stands, it will not be uniform in the Province of Ontario and in the Provinces in which the Maritime Court exercises jurisdiction; but, if the hon. gentleman takes the Act which brought the Maritime Court into existence, he will find that Parliament undertook to give more extensive powers. The first clause of that Act is:

"All persons shall, after this Act comes into force, have, in the Province of Ontario, the like rights and remedies in all matters (including cases of contract and port, and proceedings in rem and in personam) arising out of or connected with navigation, shipping, trade or commerce, on any river, lake, canal or inland waters, of which the whole or part is in the Province of Ontario, as such persons would have in any existing British Vice-Admiralty Court, if the process of such court extended to the said Province."

Now the very first section of this Act makes certain exceptions, and the same power that enables them to except would enable them to extend. But there is a very important clause in the fourth section of the Maritime Act of Ontario which enables a person to follow a ship into the hands of a bond fide purchaser ninety days after the vessel changed hands. Now the Vice-Admiralty Court gives no such power at all. As I have already pointed out, there is a broad distinction between the meaning of the maritime lien and the statutory lien. By the maritime lien the parties may follow the vessel if she changes owners, but the express decision of the Privy Council has been that the statutory lien does not follow where the vessel passes into the hands of a third party, therefore, if a statutory lien is created, and a vessel subject to that lien is owned by A. B., and becomes next day the property of C. D., the vessel cannot be followed; but the Maritime Court of Ontario expressly states:

"No right or remedy in rem given by his Act only shall be enforced as against any subsequent bond fide purchaser or mortgagee of a ship, unless the proceeding for the enforcement thereof be begun within ninety days from the time when the same accrued."

Now the Vice-Admiralty Act of 1863 provides as follows:—

"Claims for necessary supplies, in the possession in which the court is established, to any ship of which no owner or part owner is domiciled within the possession at the time of the necessaries being supplied."

Mr. McCARTHY.

These two claims, therefore, are statutory liens, created by the Vice-Admiralty Act of 1863, and the same privilege should be extended to the Province of Ontario. Now I have pointed out that when the court gives a right to follow the ship into the hands of bond fide purchasers, it was going beyond the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Court by which the lien remained for ninety days in the hands of the bond fide purchaser. Now they are met by this difficulty in Ontario, that because the owners reside within the Province of Ontario the Vice-Admiralty Court has no jurisdiction, and so far as the jurisdiction of the court is concerned, it is practically rendered nugatory. The Maritime Court of Ontario to-day has the power of adjudicating on claims for necessary supplies and claims for building and repairing, but they are met by the difficulty that the owners reside in Ontario and they cannot exercise jurisdiction, and, therefore, practically, the jurisdiction is a mere shadow, because they have no power to enforce it. Now, it seems to me that this Bill will make their jurisdiction of practical utility, because the shipping which comes under the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of Ontario, I think I may say without exception, is owned by men residing in that Province. It seems to me that the principle contended for by the Bill of giving a lien in rem against the vessel, is founded on common sense and justice, and I would like to see the Vice-Admiralty Court's jurisdiction extended. I pointed out that by the Maritime Act of 1877, there is a right to follow the vessel in the hands of the purchaser, within ninety days, in the Province of Ontario, whereas it is not twenty-four hours in the Lower Provinces, and in this sense I think the Bill meets the objection made by my hon. friend the Minister.

Mr. McCARTHY. What clause gives power to follow the vessel?

Mr. WELDON. Sub-section 4 of section 2, which shows that within ninety days from the time accrued, you can follow the vessel in the hands of bond fide purchasers.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is negative?

Mr. WELDON. True, but if you have it within ninety days, you have it.

Mr. McCARTHY. No. If you have it by the general law. As it is, when this Act was introduced, then, you must exercise the power within ninety days or you lose it.

Mr. WELDON. Then the section is perfectly useless?

Mr. McCARTHY. It may be. It does not give the power, at all events.

Mr. WELDON. You have got to give some effect to a Statute, not merely say it is redundant, or it is of no use at all. That section is used negatively, but at the same time it gives the power. My hon. friend will see on reading it over, that the statutory lien, the same as the lien under the law maritime, follows the vessel. In one exception it attaches all the time to the maritime lien, but in Ontario the statutory lien exists for ninety days against a bond fide purchaser or the mortgagee, providing proceedings to enforce are commenced within ninety days. It seems to me that while power was given to the Maritime Court of Ontario to enforce claims for necessaries and claims for repairs to a vessel, under the Vice-Admiralty Act this clause I have read took away that jurisdiction when the party resided within the jurisdiction of that court, and it, therefore, rendered the court practically useless for that purpose, and its jurisdiction became a mere nonentity. In Ontario there is no doubt, as I said before, that a great majority of the vessels coming under the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of that Province are owned by men living in Ontario. If a New Brunswick vessel were on Lake Erie and if the hon. member for Monck supplied the necessaries, he could arrest the vessel, but if the vessel belonged to Kingston he could not touch her. The same principle should be applied in each case. The Maritime Court of Ontario would have jurisdiction over New Brunswick and Nova Scotia vessels if no owner lived in Ontario. If the vessels engaged in the trade and commerce of the lakes are vessels registered in Ontario the result is that so far as jurisdiction is given to the Maritime Court of Ontario it is rendered nugatory by the explanatory clause that, if the owner resides within the jurisdiction of the court, the jurisdiction is taken away. It seems to me that this is a matter which is of importance to the people of Ontario and vessels should be placed on the same footing as regards lien as are vessels in the United States.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The hon. gentleman would look with a great deal of surprise into the countenance of any person who in the Maritime Court, or any other court, proposed to enforce a lien, and stated, as his authority, a section of the Statute declaring that if you have a lien you shall enforce it within ninety days. The hon. gentleman's argument, if it amounts to anything, is this: That because differences exist between the procedure of the Vice-Admiralty Court of the Lower Provinces and Quebec, and that of the Maritime Court of Ontario, we ought to make the legislation as different as possible; that because there is a difference between the organisation of those courts it is desirable for us to make the principles, on which the rights of suitors in those courts are adjusted, as wide as possible, as if one suitor were in Austria and the other in England. That is the amount of the hon. gentleman's argument, if there is any logic in it. There is no use in the hon. gentleman calling attention to the fact that there are differences in the courts, unless he is prepared to argue that because there are differences we should multiply them as greatly as possible. The hon. member for St. John has taken a great deal of trouble to show that this proposition is just and fair. If it is just and fair in Ontario, I want to know why the hon. gentleman does not want it in New Brunswick.

Mr. WELDON. I should like to get it.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). If he does, why do we not have it in a Bill, in a Bill professing to deal with the substantive law instead of professing to deal with the procedure. The Bill has proceeded up to this point under the guise of a Bill which professed to give a remedy to creditors against vessels in the Maritime Court of Ontario, without increasing the rights of the creditors or giving them any lien which they did not possess before. It is now proposed to amend the Bill by altering materially the rights of every suitor in regard to those causes of action which the Bill enables the court to consider. There is no use in disguising the purpose of the Bill. The Bill having proceeded so far, and the mask of the title having been thrown off, the promoters of the Bill had now better fairly state to the House what the purpose is. It is to give special legislation to one class of creditors in this country, to one class of creditors in a special portion of this country, and that is the class of creditors which in the Province of Ontario by possessing dry docks or any other means acquire debts against vessels for repairs, and it places those special creditors—perhaps I should say one special creditor—in a different position from that which creditors occupy against vessels in any part of the British domain where the maritime law prevails which we operate in Canada. It is no use for hon. members to be asked to vote for the Bill on the ground that it does not go far enough. If it does not, let us have the hon. gentleman's Bill under an honest title; but if the Bill is to relieve some particular company or creditor or a particular class of creditors let us not designate it merely as this Bill is designated, let us not degrade the moral character of Canada by passing a Bill for the benefit of those particular creditors or that particular creditor under a false title, and by smuggling it through the Parliament of Canada. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. MILLS. I cannot help expressing my surprise at the tone of the argument adopted by the Minister of Justice in discussing this question. The Minister knows very well the history of the Maritime Court of Ontario. He knows that before 1877 there was no Maritime Court, no court having admiralty jurisdiction in the Province. The remedy parties had against vessels, whether for supplies or for repairs, was one in the ordinary civil courts, and that remedy exists and is in force to-day as much since the passing of this Act as previously. When the Act of 1877 was adopted there was a desire to adopt measures so far as they could be adopted to meet the wants of the people of Ontario. That was the intention of the Bill. We were not considering whether the law was to be precisely the same in every portion of Christendom or not. I apprehend that has not been the practice in this Parliament or the Local Legislatures. We have not felt compelled to consider the proper classification and arrangement of legislative Acts. We have, as representatives of the people, undertaken to consider the wants of the community and adapt our legislation as far as possible to their wants. The Minister of Justice has not, in any one of the speeches he has addressed to the committee, pointed out that the propositions were improper, that they were not suited to meet the evils complained of and were not reasonable. What have been the objections urged? That the law in the Maritime Provinces, where the Imperial court sits and where the Imperial law is administered, is not precisely the same as the law which my hon. friend has proposed to place on the Statute-book. The law is not the same now. The remedies provided as regards liens are not the same as in any other portion of the Dominion. If one were to listen to the arguments of the Minister one would suppose, in ignorance of the facts, that we were endeavoring to break in upon that beautiful system of uniformity in which the hon. gentleman delights. The hon. gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension if he supposes that to be the case. There is no uniformity at the present time. By the third section of the Act which we placed on the Statute-book in 1877, it is provided that the courts shall not have jurisdiction in certain matters in which the Maritime Courts of the lower Provinces have jurisdiction. There is a very wide departure from the rule of uniformity, to which the Minister attaches so much importance, in the law as it at present stands. I could understand the arguments of the hon. gentleman if this were a uniform law and it were proposed to break in on that uniformity. That is not, however, the fact. We have a law which is supposed to be adapted to the particular circumstances of Ontario, situated as it is upon the inland waters, and the proposition we have to consider is what has been our experience in working out that law; what the experience of shipowners and those who supply them with necessary supplies? My hon. friend has undertaken to explain what the experience of these parties is. He comes here with a Bill, and says: Our experience is such as to show that this Bill will provide a remedy for some of these evils. Does the Minister of Justice say it will not? No; he does not for a moment contest the only really important question for the consideration of this committee. He admits practically, by refusing to argue that question, that the Bill is a reasonable one in its details, but he turns round and says: We have a different law in the Maritime Provinces, and because we have a different law which we have not sought to change here, we will not permit you to make any change you deem necessary in the law of the Province of Ontario; we will not consider your rights and interests; until the people of the Maritime Provinces are prepared to make the change, we will not budge an inch to make the change you think necessary. I confess, Sir, that that position is one which much astonishes me, because I would suppose that the hon. gentleman, if he were such an ardent advocate of the principle of uniformity, would have come down with a measure to make the law uniform. Has he proposed to change the law as it exists at the present time? He admits that there is not uniformity, but the hon. gentleman says that the present diversity should not be increased. That is not a question which should influence us for a moment. The question is, is there a grievance, and will the Bill remedy the grievance? My hon. friend who introduced this Bill, and who has had extensive experience in these matters, says it will. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) says it will; the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) says it will; my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Lister) says it will. Every hon. gentleman in this House from the Province of Ontario who is experienced in this matter, whose constituents are interested in this subject, approves of this Bill; and the hon. the Minister of Justice says: No, I will not favor it, because it does not give us uniformity throughout the Dominion. Well, Sir, uniformity is an excellent thing if we do not sacrifice the public convenience, and the practical necessities of the country, to uniformity. There is diversity in our circumstances, and I can easily conceive that a vessel situated on the lakes may be in a wholly different position from one situated in the Maritime Provinces. But I do not care how that may be. This I do know, that I think under a fair construction of the British North America Act, we ought to have had no Imperial maritime courts in this Dominion, after this Parliament was organized. The Imperial Government have, however, taken a different view, and they have contested our right to legislate on the subject of maritime law; they have contested our claim to the establishment of maritime courts. The Minister of Justice says that we can alter the jurisdiction of these courts; we can give them powers they do not at present possess; we can alter the procedure, and so on. But the Imperial Government have taken a different view, they have denied our right, and the hon. gentleman himself has said that they have promised Imperial legislation, for what purpose? To abandon the jurisdiction they now claim.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I did not say anything of the kind, and I think the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) knows perfectly well I did not.

Mr. MILLS. I know what the hon. gentleman said. He said the Imperial Government had agreed to legislate on the subject.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). For the purpose of withdrawing their courts—not for the purpose of changing their jurisdiction.

Mr. MILLS. No; but transfer jurisdiction from the Imperial Parliament to this. The hon. gentleman knows this: If it were perfectly clear, according to their view, that we had jurisdiction, then that would have power to supersede their courts. There can be no doubt about that, and if the hon. gentleman says they are legislating for the purpose of withdrawing their courts, does he pretend to say that if a court is sitting under the Imperial Act, we have power under the law, as it now stands, to alter the jurisdiction of that court so sitting?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I say we not only have power but that we have done it in fifty different cases which the hon. gentleman has voted for and seen enforced in the courts day after day and week after week.

Mr. MILLS. Well, if the hon. gentleman will specify so that I can understand his contention, I will be better able to say whether I agree with him or not. My opinion was when the British North American Act was carried, that it was intended we should have power to create maritime courts. I know there was correspondence on the subject between the Imperial Government and the Government of Canada, and I know the Imperial Government denied that right. They maintained they had no intention of terminating their maritime jurisdiction which they contend should be continued throughout the Empire, but they have seen that we forbore to exercise any power to create courts, which, at all events, would have only co-ordinate jurisdiction, and would not have superseded the Imperial courts already existing in the Dominion. But, however that may be, the hon. gentleman has here to-night contended for the principle of uniformity. He has proposed to sacrifice the interest and the convenience of the population in the Province of Ontario to this rule that he calls the rule of uniformity, and we have called the attention of the committee to the fact that there is no uniformity at the present time; that the wants of the community were taken into consideration when this court was constituted, and it is with reference to the practical mischiefs that exist at the present time that my hon. friend has proposed this legislation.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I do not wonder at all at my hon. friend's surprise, but I really think his surprise was not at my statement or arguments, but at his own—I shall not call it misrepresentation, of my arguments, out of respect for the committee—but his misapprehensions—I use that term for the present at any rate—of my argument. I think the committee will unanimously agree with me that I would be justified in using a stronger term when I remind the committee that the hon. gentleman represented me as submitting to the committee that the law should not be changed because we were not ready in the Maritime Provinces to have it changed. I am sure that in this whole committee there is not one gentleman present—and I include the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in that statement—who imagines I presented any such argument. My argument, whether sound or unsound, was that this Bill was one which had found its way to the present stage under the title of a Bill to alter the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of Ontario, by conferring on that court the right to adjudicate on certain claims; that it was now proposed at this stage to change its character, not merely as to the maritime jurisdiction of the court, but as to the right of suitors in the court, and the right of property owners, which came within the jurisdiction of the court, no matter what part of the world they come from. I did not propose to consider whether it was advisable or not advisable to alter the general law which prevails now throughout this Empire with regard to liens of this description. I proposed to defer any argument upon that branch of the question until we had a Bill before us which honestly invited us to consider it. When that Bill is before us, I shall direct the attention of the House to the principles by which that law has been regulated so far, and the principles which have induced persons in the British Empire, who have devoted at least as much consideration and experience to the settlement of this question as the hon. member for Bothwell has been able to do, to come to the conclusion that it is unwise to establish, as against vested interests and settled contracts, a maritime lien or a statutory lien, in favor of one particular class of creditors, when the owners of the ship upon whose credit the supplies or repairs have been given, reside in the country; in other words, to give the contractor a different set of rights altogether from those which he contracted for, and upon the faith of which the debt was incurred. These were the principles on which I undertook to oppose the Bill passing another stage. I did not oppose it on the ground that everything was uniform heretofore. On the contrary, I admitted that the judges of the Vice-Admiralty Court in the Lower Provinces—if you will the registrars—if you will the bailiffs—if you will the women who sweep the courts—are appointed by one jurisdiction, while in Ontario they are appointed by another; but I did submit to the logical sense of this committee that that was not a reason for changing the rights of property, the procedure of the courts, and the rights of suitors therein; whereas, the hon. member for Bothwell, by his misstatement, not to say misrepresentation, of my argument, puts the case this way before the committee—that because those judicial officers are appointed by different authorities, they should have different jurisdictions, and different systems of adjudicating between the rights of suitors who come before those respective courts; and all that in respect of a matter, which more than any other matter should be dealt with in a uniform manner by the law of Canada, because it is that branch of our law in respect of which more than any other we attract attention abroad. With regard to the Vice-Admiralty Courts, I understand that the hon. gentleman has some peculiar view, which may offer some reason for his misinterpretation of my position upon that subject. I did admit that the judges of the courts of the Maritime Provinces are appointed by Imperial authority, and that they are Imperial courts. The hon. gentleman, however, went so far as to endeavor to represent me as stating that in consequence of that it would be impossible for us to make the law uniform; at any rate, he sought to drag the argument that far. He sought at least to drag the argument this far, that because the judges in the Vice-Admiralty Courts are appointed by Imperial authority, the Parliament of Canada cannot pass any law affecting their jurisdiction. I called his attention to the fact that the Parliament of Canada had already done so. In repeated instances, notably those relating to the collection of Customs penalties, jurisdiction has been conferred by the Parliament of Canada on the Vice-Admiralty Courts, although they are Imperial courts.

Mr. WELDON. They had that before. They have always had that.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). They had not before the jurisdiction I have referred to, which was specially conferred on them by Statutes of Canada passed within the last few years. The right of the Parliament of Canada to pass any such Act was contested in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and that court took the view which has been so profoundly urged by the hon. member for Bothwell to-night. It declared that the Parliament of Canada had no right to alter the jurisdiction of Imperial courts, and if that view is right, of course the hon. member for Bothwell is right to-night, that we cannot attempt to make the law of Canada uniform, and that we must submit to the humiliating spectacle of seeing the Maritime Provinces, as well as the Province of Quebec, governed by the maritime law of Great Britain, which is good enough for the greatest maritime power in the world, but is not good enough for some section of the country for which the hon. member for Bothwell wants a special law. But in the case I refer to, of the Queen vs. Flint, the appeal was reversed by the Supreme Court of Canada, which practically decided that the Parliament of Canada has power to confer on those courts any jurisdiction it pleases, or to regulate the way that jurisdiction shall be exercised from time to time, in other words, that the Imperial courts are established and organised in the country and its judicial officers appointed in the country, by Imperial authority, but that the right of the Parliament of Canada to make use of those courts or to regulate their jurisdiction is not in any way affected or prejudiced, and exists much in the same way as it does with respect to the other courts. Therefore, that branch of the law can be made uniform with respect to the whole country, and therefore it is undesirable—leaving aside what title this Bill bears, and by what pretence it has come to this stage—to have the maritime law one way in one section of the country and another way in another section; so that the moment a vessel comes to Canada, which is recognised as one of the great maritime powers of the world as regard her mercantile marine, a ship is to be subject to one kind of law in one section, and to another law in another; and I am sure that argument is not at all affected by the simple circumstance that already we have the fact, undesirable as it is, that in one section of the country there is an Imperial judge and in another section a Federal judge. The good sense of the Parliament of Canada has already pronounced that although that may be undesirable, both the Imperial judge and the Federal judge shall administer the same law. To tell me that because one judge is an Imperial judge and the other a Dominion judge we should make the rights of suitors and the status of the vessels that sail the waters of Canada different, is simply to pervert the argument, and not to throw any light on the question at all. Whether I am right or wrong in the views I have urged, I submit that those views were not accurately stated by the hon. member for Bothwell, who undertook to reply to them.

Mr. WELDON. The best argument my hon. friend has made as to uniformity, he made just now. He said that Acts were passed by the Parliament of Canada giving power to the Vice-Admiralty Courts with respect to Customs and revenue. My impression was that they had that jurisdiction before; but I will accept his statement; and if it is so, that same Parliament of Canada has taken away that very jurisdiction from the Maritime Court of Ontario. Therefore, the lack of uniformity in the jurisdiction has been created by this Parliament itself. It expressly takes away jurisdiction from the Ontario court with regard to breaches of the Customs and revenue laws, which, he says, it has given to the Vice-Admiralty Courts of the Maritime Provinces. He also speaks of their being Imperial courts. In the other Provinces the judges, I believe, have been so far appointed by this Dominion, and the power of selecting the judges of the Vice-Admiralty Courts is now vested in the Government of Canada. It is true, that is not the case in the Province of Nova Scotia, because I believe that under the Imperial Act, the chief justice of Nova Scotia is the judge of the Admiralty Court, and that in New Brunswick and Quebec the case is different. In Quebec Mr. Irvine is the judge of the Admiralty Court. Therefore, there is not uniformity in this case, the admiralty judges in Quebec and New Brunswick being appointed by the Canadian Government, while in Nova Scotia the appointment is made by the Imperial Government.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The judge in Quebec is appointed by the same authority as in Nova Scotia.

Mr. WELDON. The appointments may be subject to confirmation by the Imperial Government, but they are made on the recommendation of this Government.

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

Mr. WELDON. Well, I understood so, but I may be wrong. Is not the Dominion Government however consulted with regard to those appointments and are they not made on the recommendation of the Dominion Government? There is another point. The only argument my hon. friend put forward is that this Bill will make a different jurisdiction with regard to vessels coming to the country; but as regards breaches of the revenue and Custom laws there is a broad distinction, and we might go further. He also says it would change contracts and interfere with existing rights, but the clause is not retrospective, and, therefore, cannot apply to any claim now accrued.

Mr. McCALLUM. It is not for a layman to take part in an argument of this kind, which is purely a legal one; but I would ask: What had we in Ontario before we got the Maritime Court, because the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Court only extended to tide water? We had therefore in Ontario to have something or other to enable us to collect our debts. Of course uniformity is all very well, if the hon. Minister would only tell us when we are going to have it. Are we to suffer in the meantime by having to go to the registry office where a vessel is registered, and see whether there is a mortgage on her and who is the owner, before we can furnish her with provisions and supplies? Is it not reasonable that the builder of a vessel should have a claim on her for ninety days and that the one who furnishes equipment and supplies should have a claim on her for ninety days, after which, if he did not protect his claim, he would only rank the same as any other creditor? That is the case now, if I understand the maritime law aright. This Bill mentions only the managing owner, but I would like to have the master included as well, because he is in charge of the vessel. Suppose a vessel goes from here to Port Arthur and gets into trouble and loses some of her rigging, and the master wants a new supply, how is he going to get it? Is the merchant to send to the port of registry to find out who is the owner or whether there is a mortgage before furnishing the supplies? This Bill is in the interests of the owners themselves. In salt water, a vessel going from port to port, can obtain any supplies or have any repairs necessary made, through the master, since he can give a bottomry bond on the vessel for the amount, and then proceed to sea again, but on the lakes the case is different. The hon. gentleman talks about the difference in laws existing on the Lower St. Lawrence and on the lakes, but very few inland vessels go to sea at all, so that the difference cannot affect sea going vessels. With reference to his remarks about Vice-Admiralty Courts, why we had no court at all in Ontario until we got this one, because the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Courts only extend to tide water. We can collect from American vessels our debts now, and we want to have the same power to collect from Canadian vessels. If the owner lives here and there has a mortgage on his vessel, the master of the vessel ought to be in a position to put his vessels in proper shape to go to sea, without putting the man who furnishes the supplies under the necessity of looking to the registry office to find out who is the owner.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). My hon. friend (Mr. McCallum) really misunderstood me. I did not say the Vice-Admiralty Courts should have jurisdiction in Ontario. All I ask is that vessels should not be governed by different laws in the one Province from those which govern them in another. It is reasonable that a man who builds a vessel should have a lien upon it, and if he wants one he can have it. By the laws of Canada, the moment the keel is laid the builder can take a mortgage which shall cover every additional dollar's worth of property put in the ship. If a man wants a lien for repairs, he can get it by asking it before furnishing the repairs. The object of this Bill is to give one class a right for which they have not asked or bargained, in respect of advances which they made on the credit of the owners alone.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman has made an imputation against my hon. friend of having brought forward a Bill under false pretences,—

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I beg your pardon, I did not.

Mr. MILLS—of having brought forward a Bill with a misleading title, and he has told us, with regard to legislation, such as proposed by my hon. friend, that he ought to have come forward honestly, with an honest title to his Bill and not one calculated to mislead. I do not propose to enter into a controversy with the hon. gentleman on any such line. I beg, however, to say that the observations he has made with reference to the jurisdiction of the courts, the illustrations he gave are not quite pertinent. We have given in election cases jurisdiction to the provincial courts, and our right to do so was contested, but it was confirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But to give a court additional jurisdiction is one thing and to change the jurisdiction of a court, to take away the power it already has, to decide that the rights which existed in a particular form shall be varied, is a wholly different thing. The Minister of Justice has spoken of the Vice-Admiralty Courts of the Maritime Provinces as if they were Canadian courts, as if the Imperial Government appointed the judges and had no other connection with them. The Vice-Admiralty courts are the creation of the Imperial Government, and not of this Legislature, and so far as they are created by Imperial Statute, and so far as jurisdiction is given them by that Statute, we cannot alter their jurisdiction, unless the whole power to deal with the subject were transferred from the Imperial Parliament to this one. The Imperial Parliament maintain, both with regard to the question of the creation of Vice-Admiralty Courts and the question of merchant shipping, that these subjects are still subjects of Imperial legislation. And when the Merchant Shipping Act was amended in 1876, the Imperial Parliament contended that we had not the power to deal with the subject. It was made a matter of controversy. Sir William Vernon Harcourt entered into a controversy with the London Times upon this subject while the matter was before Parliament, and Lord Carnarvon, in a despatch which the hon. gentleman will find in the Department of the Secretary of State, denied the right of the Parliament of Canada to legislate upon that particular subject. So that, so far as the Vice-Admiralty Courts are concerned, they are the creation of the Imperial Parliament under an Imperial Statute, and so far as jurisdiction was given to them, we have not, under their interpretation of our constitutional authority, the power to change the law in that particular. I pointed that out, and, when the hon. gentleman said that the Imperial Government proposed legislation, I certainly supposed that they proposed it for some other object than simply to withdraw their power of appointing the judges of the Vice-Admiralty Courts. I supposed—and I think no one who will consider the law as it now stands can come to any other conclusion—that, if the Imperial Government intended to confer upon us any power, it must be more than the power of appointing the judges, it must be the power to create courts to exercise vice-admiralty jurisdiction—a power which we could not effectively exercise now, so long as the establishment of these courts is vested in the Imperial Government under the Imperial Act now in force.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I think the point of the matter is that, when the Ontario Maritime Court Act was passed, it was passed to remedy grievances which were complained of by the people's representatives here, and the people's representatives complain to-night and tell the Minister of Justice that there are serious grievances still existing, and that this measure would be a partial remedy for them. I have not heard any member who represents a constituency bordering on the inland waters of Ontario oppose this Bill, except the hon. member for Simcoe, who opposes the measure because he has not had time to consider it, though last Session he supported a measure which went much further. For years we have been put off in our endeavors to obtain a remedy for these grievances. We have had ministerial platitudes year after year. We have not had a Minister of Justice in this House, and, however much we may admire the ability and the uniform courtesy of the hon. gentleman who filled that position, we did not have him here. Now, having the Minister of Justice in this House, we did not think, coming here with reasonable grievances, representing our constituents in this matter—and I may say that I feel very strongly on the subject, and that I represent people who feel very strongly on the subject—we did not expect that we should find the Minister of Justice obstructing this legislation, taking advantage of technicalities, and talking all round the subject as he has done to-night. We were promised by the Government in former Sessions that uniform legislation would take place, and no possible interpretation, such as the Minister of Justice puts on it to-night, could be taken from what was stated to us. It was distinctly stated that the Imperial Government would legislate in such a manner that we should have jurisdiction over the maritime courts; but, if it is to be merely the power to appoint the judges ourselves, and not to have additional legislation, it was no answer at all to the demands that were made in those former Sessions. In regard to the principle of uniformity, which is said to be so desirable, I do not see that it is applicable to this Bill at all. The classes of vessels navigating our inland waters, and the purposes for which they are used, are entirely different from the sea-going vessels. The principle of this Bill has been recognised by the Ontario courts, in the Mechanics' Lien Act, and I do not see that any injustice will be done to any class by extending that to the building or repairing of vessels. I cannot see on the Government orders any measure of equal importance to the little Bill which has been brought in by the member for North Grey (Mr. Allen); and I trust that, if the Minister of Justice insists on voting this down, supported by gentlemen who do not understand it, we shall have this Session some other measure of a similar character.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to make a personal explanation. I am charged with acting dishonestly with this Bill. I deny the charge and I leave it to the House to judge whether I have acted dishonestly or not. I represent one of the largest shipping ports in Ontario. The town of Owen Sound has the largest shipping yard and the largest dry dock in the Province. Perhaps we do the largest shipping business of any town in that Province. The solicitor of the dry dock company handed me this Bill. I am not a lawyer; I do not pretend to understand law. I merely took charge of this Bill in the interest of shipping in this House. About the time—I think the same day or the day before—this Bill got the second reading, I received a letter from the solicitor of the dry dock company in Owen Sound stating that an amendment was needed to make this Bill operative. To show this House that I did not act dishonestly, that I did not try to smuggle this through, that I did not try to do anything underhand, I may state that I handed the Minister of Justice the letter I received from the solicitor. I also handed him the Bill, with the amendment I desired to add written at the bottom. Was that acting dishonestly or like a smuggler? He received that, and one of the reasons, and the principal reason, why that Bill has been allowed to remain so long on the paper, was to allow the Minister to examine the amendment and to be prepared for it when it came up. I ask the House if that is smuggling a Bill through. I will not submit to the imputation from any gentleman in this House, no matter who he is or what he is. I emphatically deny the accusation.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I desire to add one word of personal explanation. The hon. gentleman must certainly have misunderstood what I said if he supposed that I said that he had got the Bill thus far dishonestly. My hon. friend from North York suggested that in order to meet my objection as to want of uniformity we should add a few words to this Bill, making it applicable to all the Provinces of the Dominion. I said: "Then what about the title?" "Well," he says, "we can change the title too."

Then I said: "If you did that the Bill would have been got thus far under false pretences"—not at all in reference to what the hon. introducer had done, but in reference to the change proposed in the Bill making it applicable to the whole Dominion, changing both its title and purport. I had no idea whatever of applying that observation, which was upon a supposititious case altogether, to the hon. member's procedure with regard to this Bill. It is true he was kind enough to submit to me in writing a statement that he would move to amend the Bill in this way in committee. It is also true, however, that he only conveyed that intimation to me after the Bill had been read a second time, and it is only twenty-four hours since I asked that it stand over until I could examine his amendment. I believe that the Bill is framed simply in the interests of the dry dock companies of Ontario, and not in the interest of the country generally.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Justice has done, of course, what is quite proper in trying to remove any misunderstanding, but I may remind him that when he made his criticism of the character of the Bill, so far as I recollect, it was in the direction complained of by the hon. member for North York.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I did state that the Bill ought to bear an honest title, but I made no personal reflection whatever against the introducer of the Bill.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think it is very unfair this Bill should be quashed now. I move in amendment that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The CHAIRMAN. You cannot move that amendment now.

Mr. McCALLUM. I would not like it to go to the country, that in this House I was advocating the interests of the dry dock men. I am here in the interests of the people of my county, and not of any dry dock men.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may add, that having had a good deal to do at various times with gentlemen connected with the business of supplying articles to ship-owners, I know, as a matter of fact, that the objects my hon. friend proposes to obtain are matters of great interest to all those parties in almost every shipping town throughout the Province of Ontario. I am not going to continue the argument, but that is a matter of fact, and it is not right, or fair, or correct, to say that this Bill is promoted in the interest of a dry dock company, or any other corporation.

The Committee rose without reporting.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:25 p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 8th April, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 87) to incorporate the Columbia Valley Railway.—(Mr. Tupper.)

HUBERT HÉBERT.

Mr. LANGELIER asked, Whether Hubert Hébert, Revising Officer for the Electoral District of Montmagny, is the same person who holds the position of Station Agent of the Intercolonial at St. Thomas; and, if so, what steps have the Government taken in order that the service of the railway may not suffer while the said Hubert Hébert is engaged in the preparation and revision, both preliminary and final, of the electoral lists for the said district?

Mr. POPE. Yes; this is the same person, but he has retired from the service of the railway, and a new station agent has been appointed.

EDMUNDSTON TO RIVIÈRE DU LOUP RAILWAY.

Mr. WELDON asked, Has any application been made to the Government for the subsidy given for a railway from Edmundston to Rivière du Loup, or Rivière Ouelle, and by whom; and has any contract or understanding been made or entered into with any company for the construction of this railway, and with what company? What is the estimated cost per mile?

Mr. POPE. Yes; an application has been made by the Temiscouata Railway Company, but no contract has yet been entered into. $18,000 per mile is the estimated cost of the road.

S. C. D. ROPER.

Mr. COOK asked, Is S. C. D. Roper in the employment of the Government? If so, in what Department? What is his salary, and what is the nature of his services?

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Roper is employed in the Statistical Branch of the Agricultural Department, temporarily, at $2 per day.

RETURNS.

Mr. McMULLEN. I moved for the following return on the 4th March:—

1st. The name of each person on the superannuation list on the first of January, A. D. 1886.

2nd. The date at which each of such persons was superannuated.

3rd. The amount paid into the superannuation fund by each person now on the list.

4th. The total amount paid to each person now on the superannuation list up to the first of January, 1886.

That return has not yet come in.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Minister of Finance is not here. I will call his attention to it as soon as he comes.

Mr. PATTERSON (Brant). I moved for a return of the report of the inspectors to whom samples of flour to be supplied the Indians were submitted.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will enquire about it.

Mr. MULOCK. When may we expect the return ordered on the 4th March, which I had the honor of moving for, regarding the sufficiency of the food supply to the Indians?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will enquire about it.

PROTECTION OF WOMEN AND GIRLS.

Mr. CHARLTON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 20) to punish seduction and like offences, and to make further provision for the protection of women and girls.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the Bill, because I am in favor of its principle, but I would suggest that it be referred to a select committee. The Minister of Justice will know, on referring to the Bill, that there are some very important clauses in it. It proposes to create some new offences, and to a large extent is taken from the English Act passed last Session, but in some respects it differs. Now, if the hon. gentleman will look at clauses 5 and 6 of the Bill he will find, on comparing those clauses with the law as it now exists, that they appear to come into collision with it. It is not proposed to amend the law as it exists, but these are new enactments altogether. It is very difficult, in Committee of the Whole, where you have to refer to the existing law and compare it with the provisions of the Bill, to deal with the matter intelligently, and I am perfectly satisfied that this Bill will receive much more justice and will be made much more perfect and consistent with the law as it now prevails if my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) will consent to refer it to a select committee, which would take the trouble to make it as perfect as possible. Section 5 of this Bill proposes to make it a misdemeanor to take, or cause to be taken, a girl out of the possession of her father, and against the will of her father, for improper purposes. Section 54 of our own Statutes declares that:

"Whosoever fraudulently allures, takes away or detains a woman under the age of twenty-one years, out of the possession and against the will of her father and mother, or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her, etc., is guilty of felony."

Section 5 of this Bill only makes the person so charged guilty of a misdemeanor. It appears to me that the two sections come somewhat into collision. This Bill does not propose to amend the law, but to create a new enactment altogether. One would require to examine very carefully into the matter and see that these provisions are not inconsistent, and that we do not weaken the law. The same applies to section 6 to a considerable extent. Whoever detains a girl against her will for an immoral purpose is guilty of a misdemeanor. Now, on reference to our own Statute, we find that whoever detains a girl is guilty of a felony, and section 56 provides that—

"Whosoever unlawfully takes or causes to be taken any unmarried girl being under the age of sixteen years out of the possession and against the will of her father or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has given sufficient attention to the Bill and has compared it with the existing law, but it appears to me that to make the Bill perfect it requires some consideration and reflection, and to compare the existing law with the proposed law of my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Therefore, my own opinion is that, however desirable it may be to pass the main portion of the Bill, it would be much better that the Bill should be referred to a select committee composed of gentlemen who are accustomed to deal with questions of this kind, in order that they may go over it carefully, examine its provisions, compare them with the existing law, and make them as perfect as possible. There are some other provisions in this Bill which I do not approve of, but which could be discussed in Committee of the Whole, such as the seventh clause of the Bill. That, however, is a matter which could be discussed without difficulty in Committee of the Whole, because it does not come in conflict with any existing laws in this Dominion of Canada. There is another difficulty which requires consideration. The offence which is created by the first section of this Bill is not now a criminal offence at all. There is a civil remedy for that wrong. It is not proposed to abolish that civil remedy. Of course that could not be done here, but it is proposed to make that a criminal offence, so that the victim would be liable to two penalties, one for the civil wrong, and then for a misdemeanor, for the crime which it is proposed to create by this Bill. I think it might be possible to place this clause in such a position that a man could only be convicted, so to speak, once for the same offence; that, if criminal proceedings are taken against him, and he is incarcerated for two years, or whatever time may be fixed, no other proceedings should be taken against him. I am not prepared to say now how far this could be done, but I think the Minister of Justice will agree with me that it is difficult to deal with these matters in Committee of the Whole House, of which the majority of the members are laymen. I therefore suggest that the Bill should be referred to a select committee, which I believe could better deal with it than a Committee of the Whole House. I would suggest that the Minister of Justice and the member for North Simcoe should be on that committee.

Mr. CHARLTON. I regret that the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has seen fit to make the suggestion he has, that this Bill should be referred to a select committee. The reference of the Bill in this manner would, in all probability, mean its burking for this Session. The Bill may have imperfections, but I think there are none so radical as to prevent their being dealt with in Committee of the Whole. The difficulty occurred to my mind, and I thought it better, instead of referring the Bill to a special committee, to consult the Minister of Justice himself, and by his kind permission, I have done so, and amendments have been suggested by him which I think will make the Bill acceptable to the House and even to my hon. friend from Huron. With reference to the fifth and sixth clauses of this Bill, I do not know that either of them is objectionable or essential to the Bill. The fifth clause could be expunged if it were inconsistent with the existing law, and I think the sixth clause could be amended in such a way as to make it acceptable. The Minister of Justice has heard the objections of the member for Huron, and he knows what the member for Huron does not know, what amendments are to be proposed; and I will leave it to the Minister of Justice to decide whether the proposal of the member for Huron should be adopted or not.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It is quite correct that the hon. member who introduced this Bill was good enough to have a consultation with me, and I suggested to him some amendments for which I only am responsible. I know that there are many differences of opinion in regard to this matter, and I would personally prefer that the Bill should go to a special committee, if the hon. gentleman is not convinced that that would result in the defeat of the Bill by lapse of time, which I think would not be the case. I stated to him yesterday that, although I would not ask to have it so referred, I would desire it, and, as the suggestion has been made and it is a question of great importance, I will say that I think all such Bills as this are better considered after investigation by a special committee. I think, as one member of the House, that it would be preferable to refer it to a special committee.

Mr. CHARLTON. In bowing to the decision of the Minister of Justice, which I have no doubt is correct, I may ask, parenthetically, if delay is occasioned by the reference, that the Government will be kind enough to allow the Bill a chance to be considered by the House, as it might not be reached in the regular order of business. I move:

That the Bill be referred to a Special Committee consisting of Messrs. Thompson (Antigonish), Casgrain, Patterson (Essex), Cameron (Huron), Curran, Temple, Shakespeare, Hilliard and the mover.

Order for Committee discharged, and Bill referred to Special Committee.

FARM OR REAL ESTATE BANKS.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole further to consider certain proposed resolutions to provide for the granting of charters to farm or real estate banks.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 3,

Mr. ORTON. Before proceeding to the concluding resolutions, I wish to make a few remarks as to the object I have in view, and to answer some objections that have been raised against the Bill that is proposed to be founded upon these resolutions. It was strongly urged by the hon.

member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that the stockholders would not go into an operation of that kind, because there was no apparent margin of profit. Now, I wish to explain to the House that the margin of profit will consist, in the first place, in the difference in the amount of Dominion bills issued by the bank and loaned out upon mortgage security, and the amount of interest that they have to pay to the Government on the bonds which are given in exchange for these bills when the Government is called upon to redeem them. I also propose that the stock shall not consist alone of mortgages upon real estate, but it may consist of gold, specie, or any other equivalent, in the same manner as other banks, and that there shall be so much paid-up stock before any bank is chartered under this Act. The amount of that paid-up stock will be a detail for consideration. I propose also that this bank shall have power to loan, to a small extent, to farmers only at a higher rate than 5 per cent., that is, not upon mortgage security, but upon note security. I wish also to surround them as far as possible with every safety that can be devised, and I propose that they shall only loan to those farmers who are known to be of good standing.

An hon. MEMBER. They will not need to borrow.

Mr. ORTON. I will show you how they may need small sums. Sometimes farmers may require small sums to hire labor, to put in their seed or to harvest it, or they may desire to meet temporary losses by fire, or losses of cattle, or other embarrassments to which they may be subjected. I propose that this bank shall take the place of the ordinary private banks of the country. Those private banks, as we are all aware, borrow money largely from the ordinary banks at 7 per cent., and they are obliged, in order to obtain a profit, to have a much higher rate than 7 per cent. when they loan it to the farmers for those temporary purposes I have referred to. I also propose, by this Bill, to permit these farmers' banks to loan money at the same rates as other banks, at 7 per cent., but only in small amounts, such an amount as is commonly required by farmers in such operations as I have indicated. I think there is no doubt that this system of banking will result in a great deal of profit to the stockholders. Farmers will take stocks by mortgaging their farms, and get an interest upon that capital that is at present locked up in their improved farms, and those who do not require to borrow money can thus become stockholders in farmers' banks and receive an income upon their capital. An objection was also made that the Government should never assume such a responsibility as to issue to the people of the Dominion, notes redeemable in bonds upon mortgages, because there is a certain amount of risk. Well, we are well aware that such security is to-day the very best security that can be obtained. I have in the Bill provided means for ascertaining accurately the value of the farm, and the soundness of the title; therefore, I think the amount of risk the Government would run would be comparatively small, because the banks would become responsible to the Government for the payment of these bonds. Those banks will not be incorporated, until there is a large amount of stock paid up, so that the security is almost absolutely certain. Why, Sir, we have now before the Committee on Immigration and Colonisation a gentleman who was engaged in settling the North-West with Mennonites, under a plan by which the Government loaned to those Mennonites a large sum of money, $95,000, to assist them in settling our North-West, and it has been a very successful venture. But the Government first secured themselves by bonds given by certain farmers in the county of Waterloo, and that this operation turned out very successfully indeed. Those Mennonites are to-day prosperous people, and many have become wealthy, and in the course of another year it is supposed that they will be able to pay off all their indebtedness. That is a case in point where such kind of aid may be of immense value in the settlement of our new country; and, in the same way, the temporary accommodation that would be afforded to farmers through the operation of this bank, will be the means not only of settling up the land, but of aiding those farmers who are now living upon improved farms to compete with the outside world in the European market. Of course, Mr. Chairman, it is generally conceded that the primary object of monetary legislation is the convertibility of the bank notes. Under this Act that convertibility is absolutely secured; the notes issued by the Government are convertible into Government bonds; those bonds have their market value and will command gold at exactly the price of the credit of the Dominion of Canada. Another benefit that I claim is the absolute protection to the public against any loss. Another advantage is that the foreign drain, when excessive, can be met without any strain upon the business of the country, by borrowing at the lowest possible rate of interest, and the amount required to be borrowed the lowest possible sum. That would be a very great advantage to the country at large, and would reduce the amount of money we are required to borrow from abroad, because to that extent it would reduce the annual drain on our people in the shape of interest. Another benefit is that it secures that the rate of discount for foreign exchange be uniformly kept at as low a rate as the actual credit of our country will warrant. It does not interfere with, but rather strengthens the position and usefulness of the more purely commercial banks of the country. The Dominion Farmers' Bank notes will not depreciate, as the public would not keep out of circulation any more than was absolutely required for the transaction of their business. The bonds represent the gold basis, and whenever too large a circulation of Dominion Bank bills exist they are converted into bonds, and bring the owner interest on his money. If gold is required for foreign demand, the Government bonds are the cheapest and readiest means of obtaining that gold or its foreign equivalent, and will be used for foreign exchange, as it can always be convertible, at the current value of Dominion of Canada credit, into gold or its equivalent in any foreign country with which we trade, so that, practically, the Government will seldom, if ever, be required to pay in specie, and consequently gold will accumulate instead of decrease in amount in this country, which appears to be the tendency at the present time. It provides a negotiable security in which the humblest economiser who has saved $10 can invest and receive interest therefrom. It provides a means of distributing amongst the borrowers of money on first-class mortgage security, a share in the profits made by the transactions of these farmers banks. It provides the wealth producing class of our country with facilities for carrying on their industry at the lowest possible rate which the credit of our country will permit. The result will be a benefit to all industrial classes by keeping labor employed at remunerative prices. It will afford a powerful aid to the settlement of our vast tracts of productive soil and prevent settlers from being handicapped by loans at exorbitant rates. I think that is a very important question for Parliament to consider in settling up our agricultural lands, namely, that the new settlers will be protected, as far as the Government can protect them, from exorbitant rates of interest. To-day, before the Agricultural and Immigration Committee, a fact was stated, which is known to members of the House, that the loan societies are not lending money in the North-West at the same rate as they charge in the older portions of the country, charging in the North-West seldom less than 10 per cent., in a few instances 8 per cent. I mention this as one matter which ought to receive the very serious consideration of this House at the commencement of settlement in a new country. Another benefit I may mention is, that the system I propose will stimulate healthily the development of our mineral, timber, fisheries, and other national resources by attracting the capital of those who desire high rates of interest in that direction, instead of being used for usurious purposes, and thereby will increase the home market for farm produce as well as manufactures. Those are some of the advantages I claim for this Bill, and I have yet to meet with any arguments that can be fairly advanced as reasons why farmers' banks should not be established. I have pointed out the extraordinary benefit of the system on the continent of Europe; and no more remarkable example could be found than that of France where, previous to the inauguration of the Crédit Foncier, the rate of interest for loans on farm lands was 12 per cent., whereas the rate has been reduced to 3, 4 or 5 per cent. That was brought about by the action of the Crédit Foncier, founded on principles similar to those embodied in this Bill; but I desire the farmers' banks in this country to be backed up by the credit of the Dominion as well.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the time is surely now come when the Government will give the House some information as to the course they propose to pursue with respect to this important question which has been raised by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I need not say that the Minister of Finance will see himself, in glancing at the resolutions, that transactions to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars may be involved under these resolutions, and, no doubt, the Government will have maturely considered them and be prepared to announce what conclusion they have arrived at as to the policy set out in them.

Mr. McLELAN. The Government have not come to the conclusion to adopt any policy embodied in these resolutions. I understood, the other day, the proposition was to send them to the Banking and Commerce Committee to be discussed there, and to hear the views of the various gentlemen selected to represent that interest upon that committee, and to have them generally discussed. The Government have not agreed to adopt any principle in them; these resolutions have not been discussed by the Government as resolutions embodying any principle to be adopted by them, and they have not come to any conclusion, nor do I think they will very hastily come to the conclusion to adopt them. It may be desirable, it is but due to the hon. gentleman who introduces them, that they should receive the consideration of the Banking and Commerce Committee, and I think, without the House being committed to the principles involved, they should go before that committee. I think that was the understanding arrived at, the other day, that the resolutions should go to the committee, without the House being pledged to the principles embodied in them.

Mr. MILLS. The statement of the Finance Minister would show that Ministers are in the clouds—that they have no opinion on the subject. Here is a question which would seriously affect our banking institutions—in fact, change the whole policy of our circulation, one which would affect the interests of the Government to the extent of millions; and yet the Finance Minister tells us that the Government do not yet know their views on the question. If we are to draw any conclusion from the hon. gentleman's statement, it is that the Government have no opinion on the subject. They have admitted they have not yet become capable of forming an opinion, and they wished to be advised by an important committee of the House. That is certainly a very extraordinary position for the Government to take upon a question of such magnitude. This is a question upon which the Government ought to have an opinion. It is a duty they owe to the House. They have other duties to discharge besides occupying the Treasury benches and receiving the salaries of Ministers. It is their business to inform themselves on questions of this kind, and to take the responsibility of determining what the policy of the country shall be on the subject. The Finance Minister says the Government have no policy upon the subject; they have not yet come to any conclusion. The hon. gentleman doubts whether the Government would adopt the views of the promoter of these resolutions; he thinks they would be very slow to accept the policy embodied in them; and yet the time of Parliament and the time of the Committee is to be taken up in discussing a measure and a policy that would be of the utmost importance to this country, and the Government have no opinion on the subject. I wish to say a word, Mr. Chairman, with regard to the observations of the promoter of these resolutions. The hon. gentleman has presented to us a scheme, and he tells us he is going to provide in these resolutions for the taking of a larger rate of interest than 5 per cent. under certain circumstances. When the loans are precarious, when the security is not of the highest order, then these banking institutions, when they are established under this arrangement, are to be allowed to take a higher rate of interest than 5 per cent. The hon. gentleman told us, the other day, that these parties were to mortgage the real estate of the country to the extent of half its value, and this security was to be the capital upon which these banking operations were to be carried on.

An hon. MEMBER. Part of it.

Mr. MILLS. If there is any other, I do not know of it. I wish to point out that the hon. gentleman assumes that these parties who pledge their real estate for the purpose of furnishing the means to carry on these banking operations to the extent of half its value, will receive 5 per cent. on the half, or on all the value of the real estate, and he went on to tell us that each farmer who went into the enterprise would receive this 5 per cent. on half the value of his property. That assumption is based on the theory that the whole of the capital of the bank is to continue for all time in circulation. I would like to know what banking institution in the world can show any such result as that. Who are to be the borrowers, the debtors of these banking institutions? The agricultural population, the population who furnish the capital by pledging their property as the basis of this circulation, and those people are supposed to be in such needy circumstances that they are going to borrow to the extent of half the value of all the farming lands in the Dominion of Canada, if all the farmers are going into the enterprise. Unless that were the case, unless they borrowed to the extent of half the value continuously of the whole of the agricultural lands of the country, then no such profits could be derived as the hon. gentleman has mentioned. I say it is a very extraordinary scheme that the hon. gentleman presents, and it is very extraordinary that the time of Parliament should be taken up, and, in addition, that the time of an important committee of this House should be taken up with the discussion of this scheme, when the Government will not assume the responsibility of saying they favor it—will not assume the responsibility of saying that if the House and the committee are disposed to favor this scheme, they will in the end accept the responsibility of promoting it. Now, Sir, if the Government wish, as the hon. Minister has vaguely hinted, to kill the proposition of the hon. gentleman, it would be better they should do it here, than that the time of the Committee should be taken up with its consideration, and that it should then be killed after a considerable portion of time has been spent to no purpose.

Mr. HESSON. It would appear that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is not in favor of this measure, and that he is not going to render any assistance towards perfecting a measure which appears to be called for by a large number of the people of this country. Now, I should have supposed that the hon. gentleman could have seen sufficient advantage in this Bill to the most hard-working and the most important part of the citizens of Canada, to have made some valuable suggestions to perfect a measure which I believe, and which he must conscientiously believe, if it can be put in a good working position, would be of great advantage to the farmers of Canada. The hon. gentleman wants to make it appear that it is a most unreasonable proposition to suppose that all the farmers of Canada will mortgage their farms to the extent of half their value for the purpose of lending it out at 5 per cent. It was never supposed that all the farmers would agree to do this. In the first place, all the farmers are not in a position to take advantage of this Act, so as to become parties likely to receive interest from the investment they make, when they involve their land under mortgage. Unfortunately, only a portion of the farmers of Canada are in the happy position of being able to say that their land is free from mortgage or liability of any kind whatever. Now, if that happy portion of the farmers of Canada can take advantage of their position and say that their farms are free, and that they are willing that those farms should be placed as a basis for a circulating medium to loan to the other more unfortunate portion of the farming population, who, as is well known to every hon. gentleman present, are now compelled to borrow at high rates of interest—I say if that class can put their property in as a basis of circulation, instead of the specie upon which the Government may furnish a circulation, and if they can lend it out at 5 per cent. instead of 7, 8, 9 and 10 per cent., which they have to pay in some instances at present, then I contend that there will be an advantage to both of those classes so great, that one would think it would be sufficient to induce the hon. gentleman to have given us the benefit of his intelligence upon this very important question. The hon. gentleman seems disposed to find fault with the Government for not expressing their views on this question. This measure has been brought before the House for the very purpose of asking the intelligent assistance, not of the Government alone, but of hon. gentlemen who are equally as capable of forming an opinion as to the wants of the public as members of the Cabinet are themselves. I hold that there is not a gentleman in this House who does not represent equally, with regard to his own constituents, as much responsibility as the members of the Cabinet do themselves in their individual capacities. Such being the case, I think opinions might well be discussed and formed here, and if in the multitude of councils there is wisdom, I should have hoped that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who has had a great deal of experience in the legislation of this country, and who is frequently capable of throwing important light on the discussion of questions in this House, would join us in endeavoring to produce a measure which would be advantageous to the large and important class who are most deeply interested in it, instead of throwing cold water on a measure which is intended to benefit them. I see no reason why this measure might not be made to work successfully. I repeat what I said on a former occasion, that I have not a high opinion of the basis upon which the banking institutions of Canada are established to-day—the specie basis—as being the only really satisfactory basis on which banking might be done in the country. We know perfectly well that the large trade which is done in Canada to-day, if you put it on the basis of the specie which is held basis of about $7,000,000, though the trade reaches as by the chartered banks of Canada, is being done on an aggregate of hundreds of millions of dollars. Now, if they are capable of doing that on the basis of $7,000,000, may it not be done by fairness on a security which I hold—and I challenge any hon. gentleman to deny it—is a better security than the specie on which the bank circulation is based. May not farmers also accomplish some good purpose for their own particular class, whom we all feel anxious to help, and whom we all sympathise with in their difficult position from time to time when they find their crops failing and large liabilities maturing. I do not wish to see this matter thrown aside, nor do I desire that the Government should immediately take up the question, or until they have received a more honest expression of opinion upon it from the representatives of the people of Canada in this House, as to what they believe would be the effect of such legislation and the advantages to be derived from it by the particular class for whom it is devised. I do not profess to adopt all that the introducer of these resolutions proposes. I do not suppose any Bill can be brought before the House that could not be improved to a considerable extent if referred to a committee; and the mover of this Bill from his standpoint may ask for provisions to be inserted in it which might be properly considered by the majority to be out of place in the Bill altogether. I am not prepared to say that it is desirable to give even a farmer the privilege of borrowing on a note unless it is secured by collateral security, or that the chartered banks should not be secured in the same way. Seeing that the stockholders in such a bank would have a clear dividend of at least 4 per cent. net after paying all expenses out of what is now dead capital in their estates, they might fairly be asked to lend to the unfortunate farmer who has to borrow, either on mortgage or notes well secured by collaterals, at the low rate of 5 per cent. instead of 7 or 8 per cent., as is charged by the banks at present. I hope that this matter will go before the Banking Committee, that it will be fully discussed, and that gentlemen on both sides of the House will declare their views on it. It is a very important measure indeed—so important that I have no doubt the Government will be obliged, eventually, to take hold of it; and if any member of this House goes before his constituents, and places honestly before them the manner in which bank transactions are conducted under our present system, and the proposition at present before the House, I venture to say that nine out of ten of the intelligent electors will say, "God speed your measure." I am satisfied that the adoption of this measure would be a very important step towards enabling the Government to provide and protect the circulation. As I have before pointed out, it is at the basis and foundation of the success of this question that until the chartered banks of Canada are deprived of the privilege now enjoyed by them of circulating their own promises to pay, and the Government substitute the circulation of Dominion of Canada notes for them, the Government cannot divest itself of the responsibility of providing for that circulation as they now provide for the Government circulation of $15,000,000. Every hon. gentleman who has investigated the returns made from time to time by the chartered banks of Canada, must know that the Government are to day in the unfortunate position that the chartered banks of the country can lock up the whole of the Government issue by substituting their own notes for Dominion notes, keeping them in circulation; and they could come any day and clean out the Government's whole reserve of specie, which is only $2,000,000 or $3,000,000. I say, therefore, that the only course for the Government to take is to require the chartered banks to give up their circulation, and to substitute for it a straight circulation of Dominion notes. That will do away with the practice of the banks holding Government notes, as they are holding four-fifths of them to-day, by which we lose the benefit of wear and tear, and the banks hold the Dominion notes as specie; they are compelled by law to hold 40 per cent., but they hold more than that for their own convenience. I strongly favor this Bill, and I think there is intelligence enough in this House to give the people that advantage which it is designed to confer upon them.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is incomprehensible to me, Sir, if the Government are not about to adopt the principle of issuing incontrovertible currency, that they should allow discussions of this kind to proceed in this House without an expression of their policy. If they desire to foster and promote the manufacture of a sentiment of this kind to the extent that will warrant them in departing from what the whole financial world consider to be sound principles, they could not take a better course than they are now taking—that of silence.

Mr. ORTON. This is not incontrovertible currency.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Finance Minister says the Government have not agreed to adopt that principle. That may be true, but the Government have given no expression of opinion upon it, and I hold that if the Government have an opinion on what is the true basis of financial circulation, it is their duty to manifest that opinion when a question of this kind is under discussion. The Minister also tells us that he proposes to allow the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill to refer it to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. Well, the more this question is discussed and the more attention it receives from the members of this House, the more danger there is of a departure from the sound financial basis on which business is done, provided that basis is sound. The hon. gentleman who last spoke says the Bill would be of great advantage to the farmers. If I thought it would be advantageous to the farmers, as my constituency is composed of farmers, I would support it. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman who last spoke, and the hon. member for Centre Wellington, are both very earnest and honest in their support of this measure; I give them full credit for earnestness and honesty; but I believe they are radically mistaken. The hon. member for North Perth tells us that this Bill is brought before the House to elicit the opinions of men who know as much, if not more, about financial questions than the Government of the day. Well, judging from the silence of the Government, perhaps he may be justified in casting that reflection on their knowledge of financial questions. He tells us—and he betrays in that expression the whole animus that controls both himself and the mover of these resolutions—that he has not a very good opinion of the specie basis; he does not believe it is the proper basis for banking business. The whole scheme revolves itself into a proposal to adopt a banking scheme that will do away with specie payments in this country. It is incontrovertibly fiat money under disguise. If the Minister of Finance holds the opinion I do as to the danger of this principle, he would not fail for a moment to give expression to the opinion and to the wishes of the Government in regard to this matter. The hon. member refers to the small specie basis in this country. I am free to confess that the specie basis held by the Government is dangerously small, but it has hitherto served the purpose. We have not suspended specie payments; our notes have been redeemed in gold, and they have maintained a high character as currency. It may be true the basis is too small, but that is not an argument that it should be done away with all together; on the contrary, if it points in any direction, it points in favor of increasing the specie basis and strengthening the hands of the Government in this respect. The first resolution of the hon. member for Centre Wellington laments the drainage of money from this country for the payment of interest, and proposes this scheme as a cure to that evil. I think I could suggest to the hon. gentleman a scheme that would work more advantageously than this, and that is to cease accumulating the debt, to cease piling up liabilities against the Government, requiring every year a larger drain for the purpose of paying interest on the public debt. The second resolution provides that Dominion notes shall be exchanged for mortgages redeemable in Government bonds based upon such mortgages, or bonds drawing 4 per cent. interest; that is, that the Government shall be obliged to issue its notes in exchange for mortgages given for real estate, under the conditions of this resolution. The mortgages are to be for not more than half the value of the real estate mortgaged; but we have in other countries, where real estate has been used as a basis of banking, the fact that great abuses exist through over-valuation, and there is no guarantee that the Government would not exchange its notes for mortgages on real estate given for more than the worth of the real estate.

Mr. HESSON. Does that not apply to over-valuation of real estate in cities and towns?

Mr. CHARLTON. I said that mortgages placed on real estate, under the provision of these resolutions, that are to be taken by the Government in exchange for their notes, issued to the parties giving the mortgages—I said that while the resolutions provide that these mortgages should not be for more than half the value of the real estate, yet over-valuation could be resorted to, and there was no guarantee against frauds on the Government of that kind, namely, that the supposed one-half value of the land would be really in excess of the value, and the Government would find itself issuing bonds on mortgages really worth less than the amount of the issue. The hon. gentleman proposes to establish land banks having as their capital stock these mortgages which are to be exchanged with the Government for Dominion notes and specie. He says, when challenged on this point by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the land mortgages would be a part of the capital only. In the very circumstances of the case, the land mortgages would be the sole capital of the bank. Banks would be established based upon these mortgages given on real estate and passed over to the Minister of Finance in exchange for Dominion notes; these banks would proceed to do business on these notes, and no provision is made or contemplated for their redemption by the banks. The notes are to be redeemed by the Government. As I have said, the Government reserve of specie is altogether too small; it is dangerously small for the issue at present, but if we adopt the scheme which may lead to the issue of scores of millions of Dominion notes in exchange for possibly worthless mortgages, the Government will be unable to provide a specie reserve sufficient to actually provide for the redemption of its notes, and we will have reached a period of irredeemable currency. That is the inevitable result that will follow the adoption of this policy. The danger that menaces us in this direction is very grave. Already we are heavily burdened with debt; this would greatly increase the burden, and if we were to attempt, after incurring these obligations, to retrace our steps and enter the way of economy, it would be impossible to stop short before we had increased our debt many millions. If matters go on as they have been going on, the financial necessities of the country will be a strong inducement to some weak-kneed Finance Minister, if we should ever have one, to issue floods of Dominion notes, so as to tide over temporarily the difficulty; and if once we enter on this course, the end will be financial ruin. We will be unable to maintain the character of our currency, when we are unable to redeem it in gold, and the door will be opened for disasters and evils that every student of history can well understand; but that, doubtless, the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) and the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) may not be aware of. This scheme for the establishment of land banks that is launched upon us has not the charm of novelty. It does not belong to this year, or this generation, or this century. We have heard of land banks being established long ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. John Law's was the first.

Mr. CHARLTON. Their projectors promised that they would work wonders, and they never failed in any instance to entail financial disaster. I will read for the benefit of my hon. friends a little extract from a standard work on history: England, by Macaulay. The circumstances related here occurred in the year 1694, some time ago. He says:

"Some pamphleteer maintained that a national bank ought to be under the direction of the king. Others thought that the management ought to be intrusted to the Lord Mayor, aldermen and common council of the capital. After the Revolution the subject was discussed with animation before unknown. For, under the influence of liberty, the breed of political projectors multiplied exceedingly. A crowd of plans, some of which resemble the fancies of a child or the dreams of a man in a fever, were pressed on the Government. Pre-eminently conspicuous among the political mountebanks, whose busy faces were seen every day in the lobby of the House of Commons, were John Briscoe and Hugh Chamberlayne, two projectors worthy to have been members of that academy which Gulliver found at Ladado. These men affirmed that the one cure for every distemper of the State was a land bank. A land bank would work for England miracles such as had never been wrought for Israel—miracles exceeding the heaps of quails and the daily shower of manna. There would be no taxes; and yet the exchequer would be full to overflowing. There would be no poor rates, for there would be no poor. The income of every landowner would be doubled. The profits of every merchant would be increased. In short, the island would, to use Briscoe's words, be the paradise of the world. The only losers would be the moneyed men, those worse enemies of the nation, who had done more injury to the gentry and yeomanry than an invading army from France would have had the heart to do. These blessed effects the land bank was to produce simply by issuing enormous quantities of notes on landed security. The speculations of Chamberlayne on the subject of currency may possibly find admirers even in our own time."

They do. It seems a couple of their admirers in that line are in our House of Commons.—

"They insisted on referring Chamberlayne's plan to a committee; and the committee reported that the plan was practicable, and would tend to the benefit of the nation. But by this time the united force of demonstration and derision had begun to produce an effect even on the most ignorant rustics in the House. The report lay unnoticed on the Table, and the country was saved from a calamity compared with which the defeat of Landen and the loss of the Smyrna fleet would have been blessings."

In after years a land bank was established. This was two years afterwards. Macaulay says:

"But the united force of reason and ridicule had reduced the once numerous sect which followed Chamberlayne to a small and select company of incorrigible fools. Few even of the squires now believed in his two great doctrines: the doctrine that the State can, by merely calling a bundle of old rags ten millions sterling, add ten millions sterling to the riches of the nation; and the doctrine that a lease of land for a term of years may be worth many times the fee simple."

Well, the bank was established, it was to loan not less than five hundred millions sterling to landholders at 4 per cent. It went into operation, but it failed to make the loan to the Government which it stipulated to make, and it failed to make the loan to farmers, and it proved an ignominious failure, though it was less injurious to England than any similar scheme was to any other country.

Mr. HESSON. Come to something later.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, I am coming to something later. The hon. gentleman evidently does not believe in the maxim of a very wise old man who says that there is nothing new under the sun. Now, we come down to the year 1716, when there was a land bank established in France by a gentleman of the name of George Law. He advocated, as my friends do to-day, the idea that land was as good a basis as gold for the issue of currency, and his views were adopted by the French Council. A royal bank was established, a land bank, and it issued currency based on State lands and State property.

Mr. HESSON. Confiscated lands.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; my friend is wrong. We are coming later to the confiscated lands. The bills of George Law were issued on the basis of State lands and State property, and issue after issue was made until the Bank of France had issued 3,000,000,000 francs. This was followed by wild speculation, and the Mississippi scheme was one characteristic result of that speculation. In four years, the speculation ran its course, and that was followed by general collapse. The whole thing went to ruin, the notes of the Bank of France were worth no more than waste paper, and George Law was a fugitive from justice. Then we come to the event which is evidently floating around dimly in the memory of my friend from South Huron.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not South Huron.

Mr. CHARLTON. I ask the hon. knight's pardon; I mean the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson). In 1789 the Government of France, though they had a terrible lesson before them in the failure of the scheme of George Law, were asked to issue bills based on land. They shrunk from doing it at first, but they were advised that, by being careful and avoiding over-issue, they would be perfectly safe. They had confiscated the Church estates, and they had a large basis of land and property to go upon, and they issued assignats based upon the Church estates and other property in France. First they issued 400,000,000 francs, and then 800,000,000 francs more, and the more they issued the less became the purchasing power of the assignats and the greater the necessity to issue more. Then they issued 600,000,000 francs more, and by 1792, three years after the first issue, the issues amounted to 3,400,000,000 francs. There was great distress, and it was said that a man went to market with a wheelbarrow full of money and came back with a market-basket full of what he bought with it. The Government officials had to resign, as their salaries were not sufficient to purchase the necessaries of life, and the Government could scarcely be carried on. In 1795, 100 francs of assignats were worth only 5 sous. Then mandats were issued, one franc representing 30 francs in assignats, and these were at a discount very quickly, to such an extent that it took 1,000 mandats to buy one, so that 30,000 francs of assignats were worth only 1 franc in silver. The scheme failed, the fabric crumbled into ruin, and the results to France were more disastrous than all the consequences of the wars she passed through from the time the French rebellion broke out to the time that Napoleon was made a prisoner and sent to Elba. History abounds in similar instances of the ruin that results from the disregard of sound financial principles. The American colonies issued money payable in Spanish mill dollars, but though it was to be payable, it was not payable for the time being. These issues of Continental money were made to such an extent that great financial disaster followed, and finally the whole issue was obliterated and was never redeemed. It was worth no more than paper rags. I might multiply instances of this kind. We have instances to-day. We might point to the South American States or to Turkey, and the sickest thing about Turkey is her sick financial state, her irredeemable currency. We might point to Russia also. But I will not refer to these cases. I will only point to the United States. During the civil war, the Northern States carefully abstained from an over-issue as far as they could do so, and their greenbacks were based upon a promise to pay in gold, and were ultimately paid in gold, and yet, in 1863, those greenbacks were worth only thirty-four cents on the dollar, and the result was great derangement of business and financial distress. The Confederacy issued scrip promises to pay, and, before the rebellion was subdued, their notes were not worth four cents on the dollar. This House has already pronounced on the question of irredeemable currency, but this land bank scheme is a move in that direction, a concealed and dangerous move in that direction, and the Government ought to pronounce an opinion upon such an important matter. The issue of an irredeemable currency is dangerous, and history shows that it is dangerous, there is no case in all history where a nation has departed from specie payment without disaster resulting from that departure. As to money, one would think, to hear hon. gentlemen speak, that we had no money in this country. Why, the fact is that the banks are unable to circulate the money which they have. They are trying every means to put that money into circulation, and money can be borrowed from the banks for six per cent., and in large sums possibly for five per cent. They cannot get circulation for the money which is now in their vaults. What sense is there then in flooding this country with irredeemable and worthless trash when we have plenty of good money for all the wants of the country, and a reserve of more if we desire to use it? Some gentlemen seem to think that there is a short cut to fortune. Men are looking for the philosopher's stone which will turn base metal into gold. Men are trying to escape the results of the primal curse which declares that they shall be obliged to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow; but we cannot possibly escape from these conditions by visionary schemes for increasing wealth. We cannot get something for nothing. If you are going to attain to value, you must give something valuable for it. The object of our friends here is to get money cheaply. No doubt they can do it, but it will be a cheap and worthless kind of money. These visionary schemes for getting money cheaply are always worthless. A warehouse receipt may be a legal tender for the amount of grain it represents; a land warrant may be good for the number of acres of land it calls for; a receipt for a certain amount of pig iron is good for the quantity of iron it calls for; but none of all these representations of value are convertible into other values. For 3,000 years, aye, for 4,000, the world has adopted a convertible medium, which has stood the test of time, and every attempt that has been made to substitute something else for it has been a dead failure. Gold and silver, at an early date, were adopted as representations of value, something interchangeable into anything else. A warehouse receipt could not be made that; stocks, grain, or any other kind of property are not interchangeable and convertible into other kinds of property, and for this reason gold and silver serve admirably the purpose of a medium of exchange, and nothing else does it. No scheme of banking can be adopted that will substitute something else for specie as a medium of exchange, a basis upon which currency shall be issued, and no such schemes as proposed can be successful. Of course, land scrip or anything of this kind may be issued at a certain value, and the fluctuation of its value carry it down below par. That is a difficulty that all kinds of representations of value are subject to, except gold and silver. They are an absolute and sure standard of value. As such they cannot be changed, and there is nothing else in the line of property you can suggest that cannot be changed. Other things will fluctuate in value, personal property of all kinds will fluctuate in value, and for this reason alone nothing but gold and silver are a proper basis upon which to issue currency. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the Government will not allow a discussion of this kind to proceed, a discussion that threatens the very basis of the finances of our country, without giving some expression of their opinions upon the very grave and important question as to the proper basis for banking, and the proper mode in which the business of this ought to be transacted.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am not going to enter into a discussion of banking itself, as it is a subject I do not pretend to understand, but I wish to point out to the mover of the resolutions the great danger there is in setting up the farmers as a distinct class in this community. I utterly deny the proposition that the farmers are, or ever can be, or ought to be, a distinct class in this community. The hon. gentleman talks about the legal profession, but that sneer is not applicable to me. Lawyers are not a distinct class in this community; lawyers are workingmen just like the rest of us, as well as the doctors and other professional men in this country. In point of fact we are all workingmen in this country; we all stand exactly upon the same footing. The farmer is not only a manufacturer, but he is also a trader. Therefore, whatever sound economical principles may be applied to other trades and professions, are equally applicable to the farmers, and to attempt to set up a system of finance for the farmers specially would be just as absurd and dangerous as to set up a separate system of law, or social custom, or anything else for the farmer. He must stand or fall with the rest of the community. I admit that in this agricultural country, as in almost all other countries, the produce of the land must be the ultimate basis of wealth, but beyond that the farmer's relations to all other classes of the community are just the same as those of any other class. I have perfect confidence in the integrity of the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) in bringing in these resolutions, but I believe he is the victim of what might be called an innocent, but a very dangerous fad. I would not like to apply to him an expression which was once used by the celebrated Dr. Dunlop with regard to responsible Government—perhaps some hon. gentleman here may remember it; I do not apply the expression to my hon. friend, nor to any of those who advocate the scheme in this House, but I say it is a scheme to which, so far as I can form an opinion of it, that expression might be applied—"a trap set by knaves to catch fools." I entirely acquit the promoters of these resolutions of any such idea. I believe they are extremely mistaken; but, at the same time, a man's mistakes, though perfectly innocent, may be exceedingly dangerous, and I think that nothing can be more dangerous than to attempt to lead the farmers of this country to believe that there is some patent process by which they can be made rich. Their general opinion is, I believe, that they have to stand or fall with the rest of the community, and I think any attempt to make them think otherwise must end in disaster and result most disadvantageously to those who bring in such a scheme as that now before the House. It is, I have no doubt, a cheap way of gaining popularity in a rural district, to devise a scheme by which the farmers may apparently get rich without working. I, for one, might just as well take advantage of this scheme as the hon. members who support this resolution, as I also represent an agricultural constituency. But I have no confidence in the scheme, and putting aside its merits altogether, putting aside the possibility of having a land bank, I believe the attempt which is being made to put the farmers into a special class, having special interest, and requiring special legislation, is one likely to work great evils in this country, and it is on that ground, mainly, that I express my opinion on this matter; and as being the representative of an entirely rural constituency, I might be supposed to have an opinion on the subject and at the same time be afraid to express it.

Mr. ORTON. I merely want to reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). This is not the first time the hon. member has treated us with the identical same speech—at least, the identical same arguments, the identical same references, about certain bubble schemes in England and on the continent. Sir, he commenced his argument by stating, without any ground, that the scheme before the House was on a similar basis. Now, I deny it altogether; I deny that the scheme I propose is in any sense one for an inconvertible currency, or in the direction of asking for an inconvertible currency. On the contrary, I have laid down the fact that it is, beyond all dispute, a currency convertible into gold, but with the intervention of bonds, and those bonds can be used by our people. People who have money in the banks, instead of allowing it to lie idle, can, if they like, invest it in these bonds. There will only be so much of this money in cir-ulation as is absolutely required by the business of the country, because, so soon as there is more in circulation than is required, it will be converted into bonds, and if gold is required these bonds will be converted into gold. Why, how do the loan societies of this country obtain their money? Do they not obtain their money to loan out on the same principle?—those loan societies in which the hon. member for West Durham is a large stockholder, and I have no doubt other hon. members in this House are large stockholders in loan societies. How do they get their money? Why, Sir, a large portion of that money is obtained by converting mortgages into bonds and selling those bonds in the English market for gold or its equivalent. I propose that this plan should be adopted in the most economic manner in order that the farmers shall have directly the money they require for their operations, and no more. It is absurd to talk about the farmers borrowing more than they require; they will not do anything of the kind. I say that the basis of this banking scheme is far superior to the basis of our present banking scheme. We find to-day that the banks of Canada virtually control the Government of Canada. They hold twelve millions of the promises of the Dominion of Canada in their vaults to-day, and any day they can come to the Government and demand gold for those notes. Sir, do you mean to tell me that that is not a great power to give to any one institution? I maintain that this will be the means, to a large extent, of removing the danger which now exists in our present banking system. Instead of increasing the public debt, it will result in decreasing it. A large amount of the bonds will be absorbed by our own people, and they will borrow only as much as they require for their business. I desire to point out the absurdity of the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe, in regard to land banks in England and France. We know that those banks entered into all kinds of speculative operations—they were not confined to lending money on farming lands. In my proposition I seek to confine their operations to the legitimate industry of farming, and not in speculation in railways and in Mississippi stocks.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. ORTON. An hon. member says, "hear, hear," in a sneering way. If the hon. gentleman would try to grapple with the question he would show more respect for the constituency which has sent him here. I have mentioned that all those land banks in France entered into speculations, the building of railways in foreign countries and in their own country; and it thus became an entirely different system from the one I am asking this House to consider. In France, Germany, Russia, and in almost every continental country, such banks have been established, and they have reduced the rate of interest to 3 or 4 per cent. for farmers who require to borrow to carry on their operations. The hon. member for Muskoka has treated this question and myself to a certain amount of ridicule. The hon. gentleman spoke about my laboring under a delusion. If he had given the same thought to this question as I have, he would have the same delusion. He spoke in that manner, because I venture to say he has not given the question a moment's consideration. If he were to visit the library and read the works on banking business he would know the principles of money legislation, and he would find that my Bill is based on the soundest principles laid down by all writers on banking legislation. He told the House that it is a scheme of knaves to catch fools. He did not say that the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) and the hon. member for Centre Wellington are fools, but by innuendo he would lead every one to believe that there is some knavery at the bottom of this scheme. There is no such thing. There is nothing but honest dealing, and it is proposed that these banks shall lend money on the best security offered in the world, and on the same principles, though in an improved degree, as those which control many of the present financial operations. I have purposely provided in the Bill a means by which farm property cannot be mortgaged to its full value. I have provided that satisfactory evidence to the Treasury Board shall be furnished in regard to the value of land covered by every loan. In the county of Wellington we have an accurate valuation by valuers appointed by the County Council, and it is known that that valuation is not an excessive one. I propose there shall be some means of obtaining an exact knowledge of the value of the land upon which the Government shall issue their notes to farmers' banks. Further, I propose that the title shall be looked into by properly appointed legal authorities, such as will be satisfactory to the Treasury Department. With respect to the charge that I am endeavoring to catch cheap popularity, I desire to say that, though it is not directly charged against me, yet it is made by innuendo. I remember a similar charge was brought against me when, year after year, I sought to induce the Government to impose a duty on American produce which came directly into competition with that of our farmers in our home market. Does anyone now believe that I then sought to gain cheap popularity, or that the result of my action has not resulted in benefit to the country? I maintain that the adoption of my proposal will result in an equal or greater amount of good being done than was done by imposing a duty on American farm produce, and it cannot be denied that the imposition of those duties has resulted in an immense benefit to our farmers, and that it has given them our home market.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat appears to feel very deeply the slight amount of ridicule which was cast upon him by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). He seems to have imagined that the hon. gentleman wished to insinuate that he and his assistants in promoting this measure were knaves. I did not at all so interpret the remarks of the hon. gentleman. He quoted a proverb—"a trap set by knaves to catch fools"—applied to a similar case, but I rather understood him to hint that he was afraid the hon. gentleman and his friend behind him had been caught in a trap by some other designing parties. That was the impression produced on the House by the remarks made. But he says now that he is accused of trying to obtain cheap popularity, and that the same accusation was made when he urged the imposition of duties on American grain coming into this country. That accusation was made. I do not suppose that charge against the hon. member for Centre Wellington is any stronger now than it was then; the evidence that he was trying to obtain cheap popularity is as strong now as then. The question is whether he obtained cheap popularity or not. As to that I cannot say with any positiveness; I do not know that he is any more cheaply popular than he was in 1876-77—whether his popularity is cheaper or dearer. I am certain, however, that the Canadian grain which he wished to protect is very much cheaper now than it was then.

Mr. HESSON. If the duty was off, it would be cheaper still.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. gentleman wants to claim that it is the National Policy that has affected the price of grain, he is welcome to all the benefit he can get out of that contention. We are not, however, discussing the National Policy now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite are very glad when I leave that subject.

An hon. MEMBER. Or any other.

Mr. ORTON.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend says: "Or any other." Well, Sir, I do not deny that I have always thought myself a somewhat powerful debater, but I did not know that I was so universally feared by hon. gentlemen opposite. Coming to the matter particularly before us, the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) denies that this scheme leads to an inconvertible currency, because the currency which he proposes is to be redeemable in bonds to be issued by the Government, and these bonds are to be redeemable, as I understand the scheme, in the mortgages which are to form the capital of the farmers' banks. If I am not correct in that statement, I hope the hon. gentleman will signify it.

Mr. ORTON. Partly correct.

Mr. CASEY. I must confess that, taking the advice which the hon. gentleman gave to the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), to grapple with his scheme, I find myself in some difficulty. It is slightly difficult to make out exactly what it does mean. In endeavoring to grapple with it, one is placed somewhat in the position of the American humorist who went out early one morning into a back yard, and suddenly found himself wrestling with a wheelbarrow. He said that as soon as he threw the critter down it kicked up and hit him somewhere else; and so it is with this scheme. When you think you have got to the bottom of it, a new feature crops up which you did not see before. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) evidently thinks that the bonds based on the mortgages were to be the basis for the issue of Government notes. It appears that they are not to be the basis for the issue of the notes, but the basis for their redemption. That hon. gentleman is generally pretty clear in his ideas of what he reads, and I think this misapprehension on his part is a clear proof of the fact that the resolution is not as transparent as it ought to be. But, Sir, we are told that this does not mean an inconvertible currency, but that the currency remains redeemable in specie. Well, Sir, I cannot see, for the life of me, where the redemption in specie comes in. Are the notes to be redeemable only in gold? Are you to present the bonds to the Government and get gold for them?

Mr. ORTON. Certainly.

Mr. CASEY. Well, that is another of those wheelbarrow points that are not explained in the resolution itself. The resolution states that such notes are to be "redeemable in Government bonds based upon such real estate mortgages and bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum." Well, I do not understand the meaning of the words "bonds based on mortgages and bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum," unless the bonds are to be redeemable in mortgages. Under these circumstances, we will have to be content with the hon. gentleman's word, that he means them to be redeemable in specie somehow and somewhere in futurity, though we cannot see it in the resolution. Then the hon. gentleman says that this scheme is in vogue in France, Germany, and Russia, and that if we would go to the Library and get the books we would find this to be the case, and that his principles of banking are those urged by the best authorities on banking and commerce. Well, I have read a few of those authorities, and I have never found one of them in which such schemes were endorsed. I have found books in which they were endorsed, but I do not think that even the hon. gentleman would call them authorities. They were the writings of visionaries whose schemes never came to anything. As to their being in vogue in France, Russia, and Germany, I should like the hon. gentleman to give us his authority on that subject.

Mr. ORTON. What is the Credit Foncier?

Mr. CASEY. I am not very clear as to what the Credit Foncier is, but as I understand—we had a branch of it here, as the hon. gentleman remembers, and I suppose the plan is the same in France—it was simply an institution like our loan companies for lending money to farmers at a rate of interest which seemed low to us, though it was comparatively a high rate for those who imported cheap capital from France. I do not understand that the Credit Foncier is an institution of this kind based on real estate mortgages, and issuing Government notes; and if it is such an institution, I should like the hon. gentleman to show it. I was much pleased with the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), for the reason that he urged that the farmers were not to be regarded as a separate class of the community, in the sense of requiring any legislation tending to make them the pets or favorites of the Government. Now, Sir, as he says, all classes of the community are alike workers, traders, and producers of wealth. The farmers are, in one sense—and I think the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) will agree with me in this—divided a little in their financial needs from the rest of the community. They want money, as a rule, for longer terms, than people in business, and the reason farmers do not obtain cheap money from the banks at present is, that they are not so sure of being able to pay that money promptly as business men and merchants are. When the banks at the present time are lending at 5 and 6 per cent., on short terms, to merchants and other dealers, they will not lend on the same terms to farmers, because the farmer cannot give them the same surety of having their money back exactly at the time bargained for when the money was lent. It seems to be the case that the farmers require the money to remain longer in their hands, although the security is just as good as anybody else can offer. What I think the farmers require in the way of further facilities of obtaining money is, the establishment of banks or money-lending institutions of some kind—whatever you may choose to call them—banks dealing exclusively, or almost exclusively, with the agricultural population, and prepared to lend them money for such terms as the farmers require to have it, and on such security as the farmer can most conveniently give. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) thinks he has provided such institutions by the resolutions which he proposes; but, for my own part, I am quite unable to see that his scheme offers any probability of affording such an institution, and it is for that reason that I oppose going any further with the resolution which is before us. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) accuses the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) of throwing cold water on this scheme because he objected to it for the reason that it did not seem sound, and he said, we should not go on with it further. Now, that is the device adopted by everybody who is supporting an indefensible, wild, or visionary scheme before this House, or any other legislative body. When the scheme appears unsound or absurd on the face of it, and anybody says so, we see the promoter rising with great indignation and saying: You are throwing cold water on an attempt to benefit such or such a class of the community; and he expects thereby to gain sympathy from the particular class which this wild, visionary scheme professes to benefit. If his is not a wild, absurd, and visionary scheme, the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) should not have adopted in support of it the devices which are usually confined to the support of schemes of the nature I refer to. If the hon. gentleman wishes to have it considered a sound and reasonable scheme, he should support it simply by argument, and not by throwing reflections on the actions of those who declare it in their opinion to be unsound and absurd. If I saw anything in it tending to benefit the farming community, or the germ of anything which might be worked out to their benefit, I should give my best support to the resolution, and do my best to assist in perfecting it at a later stage.

The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) did bring in a measure some years ago which had the germ of something useful to the farming community. It did go to a committee. It was there elaborated with the best assistance which could be given to it from this side of the House, and certainly, although the Bill, as finally reported, was very little like what it was when first introduced, we got something that proved useful to the farming community. If the present measure was a similar one, I would support it; but it is not a similar case, and, therefore, I cannot support it. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) says that if the banks can do a business of $100,000,000 with $7,000,000 of specie, why should not these banks do a large business with the capital they are to have? Now, Sir, he is evidently confusing two ideas; he is confusing the specie reserves of the banks with the capital of the banks. It is not with specie alone that the banks do their business; that is only one part, and a small part, of their resources—the part kept on hand for immediate use in redeeming notes. What the bank loans is not the specie reserve. The bank lends its own credit—the credit of all the shareholders of the bank to the extent of their paid-up shares, and the credit of the bank based on its entire assets; it lends its own credit as well as the notes which represent the actual specie reserve which it keeps on hand. A bank is a machine, not for lending specie and all kinds of paper money, but for dealing in credit. It allows a person who gives it security to substitute the bank's credit for his own, and to put in circulation a note of hand of the bank, which will be accepted by everybody in lieu of the man's own note of hand, while the bank takes the man's note of hand as its security. It is not the specie which the bank lends; therefore the hon. gentleman's argument has no application at all. Then, Sir, he says the rate of interest would be reduced under this scheme. He thinks the proposed bank can lend farmers money at a lower rate of interest than they now pay. Well, if the hon. gentleman believes that by any patent machine of this sort he can enable anybody to lend money at a lower rate of interest than the average rate of profit procurable in the country from the use of money, there is no use in arguing any more with him; because a person who believes that is unassailable by arguments based on political or financial economy. But if he merely means to urge that this bank will enable farmers to get money at the lowest current rate of interest, I am prepared to argue with him on that point, and we must go a little into the constitution of the bank to do it. As I understand it, the capital is to consist of mortgages put in by farmers, who will thereby become shareholders in the bank. I do not know whether it will lend to those farmers only, or to farmers generally. I would ask the promoter of the Bill how that is.

Mr. ORTON. Loans confined to farmers.

Mr. CASEY. To farmers generally, as well as to those who put in their mortgages. Well, either those mortgages will bear interest, or they will not. I do not understand from the resolution whether they are to bear interest or not; but if they are, I do not see what profit the shareholder is to get from his investment, if he gives an interest-bearing mortgage on his farm, and only gets a profit from the bank which lends money at 5 per cent. If, on the other hand, the mortgages do not bear interest, the security to the Government is not so good. Then, the Government are to issue notes to the banks, to be reissued by the banks to an extent equal to the amount of the mortgages. Now, if the mortgages are to be transferred to the Government for those notes, then the mortgages are all that the Government will hold for the notes they issue; and as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) pointed out, the Government are subjected to the whole risk of over-valuation of property. Every one connected with a loan company knows that notwithstanding the greatest care they can exercise, there is considerable risk run from the over-valuation of land on which they effect loans; and I do not suppose the valutors of these land banks would be more infallible than others. Then the farmer who gives the mortgage, in order to make the title secure, is to be subjected to the expense of proving his title, which we all know is one of the most troublesome and expensive things connected with obtaining a loan from a loan company; it is one of the things which borrowers most object to in their dealings with loan companies; and the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) proposes to subject the farmers, who become shareholders in this bank, to that same trouble, which is found to be a considerable part of the expense of the transaction. Then he will be put to the expense of making the mortgage. Altogether, I do not see how the mortgagor is going to get any advantage from giving a mortgage to the farmers' bank and borrowing money from it that he will not get by giving a mortgage to a loan company, and borrowing money from that. I do not see how the transaction is to be less expensive, or the rate of interest any lower, unless he can show us that an Act of Parliament will enable these banks to lend money at a lower rate of interest than the ordinary rate, which he has not shown. There is another evil. The mortgages are to go into the hands of the Government. The Government will therefore practically become the great money lender of the country, if this banking system prospers and extends, as the hon. gentleman hopes it will. Many of the farmers of the country, perhaps the majority of them, would become directly indebted to the Government to the extent of half the value of their farms. I do not think that would be a wholesome or desirable state of things. I do not think the farmers of Canada would desire to stand in the relation of debtors to the Government, and I do not think any self-respecting Government would desire to stand in the relation of creditor to the farmers of the country. I think such a state of things would give rise to any amount of wire-pulling and corruption in our political system. An hon. gentleman at my left says there is nothing in that way left to do. One would almost think so on occasions; but when one looks at the prospect opened up by this proposal as to the new relations to be created between the Government and the electorate, I do not think there is nothing left to be done. I think the hon. member for Centre Wellington has invented a plan which would leave any amount of it to be done yet. These are all the criticisms I have to offer to this scheme. I wish to renew the protest made by several gentlemen against the course of the Government in this matter. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) has said that several members of the House are quite as well qualified as the Finance Minister to consider this matter. That may be, but these gentlemen, whatever their qualifications, are not responsible to the House or country for the legislation they propose, while the Finance Minister is. It is his duty to see that no unsound financial legislation passes the House. If he considers this proposed legislation sound, he should say so, and urge the passage of the Bill. If he considers it unsound, he should say so. If he has not condemned it or was unable to form an opinion after having considered it, he is justified in taking the course he has taken, namely, of allowing it to go through in silence. That is exactly the course one would expect from a Finance Minister, who either had not studied the question or wished to declare by his inaction that he was unable to form an opinion on it. With these few remarks I will close, except to say that if a division be called for, I will vote against the resolution.

Mr. CASBY,

Mr. HESSON. My hon. friend pretends to be the farmers' friend and he is also a farmer, but his course in this debate does not indicate that he has the interest of the agricultural community at heart. Were he a friend of the farmer, instead of opposing this measure he would give whatever assistance he could to formulate a measure for the purpose of achieving the object desired by a large proportion of the people. He is not so ignorant of this question as he professes to be; I am certain he knows more about it than he has disclosed in his remarkable speech. He has gone to work to show that the chartered banks of Canada to-day are not doing their business upon a gold basis but upon credit. Now I venture to say that ninety-nine out of every one hundred people in Canada have been led to believe that the banks are doing business upon a gold basis instead of credit. The banks have discounted $140,000,000 odd to the people of Canada for various purposes of trade and commerce and for speculative purposes; and they have done that upon the basis of $7,000,000 in specie. I grant they do not pay out the specie, and I say they dare not, for if they should the result would be disastrous to themselves; they would be compelled to close their doors. My hon. friend maintains that the course asked to be pursued now would be one which, if followed, would drive every dollar of specie out of the bank and out of the country. I hold the contrary view. My impression is that instead of the banks being possessors of $7,000,000 specie, they would find themselves, like the American banks, with an enormous accumulation of specie in their vaults, which would suffice to meet every possible contingency. Since Confederation the Government of Canada have paid out about $115,000,000 interest, which has gone out of this country in the shape of specie or its equivalent; it is equal to an absolute exportation of gold to that extent, and we have paid that out in interest upon foreign loans. Had the Government in 1867 adopted a different policy; had they, instead of going abroad to make these loans taken the responsibility of issuing a circulation here, the case would have been entirely different. Had they asked the people to accept their circulation for the public works of the country, paying the civil service, and carrying on all the industries of Canada, would they not now be in that pleasant position in which, instead of having a debt of $200,000,000 due foreign capitalists, their indebtedness, whatever it would have been, would have been to the people of Canada, and the interest would have remained in Canada. They would have also the use of the money they themselves issued, at the cost of printing. I know hon. gentleman will say that is not based upon specie, simply because the Government would not hold $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 in their treasury, in order to be in the same position the banks occupy to-day. They say the Government ought not to be trusted as regards their ability to redeem that circulation. Such a proposition is monstrous. The Government have power to levy taxes, they collect $30,000,000 odd each year, which is equal to the total circulation of the banks; consequently the Government could redeem this year a sum equivalent to the present circulation of the chartered banks of Canada. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), threw more discredit upon the banks than I am prepared to do, by saying that they deal on credit only. I do not, however, consider that the paid-up capital of the banks represents anything like what their specie deposits should reach. It has been paid in in days gone by, it has gone into circulation, and it remains now in the shape of $140,000,000 of notes maturing and maturing in the hands of the banks. So that, in the case of a great crisis, these could not be redeemed, as the people could not find the gold to redeem them with, and the banks would insist upon having gold; and in consequence of that, it seems to me, as if a greater disaster would be averted by doing away with the bank circulation and adopting a Government circulation that could be redeemed on presentation to any Government office. The Receiver General would redeem them on presentation, and the chances of their ever being presented for the purpose of demanding gold, would be very small indeed. No one doing business wants to do it with gold and silver, because these metals are too heavy to carry round. We simply ask that the Government should issue more Dominion circulation, which is known to be the safest and best circulation we have, as a paper medium, to-day. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in his most remarkable speech, which I have heard on a former occasion in reply to an hon. member who has left this House (Mr. Wallace), who was then dealing with what was called "the rag baby." The hon. gentleman has repeated for our benefit the same speech to-day. I asked him for something new, and he said he would gratify me; but although I paid very careful attention to his remarks, I did not see anything worth taking note of in his remarks. When he dealt with that question, he dealt with speculations which were entirely different from the propositions of this Bill. The schemes he referred to were schemes of the most dangerous kind, they were the schemes of speculators who have borrowed large sums for purposes which I need not name. I might mention one, the Mississippi scheme, which the hon. gentleman also mentioned among others of the same kind. The issue in those days was for speculative purposes, and the promoters were not men in position to give collateral security, such as the mortgages required under this Bill. Moreover, in coming down to a later issue, the issue of greenbacks, to which my hon. friend referred, and which were circulated at a depreciation as low as 30 cents per dollar, what are the facts? The hon. gentleman knows the history of that circulation as well as any other hon. gentleman, and he dare not deny that that issue was repudiated by the Government, the Government itself refusing to receive it in payment of any Government debt. Do we ask such an issue as that? Is it right, or fair, or honorable to raise such an argument in advance against us? The hon. member knows perfectly well that that is not the object in view by this Bill. He knows it is for a different purpose. He knows that this money is asked, not for the purpose of destroying the trade and commerce of our fellow men, not as on the American side $700,000,000 were issued to aid in the destruction of the lives and the property of the country, but in order that the honest, hardworking, toiling farmer, shall have the means of paying his large liabilities which are now carrying a high rate of interest, that he may be allowed to change that for a reasonable rate of payment. I say it is most unfair to drag in this as a contrast to the present proposition, and to insinuate that we are acting like a lot of fools, as the hon. gentleman might have said as well as insinuate. I do not feel that we are taking up a position which will be popular with a large class of people in this country who are engaged in the banking business or identified with the mortgage or loan companies; but I say that the people need these better terms, and the farmers do need them at times, and I challenge any hon. gentleman to say they do not, even the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). I challenge him to say that no special legislation is required for the farmers. I say that members of his profession and of other professions have been compelled to come here and ask for special privileges, and he knows perfectly well that, if I had the capacity to handle cases in the courts of law, I would not have the right to do it. He knows perfectly well that the farmers are at a disadvantage. Let him deny that. He knows that the farmers cannot go to the banks and borrow money on the same terms as business men, that they do not want it for the same time, and that the banks do not desire to deal in that way. He knows that they cannot put up collateral security, as chartered banks cannot receive such security, and that even in his own county the farmers are in need of some such system as this, so that they may not have to fly to the note-shavers, or to those companies with which, for anything that I know to the contrary, the hon. gentleman may be identified. I say that, in the old counties as well as in the new, where people in poor circumstances have to go into debt, the cheaper the rate of interest which they can get, the more advantageous to them; and I say it is the duty of the House to consider that matter without dragging in matters which occurred two or three centuries ago, schemes which were got up for speculative purposes entirely, and not for honest purposes such as this Bill proposes. I am sorry to say that the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) has left his seat, because he seems to require some light; he seems to be in doubt as to the advantages a borrower would get, and whether a man would pay interest for a mortgage. In some cases he would. If a farmer had $10,000 worth of farm land, and choose to put in his stock to the extent of $5,000 in the bank and put a mortgage on the $10,000 worth of real estate, he would receive the interest on $5,000 of stock, according to the net earnings of the bank in the year, which would probably reach 4 per cent. On the other hand, the unfortunate borrower, who obtained money from the bank and gave his mortgage for that, would get his money from the bank and would have to pay interest for it at the reasonable rate of 5 per cent. I think the hon. gentleman ought to be able to see that one mortgage pays interest and the other does not. I do not think this question is brought up to make any popularity for the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton). I do not think this is required more particularly in his county than in any other county; but the farmers, as far as I have had conversation with them, all express a great anxiety that some such legislation should be provided by the Government; and I feel it is in the power of the Government to help them in this matter, and that hon. gentlemen, on both sides of the House, should approach this question with a more earnest desire to aid us, and not to drag in matters which occurred years ago and are not at all relevant to the issue. The hon. member for West Elgin said that the Government were not willing to express their views on this subject. The Government appear to be very willing that hon. gentlemen should express their views on both sides of the House. They were so willing that they were prepared to allow this to go to a committee which might deal with it in the best interests of the country. I do not see why any hon. gentleman should endeavor, by any side issue, to draw away the attention of the people by reference to a question of irredeemable paper circulation which is not involved in this at all, and is not near it. The question was decided by the House some years ago when my hon. friend, Mr. Wallace, used to talk on the subject. But these gentlemen now try to introduce the same arguments with a view to inducing people to imagine that we are proposing something of that kind. The hon. gentleman says that we are setting traps to catch fools. The hon. gentleman who makes that statement can probably speak from experience on that matter, because most of those who belong to the same profession as himself are the traps, and those who fall into their clutches are the fools.

Mr. BERGERON. We have heard a long discussion on this Bill for two sittings in this Session, and new members might suppose that that is all we have heard about it. We may tell them, however, that we have heard the same discussion on the same Bill for eight years before.

Mr. HESSON. No.

Mr. BERGERON. Knowing the promoter of the Bill as I do, I am perfectly convinced that he is very sincere in giving his reasons for introducing the Bill, but there is something which surprises me very very much in regard to him and in regard to the attitude of my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Hesson) who just sat down, and who is such an enthusiastic supporter of the Government. He might have asked himself before why the Government of the country do not bring down such a good measure themselves. It seems to me that either the measure is good or it is not. If it is, why do not the Government take it upon themselves to bring it down to the House. I am sure they would put it through if they did, and if it is as good as the member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) and the member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) say, the farmers would have had the benefit of this measure some time ago. But it must not be like that. It might be that the farmers of the country are better without a Bill like that than if such a measure were to pass the House. It seems to me, after hearing the discussion of members on both sides of the House, that it comes from the same quarter, the same rounding of counties, where they must have been talking about that during election time, and where some have said, we must put a measure like that through the House, and others have challenged them to do it. Some of them have said, we must put a measure like that through the House; others have said, no, you can't do it. They must have been fighting about that, and now they come into the House of Commons and fight about it again. But is it in the interest of the whole country? Is it in the interest of the farmers themselves? That is the question. If it is in the interest of the farmers, let the Government bring down a Bill and we will vote for it. If it is not in the interest of the farmers, why take up two sittings of the House in making long speeches to humbug the farmers and make them believe that these men are working in their interests who bring down this measure, and try to make the farmers believe that their condition is different from the condition of that of other people in this country. Sir, I deny that I believe that the farmers in this country are in the same position as other classes of men; I go further, I say that the credit of the farmers is higher than the credit of any other class in this country, and the proof of that is that they can go to any bank to-day, and by mortgaging their farm, they can borrow money cheaper than any other man in this country. I think we ought to have an end to this discussion, and have an end of this humbugging the farmers. It is the same as when some people come to them and say: We will bring you a fine candidate; we will bring you a farmer as a candidate, who will defend your interests. This is another way of deceiving them, and this measure of my hon. friend, although I am sure he does it with perfect sincerity, is doubtless the result of a rash promise he made them. Still, he should not have made that promise, and the House of Commons to-day, with the Government at the head of us, will tell him that he should not have done it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite in sympathy with the motion of the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) in desiring to inaugurate a system of this kind, that will be a benefit to the farmers, and I would be quite willing to assist in any way I can in order to secure that end. The farmers are a very important section of the people; we may honestly call them the backbone of the Dominion. I believe the hon. member is quite sincere in his efforts to secure this boon to the farmers if he can. I was sorry to hear the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) say that this was a scheme set by knaves to catch fools. I can hardly believe that, because I am satisfied that the Government, if they saw that it was such a scheme, would adopt it themselves, hoping that it would enable them to catch the people. But I do not think they see it in that light. I do not think they expect that it will catch any one, and I think that is the reason they have not adopted it. So far as I am concerned I want it to be understood that I shall be quite willing at all times to give any assistance in my power to help forward the best interest of the farming community. I care not from what side of this House a proposition comes, if it is likely to be a benefit to that class, I shall give it my support. I believe that if there is any class of the community in this country that requires assistance it is the farming community. They have been suffering very seriously from bad crops in the past, heavy rates of interest, and other causes, and it is the duty of every member in this House, particularly of those representing agricultural constituencies to do any thing they can to better their condition. If this scheme is not going to be a success, let another scheme be found that will be. The fact of the matter is that the addresses delivered by hon. gentleman from the other side of the House, show that there is a good deal of financial ability on that side. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) stated that there were members in the House as capable of dealing with questions of this kind as the Finance Minister, and for my part I do not deny it. I dare say there are some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who feel that possibly they could fill the position better than the Finance Minister himself. If the Finance Minister was here I would compliment him upon the material he has got to fill his position. The hon. member for North Perth has handled the question with a great deal of ability, and I dare say he is looking forward to the time when he will have the Minister's place, and I have no objection to him personally, by any means. I want to say that if this scheme cannot be made a success, and another scheme can be introduced that will give to the farmers better facilities than they now have for getting money cheaply, it will have my hearty support.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I have listened with a good deal of attention to the discussion that has taken place on this matter, and have tried to ascertain from the views expressed by the promoters of this measure, how they were going to promote the interests of the farmers by means of it. In the first place, I deny the proposition that the farmers of this country are in so destitute a condition that they require special legislation which is not afforded to any other class of the community.

An hon. MEMBER. How do you know?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I know from my experience in my own county, and from the fact that the agricultural interests of this country are, so far as one can judge from the public documents and from other sources, in a condition that does not require any special efforts from any one in this House to promote their interests in contradistinction to those of any other portion of the community. At the same time, I am free to confess that if by this measure money could be loaned to farmers at a lower rate of interest than they can obtain it at present, or than any other portion of the community can obtain it, there would be some wisdom in adopting a scheme of this kind. But so far as I can judge from this proposition it seems to me wholly and entirely impracticable. Do these hon. gentlemen pretend to say that a farmer, having money in his possession and who can obtain for it a higher rate of interest than he would obtain through the instrumentality of this bank, would place his money in this bank to be loaned exclusively to farmers? Do they pretend to say that the farmers have such a community of sympathy, such a spirit of brotherhood amongst them, that they would be disposed to lend to each other at a lower rate of interest, than to commercial men? That is a proposition that is wholly indefensible. I believe that banking is, if I may so express it, a business by itself, that it is a business that can be well conducted only by those who have learned it, and have had experience in it, and I do not see how an institution such as this could succeed. If I could be convinced—and I have listened with the greatest attention to the arguments adduced in support of this measure for the purpose of being convinced—that this scheme would be beneficial to the farmers, I would be disposed to support it; but so far as my judgment goes, it is not going to offer any benefit to that community, and therefore I cannot support the scheme.

Mr. COOK. I rise to ask a question. I would like to hear the Minister of Agriculture on this question—the gentleman who presides over that Department with so much skill. I think he ought to give his views on a question that interests the agricultural class.

Resolution negatived.

Mr. COOK. I rise to a point of order. I notice that the Minister of Customs, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Agriculture, and all the rest of the Ministers did not vote on this question.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose, and Mr. Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 4,

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). It is very evident from the expression of opinion given this afternoon that this Bill does not meet with the approval of the House. I move that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

Mr. ORTON. The resolution now before the committee, is one expressing the opinion that it is desirable to have a Dominion issue, a national currency, a national issue for all the banks, so that uniformity might exist in all the banks throughout the country. This is held to be a sound principle; it is in operation in the United States, and the resolution proposed is to withdraw the privilege from the banks of issuing their own notes, by paying them for any loss they may sustain by having that privilege taken from them. I hope the committee will allow the resolution to pass, and as two other resolutions have been adopted, there will be sufficient reason to justify me in bringing in a Bill and taking it at least to a first reading.

Mr. HESSON. It is only fair to the House that after the debate we have had, the hon. member should have the privilege of having his Bill printed so that it can go before the country. Let us see what the Bill contains, and if the details require to be amended, that can be done during this Session, and, if not, during the coming year.

Motion negatived, yeas 16, nays 34.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). This resolution, in my opinion, is based upon the one which preceded it, and which was declared lost by the chairman. That resolution stated:

"That it is expedient to grant charters to farm or real estate banks the capital stock of which may consist not only of specie and Dominion of Canada notes and bonds, but also of first liens upon improved farm lands equal to one-half the value thereof; and that as the main source of wealth in Canada is agricultural, it is expedient that the rate of interest charged by said farmers' banks shall be restricted to 6 per cent. per annum."

The resolution now before the committee reads as follows:—

"That in order to prevent any clashing of interests between such farmers' banks and ordinary chartered banks, as well as for the general convenience of the public, it is expedient that there be uniformity in the circulating medium, and that all banks be compelled to circulate only Dominion of Canada notes," and so on.

If we do not grant any charters to those banks, and there are no farmers' banks established, it is impossible that there can be any clashing of interests between them and the ordinary chartered banks. While I do not express any very decided opinion against the proposition that the Government should take into their own hands the issue of paper money through the ordinary banks of the country, yet I think that proposition should come from the Finance Minister. In this resolution there is also a proposition that payment should be made to the chartered banks for depriving them of the circulation of which this resolution proposes they should be deprived. If any such proposition is to be made to the country the Government ought to submit it.

Mr. ORTON. The committee has already approved of the second resolution which is virtually the basis of the whole Bill. I do not see how the committee can very well refrain from allowing the Bill to be printed and placed in the hands of members.

Mr. HESSON. It is very evident that the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White), wishes to burke the Bill. Certainly the committee should allow the mover the privilege of having it printed. We do not say that the Bill in its present shape would be accepted by the House or the people, but at least it should be printed.

Mr. VAIL. It is very difficult to understand the policy of the Government in regard to these resolutions. Here is a proposition to grant a charter to certain banks, and it is evidently expected that the Government will furnish the money to recoup the chartered banks for loss they may have sustained. Consequently it is a very important measure so far as the Government is concerned, and I do not see how they can shirk their responsibility in connection with it. They have had two years to consider the matter, and it is more than a week since the subject was brought up in the House. It is almost time to ask whether we have a Government.

Mr. HACKETT. I see no reason why the resolutions should not be allowed to pass. I fail to understand why hon. members are opposed to granting measures to the agricultural community which they grant to other classes. We know that the farmers are laboring under great disadvantages. An hon. member stated this afternoon that farmers had the same privileges and rights and could go to the chartered banks and borrow money as other individuals had an opportunity of doing. I know from my experience that such is not the case. A farmer in the county I represent, one of the finest agricultural counties in the Dominion, who had a large farm, but was anxious to purchase another valuable farm lying along side his own, as it was then in the market. He took with him his neighbor, who was also a good farmer, and they went to at least a half a dozen different banks and offered their own security to raise the necessary money, but they were refused. I happened to meet that gentleman in the town, and he said to me: "They appear, in this place, not to know me; you know my position and circumstances, will you come to some of the managers of these banks with whom you are acquainted and recommend me." I went with him, as he desired, to one of the banks and introduced him to the manager. I said: "Here is a gentleman from my own part of the country who is possessed of a large farm; he has it well stocked, and it is one of the finest properties in that part of the country. He is desirous of raising about $500 on a note endorsed by his neighbor, who is also the owner of good property." The manager said: "I am glad indeed to make your acquaintance, and I will take the note and discount it at three months." The farmer said: "My harvest will not be reaped by that time, and I will not be in a position to meet the note." "Well," said the banker, "if you meet half of it, I will renew the balance." The farmer replied that he could not do that, and that he thought he would be able to borrow the money on the security he offered for a term of six months when he would be able to meet it. The manager said that he could not take a mortgage on the property, but he offered to discount the note on the terms he had just mentioned. He said: "If you cannot accept those terms you will have to go to those parties who are in the habit of taking mortgages on property and advancing money, and get the money from them." He added, there is a lawyer next door who lends money in that way, and no doubt he will be glad to take security for the money, and he gave him his name. I saw the gentleman afterwards, and he said, there is no use in my trying to raise money in this town; I was refused at the bank, though I had good security, though I know parties engaged in egg-buying in our part of the country, who are not worth $50, but who can get their commercial paper discounted at the banks. He said I went to the money lender and he offered to let me have the money at 12 per cent., but I cannot afford to pay that rate, so I cannot buy the property. There is a practical instance showing that a farmer cannot go to a bank and raise money by mortgage; banks are not allowed to do that business, as it is contrary to their charters, and consequently the farmers are thrown on the mercies of the money lenders, or money shavers, who are the most remorseless characters in this country. I believe those are the individuals who are burking this Bill before the House, either personally or by proxy. I know also of my own experience, that the establishment of small banks is a matter of great importance to the farming interests of the country. Some twenty years ago a pious Roman Catholic missionary, the Rev. Father Bellecourt, who was stationed in one of the parishes of Prince Edward Island, seeing that the people in that locality were enduring great hardships by being obliged to go to the money lenders to raise money to meet small demands, established a small bank called the Farmers' Bank of Rustico. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) will, I think, corroborate my remarks on that point. It had only a capital of $10,000—the smallest of any bank in the Dominion of Canada. It could not now do business under the Statutes of the country, but having obtained its charter previous to Confederation, they were allowed a certain time to run under their old charter, and are now winding up their whole business. That bank is altogether composed of farmers; the directors are all farmers; the manager is a farmer, they have been doing business for twenty years, opposed by all the other banks of the country, who have been endeavoring to kill it—endeavoring to prevent its notes from being used, and from doing business generally. But, notwithstanding that fact, that bank was conducted on sound principles; it went on for twenty years, it has done a very successful business, and it is much regretted there that it is obliged to wind up its affairs. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) who represents more immediately that part of the country, two years ago took an active interest in trying to have the charter of that bank extended, but, as I said, its affairs are now being wound up, and there is nothing that the people of that part of the country regret so much, as that it cannot do any further business amongst them, and they hold in the highest reverence and respect the memory of the reverend gentleman who established it. I think, therefore, the farmers of the country should have the privilege of doing business in their own way, because the experience of that bank shows that with their property as a basis, they can conduct such a business to the advantage, not only of themselves, but of the community generally. I trust, therefore, that those who are interested in placing the farmers of the country at the mercy of the money lenders, will not prevail, but that the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) will have his resolutions reported and the Bill introduced.

Mr. DAVIES. What the hon. gentleman says is perfectly true respecting the formation of that bank, and the fact that it has done a great deal of benefit in the part of the country where it carried on its business. He must recollect, however, that that bank was not based on principles at all analogous to those of this Bill. It is a bank with a small capital, but it does not buy or sell bills of exchange, but simply lends money at six, nine and twelve months to farmers. As to the statement of my hon. friend that the other banks looked upon it with suspicion and endeavored to put it down, I may say that I have been a director of one of the banks for the last ten or twelve years, and that, on the contrary, the other banks were glad to see it flourishing, and would be glad indeed to see its charter extended, knowing that it was doing a great deal of benefit in the locality in which it is situated.

Mr. HACKETT. It is possible my hon. friend is right with regard to the bank of which he is a director, but I know that some five years ago I had a few notes of the Farmers' Bank, and they were refused by one of the leading banks of Charlottetown, and as I believed, for the purpose of trying to kill this small bank.

Mr. MACMASTER. The resolution of the hon. gentleman is somewhat extensive in its scope, and involves the consideration of the whole financial question of the country. There are some things connected with the resolution which deserve the best consideration of the House, and the hon. member for Centre Wellington deserves the thanks of the House and the country for bringing the matter forward, for no matter what views we may entertain respecting it, it is to the general advantage of the community that the subject of the currency should be discussed. Now, referring to the question of banking generally, it is difficult to arrange any conventional scheme by which any particular class of the community is to be benefited, regardless of all other classes. The lending of money must be based on the general credit of the borrower and the facilities of the lender for lending. If the general scheme propounded by my hon. friend could be shown to be beneficial to the farmer, if it could be shown to be specially in the interests of the farmer that such legislation should be put on the Statute-book I would be one of the first to vote for the Bill. It is because I have doubts as to the general utility of such a measure that I have some hesitation about giving my adhesion to his general scheme, although some parts of it are certainly meritorious. He proposes to establish a number of farmers' banks. Now, in order that that venture be successful, it implies that a large number of men shall be found throughout the country capable of managing these banks. Banking is a trade; it is not to be picked up in a day or an hour; and it is a grave question whether it would be for the best interests of the farmers that they should engage in the business of banking. I do not think it would be profitable for the farmer to invest in a banking operation in which his profit is, according to the terms of the Bill, restricted to 5 per cent. Is he to invest as a borrower, and are mortgages to be made negotiable securities? I doubt very much whether it would be of advantage to the farmer that his mortgage should be a negotiable security and that facilities should be provided for him to part so readily with his property. But there is one provision in these resolutions which I think should receive the best consideration of the House—if not in connection with this measure, in connection with some other measure which might be introduced by the Government:

"That it is expedient that there be uniformity in the circulating medium and that all banks be compelled to circulate only Dominion of Canada notes."

That is a little restrictive, because, of course, they should have the privilege of issuing gold or silver currency. But that it would be advantageous to this country that there should be a uniform Dominion currency, I think, admits of very little doubt, and the proposition the hon. gentleman has made in that respect should commend itself to the House and the country. Even though there should be frailty in some of the other portions of his scheme—and whether there be frailty or not will admit of fuller discussion on experiment—he has certainly surrounded his proposition with a large amount of argument and precedent. This particular portion of the resolutions is worthy of the best consideration of the House. It is so involved, however, with other propositions as to make it difficult for us to give it our full assent. But the hon. member for Centre Wellington, the hon. member for North Perth, and some of the other gentlemen who advocate the scheme are not without the advantage of the highest authority in its support. I would read a few sentences from a speech of Mr. Smithers, the president of the Bank of Montreal, who, I believe, is the leading authority on banking in this country, delivered at the last annual meeting of the bank :

"Now, I am going to allude to a matter of great public interest, which is closely identified with the business in hand. I refer to the subject of bank issues generally, and if my views were adopted, it would serve the double purpose of placing the currency upon a thoroughly satisfactory basis, and at the same time materially assist the Government finances. After these remarks I need hardly add that I am prepared to advocate the policy of putting the banks upon the American system and requiring them to secure their issues by the deposit of Government bonds. I have long been in favor of this system, but it was not pressed at the time of the last legislation on the subject of banking, not because the Bank of Montreal was not quite ready for the change, but out of consideration for the views of other bankers. I believe my colleagues, if not all, at least a majority of them, are in sympathy with my views—at any rate, speaking for myself, I wish to take this opportunity, I know of no better, as what I say to-day will be widely read—I say I want to avail myself of this opportunity of placing my views on record. Let it therefore be distinctly understood that I openly avow myself in favor of the adoption of this system. It will not only, as I have already said, place the circulation upon a thoroughly satisfactory basis, but, in my judgment, it would do away with the necessity for the voluminous monthly statements furnished in so much detail to the Government. As, if the safety of currency was fully assured, all the statements required would be furnished in half a dozen lines, as I hold that when the Government has provided the country with a thoroughly sound currency its duty is discharged. I maintain that it is both the duty and privilege of every man to satisfy himself as to what bank he will deposit his money in, in precisely the same manner as the wholesale merchant elects as to what retailer he will give credit to, and the one has no greater claim for protection on the Government than the other. The same is true of the shareholder in selecting his investments. He should be governed by his confidence in the management, just as he is in taking stock in any other company, and the moment he sees reason to change his mind, he should sell his shares. It may be said that the people of the United States are looking round for a substitute for the national banking law. But if they are it is not because it has not been a success, but because the supply of bonds is likely to give out, a contingency which is not likely to arise in this country for some time to come, if we are to judge from present appearances. This brings me to another feature of the system, viz., that it would make a market for a very large amount of Dominion bonds. Of course there would be gradual progress, and I am not going to detail now—it would be premature to do so—suffice it to say that in four or five years it would supply the Government (without allowing for any increase of circulation) with about $30,000,000. Therefore, gentlemen, without further remark, I repeat that I am in favor of the adoption of this system, and if it should be brought forward by the Finance Minister it will have my support, unless my colleagues take a different view, which I do not think very probable."

So that whatever may be our differences of opinion on the question of farmers' banks, by reason of the restriction contemplated in these resolutions, or by reason of the query as to whether farmers would seriously carry on business with these banks or not, or by reason of the further consideration whether it would be an actual benefit to the farmers to have further facilities to transfer the mortgages on their homesteads, there can be no doubt whatever that Mr. Smithers, the leading banking authority in this country, is in harmony with my hon. friend from Centre Wellington to this extent, that it would be beneficial for the country to have a uniform currency; and although I am not an authority on banking matters, the limited observation I have been able to give to this subject leads me to the same conclusion that the hon. member for Centre Wellington comes to in that respect. Of course the hon. gentleman has foreseen that it would result in temporary loss to the banks, and he has a provision, the terms of which I am not competent to discuss, for withdrawing the circulation and compensating the chartered banks. Under the present law, the circulation is the first claim on the assets of the bank, and many say that that is a sufficient protection. But it is not thorough protection; it is only partial; for if one of the smaller banks fails, what happens? There is consternation; a run on the bank occurs, and poor people who hold the bills very often sell out to designing speculators, and very serious loss results to the honest wage-earner. The proposition of my hon. friend is that there should be a circulating medium in the country which should be entirely beyond question; and when that proposition comes up as a distinct proposition before this House, it shall have my support.

COURT OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 6) for constituting a Court of Railway Commissioners for Canada and to amend the Consolidated Railway Act of 1879.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This seems to be a measure of some little importance. Have the Government nothing to say about this policy, or are they waiting to be advised by the House?

Mr. McNEILL. Having during three Sessions of Parliament presented petitions in favor of this Bill from the Municipal Council of the county of Bruce, I feel it is due to those I have the honor to represent, that I should endeavor to say a few words in explanation of my reasons for supporting this measure. I hope the House will kindly bear with me, as I have been a little under the weather for some time past, and am not very well able to do justice to the subject, which is one of very great importance to the people of this country. I am quite sure that the views and wishes of the municipal representatives of 66,000 people of Bruce, I am quite sure that the unanimous wishes and views of so large a section of the community, will always receive respectful consideration from this House, but it is not only the views of so large a community as this, but the views also of many other great counties and cities and towns of this Dominion to which I desire to refer. I believe that there have been some sixteen counties and cities and some thirty-two towns which have petitioned in favor of this measure, and during the last Session of Parliament a memorial was presented from the manufacturers' association of the Province of Ontario in support of the measure, and I think I understood that recently there has been an approval of this measure by the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto, so that I feel satisfied that a measure which receives this amount of endorsement in the Dominion will be treated with that degree of consideration, and receive that amount of care which certainly its importance deserves. I feel quite satisfied that the question has taken a firm grasp of the minds of the people, and that sooner or later it will be necessary for the Government to deal with it, and I venture to think that the sooner it is dealt with the better it will be for all parties concerned. There has been very naturally a good deal of prejudice created in the minds of members of the House against the measure by reason of the overwhelming majority which was opposed to it in the Railway Committee when it was before that body. This was a very natural prejudice, I think, but it was, on the other hand, a very unfair prejudice, because, in truth, the measure was defeated on that occasion owing to statements which were made in perfect good faith, but which were in themselves altogether erroneous. Those statements were endorsed by Sir Charles Tupper, the Minister of Railways, and it was very natural that statements coming with all the weight of the endorsement of a gentleman who is so familiar with railway enterprises in this country, and who has always taken so much interest in their furtherance, would have very great force in the minds of members of the Railway Committee. Now these statements which were made were sufficient of themselves to cut away the whole ground from under the feet of those who were supporting this Railway Commissioners Bill. The statements were these. Sir Charles Tupper said :

"Then again, it has been shown here to-day, after an experience of years in a country admirably adapted for the adoption of the principle of the commission, that Parliament, instead of being satisfied with it and re-establishing it, has allowed it to expire, and no commission exists at all in England to-day, for the reason that the commission has, to a large extent, failed in accomplishing the objects that Parliament and the Government established it for."

As my hon. friend had pointed to the English Railway Commission and to the success of that commission, and had founded his Bill mainly upon the lines of the Railway Commission Act in England, it was very natural that such a statement as this, coming from Sir Charles Tupper, would fall like a thunderbolt upon the Railway Committee and the result of it was that the measure was defeated by a very large majority. There was another statement made at the same time, and that coming from the same authority would naturally produce a great effect :

"I am justified in saying that the stock market in England is paralysed by what we are doing here to-day."

Both those statements, made in perfect good faith, turned out afterwards to be altogether mistaken statements. The Railway Commission in England, far from being abolished, was in full swing at the time; and the stock market was not in any degree affected by what we were doing at that time. So I think I am justified in saying that the vote which was then taken upon the measure was one to which we now should attach very little importance indeed. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) at that time argued that the people and the weaker lines of railway were insufficiently protected against the enormous power which is wielded by the great railway corporations in this country, and, impressed by the force of the arguments which he adduced at that time, and which were in point of fact unanswerable, the Government introduced a measure amending the Consolidated Railway Act, and into this measure they introduced two clauses which were taken verbatim from the English Act of 1854, the Canals and Traffic Act. The principles which are embodied in those two clauses are these—first, that every railway company shall be obliged to give due facility for the furthering of traffic over its line, coming from any other railway; and secondly, that there shall be no preference, that is, no undue preference, offered to individuals or localities. These two principles will, I think, commend themselves to the approval of every hon. member of this House and every right-thinking man; and, by embodying these principles in the law of the land, the Government, and not only the Government but this House which adopted that measure, have admitted the fact that the people of this country have the right to have those principles put into operation. But, unfortunately, it is impossible to put this law into force unless we have machinery which is adequate for the purpose, and it so happens that we have no such machinery. The people of Canada are told distinctly what their rights are by the Government and by this House, but the means by which they can enforce these rights are withheld from them. This, I think, can be not merely proved but demonstrated. There are just two tribunals before which these matters can be brought, the Railway Committee of the Privy Council and the courts of law. I do not think that anyone will venture for a moment to say that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is competent at all to deal with these matters, is competent to deal with questions of through freights, of undue preference, of the proper connection of trains, of proper facilities for traffic, and of a host of other questions which will at once suggest themselves to the mind of any hon. gentleman who thinks for a moment on this subject. It is impossible to suppose that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council can have either the special knowledge which is required to deal with such matters or the time to examine witnesses, and sift evidence in order to do justice in such matters. That being so, we are thrown back upon the courts of law, and it is just as certain that the courts of law are incapable of dealing with these matters as it is that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is incapable of dealing with them. This fact is thoroughly established. There is no question whatever on that subject. There can be no question about it. I think it will be admitted by everyone on both sides of the House that the law in England is administered at least as well as it is in any other country in the world, whether we have regard to the learning and ability of the judges, or to the absolutely spotless purity with which they discharge their high functions; and we know perfectly well, that if there is one thing more than another that the English people are distinguished for, it is a desire quietly to get along on the old lines, to plod along very much in the old groove, and as little as possible, especially in matters connected with commerce and traffic, to interfere with the old established methods and precedents; and that, if there is one thing more than another that John Bull disapproves of and holds in abhorrence, it is what he calls new-fangled methods of procedure. So, I think I am perfectly justified in assuming and in stating that the English people would have rested satisfied with the courts of law, and would not have adopted a new tribunal to deal with these matters unless they had been compelled by the strongest reasons to do so; and, when we find that they have in England established just such a tribunal as that which is proposed by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), we have the strongest possible circumstantial evidence in favor of the proposition that the courts of law are incapable of dealing with the matter. And we must remember that the law in Canada, at present, is just in exactly the same position as the law of England when the Railway Commission was established there. But we are fortunate in not being obliged to rest solely upon circumstantial evidence in support of this, because we have also direct evidence of the most weighty kind possible. We have the evidence supplied to us by the records of committees and commissions without number, which have been appointed in England to investigate this matter. There were committees appointed, sometimes from one House of Parliament and sometimes from the other, and sometimes from both Houses of Parliament, and the members of these committees were always selected by reason of their special qualifications and their special knowledge of the subject. We find it laid down in a most distinct way by the reports of these committees that the courts of law are incapable of dealing with this matter; they found that the courts of law were quite incapable of dealing with the enormous power which was wielded by these great corporations, which, in point of fact, held in their grasp the whole carrying trade of the country. In 1872 a committee was appointed, having among its members some of the leading men in England such as Lord Salisbury, Lord Ripon, Lord Redesdale, the late Mr. Ward Hunt, and Mr. Dodson. I find in the report a great many statements showing clearly that the courts of law are powerless to deal with the question. In the first place I find that Lord Campbell had said :

"The judges, and himself among them, thought themselves incompetent to decide these matters. They should have a lay tribunal to decide such matters, and not one composed of judges."

He said that all the judges agreed with him in this view with the exception of Chief Justice Jervis, so that all the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, all the judges of the Court of Exchequer, and all the judges but one of the Court of Common Pleas, were of the view that a special tribunal was necessary to give effect to this very law which we, a Session or two ago, placed upon our Statute-book. Then again I find on page 15 of the report :

"The necessity for power to enforce through rates for goods over every other company's line, is recognised on all hands; but the Canals and Traffic Act is inoperative to secure it."

On page 15 I find :

"The Board of Trade informs this committee" —

The Amalgamation Committee it was — "that the decisions, or rather want of decisions, under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act have shown how unsuited a court of law is to deal with such cases."

And again on page 47 :

"Almost every witness, whether representing the commercial or the railway interest, has suggested the appeal to some board or tribunal which shall settle disputes, and in fact do what self-interest—or the law itself cannot do."

There is a later report to which I am about to refer. Then again on page 48 I find :

"It is distinctly proved that the Court of Common Pleas is not capable of dealing with the question of proper facilities for the forwarding of passengers and goods."

On page 49 :

"The Board of Trade has not the requisite judicial character or means of action."

And that (this is a remarkable statement) :

"A court of law fails in practical knowledge and administrative facility."

It must, I think, be clear that the courts of law, according to the views, at all events, of this committee, were incapable of dealing with the matter. Well, in England the people were not satisfied to rest in that position. They were not satisfied to leave the whole power in the hands of the railway companies, and they determined that as the courts of law could not deal with the matter they would accept the proposal of this committee and appoint a special tribunal. That Railway Commission was appointed; but in the first place only temporarily. It is worthy of remark that the committee which recommended the appointment of that commission did not present a unanimous report, there was a majority report, and there was a great deal of doubt in the minds of a great many people as to whether this appointing a railway commission was a wise thing to do. It was felt that the experiment was a very grave one, and many people thought it was a very dangerous experiment. It was felt in England, as it is felt by members of this House, that it was a serious thing to hand over to three gentlemen, such as those who are proposed in this Bill of my hon. friend, such great powers lest injury should be done by them to the great interests of the railway companies, and by that means injury to the public at large. Many of the wisest, many of the ablest and many of the most experienced and sagacious members of the House of Commons in England, disapproved of the proposal to establish this Railway Commission, just as many of this House disapprove of it. Now, we go a step further, and come to the report of the last committee, which was made in 1882. That committee was composed of twenty-three members of the House of Commons, selected for their special knowledge of the subject, and nine members of that committee represented the railway interests. The committee was appointed for the purpose of investigating how this railway commission, which had then been in existence some eight years, was really working; whether it was a good thing or a bad thing; whether it was advancing the interest of the public or not, and they presented a unanimous report, in which they stated it had worked well, and they recommended that it should be made permanent and its powers enlarged. On the 11th of last month, the President of the Board of Trade in England, introduced a Bill, not only establishing one Railway Commission for England, but establishing one for Ireland and one for Scotland. He was simply taking up the measure which had been proposed by his predecessor, in a Conservative Government, so that both parties in the House were unanimous on the subject. He said :

"Experience had shown that the powers conferred on the commission by the Act were too restricted; and its jurisdiction had been considerably limited since its appointment by the action of courts of law. It had nevertheless done good service to the community. Its decisions had given general satisfaction to the trading community. It had operated so far as the railway companies were concerned in terrorem, and it was doing much good and useful work."

Now every argument on general principles which has been advanced here against the appointment of this Railway commission, was at that time advanced in England—I speak of arguments on general grounds. Any hon. member taking up the English Hansard can read there one argument after another which has been presented in Canada in opposition to this measure, and which was presented in England in opposition to a railway commission and which the test of experience has proved to be fallacious. I do not intend to read from the reports, because I do not wish to take up the time of the House, and because I quoted from it on a former occasion. Mr. Ward Hunt, and there was no one in the House whose opinion was of greater weight, said the shareholders' money would be in danger. Mr. Pease said it would dislocate traffic. He also said it would be a terrible thing to hand over the property of the English railways into the hands of three men. He also stated that the salaries of the commissioners would be less than those of the managers of the railways. It was alleged at that time that a depression in the stock market would ensue. All of those objections have been proved to be entirely groundless, and those in England who were opposed to the establishment of the commission are to-day in favor of it, as can be seen by reference to what occurred in the House of Commons a few days ago. It is said: Why should we not in Canada have the same benefit from a railway commission as the people of England enjoy, and as they have in many of the States of the Union? And we are told there are special reasons here in Canada why we cannot have such a commission. We are told we are differently situated from the people of England, and therefore we are to hold our hands and sit down and tell the people that there is no remedy for grievances complained of. We know from experience that the law courts cannot help them, and there is no other tribunal. We practically tell the people, by the legislation which is passed in this House, that they have certain rights, but there is no way of enforcing them. We have not surely come to such a pass as that. The objections urged, which are supposed to be special objections, are not valid objections. The first objection which is urged in Canada is, that capital is very sensitive, and it is very important for us to have capital invested in our railways. We all admit that. I suppose there is no one who would gainsay the truth of that proposition. It is said that this sensitive capital will be frightened away by the appointment of this commission, which has worked so well in England. I venture to say that the very reverse will be the case; that in Canada, as in England, it will be found that the railway commission will be the champion of the weaker lines, that it will strengthen the young undertakings, that it will enable them to get facilities for through traffic and train connections, and will prevent the struggling companies from being swamped by the greater and more powerful corporations. It is very well known to all living in Western Ontario that the greatest inconvenience to the public occurred from the fact that no connection could be obtained between the Great Western and the Grand Trunk. It is a fact, told me on the very best authority, that if there had been a railway commission in Canada at the time, there would have been no amalgamation between the Great Western and the Grand Trunk. That condition of things would not have been tolerated for twenty-four hours if there had been such a commission; the condition of one railway company deliberately running its trains so as to prevent another company connecting with it and thus preventing the proper flow of traffic through the country. Another objection raised is that the Dominion is too large, and while in a little country like England a commission may be appointed here with a greater territory a railway commission could not possibly overtake the work. That is, perhaps, the weakest of all objections against the commission. Let anyone take Bradshaw's map of England and see how the whole country is covered with a network of railways, and he will then see the amount of work the commissioners have had to undertake, work infinitely greater, more difficult and more complicated than the work they would have to undertake here. At one of the numerous stations in the neighborhood of London, more than 1,000 trains pass in twenty-four hours, a circumstance which conveys some idea of the complexity and difficulty of the railway system in England; and yet this system has been regulated by the railway commission there. How much more easy it would be to have our simple system regulated by a commission here. It is said that the through freights from the United States would complicate matters because some of the freights would come over lines that would be outside the control of the commission. Hon. members, I think, last Session pointed out that in England as great a difficulty exists, because there is a great part of the traffic carried by land and partly by sea, and that carried by sea is outside the control of the commission. Then we are told there are no outside systems competing with the railway system in England as there is here in Canada. There never was a greater misapprehension or a statement more incorrect than that. There is a system of competition in England which, according to the report of the commission which sat in 1882, affects freight in three-fifths of all the railway stations in England, that is the competition by sea. There are fleets of magnificent steamers and sailing vessels lying in all ports in England ready to carry freight in competition with the railways into every harbor, port and cranny into which vessels dare enter, which competition affects freights, to the extent I have indicated. So that objection may be abandoned. There is really no sound objection that can be urged against the proposal of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), in this Bill. There can be no doubt there is a feeling of irritation in the minds of the people in many parts of Ontario against the railway companies, a feeling I had almost said, of hostility, a feeling that those companies can do very much as they like, and do very much as they like, that they are practically uncontrolled, and that they are practically the masters not only of the people but of the Government to a great extent. It is not desirable that such a feeling should exist in the minds of the people; it is not for the benefit of the railway companies themselves. In the presence of such a feeling the enormous benefits that the people have derived from those railway companies have been to a great extent lost sight of; and therefore it is we ought to do something, if possible, to relieve the people from this feeling of oppression from which they at present suffer. One of the great advantages arising from the establishment of a court such as is proposed by the hon. member is that a great deal of misconception would be removed. A great deal of the feeling which exists in the minds of the people is no doubt well founded, but I believe on the other hand much of it is ill-founded, arising from misconception; and one of the great advantages of the appointment of a commission would be that it would be a court of conciliation, as well as a strong instrument to redress real grievances, and would do away with many of those which at present unhappily exists. Why should not the people have the benefit of such a court? We have admitted by placing this law on the Statute-book that they have grievances, and we have admitted they have certain rights, and we have known perfectly well that under the existing state of affairs there are no means supplied by which those grievances can be remedied. We know that these very same laws which we have embodied in the laws of Canada were inoperative in England until special machinery was applied to put them into effect. And so long as we withhold from the people of Canada that special machinery which experience has proved to be necessary to give effect to the law which we say ourselves ought to be put in force, the people of Canada will look upon this law as a mockery and a sham. They would look upon it very much as they would look upon bread given to hungry men locked up in a strong box, of which we deliberately withhold the key; and as long as we deliberately withhold from the people the means of enforcing those rights which we declared in this Parliament to be theirs, I think we may expect that the people will be likely to call us very sharply to account.

Mr. CURRAN. Permit me to say a few words on this subject which has occupied so much of the attention of the best minds of the country for a considerable time past. No doubt my hon. friend, the introducer of this Bill, is actuated by the very highest motives in presenting this measure so vigorously as he has done, Session after Session, and we are all deeply indebted to the very eloquent gentleman who has just resumed his seat, for the vast amount of pains he has taken to collect information on the subject. I think, however, from the very speech that hon. gentleman has made, as well as from what we know has taken place in the various councils of the trade regulating bodies of our Dominion, that if there be one question more than another as to which we may say festina lente, hasten slowly, if there is a subject upon which we should act with the greatest deliberation and proceed with the greatest care, it is the question now before the House. In the Board of Trade in the city of Montreal this question has occupied a good deal of attention. It has been discussed on various occasions, and the very Bill which is now before this House has received the attention of that body, and, no longer ago than the day before yesterday, it has been pronounced inadequate to the attainment of the objects which it professed to achieve. For that matter, I could mention the name of several other bodies which have also taken a similar view. In listening to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, I failed to notice that he had disposed of the very many objections which he said had been raised on more than one occasion against this measure. In the first place, he told us that as far back as 1872, this question had been thoroughly discussed in England, and a law enacted similar to this Bill. By his own showing, the conclusions arrived at on that occasion were not satisfactory, since in 1882 a new amendment had to be made, and if the hon. gentlemen will refer to the report of the proceedings of the British Parliament of the 13th of last March, he will find that he was entirely mistaken when he said that the Railway Commission in England had given satisfaction. On the contrary, they are now again about to amend their law and to seek new remedies by the addition of new members to that court, giving it more of a legal aspect than it had before, thereby proving conclusively that the legislation which is sought to be introduced here has proved, I may say, an utter failure in England itself. Therefore I conceive that the best thing we can do is to take our time. We have the experience of the Mother Country before us, dealing with this subject under far more favorable circumstances than we can possibly expect to deal with it here. We have not in this country the same system. We have an international system, if I may so speak, and therefore it is much more easy to deal with the question in England, where all the railways are under the one Government, without the same connections we have here; and if they failed in England under those most favorable circumstances, I cannot see why we should walk in the steps which have been traced so far, rather than wait until we see if in England they can arrive at a solution of the difficulties which are now embarrassing us as well as them. Under these circumstances, therefore, I believe that the arguments advanced by the proposer of this Bill as well as those that have been followed up by the last speaker, must have totally failed to carry convictions to our minds, and that the best thing we can possibly do is to wait the working out of the experience of the Mother Country before we attempt to introduce a law here which, I think, would be very disastrous in its results, have a very bad effect indeed on the carrying trade of the country, and fail in every respect to give us those results which that law is intended to produce. Whilst, therefore, giving credit to my hon. friend for the good intention he has, I believe this law at all events is premature, and that we should await further developments on the other side of the Atlantic before giving our adhesion to his proposition.

Mr. SPROULE. The country to-day is watching with a good deal of interest, the action taken by this House, relative to the important question that is now engaging our attention. Year after year, for part of the last Parliament, and, I think, throughout the present Parliament, this or a similar Bill has been introduced in this House. Time after time it has been dropped because there appeared to be an indisposition on the part of members of this House to take it up and support it sufficiently or to bring it to a test question. Of late there appears to have been a good deal more attention directed towards this measure. We find that the press of the country have been considering it, boards of trade have been discussing its merits and demerits, the agricultural societies of the country have been asking for it, the county councils in different localities of Ontario have passed resolutions in favor of it. And with all these various bodies and powers looking forward with interest to the time when this measure shall be discussed, I think it is not unreasonable to expect that the members of this House should take it up and deal with it. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down is opposed to the Bill, and he says he thinks the time has not come when a measure of this kind should be passed by the House. The reasons he gives for holding such an opinion appear to me to be of a most flimsy nature. From his own statement they are based on two grounds. First, because it has been found necessary to amend the Court of Railway Commissioners in England. Is that the first law which has ever been amended I would like to ask the hon. gentleman? Is it an evidence because a law has to be amended, that it is a complete failure? Is it not found necessary time after time, as varying circumstances arise, to make amendments to almost every law found on the Statute-book of the country? I think this is only an evidence that circumstances have arisen necessitating an amendment; but it is still an acknowledgment that the principle is a good one. The other is that the Board of Trade in Montreal has passed a resolution against this Bill. The hon. gentleman seems to forget that the Board of Trade in Montreal, while it represents a very important commercial body and is composed of very able commercial men, is not the whole Dominion of Canada, and that there may be influences there which would tend to warp their judgment in regard to this question. The railway influence, which is very great in that large metropolis, where railways centre and railway men are found in large numbers, is likely to be brought to bear on the Board of Trade; so that it is not surprising to find that they have resolved against this measure. But we find that in Toronto, another great centre, perhaps the next in importance in the Dominion of Canada, the Board of Trade there has discussed the merits and demerits of this Bill at great length, and after careful consideration, has come to the conclusion that it is important in the interests of this country, that a Board of Railway Commissioners should be established upon the principle of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Simcoe. But further than that, we find that the Grangers of this country, representing perhaps the largest class of people in the country, the agriculturists, in their deliberations, not only this year, but in previous years, have asserted the importance of a Bill of this kind. I have before me the resolutions passed by the Dominion Grange, on the 10th of March, of the present year, which read as follows:—

"Amalgamation has virtually reduced our railway system into two corporations. In some instances these corporations are charging double the rates on local traffic, since said amalgamation has taken place. In fact the rates are raised and lowered to whatever the traffic will bear: this means that the railroad companies fix the price of grain from year to year. The seller or purchaser has little voice in the matter.

"The people and Governments gave their money in good faith to said companies, but the trust reposed in them has been misplaced, and the corporations now virtually say to the people and Governments: 'You have no rights that we are bound to respect.'"

"How long will the people and Governments submit to this state of matters? Those corporations have become so powerful that the question arises: 'Which rules the Dominion of Canada, the people's Government or the railroads?'"

"We would, therefore, urge legislation which will procure the interest of the producer by the establishment of a court or commission similar to that proposed by Mr. McCarthy in his Bill of last Session, for the regulation of railway freights and the final settlement of all matters in dispute between railway companies and individuals or companies."

These are the resolutions passed by the Dominion Grange this year, and almost similar resolutions were passed last year. When we consider that this association represents the agriculturists of the Dominion of Canada as a whole, we must see that there is a strong and growing demand for this measure. I sent a copy of the Bill to the President of the Board of Trade in Owen Sound, the capital of the county, part of which I have the honor to represent. In reply, the president of the board writes to me as follows:—

"My board is an unit on the McCarthy Railway Commission Bill. It came up before us some time ago with a string of questions, when the following resolution was unanimously passed: 'That this board is unanimous in its support of the Act introduced by Mr. McCarthy entitled: An Act for constituting a Court of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879' I trust that the Government of the day will give its support to a measure so necessary as this one for the protection of the interests of the general public. I trust Mr. McCarthy will succeed with his Railway Bill."

Now, this is a resolution passed by another board of trade, composed of gentlemen engaged in commercial pursuits almost entirely, and passed without a dissenting voice. But it may be reasonably asked, is there any necessity for the Bill? I think I need say little in addition to what has been said by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeil), as to the necessity of the Bill. We find that with the growth of railway corporations, and on account of their great strength and ramifications, such great evils have arisen as to induce the people of the country to raise the question whether some means cannot be devised to remedy those evils. As early as 1844 those evils had become so great in England that it was found necessary to pass a law there authorising the Government to take over the management of the railways, or in other words, to buy out the railway corporations of England. I think under the late Sir Robert Peel and the present Prime Minister of England (Mr. Gladstone) a law was passed in 1844 giving the Government that power. On account of the vested rights which were then found to be involved in this question, it was thought advisable to defer the action of the Government for at least twenty-one years, so that the railway companies, on finding this law on the Statute-book, would have the opportunity to govern themselves accordingly, and to sell out their interests before the expiration of that period. Now, what were those evils which the country had to contend with? They are enumerated in a work which deals with the railway problems of the age, and we find that they are very much the same as those which the people of Canada have to contend with to-day. But after a time it was thought by the public that what was proposed was such a gigantic scheme, and would involve such a heavy outlay, that it was perhaps not advisable to buy out the railways; but for the purpose of remedying the evils the very principle was introduced there which we are endeavoring to carry in the Canadian Parliament to-night, that is, the establishment of a Court of Railway Commissioners, who would act as arbitrators between the railway companies and the commercial and general public. Such courts were established; and if, after experience, they had been abandoned or abolished, then there might be some ground for the assumption of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) that they were a failure. But we find that they are still in existence, and although, like all measures of legislation, they have perhaps been found imperfect in some degree, the Parliament of England has, from time to time, endeavored to make them as perfect as possible; and I think that any person who has read the history of those courts, and the multitudinous duties they have performed, must admit that they have been of incalculable benefit to the people of England. Now, is England the only country which has adopted this remedy for the existing grievances? No. We find that going over to the United States, a country which is, perhaps, the first power in the world as regards the importance of its railway system, they too have had these evils to contend with, and we find that many of the States, in their legislative capacity, have put upon their Statute laws for the purpose of establishing these courts, and that they are in operation and competing successfully with the difficulties to-day, no one can deny. These courts, in the United States, appear to have resolved themselves into two classes; one class, with the power behind it of giving publicity to the dark deeds of these railway companies, or, in other words, laying before the public all their acts, so that an intelligent public, by the force of its opinion, would either endorse these acts or condemn them and force a remedy to be applied. I hold in my hand a very important little work which deals with the problem of railway companies in their relations to the public. It is entitled "Railroads; their Origin and Problems," by Adams. I find that these courts have been established some years; I find that they were established in the Western States in 1869, and, strange to say, they had their origin with the same class which to-day is asking the Dominion Parliament to give us this court, namely, the Grangers who felt their inability to cope with the opposition put in force against them by railway companies. Individuals found it was impossible to secure their rights, and hence the demand arose for some other mode of dealing with this very important question. They asked the State Legislatures to take up this matter, and then, on the advice of the Grangers, courts were established to deal with the difficulty. Unfortunately they were established perhaps too much in conformity with the principles advanced by men of little practical experience and railway knowledge, and the result was they were very imperfect in their nature, but no one, after looking over the history of these courts, will deny that they have accomplished a great deal of good, if not so much good as was expected. These courts, which the Grangers recommended, were established on the principle that they were rather courts of arbitration with power behind them to enforce the arbitration. It was found this did not work exactly as was expected, because the power of the railway companies was so great that the courts were frustrated in their design of carrying out their honest intention. Then another question arose. In the grain centres of the West, it was stated that the fundamental principle behind every railroad act was force, and the commission representing the constable. Finding the laws were not carried out, it was brought to the notice of the court that the people's rights were trampled upon, and, in order to redress the wrongs, the court became in the nature of constables to enforce the people's rights. It was found, however, that they had not the power to enforce the rights as they desired. In Massachusetts, where the new principle was introduced, not exactly of enforcing the law by virtue of constable power, but by rather laying before the public the nature of the grievances of which the people had to complain and compelling the railway companies to submit to the inspection by the public, at all reasonable hours, their books, papers and tariffs, and all other things connected with them. Then, when the attention of the public was directed to any grievance, it was brought directly under the notice of the Legislature, who were enabled to amend the laws, from time to time, so as to meet the wants of the people. Those two principles were acknowledged in the courts. One was that of force behind the court, and the other was publicity to the act of the court, so as to have the power of an enlightened public behind them to enforce its ruling.

"In the West the fundamental idea behind every railway Act was force; the commission represented the constable. In the Massachusetts Act the fundamental idea was publicity; the commission represented public opinion. The law creating the board and defining its field of action was clumsily drawn, and throughout it there was apparent a spirit of distrust in its purpose. In theory an experiment, in reality it was a makeshift. The powers conferred on the commissioners hardly deserve the name; and such as they were they were carefully hedged about with limitations against their abuse."

The board, in the first place, became of necessity a judicial in place of a prosecuting tribunal. But that was changed. Then we find, when we go on to the other, that the Massachusetts Legislature established a court, and the result of that court was much more satisfactory.

"Undesignedly the Massachusetts Legislature had rested their law on the one great social feature which distinguishes modern civilisation from any other of which we have a record, the eventual supremacy of an enlightened public opinion."

Their object was to enlighten the public, and then trust to the chances of the Legislature taking up the question, and enforcing what was believed to be enlightened public opinion.

"The line of policy thus happily initiated was carefully pursued. New and wider powers were, year by year, conferred upon the board, but always in the same direction—powers to investigate and report. The commissioners meanwhile were not slow to realise the advantage of their position, and have repeatedly put themselves on record as desiring no more arbitrary powers—as feeling themselves indeed stronger without them. In 1876 this policy reached its final result, as the Legislature then placed the entire system of accounts kept by the corporations under the direct supervision of the board. Its power in this respect was unlimited. Not only was it authorised to prescribe a uniform system upon which those accounts should be kept, but they were also to be kept under the immediate and constant supervision of its officers."

Now those who opposed the adoption of the measure last year, alleged, as one of the grounds of opposition to it, that it was unreasonable to ask companies to allow any person to inspect their books and lay before the public matters which might interfere with the rights and traffic of the railway companies. But in Massachusetts it was found to be an advantage, because afterwards the companies fell in with the principle and were willing to endorse it.

"On proper application the books were to be publicly investigated. In view of the notorious scandals which have made railway financing a by-word for whatever is financially loose, corrupt and dishonest, the scope and significance of this measure does not need to be dwelt upon. It went to the root of the matter. It opened to light all the dark places. In France only, it is believed, had a similar power been asserted; but there its exercise was based on the large pecuniary interest the Government had in the railway properties. It was a partner and, as such, concerned in all their transactions."

Now, the writer goes on to say :

"This measure carried the Massachusetts method of dealing with the railway question to its ultimate point of development under a State Government.

"No greater degree of publicity was possible. The system was perfectly simple, but none the less logical and practicable. It amounted to little more than the establishment of a permanent board of arbitration, acting without any of the formality, expense and delay of courts of law."

These are some of the evils complained of: the cost of compelling railway corporations to do what is right; the delay and expense occasioned by resorting to courts of law, rendering it impossible for individuals, or even small corporations, to fight an extensive wealthy corporation such as a railway company.

"On each question which came before it—whether brought to its notice by means of a postal card or through the action of a city government—this board was to make an investigation. If wrongs and grievances were made to appear, and no measure of redress could be secured, the appeal was to the courts or legislature, the board still being the motive force. Thus on all questions, not strictly legal, arising out of the relations of the railway corporations—whether among themselves, with the community as a whole or with individuals—a body of experts, supposed to be skilled, was provided, who were clothed with full inquisitorial powers and whose duty it was, whether moved thereto by facts within their own knowledge or brought to their knowledge through the intervention of others, to investigate the doings or condition of the corporations, and to lay the resulting facts in detail before the public without remedial or corrective power themselves, behind them stood the Legislature and the judiciary ready to be brought into play should any corporation evince an unreasonable spirit of persistence, when once clearly shown to be in the wrong."

So that these courts were not without power.

"The policy thus described would seem to have worked sufficiently well in Massachusetts. The commission has certainly succeeded in sustaining itself. For while at every session the Legislature has conferred upon it new powers, always in the same direction, the railway corporations have never appeared in opposition to it as a body."

This is one of the strong arguments brought against these courts to-day, that the railway corporations are strongly opposed to the courts, thinking they will be inimical to their interests; but that is not the experience in Massachusetts. Another objection raised to these courts is, that it is said the competition among our railway companies and other corporations carrying on the trade of the country, is of such a peculiar nature, that it would be impossible for these courts to do more than a very small fraction of what they were expected to do in the interests of the people, because it is said that we are living alongside of a country which has railway facilities which are equal, if not superior, in many respects, to our own—a country from which we must draw a large share of our trade; and it is said that the competition is so great between our own railway companies and the companies of the United States that it would virtually kill the trade of the railway companies in this country if we had such a court, and it was to exercise its power and compel these companies to submit to a tariff of charges. But the gentlemen who offer that objection forget that these courts which have been found to work successfully in the United States have confined their operations to one single State. A single State in the United States is very much like one of our own Provinces, and, if the court can work successfully in one State, when those companies which are outside the State are constantly competing with those within the State, I think the court will be much more likely to work successfully here, seeing it applies to the whole Dominion. It is said that we have various railway companies competing, and that this would compel those companies to refuse a large share of the traffic they are now getting, and it is advanced as a theory that the reason why these courts have been allowed in England and not here, is that England is an island. I need not add anything to the argument of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), on that subject; but hon. gentlemen forget that in England, at the time this court was introduced, there were no less than seventy-three railway corporations, and, if seventy-three railway corporations were not sufficient to give the public the fair-play they wanted by competition, it can hardly be expected, under the circumstances in which we are placed to-day, when we have virtually only two railway corporations, that we will get the competition which is necessary; nor can it be supposed that, if this system could be worked efficiently where there is so much competition, it cannot be worked successfully here where there is nothing like the same amount of competition. Another objection which is raised is that the court has too much power and authority. I find, on looking over the clauses in the Statute which was passed to guide the courts of Massachusetts, that the powers given in them were much more extensive, ten times more extensive, than those which it is proposed to give to this court. That court was worked successfully under those extensive powers, and I have no doubt, from the experience of that country in dealing with the difficult problem between the railways and the people, that, if the system worked successfully there it can be worked successfully here. It is also said that the commissioners will not have a sufficient knowledge to discharge their functions satisfactorily to the people. The experience of these courts has proved the contrary. It is also said that the commissioners would be frequently changed, that they would get tired, that they would be bought up by railway corporations, and would be changed from year to year. In this work, which I have in my hand, I find that in six years of the experience of that commission only two changes were made, and that in nine years not a single change was made; that while these commissioners were appointed from year to year, each one holding office for three years, it has not been found necessary from the time the commission was established down to the present to dismiss any one of these men, and that they have discharged the duties devolving upon them very largely to the satisfaction of the public, and also very largely to the satisfaction of the railway corporations. I think that will effectually rebut the statement which has been made by some parties that these men, because they may not have the experience which is possessed by railway magnates, will not be able to discharge their duties satisfactorily. There is one objection raised to the Bill which I see the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has provided against in the present measure. It was said that, if our railway companies could not get freight from the United States at reduced rates they would be unable to carry on their operations successfully. I find that there is a provision in this Bill which does not allow the commissioners to prevent the companies accepting freights from the United States at lower rates than they are carrying them for through this country. That ought to satisfy the opposition in that direction. It was said again that these railway commissioners would be liable to be bought up by the railway corporations. What reason have we to suppose that there is less virtue in these railway commissioners than in the judges of our courts? They have the same human nature, and they are possessed of the same integrity and the same virtues as the judges are, and they are sworn to do their duty. It is rather discrediting the integrity of humanity to say that these men would be more liable to be bought up by railway corporations than the judges. We may ask if they have been bought up in other countries. We find scarcely a solitary complaint in that direction, especially in regard to that class of commissioners who have rested their power upon the principle of laying before the public, for the benefit of an enlightened public opinion, the defects which existed in connection with the railway corporations, who rested their power upon the principle that they would be supported by a more powerful authority than even the courts of the country, that is by the Legislature of the country. We find that they have discharged this duty, although it may be an onerous and extensive duty. Another argument which has been used is that the duties were so grave and so numerous that it would be impossible for the commissioners to do their work. The experience of these courts has been of such a character as to satisfy us that they can do ten times as much work as the law courts. Why? Because they go into the work in a practical way. They become something in the nature of arbitrators, and they take up these matters without any of those delays which exist, and which must exist, in courts of justice. If you introduce a case into a court, perhaps the first thing is that a motion is made to stop proceedings, and that has to be argued in another court. That causes delay, and then some ingenious lawyer raises another point, and from stage to stage that is opposed and argued until, perhaps, the financial support of one of the litigants is entirely overpowered and he is compelled to abandon his case. Any person who will take the trouble to look up the history of the lawsuits which were carried on between the Canada Central Railway and Mr. McLaren, of Perth, will understand the great difficulty there is for a private individual or corporation to secure their rights against a powerful railway company. That was carried on from year to year, until it would require a large fortune to pay the legitimate costs which must have been incurred by the party who was the prosecutor in that case, and I do not know if that man has ever got his right from that railway company yet. Now, these courts are of an entirely different nature. They do away with all these unnecessary delays, they do away with that large expense, and a board of practical men endeavor to adjust the difference between the corporations and the individuals, or between the railway companies themselves, and they do it without delay or expense. In view of all these things it is important that this court should be established. I believe that the great majority of the people of this country, including the farmers as well as the commercial men, believe that it would be in the interest of the country if a court of this kind were established. In supporting the measure now before the House, I believe I am doing what is expected of me by my constituents and the country. They have given an expression of their opinion in various ways; they have given it through their agricultural associations; through their county councils, and they have given it through boards of trade in various great commercial centres, and in all these lines, there appears to be a consensus of opinion that it is important a court of this kind should be established. I do not think there is any reasonable possibility that any other means will be devised for the purpose of remedying the grievances that exist to-day between the railway corporations and the people. Sir, I hope the better judgment of this House will lead a majority of the members to support the measure. We know there is a great power working against it. We find railway magnates around the hotels of this city and around this House, lobbying against this measure in the strongest way. I do not blame them, because they believe they have some interests which might be injured by this court; but, I believe that if the court is established, and after it has been in operation for a few years, they will find out that they were entirely mistaken, just as the railway companies in the United States did when they opposed a similar measure. We cannot wonder that with all these influences there should be an opposition to it in this House. We know that it is a difficult matter to carry a Bill of this nature, and I hope that if it is not carried at this time, the hon. member will persist from Session to Session in bringing it more prominently before the people, and that an enlightened opinion, which was found so effectual in Massachusetts, will enforce their desires upon the Legislature of this country, and cause it to introduce and carry a law to establish such a court, whether the railway companies are willing or not.

Mr. SPROULE,

Mr. SMALL. I wish to say in reference to the statement of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, as to the action of the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto, that that body represents the commercial interests of the whole of Ontario. They sent a petition a short time ago in which they strongly endorsed the measure. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) state that the Board of Trade of the city of Montreal opposed this Bill. I was always under the impression that those two cities acted in unison in this matter, as I believe their interests are the same.

Mr. CASEY. I feel some hesitation in rising after listening to such an instructive speech as we have had from the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), to which I listened with great satisfaction, and from which I obtained a good deal of information. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) told us this was a question on which we should hasten slowly. I would like to ask the hon. member if it is possible to hasten more slowly than we have done in regard to this measure. It has been before the House year after year, it has been discussed fully on each occasion, it has been examined by committees, and has on each occasion received a large measure of support in the House. I think if our judgment is ever to be ripe in regard to this measure, it ought to be ripe now. If we hasten at this rate much longer and refuse to pronounce an opinion for a few years more, it is possible that our judgment which is ripe now, may have passed that stage and be a little more than ripe. Of the objections that were raised to-day, only one or two are worthy of notice. It is said that the Board of Trade of Montreal declared the Bill inadequate. The hon. gentleman did not tell us that the Board of Trade condemned the principle of the measure; I do not know whether such was the fact, but at all events the hon. member did not say so. On the other hand we find the Board of Trade of Toronto representing, as the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Small) has just said, to a large extent the commercial interests of Ontario, has endorsed the Bill. Now, if one of our large commercial centres endorses the Bill and the other merely thinks it inadequate, we have a right to draw the conclusion, not that we should reject the Bill before us, but that we should do our best to make it adequate and try to meet the views of the Montreal Board of Trade, so far as they are sound. It is open to the commercial men of Montreal to lay before this House the provisions which they think would make the Bill an adequate one. Then, as to the experience in England. They have amended their Railway Commission, but the hon. gentleman did not say, and I never heard from any source, that there is any serious movement to do away with the Railway Commission in England. Faults have been found in the original constitution, and it has been amended, but the principle remains as firm as ever. In view of the pending amendments, the hon. gentleman told us that we should wait, and see what they are going to do with it in England. But almost in the same breath, he told us that our situation was radically different from that of England, and such being the case I cannot see how the experience of England is going to help us in the matter. It is evident, on the face of it, that the amendments they make to their Railway Commission in England, to suit it exactly to their circumstances, are just those which would be unsuitable to our circumstances. Then, Sir, the objection taken because we have to deal with an international system of railways, seems to me very weak on the face of it. The railway companies with whom we have to deal have their headquarters in Canada, and we can make them do what we direct on the portion of their roads in Canada, at all events, and we do not pretend to control them any further. But when we find, as was stated by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), that railway commissions have worked well in the United States, even individual States, where the difficulties must have been much greater than they would be in this Dominion, the argument disappears entirely. Now, Sir, as to the general principles which lead me to support this Bill. In the first place, I think, the State ought to realise and enforce the principle that railway companies which have received from the State the franchise which they possess, the power to take land and build roads and make profits, owe a certain debt in return to the State. On the continent of Europe this is practically enforced. In Russia, it is enforced to the extent of requiring certain payment from the railways for the franchise they have obtained. I do not think any one will propose to go so far as that; but I think the principle is perfectly sound that those who obtain exclusive privileges to build railways owe a duty to the State which gives them those privileges. Again, railways in the nature of things are practically monopolies so far as concerns the trade of the country they serve. Although the House does not, except in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway, refuse charters to other companies to run through the same district, the mere fact that one railway can do all the business of a certain district will prevent other roads from being built alongside of it unless the business is sufficiently extensive for two roads. Even in such a case as that, where there are two or more railways serving the same district, we have found, time and again, they have become virtually if not nominally amalgamated, and instead of a single railway having a monopoly of the trade we have a network of monopolies. As the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) has pointed out, that is the case with the whole Dominion at present. Practically, two great railway corporations control the whole trade of Canada; we have a monopoly extending over the whole Dominion; if those railway companies chose to make such arrangements as they can make within the law, the monopoly will become more grievous than it is now. It is a sound rule that if you permit monopolies, it is the duty of the State to regulate them. It cannot be argued that these monopolies are regulated at present in this country. There is no effectual authority to regulate them. The courts cannot do it because they can only take cognisance of suits, of matters brought before them in that form. There are many injustices existing in consequence of the action of railway companies which can scarcely be made the subject of suits until substantial damages have been caused to some individual. Those injustices a body of railway commissioners, which could put itself in motion and did not need to wait till it was put in motion by a formal legal complaint, would remedy. Again, where substantial damages have occurred, and the machinery of the law has been set in motion against the railway company, there is no fair play as between the parties. The railway company is too rich for any private suitor, and, as has been already pointed out, suits of this kind go up to the highest court until the poorer of the two parties to the suit is worn out. There is another body supposed to have some authority in these matters, the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. But without discussing their various powers and authority, I need only say that we are aware, as a matter of fact, it does not regulate the railway monopolies, that it does not afford a remedy against the injustices committed by the railway companies, and does not prevent wrangling and trouble between the companies themselves. So there is at present no authority existing which is capable of regulating these monopolies, or giving prompt and summary justice to those who have complaints against them. For these reasons I support the principle of the Bill now before the House. I think the time has come to assert the rights of the people and the rights of the State as against the rights of those railway corporations which are now becoming enormous and powerful "rings." There is a popular demand for some Act of this kind. The House has been told already of some of the forms in which this demand has been manifested. The farming community ask for it; the commercial community ask for it. Who opposes it? No one except the railway corporations themselves. Any opposition coming from the parties, whose action we propose to regulate, must be looked upon with some suspicion. It is the opposition of directly interested parties who are afraid of some injury being done by such regulation. If the proposed regulation is carried out, no harm can come to those companies; unless they can prove there is something unfair and unjust in the working of the proposal, they have no standing as opponents of the Act. If they cannot show that the enforcement of just rules and regulations will injure their trade, I say that is no ground of opposition to the Bill. But, of course, they maintain and allege that real injury will be done to them, and they will do their best undoubtedly to make all their employees and hangers-on believe the same thing—that injustice will be done to the company, that injury will be done to trade and to those who work for the company. I believe this is a hollow cry, merely a bug-a-boo set up to prevent those connected with the railways throughout the country—and we know what a large body of electors they are—from supporting such a measure. I do not see how just regulations can reduce the fair profits of the companies, still less the profits of those who work for them. If the companies are able to show such injury before the House, the Bill will not pass. The presumption is in favor of regulation and upon the railway companies rest the burden of proving that injury will be done them. We shall see if during the passage of the Bill the railway companies produce such proof. I do not believe they can do so. We shall only be doing our duty if we listen to the popular demand for a railway commission to regulate those corporations which have become too strong for the courts or the Government to control.

Mr. SHANLY. I am not going to say much at this time on the principle of the Bill. What it proposes is too like Government management to satisfy me. I am entirely opposed to Government management of railways, which has been a signal failure in every country where it has been tried, that is to say, in every country where the Anglo-Saxon race is found. It is true on some European continental railways, which are almost like military railways, it may have succeeded to a certain extent, but in this country and in the adjoining country Government management of railways has always failed. In this country we have adopted it on a pretty large scale, and those understanding railway business, as I may say I do, know that the Government management of our Intercolonial Railway has not been anything like a success. I shall not enter further on a discussion of the principles of the Bill just now; I may do that at a later stage. The Bill itself is deserving of the strongest possible condemnation, for I know it must prove an utter and entire failure. Whosoever the drafter of the Bill was he thought he knew everything himself, and therefore did not consult railway men. There are duties and powers entrusted to the three members of the commission that no thirty men in the Dominion or on this continent—I do not care what their physical powers or mental capacity may be—could discharge. The effect of the Bill will be to place in the hands of those three commissioners all that is now being done by the regular management of the railways, and those men are expected to do that which it takes fifty men working almost night and day to perform in order to keep the railways going, and to endeavor, and a difficult task it is, to satisfy a public very critical of railway management where everything is being done to please them. Now, Sir, we have heard a great deal said about the commissions which have been appointed in the country adjoining us

Some of the United States have these commissions and others have not. But I assert here and, I challenge contradiction when you come to the proof, that no railway commission in any State of the Union has any such powers as are to be delegated to those three men by this Bill, and you will find if you take the reports of these railway commissions in the United States, that the duties of the commissioners appear to be simply to make their reports at the end of each year, to make a few suggestions, and to draw their salaries. They have not in any way affected, for good or evil, railway management in that country, as it has always continued to be carried out by the men who understand railway management; and, therefore, I say there is no sort of comparison between the commission which is proposed to be established by this Bill and those commissions which exist in only some few of the States of the neighboring Union. It has also been told us here that because there is a railway commission in England, which may satisfy the people there, or it may not, such a commission would be equally applicable here. Now, our geographical position is so different that I hold that even if the English commission was proved to be the most complete success, it would form no sort of reason why we should establish a railway commission here. Every railway in England is chartered by the English Government, and is completely under the control of the English Government and people. Here we are dealing with railways all round us which are not chartered by our Government and not under our control, and to-day there is nothing which causes more irritation—such as my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has referred to as existing along the lines of railway, and which I am free to admit does exist—there is nothing which causes that irritation more than seeing long trains of freight passing, probably, from the Western States, through to Halifax or Portland, carrying the products with which they are filled, at such rates as they would not carry them where they produced within the bounds of these Provinces. Well, we must either carry western freight in that way or let it alone, and you may as well—if those railway commissioners are to legislate in that manner and establish such rates of through freight as will satisfy the people along the route, within our own borders—we might as well pass an Act of one page and enact that none of the products of the United States shall pass through Canada to the ocean. That is exactly the state of the case. But, as I said before, I do not intend to go largely into the principles of the Bill to-night. There will be other opportunities no doubt. I feel fully satisfied myself that whatever the sentiments of hon. gentlemen may prove to be as to this Bill, in its present condition the Government cannot possibly allow it to pass into law. We would find, if we did pass it, that these three men would be ready to throw up their positions before they were a month in office, because it would be utterly impossible for them to discharge the duties devolving upon them. While those duties were accumulating upon them, the railways would be practically left without management, because the legitimate managers of the railways who thoroughly understand their business, and who, with their assistants, are kept working night and day for twenty-four hours, would be left practically powerless, and everybody would have to wait for the action of those three men who could not possibly keep up with the ordinary business which would devolve upon them. I oppose the Bill first of all, because I am not satisfied that its principle, though I do not wholly condemn it, is at this moment applicable to this country, and I oppose the Bill itself because I think it is utterly and thoroughly defective in almost every clause.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Whatever the merits of this Bill may be, there is no doubt in the world that the public opinion of this country is very strongly impressed with the idea that the railway corporations, which may now be said to be almost limited to two, which have swallowed up the whole railway interests of this country, and almost crushed the one remaining independent line, are becoming altogether too powerful in this country, and I think I might say too powerful in this House. For the first evil, this Bill proposes to provide a remedy; for the second, we must trust to the good sense and the independence of the members of this House, because it is a matter which I believe we cannot exactly remedy by legislation. The people throughout the whole of Ontario—and I only speak with reference to Ontario, because I am not so well informed as to other parts of the country—are looking to this Bill; every Board of Trade, every Grange, almost every other representative body which is in a position to speak on behalf of either the rural or city population, is sending expressions of opinion that the powers of railway corporations are too great, and that there must be something done to restrain them. In different ways, and in whatever way we look, we find this evil existing. We find on some railways discriminating rates, so arranged that the business of one village is completely destroyed for the benefit of others; we find on other railways, that the rates are so arranged that American grain is carried for such a fractional rate, that the whole effect of the National Policy is completely set aside, and the farmers of this country are in a worse position than they were before railways were built and before the National Policy was introduced. If, as I believe is now being done, American grain is being carried from Duluth to the seaboard for a lower rate than grain is carried between two points in the Province of Ontario, fifty or sixty miles apart, then I ask what becomes of all the attempts we have made to afford to the farmers of this country that protection which is given to the farmer in the United States. It completely destroys every effort we have made to bring about fair trade and fair play between ourselves and the American producer. I do not know how far this Bill may remedy that particular evil, but at any rate it will be a step in the direction of providing the machinery by which something may be done. It is absurd for us to talk of endeavoring to shut out American grain by tariff legislation, when the railways which we have built ourselves, which the country has largely subsidised, which could not have been built but for our assistance, are entirely setting aside our policy by the discriminating rates which they give to American produce. This country has very largely taxed itself for the purpose of building those railways. There is not a railway in the country, either the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific Railway, which does not owe its existence to the taxation which has been placed on the people of this country. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken contrasted the difference between the American and Canadian railways and the English railways, and he said that the English railways were chartered by the English Government and were under its control. Now what is the fact with regard to our own railways? The fact is that they are managed almost entirely and exclusively for the benefit of the English capitalists who have invested in them, and that they entirely set aside the interests which the people of Canada have in them and the money they have put in them. Take any railway; take the Grand Trunk Railway, the Northern, or any of the amalgamated lines, and we find the same thing. We find that the object of the management is not to develop the resources of this country—I do not mean to say they leave that entirely out of the question—but the main thing is to run those roads for the benefit of the English investors as the largest interest involved. I have in my mind a railway which is carried on mainly on that principle, and there is no regard paid to the development of the trade of the country. I suppose the manager feels that to do that would involve an outlay which would not be satisfactory to the English bondholders, but whatever the motive, the fact remains as we find it every day, that our interests are entirely set aside so long as the manager of that road can obtain for his English masters—probably it would hardly be fair to call them that, but so long as he can help those whom he considers are the largest interests to be served. Then I say, if a railway commission was legitimate and fair in England, where the railways are under Government control, how much more necessary is it in this country, where there is not that Government control, but where there is an interest altogether separate from ours, which comes directly into competition with the interests of the people. The hon. gentleman himself has afforded the very strongest reason why there should be an independent body interposing between the railway companies and the public. Just because there is that large amount of capital invested exclusively in the railway interest and because our railway companies are largely supported by English capital, which is managed in such a way, naturally and reasonably, as to promote the interest of the capitalists, altogether irrespective or independent of the true interests of the people of this country, just for that reason should we have such an independent body as this court. Another point to which I would allude is this: that the railways ride rough shod over the local interests of the people of this country. There is not a railway in the country that does not place life and limb in daily jeopardy by refusing or neglecting to provide necessary crossings. It would not be tolerated in any country but Canada, that railways should cross streets and roads in the way they do; and although it is perfectly true that we have a machinery by which the railway companies may be compelled to provide the necessary safeguards, yet that machinery is so difficult to put in motion that nobody likes to resort to it. I have in my mind a number of places where not a day passes in which life and limb are not in jeopardy through the wilful and culpable neglect of the railway companies to provide necessary means of safety. All these things might be dealt with by this commission. I quite admit the difficulty of dealing with the question of through freights, because our railways to some extent depend on them; yet I do think that a great deal too much importance is attached to these through freights. We know that the people complain that their local interests are time and again neglected, that their warehouses are allowed to stand for weeks full of produce, on which they have to pay 6 or 10 cents a bushel to be carried fifty or sixty miles, in order that through freights may be carried at 1 or 2 cents a bushel. Local interests suffer not only because the railways carry through freights at less rates than our local freights, but local freights have to wait the convenience of through trains, and particular localities are often made the victims of the caprice of the management. Hon. gentlemen must know of cases in which particular localities are treated with the greatest unfairness, and their interests are set aside in favor of other localities which it suits the interests of the railway to serve in preference. Of course, it may be contended that a railway company like anybody else will serve its own interest, and that it is to its interest to serve the public as much as possible; but in the carrying out of that principle, we find so many instances in which the interests of certain localities are entirely lost sight of, that if we can find a remedy for this state of things, it is our duty to apply it; and until some better remedy is proposed by which it shall be guaranteed that our local interests shall not be sacrificed as they are by the railway companies, and that the producer in the Western States shall be placed on the same footing as the Ontario producer, we should accept this measure. I can assure the House that there is a strong desire on the part of the people of Ontario that this measure should become law, and that some independent body should be created which would stand between the railway companies and the public, and prevent those glaring injustices arising of which they have so much reason to complain.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am very glad the hon. promoter of this Bill has brought it again before the House. The fact is, we have come to look upon it as a mere matter of form, for we have been accustomed to see it brought in year after year, and if I remember rightly, its ultimate fate last year was lost on division, without a division being taken. I trust the hon. gentleman is not going to allow this course to be taken this year, but that he will bring his Bill to a division so that the names of the members will be recorded, and the public will know how the House stands on the matter. There has not been very much said against the Bill to-night, and very few objections have been raised against it. The hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly), however, has raised two or three objections which I desire briefly to notice. The first is that the Government management of railways has not been a success. Now, Sir, if I understand anything about this Bill, though I have not looked at it very closely, it does not contemplate the Government management of railways at all. It simply contemplates a court by which the traffic on railways can be regulated—not, as I understand it, to make railways accept freights below their value, but to see that no injustice is done to any particular locality or individual. The next objection was made to the structure of the Bill itself. Well, Sir, I do not think that that should prove a fatal objection to it. We have a Railway Committee of this House, who, we have reason to believe, are sufficiently able to deal with any defect in it that may exist; and I have no doubt, if this Bill goes to the Committee on Railways, that the gentlemen who compose that committee will supply any deficiencies in the measure there. If they were not, the Bill must come before the Committee of the Whole House; and if there is any defect in its structure, there is sufficient knowledge and skill to be found there to remedy that defect. Another objection was that the Bill was in some way or other going to interfere with through freights. By that term I understand the freight that is carried from the Western States through this country to the seaboard, and I do not understand that this Bill contemplates dealing with that at all. In fact, it is a matter over which we have no control. It is a matter for the railways to determine whether it is profitable for them to carry those freights or not. But I wish to direct the attention of the House to this fact, that during all the long past years the people of the Dominion of Canada have been taxed on their freight to enable the railway corporations to compete for the carrying trade of the United States, and the people of our own country have been paying higher rates than they ought to have paid merely to enable the railways to carry the freights of the Western States at lower rates than are profitable. Now Sir, I think it is high time that the Government and Parliament should take this matter in hand, and see that our own people are not placed at any disadvantage beside the people of another country. Another objection, which was urged by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) was that the English Bill has been amended. I think that is a very trivial objection. I scarcely remember any Bill that has been passed by our own Parliament for any purpose whatever which has not in course of time had to be amended. In fact, all legislation is experimental; it is only by experience of the working of an Act that we can find whether it needs amending or not, or that we can determine what changes ought to be made in it. Now there are one or two reasons why this Bill should become law. It has been said that we have really only two railway systems in the Dominion. Over one of these, unfortunately, we cannot, for a long time to come, hope to have any control, as far as the rates to be charged are concerned, but there is one point, even as regards that company, which this House can interfere with, and that is to see that no discrimination is made against individuals or particular localities. The exemption of that company does not extend to these matters; it simply provides that they shall be able to charge a certain rate until they are enabled to pay a certain dividend, but I do not understand it to provide that they shall be able to discriminate against one individual at the expense of another, or against one locality at the expense of another. The very fact that we have only two railway systems is one of the strongest reasons why such a Bill as this should become law. If we had railway competition at the various points this Bill would be almost unnecessary, because competition would keep the charges down to reasonable rates, and it would be in the interest of companies to do justice to the people; but the very absence of that competition is one of the strongest reasons why a measure of this kind should become law. There is another side of the question. The railway companies in this country seem to have complete control in this matter. It is a fact that cannot be disputed that it is in their power to discriminate against any locality or individual, against whom or which they may see fit to discriminate. It is in their power absolutely to decide whether a particular locality, town, or village along the line, shall thrive or perish; they have the destiny of places in their own hands. It is the very same with individuals. The companies are able to say, if they take a spite against an individual, whether his business will be closed up or not, as they can ruin him by putting up his rates to such a figure that he cannot compete with others living in the same locality and engaged in the same line of business. The arguments used against this measure are based upon the contention that the railways are the only parties who have any rights in the matter, but it seems to me that people have rights as well as the railways. You can scarcely find a municipality, in Ontario at least—and I suppose it is much the same in the other Provinces—that has not taxed itself, and taxed itself very heavily, for the construction of railways, and often for the sake even of getting railway competition; but the competition is gone, and all they have is the railway. In many cases, assistance has been given in the shape of bonuses, as a gift to the companies, in other instances, it has been given in the shape of subscriptions of stock which have proved worthless. Is it too much that the rights of the people should be recognised, after they have paid from their hard earnings for railway accommodation, after they have taxed themselves to secure railway competition and are deprived of it? Is it too much that they should expect their representatives in this House to see that the people get something like justice in this matter? There is one provision in the Bill which ought to be expunged, namely, that the Government railways are not to be subjected to the control of this court. I think that is a mistake. I know that the Government have greater inducements than the companies to do justice in these matters; but still I think it is too much, when we are passing a law of this kind, to exempt the Government from its control. They ought to be under the same regulations and should be compelled, if they do not, to deal justly with all parties interested, just as much as a railway corporation. In conclusion, I believe that such a court as this will be of immense benefit, even supposing no action were taken. I believe the very fact that there existed a court of appeal would have a most wholesome effect in bringing railway corporations to a sense of duty and preventing them from favoring certain localities at the expense of others. I hope this Bill will become law, and that the promoter of it, if it does not become law, will, at least, press it to a division, so that we may see how the House stands upon it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is undoubtedly a very important question, but I doubt whether a Bill of this kind, if passed, will operate in the same way with regard to all the different competing lines. If I understand rightly, when the Canadian Pacific Railway got their charter, special provisions were introduced into it, which possibly might interfere with the work of that commission, as regards the rates charged by that company. I do not know how this may be. However, we all remember that some years ago, the Grand Trunk Railway came to this House for the purpose of asking the passage of a Bill to enable them to double their tracks between Toronto and Montreal. The Canadian Pacific Railway have not yet completed their line. It cannot be said that either of those lines are completed, and it would be a sad thing if this House, by any action, would possibly interfere with the carrying out to completion of one or both of these lines. But after they are completed, I certainly would consider that if the country is suffering by excessive rates or by unjust exactions by the companies in the carriage of goods, some interference should be had on the part of Parliament between the people and the companies. Differences may exist just now. I must say, however, as far as my locality is concerned, I have not heard of many complaints with regard to rates. I would like to see the Government assume the responsibility of making a general investigation into the operations of an Act of this kind before adopting it. It would be well for the Minister of Railways to undertake to post himself with regard to the probable effect of a commission of this kind, and ascertain how far the evils exist, so that the House might be in full possession of the facts, and enabled to deal with the question intelligently. The hon. mover of this Bill has brought it before the House several times, and no doubt is fully persuaded of its necessity; but, at the same time, it is well we should legislate with a great deal of care. Our railway systems have had a good deal of difficulties to contend with, and those who have invested money in railways have not reaped that return they expected in almost every case, and if any action of this kind on our part had the effect of hindering the progress of railways towards completion and prosperity, I should exceedingly regret it. We know the Canadian Pacific Railway has signified their intention of going to the market for the purpose of borrowing $20,000,000 to pay the debt they owe the Government. Is it possible an action of this kind would prevent their succeeding? Until the railways are completed and put into a finished condition, we should legislate with great care; but the moment we find evils of the kind complained of, and it would be prudent to take action, I would be only too anxious that steps might be taken to adjust any wrongs that might possibly exist. In the meantime, I think the Government should assume the responsibility and should make a general and extensive investigation, and place the House in possession of all the information they can on this question; and then we would proceed with our eyes open, being cognisant of all the evils that exist and desiring to remedy them as well as we possibly can.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I suppose that, after the speeches of the last two gentlemen that have addressed the House, it will now be proper for me to state, as I have been requested to do by my colleague the Minister of Railways and Canals, who was not able to remain to so late an hour this evening, what is the view that he desires to present to the House on this question. In doing that, although it would be presumptuous for me to say so on my own behalf merely, but on his behalf, it may be well for me to present to the House our sense not only of the importance of the question, to which the House is no doubt very seriously alive, but of the very serious difficulty of dealing with it. This has been fully brought home by the circumstance that this measure has been before the House at several successive Sessions, until at last the impression seems to have existed in the minds of some members that this Session it has been brought forward again simply as a matter of form—an impression which I know, from the investigation which I have been able to give to the subject, as well as from my conferences with the gentlemen who are in favor of it, is entirely unfounded. I have no doubt whatever of the entire sincerity of the gentlemen who are promoting the Bill, but the House is fully aware, I am sure, that, before the Government could allow a measure of this kind to pass, they must appreciate the very serious responsibilities which it involves, they must be aware of the circumstance that the House is being appealed to very largely on behalf of the interests which are arrayed upon one side of the question. The speeches which have been made this evening in opposition to the Bill bring out to some extent the importance of the interests which are affected by it, but it is impossible that the adverse views can be presented with the same force as the views of those who are in favor of the Bill, because, notwithstanding the suggestion which has been made that the interests of railway corporations are strongly represented in this Parliament, it is impossible that those views can be presented with the same force as the self interests—if I may call them so—of those classes who are promoting this Bill. These latter find very ready expression in this House, while the railway corporations, and not only the railway corporations but those localities which desire to obtain the railway communication which they have not yet got, do not find the same facility of representing their views, notwithstanding the assertion which has been made that those interests are carefully guarded in this House. I think it is a mistake to assume that we have in this country to deal with only two great railway systems. It may be so with regard to a portion of the country, but this Bill would have far more extensive operation than that. It proposes, not only to deal with those two railway systems, but with the minor railways which perhaps are not so important in this section of the country, but which are of great importance to the more distant parts of the country which are not so efficiently served, if they are served at all, by those two great railway systems. Besides that, the action which Parliament will take in reference to a question of this kind will have a very important effect upon the future of the railway development of this country. There is the utmost desire in every part of the country which is not yet served by a railway to induce English and foreign capitalists to come to Canada and make their investments in railway enterprises. The moment the capitalists have made their investment they find that the interests arrayed against them become most formidable, demanding low rates and demanding consideration for particular localities which it is not in the interests of the capitalists concerned to concede. To concede such is said to be a duty which they owe to the country in consideration of what they receive in grants of land and freedom from taxation, and of the various aids which have induced the capitalist to come in and invest his money, and which certainly have not been given in consideration that the localities interested should subsequently manage the capital so invested. I only suggest these reasons to the House for the purpose of showing the sense which is entertained of the difficulty of dealing with this question and of its very great importance. I had intended to refer to the view, which has been well presented, as to the marked difference which exists between those countries in which courts of commissioners of this kind have been established and have been supposed to operate well, and this country, situated geographically as it is, and having to contend, day after day, with the very great competition which exists with the lines of railway in the neighboring country. There is no great difficulty in admitting one position which has been strongly urged by the hon. members who have supported the Bill, and that is that the unfairness of making special rates as against individuals or against particular localities, is one that ought to be prevented, and prevented if necessary by State legislation. I presume there will be no disagreement in the House on that point, and I understand that that is the principal point it is desired to accomplish by this Bill. What is the best means of accomplishing it is a question that requires more investigation than we have yet been able to give to it. Of course, the Government have had the advantage of the very full and interesting discussions which have taken place on this subject year by year, and I know it is felt by some members of the House that the Government should be ready to deal with it by this time; but older countries in which the experiment has been tried have not been satisfied with the result of that experiment. In Great Britain we see a proposition made largely to change the system by which this Court of Commissioners operates. We have the fact that, in the United States, in nearly all of the States, as one hon. gentleman mentioned, the Railway Commissions have not been found productive of any very great good. They make reports, they are careful to draw their salaries, they make wise suggestions, which the State very seldom acts upon, and in nearly all cases where they have been found to act with any degree of vigor, the complaint has gone abroad that they have been bought up by one or another interest in the community. I do not mention these circumstances at all as leading to the conclusion that the system has been a failure; I do, however, mention them as a reason why it is necessary to proceed with a great deal of caution. I, therefore, state on behalf of my colleagues and of the Government, that in view of the information which has already been gathered upon this subject, the correspondence which has taken place, and the changes which have been proposed in the countries to which I have referred, it is the intention of the Government during the recess to give this matter a thorough investigation by the appointment of a commission to enquire into the whole subject and ascertain the interests and the views of all classes in the community affected by it. The result, I trust, will be fully reported to this House at the ensuing Session, so that the House, before the expiration of this Parliament, may deal definitely with the whole question.

Mr. McCARTHY. I cannot quite agree with all my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, has stated, although I do not feel unwilling to accede to the conclusion at which, on behalf of the Government, he has arrived. I entirely deny, Sir, that the experience in other countries, so far as we know, with regard to railway commissions, has been unfavorable, judging, at all events, by the Mother Country, where the greatest attention has been given to this subject, and for a longer period of time. I think the result of the Railway Commission has been, on the contrary, eminently satisfactory. It is not merely since 1872 that this question, so important to a great country like England, so important, I may say, even to a country not so great in commercial importance as this is, has received the attention of English public men and the English Parliament; but since 1854—I am not able to say at this moment what the railway mileage was at that date—the question of controlling the railways, which very early, indeed, in their existence, showed a disposition to deal unfairly with the public, has engaged the attention of Parliament, and, I may say, of the wisest and ablest men in Parliament. Now, Sir, if we trace down the history of that legislation, as has been so well done by my hon. friend this evening, we shall find that it was experimental for a time. First it was a board of trade, afterwards, one of the courts, and, subsequently, in 1872, and upon the report of a very important commission, the Railway Commission was established as it still exists in England at the present time. If we look at the speech of the President of the Board of Trade in England in introducing the Bill, a copy of which I have in my hand, one cannot feel otherwise than that this subject in England, this method of dealing with it, has been to the highest degree satisfactory. The Railway Commission, which was experimental, which was limited in duration, is now proposed to be made perpetual. After the greatest deliberation, after the investigation of the subject by a committee of both Houses, after that committee's report had undergone consideration by Mr. Chamberlain, as President of the Board of Trade, by Mr. Chamberlain's successor in Lord Salisbury's Government, and by the present President of the Board of Trade, we have a Bill which, I would say to my hon. friend from South Grenville (Mr. Shanly), proposes to establish the Railway Commissioners as a court of record and to make it perpetual.

Mr. SHANLY. Quite right—for England.

Mr. McCARTHY. Of course, I have heard that argument, and have answered it so frequently that I do not think I would be justified in taking up the time of the House by answering it again this evening. I may say, however, that the very arguments, the self-same arguments which have been repeated in this House ad nauseam, which we have heard from the railway advocates on so many occasions, which we have read in the newspaper press and in their petitions, have been adduced, and have been urged against any attempt to control the railway companies in the Mother Country. It is a curious circumstance, and one which was mentioned, I think, by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), that the railway companies in England are subject to more competition of various kinds, notwithstanding the difference in geographical position, than are our railway companies. Then, if we look at the country south of us, do we find that they refused to legislate? That they refused to attempt to control the railway system? Why, in nearly all the States—I have here a list of them—my hon. friend from South Grenville seemed to think they were not very numerous—they have attempted, wisely or not, is not now the question, to control the railways, and the attempt to control them seems to indicate, at all events, that there has been a grievance to control.

Mr. SHANLY. Has the attempt succeeded?

Mr. McCARTHY. It has substantially succeeded in England, and unless it can be shown that the circumstances of this country are wholly dissimilar to those in England, I do not think any hon. gentleman can say that this is purely experimental legislation. I do not pretend to say how it has succeeded elsewhere, but it has succeeded I can tell my hon. friend, in one State, and that is the State of Massachusetts, and although it has been carried on on a very different system from the one in England—a system which I see Mr. Mundella proposes to incorporate, to a certain extent, in his Bill—it has been found an eminent success there. After what has fallen from the hon. the Minister of Justice in his official announcement on behalf of the Government, I will not presume to occupy the time of the House much longer; but I will just say this, to my hon. friend from South Grenville (Mr. Shanly), who has addressed the House in very strong and sweeping terms, who has condemned the Bill, and every line and every syllable of the Bill, its draughtsman and everybody else connected with it, I can only say to my hon. friend that I am afraid he has not read the Bill.

Mr. SHANLY. Yes, I have.

Mr. McCARTHY. I can only say that if he has read the Bill he has not understood it.

Mr. SHANLY. No, I have not.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Mr. McCARTHY. I can tell my hon. friend that the people who drafted the Bill upon which this is founded were competent men; they were statesmen whom I think my hon. friend will not depreciate.

Mr. SHANLY. English statesmen do not always understand our geography?

Mr. McCARTHY. It is not a question of geography. I think the hon. member has not understood the measure which he has ventured, in these sweeping terms, to criticise. He says it would take, not three men, but fifty men, to do the work proposed to be imposed by this Bill on the Railway Commission. Does not my hon. friend know that one of the objections to the Railway Commission in England, who have all the powers which are proposed to be conferred upon the Railway Commission in this country, which have a vast trade and nearly double the mileage under their jurisdiction than we have—that one of the objections was that they had not enough to do to keep these three gentlemen employed in regulating and administering the affairs which were committed to them? Has he not read in the Bill that this is merely a court to deal with complaints that are made, and not to interfere with the business of companies unless complaints are made? Does he not know, as was well said by an hon. member on the other side of the House who addressed us in so able and in so practical a manner, that the Railway Commission has done great good by the terror it has exercised upon the railway management of the country. If the hon. member will only study the Bill before he criticises it, I think his remarks will be for the future more valuable than those he has offered here this evening. There are just these matters to be dealt with in this legislation. I shall briefly refer to them: There is the matter of unjust discrimination. There is that unjust discrimination between individuals which no man can justify. I do not care how long a gentleman may have been a railway manager or acquainted with railway matters, I mean to say that no man can justify unfair discrimination between individuals on any ground whatever. There is more difficulty, I admit, when we come to deal with discriminations between localities, and it, therefore, is impossible, and it has been found so in some of the States of the Union—and we would be unwise if we did not draw what inspiration we could from them—to fix a per mileage rate or adopt a system known there as the system of short haul. Therefore, the necessity of an administrative board; therefore the necessity of, not men wholly versed in law, but men who have practical business experience and perhaps a legal man at their head, to guide them in the legal principles which regulate the carrying trade, to constitute a railway commission. With respect to what has fallen from the Minister of Justice, on behalf of the Government, I have only this to say: I have felt it all along, I have felt it still more this evening, that it is utterly impossible for a private member of this House to propose legislation and carry it through successfully. I think a matter of this kind, and I have always thought so, is one to be dealt with by the Government of the day. It was my duty, however, as a private member to draw attention to it from time to time, so as to bring to bear the public opinion which I believe to be in favor of the measure, so that the Government would feel at length that the hour had come for it to be assumed as a Government measure and to be dealt with in that way. I think that hour has come. I accept the statement of the Government that they will deal with the question next Session upon the report of a commission which they propose to issue during the recess. I accept that statement, I believe it to be uttered in good faith, and I shall look forward to the report of the commission with every confidence that the statement which I have from time to time made, that the feeling which is so largely to be found through the Province from which I come, a feeling which exists among mercantile men and among the trading and agricultural community, namely, that the railway companies have been carrying on the business unjustly, have been discriminating against persons and localities—I say I feel no hesitation in saying that the result of the commission will be to establish that beyond peradventure. And if that be so, I think that, between the two Bills, the Bill that was passed in 1872 in England, and the Bill which is now before the British House of Commons, and which I trust will become law, with the various amendments suggested in the reports of 1881-82, the Government will be able to bring down a measure which will be satisfactory to the House and to the country.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I understand the introducer of the Bill, under the circumstances I have stated, will not press it?

Mr. McCARTHY. I move to discharge the Order for the second reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. JAMIESON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 92) further to amend the Canada Temperance Act, 1878. He said: In introducing this Bill I propose to offer a few words in reference to the character of the amendments which are proposed. It will be remembered that a Bill was introduced by myself last year, at the request of the Dominion

Alliance, containing amendments to render the operation of the Canada Temperance Act of 1878 more effective. The provisions of this Bill are somewhat analagous to the Bill I introduced last year. There are, however, a few additional provisions which are deemed necessary by those who promoted the Canada Temperance Act. The first amendment we propose by this Bill is to meet a defect in the present law. A difficulty arose in the county of Perth by depositing a petition in one registry office when the county had two such offices. Now we propose to amend the law in such a way that depositing the petition in the office of one registrar will be sufficient. No doubt, when the Canada Temperance Act was passed it was intended to apply to the whole Dominion, but, unfortunately, it is found not to be workable in the Province of British Columbia. Two sections of the Bill apply to the Province of British Columbia. It is, perhaps, known to most, if not to all, the members of this House, that in the Province of British Columbia they have not municipal organisations such as we have in the older Provinces. For instance, they have no municipal divisions known by the name of counties, and consequently the Canada Temperance Act, which is framed to be submitted in counties and cities, is found to be inapplicable to British Columbia. We propose to remedy that by providing that the Act may be submitted in electoral divisions sending members to the House of Commons of Canada, and that the petition be deposited in the office of the registrar of voters in each of these electoral divisions. Then, in the Province of Ontario, there are several provisional or temporary judicial districts. Now, I believe my hon. friend for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) has two or three of these districts within the boundary of his constituency, and petitions have been presented here by the people of those districts, asking that the Act be so amended as to allow it to be submitted in those temporary or provisional judicial districts. We think this ought to be conceded to the people residing in those unorganised parts of Ontario. Possibly there are other unorganised districts in other portions of the Dominion; I am not aware of any, but I know such exist in the Province of Ontario. We propose to amend the law in such a way that it may be submitted in those provisional or temporary districts, and that the petition may be deposited in the office of the registrar in each of those districts. In addition to these we ask for a few other amendments which we think necessary to the proper working or operation of the law. We also propose by this Bill to permit druggists and others to sell liquors for medicine in less quantities than a pint. For my part I could never understand why druggists or others who are selling under a physician's prescription were required to sell in larger quantities than a pint; they cannot sell in less quantities. We propose that a person purchasing under a physician's prescription may be allowed to receive less than a pint. In addition to that we propose to amend section 100 by adding a penalty in the case of a medical man giving a fraudulent or colorable certificate. Now, we believe that such an amendment is absolutely necessary to secure the effective working of the law. We also propose to extend by this Bill the search clause of the Canada Temperance Act, popularly known as the Scott Act, to counties in which the old Dunkin Act is still in force. It appears that in some parts of the Dominion, in two or three counties, at all events, the Dunkin Act is still in force, and all the other provisions of the Scott Act were made applicable to counties to which the Dunkin Act was in force except the search law. Now, we think the search clause is as much required in those counties where the Dunkin Act is in force as in those where the Scott Act is in force. In addition to that, we propose to extend the right of search under the Scott Act. We are not proposing an innovation by this amendment, because this amendment is to be found in the license clause of the Province of Ontario, and has been on the Statute book of that Province for several years. We propose that the right of search be given to any officer, at any hour of the day or night, to enter places in which he has evidence of the fact that liquors are being illicitly sold or trafficked in. Under the original text of the Scott Act, an officer bearing a search warrant could only enter in the daytime a house in which he had reason to believe that liquors were sold contrary to law. We propose that the law be amended so as to allow officers to enter at any time during the day or night, and we believe that is necessary to the efficient working of the law. We also propose to annex to the Act a schedule containing a set of forms for the guidance of Justices of the Peace. It is well known that a good many difficulties connected with the enforcement of this law arise from the fact that many of the prosecutions are brought before ordinary Justices of the Peace, who are not skilled in the law, and that in consequence of some technical error they make in the administration of the law many of their decisions have been quashed by the courts, and the administration of the law is thus rendered more difficult. In addition to that, we propose by this Bill that the penalty recovered under the Act shall be applied in this way: one-half to be given to the prosecutor, and the other half to be paid to the treasury of the local municipality where the offence was committed. The Canada Temperance Act itself seems to be silent as to the application of the penalty. A remedy was provided by an amendment to the Liquor Act of 1883, but since that Act has been disallowed there is at present no provision as to the application of the penalty recovered under the Canada Temperance Act. Now, since the enforcement of the law will be left largely in the hands of either local municipalities or the several Provincial Governments, we think it is right and proper that parties enforcing the law should have the benefit of any penalty that may be recovered under it, and in that way a fund may be established for the purpose more effectively of carrying out the law in the different counties and cities in which it has been adopted. Those are the leading features of the Bill which I now propose to introduce, and I trust it will receive the candid consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION LANDS.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 94) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act, 1883.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In what direction does the hon. gentleman propose to amend the Act?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I may say in regard to this Bill that some provisions of it are purely technical, relating to the organisation of the Department, and are not of very special public importance. Among them, for instance, is a provision that the officials of the outside service, and extra clerks within, shall take the oath of allegiance and the oath of office, as do the ordinary members of the Civil Service. Another is that a homesteader desiring to make entry at any land office shall be permitted to make it before the senior clerk present, in the event of the agent being ill or absent. As it is now, the person appointed to take the declaration of settlers who desire to get their patents is the agent of the Department alone. Then another clause in the Bill, and perhaps it is the most important, has relation to a class of settlers who are very anxious to have an opportunity of obtaining land, but for whom the present Act makes no provision. I refer to men who have no means, or little means, and who go into the North-West and obtain employment on the railway or in the towns, and who desire, in the meantime, to secure for themselves homesteads on which to settle later on. The provision I propose is that such a person shall be able to make entry for a particular homestead and pre-emption, if he desires both, that he shall perform certain duties on it in the form of clearing and erecting a building, and he shall be allowed two years before he is asked to reside on the land; but that having gone on the land as a resident he shall be compelled to perform three years' residence in order to entitle him to a patent. I found, when conversing with settlers in the North-West, that this provision, which was recommended by the Commissioner of Dominion Lands in his report of last year, and I believe the recommendation is repeated in his report of this year, was exceedingly well received by the people there, and the proposal is one which will meet the difficulty which has presented itself in the case of people who are anxious to go to the North-West, but who are not in a position to go on the land at once and commence residence. We require three years residence for this reason: It is of the greatest possible consequence to make residence on homesteads obligatory. What is wanted in the North-West is homesteading in the proper sense of the word, that settlers obtain land for the purpose of living on it, intending to become residents on the land; and the new provision in this Bill in no way relieves persons from that obligation. The only thing it does is to allow them to secure homesteads and pre-emptions and perform certain duties and have two years during which they may make money elsewhere and prepare themselves for permanent residence of three years. Another clause in the Bill is one which may give rise to some little discussion, and in regard to which I found the strongest opinion held by those most interested in the country, the settlers themselves, and that is a provision for abolishing the principle of second homesteads. Experience has shown that this has not resulted in the advantages expected from it by those who in the first instance urged it. It was urged strongly by the people of the North-West, but I believe most of those who urged it in the first instance have become convinced that, instead of it being an advantage, it has produced a positive disadvantage; and we, therefore, propose to abolish the principle of second homesteads.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he proposes to abolish second homesteading altogether?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Yes. At present the right of obtaining pre-emptions expires at the end of this year. We propose to extend that right to 1890. I think it is better it should be extended for some time so as to give a greater opportunity to settlers in the North-West, and I am glad to say settlement promises this year to be very considerable, on the whole very satisfactory. There are clauses in the Bill relating to the Survey Branch of the Department. These have been recommended by the Board of Dominion Land Surveyors, and are considered as of very considerable importance. Some of them are purely technical, and they will perhaps be better understood by those who know more about surveying than I do. They relate to the subjects of study and matters of that kind. One of the most important of them, however, is the provision that instead of requiring the examinations for provincial land surveyors to take place before the whole board, they may be held, as in the case of Civil Service examinations, before a member of the board; and as the members are scattered in different parts of the Dominion, even as far distant as Vancouver Island, it is believed that it will very greatly reduce the expenses connected with those examinations both to the Government and the persons who present themselves, and will be a matter of very great convenience to those persons. Then I ought, perhaps, to have said with respect to the land part of the Bill that we propose that the settler shall give six months' notice of his intention to apply for his patent, by simply sending in a formal notice to the Land Office. The object is that the Homestead Inspector may go at once and make such examination as may be necessary, and take the declaration of the homesteader, so that when the time is up there may be no delay in securing his patent. The provision is one which, while it is for the convenience of the Department, is mainly in the interest of the settler himself. These are the chief changes I propose in the Bill, a copy of which I will send over to the hon. member for Bothwell, who has held the office I now fill, so that he may examine it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONSOLIDATED INLAND REVENUE AMENDMENT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved that on Tuesday next the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Consolidated Inland Revenue Act, and the Act amending the same, by providing:—

1. That the provision making the duty on articles subject to Excise, that is in force on the day when the monthly return is made, be repealed.

2. That the fusil oil and other refuse resulting from the distillation of spirits may be disposed of as the Governor in Council prescribes; that an abatement for shrinkage may be allowed in respect of spirits matured in ventilating tanks, and that all spirits produced in a distillery shall be warehoused.

3. That malt shall not be removed without a permit, except into the possession of a licensed distiller or brewer.

4. That the provisions of paragraphs 2 of section 226 of the Consolidated Inland Revenue Act, 1863, respecting the duty on goods manufactured in bond, may, in the case of spirits to be used for chemical or manufacturing purposes only, be varied by the Governor in Council; that spirits used in a bonded manufactory for the production of ether and such chemical compositions as are determined by the Governor in Council, shall be charged with the same rate of duty as methylated spirits; that no such spirits and no methylated spirits shall be removed from a bonded manufactory, except into the possession of a person having a permit to sell or use the same, and that the Governor in Council may make regulations respecting the sale of such spirits.

5. That 200 pounds of cavendish or other tobacco may be entered for warehouse by one entry, and that 100 pounds of such tobacco may be warehoused by one entry; and also, that packages containing ten pounds of manufactured Canadian tobacco and over, may be removed in bond from one warehouse to another.

6. That no oleomargarine or other substitute for butter shall be manufactured, except by persons duly licensed, and that the Governor in Council may make regulations respecting such manufacture and the supervision thereof.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the resolution is put, I would ask the hon. gentleman to explain a little more fully what is meant by the first clause.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have no objection to explaining it to the hon. gentleman, though it would be more convenient to do so on Tuesday. As the Act now stands, in the case of distilleries, for example, they keep a monthly account of the Excise duties, and the account is made up and rendered for the whole month, although the duty might be increased, say on the 20th or the 24th of the month. It would be a great hardship if the increased duty were imposed, say on the 24th of this month, in the case of the goods which had been manufactured and gone into consumption, and been sold under the old rate of duty; that we should require the difference between the existing duty and the increased duty to be paid. There can be no loss to the revenue by the change. If the goods remain in the bonded warehouse they will be subject, of course, to any increased duty, and the change is made in order to meet what seems to be a fair objection—that because the account, say, be rendered at the last of the month under the present reading of the law, the manufacturers are liable to the increased duty which may be imposed at the very last day of the month, on whatever goods they have manufactured and sold. Of course, what they have not sold must be subject to the duty, because it is still in the hands of the officers of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ORTON. I rise to a question of privilege. I notice in the Globe of yesterday, the following article:—

"Mr. Orton on Tuesday was indiscreet enough to refer to a paragraph in the Globe's editorial columns which stated that he had been almost as conspicuous as Capt. Scott during Sir Richard Cartwright's speech, and conspicuous in the same way. He complained that he had been slandered, which was certainly a much more severe reflection on Capt. Scott than the Globe made, and went on to threaten dire vengeance against somebody or other, in case such observations on the conduct of members should be continued by the Globe.

"It may be well to make Mr. Orton understand the functions of the press a little more clearly than he seems to understand them at present. It was perfectly within his right to complain if any untruthful statement had been made concerning him. But his contention substantially was that the press violates propriety and exceeds its powers by commenting on the demeanor of members when in the House. We differ from him entirely as to that. It is indeed seldom proper to reproach members for any high-jinks in which they may privately indulge, for then they can seldom compromise the seemliness of Parliament, and by consequence the reputation of the country. But the conduct of members in the House is a fit subject for journalistic comment; there they are acting as servants of the people, and the people are entitled to know whether their member compromises the reputation of himself, and therefore the interests of his constituency. No one will pretend that the interests of a constituency are not clearly injured if its representative lowers himself, and thus loses influence by appearing in the most public of places when he ought to seek the seclusion which his bad-room grants. We mean to act on this belief, with entire appreciation of the fact that it would be exceedingly improper in itself, and injurious to any journal, to look for occasions for adverse comment on the Parliamentary demeanor of members, or to seize every slight occasion for harassing jolly men. As for Mr. Orton's threats, they were supremely ridiculous, and we leave him to the unpleasant consciousness of that truth.

In another portion of the same paper, in the editorial columns, there appears the following:—

"Dr. Orton is the reputed father of a proposition to heal the North-West Indian question by sending the chiefs on a tour through Ontario as a sort of free exhibition. Couldn't the doctor employ this force against the newspapers which have been rashly saying that Col. Seott and himself are birds of a feather? He will hardly find a safer way of doing his fighting."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I stated on a former occasion that, so far as I was personally concerned, the attack made upon me in the Globe was without a shadow of foundation. I am sure there is not an hon. gentleman in this House but will agree with me that there was not the shadow of a ground for such a base attack on my personal character in this House. Since the commencement of this Session I have worked with other hon. members assiduously in the interests of my constituents, and in the interests of the country at large, to the extent of my humble ability, and I maintain that it is not only a wrong, but a cruel wrong, that the families and the tender-hearted friends of hon. members should have their feelings harassed by continuous attacks of this kind—attacks which are not made in the public interest, which are not calculated to advance the public interests of this country, or to increase the respect which should be paid to this House and to the representatives of the people assembled here. I maintain, Sir, that it is the duty of the House to assert its dignity, as I stated on a former occasion. I said if there was no attempt either by the hon. the Speaker or any member of the House to express an opinion with regard to such attacks, the only policy that could possibly be pursued by hon. members, to prevent their friends from being harassed by such attacks, would be to take the law into their own hands; and I am sorry to say that I felt it to be my duty, in defence of my position, to be under the painful and disagreeable necessity of taking that course. It has been said outside this House that the gentlemen who are the privileged occupants of the press gallery of this House, were not instigated of their own accord to these villainous attacks on the personal character of hon. members, but that certain party wire-pullers outside this House have laid it down as their policy, in order to benefit the Opposition outside of this House in their attacks upon the Government, and that as they have no policy to present to the people of Canada, they are now pursuing a persistent and continuous policy of slandering the supporters of the Government. I am not going to say, for I do not believe, that there are any hon. gentlemen in this House who would agree to any such slanderous and unworthy policy; but, at the same time, I feel it right to state that I do believe that those gentlemen who occupy seats in the gallery were instigated by others than themselves. I have the highest respect for the press, but I maintain that it is degrading and debasing to the true influence which the press should exert on legislation and the proceedings of Parliament, that they so far forget their position as to make these unwarrantable attacks on hon. gentlemen. Why, an hon. gentleman is not safe in this House from such attacks, if he happens to come in suddenly with his collar to one side or his hair out of order, as that would be an occasion far greater than existed in this case when a gross personal attack was made on me. I do hope that the House will, unless it is intended that the policy I have indicated is to be the one pursued towards members of the press, who act in this way—I do hope some course will be taken to show the disapproval of this House of such conduct on the part of those who have the privilege, the very high privilege, of occupying seats in the press gallery, for the very high and elevated purpose of exerting the influence of the press upon the country and upon this House.

Mr. TROW. I think it entirely out of place for the hon. gentleman to try to induce other members of the party to take the same course that he has taken, that is, to take the law into their own hands, for the simple reason that I understand it has not been a perfect success in this instance.

RAILWAY FROM ESQUIMALT TO NANAIMO.

Mr. POPE moved the third reading of Bill (No. 47) respecting the railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, in British Columbia.

Mr. GORDON. When this Bill was before the House last Tuesday, I was not present, owing to indisposition. The remarks made on that occasion, however, require me now, before its final passage, to make a few observations in reference to it. It will be remembered that, in 1884, when the original Bill came before this House, I opposed it at every stage—not because I opposed the railway itself, but because I opposed the immense grant of mineral lands in Vancouver Island to this company. However, Sir, that Bill passed into law, and I, as one of the citizens of the Dominion, was prepared to abide by it or by any other law passed by this Parliament. At that time it was not expected, I am sure, either by the Government or by any member of this House, that within two years from that date this company would be found appealing to this Parliament for relief from the obligations to which they had solemnly bound themselves. Now, it is not my intention to make any motion in reference to this Bill, for reasons which I will state. If, by opposing this Bill, I could cause the expropriation of all those mineral lands from the company to the Dominion, to be dealt with on the same basis as the mineral lands of the North-West, I would feel justified in standing in my place here for a week; but, Sir, the defeat of this Bill could not possibly have that effect, for, as has already been stated by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the American capitalists engaged in this enterprise have sufficient wealth within themselves to commence and carry through that work on the lines indicated in the specifications, and still be able to complete the work within the time specified by the contract; and the result of such an action on their part would most likely be the ruin of those British Columbians who have taken that work in hand. Now, Sir, although I was opposed to the scheme originally, and am still opposed to these coal lands being controlled by an immense monopoly, I have certainly no desire to see those British Columbia capitalists, who went into that enterprise in good faith, ruined or injured in any way. With regard to the road itself and the reports of the engineers who inspected it, I know very little. The reports of the engineers, so far as I have seen them, are simply to the effect that the specifications have not been complied with. Some of the work necessarily involved a heavy expenditure, and in some respects the road has been benefited by the deviations; but of these facts I know nothing beyond what has been reported. Some portion of the road I have seen, and I believe the deviations have been justified, two in particular, one at Southfield Mine, and the other at Cowichan River. These are the only two points of the road that my attention has been called to. The deviation made at Cowichan River was certainly not only in the interest of the company itself, but in the interest of the travelling public, because that river is subject to extreme floods, and it would be very difficult to maintain substantial structures across it for railway purposes on the lines of the original survey. Some opinions have been expressed with regard to the road that rather surprised me. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Shakespeare) declared it to be the best road on the continent. Well, I suppose he is a qualified engineer; he travelled over the road in the interests of the company, I suppose, for the purpose of observing it; and we shall have to take his word, I suppose, instead of the word of the engineer who inspected it. That gentleman, a professional man, did not, I think, express himself so distinctly. I think he merely expressed his views with regard to the variations from the lines marked down by the Government. Another point to which my hon. friend alluded was the settlement on Vancouver Island, in consequence of the construction of this railroad. He is reported to have said:

"This railway is a direct benefit to the Province of British Columbia, especially to Vancouver Island. Since the Settlement Bill passed this House two years ago, more settlers have gone in and located on the lands along the line of this road than went in during thirty years before, which certainly cannot be detrimental to the interests of the Province."

This cannot be so; the voters' list shows only an increase during those years in Cowichan district of twenty-three and in Nanaimo of twenty-five, and a decrease in Comox of six. That there has been a large amount of those lands located I am ready to admit; but it has not been from immigration into the Province. It has been chiefly from the fact that many of those formerly engaged in mining and lumbering squatted on the lands some years ago, and they have simply preempted their location, so that the increase of which my hon. friend spoke was scarcely an appreciable increase to the population of Vancouver Island. I have no desire to question that there has been some increase, but it has not been on the line of railway to any great extent. In the district of Alberni, some sixty-five miles from the nearest point on the railway, there has been a settlement created numbering something like 100 people. In the district of Comox, some seventy miles from the north-west point of the railway, there has been an addition to the population; but these additions are, in nearly every case, from other parts of the Province, although, of course, there have been some additions from the other Provinces. There is just one point to which I wish to allude before I close, and to which I particularly wish to call the attention of the Government. In the Bill known as the Settlement Bill there are certain rights guaranteed to settlers. In some cases there are disputes between the railway company, the Local Government and the settlers with regard to them. What I wish to impress upon the Government is this: that every person who claimed the right to preempt under the Act, up to 19th December, 1887, before the final transfer of the land subsidy in full to the company, shall secure those rights. Knowing that this Bill could not possibly cause the expropriation of the mineral lands, I beg to close my remarks, feeling, as I do, too unwell to further discuss the question.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the motion is put, I wish to call the attention of the House to one point. We made a bargain two years ago, by which we gave very valuable privileges to this Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway. If I am well informed, what we have done has been to give to these persons, substantially, if not in name, a monopoly of the coal supply of British Columbia. When, under such circumstances, they come to us and ask for modifications which involve the concession to them of favors that will save them the expenditure of some hundreds of thousands of dollars, and it may be more, the Government ought to be able to obtain some concession in return. Now, the occasion may arise when it will be a matter of great public inconvenience, not only to us, but to the British naval authorities, that practically the coal supply of British Columbia should be entirely controlled by foreign capitalists, although they may be in name British Columbian capitalists; and I think that when favors of this kind are demanded, the Government should at least require some concession in return; for instance, that a certain proportion of coal land be handed back to them, to be held in reserve for general purposes, or some bargain be entered into by which, under no possible condition of things, should the monopoly which we have unwisely granted to these persons be turned to our own detriment, or made the means of compelling the inhabitants of Vancouver Island and the British people to pay more than they ought for their coal supplies. I was called out of the House before the second reading was taken, or I would have pressed that view upon it then. As it is, at this last stage I take the opportunity of saying that it is a bad thing in principle to come to the House and obtain modifications in this fashion, without being able to show that any corresponding concession has been made to the people. If the company require concessions they ought to give something in return. The Government ought to obtain either the concession of a block of coal land to be held for public purposes, or have some agreement by which they may secure to us a supply of coal for general public purposes at a reasonable cost, under any circumstances.

Mr. POPE. I really think that the hon. gentleman, if he had this matter to put through himself, would hardly deem it fair to press upon these gentlemen for changes, in so far as coal lands are concerned, when it is said by the Government engineers that the road is quite as good and more permanent, under the changes, than if the line were drawn as first proposed. True, we may once in a while make a close bargain, and we might—because the company are put in such a position that they are obliged to ask for these changes, which, in reality, are an advantage to us—ask for some concessions, but I do not think that the hon. gentleman, if he had made an arrangement with these gentlemen that was intended to satisfy the people of British Columbia—looking back to some transactions which the hon. gentleman knows as much about as I, or a little more—that I would be warranted, when they came here for changes which the engineers report make the road as good and more permanent than under the original contract, since the company have removed a good deal of the wooden work and replaced it by masonry, have attempted to interfere with the agreement which was made to suit the people of British Columbia, and of which the hon. gentleman knows more than I do. Taking the whole thing into consideration, I do not think it would be proper for us to refuse to give them those alterations which are better for the company, and which will do us no harm. I felt a certain sympathy, the other day, with the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) when he expressed his distrust of Yankees, and deplored the fact that the Yankees had to do with this work. But, on reflection, the hon. gentleman will see that since those Yankees who have those coal mines are bound by the contract to give coal to our people as cheaply as to others, he will survive the feeling he exhibited the other day against them.

Mr. CHARLTON. No doubt, it was very natural for the hon. Minister of Railways and myself to look with distrust, and with some degree of aversion, upon Yankees; and I am glad the hon. gentleman is alive to the interests of the country, and the danger which may menace the country from that source. In the course of my remarks to which he referred, I took occasion to say that the projectors of this railway were certain Americans who controlled the railway system of the Pacific coast. I said that the past history of these gentlemen pointed to the fact that they have amassed an immense fortune at the expense of the public. If the hon. gentleman ever visited California—

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. CHARLTON—and the Pacific coast, he would find that country in the grasp of one of the most remorseless monopolies that exist in the world, a monopoly which has reached its hands out to plunder British Columbia, and at whose dictation, practically, the hon. gentleman proposes to change certain conditions in our contract with them. The gentlemen who control this road and the railway system of the Pacific coast hold the people almost as their vassals commercially. Over the railway service of the country the people exercise no control whatever; some of the roads do not even deign to publish time bills. Upon the Central Pacific you may find out, in the best way you can, at the way stations, when trains leave and arrive, for the company will not take the least trouble to inform the public as to its operations and service. They charge what rates they please, and control the State Legislature. As I pointed out the other day, the gentlemen who started this corporation commenced business with but $12,500, when they began the construction upon the Central Pacific, and to-day, by their own balance sheet, they are worth $200,000,000. It is claimed they do not own the majority of the stock in the Vancouver Island Railway, but I may be permitted to doubt that assertion, as I believe they own nearly the entire stock. They have secured a grant of $750,000 cash from the Dominion and exceedingly valuable land grants through British Columbia, besides the control of almost the entire coal interest of Vancouver Island—a grant vastly out of proportion to the amount of works they propose to do. It is a shame that this House ever sanctioned that bargain. It is not true it was sanctioned with the consent of all the members of British Columbia; it was opposed by the hon. member for Cariboo, and one or two other members, when first placed before the House. There are certain interests in British Columbia which are allied and associated with the company, and are in favor of the ratification of the Bill, but I say the company has no right to ask the House of Commons to mitigate in the slightest degree the terms of their contract. The hon. gentleman tells us that if my hon. friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) were in his place, he doubts very much if he would interfere. I think if my hon. friend were actuated by the same motive and views with regard to railways as those which actuate the Minister of Railways, he would not interfere. The hon. gentleman thinks it is hardly fair to press the company for a concession, but I hold that when they made a bargain by which they agreed to construct the road upon certain specifications and received aid vastly greater than was necessary to enable them to carry out that bargain, they should be held to the bargain. The engineers, he states, say the road is actually better than if built on the specifications. It is rather a curious statement that a road which does not conform to the specification with regard to the alignment and curves, and which has curves much sharper than the contract required, is really a better road. The road cannot be a better road, if it has sharper curves, than it would be with curves of a greater radius. I hope that we will not, in this case, set the dangerous precedent that would be set by permitting a railway corporation to make a bargain with this company, to make solemn stipulations that, for a vast subvention, it would perform certain work, and then allow it to go on and do as it pleased, and assume, from the laxity which characterises this Government in dealing with railway corporations, it could do whatever it pleased, and could come here with a Bill to relieve itself from the obligations it had entered into, and could induce the Government to relieve it from those obligations. It is a dangerous precedent. It is not right; it is not proper. There is no reason for it. The company are able to carry out their agreement. They have received aid to enable them to carry out their agreement three times over, and there is no reason for now changing the terms of the bargain. I believe that we should hold these men to the terms of their contract, and if they desire to be relieved from any of these stipulations we should, when we are granting their application, require a quid pro quo from them in the first place.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 72) respecting the Union Suspension Bridge.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

Bill (No. 76) respecting the Burlington Canal.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—STELLARTON TO PICTOU.

Mr. POPE moved the second reading of Bill (No. 57) respecting the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from a point at or near Stellarton to the town of Pictou.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. POPE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on said Bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should imagine that this Bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Railways, where it might be considered properly.

Mr. POPE. There is nothing very particular in the Bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a departure from our usual practice. In all other cases we have sent these railway Bills to the Railway Committee, which is specially cognisant of these matters. Why does not the hon. gentleman take this course? Government Bills have been sent there as well as other Bills.

Mr. POPE. Not Bills introduced by the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know the hon. gentleman has a perfect right to take this course, but it has not been our practice.

Mr. POPE. There is no reason why we should not deal with it here.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. DAVIES. What is the length of the line?

Mr. POPE. About eighteen miles.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And what grant have you got for it?

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. POPE. There was granted last year $250,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that supposed to be sufficient?

Mr. POPE. No; I think it will take about $50,000 more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of constructing that branch?

Mr. POPE. There was an understanding that the extension of the Intercolonial Railway would be made into the town of Pictou. But, Mr. Chairman, by building this road we incur no additional expense. The cost of the ferry annually is about $13,000, if I remember rightly. The interest upon $300,000 would be about the same as the cost of the ferry, and besides, the people of the town furnish the right of way, and undertake that we shall not be obliged to keep up the ferry; so that the expense to the country will not be increased.

Mr. DAVIES. The Government will be obliged to keep up the road, just as it does now, down to Pictou Landing.

Mr. POPE. I am speaking of the ferry.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not understand there is anything here relieving the Government from the obligation to keep up the ferry. The expenses will be thrown upon the Government hereafter the same as heretofore.

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. DAVIES. What guarantee has the Government got?

Mr. POPE. The agreement with the town of Pictou was that the ferry might be abandoned.

Mr. TUPPER. The Town Council of Pictou resolved to maintain the ferry between Pictou Landing and the town, and the company was to obtain a charter from the Local Legislature authorising them to operate the ferry.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the length of the ferry?

Mr. POPE. About two miles.

Mr. VAIL. And do you mean to say it costs $13,000 a year to keep up this ferry?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. We are in an extraordinary position in dealing with this Bill. We have no information before us, and we do not know what we are legislating about. The hon. gentleman has said that this is to save the Government the expense of keeping up the ferry, but he tells us the road is eighteen miles long, and the ferry is less than two miles. Now we want some information on this subject. If this matter had been referred to the Railway Committee there could have been plans and specifications submitted, and an intelligible knowledge of the subject could have been obtained. But the hon. gentleman has not explained it. He has given us no plans; we do not know what we are called upon to legislate about; in fact, we might just as well say by this Bill that the hon. gentleman shall determine what railways shall be constructed and what expense shall be incurred and charged against the public revenues, as to propose to legislate in the dark as we are doing. I submit that this Bill ought to go to the Railway Committee.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. member ought to be aware himself of certain facts connected with the cost of the ferry, as he was a member of an administration that, from time to time, had to obtain funds to maintain that ferry. As the Minister of Railways has already told the House, it costs between $13,000 and $14,000 a year, and it has done so under both Governments. In the winter, I may say, the Government has to maintain communication between the town of Pictou and the landing, by a stage, the harbor being frozen over, and the people of the town have had to put up with a great deal of inconvenience for many years, in consequence of the state of the harbor, and the great danger, at certain seasons of the year, in connection with the passage. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) knows that the town of Pictou is a town of great enterprise, and an important centre in the Maritime Provinces; and, surely, I do not see why the hon. member, who has tacitly permitted to go through the House measures authorising the construction of branches of the Intercolonial Railway of much less importance, and with far less prospective profits, should now raise an obstruction to the passage of this Bill. It does not propose any new charge upon the country, because last Session, as the hon. member will find by looking at the Supply Bill, this House ratified the construction of this work, and, as it is stated in the preamble of this Bill, authorised the expenditure of a certain sum of money. If the hon. gentleman was anxious then to have all the reasons for the construction of this work, why did he not ask for information when the money was asked from Parliament? Surely he will agree with me that there have been few cases of the construction of branches of the Intercolonial Railway where such good reasons could be given as the Minister has given to-day in connection with this work. Not only will the branch be a valuable feeder to the Intercolonial Railway by connecting it to the town of Pictou, which contains over 3,000 inhabitants, but that work can be constructed without entailing any additional burden upon the people of this country. I do not think that in the case of the Indiantown Branch, or any other branches of the Intercolonial Railway, could these reasons be advanced. They were justified because they connected important portions of the Province with the Intercolonial Railway, and it was reasonably supposed that receipts of the traffic would show that the expenditure was a wise one, but in this case the construction of the work entails no additional burden. As I understand, the money has been voted by this Parliament last Session. This Bill is similar to other Acts which have been passed in this House, authorising, among other things, the appropriation of lands in connection with the railway. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) alluded to the procedure to be followed by a Bill of this kind, as to whether it should go to the Committee of Railways and Canals. Of course, it would be presumptuous for me to attempt to instruct a gentleman of his standing as to the proper course of procedure, but he will allow me to point out that a similar Act was passed through the House in connection with a public work of similar character in the Province of Quebec, in 1882—I think it was the St. Charles Branch, or some other branch of the Intercolonial near Quebec. An amount had been voted for the work, a different work formerly authorised by a Bill of this kind, which precedent will remove any question that litigants might wish to raise, or remove any doubt as to the Department having the same powers in connection with the expropriation of lands and the construction of the road, as they have in the case of branches not exceeding six miles in length, where they are authorised by Order in Council. This is in reality a mere matter of form. The county of Pictou grants the right of way, and that is something that cannot be stated, I think, with regard to the other branches of the Intercolonial Railway, which were built at great cost in connection with the acquisition of the right of way. Legislation has passed both Houses of the Legislature in Nova Scotia authorising the county of Pictou to assume that charge.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has not quite understood the point I took. I did not desire, nor was it likely I would desire, to deny the right of the House to consider this Bill in Committee of the Whole, if it so pleased. The House can consider any Bill in Committee of the Whole, railway or other, and I never heard the proposition disputed, nor ever thought of disputing it. What I did say was, that in all cases where there was not strong necessity to the contrary, the uniform practice is to send a railway Bill to the Railway Committee, and for these several reasons: In the first place, when a Bill like this comes up unexpectedly, as this has done, and is referred, contrary to the usual practice, to the Committee of the Whole, instead of being referred to the Railway Committee, members of the House have made no special enquiry about it; they have not, in the least degree, endeavored to become acquainted with its details, expecting it to go to the Railway Committee, where all these things are brought up in due course, after reasonable notice, and where such details as those to which the hon. member has referred are severally considered. It is quite impossible to examine in Committee of the Whole any of these matters with anything like the fullness which can be exercised in the Railway Committee, and that is a very good reason why as a general rule, unless there is strong reasons to the contrary, this Bill should go to the Railway Committee. As to the other matter, I desire to say this: that when this and some score of similar grants were passed through the House last Session, it was done on the very last day of the Session and in opposition to my deliberate protest, because I pointed out then, as I point out now, that no sort of explanation was given by the Minister who brought them down of the reasons for making any of those grants. We were just closing the House, three-fourths of the members were away, and these grants were rushed through on the last day without explanation. Therefore, in this particular case there is very good reason for asking to have full explanations, inasmuch as it was physically and morally impossible to get them when the grant was put in the Supply Bill and became law last year.

Mr. DAVIES. It will be most unfortunate if the hon. gentleman persists in pressing this Bill through Committee of the Whole until we have more information. There are not six members in the House who know anything about the location of the road. The road may be perfectly defensible. I am not at present saying it is not. At first blush, however, it appears to be indefensible, and I cannot see how the hon. gentleman is going to defend the expenditure of so much money. The Pictou Branch runs down to Pictou Landing, opposite the town of Pictou and within a mile of it. Pictou also has connection with the Intercolonial by means of a steam ferry, and it is with that landing that the boats for Prince Edward Island connect. If the people of Pictou want to go to Halifax they can go by crossing in the steam ferry to Pictou Landing and arrive at Stellarton, a distance of nine miles. This road will have to go nine miles further. You will still have to keep up the old road, and you will have twenty-six miles of road, which will have to be maintained at the expense of the country, when eight miles does all the work required. I am told, but I do not vouch for the accuracy of the statement, that this road will come into competition with the road running from Stellarton to the head of West River.

Mr. TUPPER. There is no other road in the county but the Intercolonial.

Mr. DAVIES. I think we should have a map and plans submitted, so that we can see exactly where the money is being expended. It may be that sufficient arguments can be adduced to lead the House to vote the money, but in the state of ignorance that prevails as to the necessity of this road, and as to the trade which will flow to the Intercolonial from its construction, it would be highly improper to force the Bill through Committee. What additional trade will be given to the Intercolonial by building these fourteen miles? You are going to cut off New Glasgow altogether.

You tap the Intercolonial five miles to the south of New Glasgow and run a branch round the head of West River to the town of Pictou. The only present inconvenience is in spring when the ice is breaking. This is one of the difficulties of the location of the town. We cannot overcome nature there any more than we can in Prince Edward Island, where serious inconvenience arises from its position; and when we ask for a remedy, I find we do not get our grievances listened to so readily as do some members on the mainland. I protest against the attempt being made to force this Bill through Committee of the Whole without plans being submitted. Let us see whether the road passes through a populated country or not, and what trade it will bring to the Intercolonial for the proposed expenditure of $250,000 to start with. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) says the road will cost $250,000 more.

Mr. POPE. You do not know anything about it.

Mr. DAVIES. If not, we ought to be informed.

Mr. POPE. I say the hon. gentleman does not know anything about the cost.

Mr. DAVIES. Nor does any hon. member know the cost. The Minister alone possesses that information. He is not treating the House fairly when he asks it to pass through Committee a Bill for a work, the cost of which he alleges no one knows anything about, and which he has not imparted to the House.

Mr. POPE. I have.

Mr. DAVIES. Has the hon. gentleman given us the surveys and reports of the engineers?

Mr. TUPPER. You never moved for them.

Mr. DAVIES. No one imagined it would be attempted to force this Bill through Committee of the Whole without submitting it to the Railway Committee, which is the only place where the details can be examined. The hon. member will further his object if he refers the Bill to the proper Committee, so that it may be carefully examined.

Mr. TUPPER. I hope the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) will not be offended if I think I could read between the lines as he made his remarks, and if I attempt to act as mind-reader for a moment he will correct me if I go astray. He has brought into this House the question which I am sure he knows interests a certain portion of the people of Pictou county, and those people are mainly the friends who act in concert with him, and he has attempted to make political capital out of one phase of this public work, and that is the question of location. I utterly deny that this House is the proper place to decide where the true location of a line should be. Hon. gentlemen here will remember that the hon. member who has taken his seat confined his remarks almost exclusively to the question of location and to the point that the Minister, as he claimed, had not put the House in possession of the plans showing the particular route which this railway was to take. Now, I will candidly state to the House that difficulties have arisen in the county, in connection with the proposed location. I can speak for myself when I say that I undertook the responsibility as one of the members for that county—and my colleague joined me—of refusing either the wish of my political friends or of those opposed to me, to advocate any particular location in the county of Pictou. It was a matter with which we were not qualified to deal. I do not think my hon. friend is any more qualified to deal with it, but I certainly shirked the responsibility, and I shirk it now, of saying where the best points are for that road to go. A great deal of complaint has been made against us for not adopting the location which some parties in the town of New Glasgow believed would be more favorable to them.

Mr. DAVIES.

A great deal of political capital is being made of that to-day, and I am, of course, painfully aware of that fact. Nevertheless, I believe that the only parties who can locate this road are the engineers who are in charge of the work, and my colleague and myself have left that matter entirely to the Government who are charged with that responsibility. Of course, it is not supposed that we could control it, but what I mean is that we have not assumed to act on behalf of any particular locality in connection with their views as to the particular points this line should touch. But it is comforting for us to know this, and I think it will comfort my hon. friend, if he is really serious about the location of the line—it will comfort him to know that after this location was proposed, joining the Intercolonial Railway at Stellarton, the County Council of the county of Pictou unanimously resolved that the right of way should be given by the county for the construction of the road; and they were aware of this—it was stated in a meeting—that unless that right of way was given, not a mile of the road would be built. That was the condition under which the work was to be carried on. My hon. friend is perhaps aware that many of the people of New Glasgow, naturally anxious that all roads built in that county should start directly from that enterprising and wonderfully pushing locality, endeavored to secure a change in that location, but I believe they have failed. After that the matter went before the Legislature of Nova Scotia for a ratification of the resolutions of the County Council. The Premier announced that a petition had been presented from those whose views my hon. friend has been ventilating to-day, and yet the Bill went through both Houses without amendment. So that my hon. friend will see, and I think will admit, that considering those facts that whatever objections might be urged to the locations of this work, the people as a whole are satisfied with the proposed location, and my hon. friend is perfectly well aware that you never can satisfy the views of all parties near or adjacent to any proposed line as to the location. Some of those parties near whom the road has not passed will, of course, be dissatisfied, and, of course, those who are near it will be satisfied. But I again call attention to the fact that the county represented as a whole, sitting in the County Council, passed that resolution, which is very significant as showing that the people there as a whole, without reference to any sectional feeling or personal interests, approved not only of the location, but of the work. One word with reference to the great necessity for urgency. I alluded to the fact that this is not a new matter; it is really a formal matter; it has been ratified by Parliament in such a way that there can be no retrogression in the matter, no matter whether it was proceeded with quickly or not. I say that hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for the delay.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They are not.

Mr. TUPPER. I claim they are.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They are not.

Mr. TUPPER. I claim they are, and the hon. gentleman can contradict me as often as he likes. I say that hon. gentlemen are responsible—and I believe the people will recognise their responsibility—for having kept Parliament so long last year. They spent weeks and weeks on the Franchise Bill and yet nothing came of their efforts, and surely they could have spent half an hour or so in order to obtain the necessary information which they should have obtained before sanctioning this vote. We were fully prepared to answer all objections, and I believe the hon. gentleman opposite only stated that it was a vast piece of political corruption—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And so it was.

Mr. TUPPER. And he now repeats it. Well, Sir, that is the kind of political corruption that the people of this country like to see. They like to see a Government building public works and not acting as the hon. gentleman's Government did, as mere flies on the wheel. Down in that part of the country the people believe in this road.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am sure they do, or you would not be here.

Mr. TUPPER. If I supported a policy such as the hon. gentleman inaugurated, I would not be here; but I supported a party not only able to promise public works in the different parts of the country, but ready and willing to carry out their promises, and ready to do something; and I have no doubt my hon. friend's line of conduct will help me to come here again. What I wish to say and what I intended to say was, that my hon. friends opposite were responsible last year for not obtaining all the necessary information; and they consented to this vote; they did not challenge it formally; no remarks were made, except by my hon. friend opposite and one other member of the Opposition. They were content to make a general charge of political corruption, and they did not intend to probe the matter. From the fact that Parliament is pledged to this work, I ask hon. gentlemen not to put any unfair delay in the way of this formal measure going through the House. The work is authorised, and this is to remove all possibility of litigation, to remove the possibility of any question being raised with regard to the authority or right to take certain steps in connection with that work, the House being committed to it, and the tenders having been advertised for. The people of Pictou town, to whom this matter is of tremendous importance, are most anxious for that legislation to take place without delay, because they are desirous that construction should begin. There is no hon. gentleman on either side who can fairly say that delay should occur when the work is to be carried on, and when it is fairly sanctioned. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island must know the importance of this road to the town of Pictou. Situated as it now is, under the present trade policy forced upon us by the action of the United States after the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, when the town of Pictou had at an amazing rate prospered, those facilities for trading by water and using their splendid water communication, were suddenly cut off and they were told that they must turn their trade into new channels. And inter-provincial trade should be cultivated. Now, across the harbor is two miles, or thereabouts, away from the Intercolonial system, and the town is connected with it only by a ferry; so that the people of Pictou have been handicapped in consequence, through not being able to develop that trade and enterprise which every other town on the line of the Intercolonial Railway has been able to do. They have made a good struggle under the circumstances; but I can assure hon. gentlemen that their anxiety is simply intense. Whether rightly or wrongly, they believe that the construction of this road will work wonders for the town, and the question of delay is serious with them. The town permanently suffers a great drawback in connection with the transmission of freight and traffic generally. The ferry itself, under either Government, has never been able to accommodate the traffic, and, in consequence, great difficulty is experienced in getting freight over. Freight is continually and unavoidably lost or injured, and passengers have suffered great inconvenience and run great risk in crossing that harbor, which at times has been extremely dangerous. Accidents have happened; fortunately, no lives have been lost, but animals have been lost, and the people of Pictou have had a hard battle to fight. The road is a most important part of the Intercolonial Railway. No one from the Maritime Provinces can deny that, nor will the members of the late Cabinet deny it, for their attention was frequently called to the great value of the Pictou Branch. I believe the proposed road to connect the town of Pictou with the Intercolonial Railway will be a productive benefit all round, and, as I said before, it is not going to entail any additional burden on the people of this country. I hope, under the circumstances, that the Bill will not only go through the House without undue delay, but that hon. gentlemen will appreciate the importance of haste, because the sooner the work is begun the sooner it will be completed.

Mr. VAIL. As the hon. member for Pictou has spoken very warmly on this subject, I conclude that the people of the county he represents must feel a similar interest in it. We on this side, up to the present at any rate, have not objected to this grant, provided it can be shown to be in the interest of the country that this road should be built; but we ask for further information on the subject. Let me state to the House that there is already one railway to the town of Pictou, and the proposed road will run almost parallel with the existing road, and both roads will have to be kept up, one thirteen and the other eighteen miles in length. The Minister of Railways says we shall save the $13,000 a year that it now costs to keep up the ferry. There is nothing to show that that will be the case. The ferry must be kept up. I know that this road will be of some advantage to the travelling public of Pictou; but what has Pictou to send over the road in the way of freight? The town is a market for the farming produce of the surrounding country, and I am sure the people do not want to send farm produce over the road to Halifax, and it is not much trouble for people to cross the ferry to Fisher's Grant and take the line there to Halifax. The Minister of Railways says I know nothing about the cost of building railways. Well, he may know something about building railways and getting subsidies for private railways from the Government of which he is a member; but I can tell the hon. gentleman that I have had something to do with the building of railways. I had a good deal to do with the building of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, and also with the building of the Western Counties Railway. We have been told that this will be a cheap road, but I would remind the House that both the present Minister of Railways and his predecessor have stated that such and such a railway would cost only such a sum; but let us look at the St. Charles Branch, which was only eight or ten miles long, and which cost millions more than the Minister of Railways told us it would.

Mr. TUPPER. That is the right of way.

Mr. VAIL. It is no matter where the money was spent, the country had to provide it; and my hon. friend seems to think that because the town of Pictou has agreed to pay the land damages in connection with this road, that is a reason why the Government should spend half a million dollars in order to get this second road built for the benefit of Pictou. Let me tell him that in most cases the counties have paid for the right of way, while in Pictou, Colchester and Cumberland, the Government have paid for it; so I do not think it is anything to boast of that the people of Pictou are paying for the right of way, in order to have two roads instead of one. I should like to see the Government liberal enough to spend some money for railways in the western part of Nova Scotia, instead of spending money for a second road to this town. I am not disposed to oppose the grant; but I think the Minister of Railways should give us fuller information as to the cost of the work, before he asks the House to consent to the Bill being read a second time.

Mr. KIRK. The hon. member for Pictou says his party is a party of great promises. I quite agree with him as to that. It is a party of great promises, so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, but of small performances. The promise which had so much to do with the hon. gentleman's seat in this House was not the building of this road, but the one I spoke of a few days ago, the Oxford and New Glasgow Branch. When the hon. gentleman first took his seat in this House he advocated the completion of that branch; it was to be completed at once; in fact, the newspapers declared that it was already an accomplished fact. At least four years have gone by, and that road is not finished. Considerable money has been expended by a private company.

Mr. DAVIES. It will do for the next elections.

Mr. KIRK. Two years have gone by since work has ceased on the road, and nothing has been done nor can be done. It has been found that another promise, another great promise, must be made, as another election is coming on, to secure the continued representation to the hon. gentleman. That is the promise of a branch from Stellarton to Pictou. The hon. gentleman said this will not entail additional expense, because this House last year voted the sum of $250,000 to the construction of this branch. True they did, but when that vote was taken, it was after the House had sat for nearly six months, and when the majority of members had left for home; it was taken, I believe, the very last day of the Session, because it was taken after I left for home, and I did not leave until a day or two before the House prorogued. It was taken also without the knowledge of more than a half, or of fully half at any rate, of the people of Pictou at the time. I understand a petition was secretly circulated in Pictou for the purpose of impressing upon the Government the necessity of building this branch, but the other portion of Pictou knew nothing about it.

Mr. TUPPER. Do you say secretly circulated?

Mr. KIRK. Yes.

Mr. TUPPER. On what authority?

Mr. KIRK. On the authority of the public press of the county.

Mr. TUPPER. Of the public Grit press?

Mr. KIRK. Well, I think that is about as good authority as the hon. gentleman is himself. The petition asking for the grant was circulated, as I understand, from the press of Pictou opposed to the Government, privately, and I understand also, from friends of the hon. gentleman, that they knew nothing at all about the petition or about any request being made for the branch until the petition was presented in the House and the vote was taken.

Mr. TUPPER. You are mistaken.

Mr. KIRK. More than half, or quite half, the people presented a petition opposed to taking away the ferry from the Pictou Landing. They feel that the people of east Pictou and of east Nova Scotia, in fact, will suffer if this road is allowed to go down, which, of course, it will, if the ferry is taken off. I look upon the building of the branch from Stellarton to Pictou as interfering with the short line proposed from Oxford to New Glasgow and from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg. If this line is built, it will be the end of the Oxford branch. The hon. gentleman may do his utmost to lead the people to believe both will be built, but, so far as Pictou town is concerned, I believe that town will be quite well served without building the branch from Stellarton. I do not see why so many railways should be built through Pictou county and town, whilst other counties in Nova Scotia are to be without railways. It is said that $250,000 will about build that branch, but the Government cannot give information with regard to its cost. I placed a notice on the paper three weeks ago asking for papers and plans and the reports of the engineers, if there are any, in order to get all the information I could, before this Bill would come up, but we have not reached that motion yet. I am informed, however, by parties well acquainted with the district that one bridge to be built on the road will cost $150,000, and another heavy bridge will have to be built, the cost of which I do not know. Therefore the $250,000 are not going to build the road. Again, there are pieces of road owned by two coal companies, which are to be purchased by the Government, as the Government engineers and the Government have decided to purchase those lines and make them a part of this branch. I do not think it is known upon what condition these lines can be purchased. I understand, and I have no doubt it will be so, that the owners of these roads will see that their coal shall be carried over them, after the Government have purchased them, at a cheaper rate than they can possibly carry it now. The hon. member for Cape Breton complained the other day because the coal mines of Nova Scotia proper were particularly favored by receiving cheap rates, and by that means were enabled to take the trade from the coal mines of Cape Breton. As it is, if the Government should treat for the purchase of these roads, Cape Breton coal interests will suffer and their owners left behind, and I simply wish to draw the attention of the hon. member for Cape Breton to that fact. The people of New Glasgow have invested their capital in erecting manufactories on the line of the railway between New Glasgow and Pictou Landing. At Trenton there are very extensive and expensive manufactories established, which, if the ferry is taken away from Pictou Landing, must inevitably suffer, because I do not think it is possible the Government can keep up the old road in the same state of efficiency as that in which they are keeping it to-day. If they do not the manufacturing industries must suffer. I understand that these manufacturing industries give more traffic to the Inter-colonial Railway than the whole trade to and from the town of Pictou, and will likely do so for years, and yet the manufacturing industries of Trenton, which were established because of the railway facilities afforded, and which would not have been established but for the ferry there, are to be deprived of the advantages they have hitherto enjoyed. I think that is very unfair, and, if the railway accommodation is not kept up in an efficient state, it will very likely have the effect of shutting down those manufactures altogether which have been so fostered by the National Policy and by these railway facilities. I have no doubt that, if the Oxford and New Glasgow Branch were built, it would serve all the purposes of this short line. It would be more convenient for the eastern part of Nova Scotia and would serve Cape Breton, and, if the terminus were made at New Glasgow, the Government have a large piece of land there, so that it would cost them nothing for land on which to erect their works and buildings. I do not wish to be understood as absolutely opposing this Pictou Branch, but I believe that it is not in the interest of the people of eastern Nova Scotia, and that, if the Oxford and New Glasgow Branch were built, it would serve all the purposes said to be gained by this branch for the town of Pictou, and not only that but would serve the counties of Cumberland, Colchester and Pictou, and all the eastern portion of Nova Scotia as well.

Mr. TUPPER. I am sorry that the discussion has become rather local in its character, but, after the charges which the hon. gentleman has made against me, I think it is only due to myself to say a word or two in reply. First, as to the secrecy with which he says this was agitated in the county. If the hon. gentleman could see the petitions which are on file, and he must know the names which are appended to them, he would have to admit that he was mistaken in thinking that anything was secretly done or was done in an underhand way.

Mr. KIRK. In the first petition?

Mr. TUPPER. In the first petitions from the county of Pictou, if he saw the names, I am sure that he would at once withdraw the charge that there was anything done in connection with the matter, as far as they were concerned, in an underhand or secret manner. Further, he must be aware, for he seems to have read the Pictou papers, that, as he might learn from the press on both sides of politics, committee after committee was formed in the town of Pictou to press upon the Government the importance of this as a public work, and that members who act in concert with him in the Province of Nova Scotia, members of the Grit party, joined with members of the Conservative party, to bring the necessity of this work under the notice of the Government.

Mr. KIRK. Since the vote was taken?

Mr. TUPPER. No, but a year ago; and that articles were written on that subject in the papers there. I am meeting the charge of secrecy, the charge that we approached the Government in an underhand fashion, and not in a proper and regular manner; and I say that the reports of these committees, which were published in the press in the county, would show my hon. friend that he has been misinformed in regard to the matter. I do not see why he should bring in the question of any personal interests of mine in connection with this road, when he says that the county is petitioning against it. How can it be possible that I am furthering my political interests in urging the Government to construct a public work against which my constituents are petitioning. That is one of those things no fellow can understand.

Mr. LISTER. It is a job.

Mr. TUPPER. On whose part? It is a question where the jobbery comes in. One other point. The hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), who tackled this short line question the other day, and whom I then answered, again gives utterance to the strong feeling he has that this action is hostile to the prosecution of a much larger and, as far as the Province is concerned, more important work. I think it is unfair to press that view without adducing some reasons for it. I gave him a reason, which should have been satisfactory, in the absence of any to the contrary, to show that this was a portion of that work. It was not parallel to any portion of the short line scheme, so called, in Nova Scotia. It is a branch of the short line. It was not contemplated that the short line should run through the town of Pictou, but that there should be branches to Pictou, River John and other places, and I do not see how the building of this portion of the line is to threaten the completion of the other portions. Because the Government builds this in connection with the Intercolonial Railway system and calls it part of the Intercolonial Railway, that is surely no reason why a private company should not go on with the rest of the work, when no part of the subsidy is withdrawn from the rest of the work; and I tell the hon. gentleman, if it is any satisfaction to him, that I fully recognise the importance of the short line scheme as a whole. In a political sense, it would be ridiculous for me to take any position hostile to that scheme, because the people of that county, as well as the people of Cape Breton, attach a great deal of importance to the completion of that road, and it is to my own political interest to press on the completion of that work which has been so largely subsidised. The people of both parties there, and in Cape Breton, are doing their utmost to have that completed at an early day. So I have met for the second time the charge of my ardor being cooled in the slightest degree, and as the hon. gentleman insists upon repeating the statement that this road was started in my political interest, I again give it a flat denial, because the dates corroborate my statement.

Mr. KIRK. The dates suit first-rate.

Mr. TUPPER. I venture to say that the hon. gentleman cannot give the date when the subsidy for the Short Line was voted and the date of the general election, because if he could he would not venture to repeat the statement.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am not acquainted with all the facts connected with this line, but it seems to me that the matter bears all the ghastly shadows of a job. The responsibility of carrying it through the committee appears to fall upon the hon. member from Pictou (Mr. Tupper), and he has been able to secure the assistance of the Minister of Railways and of the Government possibly to assist his own interests, and he has undertaken to engineer the whole thing before a committee of this House. We know that the construction of the Intercolonial Railway has swallowed up a vast amount of the money of this Dominion, and that we are now paying $1,600,000 interest upon it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Nearly two millions and a half.

Mr. McMULLEN. Very nearly two millions and a half of interest, my hon. friend in front says, we are paying on money which has been sunk in the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. TUPPER. Can you give us the figures on the canals?

Mr. McMULLEN. In place of adding to that sum, I think we should cut off all additional improvements which are likely to add to it. I was rather surprised to hear the Minister of Railways state that $300,000 would be enough to complete the road, but, even supposing that that completes the line, the interest would be $12,000, at 4 per cent. I would like to know where the Minister of Railways is going to get the money for operating the line afterwards. He says the ferry costs $13,000 a year to work it. He has not stated whether that also covers the cost of running the short line of railway which is now built and running in connection with the ferry.

Mr. POPE. It pays $40,000 more.

Mr. TUPPER. What short line does the hon. gentleman refer to as now built? There is none built.

Mr. LISTER. It is Mr. Pope's road.

Mr. McMULLEN. The line to Pictou Landing is now built.

Mr. TUPPER. That is not the short line.

Mr. DAVIES. It is eight miles against eighteen.

Mr. TUPPER. It is the shorter line.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister of Railways stated that it cost $13,000 a year to run this ferry, and the sum necessary to build this line would not be any more, that the one sum would be about equal to the other. I asked him what it would cost.

Mr. POPE. Is it going to earn nothing?

Mr. McMULLEN. We are earning all now that we would if the road was built to-morrow. We are getting all the trade of Pictou that you will get. This shows that it is not because you anticipate any increased trade that you are building this line, but possibly because it may be an advantage to the hon. gentleman who happens to sit for the county of Pictou. It may be in his interest that it is thought best to undertake the construction of this road, so that it may give him a seat in Parliament for many years to come. Now, I say it is an outrageous thing that the means of the people of this country are going to be frittered away in this kind of style, in order to provide a seat for a man that wants to be a perpetual representative in this House. We have had an experience of this kind of thing in the past, and it is going, evidently, to be continued just as long as they find that it is going to be an advantage to any man and help to keep him here by purchasing his seat in Parliament for him by means of the people's money. He says the county is going to give the right of way. Why, Sir, in our section of the country, our people have not only to give the right of way, but they have got to go to work and vote five or six, or, in some cases, seven thousand dollars a mile to build the road. I wonder why the people of that county, if they are so anxious for the construction of this road, do not ask the Dominion to provide all the money. Why does not the county go to work and pass a by-law to contribute $4,000 or $5,000 a mile towards its construction? We were told by the gentleman who preceded me that they were going to have a very expensive bridge built on this line, to cost $25,000. If it was a plain line, and the cost was not likely to be very excessive, and there was a considerable amount of trade to be got after it is built, it might, possibly, be an inducement to build the road, because it is trade that we want down there. If there is anything in the world that is going to keep the Intercolonial Railway alive, it is trade. But we are not going to gain any more trade by this road than we had before. The hon. gentleman who preceded me says that there are important manufactories on that branch which is now in operation, which will be seriously affected if that branch is closed up. How are they going to be able to satisfy those people who have been accommodated by that branch? If they are now going to shut down the ferry, how are they going to get the goods out? Are they going to run all the way around the county with the proposed new branch? Now, it is a well-known fact that short lines of this kind, I care not what amount of trade they do, are always a source of loss to any railway, I care not what railway owns them. No short branch of eighteen or twenty miles can possibly pay. They are undoubtedly a loss; they are financial blood-suckers attached to any line, I care not what line has them. I say that if you take the history of the Grand Trunk to-day, you will find that they have not one single branch of eighteen or twenty miles that they would not be glad to get rid of, I care not what trade they have in connection with them. It is the same in connection with that branch. I hold that unless you can show that an enormous volume of trade is going to be brought to the Intercolonial Railway by the construction of that line, it will be a positive loss to the country to build it. I would like to know where we are going to end the money that is being invested in the Intercolonial Railway. Years ago it was said that we had some twenty-eight millions sunk in it; now we have got nearly forty millions. The Minister of Railways is adding about a million a year to it, and I suppose he means to charge it to capital account. Well, Sir, I do not know where that capital account is going to end. I think it is about time it was closed. I suppose the building of this branch will be put to capital account also. Now, I hold that it is unfair—I say it is unreasonable and unjust—to the people of this Dominion, that the people of the Province of Ontario, who have to go to work and subscribe bonuses from counties, townships and towns, to build their own roads, that towns in the Province of Nova Scotia can get their roads built at the public expense. Here you have the town of Pictou with 2,500 inhabitants—

Mr. TUPPER. Three thousand.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, supposing there are three thousand. They have got one road already, they have got a ferry of two miles, and they appear to be satisfied with that. There appears to be a difference of opinion with regard to the length of that ferry; perhaps, when we find out its real length we will be able to judge whether the Minister of Railways was correct in his statement that it cost $13,000 a year to operate it. I think we should have laid before this House a full survey of that road, with detailed specifications, and an estimate of the Government engineer what it is going to cost, before we vote a dollar for it. We know what our experience has been in the past in building roads. First, the Government come along and get a small grant; afterwards it is found that they require some more, and difficulties arise about the line and then we have to go on and finish it. What has been our experience already in regard to these branch lines? Last year we voted $250,000, and now we are asked for $50,000 more, and the probability is that next year the Minister of Railways will come down and ask us for a further grant. Before we proceed at all in this work we should have a detailed estimate of what it is going to cost. It appears there is nothing done yet; I do not know whether there is even a survey made. It is now stated that this road is going to be eighteen miles long, and, judging from our experience with the Intercolonial Railway, I should not be at all surprised to find, when this road is finished, that it will be twenty-five miles long, because, in all probability, they will find it necessary, in order to please some particular part of the constituency, to take a roundabout route, and to make a considerable bend in order to meet the views of some parties who will be anxious to have accommodation at their own doors. When the Intercolonial Railway was projected we were told it was not going to be anything like the length to which it finally attained. Now, the hon. gentleman who has just sat down has spoken about my hon. friend being one of the flies on the wheel. That appears to be a favorite epithet which the hon. gentleman uses when anything of this kind comes up that we find fault with. Permit me to tell him that I would a thousand times rather follow men who could even be charged with being nothing more than flies on the wheel, than to follow men who are trying to suck the life's blood out of the people of this country. Look at the increase of our indebtedness every year—a million a month, twelve millions a year. Then, what are you going to do with that twelve miles of road attached to that ferry? It is to remain there, I suppose, as a spectacle of a rejected road. Now, I hold that it is extremely unfair and improper to ask this House to consent to this kind of thing. I hope that before this question is disposed of, every member of this House who is interested in the general curtailment of all expenses, will give an expression of his views.

Mr. DAVIES. I did not quite understand the statement of the Minister of Railways until I heard it repeated by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), or I would have alluded to it previously. I look upon it as a rather serious statement, not only for the people of Pictou, but for Prince Edward Island—the statement that one of the inducements which led to this demand for spending this half million of money, was that they would get clear of the ferry which now costs $13,000 a year. The hon. Minister knows well that the only deep water is in Pictou Landing, where boats run to and from Prince Edward Island now, and he knows that the whole trade between Prince Edward Island and Pictou now carried on, is carried from that landing by means of the ferry, and if he does away with that, he destroys all the connection there is between Pictou town and Prince Edward Island. He does more than that; all the trade from New Glasgow, and from the Eastern Branch Railway, which now goes to Pictou, will have to go round those eighteen miles of road instead of going over the eight miles which is there now. After the examination of a sketch which I had not in my hand when I first spoke, I repeat the statement I made then, that the eighteen miles additional road which this Government is going to build, will be in direct competition with the existing eight miles the Intercolonial Railway has there now. I desire to ask the Minister some questions. Does the hon. gentleman propose to do away with that ferry? If so, he is going to inflict very serious injury on Pictou and the trade between that point and Prince Edward Island. He is going to injure New Glasgow. Has the hon. gentleman made any arrangements with the Acadian Coal Company for the purchase of that part of their road which he intends to buy from them in connection with these eighteen miles of railway? Has he made any arrangements with the Nova Scotia Coal Company for the purchase of a portion of their line? If so, does the hon. gentleman know what he is going to pay for it?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. If so, perhaps the hon. gentleman might inform the House. I have been informed on pretty good authority, although I will not vouch for the accuracy of the statement, that an arrangement has not been made with the road.

Mr. POPE. It has.

Mr. DAVIES. If so, perhaps the hon. gentleman will have the kindness to favor the House with a statement of the facts. With respect to the statement that the county of Pictou has given the road bed, that is only partially true. The Government purchased from the Acadian Coal Company part of their line and will pay for the road bed. They next purchased a portion of the road belonging to the Nova Scotia Coal Company and paid for the road bed; and it is only when they will come to the Middle River that the road bed is granted by the county. Two bridges will be necessary; that over West River costing over $150,000. It must be obvious that further information is necessary in order to obtain a full acquaintance of the facts. The Minister should consent to the reference of the Bill to the Railway Committee where the details can be fairly and quietly discussed instead of across the floor of the House. When the people discover that this scheme means the discontinuance of the Pictou ferry, which is operated at an annual cost of $13,000 and which also enables Pictou to trade with Prince Edward Island, there will not be so much enthusiasm as the hon. gentleman pretends to say exists.

Mr. TUPPER. The people knew that the ferry was to be abolished in August last—that is the Intercolonial ferry. Another ferry will be substituted in its place, and the necessary steps will be taken to secure ferry accommodation between Pictou Landing and the town of Pictou, so that the island people will suffer under no disadvantage.

Mr. DAVIES. The ordinary sail boat—not a ferry kept up at a cost of $13,000 a year.

Mr. TUPPER. An efficient ferry.

Mr. DAVIES. It is a matter of importance for the traffic between Pictou and Prince Edward Island that there should be ready means of access not only by the railway but by the ferry.

Mr. TUPPER. They will supply that.

Mr. DAVIES. The Government should be compelled to maintain the ferry, and pay $13,000 a year for that purpose. Before the committee is asked to pass this Bill the Minister, in common courtesy, if from no other motive, should place hon. members in possession of the necessary information, which so far he has refused to furnish.

Mr. McDUGALD. Hon. members opposite declare they are not opposed to the present measure, but they are taking a very strange course to show their sympathy with it. I am not surprised at the position of the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), who supported a Government which never built any railways except in the western portion of the country, excluding the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. KIRK. What about the Eastern Extension?

Mr. McDUGALD. I must correct the statement of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies)—and he should be the last member of the House to oppose railway construction in Nova Scotia, seeing that Prince Edward Island is supplied with a system of railways, the equal of which cannot be found in any other part of the Dominion in proportion to the population. The hon. gentleman made a statement that the trade of the Island would be injured, because the water on the Pictou side was not sufficient to afford the necessary accommodation to vessels, and that the depth of water necessary could only be obtained at Pictou Landing. I must controvert that statement, because it is contrary to the facts. The water on the Pictou side of the harbor is quite as deep as that at Pictou Landing, and it is a better place for building wharves and more suitable in every respect. Any person who has given attention to the question must know that if people coming from Prince Edward Island could be landed at Pictou it would be preferable to their being landed at Pictou Landing, where there is no accommodation for passengers except such shelter as they can secure in the station house. The hon. member for Guysboro' stated that he understood more than half the electors of Pictou county were opposed to the building of this railway. He should feel very well satisfied if that were true; but, unfortunately for him and his party, it is not true. It is quite true that a petition representing 1,300 ratepayers out of 7,000 was sent to this House opposing some portions of the condition of the grant; but some of those electors have written me desiring their names to be withdrawn from the petition and stating that they did not understand the facts. Those petitions were sent out by the leading Grit wirepullers in East Pictou, and after the most strenuous efforts only 1,300 names were procured in opposition to the line. As to the road being approved by the county of Pictou, no better evidence can be adduced than the action of the county council, after all the facts were known, in granting a free roadbed for the railway, which was to be a condition precedent to its being built. All the facts were known and the question was discussed at the county council, and the leaders of the opposition party in the eastern part of Pictou County used all their exertions to defeat the scheme with the view of throwing obstacles in the way of the representatives of the county respecting a work which I feel satisfied to-day has the confidence of nine-tenths of the people of the county, outside of certain local issues. Their action, moreover, was confirmed by that of the Local Legislature. The hon. gentleman's friends had a majority in the House of Assembly and the Legislative Council, but the measure was passed. It is idle, therefore, to say that the work is not one which has the confidence of the county of Pictou. Hon. members from Ontario, are quite willing to see very large expenditures on canals and their enlargement, all charged to capital account, but if any extension of the railway lines in the Maritime Provinces is proposed they oppose such a proposition. At the same time, we know that the deficit on the canals is much greater than on the Intercolonial Railway. Besides there is a continual demand from the people of the west to reduce the tolls on the canals, and make them free. Intercolonial Railway branches have been built in other parts of the country involving a great deal more money than is involved in this branch, without opposition being raised in this House, and some of them will not carry a tithe of the traffic which will be carried on this road. The member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) was unable to see how this could be a paying portion of the Intercolonial Railway, but it never entered into his consideration that there would be a considerable way traffic. As to the rates for coal on the Pictou Branch, it never was contended that the local rates were low; in fact, it is the coal rates of Nova Scotia that make the Pictou road pay a surplus amounting to $40,000. On this road there will be a considerable way traffic besides the traffic it will get at Pictou. It is an illusion to say that Pictou has railway communication at the present time. It would be just as true as to say that Quebec had railway communication because the railway touches at Point Lévis, for in the winter season it is impossible to have such railway communication connecting them with the railway system of this continent. Under all the circumstances, I do not think this is a project which should have met with the opposition it has received. The hon. gentleman has referred to some large factories existing near New Glasgow as a reason why his view should be adopted, but if that traffic to which he refers is so great as he represented, surely it would be a greater inducement to the Intercolonial Railway to have that line and keep it in operation.

Mr. KIRK. The hon. gentleman says that I supported a Government for five years that never did anything toward extending the railways of Nova Scotia to the east. I differ from the hon. gentleman altogether. During the five years of the Mackenzie Government there were more railways built in the Province of Nova Scotia than there had been in the thirteen years that the hon. gentleman's friends have held office in this House. I say this result was achieved by the influence and the support of the Mackenzie Government and their friends, and that they did more to advance railway construction in eastern Nova Scotia, and in all Nova Scotia, than was done during the thirteen years that the Conservative party were in power in this House. What roads have his friends built in the Province of Nova Scotia since Confederation? There is one running a few miles from Halifax terminus to Dartmouth, and there is not another solitary road that they built since Confederation, whilst the Mackenzie Government built eighty miles, from New Glasgow to the Strait of Canso and to Cape Breton, they extended the railway from the terminus at Richmond to the deep water terminus at Halifax, and they made arrangements for building the railway to Yarmouth. Under these circumstances, it ill becomes the hon. gentleman to say that I supported a Government that did nothing in building railways in Nova Scotia.

After Recess.

CANADA ATLANTIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No 43) to amend the Act incorporating the Canada Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Mackintosh.)

Mr. HAGGART. As the time had nearly expired the other evening for the consideration of this Bill, and as I wish to put before Parliament the position of the gentlemen in whose interest the last clause is being added to the Bill, I take this opportunity of explaining as well as I can the reasons why I think that clause should be added to the Bill. Two contractors, named Stanton & Balch, entered into contracts with two railway companies, one the Coteau Landing Company, and the other the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company. Under that contract they were to have the stock and bonds for the building of the road from Ottawa to Coteau Landing, and the road was to be built as fast as the money could be realised from the bonds and stock. A mortgage was to be executed to secure the issue of the bonds. The work was not to be commenced until the mortgage deed was executed and the bonds were issued, and as soon as the money could be realised from the bonds and the stock they were to proceed to build the road. Afterwards, by an agreement between the two companies, they decided upon amalgamating—Stanton & Balch, the contractors, and the other two companies agreeing to the deed of amalgamation. The deed of amalgamation was made, and the new company was to be promoted and the charter procured by Stanton & Balch. Further contracts supplementary to the other two contracts, were entered into with this amalgamated company. The conditions agreed to in the other contracts were to be fully carried out by the amalgamated company. The company was to issue bonds and stock to the contractors for the building of the road, and out of the proceeds of these bonds and stock, they were to proceed to build the road. A mortgage deed was to be given as security for these bonds. Stanton & Balch carried out their part of the agreement and they caused an Act to be promoted before this Parliament in 1879. Every hon. member knows the difficulty they had in getting that Act through the railway committee. There were several very powerful bodies opposed to the building of the road. The Government opposed the scheme of building a bridge across the St. Lawrence, but after a good deal of trouble and fighting, they got their Bill through the committee, through this House, and through Senate. This took up considerable time from the spring of the year 1879, through the rest of that year. The Government reserved to themselves the right, before the Act should come into force, of approving of the scheme of the bridge. It took nearly a year after the amalgamated company was formed, and after they got their charter, to get the consent of the Government to their scheme of the bridge. Immediately after the company obtained the consent of the Government to that scheme, the contractors proffered to the company a mortgage deed to secure the issue of bonds and stock for the building of the road. The House will remember that the road was to be built entirely out of the bonds and stock of the amalgamated company, and was only to be built by these contractors, whose bonds and stock should be issued. The company took objection to the mortgage deed which was proffered to them, and refused to enter into the contract with Messrs. Stanton & Balch, who claimed that they were entitled to such a contract, and that it was precedent to any other work that they would be called on to execute. They could not go on and fulfil the contract or do any work on the road, because the money to be obtained from the sale of the stock and bonds which were to be issued on the giving of the statutory deed, was the only means they could obtain for building the road. The company refused to perform their part of the contract, and consequently these parties were unable to go on and build the road. The company afterwards entered into a contract with some other persons in violation of this contract with Messrs. Stanton & Balch, which was confirmed by this House and is recited in the Act of Parliament of 1879. They accordingly tried to amicably adjust affairs between themselves and the company, and found it impossible to do so. Then they entered an action against the company in the city of Montreal, obtain damages for the non-fulfilment of their contract. That action is still pending in the courts, and is at present undecided. At this time perhaps I may make a few remarks on the position assumed by the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly). He stated that the decision of the courts was adverse to these parties who are asking for this amendment. It was not adverse at all. As part of their proceedings, they got an injunction against the company to restrain them from the sale or disposal of those bonds, and it was decided both by the Court of Review and the Court of Appeal, I think, that a writ of injunction should not issue at that stage of the proceedings, as the contractors had a remedy by action for damages. Every lawyer in the House will understand that there is no judgment standing against the parties who are asking this House simply to protect them in rights to which they were guaranteed by the Act of 1879. Under the deed of amalgamation the company had a right to issue bonds to the extent of $15,000 a mile and $1,000,000 besides. Under this Bill they take the power to issue bonds to the extent of $25,000 a mile and $1,200,000, I think, besides. You will see at once what position the parties who have a claim against the road will be placed in. Their security may be a perfectly good one against a company which has the road bonded for only $15,000 a mile and $1,000,000; but there may be no security for them against a road which is bonded to the extent of $25,000 a mile and $1,200,000. Now, I wish to state positively that this contract is recited in the Act of Parliament passed by this House in 1879; so that these gentlemen state that they have a statutory right confirmed by this Parliament; and by the Act which is now introduced they will be entirely cut out of their claim. The promoters of this Bill have not stated why they wish the bonds increased from $15,000 to $25,000 per mile; the question was asked them in the Railway Committee, and it received no answer. Now, look at the position in which it is proposed to place any creditor on the road. Instead of paying his claim, or allowing the courts to decide it, they come to this House, and simply by getting a Bill passed here, allowing them to issue a large amount of bonds to be secured prior to their claim, they may leave the creditor's claim entirely useless and out of the question. The parties seeking for legislation in this case, have no objection to the Bill, all they want is to be protected in their own rights; all they want is to be guaranteed that the claim they are pressing before the courts is placed in no worse position by this Bill than it was in before. As for myself personally, I know the parties interested in this road; I know that they are men of large public spirit and enterprise—men who, at a great expense to themselves, and without any hope of pecuniary benefit, advanced large sums for the purpose of furthering the interests of this city and the development of this section of country. I know that any legislation which it is possible to give them in this House, ought to be given for the purpose of assisting them. They may have had some embarrassment from the course they took, and I think the legislation of this House might relieve them from that embarrassment in view of the work which they undertook, so much to the benefit of this section of the country. I think an amendment could be framed which would protect the rights of these contractors, and, at the same time, meet the wishes of the company. All these parties wish is to be protected in their claim, which they believe to be an honest one, for a large sum of money. In introducing this amendment, at the request of Mr. Ferguson, their solicitor, and an old friend of mine, who asked me as a member, whom he knew, to bring it before the House. Now, I think the House should give them justice by simply saying that they shall be protected in the claim they have against the company. That is the object I have in introducing this amendment, and I think the committee, looking at the whole subject, will see the justice of the clause I propose to be inserted.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. My hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) is perfectly correct when he states that the gentlemen at the head of this enterprise have conferred a great benefit upon the city of Ottawa, as well as to the large district lying to the south. The hon. gentleman says that no reason whatever has been given for the demand to increase the bonds of the company $10,000 a mile. I would explain to the committee that the increase is necessary because the road is one of the best built in Canada, and one of the fastest roads in the country. Since the company got the charter and the contractors commenced their work, the road has been continued from the St. Lawrence, and it proceeds from Valleyfield to Rouse's Point. The company has thus been at immense expense in carrying out and completing the work. Every practical man knows that the expenditure of $15,000 a mile on a road of this character is not excessive, and every one can well imagine that three or four prominent men in Ottawa, as well as gentlemen in Vermont and other places, who are interested in that road, found it necessary to become largely involved—some of them to the extent of all their means—in order to complete the work. The money has been found, but the bonds are necessary to recoup the expenditure. One of the objections made to the passage of the Bill in its present form is that the original contractors from whom the contract was taken expended money. I submit that where a contractor undertakes to construct a work and gives security for its construction, but fails to carry out his contract, this House has nothing to do with the matter, and should extend no sympathy to the contractor, because he jeopardised the proceeds put up as an experimental outlay. My hon. friend has spoken of trustees being appointed. I beg to inform the House that the trustees asked for by Stanton & Balch, under their contract with the former company, were themselves. They asked that they should be appointed trustees to manage the bonds of the road; they offered no other trustee, and simply replied to the company's demand by saying that they offered their own names as the men to whom the control of the issue of the bonds, and the management of the bonds, should be given. The delay in going on with the contract jeopardised bonuses, not only of the municipalities, but also the bonus which the Ontario Government agreed to give the Canada Atlantic. Parliament is asked to establish the precedent, that where outside claimants make demands upon the applicants for legislation, although no court of law yet has vested them with any right, Parliament shall declare it a vested right, and that the vested rights shall thus incommode the issue of the bonds, and possibly ruin the company, simply because outsiders come in and say they have a claim. No court of law has yet recognised their claim, and we, as a Parliament, have nothing whatever to do with the undecided legal disputes of the claimants. We are asked to believe further that the increase of the bonds to $25,000 a mile will jeopardise the claims of these parties. I ask this House whether any practical business man would not prefer holding a claim against a completed road with a bonded debt of $25,000 a mile, rather than a claim against an uncompleted road with a bonded debt of $15,000 a mile. I wish to be as brief as possible, as the promoters of the bill are desirous to have the question settled forthwith. I simply submit that the claimants and petitioners in this case have been proceeding before courts of law for nearly three years, and if this House deems it advisable to insert a clause in the Bill, such as this and which reads:

Nothing in this Act contained shall be so construed as to alter or affect any of the rights of Stanton & Balch, under the Act 42 Vic., chap. 57—

this House will simply place an obstacle in the way of floating the bonds, and put into the hands of gentlemen outside, who are pushing a claim which they call a vested right, but a right of which they divested themselves years ago, the power to retard the progress of the company, prevent the issue of the bonds, and by simply keeping their suit in the courts of Quebec three years more until that suit is decided, preventing the company from making any progress and forcing them to abandon a portion of the work or suffer great pecuniary losses. It would be an injustice to the promoters of the Bill, men of large public spirit, who have put their means into a great enterprise, to hamper them in the carrying out of that enterprise by inserting any such clause as that which the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) proposes. I submit therefore that the Bill should pass in its entirety as sent from the Railway Committee.

Mr. MILLS. I agree with the views expressed by the last speaker. I think that while we ought not to legislate in any way that will interfere with the private rights of any particular party, we ought to take care at the same time that in seeking to protect one party we do not injure another. It is extremely doubtful whether the parties, whose interest it is sought to protect by the proposed amendment, have really any valid claim at all against the company. If they have, they have not shown due diligence in its pursuit; and if we were to carry the amendment the only effect would be to enable the parties to force the company into an unfair settlement, in order to get rid of impediments in the way of selling their bonds. The effect of this would be to enable parties, who have no good claim, to enforce blackmail, it would enable them to enforce pretensions in consequence of an Act of Parliament, they could not enforce in the courts of law. When we look to the terms of the Act itself, I do not think the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) would give to the parties, whose interests he seeks to protect, any greater protection than this Bill would give. The Bill declares that the proposed issue of bonds shall be a first charge and lien on the whole railway, bridges, rolling stock, and so on. If it be thought well to declare that any rights these parties may have shall not be prejudiced, these bonds issued would still be the first charge on the road, rolling stock, &c., and the only effect would be to interfere with the marketable value of the bonds. That being the case, we ought not to support the amendment, but carry the bill as it is. These parties will not have their rights impaired, if they have any; but the negligence they have shown in enforcing their claim would seem to indicate that they have not very great confidence in it.

Amendment negatived and Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER. Shall the Bill be read the third time?

Mr. HAGGART. I object; let it wait another stage.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is not a different stage.

Mr. HAGGART. If it can, it may.

Bill read the third time.

PICTOU BANK BILL.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 50) respecting the Pictou Bank.—(Mr. Tupper.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. TUPPER. I think it is only right to state in regard to a despatch or a rumor which appeared in the press in reference to this bank that a portion of the rumor was incorrect. There was a report in one of the Montreal papers, I think, to this effect:

"A despatch from Pictou says James Kitchen has assigned. He was a director of the Pictou Bank, and the largest shipowner in Pictou county. He is said to owe the Pictou Bank $70,000. His other liabilities are $30,000. Heavy losses by disaster to his shipping caused the failure."

That statement coming after the examination by the sub-Committee of the Banking and Commerce Committee makes it necessary for me to say that Mr. Kitchen was formerly a director of the Pictou Bank but is not now a director. I am advised that the bank is secured against loss by reason of this failure and that the position of the bank will not be impaired by this misfortune.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—STELLARTON AND PICTOU EXTENSION.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 57) respecting the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from a point at or near Stellarton to the town of Pictou.—(Mr. Pope.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was at first disposed to think that this Bill should have gone before the Railway Committee, but I am now rather disposed to alter my mind and to think that it was an advantage that it should be discussed in the full House. Useful information is always desirable and we have been trying for some time to get a correct idea of the worth of a gentleman from Nova Scotia. This Bill, it appears to me, will give us some valuable information as to what it cost to return a supporter of the Government to this House from the Province of Nova Scotia. Judging from present appearances, you have first of all to give them a railway for the benefit of themselves and their constituents at a cost of nearly $400,000, then you have to promise them an extra railway which, certainly will cost $300,000 and perhaps, for anything I know, $500,000. Now, I am bound to say, speaking for my own Province, we do not appear to be able to do so well on either side of the House. I do not think any member from Ontario has succeeded in obtaining such subsidies as these for himself, as these hon. gentlemen seem to have no difficulty in procuring—

An hon. MEMBER. Timber limits.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That depends. Sometimes timber limits are very good; but, then again, as the hon. member for Hastings has found out, they do not result so profitably. But there is no discount, I fancy, on railways of this description. The member gains something, and the constituency gains something, and as the hon. gentleman, who seemed to be chiefly interested in this Bill mentioned, that was the way to get seats in Nova Scotia. I am very glad to see that the hon. gentleman is so apt and promising a pupil; he promises to develop into a very good constitutional lawyer. Well, we have had some experience of what constitutional lawyers cost, and when the Supplementary Estimates come down, we will know more about the cost of the gentleman, for instance, who said that the Crooks Act was not worth the paper that it was written upon. In this particular case, the hon. member for Pictou was good enough to tell us that the responsibility for these things rested on the Opposition. Well, that is somewhat novel doctrine.

I have hitherto been under the impression that the Government are responsible for every act dealing with the public money, which they choose to bring down to the House, and in order that the House may know the way in which hon. gentlemen treat their responsibility, I would call your attention for one moment to the information afforded to us by the Minister of Railways, when this and nineteen other subsidies were ordered on the 17th July last, twenty-four hours before the House rose, and when three-fourths of the members had left for their home :

" Mr. POPE moved that the House resolve itself into committee to consider certain proposed resolutions to authorise the granting the subsidies herein mentioned, to and for the parties, railways and railway companies mentioned."

Now, Sir, what could any hon. gentleman say more? What more could any hon. gentleman expect from the Government, with a majority at its back, then the amount of information which the Minister of Railways thought sufficient to give us with respect to some eighteen or nineteen railways involving a grant of a couple of millions of public money? I would not discuss them, and I stated the reason why, and I take the liberty of reading to the House what I said on that occasion. I said :

" It would be perfectly idle to oppose the intention of the Government to put these resolutions through; but at the same time, although I am not going to oppose them, I wish to say, as a matter of course, not only must they be passed wholly and entirely on the responsibility of the Government, but I desire to renew a protest I made last night against the introduction of measures of this kind at the present stage of the Session. These various grants which are proposed may be good or may be bad. They may open up very valuable districts; they may give important commercial facilities to important classes of the community; or they may be of precisely an opposite character. They may be roads which are of no real value to any one but a few interested parties; they may be roads which run through districts, which will not repay the expenditure; they may involve this country in heavily-increased expenditure. We cannot tell; we do not know; we possess no information."

Now, I say that this is a very pretty sample of the result of passing measures of that kind through the House in the last twenty-four hours of the Session without any information of any kind being laid before the House in order to justify their action, and I say it was specially fit and proper, under such circumstances, that a measure of this kind should have gone to the Railway Committee where it could have been sifted and discussed. The hon. gentleman may be right or he may be wrong in saying that this will cost only $300,000. We all know perfectly well, after the Government have voted a $250,000 or $300,000, that the work must be gone on with, and from experience in these matters, we should say it was just as likely, for all the hon. gentleman knew or cared, it might cost $500,000 or $600,000 or $700,000 as the $300,000 which he says it will cost. I do not know anything about the value of this road for the particular quarter in which it may be built, but I do say that the granting of these large subsidies to small local railways is utterly vicious and indefensible in principle and in practice. I say it is a readymade mode of corrupting members and corrupting constituencies, and as long as it goes on there is not the slightest wonder that our debt in half a dozen years has piled up by $108,000,000, and still less wonder that the Intercolonial Railway account on the 30th June, 1885, stood at $45,000,000 odd, and probably at this present moment is much closer to $47,000,000 than it was to $45,000,000. I say that no case whatever has been made out up to the present time for even pretending that these eighteen miles are for the general benefit, and we have no right to take the money of the people of the other Provinces and grant them to one particular Province, unless, indeed, we are going to do the same all round. I warn hon. gentlemen as I warned them before, that the result of this is going to be to excite a very strong feeling indeed in those other constituencies and sections of the country which see their money taken for the benefit of this or that locality. Now, Sir, it appears, that the town of Pictou has already got a railway to a certain point, that nearly opposite it there is a ferry which cost some $13,000 a year, or thereabout, for the purpose of facilitating this traffic. The hon. gentleman tells us, but he does not put it in the Bill, he does not produce any binding agreement about it apparently, that this is to be commuted practically for a donation of $300,000 for the purpose of constructing this railway. Well, we know very well by experience in the great majority of cases when these loose arrangements are made, that it will be discovered after a little space of time that something else in this locality requires that that ferry should be continued, and the end usually is, as I believe it will prove to be in this case, that we will have to spend $300,000, $500,000 or $600,000 for the purpose of constructing these eighteen miles, and we will find ourselves, sooner or later, saddled with the expense of the ferry besides. I have no particular objection to this more than any other road of the sort. What I denounce, and what I have always opposed, is the vicious system of granting subsidies for purely local purposes. As long as that goes on, it will be utterly impossible for any Finance Minister to deal properly with the public finances. He cannot tell what expenditures he may be called upon to make, from one end of Canada to the other. There will be a continual series of demands made on the Government of the day for just such concessions as this. Already in Ontario, as I mentioned before to the Minister of Finance, in a great many localities the people feel, and feel very justly, that they, having contributed out of their own pockets many thousands of dollars per mile to obtain similar facilities, are entitled to be recompensed; and they can see no just or logical answer which the Government will be able to give when they come down and make such applications, if they go on in this mischievous fashion granting subsidies to other parts of the Dominion. One argument used by an hon. gentleman opposite was that Ontario had canals constructed, and therefore should not grumble. I should like to know what benefit Ontario got from the $45,000,000 of public debt, now nearly $47,000,000, which went to the Intercolonial Railway account. I do not want to grudge the Intercolonial Railway; it was part of the Confederation resolutions, and so also was the construction of canals. It may be that we would have done wisely not to incorporate one or other in a binding document like the terms of Confederation; but we did so; and looking at the population and the contributions of revenue, take it how you like, the Maritime Provinces have no reason to complain of Ontario canals, when $47,000,000 of public debt is due to the construction of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. HACKETT. I regret very much that there should be any opposition to the passage of this Bill. I cannot see what good reason can be brought forward for opposing it. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has advanced some arguments. But I cannot see that there is any weight whatever in them. As I understand the matter, this Bill is required to enable the Government to expend an amount of money which was voted at the last Session of Parliament. I can remember that in 1832 a sum of money was voted by this House for the building of a branch railway on Prince Edward Island, called the Cape Traverse Branch. It was found necessary that a Bill should be passed for the purpose of empowering the Government to expend that money; that Bill was passed, I am glad to know that the railway was built, and that although but a branch of the island railway it has proved of immense benefit to the people of that section of the Dominion. Now, we find that after the money was voted last Session for the building of this railway, hon. gentlemen from different parts of this country opposed the passage of a Bill to enable the Government to expend it. It is quite possible that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullea) who spoke this evening, and who I believe acts in the absence of the leader of the Opposition, may feel justified in opposing the construction of this railway; but I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen coming from the Maritime Provinces can oppose it. The hon. gentleman was quite consistent, I have no doubt, in stating that the Intercolonial Railway was built for the purpose of affording great advantages to the people of the Lower Provinces; but he said it was not right that more money should be expended for those people. If the hon. gentleman would study more closely the constitution of this country, he would find that the Intercolonial Railway was guaranteed by the Confederation Act, an Act of the Imperial Parliament, and we have nothing whatever to do with it on this occasion. The hon. gentleman may think that the people of the Lower Provinces are obtaining a great deal of money for the building of railways; but we have frequently heard in the Lower Provinces that the money of this country was spent in the construction of railways in the western portions of the Dominion to the disadvantage of the Eastern Provinces. If the hon. gentleman will look at the facts for a moment, he will see that a very large amount of money for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been expended in the Province of Ontario; he will see that the whole of the money expended for the building of a line of railway from Pembroke, in the Province of Ontario, to Rat Portage, in the same Province, has been supplied by the people of all sections of this country, and has been solely for the advantage of the people of Ontario. The people of the Eastern Provinces have contributed their share to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway running through the Province of Ontario for some thousand miles, and costing the people of this country some $12,000,000 or $15,000,000. The hon. gentleman, therefore, cannot bring forward any strong argument why a somewhat corresponding amount to that should not be expended in the Lower Provinces. Hon. gentlemen coming from those Provinces at all events cannot oppose this measure. We have heard at different meetings held in the Province of Prince Edward Island that the money has all gone westward. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), who I regret to see is not in his seat, was one of the loudest in making that statement in that Province. Now, the hon. gentleman comes forward and opposes the expenditure of a small sum of money in the neighboring Province of Nova Scotia, which will be of great advantage to the people of Prince Edward Island, short as this railway may be. We can supply the labor for building it, and the products of the farm required by the people engaged on it, and it would be of great advantage to us in every way to have this money spent there. But the principal argument brought forward by the hon. member for Queen's was that if this railway was built from Pictou town to Stellarton it would be a great inconvenience to the people crossing from the island to the mainland. There is no foundation whatever for that statement. Instead of being a disadvantage, it would be a great advantage to the people of the island. The fact is, people crossing from Georgetown to Pictou are put off at Pictou Landing. If the steamer arrives there late, there is no accommodation there for passengers, and they are obliged to cross to Pictou town and stay there over night or day, as the case may be, until they return to the landing to take the railway east or west. Now, if this railway from the town of Pictou to Stellarton were built, passengers from the island would be landed at the town instead of the landing, and could take the railway at their convenience. Therefore, it would be a great advantage instead of inconvenience to the people of Prince Edward Island if this branch were built. This very winter, people passing to the island and the mainland were obliged on several occasions to utilise the services of the Northern Light for the purpose of forcing a passage from Pictou Landing to Pictou town. That boat was used on one or two occasions, when the Mayflower, the ferry boat there, was laid up. No obstacle presents itself against landing passengers at the town instead of at the landing, and at the town people take the railway to Stellarton or other points on the Intercolonial Railway. I consider therefore that this road would be a great advantage to the people of Prince Edward Island, not only because this money will be expended in the Maritime Provinces, in opposition to the view taken by hon. gentlemen opposite who are anxious that no money should be expended except in the west, but also from the fact that it will place the people of the island in immediate connection with the Intercolonial Railway. There can be no possible reason why this Bill should not pass, as it is to the general advantage of the Maritime Provinces, and I regret to see hon. gentlemen representing western constituencies, raising objections to it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would ask the hon. Minister of Railways whether there has been any survey of the proposed line?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Have the quantities been taken out?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. gentleman inform us what quantity of earth has been removed?

Mr. POPE. I do not remember, but it is not a heavy road to build.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is there any rock work?

Mr. POPE. Very little indeed.

Mr. McMULLEN. On what basis has the calculation been made that $300,000 will build the line, and are the bridges included?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. What length are those bridges?

Mr. POPE. I do not remember, I really cannot give all these particulars in committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That information ought to be given in committee.

Mr. POPE. I can tell the hon. gentleman what will be the cost of the heaviest bridge, for a tender has been submitted to build it for $40,000 or about that. The whole road will cost about $300,000.

Mr. KIRK. Does that include the money required to purchase the roads from the coal companies?

Mr. POPE. It includes the actual cost of the roads we are going to purchase. The Nova Scotia Railway has been already purchased for about $16,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does Pictou provide terminal accommodations?

Mr. POPE. They furnish the right of way; we build our own terminal accommodation.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does the town supply the accommodation in the way of land?

Mr. KIRK. The objection to this road is the fact that whilst the Government has provided to build a road from Oxford to New Glasgow, they are, in order to give Pictou further accommodation, going to build another branch from Stellarton to Pictou, which will cost at least $300,000. This is more than the town of Pictou is deserving of. Some consideration should be given to other portions of the country that have not railway facilities. Pictou has a railway extending to the harbor, within one and a half miles of the town, with a ferry of about one and a half mile supported by the Government, and with the prospect of building a road from Oxford to New Glasgow, through or near the town of Pictou, which the hon. member (Mr. Tupper) says will be built. Pictou has quite sufficient accommodation for any town. This House is asked to do too much, when it is asked to vote $300,000 for the purpose of building a line parallel or nearly parallel to the Intercolonial road. What special interest is the town of Pictou to this Dominion that the Government should be so liberal towards it? The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) said I did not know what I was talking about when I talked of this line being parallel line, but I have a plan of the road here.

Mr. TUPPER. If the plan shows the line to be parallel it is incorrect. One runs east and the other runs west.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course they do; that is how they are parallel.

Mr. TUPPER. The lines start from the same point, but one runs east and the other west.

Mr. KIRK. And they end within a mile and a half of each other.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) is talking about one road and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) about another.

Mr. KIRK. I do not think so.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The line the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) refers to is the Oxford line.

Mr. KIRK. I think not; we understand each other thoroughly. For all practical purposes the lines are running parallel. The hon. gentleman said I did not understand the geography of the country or I would not talk as I did, and he also said with regard to the Oxford Branch that when the subsidy was granted to it he was not a member and had not, perhaps, thought of becoming a member. Well, that grant was voted in 1882. The hon. gentleman then, perhaps, did not think of running for Pictou county, but there was another hon. gentleman here, the Minister of Railways, whom we all know, and who manifested great care for the hon. gentleman in forcing this vote through. The vote was passed in April, 1882, and the elections came off in June; therefore, the hon. gentleman had not much time to think about preparing to be a candidate, if he did not think of it before the vote was passed; and I reiterate the statement, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. gentleman that he never thought of running for Pictou at the time the vote was taken, that it was taken and the contract entered into to secure the seat to the hon. gentleman. Now that the company, so highly recommended as being able to build the road with their own means, have failed to do this, and is now in bankruptcy, according to the hon. gentleman himself, he finds that, in order to enable him to keep his seat and in view of the elections to be run, perhaps, before we meet again, it is necessary to have another vote for the purpose of building the branch from Stellarton to Pictou. If the Oxford Branch is to be built, as the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) says it is, I maintain that the House is not doing justice to the other portions of the country in voting the subsidy at all, but I shrewdly suspect that it is not to be built, from the very circumstance which I mentioned the other day, that the Government have refused to give the whole line from Oxford to Louisburg to one company to build, but have divided the line and are willing only to give the subsidy to a company which will extend the line from New Glasgow to Louisburg, and to make two portions of the line. This circumstance leads me to believe that the object is to destroy the Oxford and New Glasgow line altogether. The hon. gentleman stated a while ago that the Opposition were responsible for the vote taken here last Session, that they should have opposed it then or should have got the information necessary to enable them to vote for it. I do not think the Government were in a position to give any information in regard to this line when the vote was taken. They had no information themselves in regard to it, unless perhaps it was a petition, and I find even now that the Minister of Railways is not prepared to give any information to this committee, and for this reason I believe that this Bill should be submitted to the Railway Committee, which would have the opportunity of examining into any evidence the Government may have to submit in order to show the necessity for this road. I believe there have been petitions presented to the Government for the building of this branch, and petitions against the building of this branch, and there may be other information in their possession. I believe that engineers have been on the line, and it is likely that they have reported in regard to it, and these petitions and this report and the plans they have prepared could be laid before the Committee on Railways, and they would have an opportunity of examining which we have not here, and this committee is asked to vote for this Bill, to go it blind, knowing nothing at all about the merits of the scheme which would enable them to form a correct judgment upon it.

Mr. POPE. With respect to the remarks made by my hon. friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) that all this money was being paid to the Lower Provinces and to Quebec, and that Ontario would like some of it, I have just this one thing to say. So far as the subsidies were given last year to any roads, the different Provinces stood in this position. I do not speak of those subsidies that were voted the year before, and were only changed last year, the same amount remaining there, but I speak of those to which money was actually voted last year. In Ontario, $689,000 was voted for roads; in New Brunswick, $137,000; in Quebec, $223,000. There was an appropriation of the year before for the Gatineau road, which was changed last year, but not a dollar was added to it. I say this in order to show the hon. gentleman that he is not so badly used as he seems to think, and to show the hon. gentlemen from Ontario that they had more than the lion's share. I will point out what the roads were to which the subsidies were granted. In New Brunswick, $118,400 was voted for the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway. In Quebec, $72,000 was voted for the Sorel Railway. In Ontario, $128,000 was voted for the Brockville Railway. In Quebec, $96,000 was voted for the St. John Railway. In New Brunswick, $19,200 was voted for the North-Western Railway. In Quebec, $30,000 was voted for the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway. In Ontario, $92,000 was voted for the Thunder Bay Colonisation Railway. In Ontario, $64,000 was voted for the Central Ontario Railway. In Ontario, $10,500 was voted for the Belleville Railway. In Quebec, $25,000 was voted for the Temiscamingue Railway, but half of that would be for Ontario. In Ontario, $44,800 was voted for the Lake Erie Railway. In Ontario, $70,000 was voted for the Napanee and Tamworth Railway. The Gatineau Railway vote was one of the year before, and in dollars was not changed at all. There was voted for the Grand Piles and St. Maurice Railway in Quebec $217,600. This, like the Gatineau, was voted the year before, and cannot be included in last year's vote. In Ontario, for the Atlantic Railway, $96,000 was voted. And there was voted the year before for the Indiantown and Miramichi Valley Railway, $140,000. I have not taken the two subsidies which were voted the year before, and not changed last year; but, taking all the subsidies which were voted, we find there were $639,000 for Ontario, $223,000 for Quebec, and $137,000 for New Brunswick, apart from the $140,000 for the Indiantown Branch, which was voted the year before; and there was voted for this branch we are now discussing, in Nova Scotia—and it was the only vote for Nova Scotia—$250,000. I was afraid that my hon. friend was running away with the idea that Ontario was not properly used in this, but I think this must satisfy him that Ontario has got her full share.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I have no desire to prolong this discussion, but, as I have taken considerable interest in the extension of the railway from Oxford to Louisburg, and as my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) called attention to that branch on more than one occasion during this discussion, I deem it my duty to say a few words relative to this Bill. He stated that the building of a branch from Stellarton to Pictou would interfere with the short line from Oxford to Louisburg. I frankly admit that that was the impression the vote made on my mind when I first saw it in the Estimates, but, having taken so much interest in that line, I made enquiries from those most immediately interested in the line from Oxford to Louisburg, and particularly from the company interested in the construction; and I was informed that, instead of the building of this branch interfering in the project they had in view, it would materially assist them, so that my friend from Guysboro' may rest assured that the building of the branch from Stellarton to Pictou will not interfere in any degree with the line from Oxford to Louisburg, but on the contrary, that the building of that line, a part of which is concurrent with the other line—

Mr. KIRK. No.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Yes, it is. I am so assured by a promoter of the short line from Oxford to Louisburg, and he ought to be a better authority on that question than the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk). Besides being a part of the short line, it is a great convenience to the great and enterprising town of Pictou, and during its construction, I have no hesitation in admitting that it will materially aid all the laborers in that part of the country. I desire to point out the extraordinary opposition which hon. gentlemen opposite, led by members from Nova Scotia, always offer to votes for railway purposes in that Province. When hon. gentlemen from Nova Scotia oppose votes for railway purposes in their own Province, it is not astonishing to find the hon. gentleman who is acting leader of the Opposition, opposing a small branch of the Intercolonial Railway from Stellarton to Pictou. However, we are used to receiving that treatment, and I should have been astonished if this vote had not been opposed to-night. I have taken much interest in the extension of the road from Oxford to Louisburg, and believe that a further vote will be necessary to enable any company to build that road. I fear that the very determined opposition offered to this vote may intimidate my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways, from asking for any more money east of Pictou, but I hope he will not be deterred and that he will ask a sufficient amount of money to enable a company to build the short line, in which my hon. friend from Guysboro' seems to take so much interest. I believe that if the Minister of Railways had granted a liberal subsidy for the construction of the road, as a part of the Intercolonial Railway, the opposition would not be so strong as it is to the smaller vote which is now asked. On former occasions, I know, the real leader of the Opposition, when votes were asked for Cape Breton, seemed disposed to encourage the building of the road on the Island, and I think that if the Minister of Railways will extend the Intercolonial Railway from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg, he will be supported by a large majority of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It may be quite true, as the Minister of Railways said, that in chapter 59 of the Act of 1883, granting subsidies, the details may be as he stated; but if you will look back, Mr. Chairman, to chapter

Mr. POPE.

58 of the same year, you will find grants of very considerable importance. For instance there is an amount for a road from a point on the Intercolonial Railway at Rivière du Loup, in the Province of Quebec, for a sum not exceeding on the whole $253,000, said subsidy to be in addition to the subsidy already authorised to be granted in aid of the construction of the said railway. That, I take it, was a new grant made last year, and makes, in addition to the $221,000 the hon. gentleman spoke of, $478,000 for the Province of Quebec, and if he goes down a little further he will find a railway which, I suppose, he knows something about, a line of railway from the south bank of the St. Lawrence River to the ports of St. Andrews, St. John and Halifax, via Sherbrooke, Moose Head, Mattawamkeag, Fredericton and Salisbury, a subsidy not exceeding $80,000 for twenty years, in addition to the $120,000 granted before. Now $80,000 for twenty years is worth certainly $800,000, and if he will add that to the $45,800—

Mr. POPE. That is for New Brunswick.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is for the United States, so far as I can see; it is probably for the State of Maine, and I suppose the hon. gentleman may therefore have excluded it from the New Brunswick or Quebec grant. It goes most of its length through Quebec, and then through the State of Maine.

Mr. IRVINE. And for the benefit of the State of Maine, too.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If we get the short line made at our own expense, and hand it over, as I suppose it will be handed over, to somebody else, it will tend materially to injure the traffic on the Intercolonial Railway, and the deficit on that will be likely to reach considerable proportions, but $800,000 per annum, for twenty years, is a very material addition, whether for New Brunswick, or Quebec, or whether divided between the two. Then there is a further declaration that an additional subsidy, not exceeding $340,000, be granted by the Governor in Council to the Canadian Pacific Railway in order to reach Quebec. Now, I cannot conceive, in view of all these additions, how the hon. gentleman can say that last year we only gave about a quarter of a million of subsidies to Quebec, as I make it, at least, a million and a quarter, and, perhaps, a million and a half, which will go to Quebec under that Statute of 58, although he may be right enough in saying that under the Statute of 56 the details were as he gave them.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman might as well say that any vote we gave to Ontario, which we have been voting for years back for the Canadian Pacific Railway, ought to be charged to Ontario. Every year we voted large sums, and if that vote is for the Pacific Railway, is it not a fair set off against the other?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was voted in Ontario was for the direct benefit and interest of the port of Montreal, and was demanded by gentlemen from Quebec for their express interest. I remember the present Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, Mr. Masson, openly, in this House, advocating a grant to the Central Railway on the ground that the traffic would go to the Province of Quebec. But he was right enough; that was part of the main line to Montreal on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The only substantial grant which was given by the Government was a grant to that portion of the Ontario roads which connected Toronto with Callander Station. But the grants through Ontario in that particular quarter were distinctly for the benefit of the country east of Montreal, and nobody knows it better than the Minister of Railways. It was a great advantage to the City of Montreal, and very little advantage indeed to the Province of Ontario, while Toronto is not benefited in the slightest degree by the construction of that line. Toronto may be benefited by the grant which goes to connect it with Gravenhurst and Callander Station on the Canadian Pacific Railway. But it is not an answer to the question I have raised that these three grants make a sum four or five times as much as was admitted—perhaps six times as much. The truth is, there is only one doctrine that can be safely laid down, and that is that the Confederation of Canada has no business to give aid to local roads, but only to construct roads for the general benefit of the whole Confederation, and it is only on that ground that this grant can be defended at all. That is an opinion I have announced many times on the floor of this House, and I am not in the slightest degree disposed to recede from it.

Mr. FOSTER. The debate that has arisen quite unexpectedly to many members of the House has been as instructive as it has been amusing. It has brought out a good many things of which it is well for us to take notice, one or two of which I wish to emphasise just in passing. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down, if there is any point to his opposition at all, opposes the expenditure of money for railways in the Maritime Provinces, especially in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. I am in the judgment of the House if there has been anything else to be gathered from the hon. gentleman's speech and his previous remarks. The point I wish to emphasise is this: The party opposite, led to-night by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) cannot have one policy for Ontario and another for the Maritime Provinces, and yet demand to be called a consistent party. I went through two or three elections not very long since in New Brunswick. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) will remember those elections, and if there was one point put more strongly than another by the followers of the hon. gentlemen in the city of St. John, in the Province of New Brunswick, it was the point that the Maritime Provinces were systematically neglected in the expenditure of the public money and that the Province of Ontario notably, and the Province of Quebec in part, took the larger share, the giant's share of the public money. During that contest I had the pleasure of reading the utterances of the hon. member for South Huron and of the leader of his party as well, in which they had again and again declared that the Maritime Provinces were treated quite too well and Ontario was the cow that had to be milked for the benefit of the Lower Provinces. I want that to be understood. There were two policies on the Riel question by hon. gentlemen opposite; there are two policies on the railway question; there is nothing but sectionalism that has cropped out of the debate to-night from hon. gentlemen opposite. My good friend from Guysboro' is sectional if he is anything. A day or two ago he was sectional in favor of the Province of Nova Scotia as against the Dominion. To-day, he is sectional in what? Against a grant to a railway which does not happen to run through his own county. I will tell the committee what I believe—it may be that I am mistaken but the House can judge. I believe the hon. member for Guysboro' would not have been found either speaking or voting against the granting of $300,000 for a railway if the railway ran through the county of Guysboro'. Yet he stands up behind his leader and leads in the applause when that hon. gentleman says: There is no more vicious, no more reprehensible system of corruption than that of granting subsidies to the different parts of the Provinces. I want to point another moral to the hon. member for South Huron, and it is this: He says that the Canadian Pacific Railway subsidy was granted and the road itself was built through this section of country for the port of Montreal. That is that there was a large portion of the railway which ran through the Province of Ontario and which ended at Montreal for the time being. He said that railway was built entirely and only for the benefit of the port of Montreal, neglecting all other advantages. Then Toronto gets nothing. Yet I thought we voted money by which Toronto was to make connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I should like to ask the hon. gentleman of what great benefit that would have been to Toronto if the whole line of the Canadian Pacific Railway had not ran near there for that road to tap. The point I wish to bring home to the hon. member is this: When a grant of money was voted by Parliament to connect the Canadian Pacific Railway through the State of Maine with the ports of the Maritime Provinces, Halifax or St. John, the hon. gentleman took a quite different attitude, and he said: No, that is not for the terminal point at St. John or Halifax—it is for the State of Maine. There was no doubt about that. He contended that the whole value of that road, the major part of which runs through the Maritime Provinces, was concentrated in that portion of the road which runs through the State of Maine and there was nothing for the terminal point. That is what the hon. gentleman stated. If he wants to make a point the other way he declares that all this long line of Canadian Pacific Railway was not constructed for the benefit of the country through which it passes, but solely for the benefit of Montreal. If the hon. gentleman wishes to be successful in leading a party in this country I submit he must learn to stand consistently in the different Provinces. If the hon. gentleman advanced a principle it was this—it is one which is not desirable, and no Government could stand for ten minutes if it adopted it as the basis of its action—that the money taken from the country and put into the public Treasury ought not to be expended for merely local works. That is the doctrine which the hon. gentleman lays down. If the hon. gentleman opposes the railway subsidies to the different Provinces it is upon that doctrine; yet there is not a single expenditure probably made by any department of the Government which is not for some local purpose in different portions of the Dominion. But the hon. gentleman said if there was any vicious and reprehensible system of corruption introduced it was the system of spending public money in the different localities; and yet his friends sat behind him, almost every one of whom had voted over and over again in this House in favor of that very same kind of vicious and reprehensible corruption. But at that time the road went through their own localities. Not all of the hon. gentlemen opposite voted for them, for I see my genial and philosophical friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). He did not vote for them, if I have searched the records rightly—he left the Chamber.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not surprised to find the Minister of Marine and Fisheries posing as an advocate of that most corrupt system. I remember perfectly well when, three years ago, that hon. gentleman was elected as an Independent member by Liberal votes, and if I recollect aright, that hon. gentleman, whom some persons have put down as a Puritan, so far from showing any indisposition to fall in with the prevailing tendency of members of the House, had not been three months a member of this House, before an Independent member was found applying to the Minister of Interior for a grant of fifty miles square of timber limits for himself. I recollect that perfectly well, and a pretty sample it was of the sort of independent member and Minister that the hon. gentleman is likely to make. As to this railway through the State of Maine, I have this to say: My objection is not to the railway going to St. Andrews or St. John, or some point in Nova Scotia, but my objection is this: It is a competing line with a line which has actually cost Canada $46,000,000 or $47,000,000, and that it tends directly to make that very costly and expensive line of railway useless and to largely increase the deficit upon it. That is the point I took, and it is a very strong point. And it in no way reflects on the right of the Maritime Provinces to share, so far as they can, in the benefit of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have great sympathy with the Maritime Provinces for other reasons. I hold that those Provinces have been exceedingly oppressed and unjustly dealt with by the tariff imposed by hon. gentlemen opposite. I say they have perhaps some reasonable excuse for asking that a considerable sum of money should be given them out of the public chest, because I believe in their case the oppressive and unjust tariff which now exists plunders them right and left, and that is one reason why I have less objection to this particular grant and other grants to the Maritime Provinces than I otherwise would have. But as my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), has shown, this road is not for the benefit of the Maritime Provinces, it is for the benefit of a particular locality, and like its prototype, to which the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries alluded, it is a competing line, to a certain extent, with another line or a branch line of the Intercolonial Railway. It is not going to bring additional trade, it is going, to a certain extent, to divert the trade we now have. And moreover, I say, as I said before, that this question on which no proper explanations have been given to the House, is a question which ought to have been referred to the Railway Committee to be threshed out and discussed there, where it can, with any propriety, be sent.

Mr. FOSTER. One word of explanation with respect to an assertion made by my hon. friend, which has not before been made in the House. He said that I very soon developed into a champion of corruption, by voting for these railway subsidies.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was not what I said.

Mr. FOSTER. I have only to say in reply to that, that I advise him to look around him and he will find I have a great many companions of the right stripe on the benches of the Opposition. I wish also to allude to another remark of the hon. gentleman. He asserted that I came out as an Independent candidate. That assertion has been made in the press. It is meant by that assertion that I came out and ran in the county and was elected—speaking in a party sense—upon an independent basis. I challenge my hon. friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) to show one single line in my canvass, in my canvass, in the printed speeches I made in that canvass, which will show that I came out as anything else than a Liberal-Conservative, pledged to support the Liberal-Conservative Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I said was not that the hon. gentleman voted for railway subsidies, but that he had not been three months in the House before he was an applicant for fifty square miles of timber limits for his own use and benefit.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will say in his place that I took one single step towards corruption by applying in a legal way for a timber limit, let him do so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do say so. I say that no member of Parliament has a right to ask for favors of that kind from Government. I do not say that the hon. gentleman is singular in that respect. I say that members of Parliament are trustees; that no trustee has the right to speculate in the property of his ward with which he is entrusted. That is my doctrine, and the hon. gentleman in company with a great many others have violated that principle constantly and systematically.

Mr. FOSTER. That is fine doctrine, but it will not stand the test. When a man applies under a law passed by Parliament, and in a strictly legal way for what the law allows him on legal conditions, he is applying for no favor.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. MILLS. I beg to observe that I do not subscribe to the views of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I think that if every member of Parliament would act on the assumption that it is perfectly proper for him to do whatever the law may permit him to do then Parliament would be worse than it is. The hon. gentleman in discussing this question has referred to two entirely distinct propositions. One is the propriety of the course adopted by the Government in assuming control of local railways, and the other is the propriety or merit of this particular application. Now, my hon. friend from Huron pointed to this instance now before the House as an illustration of the mischief that resulted from the course of the Government in undertaking to take control of the various local railways of the country. Our constitution provides that we may take control of local railways when they are for the general advantage of Canada, and the House of Commons in the preceding Parliament declared that all the railways connected with the great main roads of the country were roads for the general advantage of Canada. The result of that has been to assume control of a large number of local works and undertakings, and the effect has been to needlessly waste the public money of the country, and greatly increase the public expenditure. What is our object in having provincial establishments? What is our object in providing a Parliamentary Government in each Province, and giving to each Province a certain definite jurisdiction? Was it not for the very purpose of placing these local works and undertakings which are specially advantageous to the different Provinces, under the control of the Provincial Legislatures, to throw the burden upon those who are to receive the benefit? Well, that principle has been seriously interfered with, and, in fact, a very serious blow has been struck at our federal system by the railway policy which has been inaugurated. But I am not going to discuss to-night whether that policy be wise or unwise. I am not going to discuss the question as to whether Ontario or Quebec or Nova Scotia or New Brunswick has received the larger sum for these local works and undertakings. I leave that question out of view. We have before us a proposition that we are to spend a certain sum of money in building a railway from Stellarton to Pictou, and we have to consider whether or not it is a meritorious undertaking. I leave out of view the fact that we have other legislative bodies in this country. Supposing this Parliament was the only body which had the right to deal with this question of local projects; is this an undertaking upon which we would be justified at the present time in expending a large sum of money? Let us look at the condition of things at this moment. There is a road extending from Stellarton to Pictou. By whom was that road built? It was built by a Government of which the father of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) was an influential and important member—in fact, he was Premier at the time. It was possible for the Government at that time to have extended this road from Stellarton to Pictou by the particular route which the hon. gentleman says should now be adopted. The Government of Nova Scotia at that time, making a road at the expense of the people of Nova Scotia, responsible to the people of Nova Scotia, chose a different line, chose a line nine miles long between Stellarton and Pictou, instead of one eighteen miles long. That road was built and is now in operation. Is this country, is the Province of Nova Scotia so well supplied with railways, have we so large an amount of money in the public Treasury that we can afford to build eighteen miles of road to connect two points which are already connected by a road nine miles long? That is the position of things and the hon. gentleman can bring forward no justification for this measure. There is a road at present between Stellarton and Pictou. You have to cross the Harbor of Pictou, and why? Does the hon. gentleman say that the trade of Pictou is of so little consequence that a ferry cannot be profitably kept up? Does he pretend to say that a river a mile wide is a serious impediment to the trade of Pictou? If the hon. gentleman looking at the facts cannot say—as I am sure he cannot—that Pictou is not adequately supplied with railways at the present time, and if Pictou has already a railway connecting it with Stellarton, nine miles long, why does the hon. gentleman want another railway eighteen miles long to connect the same two points. That is what he proposes. I say the railways of Nova Scotia are not so abundant. There are many parts of Nova Scotia without railway facilities, and if the Government are anxious to expend large sums of money for railway enterprises in Nova Scotia, let them spend it on some other points which are without railway facilities at the present time, instead of wasting money in connecting two points already connected by a railway, half the length of the one the hon. gentleman proposes. I was rather astonished at the argument of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron). What does the hon. gentleman say? Does he support this scheme because it is a meritorious one? Not at all; he admits that there is no merit in the scheme; but he says, I want a railway in my constituency, and I am going to support this in the hope that I will get support elsewhere. He is going to support the system of log-rolling. This is one of the evils of this policy of usurping the control of local works which the constitution intended should be vested in the provincial establishments. Now, we have a deficit, the Minister of Finance informs us, of nearly $5,000,000; and while the country is in these straitened circumstances, the hon. gentleman proposes to expend a large sum of money in building a road which, according to all the evidence we have before us, is wholly unnecessary, and wholly without any merit. Now, I call the attention of the House to these facts. There is a road already built from Stellarton to Pictou, nine miles in length.

Mr. PAINT. The road is seventeen miles in length.

Mr. VAIL. It is thirteen miles.

Mr. PAINT. I am positive it is seventeen miles.

Mr. VAIL. I am positive it is not.

Mr. MILLS. I have in my hand a map of the district upon which is marked the existing road and the proposed road; and it is impossible to look at this map without seeing that if the proposed road is eighteen miles in length, the existing road is but little more than half that length; and if the road were as long as the hon. member says, the proposed road, instead of being eighteen miles, would be nearer thirty miles in length; the map shows that. I say that the Minister of Railways has not treated the House fairly in this matter. He ought to have submitted plans and specifications. If he had laid on the Table of the House a map of the district, showing the existing road and the proposed road, I do not believe he could have got a corporal's guard, even on that side of the House to support this proposition. This is simply a contribution to the election fund on behalf of the hon. member for Pictou; it is impossible to make anything else out of it. When our finances are in their present condition, he is calling on the Government to expend a large sum of money for a purpose that has no justification whatever.

Mr. TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman's speech in the county of Pictou will be a better contribution to the election fund or the election literature than almost anything else that could have occurred. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that when he makes these statements he is insulting not merely the Liberal-Conservatives in the town of Pictou, but people who rendered him good support in the days when he needed it, and who, after the remarks which have fallen from his lips, will think twice before they support him again. Coming from Bothwell with a little inaccurate plan which has been handed to him by the hon. member for Guysboro' he presumes to tell 3,000 or 4,000 people who are living and doing business in the town of Pictou, that he knows their wants and necessities far better than they do, and that when the town paid delegations to come up to Ottawa and lay before the Government the great and crying need, that existed for the construction of this road, they did not know their own business, and that they are perfectly well served by another branch. The hon. gentleman has no right thus to insult the intelligence of the people of that section of country. I take his speech in no other light. He avoids looking at the question squarely; he shuts his eyes to the facts before him. He could not have known the facts, or he would have known that this is no provincial work, on which he tried to found some constitutional argument. It is a proposition to aid one of the most remunerative public works of Canada from one end of the country to the other. The hon. gentleman cannot point to a public work that produces a larger revenue than that portion of the Intercolonial Railway known as the Pictou Branch. I must express surprise at the remarks of the hon. member for Guysboro' before recess, when he took issue with the remark of my hon. colleague that in eastern Nova Scotia the Grit party had not built a mile of railway; and he told this House in loud and emphatic language that the Mackenzie Administration had built all the railways east in Nova Scotia.

Mr. KIRK. I said, made arrangements, and I say so now.

Mr. TUPPER. I ask hon. gentlemen whether any such language fell from the hon. gentleman's lips. I have no doubt that is the language he would have used if he knew the facts, and wished to place them before the House as they really stand. Let him rather speak of these than of arrangements which produce nothing. Why, every person knows that the construction of the railway in Nova Scotia, to which that hon. gentleman alluded was carried on and completed by private capitalists aided by a provincial subsidy and $1,200,000, which this Government, and not the Mackenzie Government, paid to the Provincial Government, and since that hon. gentleman has been sitting in this House. And yet the hon. gentleman pretends to say that a policy inaugurated or an arrangement made in connection with the Pictou Branch, by the Administration of Sir John A. Macdonald, previous to the advent of the Mackenzie Administration, was used in connection with the construction of this road, and it was never handed over; and that hon. gentleman, under these circumstances, states that we owe everything to the Mackenzie Administration for the construction of railways east in Nova Scotia. That will be news to the people who reside there. I do not understand why in connection with this question the hon. gentleman persists in harking back to a question with which this House has really nothing to do—a question that can only interest people in a certain locality, and that has a purely political interest in that locality; that is, my connection with the short line railway scheme. He has not accepted my statement; I did not expect that he would; but why should we discuss that subject three or four times over? I never accepted any responsibility for the initiation of that work; I did not choose to do so, and I could not do so; and if the people of Pictou choose to give me credit for it, all I can say is that they do me too much honor. As to the question of geography, which the hon. gentleman after several days has again referred to to-night, I say that the people who are mainly interested in the question will judge whether he is right or I am right with regard to the nature of this work. Now, to some extent that remark is relevant, because the hon. gentleman must bring it forward to say that this is an entirely useless piece of work, and he has evidently misled the hon. member for Bothwell in that respect. Had the hon. member from Guysboro' considered another portion of his remarks, another portion of the remarks which no doubt have been handed to him, and upon which he has been coached, and had the attention of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) been called to that portion, he would have seen how unfair it was to bring forward this idea; because the hon. member for Guysboro' himself testified to the fact that large numbers of extensive industries have grown up upon the Pictou Branch, in a flourishing place called Trenton, and in New Glasgow itself, under the influence of the National Policy, which the late Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) could not help attacking in this debate, and these industries are now feeding that portion of the Intercolonial Railway, and adding largely to its traffic returns. The hon. gentleman knows that these industries are on this side of the town of Pictou, on this side of the harbor, and surely it will be seen at once that this road going into the town of Pictou cannot, in the nature of things, interfere with the traffic arising from these various industries. As a matter of fact, you first come to Stellarton, you afterwards strike New Glasgow about three miles away, and starting from Stellarton this proposed road runs in almost a straight direction into the coal fields, runs right away west from Stellarton to western Pictou running through Westville down over the Middle River, and then takes a turn; and for a very short distance you might call it parallel, but to term the whole line parallel, or to use that argument to show that these roads are going to destroy the one the usefulness of the other is to state an unfair view of the question, and one which will not be appreciated by the people who are on the spot and understand the matter. The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Richard Cartwright) has alluded again to the great necessity of going into committee on this question. Well, I think that the late leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie) understood pretty well what course to pursue, and what procedure to follow in matters of this kind, and it is because I find that this course now proposed is so unusual, I am led to believe that the whole of this discussion is unusual. I am led to believe that this extraordinary discussion is not so much in the interests of the country as to stir up sectionalism and ill-will between the Maritime Provinces and the Western Provinces. When such unfair statements are made, they can only lead to the effect of an exciting prejudice, ill-will, and sectional feeling. It is unfair to place this in the category of local works for the reasons I have given, and I say this procedure which the Government is asked to follow is not usual. When the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) led the Opposition, I take it for granted, he understood his duty with reference to schemes and propositions of this character. What took place in connection with the St. Charles branch, to which I alluded at the beginning of the debate, in 1882, when that hon. gentleman was here and paying particular attention to public works, and took charge of the discussion on the vote to that branch? All he wished to know was the probable cost of the work and one or two other particulars. When the Bill ratifying the expenditure, authorising the work, and removing all doubts so as to protect the Government in the construction of the work from any litigation, came down, I find, according to Hansard, that it was introduced, read the first, second, and third time and passed without any remarks or criticism whatever. Now, is this great constitutional argument to come up, is this heated partisan discussion to occur only upon Bills relating to public works in the Maritime Provinces? Why is it this heated discussion takes place on a Bill relating to a maritime work? Why did we not understand long ago that Bills of this character had to go through this test of fire? I ask the hon. gentleman to point to a single case where a proposition to construct any other branch of the Intercolonial Railway, or any other public work in Nova Scotia, met with such hostile, unfair criticism as this, and yet this is a solitary exception of works of its kind which is not going to entail any burden upon the people. I think that ought to be well-understood, since so much complaint is made about spending money down there. No one can controvert the statement I have made once or twice, that the proposition now before the House is to add to and enlarge one of the most remunerative, if not the most remunerative public work in the Dominion, and that the construction of this extension is to be carried on without costing the people of this country one single dollar more than they now pay.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. KIRK. I do not propose to extend the discussion further, but one remark of the hon. gentleman I cannot allow to pass without an answer. He has stated for the third time that I did not know what I was talking about when I referred to the Eastern Extension.

Mr. TUPPER. I proved it.

Mr. KIRK. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), has himself given the most undoubted evidence of the most intense ignorance with regard to the matter. He has stated this Government granted, as assistance to the Eastern Extension, the Pictou and Truro Branch. It did not do so. He said this assistance was given before the Mackenzie Government came into power, but he ought to know that Mr. Hugh Macdonald, the present judge, moved, before the coming into power of the Mackenzie Government, a resolution that the Pictou and Truro Branch should be given in aid of extending the Railway east. That resolution was allowed to drop, and nothing was done until Mr. Mackenzie's Government came into office. In 1875, that hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie), introduced a Bill providing that any companies which would extend the railway from New Glasgow to Louisburg, Cape Breton, should have, in aid of the work, the Pictou and Truro Branch. The Local Government of Nova Scotia, then a Liberal Government, provided also that a subsidy of $5,000 per mile should be granted to assist the company. When this law was first enacted, a company offered to build the road to the Strait of Canso for the subsidy offered by the Mackenzie Government and the Local Government of Nova Scotia, namely the Pictou and Truro Branch and the $5,000 per mile. They offered to extend the road to the Strait of Canso, and put a ferry on the strait, but the Conservatives of Cape Breton and others objected to the Government giving the contract to the company, unless they would build the road to Louisburg, and the then Premier (Mr. Mackenzie), held the matter open for twelve months, in the endeavor to obtain a company to build the road through to Louisburg, but without success. The consequence was that the company, which had offered to extend it to the Strait of Canso, withdrew their offer, and tenders had to be asked for by the Local Government, for the purpose of ascertaining what other companies would undertake the work, and the lowest tender they received for building the road to the strait, was $8,000 a mile besides the Truro and Pictou Branch, so that hon. gentlemen opposite were the means of causing that road, to the Strait of Canso, to cost Nova Scotia $3,000 per mile more than it would have cost that Province if the Mackenzie Government had been allowed to go on with the contract and build the road according to the first offer. Therefore, what I said was correct, that the Mackenzie Government and the Nova Scotia Liberal Government of that day, provided all the means necessary for extending the road to the Strait of Canso and building the ferry. Then they gave the contract, and bound a company to build the road under the increased subsidy to which I have referred. It is true the road was not completed when this Government came into power, but a large amount of the work was done, and what did this Government do? They simply passed a short law amending the law which had been enacted by their predecessors, and which they said was not perfect. But they never gave a dollar of assistance towards the road, contenting themselves with simply amending the law wherein they considered it to be defective. The hon. gentleman says that this Government paid back to the Government of Nova Scotia the money for the branch. That may be true, but they paid it back after the road was built and in operation, and under circumstances that were not very creditable to them. They placed the Local Government in such a position that they were forced to sell the road out. When the road was completed to the Strait of Canso, it was provided, under the law passed by this Government, that the Truro and Pictou Branch should be transferred to the company. The Local Government bought the company's right out, and when they applied to this Government for the transfer of this branch, this Government refused to hand it over, as they claimed they could not transfer it in consequence of the law not empowering them to do so. The Local Government thus could do nothing else but sell the road out to this Government, or enter into an expensive lawsuit in order to force this Government to transfer to them the road. Then this Government did not pay the Local Government for the Pictou and Truro Branch. They refused to give it up, and they paid nothing for it at all. All that this Government paid to the Local Government was the money the Local Government were bound to pay to the company for the construction of the road. They did not pay back to the Local Government a dollar of the amount they had paid to assist this road. Yet this hon. gentleman will tell us that this Tory Government built this road. They did not. They obstructed the Local Government in every possible way, they refused to transfer the road when they should have transferred it, and they forced the Local Government to sell when they should not have done so. The hon. gentleman seems to take credit for all that has been done to extend the road to the Strait of Canso. I say that if it had not been for the hon. gentleman and his friends, that road would have been extended from the Strait of Canso long ago far into Cape Breton, and whatever has been done in building the road, the eighty miles to the Strait of Canso, is due to the Mackenzie Government.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The hon. member for Guysboro' has forgotten his history as well as his geography, perhaps it is rather complimentary to him to say that he has forgotten. He stated before recess that the building of the eighty miles of railway to the Strait of Canso was due to the Mackenzie Government. That will be extraordinary news to everybody in Nova Scotia. The Mackenzie Government did nothing in relation to that work except to carry out the arrangement made with their predecessors for the cession of the Truro and Pictou Branch as a subsidy and aid to that work. The hon. gentleman knows that it was not in any sense due to this party, either to the local party or the party in this House, that the contract was delayed, and he knows also that the reasons why the company withdrew were not due to any delay, but to a misunderstanding as to what the equipment was which went with that transfer. It transpiring afterwards, on Mr. Mackenzie's own statement, that there was no equipment intended to go with the transfer, the company withdrew their tender. The road was eventually built, as everybody knows or at least as everybody knows in Nova Scotia, by the assistance of the Local Government and by the promise of the Truro and Pictou Branch, but that was returned to this Government with the consent of the present Government of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman says that this Government acted very unjustly to the Government of Nova Scotia and forced them to give up that work. The present Government of Nova Scotia will not thank him for that statement, because they are about to run their election on the ground that they deserve credit for forcing this Government to take back the Eastern Railway.

Mr. KIRK. No, by no means.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The hon. gentleman will very shortly be stumping his county in Nova Scotia asking for support from that Government on the ground that they caught this Government by the throat, and made them take back again those works and operate them at their expense.

Mr. KIRK. It is the first time I ever heard of it.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I am very glad to hear that statement from the hon. gentleman, and I am very glad that it should go down to Nova Scotia in that form. This, however, is beside the real question. Coming back to the question which is before the committee, it seems to me that there is hardly any ground for the contention that this Bill should go to the Committee on Railways because whether the hon. gentleman was hostile or not to its provisions, and whether it passed against the protest of the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) or not, the principle was definitely settled last Session. The vote was passed in the form of a statute, and, in accordance with the policy then adopted, a provisional contract has been made by the Minister of Railways. This Bill need not have come before the House at all but for a doubt which has arisen as to whether the Railway Act applies to this branch or not, and the only object of this Bill of three clauses is that the Railway Act shall be made to apply to this undertaking as a part of the Intercolonial Railway. It is, therefore, simply to remove a doubt and to allow the policy which was adopted last Session to be carried out that this measure is introduced. To send it to the Railway Committee to discuss the merits of the policy of the Government on the question would seem to be a very unusual course and entirely uncalled for. There is nothing in the Bill itself which would invite the scrutiny of the committee or upon which one word has been said in this long debate. I protest against this being looked upon as a concession to Nova Scotia, or even as a local railway concession in Nova Scotia. I know that my hon. friends from Pictou claim that it will be of great local advantage. That may be admitted, consistently with my argument. This, Sir, is the extension of an existing public work, the construction of a branch of the Intercolonial Railway, and not for local purposes alone. My hon. friend beside me has said that the Pictou Branch is the most productive railway property in the possession of the Dominion Government, and I think experts say so too. Therefore, our friends who have an anxiety about the way this work is to be maintained, need have no fears. This branch, as the Minister of Railways has said, yields from $40,000 to $50,000 over and above its working expenses, which cannot be said of any other section of equal length on the Intercolonial Railway. In addition, the new branch is to run to the town of Pictou, or to the waters of a magnificent harbor at one end, and the other end is centred in one of the finest mineral districts in Canada. As regards the anxiety which some hon. gentlemen have expressed as to the operation of what is now the existing branch from New Glasgow to the Landing, I think their objections have answered themselves. It is said that line ought not to be abandoned because it is dotted all along with flourishing factories. I hope that is so; I have some reason to believe it is so, and this fact should calm any fears as regards the operation of that branch hereafter. Instead of the new line being a competing line as regards those factories, their products run the other way; they seek an outlet in the eastern section of Nova Scotia and down the Intercolonial Railway; the district through which that line now runs has the assurance of the Minister of Railways, and an assurance well justified by the amount of traffic which these factories can give it, and which the town of New Glasgow can give it, that that branch will be kept up, and that they will be as efficiently served as they are at this moment. As regards the ferry, it ceases to be operated at the expense of the Intercolonial Railway. My hon. friends opposite have doubted that it can be efficiently maintained by the town if it costs $13,000 or $15,000 a year. But it need not be maintained as such a great cost as that, because its present cost arises from the fact that it has to be a great railway ferry, whereas it can be very efficiently managed by the town on a smaller scale than at present. It is to be observed, moreover, in support of the general policy on this question, not only that we are to get this branch constructed for a sum, the interest of which will be only an equivalent to the sum which will be saved by ceasing to operate the ferry, but that the ferry can only be kept open for a little more than half a year at present, and, therefore, we are getting a branch line of railway which will serve that district, and serve the Intercolonial Railway itself all the year. Another difficulty my hon. friends have raised is in regard to this bridge, and the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) said he was of opinion that the bridge would cost $150,000.

Mr. VAIL. The bridges.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understood him to say the bridge, and he was so understood by one of his friends, who stated immediately afterwards that it would cost $250,000. But the Minister of Railways states that he has an offer to construct the work at a cost of $40,000. I trust my hon. friends from Nova Scotia who seem hostile to this Bill, will scarcely carry their opposition to a vote, in consideration of the fact which the Minister of Railways has referred to, that notwithstanding that large sums were appropriated last year to public works in Ontario and Quebec, made larger by the additional sums mentioned by the hon. member for South Huron, this is the only grant which was given to Nova Scotia, and their opposition would amount to asking Parliament to withdraw the only concession which was made last year to Nova Scotia out of the very liberal grants that were given to local works in the other Provinces of the Dominion, although this railway is to be considered as an extension of an existing public work, and one that will be very productive. I also feel it my duty, before closing my remarks, to protest against the view which has been advanced by the hon. member for South Huron that the cost of the Intercolonial railway, forty-six or forty-seven millions, as the hon. member stated it—forty-four millions, as I find it in the blue book.—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Forty-five millions—you will find it in the blue-book.

Mr. THOMPSON—no, it is, I believe, $43,627,000—is to be considered a debit to the Maritime Provinces. That is an unsound principle, because the Maritime Provinces were induced to enter Confederation by the stipulation that they should be connected with the Upper Provinces by the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, and we maintain that the construction of that work is as much a benefit to this section of the country as it is to the Maritime Provinces. It is to be regarded as a great national work, for the benefit of all sections of the country, and it is unfair to the Provinces below to argue that that large amount of capital is to be put to their debit.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. gentleman observed that his own supporters behind him had charged that the Canadian Pacific Railway had been constructed for the benefit of Ontario, for a thousand miles. Does he think that there is any warrant for saying that it was constructed for the benefit of Ontario any more than that the Intercolonial Railway was constructed for the benefit of the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. THOMPSON. I have heard it stated that the Canadian Pacific Railway was constructed for the benefit of Ontario, but I do not know that any such argument was used this evening. We have it so contended continually in Nova Scotia, but only from the supporters of the hon. member for South Huron.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then he might have heard it from his own supporters to-night.

Mr. THOMPSON. We have to meet that on every platform, on every husting, in every meeting, and we do meet it by saying that the Canadian Pacific Railway is a national undertaking, built for the whole of Canada; and in every place where we have to meet that difficulty it has been made by the hon. gentleman's supporters.

Mr. VAIL. I am rather disposed to differ with some remarks that have fallen from my hon. friend from South Huron. I do not endorse his statement with regard to the Intercolonial Railway. It is quite clear that road was built more in the interest of the Upper Provinces than of the Maritime Provinces, and I am quite sure that instead of carrying goods from the Lower Provinces to the Upper Provinces, it is carrying goods from the Upper Provinces to the Maritime Provinces, and carrying back our money to pay for them. Now, I cannot, at all events, be charged with being opposed to this Government granting subsidies for the building of railways in Nova Scotia. I have said before in this House, and I repeat it now, that the Local Governments are not in a position to build railways. As a rule, whenever subsidies have been voted to railways in the Maritime Provinces, they have been coupled with subsidies to roads in the Upper Provinces. They were all put together and, as a matter of course, I voted for the whole. Now, I must say a word or two more in regard to this branch line. In the few remarks I made before recess, I said that I did not object to any expenditure on railways in the Lower Provinces, provided such was made in the proper place and in the interest of the general public. My objection to this branch line was because it involved an expenditure of from $300,000 to $500,000 to give the people additional railway accommodation which they have already to the town of Pictou, a town which has had railway accommodation for the last twenty years, while there are other points in Nova Scotia without railway accommodation although as much entitled to it as Pictou. We have a railway in the western part of Nova Scotia, some 68 miles in length, between Yarmouth and Digby. There is another railway running out from Halifax in the direction of Annapolis, some 120 miles. Between Annapolis and Digby there is a distance of seventeen or eighteen miles of unfinished road and notwithstanding our best efforts we have been unable to get more than a paltry grant of $3,200 a mile, although the completion of that link would perfect our railway system from Halifax to Yarmouth. It would have been much better if the Dominion Government had expended $300,000 in connecting the road in the west before they gave a second line to Pictou. I have no objection to Pictou getting all the accommodation it can, and that the Dominion Government should expend all its surplus money at that point if it is not needed elsewhere. But in justice to the western part of Nova Scotia the Government, instead of spending money in the east where it is not wanted, might have connected those two roads in the west. There is no railway accommodation on the south shore of Nova Scotia or in the Island of Cape Breton. Will the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) tell us that this road is going to be of any advantage to Cape Breton? When the Liberals are in power there is a great cry raised that nothing is being done for Cape Breton, but when the Conservative Government is in office, they are as peaceful as possible and declare they are satisfied that the Tory Government would build railways in the island if they could. If the Liberals are in office, Cape Breton wants a member in the Cabinet, but when the Conservatives are in power they are quite satisfied that both members should be from Nova Scotia proper. The Minister of Justice has referred to the few remarks made by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), in regard to the Eastern Extension Railway and its transfer to the Dominion Government. I do not think my hon. friend overstated the case in any way, he gave the exact facts from beginning to end. No Government could be induced to build the line to Louisburg, and at the request of the Local Government, finding it was impossible to continue the line to Louisburg or to get a company to contract for it, the Mackenzie Government agreed at the solicitation of the Local Government to give the Pictou Branch on the understanding that the road was to be built to the Strait of Canso, with a ferry across the strait for the accommodation of the people of Cape Breton. After the road was built, in order that it might be run in connection with the Pictou road and with a view to utilising the Pictou Branch and extending a line to the Strait of Canso, and getting an extension to Louisburg, the Local Government made up their minds to buy out the company owning the road to the Strait of Canso and give them $1,200,000. The Government of that day, of which the former member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper), then Minister of Railways, agreed to hand the road over to the Local Government, and he told me there was no difficulty in connection with it, that the whole matter could be settled in three days. The Local Government bought up the eastern road, when the Dominion Government objected to the transfer, and the Local Government were left under the arrangement to pay the company one and a quarter millions; but, instead of the Dominion Government transferring the road, they raised objections and refused to advance any money to the Provincial Government. For instance, they informed the Local Government that before the road was transferred there should be about three times the quantity of rolling stock on the Pictou Branch that the Government had ever had on that branch before. The Dominion Government threw every obstacle in the way until they forced the Government of Nova Scotia to hand over the whole road to the Dominion Government on the understanding that they would pay them back one and a quarter millions without returning any portion of the subsidy. I take issue with the Minister of Justice in regard to the Local Government making this an election cry. The Local Government did not intimate that they made any money out of the road. Under the circumstances it was the best thing they could do, but they never wanted the country to understand that they made money by getting clear of the road. If the Local Government could have obtained the Pictou Branch, and been allowed to hold the road they would have been very glad to do so, but in consequence of the course taken by the Dominion Government they were obliged to sell the road, and the Pictou road was held by the Dominion Government, and now they say the road is worth some $40,000 a year. If it is worth that much it is quite clear that the Dominion Government used the Government of Nova Scotia very badly when they refused to transfer that road, or put such restrictions upon it that the Local Government could not accept it. However, that is beside the question now before the committee, and I merely refer to it because the Minister of Justice brought up the Eastern Extension. In regard to this Pictou road, I do not feel disposed to oppose the grant. The matter is in the hands of the Government. I asked for information in regard to it, and if it was the intention of the Government to pass it through Committee of the Whole, the Minister of Railways should have placed before the House much more information than was obtained from him at first, or was subsequently dragged from him; for at the outset he did not tell us what the line could be built for.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Owing to some remarks made by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), I was called upon to say a few words in connection with this question. He said that the building of the branch from Stellarton to Pictou would militate against the construction of the short line from Oxford, but I think I have shown him that this is not the case on the authority of the promoter of that road. Owing to the remarks since made by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail), I feel it to be my duty to say a few words further in connection with it. It is well known, as my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) admitted, that Mr. Hugh McDonald, who represented the county of Antigonish in the first Parliament of Canada, was the first who, on more than one occasion, placed resolutions on the notice paper with a view of securing the Pictou Branch in aid of the Eastern Extension from New Glasgow to Sydney, or Louisburg. Before the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald resigned in 1873, a Minute of Council was passed which offered the Pictou Branch as aid to any company which would undertake to build the road from New Glasgow to Sydney, or Louisburg. That being the case, it ill becomes the Liberal or Reform party of this House to take credit for giving the Pictou Branch as aid to the Eastern Extension, and as my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Vail) endeavors to mislead the House in believing that the party to which he belongs did a great deal for Cape Breton, I thought it my duty on this occasion to point out the fact that they did nothing but give promises. Yes, they did go further, for they refused to give us that which the Liberal-Conservative party offered before they resigned power in 1873. On the 19th of May, 1874, in accordance with the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party, the Reform party submitted the following resolution in this House which was unanimously adopted.

Mr. KIRK. That was the first thing which was adopted.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No, it was the policy of the Conservative party. That resolution was as follows:—

"Resolved, that the Government be authorised to negotiate during Parliamentary recess for the transfer of the railway from Truro to Pictou to some authorised company on condition that such a company will extend the said railway from New Glasgow or Pictou to the Gut of Canso, or some place in Cape Breton, within a specified time—such transfer to be subject to the approval of Parliament at the next Session."

Mr. KIRK. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I hear the derisive "hear, hear," and I think if he will hear the rest of it, he will not "hear, hear," so derisively. This was the policy of the Government as proposed on 19th May, 1874.

Mr. KIRK. The Mackenzie Government.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Yes, in carrying out the policy of their predecessors.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. KIRK. Read to the House the policy of the previous Government.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). With reference to giving railway aid to Cape Breton, that Government never had a policy except to disapprove of such aid and, I dare say, they will continue it to the end of the chapter. Owing to the influence of an hon. gentleman, a member of the Government, who happened to be from the Island of Cape Breton, the policy of the Reform party was slightly changed, and a decision was come to on the 19th June, 1875, that the Pictou Branch would not be given to a company unless they undertook to build, equip and run a line from New Glasgow to Louisburg. That was everything the Reform party did, to carry out the policy of the Conservative party in 1873, and that was done at the instance of a representative of the Island of Cape Breton, who happened to be in the Government. It would appear that gentleman took a lively interest in the promotion of railway enterprises on the island, and on account of his earnest advocacy of railway extension on the island, he was forced out of the Government. At any rate, it was assumed by us that the reason he was forced out of the Government was that he advocated a little too energetically the interests of the island in the Government, and in order to endeavor to defeat any railway project which would contemplate the extension of the road in the Island of Cape Breton a successor to that gentleman was procured from the western part of the Province. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) seemed to be anxious to lead the House to believe that the party to which he belongs always favored railway extension in Cape Breton, while the fact appears to be that they did not do much for the island. On the 6th day of May, 1875, an Act was passed by the Legislature of Nova Scotia to encourage the building of a line of railway from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg, which provided as follows:—

“For the purpose of aiding the construction of a line of railway from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg, an allotment in all of three thousand acres of Crown lands in the counties of Cape Breton, Richmond, Inverness and Victoria, and a money subsidy of $5,000 a mile, and the mineral, if any, contained in 150,000 acres of such Crown lands, and also the sum of $5,000 to assist in establishing a steam ferry across such strait, shall be granted to any company now incorporated or hereafter to be incorporated, that shall, on or before the 1st day of September ensuing, give security and assurance to the satisfaction of the Governor-in-Council, to establish such ferry, and construct, finish and equip such line of railway, within three years of the 1st day of June next, ensuing, and work and operate the same.”

Now, Sir, the object of this Bill was to defeat the scheme for building a railway through the Island of Cape Breton. That is apparent on the face of it, because instead of giving a reasonable time to organise a company to build a road from New Glasgow to Louisburg, they only afforded a little over three months for that purpose. This Act was passed with the view of deceiving the people of Cape Breton into supporting a railway scheme which had in contemplation the building of a road from the Strait of Canso to New Glasgow only. The subsidy which was provided by the Liberal-Conservative party in 1873, in order that a railway should be built from New Glasgow to Louisburg, and which was reaffirmed by the Liberal party in 1875 to utilise the Pictou Branch for the same purpose, was reversed by the policy of the Local Government in 1875 and 1876, and that subsidy was diverted from its original purpose and utilised for the purpose of building to the Strait of Canso only. Besides that I would ask who expended all the money placed to the credit of the Province of Nova Scotia in 1875? Where did that money come from? Did it come from the Reform party? Was it not obtained as a concession to the Province of Nova Scotia from the Liberal-Conservative party, and instead of utilising that money to the advantage of the whole Province, it was utilised to build railways in Nova Scotia proper? This Bill shows that out of the $2,000,000 to the credit of the Province of Nova Scotia $600,000 was for the Island of Cape Breton; but there was no intention at that time to expend money on the island. It was simply put there with the view of securing the support of the members from the island at that time. I have proof of the fact by a Bill which was introduced into the Local Legislature in 1879 or 1880, reviving the same Act; and it was a singular fact that the very party who placed that Bill on the Statute-book, in 1875, refused to revive it, whereas the Liberal Conservative party did so. This shows that the placing of the Act in the Statute-book was simply a delusion and a snare. The hon. member for Gt. Gt. says that is the policy of the present Government. I say it is not. It is true that the deception practiced against the Island of Cape Breton for several years led the people to believe that promises made in 1883, Mr. CAMERON (Inverness).

1884 and 1885 might also prove delusive; but if they do, it will only be a repetition of what they suffered from the Reform party when it was in power in Nova Scotia and in this House. But as the promise has been made so repeatedly in this House by the Government of the day, to extend the road through the Island of Cape Breton, I believe that unless a company can be secured to extend that railway at an early day, the Government will adopt it as part of their policy to extend it from the Strait of Canso to Sydney and Louisburg, and that which the hon. member for Gt. Gt. declares to be a delusion and a snare will be proven by the Minister of Railways in the near future to be a fact

Mr. KINNEY. I wish to make a few observations in reply to some remarks made by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail). That hon. gentleman would lead the committee to believe that the non-completion of the Western Railway was due to a disposition on the part of this Government to thwart that enterprise. It is quite true, as he stated, that some fifteen years ago a company was chartered to build a road from Annapolis to Yarmouth. The hon. gentleman was at that time the leader of the Provincial Government, and for the purpose of securing his seat, he caused the projectors of the road to change the line of the road from the interior, to that extent that it cost $250,000 more to build it, and for that reason the provincial subsidy proved inadequate to complete the road. This, the hon. member did, I believe, and I think everybody else in Nova Scotia believes for his own personal interest, in a political sense, to make secure his seat in the county of Digby. That is one reason why the road is incomplete. Another reason is that, although this Parliament gave the Windsor Branch to assist in completing that road, yet the ex-leader of the Opposition signed a contract which rendered null and void the Act of Parliament; so that when the company went on the London market, they found that by this contract, which was contrary to the spirit of the Act, they were thrown out of their property for twenty-one years. That is the second reason why the road is not completed; and a third reason was that the hon. member for Digby was sent home to England, in 1872, after his party came into power, ostensibly to assist the road, but really to damn the project of consolidation. There are four members sitting on this side to-night, who were members of the Government who initiated the amalgamation scheme to put the railway under one management from Halifax to Yarmouth. This project was assisted by the Dominion Government; but the hon. member for Digby was a paid delegation to damn the project and kill the road. Yet he comes to-night to blame the Government for not carrying out an enterprise which he spent fifteen years in the attempt to kill—simply that he could injure his opponents and secure himself in his seat—by adding ten miles to its length and $250,000 to its cost, although this Government had given $1,500,000 to assist the road. We are left to-day with eighteen miles of a gap in the road, all for those three causes; and the hon. gentleman has the audacity to get up to-night and blame the Government for not carrying out an enterprise which he spent fifteen years in trying to thwart.

Mr. VAIL. It is not very often that the member for Yarmouth speaks in this House, and I suppose it has been because he had not an opportunity before to attack me in regard to a subject which he thinks he knows something about; but I think I will be able to show in a few moments that the hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about, and if he thinks for a moment, he will conclude that he has made a statement which has no foundation in fact. I was in the Local Government and introduced a Bill to build a line of railway from Annapolis to Yarmouth. After that Bill was introduced, and when the survey was being made, contrary to the expectations of the Government, and contrary to the spirit and intention of the Railway Act, the company undertook to run a line from Annapolis straight through the interior of the country from five to twenty miles from the shore, in order to divert all the trade and traffic from Digby. I, representing Digby, interposed to prevent it. The hon. member for Yarmouth says this was contrary to the contract. He knows very well that it was not contrary to the contract, or the spirit of the agreement. I am quite satisfied to take the responsibility of carrying the road through my own county. The Yarmouth company, in a selfish spirit, endeavored to carry it away from Digby as far as they could. Now, the hon. member in his place in Parliament has stated that I was sent to London by the Local Government, in his choice language, to damn the project. I assert the statement has no foundation in fact. I was sent by the Local Government to assist in every possible way to carry out that scheme, and I lent my assistance to the company for that object. I only required what the present Minister of Justice said in his place when the Act was being passed, would be required before the bonds should be signed. All I asked of the company was to fulfil their contract. The present Minister of Justice (Mr. Thompson), when Attorney-General of Nova Scotia, stated what was incumbent on the company. In fact it was a wildcat scheme, without a dollar of money behind it, and the Act was so constructed that they could carry out the arrangement to a certain point until they succeeded in getting bonds from the Government to the extent of $5,500,000, then put $1,250,000 in their pockets, and say to the Government: We find we cannot raise the money to complete the road; take what there is and complete it yourselves. They could have done this, because the only security provided was the security of the road itself; and because I declined to sign those bonds until the first part of the contract was fulfilled, the hon. member for Yarmouth has the hardihood to state I neglected my duty; and, notwithstanding that I went home ostensibly to secure the carrying out of the work, that I "damned the road." Every honorable man in Nova Scotia—I am not including the hon. member for Yarmouth—now gives me credit for the course I took; and if I had not understood the parties I was dealing with, the Province of Nova Scotia would have been mulcted in the sum of $1,250,000, and the company would have left the work incomplete. That is the sum and substance of the whole thing, and I am glad the hon. member for Yarmouth has given me an opportunity to make this explanation.

Mr. McLELAN. This debate has taken up a great deal of time, and now an entirely new phase is opened. I have been reminded of what I knew before, that the reason why there is a gap of eighteen miles in the road between Halifax and Yarmouth, is that it has been carried away towards the county of Digby. The hon. gentleman himself has admitted it.

Mr. VAIL. No.

Mr. McLELAN. He said that the people of Yarmouth proposed to run it away from the shores and carry it direct through Annapolis, which, according to the hon. member for Yarmouth, would have resulted in a saving of fifteen miles in distance and $250,000 in outlay. But the hon. gentleman insisted on having the county of Digby served. He should remember what his leader to-night stated, that all these appropriations, intended to serve counties in order to secure members' seats, were the grossest corruption, and should not be sanctioned by Parliament. His leader therefore charged that the action of the hon. gentleman was corruption of the grossest kind, which should not have been tolerated by any Parliament; yet the hon. gentleman acknowledges that he had the road diverted from a direct line in order that his county and particular seat should be cared for. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) says that the Local Government had no funds with which to subsidise railways, but they have been able to appropriate certain funds to that purpose in Nova Scotia. Where then did they get the money? The hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) says that everything that was done in the way of promoting railways in Nova Scotia was done by the Mackenzie Government. I go back to the assertion of the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) who says, respecting the Local Government subsidies, and I say that they got from the present Government the money with which they subsidised the railways.

Mr. VAIL. No.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes; go back to 1869, and you will find that Nova Scotia had no money to appropriate; but in that year they got over a million dollars from the leader of this Government. In 1873, they received more from the same source, and that is the money with which they subsidised the Eastern and Western Extension. The Mackenzie Government never gave them a dollar to enable them to subsidise railways.

Mr. KIRK. The Pictou and Truro Branch.

Mr. McLELAN. The Pictou and Truro Branch was built by the Local Government itself, and Mr. Mackenzie looked upon it as worthless property; he looked upon the whole Intercolonial Railway as worthless and wanted a company formed to take it off his hands, and he offered the Pictou and Truro Branch to any party who would undertake the construction of the eastern section. He never gave a dollar in cash. What did this Government do? They purchased the Eastern Extension at $1,250,000, they furnished a subsidy of $3,200 per mile, and last year or the year before they increased that subsidy again; thus, not only giving eighty miles of railway but large cash subsidies to extend the line east to Cape Breton. The hon. member for Guysboro' says we took an unfair advantage of the Local Government in obtaining the Pictou Branch. We only called upon the Local Government to fulfil the terms of the contract, we called upon them to show that the railway was properly equipped, and that they would not run it so as to be injurious to the people, by exacting undue tariff charges from those who would be compelled to use it. Under the original contract, a company built the Eastern Extension, and the Local Government were the parties who were appointed to see that the tariff was not unnecessarily high. When the Local Government stepped in and became the proprietors of that road, the Federal Government said: We must take the place of the Local Government, and see that an undue tariff is not imposed upon the people using that railway. The Local Government refused to agree to that, and they refused to equip the road in the way which we thought the interests of the country required. But, if they had acted up to the contract, and had equipped the road, we holding the right to regulate the tariff, they would have had the road without any difficulty. The hon. gentleman says that we have compelled them to give over the road. We did not want it, and they would have had it if they had run it in the interests of the people in the east.

Mr. VAIL. I do not desire to occupy the time of the House, but I must defend myself in a matter of this kind, because, when the Minister of Finance says that it is because of a divergence made by me that this road is not completed I tell him that he does not know what he is talking about. The road was originally to run to Digby, and it is between Annapolis and Digby that the gap occurs, and that is what I referred to. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman did not give us more information in reference to the Pictou road. I remember a discussion which took place in Nova Scotia, when the hon. gentleman stated that the road should have been carried to the town of Pictou and not to Fisher's Grant, and, if I had the documents here, I could read some very interesting literature to the House on the subject of the Pictou road. I could read some statements of the hon.

gentleman when he referred to the gentleman who was then leading the Government as having his hand in the public chest up to his elbow, and that he was really one of the contractors of the road and was making money out of the public treasury. I might refer to many of these things, but I will not do so. If the hon. member had pointed out to the House that he had recommended the building of this road, which is now going to cost the Dominion of Canada $300,000, instead of the other line, and that, if they had taken his advice, the Dominion would have saved $300,000, it would have been the correct thing. The Minister of Finance, in referring to what took place between the Dominion Government and the Local Government, is entirely mistaken, and has either forgotten what took place or has never taken the trouble to look into it. He says the Dominion Government did not require any more for the equipment of this road than the traffic required. I could show, in five minutes, from the documents in the Library, that the quantity of rolling stock which the Dominion Government required the Local Government to provide, was three times the quantity which was put upon that road by the Dominion Government themselves. The fact is, the Dominion Government determined from the first to keep the road out of the hands of the Local Government, and now I am afraid they are pursuing the same course in regard to an offer before the Local Government to finish the line between Annapolis and Digby. That is the honest way in which the Dominion Government has been acting towards the Local Government of Nova Scotia. As the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) said, they have never spent a dollar west of Halifax, and now it is proposed to build eighteen miles of railway into a town which has railway accommodation already, while, at the same time, they leave the rest of Nova Scotia, including Cape Breton, without railway accommodation. My hon. friend referred to my having carried this railway through Digby county in order to make political capital out of it. He also referred to the money we got in Nova Scotia in 1869. But we got no more from the Government at that time than Nova Scotia was entitled to according to her population. The fact is she did not get proper treatment in the first place, and the only reason for the amount granted to her in 1869 was to bring her up to the amount which had been apportioned to the other Provinces. Perhaps the granting of that money was of some advantage to the Minister of Finance. I would not like to say that he sold himself to the Government, but he certainly looked well after number one. He was made Commissioner of Railways, with a seat in the Senate at the same time, and profited as much by the transaction as did Nova Scotia.

Mr. IRVINE. I think the hon. gentlemen imagine that Nova Scotia is the hub of this country and that Pictou occupies a very important position. I want to change the discussion to New Brunswick. I do not desire personally to say a word against the Pictou Branch. I am not personally opposed to the town of Pictou. But I have to ask the question why Pictou has a better right to a road being subsidised than my county has. Do I not show as much independence as the hon. member for Pictou? Am I not as good as good looking a man? Are not my constituents as good as his? Why is my constituency left out and his road to the town of Pictou subsidised when that town is already served by a railway? The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue has been pleading for years and endeavoring to get the Government to give a subsidy to a road in New Brunswick, why does he not get it? Is it possible that the Minister of Inland Revenue has not as much influence with the Government as the member for Pictou? Or is it possible that the Government of the day are persuaded that the Minister of Inland Revenue is safe in his seat and that it does not require any expenditure from the Treasury to make that seat safe, while the seat of the hon. member for

Mr. VAIL,

Pictou is perhaps unsafe? I am not opposed at all to the Pictou Branch, but I would like to know upon what principle the Government of this country disburse the moneys which belong to the people of this country. I would like to know, so that I might get my share, for I am sure that the Government of the day, I am sure that my smiling friend the Minister of Customs, would not say that it was necessary for me to fall at the feet of the Government of the day, that it was not necessary for the county of Carlton to send a member to this House to serve the Government in order to get a share of the revenues of the country. The revenues of the country do not belong to the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches, they belong to every man, woman and child in the Dominion of Canada, and we want to know how they are distributed. I was very much struck by the crushing argument of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when he said to the member for Guysboro' that he would not object to have $300,000 expended in his county. Of course he would not. He is not a fool. I would not object to it myself. But how can the hon. member avoid being crushed by such an argument? The expenditure of that amount might help him in his election. I want to know upon what principle this money is distributed. I ask for the information. I would like to know, because I would like to apply on my own behalf, or on behalf of my constituents. I have made a declaration before that I am wholly and entirely opposed to the Government of this country subsidising one mile of local railways, it is contrary to the spirit and to the letter of the arrangement entered into at the first by the various members of this confederacy, and I say that it was never publicly stated in this House of Commons until 1883 that local railways would be subsidised, and when it was stated it was in my judgment one of the most humiliating days this country ever saw, when the floodgates of corruption were thrown open by the announcement of that policy of subsidising local railways. When I saw some members from New Brunswick suing for assistance for local railways, when I know that that assistance is simply a means used to corrupt hon. members and make them servile followers of the Administration, I think I have a right to protest against such a system. It is a system which is subversive of good government, it is a system which tends to destroy the independence of this country and of this House, it is a system which must end in ruin, it is a system which no honest Government would ever have introduced. I maintain, that if they receive money from the people of this country in the shape of revenue, that it should be divided upon a correct basis between the several members of this confederacy; but I maintain, as I have before, in the House and out of it, that no honest Government ever would have adopted the system that hon. gentlemen opposite have adopted since 1882. The money is not disbursed now in the interests of this country, but in the interests of servile followers of hon. gentlemen opposite. Do you tell me that the town of Pictou occupies a more prominent position than the town of Woodstock in the county of Carlton? Give me a reason why a line of railway should be subsidised into that town more than into my county? Give me a reason why you should subsidise the town of Pictou more than you should subsidise a railway to the plaster rocks in the constituency of the Minister of Inland Revenue, when he has been asking for subsidies for years. Then, again, reference has been made to the Intercolonial Railway, and I differ from the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his view of it. Whoever the building of that road may have benefited, it certainly has not benefited New Brunswick, for the reason that it was built where no sensible man would have built it. It was built contrary to the interests of a large portion of the people of this country, east and west. But it is well known that an arrangement was entered into before Confederation for the building of that road. Then, what has New Brunswick done since the road was constructed by the North Shore? New Brunswick had to build a line of railway out of her own means, subsidising a line in moneys and land, from St. John on the seaboard up to the boundary between Quebec and New Brunswick, to connect St. John with the railway system west. We were obliged to do that in our own defence. An arrangement was entered into for the construction of that road between the Province of Quebec and the Province of New Brunswick, and Quebec agreed to build her portion of it if New Brunswick would build to the boundary line. Our portion of it is built to Edmundston, but instead of the Province of Quebec finishing those eighty-six miles, as she agreed to do, this Dominion Government has come to her rescue and offered a subsidy of $6,400 a mile for that purpose. So, Sir, instead of having one line, we are to have three lines of railway competing with each other. When the Rivière du Loup line is built, that is to compete with the Intercolonial Railway; when we have subsidised the Short Line, that is to compete with the Intercolonial Railway. These hon. gentlemen who made such a blunder before, now come down and subsidise two more lines to compete with one they have already built; but there is a worse state of things than that. It is with shame that I refer to it; it gives me pain to refer to it. What is that, Mr. Chairman? It is simply this: I see before me the smiling countenance of the Minister of Railways; I am told he had an interest in this Short Line Railway, and what did the hon. gentleman do three years ago? Like a good man, like an hon. gentleman, the Government came to his rescue, and gave him $3,200 a mile for putting steel rails on a road that was already running.

The CHAIRMAN. You must not open up that discussion.

Mr. IRVINE. They have gone all over the world, and I am not worse than the rest. That hon. gentleman, it was said, put into his pockets $150,000 of the money belonging to the people of this country. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I named that act properly out of doors—it might not be proper for me to name it here—I would call it a mean swindle—that is what I would call it out of doors. That is a transaction an honest Government would not have done, and an honest party would not have sanctioned. I think the better way, Mr. Chairman, is to call everything by its right name. That was done to cover up something that was outside the line of honest conduct on the part of the Government, or on the part of an individual.

The CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. IRVINE. I admit, Sir, that this question is not properly before the Chair, but I have not gone a bit further than other hon. gentlemen. I have probably said enough. I do not think it makes much difference how much or how little is said in this House.

Mr. WIGLE. Then sit down.

Mr. IRVINE. I will sit down when I like. The hon. gentleman did not sit down when he made a declaration that he sat in this House all last year and took his pay, when he was out canvassing.

Mr. WIGLE. Do you want to discuss that?

Mr. IRVINE. You can discuss it, Sir. What I meant to say is that it does not make the slightest difference, for me or any other hon. gentleman, to speak in this House, because it is an acknowledged fact, I believe, that, no matter how eloquent a man may be, no matter how truthful he may be, or how logical he may be, no man has ever yet changed his opinions in this House. Hon. gentlemen vote at the ringing of the bell.

An hon. MEMBER. Speak for yourself.

Mr. IRVINE. There is no hon. gentleman in the House more servile than the hon. gentleman who said "Oh!" just now.

The CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman is out of order to say that any hon. gentleman is servile. I must ask him to withdraw the expression.

Mr. IRVINE. I will withdraw it, Sir, if you will mention the name of the gentleman to whom I referred. I did not mention any hon. gentleman's name. I do not know the hon. gentleman who said "Oh," but if you, Mr. Chairman, will mention his name, I will withdraw the expression. Certainly if I have violated any rule of order I must withdraw it, but not otherwise.

An hon. MEMBER. Withdraw.

Mr. IRVINE. Withdraw what, Sir?

An hon. MEMBER. Withdraw your presence.

Mr. IRVINE. I must say you are very kind to listen to me so long. I did not intend to say unpleasant things. Of course I wish to make this Parliament as pleasant as can be, so that hon. gentlemen may have smiling faces. I do not care to be addressing wry faces. I thank you for the kind manner in which you have borne with me.

Mr. KING. I have a few words to say with regard to this policy of subsidising branch lines of the Intercolonial Railway. I was pleased to-night when the Minister of Fisheries rose to his feet and gave his sanction in most unqualified terms to the proposition before the House. The Intercolonial Railway, as most members of this House know, is not confined to Nova Scotia, but it also traverses a large portion of the Province of New Brunswick. Very early after the completion of that road the people of New Brunswick felt that it would be in their interest to secure branch lines to connect them with the main line of railways, and an application was made to this Parliament for aid. The policy of the late Government was to assist branch lines, by giving old rails that were taken off the Intercolonial Railway. That policy, if I am not greatly mistaken, was opposed by the Conservative party in this House. But since that time, the business of constructing branch lines of the Intercolonial has been carried on to a large extent in the Province of New Brunswick, and to-day, we have no less than seven or eight lines of railway, varying from ten to 110 miles in length, connected with that road. Those branches have all been built by aid received from the Provincial Government and from private sources, with the exception of the small grant of $3,200 per mile, given to two or three of them. In the aggregate, the Province has built 300 miles of feeders to the Intercolonial. If the statements made to-night are anywhere near the mark, the whole amount of aid received for the 300 miles would not exceed that proposed to be given to these eighteen miles at Pictou. I shall be pleased to hear that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will see that justice is done to the Province of New Brunswick in future, and that in the construction of any further branch lines to the Intercolonial, the Province will be treated as well as the people of the town of Pictou are being treated in regard to the building of a branch line. We find the Dominion Government have given New Brunswick $3,200 per mile towards feeders to the Intercolonial; and yet this Pictou Branch can be regarded in no other light than as a branch of the Intercolonial. On what principles does the Government propose to deal with branch lines of the Intercolonial? There should be some settled policy so that in the Province of New Brunswick we should not be expected to build branch lines with the aid of $3,200 per mile while Pictou is receiving from $18,000 to $20,000 a mile for a branch railway. I was anxious to call the attention of the Minister of Marine to this phase of the subject as I am sure he will be prepared in the future to stand up for the rights of his Province as he should do. I might go further and say that this Government measure is opening a very wide door. The time is not far distant when the Province of New Brunswick will be able to claim that it should be recouped for all the expenditure it has made on feeders to the Intercolonial. If in the future it is to be the policy of the Government to build branch lines in Nova Scotia and pay the cost of operating them, while the people of New Brunswick have to contribute their private means and local funds for the construction of similar lines, the people of New Brunswick should know it. The Minister of Marine thinks the member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) has, to-night, given him a peg to hang his hat on. I know the hon. Minister found very great difficulty in reconciling some statements he made in regard to the Short Line Railway at his election, and one of the great cries at that election and at another election which occurred since was that the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake) had opposed the Short Line Railway. I have been in Parliament quite as long as the Minister of Marine and if the leader of the Opposition ever opposed the Short Line Railway I have yet to be satisfied on that point.

Mr. FOSTER. He voted against it.

Mr. KING. I recollect when the subject was first introduced, and if reference is made to Hansard it will be found that he said he was glad that the Tory party had at last come to their senses and were prepared to give the Maritime Provinces a short commercial line.

Mr. FOSTER. He spoke in favor of it and voted against it.

Mr. KING. The hon. gentleman does not need me to defend him, but if it were necessary I could do it. I might say that what he opposed was the whole scheme which proposed other subsidies than that of the Short Line, subsidies of the character asked to-night, and of course he had to vote against the whole. At the same time he spoke as I have mentioned, as will be found on reference to Hansard. So that charge cannot be laid at the door of the leader of the Opposition. It did service however in New Brunswick and I dare say it will do service again, and perhaps the remarks of the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) may be a satisfaction to the Minister of Marine. I think he will require all the advantage he can derive from them.

Bill reported.

Mr. POPE moved that the Bill be read the third time to-morrow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not satisfied with the explanations given, and I move that the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Amendment negatived.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12.10 a.m., Saturday.

Mr. KING.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 12th April, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 95) to incorporate the Victoria and Sault Ste. Marie Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

MAJOR-GENERAL MIDDLETON.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have received from Major-General Middleton a communication acknowledging the receipt of the resolutions adopted by this House on Friday, the 17th of July last, and expressing, on behalf of himself and his colleagues, their appreciation and thanks for the great honor done them by the said resolutions.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Mr. FOSTER, in moving for leave to introduce Bill (No. 96) respecting the Protection of Navigable Waters, said: The Bill is mainly an adaptation of the law as it at present exists, with some change in the verbiage, and two or three new sections, or parts of sections, added. To section 1 is added a sub-section defining the word "owner," making the owner of a vessel to mean the registered owner. Section 2 has in it an addition, to the end that if a vessel is wrecked, or sinks, or is lying in the course of a navigable water, the owner of it, as long as it remains there, shall place a signal by day and a light by night, to give notice of its position, so as to prevent danger to passing vessels. Section 3 empowers the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to place such signal and light, in default of the owner, or the person in charge of the vessel, doing so. Section 4 has little or no change—the change in it enabling the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to take out from the proceeds of the sale of such wreck or vessel, the expense which the Department has incurred in placing the signal or light. Then, in section 7, there is an amendment which adds "navigable waters" to "navigable streams," which is meant to protect them from sawdust, or rubbish, or other deleterious substances. The law, at present, simply has reference to navigable streams, but there are many bays that run up into the land, which are valuable for their fisheries; and mill rubbish, sawdust, or other deleterious substances being placed in them, makes the water injurious to fish. The amendments are also made for the purposes of navigation.

Mr. MILLS. How about vessels that are totally wrecked?

Mr. FOSTER. The law, as it at present exists, provides for the removal of the wreck either by the person or, in default of the person doing it, by the Government.

Mr. DAVIES. It does not touch the question of the construction of piers and wharves?

Mr. FOSTER. It does not. It is just to cover the channels of navigable streams.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. KIRK. Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the House, to a matter which has just come under my notice. I find, with respect to a debate which occurred on a motion moved by myself for papers and correspondence in regard to better terms in the Province of Nova Scotia, that this debate is published with interpolations and corrections under the official heading of the Debates of the House of Commons. This is done for the purpose of creating a false impression, and for the purpose of giving the authority of this House to that false impression. I have the paper here. It is under the official heading: "House of Commons Debates; Fourth Session, Fifth Parliament, 49 Victoria. Better terms to Nova Scotia. The insincerity of the Grits exposed. Only one from Ontario and one from Quebec in favor of better terms to Nova Scotia. The member for Guysboro' caught in his own trap by Cameron (Inverness) and McDougall (Cape Breton)." I do not complain at all of the report having been printed, but I have a right to complain that false statements of this character are made under the heading of the Official Debates of the House of Commons. The impression made here, or sought to be made, is that but one Grit from Ontario and one Grit from Quebec voted in favor of better terms, that all the rest of the Grits from all the Provinces voted against better terms; but it does not point out that every member of the Government, and every supporter of the Government, except a few supporters from Nova Scotia, voted against better terms also. I, therefore, complain that the Official Debates of the House are made to convey a false impression to the people of Nova Scotia in this regard. The division is also purported to be given, but it is not fully given, as it only gives the names of those who voted for the amendment of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), and the names of those who voted against it are suppressed in order to deceive the people.

Mr. SPEAKER. I presume the hon. member is not reading from the official report?

Some hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. KIRK. It purports to be the official report. It is under the heading of "House of Commons Debates."

An hon. MEMBER. On what date?

Mr. KIRK. 1st April.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is most improper to use the official reports of the debates to convey statements of this kind, and to have them printed by the parliamentary printers. It is most improper, I say, for the parliamentary printers to publish statements of this kind. I shall call the attention of the Chairman of the Hansard Committee to the fact. This paper purports to be a report—

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Does it not purport to be the speech of an hon. member?

Mr. SPEAKER. It purports to be the official report printed by the parliamentary printers of the House of Commons.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Is it not a speech of an hon. member?

Mr. SPEAKER. No; it is a most improper proceeding for any person to use the official titles in that way.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There is only this to be said: It has been perfectly well understood, ever since we had an official report, that any member could get a number of copies of his own speech printed in Hansard form from the parliamentary printers at a certain price. This appears to be the speech of an hon. member who obtained copies of his speech in the ordinary way, and sent them out in the ordinary way. This is done every day.

Mr. BÉCHARD. It is the practice, when an hon. member's speech is printed, to have it printed as it was spoken, and an hon. member assumes the responsibility of taking it from the official report of the House; but to have a speech published in the way this has been published is an outrage. You, Mr. Speaker, have stated that you will call the attention of the Chairman of the Debates Committee to this proceeding. I observe that the Chairman of the Committee is not in his place; but, as a member of that committee, I assure you, Sir, and this House, that the attention of the committee will be called to this proceeding.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I know, as an ex-member of the Debates Committee, that it is part of the contract with the parliamentary printers that copies of the speeches of members shall be supplied at a particular price. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) evidently got his speech printed in the ordinary way, as hon. members are doing every day.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. member cannot point to an instance of this kind that has previously occurred in connection with the Debates of this House. No man has put in his own views after the speech was delivered. It is a very common practice to have a number of copies struck off by members when Hansard is being printed for book form, but no one would pretend to insert anything but what has been stated in this House.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). That is what has been said.

Mr. VAIL. It has a different heading. It contains statements at variance with the facts, and it really suppresses what is the truth in regard to the vote which was taken.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I suppose the question is really one for the Debates Committee and not for the House at all. I would not have spoken except for the circumstance that the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), in the course of his statement, gave a very strange version as to what took place in the House. He said every member of the Government voted against better terms to Nova Scotia. There was no such question before the House. There was a question put to the House by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) as to whether certain papers should be brought down to the House or not. An amendment was moved expressing the opinion of the House upon the repeal of a certain clause of a statute. The resolution would not have effected the repeal, and I preferred to vote for the hon. member's own motion to bring down the papers, although he did not want to vote for it himself. No one voted against better terms.

Mr. KIRK. That is the very thing of which I complain. It is not I who say that every member of the Government, and those who support them, except the few members from Nova Scotia, voted against better terms. The heading of this paper points out that every Grit except two voted against better terms. I pointed out the fact that if they did so, every member of the Government, and every member supporting the Government, did the same thing. But that paper is misleading, it is intended to deceive, and the printers of the Official Debates of the House are made the instruments of impressing upon the minds of the people that such votes were given in the House; and all this was done for the purpose of deceiving the people.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) did exactly the same with respect to his speech on the Riel debate. I find that report has the imprint of MacLean, Roger & Co., Parliamentary Printers, Wellington St., Ottawa.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No.

Mr. KIRK. This is not only a speech delivered by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), but it purports to give also my speech. Whether this is done correctly or not I do not know; but I have good reason to believe that my own remarks have been changed from those which were delivered.

Mr. SPEAKER. I shall call the attention of the Hansard Committee to the matter, and allow them to adopt a rule in future as to whether hon. members shall be allowed to circulate speeches prepared in this manner, and whether it is the proper practice.

Mr. BOWELL. The only difference between those two speeches that this House or the committee would have to consider, is, as to whether gentlemen delivering speeches in this House should be permitted to take another gentleman's speech and the published proceedings as found in the official report of the Debates, and circulate them amongst his constituents or anywhere else, or whether he is to be permitted simply to do as Mr. Cameron has done, put at the head of his speech the words "Speech of Mr. Cameron, M.P., on the subject of the execution of Louis Riel," or whether he should be allowed to state in the way of a preface—or whatever you might choose to call it—what is in those speeches.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. BOWELL. Is not that the question before the House? I am only putting the position of the matter, and what are hon. gentlemen contradicting? I simply ask the question, whether a gentleman is to be permitted to use the official name of the printers to any speech he may circulate, or whether he may be permitted in addition to show at the head of it what the report contains. The question is, if he puts such words as I have read at the head and follows immediately with the official report, as he finds it in the Hansard, is he to be permitted to do that, with the name of the official printers added to it? There certainly can be no objection to his putting what he pleases to what he delivers in his speech indicating what it contains, providing he does not put at the bottom the names of the official printers.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Put what he finds in the speech.

Mr. BOWELL. I said nothing about that.

Mr. BÉCHARD. Provided it does not appear as being the official report of the House, because then it would be misleading.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). My speech has been referred to, but it is precisely as it was printed, and there is put at the head of it this heading: "Speech of M. C. Cameron on the execution of Louis Riel." But this other gives a false impression; a false impression lies on the face of it, because it gives to the world these words as the utterances of Parliament, printed by the parliamentary printers: "Better terms for Nova Scotia—The insincerity of the Grits exposed—Only one from Ontario and one from Quebec in favor of better terms for Nova Scotia—The member for Guysboro' caught in his own trap by Cameron (Inverness) and McDougall (Cape Breton)." Yet we find that a Minister of the Crown, the Minister of Interior, justifies that proceeding; it is quite the proper thing, from his point of view. I say it is a scandal on Parliament and on the Printing Committee to allow it to be done, and I challenge him to point to another instance giving such a false impression, giving such a document with a false garb lying on the face of it, and apparently with the sanction of Parliament and the Queen's printers; and the hon. gentleman thinks that is right.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I desire to give a word of explanation. I am responsible for the heading on the Hansard, if it be the Hansard, for I went into the printing office and gave them that heading. There is not a word in that heading which is either misleading or unfair to any person.

Mr. Kirk.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). The hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) endeavored to mislead the people of the Province of Nova Scotia to believe that they could secure better terms for Nova Scotia if the party at present in power were defeated. My object was to show that better terms for that Province were not favored in this House, and that for many years previously we had repeatedly passed through the ordeal of endeavoring to secure them better terms. I showed that any concessions made to Nova Scotia were made by the party now in power in this House.

Mr. KIRK. Is this in order?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes; the hon. gentleman is in order, as this matter was referred to in the discussion.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I spoke with regard to the better terms for Nova Scotia; I showed the insincerity of the Grits, the speeches of whom are published here; I gave them the whole discussion; I gave them the whole division—

Mr. KIRK. No, no.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). The whole division of those who supported better terms is given here, and the object was to let the people of the Province of Nova Scotia see how many members of this Parliament would concede any better terms to that Province than they had already received. There is not a word changed by me nor by the Hansard people, so far as I know. But for the heading I am responsible, and I have as much right to put a heading to this as the great leader of the Opposition to put on his speech such a heading as this: "Ministers on trial—Was the execution of Riel necessary or proper—Mr. Blake's great judgments—Delivered in the House of Commons of Canada on the 19th of March, 1886."

Mr. LANDERKIN. And where printed?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I say that the heading of my speech is equally as honest, equally as fair, and it gives the whole discussion on the question. But is that done in this case? It is not intended to mislead anyone in connection with that discussion, or to refuse fair play to opponents; the whole discussion is given, and the people of the Province of Nova Scotia who will read it, will find that nothing but justice was done. Here is another speech with a heading, and who authorised this heading?—"House of Commons Debates—Speech of Mr. Wilfred Laurier, M.P., on the Riel question, delivered in the House of Commons, at Ottawa, March 16th, 1886." There is the official heading, "House of Commons Debates." I say that that is exactly a parallel case, and yet we find hon. gentlemen opposite clamoring just because we have been following their example. But that is the policy they have always pursued ever since I have had a seat in this House; it is a policy which has kept them in a minority and will in future leave them in a more miserable minority than they are now.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman may have succeeded in deceiving himself into believing that a document purporting to be printed at a private printing office purports, in any sense, to be official, in the same sense as one which purports to come from the Queen's Printer and has the official heading of the Debates of this House. A member who goes to the Free Press office, or to the Citizen, or the Montreal Gazette, or any other office, can print what he likes and give what heading he likes. The speeches of the Hon. Mr. Blake and of Mr. Laurier, to which he refers, were printed at private printing offices; they did not profess to be the official reports; but the speech of the hon. member for Inverness, under the guise of an official report—

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No.

Mr. DAVIES. Yes; it is headed: "House of Commons Debates, 4th Session, 5th Parliament;" and at the end it is stated: "Printed by MacLean, Roger & Co., Parliamentary Printers." It is printed in a form to deceive, and with the object of deceiving.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I do not think the hon. gentleman should state it was printed with the object of deceiving.

Mr. DAVIES. I said printed with the object of deceiving—not by the hon. gentleman; we are talking of the printing by the printers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DAVIES. If the hon. gentleman has stated here that he did not intend to deceive anybody by the document, we accept his statement. But does the hon. gentleman mean to say that there are not hundreds and thousands of people who, reading that report, would believe it to be the proper official report.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). So it is.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) says, "so it is." Does he mean to say that the words: "The insincerity of the Grits exposed" is part of the official report?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No, they are not.

Mr. DAVIES. It is under the official heading "House of Commons Debates, 4th Session, 5th Parliament." Then it says: "Only one from Ontario and one from Quebec in favor of better terms for Nova Scotia." In the first place the statement is not true—

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It is true.

Mr. DAVIES. In the next place, it is printed under the guise and form of the official report, and this document, which is so calculated to deceive, has the imprimatur of a Minister of the Crown—the Minister of the Interior—who says it is all right. Well, that may be his idea of party exigencies, but it is not mine.

THE NORTH-WEST DISTURBANCE—RECOGNITION OF SERVICES.

Mr. ROSS asked, Is it the intention of the Government to recognise in a suitable manner the services rendered by teamsters and other non-combatants in the various engagements during the late North-West rebellion?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The teamsters have been paid for their services. They were not enrolled in the militia. All who were enrolled in the militia are entitled to land grants.

Mr. ROSS asked, Is it the intention of the Government to issue scrip to the Prince Albert Volunteers?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This corps was organised by the North-West Mounted Police and maintained under their control, and as such they were not entitled to land grants. The advisability of giving them land grants is now being considered by the Government.

Mr. ROSS asked, Do the Government propose to pension the volunteers wounded at the Duck Lake fight?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. These claims are also now under the consideration of the Government.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to recognise the services of any of the non-combatants who participated in the field operations in the North-West, by grants of scrip or land similar to those granted the enrolled volunteers then on service?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That question has been already answered by the answer I gave to my hon. friend.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). That did not cover all cases. This question asks if it is intended to recognise the services of any of the non-combatants?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The non-combatants who were enrolled are entitled to land scrips. The cases of those who served without being regularly enrolled are now being considered by the Government.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—AGREEMENT WITH NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. EDGAR) asked, Did the Canadian Pacific Railway Company enter into any agreement with the lessees of the Northern Pacific Railway providing for through rates and fares and proper traffic arrangements as required by the agreement of 12th April, 1884, under which the Government granted the subsidy of $12,000 per mile for the construction of the railway from Gravenhurst to Callander? If such agreement has not been executed, why has it not been done?

Mr. POPE. No such agreement has been entered into. It was provided by the contract that "this clause shall have no effect unless the Canadian Pacific Railway Company shall, within six months from this date, enter into such an agreement." There has been no agreement.

PIER AT FATHER POINT.

Mr. GAULT asked, Is it the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates for the erection of a deep-water pier at Father Point?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Petitions from ship owners, especially steamship owners, have lately been presented to the Government on this matter; and it is now engaging the attention of the Government. I do not know what will be the decision.

LOTS ON LACHINE CANAL BASINS.

Mr. GAULT asked, Is it the intention of the Government to lease, by auction or otherwise, the lots on the Basins in the Lachine Canal? And, if so, when is the sale likely to take place?

Mr. POPE. It is the intention of the Government to lease the lots on the Lachine Canal Basins very soon. I think perhaps the advertisement has been issued.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY EXPENDITURE.

Mr. HOLTON asked, By what amount has the expenditure on account of the Geological Survey during the present financial year exceeded the sum voted for that purpose, and how has such deficit been provided for?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is impossible to state exactly by what amount the expenditure on account of the Geological Survey during the present financial year exceeds the sum voted for that purpose until the close of the financial year. It is, however, estimated that the amount will be about $18,400, which amount has been provided by Governor General's warrant. I ought to say, however, as has been explained to me by Dr. Dawson, that the payments properly chargeable to former years, but which have been going over from year to year and made in the present financial year, will amount to about $18,700, so that I fancy the expenditure of the present year will be about equal to the estimate.

THE CASE OF LOUIS RIEL—PETITIONS FROM PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. HACKETT (for Mr. TASCHEREAU) asked, Whether the Dominion received from any of the Provincial Governments a petition asking that the sentence pronounced against Louis Riel should not be carried out?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). No.

SAVINGS BANKS DEPOSITS.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. MULLOCK) asked, What is the aggregate amount of deposits amounting in each case to $1,500, or upwards, on deposit, on the 1st of January, 1886, in the Government Savings Banks and Post Office Savings Banks, respectively?

Mr. McLELAN. It is impossible to give an answer to this question without an enormous amount of labor, as all the accounts would have to be examined. The returns are completed only up to the 30th of June, 1885, which we could give with some considerable labor; but there are no monthly or quarterly returns made up, by which we could give an answer to the question without going through 400,000 or 500,000 accounts.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. MULLOCK) asked, What is the aggregate amount of deposits amounting in each case to $1,000, or upwards, on deposit, on the 1st of January, 1886, in the Government Savings Banks and Post Office Savings Banks, respectively?

Mr. McLELAN. The answer is the same.

FACTORY LEGISLATION.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. MULLOCK) asked, Is it the intention of the Government during the present Session to introduce a Factory Act, or any legislation affecting the employment of labor in manufactories?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The matter has been brought recently to the attention of the Government by some correspondents, but a conclusion has not yet been reached about it.

REPENTIGNY WHARF EXPENDITURE.

Mr. HURTEAU asked, What is the amount expended for the work of excavation done at Repentigny, with a view to the construction of a wharf? Has an estimate been made of the work required to finish the same? Is it the intention of the Government to complete the work? If so, when?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount which has been expended on this work is $1,050. To complete it to a depth of nine feet of water will require a further expenditure of $5,000.

CENTRAL BOARD OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in organising the Central Board of Agriculture, to appoint, in conjunction with the entomologists already appointed, a French entomologist capable of meeting more effectually the wants of all the farmers of the Dominion?

Mr. CARLING. There is no Central Board named at present; but should the Government decide to appoint one, the party referred to will have every consideration.

FREE EXPORT OF LUMBER.

Mr. IVES asked, Does the Government intend to obtain power at the present Session to permit the export of saw logs and other lumber free from export duty, in case the proposed tariff changes in the United States should become law admitting sawn lumber free from duty when imported from countries not collecting an export duty on logs or lumber?

Mr. McLELAN. That is being considered by the Government.

HALF-BREED CLAIMS.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved for:

Return giving the report of Matthew Ryan and J. M. Machar, the commissioners who were appointed to investigate the half-breed claims to land in the North-West in the year 1877.

He said: I see by the return brought down, in reply to a motion of last Session, that these gentlemen were appointed to investigate the claims of the half-breeds in either 1876 or 1877. The claims of the half-breeds were known and duly considered by the Government of that day, who were alive to the importance of the matter. They appointed a commission, which, I presume, reported in 1877 or 1878. I would like to see their report, as no doubt it will furnish a vast amount of information, and tend to show the people that the Government of that day was alive to its duty.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There was no formal report, but they sent down several memorandums and lists, which will be brought down, with any remarks that may be attached to them.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST FLYING COLUMN.

Mr. WATSON moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Government officials in Manitoba or the North-West Territories, or any other person or persons, concerning or relating to the proposed despatching of a military expedition into the Territories, with a view of preserving the peace, or for any other purpose.

He said: Some time ago it was stated that the Government intended sending out a flying column to the North-West. I think, in the first place, a great mistake was made in proposing to send out such an expedition. If the Government intended to increase the forces, the increase should be a permanent one. The Government have, however, I believe since made up their minds not to send the flying column; and, inasmuch as they made a mistake in proposing to send it and in informing the Indians, through Mr. Dewdney, that it would be sent—Mr. Dewdney asking the Indians to make preparations to receive the column quietly and give no grounds for any disturbance—now the effect of this column not going will be to disturb the Indians. The Indians are now of opinion that the Government are afraid to send out the column. It is always a great mistake on the part of the Government to make any proposition of this nature and not carry it out. I would suggest that before the Government come to any decision in a matter of this kind, they should consider it wisely, and not first publish their intention to the Indians and then fail to carry it out. I therefore move that all correspondence in connection with this matter be laid on the Table.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am quite sure the hon. gentleman will join with the Government in congratulating the country upon the fact that it became unnecessary to send out the column. The facts indicated to the Government convinced us that the flying column was not required. It was the duty of the Militia Department to be prepared for any possible emergency, and the column, had it been required, could have been sent at a very short notice, as it could be sent to-morrow. But I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman in considering it advisable to bring down the information which came to the Government, and upon which the Government acted, in taking the necessary measures to have a flying column ready in case of necessity. A good deal of this information is of a strictly confidential character, and I do not consider that now, when the country knows that it is no longer considered necessary to take any further measures for the protection of the North-West, it would be advisable to produce papers, the production of which might have a bad effect in many cases. A good deal of information is communicated by people living in that district, and who considered they were fulfilling their duty to the Government by putting the Government in possession of any facts which might be of use in arriving at a conclusion as to the measure of protection required. It would not be advisable to give the names of these people who have to live in the North-West Territory, and their communications. I do not consider it advisable, therefore, to bring down the papers the hon. gentleman requires.

Mr. WATSON. I think we should insist upon the papers being placed before the House, as it has been said repeatedly by members in this House that residents in the North-West Territory were the cause of exciting the Indians and half-breeds, and were thus partly the cause of the rebellion. Now, I think if there are any charges of that kind to be made, if there are any men living in the Territories who have communicated such information to the Government, their names ought to be made known, and those gentlemen ought to be dealt with. It is unfair that a large number of people in the North-West should be accused of rebellious sentiments, should be accused as traitors to the country, and those who give information that they are not willing to back up by having their names made public, should be exposed. I think, for the very reason given by the hon. gentleman, this correspondence should be laid before the House. It is well known that for the past year such charges have been made in this House by supporters of the Government against people in the North-West, and it is unfair that all the residents of that country should lie under this stigma. I do not know of any white men in the North-West who are more rebellious, probably, than the parties who gave this information to the Government, and the chances are that if the names of these parties are laid before this House, they will be found to be men who expected to get a little more plunder out of the Government by transporting these troops, and furnishing them with supplies. I know myself that men have been waiting around Ottawa and lobbying here in an endeavor to obtain contracts for furnishing transport and supplies to a flying column to be sent to the North-West, and I think the names of those men ought to be made public. In the first place I think the names of those who started the movement of having this expedition sent out, should be laid before this House. I may say that the stockmen living at Fort Macleod discussed this matter, and were strongly opposed to a flying column visiting that country and I believe that any gentleman who may have informed the Government that it was necessary to send a flying column in the first place was himself not very well posted. Any person living in the North-West must know that the Indians have little regard or fear of a flying column, or any body of men travelling through that country in order to make a little bit of show. If they were sincere in wanting more protection for that country they would have asked for a permanent force or an increase in the Mounted Police. For these reasons the House should be made acquainted with all the facts in connection with this flying column, and the correspondence should be laid before the House whereon the Government based their proposition to do so.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I agree with my colleague on my left that these papers should not be published. I think the hon. gentleman cannot have realised the position of the parties who may have informed the Government from time to time of the state of feeling in the Territories, and outside, amongst the half-breeds and the Indians. The hon. gentleman should see at once that if officials and others have been employed by the Government to obtain information from various quarters, it would be improper to make their names public. Therefore, their communications must be considered privileged, must be considered confidential, and ought not to be brought down. That has been the usual practice under similar circumstances. The hon. gentleman, in saying that the Government did finally decide that there should be no flying column sent out to the North-West, evidently believes that we made that decision after carefully weighing and considering all the information that was brought to the Government. We have saved the country a large expense in that way, and I think the House, as well as the country, will see that the Government were perfectly right in what they did. Of course, I know it may be a matter of curiosity to have the names of certain parties who might be compromised, but, on the whole, I think the weight of prudence is against communicating those papers to the public.

Mr. WATSON. I do not see why we should not have the information that has been given by public officials—for instance, a communication from Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney cannot be considered as confidential. Of course, when the Government say that there are papers that are strictly confidential we are bound to accept their explanation; but there must be some public documents in connection with the matter.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman must see himself that Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney was not in a position to go and seek for information himself; he had to employ people to do that, and in reporting to the Government he must have reported the names of those parties, their statements, and so on. Therefore, those communications are in the same position as those of other parties.

Motion negatived.

ASSISTED IMMIGRATION.

Mr. WILSON moved for:

Return showing the total number of assisted immigrants, and the total number of unassisted immigrants who entered Canada in each month of the calendar year 1885; such statement to show how many of such immigrants were skilled artisans, unskilled artisans, farm laborers and domestic servants, and the amount paid towards assisted passages to each of said classes of immigrants during said year.

He said: In moving this resolution, I desire to call the attention of the House to the manner in which we have been expending money for immigration purposes. While I am quite willing that any reasonable amount should be expended for this purpose, I am certainly not of opinion that at the present time we ought to incur any more liability for the purpose of bringing immigrants to Canada, where, it is admitted by all who have an opportunity of knowing, the labor market is already overstocked. I would hesitate to say a single word against the utility of any country obtaining as great a population as possible. I believe we have in this country useful and valuable citizens who have been brought out here as immigrants from the Old Country; and while I cheerfully recognise their merits, I feel at the same time that we ought to consider seriously whether our Immigration Bureau is performing services that are really useful to the country. I am well aware that for the last year a smaller amount has been expended on immigration purposes than in the previous year. I am also perfectly aware that the present Minister of Agriculture, in his perambulations through the country, has taken the opportunity to address public meetings where he has displayed an ability and an eloquence beyond what we had previously supposed him to possess. But I ask you, Mr. Speaker, did he take a straightforward course, that honest course a Minister of the Crown ought to have taken when he was before these public audiences, and tell them plainly that, although not a very large amount was paid directly in the way of assisted passages, yet a large sum indeed was being expended for immigration purposes. That is one reason why I complain of him, and I complain further that he should take an opportunity of writing to the various labour organisations letters which, if they were intended to mean anything, were intended to mislead public opinion in regard to what the Government were doing. A Minister of the Crown ought to be fair and honest with the whole country; he ought not, under any circumstances, to convey a misleading impression to those to whom he writes. Although I should feel that the hon. gentleman was doing a proper duty if he was bringing out a reasonable number of immigrants for the amount of money expended, his letter should show that the Government were expending a large amount for immigration purposes and thereby overstocking to a great extent the already overstocked labor market of Canada. We find that his policy in reference to these labor organisations is quite different from the policy announced by his predecessor, the present Minister of Railways. That gentleman's doctrine seems to have been that these labor organisations were of no avail, but the present Minister has roused himself from the lethargy of the previous Minister, and thinks it is necessary to conciliate these labor organisations and to claim that he has always been in sympathy with them. Wherein has he ever shown that sympathy for the laborers of this country? Wherein has he ever displayed his interest in the welfare of the labor organisations or the laboring classes? Do we not all know that, day in and day out, year in and year out, the course of this Government has been to enhance the cost of everything which these men require for their maintenance? But, when the hon. gentleman placed his hand to the pen, he said he had always been in favor of those organisations. Unless I read his letter, you would hardly imagine that such a letter had been written to these organisations, so I will read it and it will speak for itself. I might imagine that his idea was to mislead these organisations, but I will give him the benefit of the doubt, and suppose that he was ignorant of his Department, having so lately taken charge of it, and that he was crammed by some official of that Department, and that, in consequence, this letter was sent out. There is a labor organisation in the town that I have the honor to represent: it is called the Knights of Labor. At that place there is a good Conservative who was rather concerned as to the reports which were in circulation in reference to the amounts that had been expended for immigration purposes, and I suppose that, among other things, he thought it was necessary to keep the faithful within the fold satisfied that the present Government was doing nothing but what was in the interests of the country, and thereby get as many votes for itself as possible. So I find in the St. Thomas Times, the hon. gentleman's organ, one that praised him so highly when he paid a visit to our constituency not long ago, and showed that the Government was in a very prosperous condition, that everything was progressing admirably, and said that he was most enthusiastically received there, the following is the letter:—

"THE GOVERNMENT'S POLICY ON THE QUESTION OF ASSISTED PASSAGES.

"Mr. A. B. Ingram, Vice-President of the Trades and Labor Council, St. Thomas, Ont.:—

As I have already said, the hon. gentleman has an interest in these councils now; he has an interest in their votes, and he thinks it will not be proper to do anything to weaken his position in that view.

Mr. WILSON.

"DEAR SIR.—I have to acknowledge your letter of the 5th instant, in which you refer to my remarks in my address to the people of Dunnville,"—

It appears that our friend has been at Dunnville also as a missionary, and has done something there.

"as reported in the Mail, on the subject of the relations between trade and labor councils and immigration, as encouraged by the Dominion Government. You are quite right in supposing that my sympathies are with an object having in view the protection of the interests of workingmen."

Mr. CARLING. Hear, hear.

Mr. WILSON. My hon. friend says "hear, hear." That is all he has ever done for them, to say "hear hear." I would like to see a little more work and a little less "hear, hear." It would be more beneficial for these labor organisations.

"But I have noticed that some of their utterances in relation to immigration, and especially in so far as it is encouraged by the Dominion Government, have been erroneous."

You see he is very much concerned. He has heard the rumor. He has heard somewhat of the rumbling, and it was hard on the Government; so he says:

"For instance, it is erroneous to assert as has been done, that any policy or act of the Government of late years has had for effect to bring out artisans or workmen of any sort to compete with those of this country, and so cause a glut in the labor market, thereby lessening the rate of wages. I find, also, that what is called the 'assisted passage' has been greatly misunderstood and also misrepresented. The passage is not 'assisted' to the individual in the manner commonly alleged; but it is simply an arrangement affected with certain steamship companies, by which a cheapened or reduced rate of passage is afforded to agricultural laborers, families of agricultural laborers and female domestic servants, which is paid by them and not by the Government. The rate is, moreover, strictly confined to the classes named by special regulations made by the steamship companies, and none others can obtain it, except by double fraud; that is, first, by a fraud of declaration on the part of the intending emigrant himself, in which he is required to specify what he is and where he has worked; and, second, by a fraud in the certificate of a minister of religion or magistrate as to the good faith and truth of the declaration made. And, even as respects the class of general laborers, when it was seen more than a year ago that the Canadian Pacific Railway and other public works would cease to afford employment for many thousands of men engaged in their construction, special instruction was sent home to prevent this class from obtaining the advantage of the cheapened or so called 'assisted' passage, and comparatively few of this class have come, as compared with former years."

I will agree with him that comparatively few immigrants have come, compared with former years:

"Very few mechanics have come to Canada. If we take the test of the port of Quebec, where alone there is a registration of trades and callings, and where, with the exception of a few at Halifax, all emigrants holding cheapened tickets. I have, however, reason to believe that many of those who came successfully changed their callings and became agriculturists. There are many cases of this kind in the North-West. As regards agricultural laborers and female domestic servants, I find from the reports of all the Dominion agencies that there has been a steady and unsatisfied demand for this kind of labor, and I find the same fact very strongly reported by the Bureau of Industries of the Ontario Government last year."

In passing, I may state that I will have reason to refer to that further on, but I will state that I have carefully looked over these reports, and find them just the opposite of what the hon. gentleman represents:

"I confine my letter simply to meeting the facts in issue, without dwelling on any question of needs or advantages of increase of population, especially in the North-West, where there is a vast unoccupied country to fill up, or without dwelling on the fact, immigrants have brought as much as $8,000,000 of money or money's worth into Canada in a single year.

"Believe me, etc., (Signed) "JOHN CARLING.

"OTTAWA, 16th February."

The House will observe by this letter that its whole tone would have a tendency to mislead those who perused it, and it did not give that information which the people really desired. But I believe in the intelligence of the members of those organisations, and my confidence that they are not so easily misled as to be betrayed by a letter of this kind. The hon. gentleman tried to convey the impression that none but agricultural laborers and domestic servants were being assisted by the present Government, a statement which is entirely erroneous. Had not that hon. gentleman, at the time the letter was written, seen reports of the various speeches delivered by Sir Chas. Tupper in England, in which he held out strong inducements to the people of that country to come to Canada where they could improve their condition and could obtain full employment? Was there not before his eyes at the time the speech made by Sir John A. Macdonald? Not only so; but has not the hon. gentleman been a member of the Government sufficiently long to know that the various guide books scattered broadcast in the Old Country contain advertisements declaring that the Government granted assisted passages to emigrants to the Dominion of Canada? Did he not know at the very time the letter was written that the Beaver line of steamships were publishing an advertisement, stating distinctly that arrangements were in force with the Government, by which assisted passages were provided for emigrants to Canada? With all those facts before him, and ample data to which he might have had recourse, I say that letter was not such a letter as should have been written. But I suppose the hon. gentleman has changed his views, or the Government have changed their views since last Session in regard to the course they intend to take in connection with the various labor organisations. We had the matter under discussion when the Estimates were before the House in 1885. A discussion took place at that time as to the propriety of expending so much money, as was being expended during that year. The then Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Pope) said:

"Hon. gentlemen opposite may sneer at the men who have come out to this country, and talk about labor unions. Are we going to adopt the policy because the labor unions say so? No. Ours will be a better and a broader policy, one I believe which the country requires. Although there may be in Montreal and Toronto some labor unions, I am satisfied to appeal to the common sense of the farmers who want laborers and who will not believe in the nonsense of pandering to a set of men in towns."

I ask if the labor unions of 1865 did not ask that a less sum of money be voted for immigration purposes; and yet the then Minister of Agriculture stated that it would be pandering to the unions to reduce the amount. Although the hon. gentleman's predecessor announced his intention of resisting their demands, the present Minister comes this year and asks for a less grant by $100,000 for immigration purposes? Who is pandering now? If it was wrong for the Government to reduce the grant a year ago, is it not wrong to do so to-day? The state of the labor market a year ago was very similar to what it is at the present time; and I ask this House whether it does not appear, judging from that letter and from the manner in which the Minister comes before the House this year to ask for a less grant, he is not pandering to the labor unions? I have every confidence in those labor unions. I have no hesitation in saying here that they have rights and those rights should be conceded by the people to them as the rights are conceded to any other class, and while we have been protecting year after year all the other classes, the labor classes have been systematically ignored and everything possible has been done to render their position more unsatisfactory. In view of the large amount expended for immigration purposes we ought to have had a reasonable return for that expenditure. I ask even the Government if they are prepared to declare to the House that they are fully satisfied with the results of their immigration policy. Let us look at the increase of population during the last eight or ten years and at the amount which has been expended for immigration purposes. We find that the increase of population has been hardly equal to what we ought to have had by our normal increase, and that the men we have brought from the older countries to Canada must have displaced a similar number of our citizens and compelled them to go to another country. I am perfectly well aware that if I should say that in various counties a large number of the people have left Canada and gone to the United States, the cry would be raised that I was disparaging our own country. If it be disparaging the country to tell the truth, I am perfectly willing to meet the charge. I know whereof I speak, and I am able to say that in the county which I have the honor to represent a very large number of the people have left and gone to Dakota and other parts of the United States, and at that very time we were making a large expenditure for immigration purposes. I might refer to the number of people who have left Canada and gone to the United States, and show where they have gone, and show that all that time the Government were quite indifferent to the fact, and continued to spend money for immigration purposes lavishly. I can quite understand that there are a large number of the newspapers supporting hon. gentlemen opposite that require subsidies. There was nothing more convenient than to make large appropriations for immigration purposes and devote a large part of the money to pay a number of those newspapers. We have for instance, my hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture, who has an organ in the city of London, the Free Press, which does yeoman work for the hon. gentleman and always supports him and his Government. It is always ready to say a good word for him, because we find that in 1884-85 something over $10,000 was granted to that paper for printing and advertising. If you go to Montreal you will find there another paper, with which, of course, no one in this House, no one connected with the Government, has anything to do. An appropriation was necessary to be kept up, and so that little paper, the Montreal Gazette, with which of course no member of the Government has anything to do, directly or indirectly, received, according to the Auditor-General's report, between $6,000 and $8,000 for immigration purposes, though, of course, it may have received other sums outside of that. But this much has paid that paper for advertising and printing pamphlets giving information to people in Canada and abroad. Other papers have received large sums for similar purposes. We find that a much larger amount was expended for printing and advertising than there is admitted to have been expended on account of assisted passages.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should not refer to questions other than the subject of his motion, namely, the question of assisted passages.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly I do not wish in any way to trespass on the rules of the House. My object is to show that the number of immigrants we have brought out to this country is not at all in proportion to the expenditure we have made for immigration purposes. I have no hesitation in saying that, considering the condition of the labor market as well as the financial condition of the Dominion, it is no longer in the interests of Canada that we should keep up this expenditure, and I for one will be prepared to vote that we expend no further sums for immigration purposes. I hope the Government will reconsider their determination and will deal with the matter with a view to the requirements of the country and the actual condition of the labor market. They will find, if they look at the reports of the Province of Ontario, that both as to agricultural laborers and skilled artisans the market is overrun. I therefore ask for this information so that we may be able to see, when the Estimates are before us, whether it is in the interests of this country that we should make further appropriations for immigration purposes.

Mr. JACKSON. We were told last year by the Minister of Agriculture that there would be a large reduction in the expenditure for immigration, and there was last year a reduction in the estimate of $150,000. In looking at the report of the Auditor-General, however, we find that about half a million of dollars was expended for that purpose. The amount for assisted immigration was $423,860; quarantine, $54,000; and then if we take the various items for repairing and building immigrant sheds at Point Lévis, Port Arthur, Emerson, Qu'Appelle, Calgary, Brandon, Medicine Hat and other places, it brings the total up to nearly the round sum I have mentioned. The Minister stated that the number of immigrants who had come to this country last year was 79,000. The Secretary of his Department, Mr. Low, stated that over 22,000 of those were Canadians who had returned from the United States, so that the actual number of immigrants we have received is reduced to 57,000, of whom only 7,240 went to the North-West Territories, according to the report of the Minister. That is a very small number considering the sum of money we have expended to bring them here. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) stated a short time ago that, taking the census of 1881 and the census of the North-West Territories taken last year, which, according to the Minister, was 125,000 for Manitoba and 48,000 for the North-West, there was a discrepancy of 103,000 to be accounted for. The hon. member for South Brant asked where those people had gone. Now, Sir, I will try to show where they have gone. The Canadians who have gone into the United States have formed themselves into what are called Canadian-American societies, and these societies are to be found in many of the larger cities of the Union. The Canadians in the various States report themselves to those societies, by which they can ascertain their number and render mutual assistance. The Chicago Times of February 23rd, 1886, contains a statement made to one of these societies, in which occurs the following:—

"Canadians claim that the population of the Dominion is at present 5,000,000. This is not a very large number of inhabitants for a country of such a vast territorial extent, especially when it is remembered that the Government there has during the past ten years expended large sums to assist immigration; but, in view of the surprisingly large Canadian element to be met with in the northern portion of the United States, one finds an explanation for the discouragingly small population which has all along, and still continues to exist in Canada. If Canadian statesmen are at a loss to understand how it is that with all their efforts and expenditures to secure settlers from European countries, the increase from all sources in the Dominion during the past ten years has not much exceeded half a million, let them turn to published official and other reliable statistics in this country, and they will receive some important instruction. They will discover that there are now living in the north-eastern States more than 750,000 persons—native Canadians—who have settled there within a comparatively short period, and in the north-western States and Territories over 500,000 who have selected homes under the stars and stripes within the last quarter of a century, and a majority of them within ten or twelve years. In addition to this there are on the Pacific slope about 50,000 more, raising the total to 1,300,000, which is more than one-fourth the present population of the Dominion. It is not surprising, under these circumstances, that there should be the strongest feelings of friendship between the two countries.

"The following statistics, compiled from the last census and more recent returns, show the distribution of Canadian-Americans settled in the North-West:

Michigan	200,000
Illinois	55,000
Wisconsin	50,000
Minnesota	65,000
Iowa	60,000
Dakota	40,000
Montana	10,000
Nebraska	20,000
Total	500,000

"The number in Colorado is set down at 40,000, and that on the Pacific coast at considerably over 50,000. All these figures are probably within the mark, as those connected with Canadian-American societies in this and other cities who have devoted time to the collection of such statistics place the quota considerably higher.

"This large number of Canadians can scarcely be said to have greatly increased that which is generally called the foreign element in this country. They had for the most part become thoroughly Americanised at home, so that their tastes and habits as well as their language were the same as those of the people with whom they came to dwell. If anything was lacking in their general make-up, upon arrival in the United States, that was necessary to perfect assimilation with its customs, laws, and institutions, it required but a brief residence to acquire it. Therefore Canadians settled down everywhere in the northwest without manifesting provincialisms sufficiently strong to indicate their nationality. They have, in all sections where they have taken up their abode, proven to be most excellent citizens, pushing their way into every avenue of industry, taking an honorable place in all the professions, and filling the workshops, manufactories, and commercial establishments with a class of young men and women characterised by a high degree of sobriety, industry, skill and honesty.

"There are in Chicago between forty and fifty thousand Canadians, and they are creditably represented in every branch of business, in every profession, and in the great industrial pursuits which engage so many thousands of workmen and skilled artisans. Railway men in positions which enable them to estimate correctly say that more than one-sixth of all the hands employed in the yards, the workshops, and the general offices of the railways in this city are natives of the Dominion; in the factories they are very largely represented; in wholesale and retail business houses they constitute a large percentage of the hands employed, one establishment in the dry-goods business having at present on its list of clerks the names of over fifty Canadians. There is scarcely a newspaper published in Chicago which has not one or more Canadians prominently connected with its staff. The list of physicians in the city includes more than one hundred who were born and raised in Canada. The job-printing and publishing business of the city is very largely conducted by ex-Canadians, and some of the heaviest board of trade operators were former residents of Canada. In the legal profession there are a number of shining lights who came from the Dominion, and banking, commerce and education have also distinguished representatives from the same section.

"The Canadian club of Chicago is a chartered institution, of which Dr. Ogden is president. It is conducted for the social advantage of the members, and is in a flourishing condition; the Canadian-American association, Rev. T. D. Phillips president, has well-appointed rooms at No 208 La Salle street, and meets twice a month for the discussion of questions of interest to its large membership. Aside from these there is The Canadian-American newspaper, a weekly of sixteen pages, published by the Jeffery Brothers, late of Brantford, Ont. This paper was for some years issued in Minneapolis, but was recently moved to Chicago. It is gotten up in the interests of Canadians settled in this country, and seeks to promote a Canadian sentiment among them. It is creditably edited, and has had an existence of about four years.

"Turning to Wisconsin, it will be noticed that the large Canadian population there is chiefly scattered throughout the immense lumbering districts of the northern part of the State. But these people are not all confined to the work of felling trees and rafting logs. The Ingrams and the Kerrs, the heaviest lumber proprietors of the Eau Claire valley, represent them in the highest successes to which that business has attained. Some of the largest lumber proprietors in the Chippewa valley are also Canadians. In Milwaukee one may meet a great mill-machinery inventor whose reputation is world-wide and who has presided over the construction of many of the best mills in Minneapolis. He, too, is a Canadian. In all the commercial centers of Wisconsin his countrymen may be found occupying positions of trust or engaged in business or industrial pursuits."

I know that gentleman personally; his name is Wilkin; he is from Canada, and his wife is the daughter of the model farmer of the county of Norfolk, I. B. Carpenter.

"The State of Minnesota has been a very successful competitor with the Canadian North-West in securing English and Canadian settlers for the broad prairie areas in the northern part of that State. Until within the past year or two immigration to the territories north of the boundary line was obliged to travel through that State. The opportunity was not lost. Immigration agents besieged immigration trains and placed glowing descriptions of the advantages of Minnesota and Dakota as fields for settlement in the hands of northward-bound passengers, many thousands of whom yielded to the allurements presented, and cut their journey short by selecting farms under the flag of the United States. In many instances these trains, by the time they reached the international boundary in 1880-1-2, were emptied of their passengers, and were compelled to enter Winnipeg unoccupied. The result is, that in the northern portions of Minnesota or Dakota, many of the best farming districts are populated almost entirely from the Province of Ontario. Grand Forks, and its vicinity, for instance, are as completely Canadian, so far as the nationality of the inhabitants goes, as any portion of the Province of Manitoba.

You will see from this that a great portion of the money that has been spent in assisting immigration, has been spent upon persons who, in travelling through the United States, have stopped in Minnesota and Dakota instead of going to Manitoba and the North-West, as they intended.

"In St. Paul the wealthiest residents are Canadians. Mr. Norman Kittson, the millionaire and celebrated stockman, is from Ontario; Mr. Ryan, also a millionaire, and principal owner of the Hotel Ryan, is from Pontiac, near Ottawa, the capital of the Dominion; Mr. Beaupre is from Kingston, Ont.; Mr. Overbach is from Quebec. The railway offices and workshops of St. Paul are filled with Canadians, who are represented in a notable manner by Mr. J. J. Hill, president of the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba road, who is supposed to be worth ten or fifteen millions.

"In Minneapolis, where there are over ten thousand Canadians, it is a significant fact that a part of the site of the city was pre-empted by Col. J. H. Stevens, who is a native of Montreal. Mr. Stevens is now editor of The Farm and Stock Journal, published there, and is considered a good authority on agricultural questions. Col. R. S. Innis, a native of Port Hope, Ont., is one of the principal real-estate operators of that growing city, and Hon. F. H. Boardman, also from Ontario, is numbered among its principal lawyers. Throughout the state Canadians are to be met with in every branch of industry, in educational and literary pursuits, in the commercial and industrial establishments, in the pulpit, in the Legislature, and in every calling of life.

"Dakota has secured the cream of the immigration that the Canadian Government set in motion for its own North-West Territories; and the population of the northern part of that district, which is now asking Congress to be admitted as a State, is about one-half Canadian. Attorney-General Hughes is one of their leading representatives, and so is Hon. Alex. McKenzie, the well-known Dakota 'boomer.' The latter served on the capital commission, and is one of the rising men of the territory.

"Montana enjoys an important Canadian element. Some of its principal supply-houses are conducted by ex-Canadians. A large number of the most active miners in the territory are from New Brunswick, and a few from Ontario are engaged in the ranch business.

"Iowa's 60,000 Canadians are located principally on farms. Many of them have become wealthy. They have an able and widely-popular representative in Hon. John Van Valkenburg, of Fort Madison, Iowa, (formerly from Ontario), who is supreme chancellor (of the world) of the Knights of Pythias. He is now engaged in the organisation of a State Canadian association.

"The 20,000 Canadians in Nebraska have a flourishing club in Omaha, of which Mr. George H. Leslie, of that city, formerly of Toronto, is president, and the 40,000 located in Colorado have an association in Denver. There are also similar associations in Portland, Oregon, and in San Francisco, but the largest, and probably most active, is that in Minneapolis, of which Mr. C. E. Brown, ex-mayor of St. Thomas, Ont., is president."

Now, you will see that the gentleman who wrote this article knew what he was writing about; he gives the names of the parties and refers to their former places of residence, and I have no doubt that there are hon. gentlemen in this House who will recognise a great many of the names which I have read. This article proves conclusively to my mind that hundreds of thousands of our young, energetic and ambitious Canadians, whom the article speaks of as being all men of promise, have gone from this country. This takes us back to the policy of the Government in assisting immigration, which has filled the country with a set of immigrants and driven our native element out of the country. Now, what do we see? A delegation from Toronto waited on the Government which stated that Toronto was overburdened with a certain class of immigrants, and that, although the city had voted $6,000 for certain casual purposes, last winter, that amount would not be half enough to cover the expenditure. Alderman Hall said that he had visited one of the police stations on the 20th March, and found there thirty vagrants, of whom eighteen were Irish, nine English, and three Scotch. He asked them where they came from, and they said they came out as assisted immigrants. And that is only for one police station in one city. Alderman Turner said that a certain clergyman had told him he knew of a family of seven, all mechanics, who had been assisted out here as agricultural laborers. The deputation also complained largely of the system of bringing out families of small children, who only became a burden on the cities. Montreal and Toronto were the two great dumping grounds for this immigration, and these two cities have to bear the burden of this policy. I have a statement here to show that even during the last month, the month of March, nearly 7,000 French Canadians left Bonaventure depot for the New England and Middle States. These would return at the end of the summer season, a great portion of them, and they are the class, I suppose, who, the Minister's secretary states come back from the United States. In his statement the other day, he estimates at 22,000 or more the Canadians who returned last year from the States. I suppose these are the parties who go to make up the 79,000 who, the Minister says, must come to this country. 227 families, representing about 1,000 persons, left Quebec during February to make a permanent residence in the United States. What is the cause of this immigration from Canada? It must be the policy of the Government that drives the people out. What did Mr. Meredith do, a few days ago, in the Local House? He moved a motion of censure against the Government for putting $18,000 in the Estimates to assist immigrants; but I am not going to propose a motion of censure against the Government here, though, if any other hon. gentleman will, I will give him my hearty support. I do not believe in a policy of expending $500,000 a year annually in bringing immigrants into the country, when we are overburdened with a similar class who have shown themselves detrimental to the country. In England the newspapers are advocating sending out their paupers to Canada, as our Government is encouraging such immigration. That certainly is the class we are getting, and I hope some hon. gentleman will propose a motion of censure to show the people that the Government are moving in the wrong direction.

Mr. ROSS. I did not intend to say anything on this question, but, inasmuch as the hon. gentleman who last spoke has quoted some figures from a Chicago paper, I deem it my duty to set him right. In that statement which he quoted there is not a single figure correct, although the statement has been going the rounds of a certain portion of the Canadian press for some weeks back. Having gone fully into the matter, I am in a position to state that in not a single case in which the American press make statements as to the number of Canadian residents in the United States, do they state anything near the facts. In the States of California, Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Montana, Ohio, Oregon, Wisconsin, Washington and Dakota, the total Canadian population, according to the census of 1880, instead of being 500,000, is 191,676.

Some hon. MEMBERS. This is 1886.

Mr. ROSS. What figures have they got since, or how could they secure them when no census was taken, except in Minnesota and Dakota? I can state that the Canadian census of Minnesota for 1885 shows only 45,473 Canadians in that State instead of 60,000. The returns from Dakota I will have in a few days: The Chicago authorities which the hon. gentleman quotes show figures to make out 40,000 Canadians in that city; but, by the census of 1880, there are not 14,900 Canadians there, and it is extremely unlikely that the difference has been made up in the five years which have elapsed since 1880. What does the total population of the Western States mentioned show, in each decade, from 1850 to 1880? In 1850 there were 29,901 Canadians in those States; in 1860, 73,039; in 1870, 131,397; in 1880, 191,696, and the total population of those States in 1880 was 14,454,456; so that the Canadian population averages only one and one-third per cent. Of all those States, the native population, according to the census of 1880, was over 89 per cent. of the entire population, leaving 20 per cent. for the total foreign population including the one and one-third per cent. Canadians. As regards that portion of Dakota, in the northern part where there has been a large immigration during the past few years, the population of Canadians is not equal to what it is represented to be. In that northern part which has been represented as almost entirely Canadian, the native population, according to the census of 1885, is more than 50 per cent. of the whole, leaving less than 50 per cent. for the entire foreign population, thus proving that the figures copied by the American papers and recopied by ours are not correct. Three States in the Union, Massachusetts, New York and Michigan contain about one-half of the total Canadian population in the whole of the United States, thus leaving to the Western States and the balance of the Eastern States and the Southern States, one half the total number of Canadians in the whole of the United States. The statement was also made that there are 50,000 Canadians on the Pacific slope. That is equally incorrect, as there were not 25,000 there, according to the census of 1880. I do not wish to say anything about assisted immigration. We in the North-West are satisfied to get good bond fide settlers to whom we have as free homes to offer as they can find in any part of the United States, and to whom we offer more liberal land laws. We are willing to aid any one who comes out ready to do his own work, ready to take hold and work out the destinies of the country, and we object to continually setting the United States against us by representing them as offering more favorable inducements to settlement, and while too many Canadians have gone to the western parts of the United States, not one-half of those who are represented to have gone to the north-western parts have gone there.

Mr. CARLING. I am very glad to hear the remarks of the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) with regard to my visit to his constituency. That perhaps has raised the ire of the hon. gentleman a little, and has caused him to take a very high stand against the policy of the present Government with reference to immigration. It is true that I addressed a meeting in East Elgin and met with a very kind and hearty reception; and the more the policy of the Government was discussed the more hearty that reception was. I also had the honor of an invitation to the county of Monck, where I had the opportunity of addressing the constituents of my hon. friend the member for that county (Mr. McCallum), and there the members of the Government and those who took part in the discussion were most heartily received by the people generally. In discussing the policy of the Government, I happened to refer to the matter of assisted immigration, and, that speech being reported, the vice-president of the Knights of Labor of the city of St. Thomas, in the county of Elgin, wrote me a letter for an explanation. In reply to that, I sent the letter which has been read by the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson). My hon. friend says it is dishonest. Well, I am not in the habit of making false statements, and I defy the hon. gentleman to show me any one particular in which my statements were untrue. I said that there was a wrong impression with regard to assisted immigration, and I find that there is a wrong impression in the different cities and towns with reference to the amount of money which is paid for that purpose. There are those in the country who would try to make one believe that the Government expended from three to four or five hundred thousand dollars annually in assisting immigration to this country. Such is not the fact, and I took great pleasure in making that known to the vice-president of the Knights of Labor of St. Thomas. The amount of money, instead of being $300,000 or, as some say, half a million, for assisted immigration, was last year, all told, I am sure, not more than $40,000, and the number of immigrants brought out assisted by the Government was not more than between 7,000 and 8,000, and the amount paid to assist such immigrants did not much exceed $4 per head. It is necessary to keep up a large staff of agents in this country and in the Old Country, and although it has been said that the American Government do not expend large amounts of money for immigration, that may be true in regard to immigration agents, but we know that the United States have their ambassadors in every country in the world; we all know that they have their consular agents in every part of the British Empire, and that in Canada they have some seventy or eighty consular agents who are, to all intents and purposes, immigration agents. We have them in every town of importance. We have them representing among our people that the United States is a much better country to live in than Canada; that the Western States are much superior to our North-West Territories. There are all these influences brought to bear as well as those which are brought to bear through the press of the United States, and I am sorry to say that we have also immigration agents in this House. I am sorry to say that we have members in this House who, for party purposes, and for the sake of gaining a party point, are willing to decry their country; but I was glad to find that there was one hon. gentleman in the Opposition, the member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), a gentleman who is highly respected on this side as well as on that, who had the manliness to stand up and defend his country and the North-West. We had a speech the other night from the member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and I would ask the House if the Americans could have a better immigration agent than Mr. McMullen to advise people to go to the United States. On the 2nd April, Mr. McMullen said, as reported in Hansard:

"I should like to ask the people of this Dominion whether we, with the drawbacks arising from our severe winter and other causes, are in as favorable a position as the people of the United States, who have great diversity of climate and produce everything under the sun."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not refer to a previous debate.

Mr. CARLING. If hon. gentlemen refuse to allow me to quote parts of the speech of this hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it all.

Mr. CARLING. I am not going to read it all, but only this portion with regard to the country:

"Would any one studying the speech of that hon. gentleman decide to stay in this country rather than go to the Western States? No, he would decide to go to a better climate."

Those were the words of the hon. gentleman. Then he goes on:

"Then the hon. member for Cardwell told us that wheat on the Canadian Pacific Railway is worth more than what it is on the Northern Pacific. Now, I am strongly inclined to doubt that statement, because I have friends who live in Manitoba with whom I have continuous communication with regard to prices, and I have also friends in Minnesota. I have received letters from friends of mine since I came here, and I am satisfied that wheat is higher in Minnesota than it is in Manitoba. * * * Reference was made by the hon. member for Cardwell, to the Australian colonies, and the hon. gentleman tried to show that their debt was greater than that of Canada. The Australian colonies are, however, in the same position as the United States. They have a climate very much more desirable than ours. In consequence of the shortness of the seasons here a farmer is obliged to have a large force of horses and machinery, whereas in countries with a more favorable climate they are able to work almost all the year round."

I would like to know if that is the speech of a patriot? Is that the speech of a gentleman who has the love of his country at heart more than the love of the country across the lines? I say not, and I say it is to be regretted that any gentleman in this House should decry his own country and praise the country which is endeavoring to take our people away from us. Then, the Globe of 5th April contains this article:

"There is no other country under the sun the Government of which could survive such an attack as that contained in Sir Richard Cartwright's speech on the Budget. He proves by unanswerable figures and logic that this country is rushing into bankruptcy and ruin."

Those are the speeches of hon. gentlemen, taken from the Hansard and articles published in the Globe. These are the statements which are published in the papers in the United States, and I would ask whether there can be any better immigration pamphlet than these speeches taken from our own reports in Parliament. Then, with regard to the people being brought here to fill up this country, my hon. friend says they are not wanted. Well, I regret very much to hear him say that we do not want immigration in this country. We have expended a very large sum of money in purchasing the North-West; we have expended many millions of dollars in opening up that country, and I think it is the duty of Parliament to do everything in their power to make known the advantages of that country to immigrants who desire to come to Canada instead of going to the United States. I am satisfied that our country is equal to the Western United States, better than Dakota, of which so much has been said, and I do not think it is either fair or right for our representatives or the press of Canada, who are interested in its welfare, continually to decry their own country in favor of another. Now, with regard to assisted immigration. I stated in the House a short time ago, in answer to an enquiry, that the number of immigrants who had been assisted to this country was somewhat over 7,000.

Mr. WILSON. Was that for 1884-85, or 1885-86?

Mr. CARLING. It was for the period between the 1st of January, 1885, and the 1st of January, 1886, and that was the period asked for by the question of the hon. gentleman which he placed on the notice paper. The amount paid for the assistance of those 7,000, was, as I have before stated. I may say here, Mr. Speaker, that there is a great demand for agricultural laborers and domestic servants. We have information, from all parts of Canada, that these two classes are in great demand. I will read from the report of the Commissioner of Immigration, in the Province of Ontario, Mr. Hardy, in which he says:

"From the beginning of August to the end of October there was a steady demand for farm laborers, especially for single men. More than double the number who arrived could easily have obtained employment by the year at fair wages. Of one large lot of practical and experienced farm hands, thirty reached Toronto at 5 a. m., their expected arrival having been published in the morning papers, and before noon all had been engaged at fair wages, ranging from $144 to $150 per annum, with a maintenance. It must, however, be understood that only experienced men are wanted by the year. A single man who can plough well, and who has had some experience in taking care of stock, can readily obtain employment at about $150 per annum, with maintenance, with a prospect of considerable increase if he should be found to be a good, trustworthy man. Should thirty or forty come together, and advise the Department, on their arrival, at Quebec, farmers would certainly be in waiting at Toronto to employ them. Farmers have been so often disappointed in coming for men, that they do not now feel disposed to come to meet immigrants unless they have some assurance of success.

"Families of farm laborers can find ready employment if they are experienced and have the means of providing a little furniture and provisions. If there are young women in the family, able and willing to take places as servants, so much the better. Some farmers may be found willing to provide furniture and provisions, but, as a rule, they prefer not to allow the men to get in their debt till they know whether or not the latter are worthy of being trusted.

"During the last immigration season only a few female domestic servants came to Ontario; not more than eighty-eight reported themselves at Toronto. These were employed in this city and in various parts of the country. The demand for this class is everywhere so great that the few arriving at Quebec are employed in various parts of the Lower Provinces. Wages of experienced servants were higher in 1885 than in the preceding year. Good general servants can readily find employment at from $8 to $10 per month."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have read from the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the Province of Ontario in which he clearly states that there is a great demand for agricultural laborers and domestic servants, and those are the classes of people we have assisted to come to this country. The demand is not confined to the Province of Ontario; agents from all parts of Canada, from British Columbia and the North-West, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, say to us that there is an unsupplied demand for domestic servants and agricultural laborers. The Government of Canada during last year brought out to this country something like 7,000 of these classes and still there is a great demand for them. I think it is a wise policy for the Government to hold out every inducement they can to these two classes of immigrants to come to this country.

Mr. DAVIES. During what period did you bring out these 7,000?

Mr. CARLING. Between the 1st of January, 1885, and the 1st of January, 1886. But we have given no assistance to mechanics coming to this country. I will read to the House the certificate that is required on behalf of an immigrant before he can get a cheapened ticket:

"I beg to certify, for the information of the agents of the Canadian Government, that the persons named on the other side are of good character, able and willing to work, and have expressed to me their intention of settling in Canada. To the best of my knowledge their statements are correct, and I recommend that their application for the Government assisted passage may be favorably considered."

This declaration is signed by a clergyman or a magistrate, and this statement heads the form of application that the applicant has to make:

"Agricultural laborers of good character, and their families, desiring to settle in Canada, will, if the application made on this form is approved, be provided with passages to Quebec or Halifax at the following rates:—Adults of twelve years and over, £3; children between one and twelve years, £2; infants under one year, 10s. These rates include an ample supply of provisions, but not bedding and mess utensils, which can be obtained for a few shillings at the port of embarkation."

The parties have to make a statement that they are agricultural laborers or domestic servants, before a magistrate or clergyman, and the magistrate or clergyman certifies that he knows them to be such as they represent themselves. The Government have taken every precaution that no one should be assisted but agricultural laborers or domestic servants, and I think the House will agree with me that the precautions I have stated are sufficient. I did not expect that this discussion would have taken so wide a range, and I thought that when the estimates for immigration came up, as they will in a few days, this matter would be fully discussed and explained to the satisfaction of the House. But with respect to the statement which the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) made, that I perambulated the country making untruthful statements, I do not know there is any sin in a Minister of the Crown accepting an invitation to visit a particular part of the country, even if it is the constituency of the hon. member, an opponent. I have had the pleasure of knowing a great many people in that county, and they were very desirous that I should go there, and whether I gave them satisfaction or not it is for them to say. I, of course, did my best to explain to the people of East Elgin the progressive state of the country and its financial condition. The hon. gentleman has stated that the policy of this Government has been one opposed to the interests of this country, and that Canada has become a dear country instead of a cheap country to live in on account of the National Policy. I know there is not an hon. member in this House, I do not care on which side he may sit, who will say that statement is true. I am prepared to show by figures, which cannot be doubted, that nearly every article of consumption and every article used by the farmer can be bought to-day at 25 per cent. less cost than in 1878. I state that as a fact, and I defy contradiction. I say that the implements used by the farmers, the clothing worn by him, the luxuries used and everything used on the farm can be bought to-day at 25 per cent. less than they could be in 1878 when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman said in 1876 that the prices were so low the manufacturers could not live.

Mr. CARLING. The cry was that the National Policy was going to make this a dear country to live in, and that it would increase the number of factories and the number of producers.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will confine his remarks to the subject before the House.

Mr. CARLING. I was only endeavoring to show the House and the country that this has not been made a dear country to live in by the National Policy.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman has made that statement, let us now hear him prove it.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman says, why did I not prove it. I was not prepared for this discussion, as the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) simply placed a notice on the paper to ascertain the total number of assisted and unassisted immigrants who entered Canada in each month of the calendar year, 1885. In the course of his remarks that hon. gentleman said the policy of the Government had been a policy that had increased the cost of goods used by the people instead of reducing the cost, and I reply that I am prepared to show this House and the country that nearly every article consumed by our mechanics and farmers is 25 per cent. less to-day than during the last year when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. If that be the case—and I say I can prove it and can substantiate it without doubt—then hon. gentlemen opposite should cease, and their organs should cease, stating to the people that this is a dear country to live in and that increased prices have been caused by the National Policy introduced by the hon. leader of the Government. There is no objection whatever to bringing down the information asked for by the hon. gentleman, and I only regret that he should have said that the statements I made in East Elgin were exaggerated, and that the letter I wrote to Mr. Ingram in his town was written for political purposes.

Mr. WILSON. I did not say that the statements made by the hon. gentleman at the public meetings were deliberate misrepresentations. What I said was that there was misrepresentation in the letter and in the letter alone, because I did not hear what the hon. gentleman said at the meeting.

Mr. CARLING. In regard to that letter, which has been read by the hon. gentleman to the House, and which, I suppose, will appear in the records of Hansard, I want the hon. member in this House, or over his own signature, to show wherein I have made a false statement.

Mr. WILSON. I have the evidence.

Mr. CARLING. I want the hon. gentleman to show where I have made a false statement. I endeavored in writing that letter to Mr. Ingram, who is a very highly respectable gentleman, I believe, although I have not the pleasure of his acquaintance, and who is vice-president of the society referred to, to answer the questions honestly and fairly, as I did. When the question comes up I am quite prepared to defend every line in that letter and to defend every utterance I made at public meetings with regard to the financial standing and general prosperity of the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister of Agriculture has read from a speech of mine, delivered on 2nd April. I am quite sure the Minister of Agriculture does not wish to misrepresent what I said. I can honestly say there is not a Minister of the Crown for whom I have greater personal respect than for the Minister of Agriculture, and I believe if he had seen the corrected report of my speech he would not have made the quotation he has done. I will give the hon. gentleman the correction I made. I read from the report:

"I regret that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) was forced to admit that our debt per capita is in excess to that of the United States as well as our taxes. I should like to ask the people of this Dominion whether we, with the drawbacks arising from our severe winter and other causes, are in as favorable a position to pay a per capita tax, as the people of the United States who have great diversity of climate and produce everything under the sun."

"To pay a per capita tax," are the words inserted in my corrected speech. I stated, in connection with the statement of the Finance Minister, that I regretted exceedingly that we were in the position the Minister of the Interior had to confess we occupied, that our per capita debt and our per capita tax was in excess of that of the United States, and that, owing to our drawbacks, we were not in a position to pay a per capita as well as the people of the United States. Referring to the Australian colonies, I said that the diversity of climate gave them great advantage over us, from the fact that they could produce almost everything they wanted. They were more in the position of the United States in that particular than we were, and they consequently had advantages in the matter of climate. I said I had no intention whatever of making any reference to our country in the way of decrying our country. It is our duty, as an Opposition, to criticise statements made in the House by hon. gentleman opposite. We are consequently expressing our regret that the debt of the country has ran up to such an extent, that it has gone beyond the per capita debt of the United States and the per capita tax of the United States. There is another point in connection with this matter to which the hon. gentleman referred, and to which I will take the liberty of referring. I am sorry he did not read all I said. He garbled my utterances on that occasion. I was referring to the fact that we were running into debt so rapidly and that hon. gentlemen opposite were responsible for it, and settlers would hesitate to remain here as our taxes were so much in excess of the burdens across the borders. I hold that if any one inducement beyond another would tend to bring the people in and settled them here it would be that this was a cheap country to live in and that of all the British colonies this was the cheapest country to live in under the British Crown. I said if we were in that position to-day, it would be more of an inducement to people in the Old Country to come and settle here than any other inducement we could possibly hold out. Now, I say we have been spending altogether too much for immigration. As regards the number of people who have gone from Canada into the United States, I do not say that hon. gentlemen opposite are entirely responsible for the number who have gone there from year to year and from month to month, but we cannot forget this, that when the Mackenzie Government were in power hon. gentlemen opposite were continuously charging the Government that the population of the country was going out of Canada year by year and month by month, and that it was the want of a proper policy on the part of the Mackenzie Government that brought about the state of things, and they held that Government responsible for the exit. They said that they were not prepared to deal in a proper way with the great industries of the country. But I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite if their National Policy, of which they feel so proud, has accomplished this object—that of stopping our people from going abroad. The returns show that all the professions they made with reference to the advantages of that policy in keeping our people at home and giving our mechanics and laborers work at home and putting a stop to the exit of our population, have not been maintained, that our people are still going across the borders, and that we are contributing largely to populate the United States. I say that while they held out these inducements, as I stated then in the debate on the Budget speech of the Finance Minister, they were humbugging the people and —

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not speaking to the question of assisted passages.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, Sir, I was confining myself to that subject, but the Minister of Agriculture led me away by referring to the other question. However, I think the time has come when a close, careful and economical policy with regard to assisted passages should be adopted. I have no doubt that in the past hon. gentlemen thought it was desirable that a considerable sum should be spent for that purpose, but I cannot see for the life of me, how they came to the conclusion that by spending something like $80,000 on various printers and newspapers for printing and advertising in connection with immigration, they hoped to be able to bring out immigration here; why the granting of a large sum to the Montreal Gazette—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. McMULLEN. We are now talking with regard to immigration.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is the policy of assisted passages to immigrants. I stopped the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), when he touched on the same question and I hope the hon. gentleman will not pursue it further.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am sorry we are not allowed to discuss the whole question, as I think it would be in the interest of the whole country as well as in the interest of the House. I am glad the Government have intimated their intention of reducing the amount expended on immigration. I believe it is desirable that they should do so. I believe we should make a decided and determined effort when we bring the people to our shores to induce them to settle here. I think we should try, if possible, to show them that our North-West is a good country to settle in. I hope it will prove a success; I dare say it will; I have some good grounds for saying and believing it will, but we want to be able to say that we have there a sufficient quantity of land to give every man a good homestead, that we have many inducements for immigrants to come and settle amongst us, and the best way that we can have an increased number of inhabitants is by showing that we can give them anything they want cheaper, and if we can show them that I believe it will be a greater inducement than anything else. I did not intend to speak on this question at all, and I would not have taken up the time of the House for a moment had not the Minister of Agriculture referred to my remarks. If the hon. gentleman had waited for the corrected report of what I said, I do not think he would have drawn the attention of the House to the matter.

Mr. CARLING. I should be very sorry indeed to do any injustice to the hon. gentleman, but I may say that I took up Hansard and I was not aware whether the report was the one made by the Hansard reporters or a report corrected by the hon. gentleman. I knew that I was quoting from the Hansard as issued, I read the remarks to which I refer in the pages of the official report, and gave them just as I found them and as hon. gentlemen will find them if they will refer to the Debates of the 2nd of April, at pages 510 and 511. There you will find the quotation I read, just as I read it.

An hon. MEMBER. And just as he uttered it.

Mr. CARLING. Then with regard to what the hon. gentleman said about these newspapers—

Mr. SPEAKER. I have stopped other hon. gentlemen from speaking on that question, and I do not think the hon. gentlemen should make any remark upon it.

Mr. CARLING. I want to explain the expenditure as hon. gentleman opposite have made charges with reference to it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I stopped the mover of the motion when he was commencing to speak on that subject, and other hon. gentlemen.

Mr. CARLING. I think it is rather unfair that the hon. member for West Wellington (Mr. McMullen) should have been allowed to make charges against certain newspapers—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I stopped other hon. gentlemen from doing it—

Mr. CARLING. After the charges were made.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I think the hon. Minister of Agriculture has a right—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. WOODWORTH. This is a question of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. What is the question of order?

Mr. WOODWORTH. I will tell Your Honor when Your Honor will hear me. I say that the hon. Minister of Agriculture had already spoken, and Your Honor had not ruled him out of order, but allowed him to speak on this question. It was then taken up by other speakers on the other side, and now the hon. Minister of Agriculture desires to make an explanation on that point, as to what was said on the other side, and I think that would be a perfectly proper explanation and one which would be in order.

Mr. BEATY. I was very glad to hear the remarks and explanations of the hon. Minister of Agriculture with regard to the class of immigrants who are assisted by the Government, for there is much misapprehension, particularly in the cities, with reference to this matter. I have found the policy of the Government very frequently misrepresented, and the statement is often made that mechanics and artisans are assisted by the Government to immigrate into this country. Mechanics in the cities who have not been able to find enough work in the winter season feel very keenly the fact—if it is a fact—that the Government should bring in mechanics from other countries to compete with them in their trades. That is my view of the matter repeated over and over again, but misrepresentations are constantly made in the city of Toronto, and no doubt other cities as well. I think that with regard to agricultural laborers and domestic servants, who are said to be assisted, there can possibly be no objection, but in cities and especially in great centres of population like Toronto, and no doubt in Montreal and other places, any aid given to the mechanical classes of other countries to bring them into those cities, would be very strongly objected to, and so far as I can speak on their behalf I would join them in protesting against such a course.

Mr. GAULT. I was just about to make the same remark as the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Beaty) with regard to assisted immigration. I do not say, of course, that we should bring artisans or skilled mechanics into the country, because they are usually people who can pay their own passage and who do not want assistance. But you cannot bring too many female servants. In Montreal we can find places for a thousand female servants any day; the employment agencies receive a hundred applications for every servant they can get. Many of our laborers go to the Eastern States for work in the spring, and come back in time for harvest; and the ship laborers of Quebec go south during the winter. But I am glad to say that in Montreal we have no people working on half time; our industries are kept fully occupied; wages have not diminished; and there are no houses to rent. Although we have no boom—we do not want a boom—I believe there are no people better off than we in the Dominion of Canada. I believe we in Canada are better off than the people of England, France, Germany, or even of the United States. As for the cotton mills, for three or four years the shareholders have had no dividends; but the operatives have been fully employed, and not one reduction of wages has ever taken place with the skilled mechanics, because if we let them go to the United States we could not get them back again, and I think they are perfectly well satisfied with what we have done for them. With regard to the North-West, we must look forward to the filling up of that country with immigrants; if we do not, I shall despair of Canada, and I hope and trust that every effort will be made by the Minister of Agriculture to induce immigrants to go there. There is no doubt that it has one of the finest soils in the world; I have been there myself and seen it. In the Western States, in some parts the water is not drinkable, in other places there are great storms, and you hear complaints everywhere; but in our North-West Territories there is no doubt we have a home for future millions.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am glad that at last the Minister of Agriculture has taken the ground he has done to-day, that he thinks the time has come when assisted passages to mechanics should cease. I am glad also that the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) has expressed the views we have just heard from him; for it will be in the recollection of the House, that scarcely two years ago I moved a resolution in the House expressing the opinion that the time had come when assisted passages to mechanics coming to Canada should cease, and that that resolution was voted down by every Conservative member in the House; and, speaking from memory, I think the hon. member for West Toronto was in his place and helped to vote it down. That resolution expressly omitted agricultural laborers and domestic servants, and it is only two short years since these hon. gentlemen declared by their vote, which was more emphatic than their word, that they did not think that assisted passages to mechanics should cease. Why this change? Are wages lower, or is the country less favorable for mechanics than was the case before? This question requires a little explanation.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). One expression has been made use of in regard to immigrants which I have been sorry to hear. I think it is unfair and unjust to the country that it should be permitted to go abroad that this country is unfavorable to mechanics. It is right enough to say that we require agricultural laborers and female servants, but the immigrant for this country is the skilled man—the man of muscle, and trained muscle if you can get him—the man of energy and vigor, who is willing to work. I have as strong sympathy with the agriculturists as any member of this House; but we know that there are many agricultural laborers in England, Ireland and Scotland who have not a tithe of the brains of skilled mill men and artisans in factories. Take away the mechanics like the weavers, the stone-masons and carpenters, and their first descendants, and you will depopulate the country. They are the very best men we have; their training taught them business habits when they came to this country, and they have developed into the best farmers we have. I say it is unfair that the impression should go abroad that this country is unfavorable to this class of men. It is evident that the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) wishes to create the impression that the National Policy has reduced the price of mechanical labor. I deny that emphatically. I cannot speak of large centres like Toronto and Montreal; but I know that in Eastern Ontario, stone-masons, carpenters and plasterers are receiving fully 30 per cent. more than they did in 1878. You can hardly get a house built unless you get it done in the winter season when work is slack. Everybody is building; and to say that the country is not prosperous and that wages of mechanics are not good is simply contrary to the fact.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ASSISTED IMMIGRATION.

Mr. MILLS. I could not help noting the tone of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, as he addressed the House.
Mr. GAULT.

He spoke in a very melancholy tone like a Niobe, he seemed to be in tears, and his manner was most affecting. But the reason was easy to find. It was due to the fact that some hon. gentlemen on this side made the statement, in some other debate, that the climate of the North-West Territories was not quite so favorable as that of some parts of Australia.

Mr. CARLING. Of Canada.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman read the statement with reference to Australia; if he will look at his own notes he will see it. He may be of opinion that the climate of the North-West Territories is less severe than that of Australia or the continent further to the south, but a great many members of this House and people in the country—in fact people generally who know something about geography—will entertain a different view. I do not think we are going to promote settlement in the North-West Territories, or do anything to favor the occupation of that country by people, either from other portions of Canada or the United States, or the continent of Europe, by stating misleading facts. People, when they go there, if they find the climate is not such as it is represented to be, if they find the conditions and circumstances different from what they expected, will be seriously disappointed; and we will fail to retain many who might be disposed to remain, if they had gone under different circumstances. The hon. gentleman has stated that we on this side of the House have very seriously impeded the growth and prosperity of the country by stating that a large portion of our own population had emigrated. That is a question of fact or it is not. If it be a fact it is of far more consequence to the people that we should take steps to obviate the evil than that we should deny its existence. What did these hon. gentlemen do in 1878? They seem to forget the resolution moved then by their leader. In 1878, the First Minister moved the following resolution:—

"That it be resolved, that this House is of opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which by a judicious readjustment of the tariff will benefit and foster the agriculture, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow countrymen, now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbors, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country eventually a reciprocity of trade.

This was the representation at that time; that there were thousands of people who had left Canada because they were unable to find employment. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture was then a member of this House, sitting on this side, and he voted for this resolution.

Mr. CARLING. I was not then a member.

Mr. MILLS. At all events, all the hon. gentleman's colleagues and all the hon. gentlemen behind him, who were then members of this House, voted for that resolution. They affirmed as a fact what was not a fact. They affirmed what there is difficulty now, but what there was no difficulty then, in showing was not a fact. We did not complain that those hon. gentlemen then voted to affirm something that was true, and ought not to be made known, for I believe the country will suffer nothing by the truth being made known, but what we complained of was that hon. gentlemen opposite voted and affirmed that to be a fact which was not at the time a fact. What I quote this resolution for is to show that hon. gentlemen then did not think they were degrading the country when they declared there were thousands of people leaving it because they were unable to find enjoyment. The hon. gentleman referred to the speech of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Boes), which he declared was a patriotic speech. It may be in his view, but it was not a speech consonant with my opinions of patriotism, because I do not think anything can be affirmed as a patriotic effort which is at variance with the facts.

Mr. CARLING. I referred to the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow).

Mr. MILLS. I do not know to what speech the hon. gentleman referred, but I understood him to refer to the speech which the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) made this afternoon. I am glad to see that he repudiates that speech.

Mr. CARLING. I do not.

Mr. MILLS. For although it was intended to support the Government and the policy in which the Government persisted in the matter, it was a speech at variance with the facts. Although the hon. gentleman confidently asserted that the statement made by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Jackson) was inaccurate, and one he would show to be inaccurate, while he dealt within strong and positive assertions, he gave no information calculated to substantiate the assertions he made. The Minister has told us that everything is 25 per cent. cheaper to-day than it was in 1878. I do not suppose he meant that everything is cheaper on account of the fiscal policy of the country, for in my opinion, that would not have been in order, as the fiscal policy is not the question before us. If the hon. gentleman is disposed to affirm that as the consequence of the National Policy we will have an opportunity to discuss it at another time; but as he mentioned it in this debate in connection with the subject of immigration he means no doubt to affirm that the effect of the Government's policy in importing a large number of people into the country has been so far to lower the wages of the laborers that the cost of production has been greatly cheapened. If that be not his argument then it is not pertinent in the debate. I would call his attention to the fact that 25 per cent. is more than the price of wages in the manufacture of an article. If the hon. gentleman means that the wages of laborers are being so far reduced by the policy of the Government that the manufacturers are able to produce an article 25 per cent. cheaper than before, he must make it appear that the wages of the laborer are reduced by his policy to a mere cypher.

Mr. CARLING. Wages are not reduced.

Mr. MILLS. Then in what way has the policy of immigration affected the cost of production? If the manufacturers and the industrial classes are receiving larger profits than before and are in a more prosperous condition, I would like to know how that is brought about? What is the statement in this resolution proposed in 1878 by the hon. gentleman's chief leader and supported by all hon. gentlemen opposite? It is this, that in Canada the industries had been injured, had been ruined, because Canada has been a sacrifice market. How is it a sacrifice market? Why, because foreign goods sold here at such rates that it was impossible to produce them at the same price, and yet the hon. gentleman tells us that the prices at which the manufacturers were unable to produce them are reduced by 25 per cent. and that what was sold then at a $1 is sold now for 75 cents, and yet that those who could not afford to sell for a $1 are prospering now when they are selling for 75 cents. That is what the hon. gentleman said he could establish. I trust, when the time comes, and when it will be more pertinent than it is now, when he can assign some other reason than the importation of labor for the diminution of price, that he will be able to give it further light in reference to the proposition which he has laid down. But the hon. gentleman has gone further. In 1878, the leader of the hon. gentleman told the people at the Amphitheatre in Toronto that during Mr. Mackenzie's régime 500,000 people has left Canada. Now, what does the Bureau of Statistics show? Why, that during the Administration of Mr. Mackenzie there was an average of 22,000 people a year who left Canada, or 110,000 during the five years—just one-fifth of the number stated by the hon. gentleman's leader. Was that patriotic? Was that statement an evidence of the patriotism of the hon. gentleman and of those associated with him? The leader of that party, at a time when the trade of the country was depressed, represented that five times the number had gone out of the country that had actually left it. The hon. gentleman may consider that to be patriotic. That was patriotic when the hon. gentleman and his friends occupied this side of the House, but any reference to the subject is highly unpatriotic when they are on that side of the House. Then, I take the same statistics that those gentlemen quoted at that time, and I find that, during the five years that preceded Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, on an average 44,000 people left the country every year, or 220,000 during the five years—just double the number that left during Mr. Mackenzie's Administration. Then, according to the same statistics, I find that in 1879, 54,000 left the country; in 1880, 89,416; in 1881, 125,000; in 1882, 98,109; in 1883, 69,354; in 1884, 60,406; and in 1885, 88,500. Now, this is the statement, according to the American Bureau of Statistics, of the number of people who left Canada during this particular period of time, and I would call attention to the fact that the census which hon. gentlemen opposite have taken in Manitoba and the North-West Territories shows that, making the ordinary allowance for the increase of population, there are 215,000 people to-day fewer in that country than the returns which they have brought down from year to year would lead this House to expect. I would ask the hon. gentleman to explain that fact. How is it with these patriotic statements, as he calls them, which it is unpatriotic on this side of this House to question, when their accuracy is tested by the census taken a year ago in the North-West Territories, and that census shows a population of 215,000 less than there ought to be in that country, if the statements the hon. gentleman has made are correct? Have the hon. gentleman and his colleague been misleading this House, or is it a fact that a very large proportion of those who have gone into that country, and have been taken there with so much trouble and expense to the country, have left and gone elsewhere? The statistics I have quoted, the statements they have brought down from year to year, show that the statements, which the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Jackson) read from a Chicago paper, are far more likely to be accurate than the information which the hon. gentleman from Lisgar (Mr. Ross) undertook to impart to this House. Let us take another test. In the United States, in 1870, we had 490,000 Canadians. In 1880, we had 712,000, or 222,000 more. Making the necessary allowances, making the actual allowances for deaths, during those ten years, we find that 348,000 Canadians left Canada during the ten years, or 34,800 a year, which just about makes the number which the Bureau of Statistics shows left Canada for that country—that is 22,000 a year during the period of Mr. Mackenzie's Government, and 44,000 a year during the administration of the Government which preceded it. We have other tests of what the hon. gentleman has accomplished in this way. By our own census, in 1871, we had foreign-born people in Canada to the number of 489,500; in 1881, we had 487,600, or 1,900 less, although the hon. gentleman claimed to have brought into the country nearly 400,000 people during that time. I would like the hon. gentleman to explain that fact. What has become of those people? Why should we expend large sums of money every year to promote immigration, when it is perfectly obvious, when we examine into the question, that those whom we pay to come here do not remain with us? That is what the information he has given to the House discloses. Then the hon. gentleman says that, during the past year, he has only assisted, I think, some 7,000 immigrants in coming to this country. He says he has expended for that purpose $40,000.

Mr. CARLING. Less than $40,000.

Mr. MILLS. Well, I suppose it was very nearly $40,000, or he would not have given us that figure. But the appropriation is $422,860. What has become of the rest of the money? How is it distributed? We see; we know what goes to the London Free Press; we know what goes to the Hamilton Spectator; we know what goes to the Brockville Times; we know what goes to the Montreal Gazette.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS. I am showing, what is a perfectly legitimate thing to do, that this assisted immigration has resulted in the expenditure of a large sum of money, outside of that which is expended to aid the passengers. And the hon. gentleman knows that, if he would put an end to the assisted immigration, this $422,000 would fall with it; that the expenditure is unnecessary, and that the whole attempt to aid in the introduction of immigrants into this country, has been a huge failure. The hon. gentleman knows that we have failed to retain the population, and that we have merely aided a large number of people, year by year, to come to this country, to ultimately take up their abode in the neighboring republic. If the hon. gentlemen were to adopt a policy which would do more to retain our native-born people in Canada, it would be eminently more satisfactory than the course which has been taken.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. It was laid down this afternoon, I believe, that in discussing the question, we should be confined altogether to the subject matter of the motion itself. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) by introducing the National Policy—

Mr. MILLS. No.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. The hon. member for Bothwell certainly read the resolution introduced by the then leader of the Opposition with regard to the National Policy.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Regarding immigration.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I am well aware that the hon. gentleman stated what was in the resolution, but he passed on to speak of the exodus, criticising the Department of Agriculture, the Premier, and, in fact, made a tour throughout the entire Dominion, in order to make a point against the Government. I was very much amused, this afternoon, when the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) presumed to pose as an advocate of the mechanics and laborers. Why was not the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) candid enough to say at once, that in view of a pending election, in view of the fact that perhaps within fifteen months, this House will be dissolved and the respective claims of both parties will be before the people, he was merely bidding for the support of the workingmen in this country. Well, I tell him at once that the Conservative party, so far as their record is concerned, are prepared to meet the hon. gentlemen in their appeal for the votes of the mechanics and the workingmen of the Dominion. The hon. member for Elgin has become the friend of the workingman, and to hear his protests against mechanics being brought into this country, one would imagine that his career was such as to entitle him to their confidence. Why, Sir, at the inception of the policy of assisting immigrants, my hon. friend was one of the warmest supporters of the then hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) when he introduced a policy of assisted passages, into the Ontario Legislature. No man was more warmly in favor of assisting mechanics coming to Canada. Looking into the Ontario Immigration Reports of 1872, when my hon. friend was in the Ontario Legislature, and when the Government of that Province adopted the policy of assisted passages, I find an Order in Council passed on the 10th April, 1872:

"The Government will pay to regularly organised societies in the United Kingdom or Ontario or to individuals the sum of six dollars for every statute adult sent to this Province at the end of three months continuous residence in the Province."

Further, in 1872, the "Passage Emigrants' Money Fund" was established by Order in Council and ten immigration agents appointed, and a further Order passed directing these agents that:

"In carrying out these general instructions it should be their endeavor that, of the total number of immigrants sent out, at least 75 per cent. should be agricultural and ordinary laborers and the remainder mechanics or skilled laborers."

Thus all of the immigrants sent to this country might virtually have been mechanics and laborers, and still the hon. member for Elgin supported that policy. Again, when the Government of Sir John Macdonald went out of power, hon. gentlemen opposite warmly and earnestly advocated the bringing of immigrants to this country. Several pamphlets were published, one of which stated, in 1874:

"The Dominion of Canada includes within its far-reaching borders, means for the employment of capital and labor, skilled and unskilled, in an endless variety. There is no danger in this country of people jostling each other too closely. There is room, and to spare, for all. And the more population increases in the new settlements, while yet millions of unoccupied acres remain to be filled up beyond, the more opportunities are afforded for the exercise of industrial skill and energy, for the investment of capital, and for the employment of unskilled labor in all departments of production. But there is also a very large demand for the classes of the able-bodied laborers, arising from the numerous and extensive public works and buildings everywhere in progress in the Dominion, and this demand will be largely increased by other large public works projected—notably, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the enlargement of the Canadian canal system.

"The handicrafts and trades generally which are, so to speak, of universal application, can also always absorb a large number of artisans and journeymen."

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, and so will other hon. gentlemen, that at that time a cloud of depression had been foreshadowed by the then Minister of Finance, the present member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). Immediately after the speech in which he painted a picture of gloom and depression throughout this country, what do we find? Another departmental pamphlet published in the fall of 1875, setting forth:

"Meals are provided for immigrants, of good quality at very low prices; and they are afforded gratuitously by the Government to the absolutely indigent"

That is, the Government were prepared to bring indigent people to this country, in a time of depression, when starving multitudes were knocking at the doors of Parliament for bread, were prepared to pay and to feed indigent immigrants sent to this country to compete with the already starving multitudes.

"Railway tickets at the public charge, or free passages are given from Quebec, to indigent immigrants to points at which the Grand Trunk Railway has stations, in the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Mechanics of various descriptions, but more particularly blacksmiths, carpenters, railway navvies, shoemakers, tailors, printers, stonemasons, and masons, gardeners, bricklayers, millwrights and machinists, for whom there is a demand."

Then there is the following tabulated statement, prepared to induce mechanical competitors to come to the Dominion:

" RATE OF WAGES IN CANADA.

" The following statement shows an average range of the rates o wages paid in Canada in some of the principal callings :—

And the price per diem was stated to be from $1.25 to $2.50, when hon. gentlemen opposite knew that at that very time in this city, under the very shadow of the Parliament buildings, men were working for from 75 cents to $1 per day, and yet the hon. member for East Elgin has told us that the present Government were absolutely criminal in bringing artisans to this country, although the Minister of Agriculture said they were not assisting artisans. In looking over the returns, I find some facts in regard to mechanics being brought into this country in that time of depression when the Reform party was in power, and with regard to the artisans brought into this country by the present Administration while there was prosperity throughout the land. The record of mechanics arriving at the port of Quebec is :

	" AT QUEBEC.		Per cent.
	Mechanics.	Total.
1874.....	2,773	8,828
1875.....	977	6,035	23
1876.....	491	3,810
1877.....	1,118	2,740

1883.....	1,872	19,449
	5,448	75,484

Yet, hon. gentlemen rise in their places and charge this Government with bringing artisans into the country in a time of prosperity, when they themselves, in a time of depression and gloom, brought to the port of Quebec 23 per cent. of mechanics, while this Government, of the whole number arriving at that port, has simply brought 7 per cent.,

many of whom, the Minister has explained, were not assisted. The hon. member for Bothwell has spoken about the cost of immigrants. The total number of immigrants for five years from 1874 to 1878 inclusive, was 147,277, at a total cost of $1,201,295. Then, from 1879 to 1885, 371,670 immigrants were brought out at a cost of $1,131,358. Thus the record was $8.15 per head under a Reform Administration, and $3.56 per head under a Conservative Administration, or $4.59 less per head under Conservative than under Reform rule; and yet hon. gentlemen opposite call this an extravagant, a reckless Government, indifferent to the interests of the mechanics and working people, because they spend at least 100 per cent. less in a time of prosperity than the Reform Government did in a time of depression and gloom. I stated that I would not refer to the National Policy, but my hon. friend from Bothwell unfairly attacked the Government, without coming directly to the issue. Well, I find that in 1879, that the hon. gentleman found fault with the then Minister of Agriculture in 1879, who is now the Minister of Railways and Canals, because he would not encourage artisans to come to Canada. On the 25th April, 1879, Mr. Mills stated :

" Mr. Mills said the hon. gentleman had stated that he was very careful in determining who should emigrate to this country—in fact he controlled the entire immigration. He had taken good care that parties emigrating hither should not be persons whose labor would bring them into competition with those who were already in the country. They were assured over and over again during the past year that the Government were going to adopt the policy that would give them a home here and would create a demand for their labor. The hon. gentleman said he was not going to be a fly on the wheel, and yet he said the Government had done all it could, had exhausted its resources, and could do nothing more. The last step of this great National Policy was to take care that no one in the Old World engaged in any skilled industry should have any encouragement to come to this country."

The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) replied as follows:—

" There was about as much knickerbocker in the hon. gentleman's remarks as in anything he had heard for a long time. He, Mr. Pope, said nothing of the kind attributed to him; what he said was this: Any body could come to this country that liked, but the Government did not encourage people to come here who would come into competition with our laborers."

The present hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) stated on 20th May, 1879 :

" I have only to say upon the general proposition that I am quite willing to consider any scheme of colonisation that will settle up the interior of our continent. I am quite prepared to consider the propriety of extending any aid that may be thought desirable in advancing such a proposition. I am convinced, and have always been, that, in order to make our railroad a paying one, we must have a large population thrown into the heart of the continent."

The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) said :

" My hon. friend is perfectly right in saying that, for the purpose of developing that country, it is, in the very initial stages, of great moment to give away some land to encourage settlement; but he never pretended it would be part of his policy, or that of any Government, to give the great mass of the lands along the line of the Pacific Railway in free grants. We recognised distinctly and clearly the fact that, for the purpose of promoting the settlement of that country, some sacrifice might be undergone, more especially because we knew there was great competition to be borne with from the United States in the settlement of the North-West, and that they offered great tracts of land to settlers on very favorable terms, and that so long as that rivalry continued, it would be practically impossible for us to attract to the North-West any but the most inferior class of settlers, unless prepared to give corresponding advantages to those offered by the United States."

Mr. POPE. What date ?

Mr. MACKINTOSH. The 20th May, 1879. I read from Official Debates. In fact, from the day the Government passed resolutions in favor of colonising the North-West and building the Canadian Pacific Railway out of the public lands, the Opposition has spoken and acted in a way certainly detrimental to the interests of the country. I am convinced this question will come up in a much larger form before this House, and I quite understand the design of the motion introduced by the hon.

member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson). So far as the Conservatives are concerned, I, as a private member of the House, am prepared to discuss the whole question, the whole policy of the Government with respect both to the exodus and the effect of the immigration policy, the effect of the general policy and of the National Policy of the Government, with hon. gentlemen opposite. But it is most unfair and most uncandid, under the guise of an unpretending motion with respect to the number of immigrants, to discuss the National Policy, the exodus and other questions which hon. gentlemen were warned by the Speaker they could not refer to as being without the limit of the resolution. When the question in its broad features comes up for discussion I am prepared to discuss it, as well as the record of the hon. gentlemen opposite is concerned, so far as regards the cost of immigrants and the treatment the late Government meted out to the mechanics and workmen, for that record of hon. gentlemen opposite will not bear the light of day any more than their record of other acts for which they were responsible. I simply rose to make a few remarks in order to let the House and the country understand that there is not merely one side of the story but two sides; and I am satisfied the people of Canada and the workmen and the knights of labor, for whose support hon. gentlemen opposite are angling, when they come to look at the truth and to discuss it, will have very little confidence in hon. gentlemen opposite, who in opposition become their friends and the very moment they obtain power are prepared to act to their injury on the ground of what they term political exigency. I am prepared to show that hon. gentlemen opposite when in power spent large sums to send back immigrants. I remember a discussion that took place when it was proved they paid $5,000 to send 250 Frenchmen back to old France; that during the time of the depression, between 1875 and 1878, they paid $100 and $200 a night for a hall in Birmingham for lecturers to induce mechanics there to come to Canada where they would have deprived our workmen of employment; and on the other hand, we can point to the record of this Government as a chivalrous and public spirited one, and I have confidence that when an appeal is made to the electors hon. gentlemen opposite cannot by such a policy as they now adopt, hope to gain power in this country.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has undertaken to predict what the workmen of this country will do in a short time. He has told us that within fifteen months there will be a general election and at that election the workmen will be found arrayed upon the side of the Government. It is remarkable how very much interest hon. gentlemen on the other side take in the workmen of Canada to-day. When the hon. gentleman thought proper to quote to us ancient history he ought to have considered for a few moments the altered circumstances. At the time the then Government initiated a policy of bringing immigrants into this country, there was no protest from the workmen of Canada against further immigration. At that time there was a period of prosperity which does not exist to-day. In every town throughout the country you to-day find workmen's associations denouncing the Government and complaining of the public expenditure for the purpose of bringing workmen into this country to compete with those already here. To-day you will find thousands of men throughout Canada unemployed. We find the industries, which hon. gentlemen opposite promised would give prosperity, all in a declining condition, the factories closed, the workmen out of employment, and the working classes in a very unsatisfactory condition indeed. We find wherever there is an association of workmen in cities and towns they pass resolutions at their meetings imploring the Government to stop the system of bringing labor into the country, which has the effect of further reducing the earnings of those already here. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) thought proper to go back to 1874-75, and to take four or five years about that period and compare the expenditure of the present time. During the past two years the immigration has cost nearly a million dollars; last year $500,000 and this year nearly half a million has been spent. In those two years that sum has been spent for the purpose of bringing artisans from the older countries into Canada to compete with our own workmen. Not only has the money been so employed, but it has been given with a lavish hand to supporters of the Government who happened to be so fortunate as to own newspapers.

Mr. CARLING. I call the hon. gentleman to order. I was called to order myself for referring to the press and money paid to newspapers in connection with immigration.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. member has wandered away from the question. We are discussing only the expenditure so far as relates to this motion.

Mr. LISTER. It was somewhat refreshing to listen to the arguments of the member from Lisgar (Mr. Ross), who is not in his place to-night. He entered into the discussion with all the warmth and zeal of a new convert to Toryism. Sir, he thought proper to present to this House a table representing the exodus from Canada into the United States. He took the census of 1880, and I ask the hon. gentleman if he thought it was honest to tell us that according to the census of 1880 there were 140,000 Canadian people in the whole of the United States or if it is reasonable to suppose that in the five years which have elapsed since that time that the number has not been greatly augmented. I believe it is no stretch of the imagination to say that there are 1,000,000 of Canadians in the United States, possibly owing allegiance to the Government of the United States, who have been driven from Canada by the maladministration of the present Government. He takes the census of 1880 and he wants us to understand that the number of Canadians is a mere bagatelle as compared with the population of that country. We have it on most indubitable evidence that in 1880 there were 700,000 Canadians who had sought homes in that country. During the past few years we have been spending millions of dollars to bring foreign immigrants to this country and yet the census shows that to-day there has been only an increase over 1870 of 1,000,000 people. Where are all the thousands of people that they spoke of bringing to this country? Where have they gone? They have vanished like the snow beneath the summer's sun. Where is the natural increase of our population which we ought to have had in this country to-day, and which ought to have amounted to 1,000,000? They have been driven from our country; unable to find employment here in Canada, they have sought homes and employment in the United States, and yet if we confront the Government with these facts, if we reproach them with this state of affairs we are told we are unpatriotic. Dr. Johnson said that patriotism was the last refuge of a scoundrel; and I believe that if we did not get up in this House and denounce the Government and lay before the country the true state of affairs we would be false to the positions we occupy here, and we would not be doing our duty to the country to which we owe our allegiance. To tell us when we state that they have so maladministered the affairs of this country that certain things have taken place—to tell us that we are lacking in patriotism is in my opinion a piece of cool impudence on the part of these hon. gentlemen. We are here to criticise the acts of the Government, to point out to the people wherein they have failed in the discharge of their duties, and if we fail to do so we are false to the duty which the country expects us to discharge. Sir, it is all very well for hon. gentlemen to say that this is not a matter which should be brought up; it is all very well for hon. gentlemen to say that in 1874 the Government of that day supported a policy of bringing immigrants into this country. I desire to remind hon. gentlemen that since 1874 things have changed. In 1874 we had a time of prosperity; in 1874 we had not workmen enough in the country to do the work we had for them; in 1874 there was no clamor by the workmen of this country against further immigration. To-day the workmen of Canada represent a large proportion of our population, and we are bound to pay regard to what they are telling us all over the country. Then, Sir, I say there was no clamor, no protest against the bringing of workmen into Canada, while to-day you cannot go into a single meeting of workmen throughout this vast Dominion but you will find one of its resolutions is condemnatory of the Government for assisting immigrants to come into the country, to enter into competition with them. Their language is strong and unmistakable upon that point; and the best proof that the ex-Minister of Agriculture felt that he was not altogether clear in this matter is to be found in the fact that at a meeting at St. Thomas and other meetings held elsewhere, he had to get up and excuse himself and say that the Government were not doing so badly and that it was only agricultural laborers that they were bringing into the country. We know very well that mechanics are coming in day after day in the guise of agricultural laborers and entering into competition with our own mechanics. That hon. gentleman does not get up to-day and say that his policy was a good one; he does not get up in an aggressive mood and assert that what he did was right, but he tries to excuse himself for bringing in the classes of people that we say he is bringing in. Sir, the policy is bad and wrong, and the Government know very well that the workmen throughout Canada will hold them responsible for that policy within fifteen months or perhaps in a less time than that. What have they done with the millions of dollars that they have been appropriating for immigration? They have been squandering it among the Tory press of Canada—squandering it in that way and other ways. They have referred to the Ontario Government, but I say the policy of the Ontario Government is a different one. Only $18,000 was appropriated this year by that Government and yet the leader of the Opposition in that House felt it to be his duty to get up and protest against further immigration being brought into this country. The man in the small House in Ontario thinks that it is a bad thing, but hon. gentlemen in the big House of the Dominion think it is a good thing. So far as the Conservative party in the country is concerned, one portion of them are entirely opposed to bringing immigrants into the country, whilst the other portion of this House seem to be in favor of that policy. I repeat that the workmen of Canada will hold the Government responsible for this enormous expenditure which has been going on for the last seven years; I say that that expenditure has assumed the proportion of—shall I call it—a huge job, and the quicker the people of the country put their foot down and give the Government to understand that this expenditure must be stopped, the better it will be for Canada and her people. The time will come when further immigrants will be required, and when that time comes let us appropriate sufficient money for the purpose, but at the present moment, under the present condition of commercial depression of the country, I say it is an act of cruelty on the part of the Government to bring further immigrants into the country to compete with our people. They tax everything they eat, everything they wear, the very fuel that heats their bodies; they have done everything to make living as expensive as possible, and yet they are bringing more people into the country to reduce their already reduced wages. It is notorious that on the railways of this country the workmen are working for 80 or 90 cents per day; their wages are barely sufficient to keep body and soul alive, and yet under this deplorable condition of affairs the Government is insisting on maintaining their policy of the past, and what a ghastly failure that policy has been. For years they have been telling us that they were building up the North-West country by thousands of people; they have been leading us to believe that there was a large population in that country, and to-day we are startled by the facts told us by the census returns that there are only 23,000 white people in the North-West, and that the population of Manitoba is a mere bagatelle. Either they have been misleading the country intentionally or unintentionally, or else the people they have been bringing here have immediately gone to the United States, one thing or the other is the true state of the case, and let hon. gentlemen perch upon which horn of the dilemma they please. I say again that this thing must stop. I appeal to every man in Canada who has the interests of his country at heart that this is a condition of affairs which should not continue; and this system of jobbery—shall I call it—must be put on end to; and if it is not done before the elections, I believe the verdict of the people will tell the Government that they have been acting improperly in the policy they have been pursuing.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not rise to reply to the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, because my hon. friend has been making simply a stump speech. That has been shown very clearly by the frequency with which he referred to the Knights of Labor and the workmen. There were, however, two or three propositions put forward by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that I would like to glance at before this debate closes. He said—and it is a statement which will command the assent of all in this House—that we would gain nothing by misrepresenting the facts. Now, I believe in that most thoroughly. I believe it is not a wise course to take to only set forth the brightest and most favorable circumstances with reference to a country. I believe it is worse, however, to take all the exceptional disadvantages of a country, and simply make up a statement of those. Of the two I should rather choose the former by far. My hon. friend said we gained nothing by misrepresenting facts. Now, if I had been simply a spectator coming into this country and into this House for the first time, and listening to the speech of my hon. friend, I should be unable to give Canada credit for one single thing of good with reference to her soil, her climate, her population or her progress for the last five or six years; and my hon. friend goes entirely against his own proposition that we must not misrepresent facts, when just on the top of that he picks out the isolated facts which are to the disadvantage of this country and dwells on them solely, without reference to other facts which are more favorable in their character. I hold that the true way is to give our country its fair chance. If it has good qualities, say so. If there are parts of it which are specially fertile, let us say so. If there are disadvantages, we need not always conceal them, neither need we always be bringing them to the front. A fair and square statement of the country on an average is what will benefit the country and what will be in the long run the fairest policy for any party to carry out. But to be continually talking of the disadvantages of the country—all countries have their disadvantages—and harping upon them is not representing facts, but misrepresenting facts—something which my hon. friend from Bothwell did not wish to have done.

Mr. GILLMOR. What did he say against the country?

Mr. FOSTER. What did he say in favor of it? Why, he said against the country that it was losing its population; he said against the country that it was wasting its money for no purpose; he said against the country that its climate and soil were not the best in the world, and that there was no use of shutting our eyes to it.

Mr. MILLS. I did not state that.

Mr. FOSTER. While he stated all these things, he did not state one single advantage that the country possessed over any other country with which he compared it. Now, if the hon. gentleman was honest in his statement, and honest in his wish to represent the facts, he would have given the country credit for something good, instead of giving it credit for nothing but disadvantages. My hon. friend read a resolution which was introduced into this House, in 1878, or 1879, and he chose to say that those who introduced and those who voted for that resolution—because it stated that the proposal to introduce the National Policy was intended to retain laborers in the country who were leaving it by thousands for want of employment—were just as unpatriotic as the members of the Opposition were charged with being for giving those disadvantages a prominent place in all the speeches they make. Now, the difference between the two is simply this. My hon. friend declares that people are leaving this country by hundreds of thousands without proposing anything which will remedy this state of things, while the resolution of 1878 or 1879 proposed a remedy, and then gave reasons why that remedy should be adopted.

Mr. MILLS. We are proposing a remedy now.

Mr. FOSTER. Do not be uneasy, my dear friend. What proposition did the hon. member for Bothwell make in his speech to-night which would remedy this state of things? What proposition has he ever made but this: Put the others out, and put me and my friends in. Now, having stated that difference, I want to draw the attention of the House for a moment to a very specious style of reasoning which my hon. friend adopted in reply to the Minister of Agriculture. It was this: The Minister of Agriculture suggests, says the hon. member for Bothwell, that prices are lower now than they were in 1879; then he goes on to argue that if prices are lower, they must be lower for one reason and one only, that is, that labor is cheaper now than it was in 1879; and if labor is cheaper than it was in 1879, it must be because of the hon. Minister's immigration policy, which has brought in immigrants so that competition has reduced the price of labor in the labor market.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. "Hear, hear," says my hon. friend—exactly what I wanted him to say. He admits that I have stated it fairly, and yet there is not a shred of fair or honest reasoning in the deduction he came to from the premises from which he started. Is it a fact that cheapness of products always depends upon cheapness of labor? I say it is not, but it is perfectly compatible with reason and common sense that you may pay your laborers better wages, and at the same time there may be conditions under which you may sell your products at lower prices. What is it besides cheapness of labor that contributes to the cheapness of products? One thing it may be, is cheaper raw material. Now, when it suits my hon. friend, he gets up and makes a point against the National Policy and against arguments on this side, by saying: "Oh! these things are cheaper, but raw material is a great deal cheaper than it was in 1878." But when it suits him to make a point against the Minister of Agriculture, he leaves out entirely the greater cheapness of raw material, and he says that if the products of the manufacturing are cheaper, it is because the price of labor has been depreciated.

Mr. MILLS. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to make one observation? I referred to the matter because the statement of the Minister of Agriculture was out of order. I assumed that he spoke to the question, and when he said that the cost of production was reduced 25 per cent., I did not suppose he meant that it was reduced in consequence of the National Policy, because that was not the subject before the House.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend cannot make a scapegoat of that statement, because when I put the proposition before the House, he assented to it by saying in that honest tone "hear, hear" which means with him, "them's my sentiments." Now, besides cheap material, there is another thing that cheapens the product, and that is better methods of manufacture, and these will increase in the exact ratio as the manufacturing become older, become more steady, have a more assured market, and gain more skill and more capital in the carrying on of those manufacturing. And so, if you start manufacturing in a country, their first period will be the period of the poorest work and the highest prices; and then, in proportion as the experience in manufacturing increases, according as the manufacturers settle down to their work and the artisans become more skilful, they learn the cheapest methods of producing, the great effect of which is to cheapen the cost. Again, if you make a market larger and more secure for the manufacturers—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. What else would bring in immigrants, but to show them that they may have goods cheaper, and that this cheapness comes, not from competition between themselves and the artisans in the country, but from securing to the manufacturers better and larger markets, so that the factories may turn out larger quantities, and the more they turn out of course, the cheaper the cost of production. My hon. friend spoke of the loss of population, and he read many figures to show that the people were going out of the country faster than they came in. But what figures did he rely upon? The figures he relied upon were those given by United States immigration agents, or census or Customs officers, whatever they may be—those officers who have been proved so unworthy of credence that their own Government had to take them away from the positions in which they abused their trusts, and to abolish the whole system. If that is all the authority my hon. friend can find to endorse his statements, we know what value to place upon them. But there is one very odd circumstance in this connection. If immigrants come here, and, finding things in a certain state, become disgusted with the country, as my hon. friend says they do, and leave it, where in the name of common sense do they go and why do they go there? They go to the United States my hon. friend says. Why? Is it because they have a freer trade system than we have?

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Does that draw them?

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. That is they flee from the Customs and Excise taxation which we have and which is so grinding, to a country which has a Customs and Excise taxation three times greater.

Mr. MILLS. But there you have free trade among forty nations.

Mr. FOSTER. And here we have free trade among seven or eight nations, and in proportion to our size our trade is about equal to theirs. And if they have a trade among forty nations, does not the taxation from Customs and Excise weigh upon them, as it does upon us, only in a far greater ratio; and if the hon. gentleman's statements were right in other respects, when you take our population and divide it into the Customs and Excise so as to make a per capita rate, you must also take that of the United States. People, say hon. gentlemen opposite, will not remain here because of the too grinding rate of taxation, but fly away to that sunny, beautiful clime where there is a taxation rate for Customs and Excise three or four times greater than ours. They also leave our North-West because of our terrible land laws, and go to the United States where the land laws are not nearly so liberal. So that when you come to look into the matter, there must be something wrong somewhere.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes; something wrong.

Mr. FOSTER. And I think the reasons I have given show that the wrong does not lie with the policy of this Government. My hon. friend afterwards apostrophised somebody or something, and cried out: "Why do we not maintain our own people in our own country?" I will give him a short answer. If he and those with him would stop for one short year their dismal wailings about taxation and the grinding monopoly, they would find people would stay by hundreds where they are now going out by hundreds. It is an easy matter to raise discontent; it is an easy matter to make people think they are not as well off as they might be somewhere else, and the constant round of speeches and newspaper editorials which flow through this country every day, crying down the country, is something which does not tend to make people more contented or more in love with their country. Again, it is said there is no work, and my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister), drew a most miserable picture of the thousands who were without employment in every town and city of Canada. Well, we must have a large population in some of our towns or else every person in them must be idle.

Mr. LISTER. I said nothing of the kind; do not go so fast. I said that there were throughout the country, and you could not go into a town or a city but where there were hundreds out of employment.

Mr. FOSTER. I take my hon. friend's denial as he gives it; but if I have two ears that hear, the statement he made was, as I heard it, that in every city and town thousands were out of employment. However, that does not amount to much. The point I wish to make is this: My hon. friend drew a dismal picture of the want of employment. I want him to contrast our own happy, peaceful, prosperous, beautiful Canada of the year gone by, with England, Belgium, France, with the United States, with any other great country of the world, and if he can find any one of them in which labor has been more contented, employment more steady, want or poverty less known, I am mistaken in my views. The best proofs are not statistics, not the declamations of any hon. gentleman. They are the quiet year in and year out experience which hon. gentlemen here, coming from every constituency, have had and can bear testimony to. And the experience of hon. gentlemen on this side, as of hon. gentlemen opposite, is that our own country has, as regards peace and prosperity and lack of disturbance between labor and capital, kept pre-eminence in comparison with all other great countries of the world. I have only now to reply to the assertion which is couched in the question, Where does all this money go? millions upon millions of it are wasted! I think there is another side to this. I do not deny for a moment that in every great expenditure—I do not care in what department or under what officer—there may be and must be some money expended which brings no direct return. But to state that millions upon millions spent on immigration have been wasted and there has been no return is simply to exaggerate. There is another side to the question. When Confederation brought together the four Provinces of this Dominion, Canada began first to be known as a large and prosperous and promising country in the areas whence immigration was hoped to have been drawn; and when, later, Province after Province was added, and the great North-West was joined on to these older Provinces, and it began to be explored and its resources to be opened up, the countries from which immigration was to come had to be advertised of that fact. You might as well try to grow up a child to the stature of a man in six weeks as to try to grow up the knowledge of the resources and the extent and advantages of a new country in old and settled and far distant countries in a short space of time. I say there has been a rich return for the money which has been expended in the seed-sowing, in spreading information of the resources, the capabilities, the extent of fertile land, the mineral riches, and the riches of sea and land which exist in the Dominion of Canada. I say that this has been the seed-sowing of that knowledge. We have had to pay for it. We could not have had it sown in any other way, and the fruitage of that seed-sowing is beginning to come now; and, as the years pass by from this on, as from 1879 up to this time, you will find as the result of that seed-sowing and of the knowledge which has been scattered far and wide by the expenditure of this money, that Canada has been, is now, and will be taking hold in a greater degree of the peoples of all those countries, winning to itself a place in their affections, that they will be sending out to this country their immigrants who, settling in this country, shall become a nucleus to draw still further immigrants to it, and to draw their friends from every clime to settle with them. This could not have been done without the expenditure of money, and, although we have not yet reaped all that we may have expected, we shall in future reap the benefit of an accession of a noble class of citizens brought from other countries in consequence of the expenditure of money which was absolutely necessary to spread the knowledge of this country abroad.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) has made a presentation of the case tolerably ingenious and with considerable ability. He has, however, I think, in some particulars, made statements that will militate against his own view of the case. I was particularly pleased to find that the hon. gentleman took up a point of the subject which I had intended to take up myself, and explained in a most satisfactory manner why goods were cheaper now—if they are cheaper—than they were in 1878. He explained that it was not because the taxation is less, not because the Customs duties are less, but, as he informs us, because improved methods of manufacture have an increased tendency to reduce the price of goods. This is true. It is a law which has been in operation for centuries; and, within the past forty years, the price of goods, from this cause, and from this cause alone, has steadily been reduced. I have no doubt that in many lines of goods prices are actually lower to-day than they were seven or eight years ago, notwithstanding the fact that the duties imposed are very much larger. But the hon. gentleman, if he took the pains to make comparative statements as to prices, to compare the prices in this country with those which exist in England and in other countries, would find relatively the prices here are higher now than they were in 1878 or at any time between 1874 and 1878. He would find that, notwithstanding the fact that there may be an actual lessening of the value of goods, there is a comparative increase, and that the inducements for smuggling to-day are greater than they were between 1874 and 1878; that the advantages of buying in foreign markets and importing into Canada are much greater than they were between 1874 and 1878 under a revenue tariff. He certainly explained very satisfactorily why goods might be cheaper to-day than they were then, but he took care to make no comparison of prices as between this country and other countries. He tells us, with regard to the expenditure for immigration, that rich returns have been received for that expenditure. I agreed with him. Rich returns have been received. Of an expenditure of $500,000, two-fifths were applied to the legitimate objects of the expenditure, and three-fifths went into the pockets of favorites—a rich return surely to the favorites of the Government, to the officials, to those who printed pamphlets, to those who advertised, to those who did not receive assistance in passages. To those men rich returns went. They have reason, through their mouthpiece the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster), to say that the expenditure of this money has brought rich returns. It would have been better for the hon. gentleman to define more particularly in what respect he wishes us to understand the rich returns have been received. He finds great fault with my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). He says that a misrepresentation of facts is to be deplored. I agree with him. He says that, if a statement is to be made with regard to the affairs of a country, it is better to present the bright side than the reverse. I will agree with him to some extent in that. He tells us that a fair, square statement is what he wants. I agree with him there, and the facts will prove that my hon. friend from Bothwell did nothing more than make a fair, square statement. When he was challenged to say what the hon. member for Bothwell had said against the country, the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) said he had spoken about its losing population. That is merely a reference to a melancholy fact, which we deplore, and the causes for which we desire to remove. He said he has also spoken about the country launching into debt recklessly. That is another melancholy fact which we deplore, a condition of things which we wish to remedy. We have been frequently taunted—we were taunted by the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon—with being the enemies of this country. The Minister of Agriculture made use of the expression that we upon this side were the best immigration agents the United States have. There is great injustice in these charges. It is perfectly proper for the representatives of the people in this Parliament to realise and recognise great existing facts. It is perfectly proper, in order to realise the facts that exist and militate against the prosperity of this country, to recognise them as existing facts, and it is patriotic to try to remove the causes which lead to this melancholy state of affairs; and the sense in which the members of the Opposition have grappled with this question and criticised the policy of the Government is a patriotic sense, with a sincere desire to remove the abuses, to remove the causes which impede the progress of Canada, which prevented the settlement of Canada, which drive from Canada its own sons to another country. The facts that the debt of this country is increasing with great rapidity; that the land laws of this country are less liberal than those of the United States, that various circumstances have militated against the prosperity of this people and have handicapped Canada in its race with the United States—these are the things which we deplore and which we desire to be removed. We point out the result and the consequences of these acts, and we ask the Government to rectify its policy, to change its course, and to remove these things which militate against this country; and we are met with the taunt that, in displaying this to the world, in giving to the public the reasons why we do not make greater progress, we are guilty of preventing the country making progress. Nothing could be more unfair. Now, the hon. gentleman tells us that the immigration statistics of the United States are totally unreliable. Well, what immigration statistics shall we appeal to? The other day the Minister of Agriculture informed us that we kept no statistics at all. I put a question on the paper asking the Government what was the supposed emigration from this country to the United States during the last year, and I was told that the Government had no information to give, that they had no statistics in regard to the matter. And if we are to make an estimate at all, we must resort to American statistics. Now, Sir, a careful scrutiny of those statistics will satisfy any fair and candid man that they are substantially correct. If you take the statistics compiled at the district of Detroit, including Port Huron, and with those statistics as a basis, compare the census returns of the United States, which are admittedly correct, you will find that they correspond very closely with the census statistics. For instance, take the decade between 1870 and 1880. The United States census tells us that in 1870 there were 496,000, in round numbers, of Canadian born people in United States, and that in 1880 there were 712,000. Now you take the immigration statistics on the frontier and compare them during the period from 1870, upon the basis of the census returns, allowing a death rate of 1 per cent. per annum on the population going in, and 2 per cent. per annum on the initial population there, and you will find the result will be that the census statistics of 1880, compared with the immigration returns, come within between 7,000 and 8,000, that they are, in fact, remarkably correct. We are warranted in assuming that they are substantially correct, and basing our calculations on those statistics, which agree with the census returns up to 1880, we are warranted in believing that to-day there are 1,000,000 Canadian born persons in the United States.

Mr. CARLING. Has the hon. gentleman read the circular of Secretary Manning?

Mr. CHARLTON. I have. But it does not follow from the fact that Secretary Manning has sent a circular abolishing the collection of those statistics at Port Huron, that they are unreliable. When this thing has been carefully examined, when it has been tested by the census returns of the United States, and you find, with a death rate of 2 per cent. allowed on the initial population, and 1 per cent. upon the population going in, that the results of the two are the same, we are warranted in saying that these statistics are substantially correct, Secretary Manning to the contrary notwithstanding—although the hon. member assumes, what is not proven, that Secretary Manning abolished the collection of the statistics because they were not correct. That may or may not have been the reason, I believe it was not the reason. The American officials have claimed, at all events, that those statistics were correct, and when we apply the test to those statistics, we find that their position was a sound one.

Mr. CARLING. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to read Mr. Manning's circular?

Mr. CHARLTON. I have admitted it. I say it does not invalidate the position I have taken that those statistics are correct, and they are proved by evidence entirely foreign to Mr. Manning's opinion. They are proved by the fact that these emigration returns given at Port Huron and Detroit, when compared with the census returns of 1870 or 1880, prove that the emigration returns were substantially correct. The census returns for the United States for 1880, show that there were at that time in that country 936,000 children born of Canadian parents; there were 1,600,000 people in the United States either born in Canada or children of Canadian parents, and I venture to say that there are to-day in that country from two million and a quarter to two million and a half inhabitants, either Canadian born or children of the first generation of Canadian parents. Well, Sir, that is a matter of serious consequence to us. We, a nation of less than 5,000,000 inhabitants—at the utmost not more than 4,700,000—have lost two million and a half of our population, who have gone to a foreign country. Are not the Opposition warranted in criticising a policy which has produced these results? Are we not warranted in asking the Government to adopt a policy that will, to some extent, cause to cease this drain upon the life blood of this country. Here we are, a vast region, with undeveloped resources, one of the finest countries in the world. I believe, Sir, that the Province of Ontario is the finest country upon the continent of America. I believe the North-West is as fertile as Dakota and Minnesota, and is well calculated to be the home of prosperous and intelligent millions. We do not decry our country, Sir; we decry and condemn the policy that prevents that country from being settled; we condemn the policy that drives from our shores men that wish to remain in this country; and we hold that we are not unpatriotic in denouncing the Government, in asking them to change a policy which has produced these sad results. Sir, it always makes me warm up a little to be accused of being unpatriotic when I lament what I see, when I lament the short-sighted policy of the Government, when I ask that something should be done to correct this evil—I say it makes my blood boil to be accused of decrying my country and of being unpatriotic. It is these men who are unpatriotic. These are the men who are the enemies of our country, who are piling up the expenditure of our country, who have increased the debt 250 per cent., while the population was increasing 36 per cent. What can you expect but that those who look ahead and see the evil day coming, will abandon this country? Our debt now is $55 per head, and the interest charge is $2.40 per head, against 83 cents in the United States this year. Our public debt is twice as great per capita as that of the United States. Theirs is rapidly decreasing while ours is rapidly increasing. Why, Sir, our young men, our intelligent men, foresee the evils that are coming, and leave us—not because the United States is a protective country, not because it has better soil, not because it has superior advantages, but because it is more wisely governed, financially, than this country, because the taxes are less there, and are likely to be much less in the future than here. For these various reasons they refuse to go to the North-West, and go to the United States. And there is another reason. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) stated this afternoon that our land laws are more liberal than those of the United States. Sir, I deny it in toto. One of the great reasons why we do not secure a population in the North-West is that our land laws are illiberal compared with those of the United States. Take any land south of the Canadian Pacific Railway, land that is worth $2.50 an acre—

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I rise to a point of order. When I left here before dinner the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) had just commenced to answer some of the arguments used on the other side, but outside of the question of assisted immigration. He was stopped by the Speaker of this House then in the Chair. I find now a discussion going on with relation to the land laws. Has that anything to do with assisted immigration?

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a question of order also. No doubt, strictly speaking, my hon. friend is out of order, but a similar latitude was granted to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and I think my hon. friend ought to have the same allowance in his reply.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. member is going very far. At the same time the question of the land laws has been referred to, and I think he should be entitled to reply; but I must ask him to come back to the subject.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Then, I understand that an attack may be made, but no defence may be permitted—precisely what occurred before.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have stated to the House, that it is because an attack has been made that the hon. member is justified in replying.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). This is in reply to something stated on the other side.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If an allusion is made, if an attack is made, I think it is only fair to allow a reply. But the hon. gentleman ought to come back to the main subject of the debate, and this subject must not be continued.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair! chair!

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I desire to point out that—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order! chair! chair!

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If it has come to this, the sooner we know it the better.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for North Norfolk has the floor.

Mr. CASEY. I desire to ask whether it is in order for a member of the House to cast reflections upon the ruling of the Speaker, or to question a ruling after it has been made.

Mr. CHARLTON. I freely acknowledge that I was perhaps a little out of the latitude, if I were to be governed strictly by the character of the motion. But as you, Sir, said I could reply to the charges made I have strictly confined myself to the positions taken by the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Marine and the member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), and I will confine myself strictly to positions that have been advanced by those hon. gentlemen; I thank you for your exceeding fairness and impartiality in ruling that it was allowable to meet those points, and I certainly will go no further. I shall say very little more. I do not wish to be held by any considerable portion of the House to be outside of the rules of debate. It is evident the Minister of the Interior has not been listening to the whole of the discussion and is under a misapprehension as to the position taken. The Minister of Marine broadly made the assertion that the Excise and Customs duties of the United States were two or three times higher than those in Canada the hon. gentleman could not well have been wider of the mark. With respect to Excise duties, they are considerably higher in the United States than in Canada; but it is always to be borne in mind that an Excise duty is a voluntary tax. No man in this country or in the United States is obliged to pay one cent of the Excise tax; it is purely voluntary whether he contributes to it or not. But Customs duties form a compulsory tax to which all must contribute. The amount of Customs duty in the United States last year was equal to $3.18 per head, the amount collected $181,000,000 odd. In Canada it was $4.25 per head, or 33 per cent. higher in Canada than the United States. So the hon. gentlemen's statement, that these taxes were two or three times higher in the United States than here, was entirely wrong. I suppose the hon. gentlemen does not pay any Excise duties, as I do not. I will now offer a few words strictly pertinent to the question before the Chair. This discussion arose upon the policy of spending money for assisted immigration. There is a very general doubt as to whether the policy we have pursued,—and I know all parties have pursued that policy—is the best policy with respect to immigration. I doubt whether we secure by the expenditure of money for immigration a desirable class of immigrants. We may secure the immigration of a pauper class, of a class that are too ignorant to make their choice, of a class too indigent to pay their passage; but that self-reliant class with money we probably do very little towards reaching. The United States for many years, I do not know how many, but for very many years, have not spent one dollar in promoting immigration. On the contrary the United States tax immigrants half a dollar per head on landing at Castle Garden, for the purpose of paying expenditures for quarantine regulations and other matters. The country derives from immigrants sufficient to pay all the expenditure in connection with the management of the immigration department at the various ports. Yet we see the United States have been immensely successful in securing immigrants not only from Europe but from our own country. Their foreign population numbers eight or nine millions to-day, and the immigration of that country has always been on a vast scale and always secured without the expenditure of money on the part of the Government. I do not believe the expenditure of money in this country has produced results at all adequate to the outlay, and I seriously doubt whether it has been any advantage to the country at all. Under the circumstances in which we are placed, the very large public charges we have to bear, our enormous debt, our heavy interest charges and the scale of expenditures which taxes heavily the resources of the country, I think it is well worthy of consideration as to whether this is not an expenditure we can dispense with. I doubt very much whether any serious injury would accrue from striking this item from our estimates altogether. I believe most conscientiously and sincerely, and my belief is the result of investigation in this matter, that the whole policy is wrong. We might as well leave people to select their own homes, and if we will take pains to make our laws such as will reduce our expenditure, reduce our taxation, cease increasing our debt, place ourselves in a favorable position in these respects, the day is near at hand when we must attract population and have a great immigration. The United States have had a great and attractive public domain; but that public domain is rapidly becoming exhausted, and it is a question of a few years only when the attractive fields for immigration in the United States will all be occupied. Our own North-West is the next great point to which immigration will tend, and if our policy is made what it should be, if our laws are as liberal as those of the United States, if our expenditures are as light and our taxation is as light, if we have inducements to offer to immigrants we shall get them without the necessity of keeping up a large immigration staff and spending $500,000 a year to assist immigrants to come here, a majority of whom are of an undesirable class.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The subject with which the hon. gentleman has concluded his remarks, is entirely relevant to the motion before the Chair, and it is one which is undoubtedly worthy of very considerable attention and consideration, and that is whether the policy pursued with respect to immigration in the past, is really the best policy, or whether it would not be better to stop all expenditure in connection with immigration matters, and adopt the principle of allowing immigrants to come here if they choose, and if they do not choose, to remain away. I think the hon. gentleman was not quite ingenuous in his reference to the Manning circular. His statement in regard to that, was that the figures at Port Huron, to which reference has so frequently been made in the past, in regard to immigration matters, were absolutely correct, and were proved to be correct.

Mr. CHARLTON. I said substantially correct.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. The hon. gentleman used the words "substantially correct," and he said this was proved by the census statistics of the United States. We have had some statistics on this subject from the officers of Canada. We have had figures that have been obtained from sources which made them at least of some value. We have had for instance a statement as to the number of tickets sold on railways carrying passengers to and fro to that point, the number of persons going and the number brought back, and we find, measured by that test, which must be regarded as on the whole a very fair test, that instead of the number being 80,000 as the balance of immigrants going from this country into the United States by way of Port Huron, the number of persons going and coming was about equal, 2,000 or 3,000 being the difference. That fact has been established beyond controversy from the books of the railway companies, and it must be regarded as having as much force and weight as the statement of an immigration agent or Customs agent on the other side who went through the cars and pretended to take the number of immigrants and reported to Washington; it should at least have some weight with Canadian public men. That seems to me to be wherein we have a right to charge hon. gentlemen opposite with not dealing quite fairly by their own country—when they accept these statements as true and give to them the weight of their authority as members of this House, as Canadian public men, when those statements have been absolutely contradicted by the most successful method by which it was possible to obtain accurate information with regard to the matter. Now, Sir, Mr. Manning withdrew this particular officer, or rather he prevented his going on with his work, as enumerator of immigrants into the United States, expressly because his statements were not accurate. I will read the circular:

"Since it appears to be impracticable to procure, under the existing laws, accurate statistics of the immigration arriving in the United States from the British North American Provinces and Mexico, you are hereby directed to discontinue collecting the statistics of such immigration until otherwise directed.

(Signed) "DANIEL MANNING,
"Secretary of the Treasury"

So you will see that the express ground upon which that officer was withdrawn from that work was the impossibility—judged by the records of the past—of getting anything like accurate statistics under the system which had been adopted. Now, in face of that circular, and in face of the facts as shown by the reports of Mr. Lowe, who went very carefully into this matter, based on the reports of the chief railway companies carrying passengers from Canada into the United States, and from the United States into Canada, it does seem to me we might at least, in fairness to Canada, assume that the statements made here were accurate, when the highest authority in the United States declares that the statements on the other side were not accurate. Then the hon. gentleman says the United States have succeeded in attracting a large immigration into that country without expending any money, and the hon. gentleman is substantially right. There is no doubt that the United States instead of spending money on immigrants, have actually imposed a poll tax on immigrants coming into the country, and by means of that tax they have succeeded in paying a large proportion of their immigration expenses, in connection with Castle Garden and other machinery of that kind connected with the reception and distribution of immigrants. But hon. gentlemen must remember that for many years when we had no great west at all, the United States had practically on the other side of the water immigration agents of the most practical and energetic kind, for the very reason that upon the successes of their efforts in attracting immigration to the American North-West depended the extent of their earnings. For years before we had our own North-West opened—and that same principle obtains to-day—as immigrants came into that country they became the immigration agents for others to follow them and as the people from different districts managed at that time to get into the great west of the United States, by sending home their letters they naturally attracted others to follow in their footsteps and settle near them so that they would be on this side the water near the friends they knew on the other side. It takes a long time before you can change the current of immigration and bring it into a new direction. What was the inducement that set the current in the direction of the Western States of America? Among others, and perhaps the most influential, was the system of commission paid by steamship and railway companies to passenger brokers in Great Britain and Europe—the commission being not only on the ocean passage, but on the railway passage as well, so that the interest of every steamboat agent in the United Kingdom—his own personal interest—was to send immigrants to the furthest point west, that furthest point being until recently, in the Western States. Take the Allan Line for instance. They have some 1,200 agents in Great Britain and Ireland alone. These men called immigration agents, are in reality passenger brokers. They obtain their certificates from the Imperial Emigration Commissioners, and they are responsible in that way for their relations to the persons who buy the tickets from them, to the Imperial Emigration Commissioners. The further these agents can send immigrants inland in America the higher is the commission they receive, and in that way there have been connected with that company alone upwards of 1,200 immigrant agents with a direct pecuniary interest in sending immigrants into the furthest point they can send them in the United States. That is a process which has been going on for years, and has been building up the population of the United States. On this side, on the other hand, the commission given to the immigration agents until quite recently, was given simply to the port of Quebec, that being practically the port to which they came, and the commission the agent got in that way was therefore a small one. In fact the sum was so insignificant compared with the amount which he could get if he sent his immigrants in the United States, and sent them on to the Western States, that it was a matter of the greatest possible interest to Canada that there should be some means of supplementing to the agent the amount of his commission. If I may be permitted to refer to my own connection with matters of this kind, I may say that when I was sent over by the Ontario Government in 1869 and 1870, that in the report which I presented of my mission at that time—and at that time I may say there was not so great a feeling against immigration as there appears to be in some quarters to-day—I suggested that some means should be adopted by which these agents could get some kind of commission to supplement that of the ordinary steamship company to Quebec, in order to compensate them for the greater commission they would receive in the United States, and thus induce them to assist in promoting immigration to the Canadian side. Now, that process has been going on, and in that way the Government of the United States have, because of this very practical kind of assisting, been spared the necessity of spending money. They have had their land companies, their railway systems, their steamboat companies, and by the system they have adopted in connection with these various companies, they have succeeded in securing the most practical and systematic method of assisted passages—assisted in the sense of paying every one of those agents for becoming immigration agents, and they succeeded in doing it in a way which Canada could not possibly meet. Take for instance the Australian colonies, which stood in the same position as regards the desire to obtain immigrants. The large part of their debt, a very considerable part of their debt—a part so large as to lead one to be surprised at it when you compare it with what they have incurred for other purposes—was incurred on account of immigration, which shows how deeply they felt its importance. In order to counteract the system which was going on and which was attracting practically all the immigration to the North American continent, to the United States on this continent, they adopted a system of free passages altogether, for certain classes of immigrants, and, as I have said, they incurred a large debt in order to enable them to pay these free passages. We in Canada, on the other hand, had to do the best we could, and I think the policy which has been pursued, a policy which was necessary in the conditions in which we stood, having regard to the fact that we are commencing to compete with the United States for the immigration of the old world into our own North-West, and in doing that we had to compete with the great motive power of immigration, that is, the actual settlement of people who are trying to get their friends to come near them instead of going to other places. I say, in view of that, it is absolutely necessary that some expenditure should be made in connection with immigration into this country. The argument which has been used on the other side, and the motive which I venture to say has prompted this discussion on the other side, has been in relation to the immigration of certain classes of mechanics and laboring men, who are said to come into our towns and cities and compete with the laboring men and mechanics in those towns and cities, and so competing to injure those who are already here. Well, Sir, the statement by the Minister of Agriculture to-night, made on his responsibility as a Minister charged with this particular branch, must be accepted as accurate until hon. gentlemen opposite can show the contrary. That statement is to the effect that the only persons assisted to-day are domestic servants and agricultural laborers, and that every person who is assisted has to make a declaration, the form of which was presented to the House to-day by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, that he or she is an agricultural laborer or domestic servant; and the authenticity of that declaration has to be certified to by a clergyman or a magistrate. Now, it is impossible to imagine any manner by which that class of immigrants whose presence here is favored by all parties, whose presence is declared to be necessary by the report of the officer of the Ontario Government in charge of this matter, may be brought here, and by which the bringing of the other class may be avoided, than the method adopted by the Department of Agriculture. My own opinion always has been, and I have not hesitated in expressing it, that if we had expended more on this side of the water, in receiving and distributing immigrants, on the whole it would be better; but to say that a new country like this, with the enormous areas which we have to fill up, and with the competition of the United States in relation to the immigration, should cease all expenditure for immigration, is to say what I venture to think no reasonable man really believes, or what hon. gentlemen opposite, if on this side, would not think for a moment of adopting. The success of Canada in the future depends very largely on the success with which we shall attract immigrants from the Old World; and the policy the hon. Minister of Agriculture is adopting of not granting assisted passages to mechanics and ordinary laborers, who settle in our towns and cities, and who may become disturbers of the labor interests of those places, but assisting domestic servants and agricultural laborers, is a policy of great advantage to Canada, and can be sustained without the slightest trouble, even in the presence of those who for the moment assert that immigration is an injury to their special interests in the country. I think that in the early future, by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, by the success of the branch railways in course of construction in the North-West, and the greater interest that will thus be excited on the part of those companies—an interest which has done so much in the way of promoting immigration in the United States—which shall be able to attract to our own North-West a far larger degree of immigration than we have been able to do in the past, or than the most sanguine amongst us at this moment hope for. I have no doubt whatever on that point. In fact, at this moment, I know that the greatest efforts are being made by the Land Commissioner of the Manitoba and North-Western Railway to settle immigrants in the country to the north of that railway, and that these settlements are soon to become the nuclei of increasing settlements in the future; and the success which has attended them up to this time has induced many of these people to write to bring their friends out. I believe that we shall soon be able to compete fairly with the United States for the immigration from the Old World; but we are only now beginning to overcome the difficulties to which I have just referred, and the absence of which has enabled our friends on the other side of the line to enlarge their immigration to such an extent; but those difficulties having been overcome, we shall before long be able to show that the North-West is quite as attractive as the great American west, and the development of that North-West will form a reasonable parallel with the marvellous development of the North-Western States of America.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister who has just sat down concluded his speech by pointing out the necessity of obtaining immigration of a certain kind—the immigration which would settle in our North-West Territories and fill them up. No one has ever questioned the propriety of obtaining that class of immigration. No one has attacked the Government for having got in too many of that class; our only charge against the Government is that they have brought in too few of them, and not too many. The hon. Minister hopes that our railways now opening up that territory will act as the railways of the United States have done in the way of encouraging immigration. That hope was held out to us very strongly when we were asked to enter into the very expensive arrangements which we did for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That railway has been in operation through the most fertile parts of the North-West for over four years, and yet we have not seen that the efforts of the company, apart from the efforts of the Government, have been successful in bringing a large number of immigrants into the country, and have enabled the Government to largely reduce its immigration vote. Although we have a slight reduction in the vote this year, it is not pretended that it is because the railway company has been fulfilling the expectations which were formed of it as a promoter of immigration. The hon. Minister treated us to some remarks on Secretary Manning's circular in regard to the passage of population back and forth at Detroit, and he urged not only that Mr. Manning's opinion of the statistics collected at that point showed them to be false, but that the statistics obtained by our own officer, Mr. Lowe, in regard to the same movements of population, showed the American statistics to be incorrect. Now, in the first place, Secretary Manning's opinion was only an opinion; but as for the figures which have been put forth by the Department of Agriculture or by the Department of the Interior for that matter, in regard to the movements of population into and out of Canada, I think it is a little too absurd that they should be quoted as showing the falsity of any other statistics whatever. Why, Sir, we have had calculations year after year, of the number of immigrants who went into, and the number of people who went out, of the North-West, taken in the same way from the sale of railway tickets; and the result is that there should be at the present time, if those statistics are correct, about 215,000 more people in Manitoba and the North-West Territories than the late census shows there are. If such figures as these are to be used as showing the incorrectness of American statistics, they should be presented for that purpose before a less intelligent body than this. I say further, that a department whose officers have shown such utter inaccuracy in their figures, as to show a population more than twice as great in a certain district of our country as is really proven to be there by the census, should say nothing of the inaccuracy of anybody else's statistics, and should not ask anybody to take their calculations or opinions as worth anything whatever in regard to such matters. He repeats the statement of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

ture that stringent precautions are now being taken to prevent the assistance of any but agricultural laborers and domestic servants, and he tells us everybody admits the necessity of assisting both these classes by paying part of their passage money. In support of that assertion, he read statements of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture of the Province of Ontario. I do not remember the statement to which the hon. gentleman refers, but I know that the report of the Bureau of Agriculture and Industries of Ontario states that last year there was an ample supply of agricultural laborers and that the average of wages had gone down. It does not seem, therefore, there is any great necessity for assisting agricultural laborers to come out.

Mr. SPROULE. I have a report which says that agricultural laborers are in good demand throughout Ontario.

Mr. CARLING. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Bureau of Agriculture reports there was a surplus population?

Mr. CASEY. I stated there was a full supply.

Mr. CARLING. Will you allow me to read the report:

"The servant girl question is becoming a much more serious problem to our Ontario farmers."

Mr. CASEY. I did not speak of servant girls.

Mr. CARLING:

"It is a subject of universal complaint that the ordinary navvies who know little or nothing of farm work, as well as many lazy and worthless characters impose themselves on the farmers and rather hinder than help them, while at the same time, their presence tends to swell the labor supply and thus to keep down the rate of pay for good hands. Nevertheless, correspondents say that really desirable agricultural laborers, who know their business and are willing to work, are always in request at fair rates of pay."

Mr. CASEY. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture quoted remarks about servant girls. I hope he does not insinuate that servant girls are employed as agricultural laborers in Ontario.

Mr. CARLING. They are employed by farmers.

Mr. CASEY. They are not described as agricultural laborers, and the hon. gentleman, as Minister of Agriculture, ought to be aware of that. The hon. gentleman quotes exactly what we have been urging, that a lot of undesirable navvies and people of that sort, who know nothing about farming, have been imported into Ontario, and by their presence have reduced the wages of agricultural laborers, although a good agricultural laborer can always get employment at a fair rate. But the report states distinctly that the average rate of wages is lower than that of last year. All this leads to the conclusion that the class of immigrants we ought to particularly try to obtain is those whose passage will not need to be paid for them. Immigrants coming out with some small capital sufficient to pay their way, who will settle in the North-West and become the nuclei of thriving colonies there, are the people we want. Special efforts should be made to obtain the immigration of tenant farmers and other small land owners in other parts of Great Britain, who are notoriously in very deep water and suffering severely from agricultural depression, and if there ever was a favorable time for bringing them out that time is now. If the Minister of Agriculture wishes to signalise his tenure of office by doing something really useful with the expenditure of that Department, he could turn it to the best account in setting before these people the advantage of immigration to Canada. In connection with this part of the subject, I must refer to the statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh). I understood him to say that in 1878, the last year of the Reform Government, special efforts were made to obtain the immigration of mechanics and other laborers from England, and I understood him to say their passages were assisted. In regard to that assertion I wish to quote from the report of the London Immigration Agent of 1878. The Hon. William Annand, referring to his instructions, which, he says, remained unchanged in these respects since he went to England, about a year and a half or two years before that time, says they were :

"First, to actively promote, with the assistance of the special agents of the Department, home and foreign, the emigration from Great Britain and the continent of Europe to Canada, of desirable persons of the following classes :

"Tenant farmers, with or without families; agricultural laborers; female domestic servants; children of a certain age under proper supervision, and persons possessed of capital desirous of finding homes in the Dominion; and instead of encouraging, to dissuade as far as practicable, the emigration to Canada, under existing circumstances, of mechanics, artisans, tradesmen, navvies, ordinary laborers, and persons without means belonging to the non-productive classes."

That was the policy of the Reform Government which was changed for the worse by the incoming Administration, and we see the result in the cases quoted by the Minister of Agriculture, where the introduction of navvies and other ignorant laborers had reduced the wages of home born agricultural laborers. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries went into an argument with regard to the cost of manufactured products, saying that the cheapness of cost was not entirely due to cheapened labor. I do not suppose anybody said it was. The argument on our side is that a state of things which assists the manufacturer to import cheap labor, while he is protected in regard to the price of his goods, gives to him an advantage which it denies to the laborer. That is the argument and it has been entirely untouched by anything said on the other side. The Minister of Agriculture contended that the prices of these manufactured products had gone down at least 25 per cent., in consequence, we must infer, of the Government policy. But the Minister must be aware that the prices of other things have not gone down; he must be aware that the price of agricultural land, for example, in the immediate suburbs of London and almost within the immediate corporation of that city, has not gone down 25 per cent. within the last year. Whether the sustained prices of certain individual parcels of land there be due to the National Policy or the importation of cheap labor, or some other cause, I leave to the hon. gentleman to point out. One word only before closing in regard to this much abused question of want of patriotism in running down the country. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries told my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that he had been making a stump speech—

Mr. FOSTER. I made no such statement.

Mr. CASEY. Well, I took down the hon. gentleman's statement at the time. I mean the member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), so the words were taken down correctly. He accused the hon. member for Lambton of having made a stump speech. If anyone will take the two speeches in Hansard to-morrow, and compare them, if he has two eyes to see—to use the hon. gentleman's phrase—who said if he has two ears to hear, and if he has one brain to compare and understand, I think he may come to an easy conclusion as to which of them was more suited to the stump; but I think that a speech containing as little argument, and with as little adherence to the question, as the speech of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries would hardly be offered by my hon. friend from Lambton to his constituents, even on the stump. The Minister says we were talking about the disadvantages of Canada, and, when he was catechised upon the point, it came out that the disadvantages he accused us of imputing to Canada, were the disadvantages of possessing the Government which we possess, it was that the money was being wasted and the population was being driven out of the country—and he said these were what we were imputing to Canada. We do not impute these things to Canada. We admit that Canada has the greatest natural advantages and opportunities of development, probably of any portion of the American continent. We maintain that in every discussion and before every audience. But we complain that Canada, with its great natural advantages, is in the comparatively unprosperous condition in which we find it, not because of any natural disadvantage, but because of the artificial and political disadvantages which weigh upon the energies of its citizens and prevent its attaining to that degree of prosperity that other portions of the continent possess.

Mr. SPROULE. The member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) represents that it is because of the policy of this Government that wages of farm hands have fallen, and the demand for farm laborers decreased. I hold in my hand the report of the Department of Immigration for the Province of Ontario for the year 1885, and I find in it this passage in regard to this matter :

"From the beginning of August till the end of October there was a steady demand for farm laborers, especially for single men. More than double the number who arrived could easily have obtained employment by the year, at fair wages. Of one large lot of practical and experienced farm hands thirty reached Toronto at 5 a.m., their expected arrival having been published in the morning papers, and before noon all had been engaged at wages ranging from $144 to $150 per annum with maintenance. A single man who can plough well, and who has had some experience in taking care of stock, can readily obtain employment at about $150 per annum with maintenance, with a prospect of considerable increase if he should be found to be a good trustworthy man. Should 30 or 40 come together and advise the Department on their arrival at Quebec, farmers would certainly be in waiting at Toronto to employ them. Farmers have been so often disappointed in coming for men that they do not now feel disposed to come to meet immigrants, unless they have some assurance of success."

He goes on to say, in reference to female domestic servants :

"During the last immigration season only a few female domestic servants came to Ontario; not more than eighty-eight reported themselves at Toronto. These were employed in this city and in various parts of the country. The demand for this class is everywhere so great that the few arriving at Quebec are employed in various parts of the Lower Provinces. Wages of experienced servants were higher in 1885 than in the preceding year. Good general servants can readily find employment at from $8 to $10 per month."

Speaking of the experience in my own county, I know it has been the case for several years back that, although farmers have need to employ many hands during the summer months, and these they were ready to employ the year round, they were able to get only a small fraction of those they applied for, and the wages paid were very high. The hon. gentleman says the wages have been reduced in consequence of the policy of the Government. The Commissioner of Immigration says that it was—

"Owing to the low price of wheat and the more general use of machinery, the wages of farm laborers have ranged some what lower than in 1884. This reduction was particularly noticeable in the case of harvest hands. It will be remembered that not many years ago in some parts of the Province farmers had to pay harvest hands $2.50 per day with board, and in some places even at these high wages laborers could not be had. This difficulty is not a recent one, as farmers were under the necessity, at least for one season, of paying in some localities as high as $5 per day to harvest hands. This state of things led to the general use of reapers, mowers, self-binders and other machinery, and the farmer who is well supplied with machinery can now take off his harvest with his ordinary help."

That is the reason which he assigns for the somewhat reduced price of farm laborers compared with the last and the previous years, but I can assure those gentlemen who say there is not a demand for farm laborers that it is not the experience in my part of the country. The only difficulty there is that the farmers cannot get these laborers, when they apply for them, and therefore they have ceased to ask for them of late.

Mr. McLELAN. This debate started upon assisted passages, and it has taken a very wide range since. I desire to say a word on assisted passages. The whole trouble has arisen largely from the action of the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, the Government of Ontario. The position which the question assumes now in the public mind is largely due to the action of that Government. Agents came out from Ireland some few years ago, and asked this Government to take charge of the pauper emigrants they proposed to send out. This Government refused, and they went to the Local Government of Ontario and made arrangements with them to receive these pauper emigrants. They then came to the Minister of Agriculture and said: "The Government of Ontario has agreed to receive all the emigrants of that kind whom we send out, and to provide for and locate them and put them in the way of earning their living, if you will do something to assist them in their passages." The Minister of Agriculture said he would assist in their passages on condition that the Government of Ontario would provide for them on their arrival and see to their maintenance. They came out, and in the next winter many of them gathered in the city of Toronto destitute. It fixed itself upon the public mind that immigrants were brought to the country who were unable to get work and some of whom were unwilling to work if work was provided for them. The difficulty arose from the fact that the Ontario Government said: "We will provide for them if you will bring them out." When the Ontario Government discovered the mistake they had committed, they refused to continue it in subsequent years. They came to us and said: "The Local Government refuses to continue that operation, will you do so?" We said: "No, we will not." The hon. gentlemen have spoken as if they had never spent anything for immigration; but, from 1874 during the time they held office, they spent over a million of dollars on immigration, a great deal of which was spent in assisted passages and a great deal in assisting the immigrants after they arrived here. In looking at the returns for 1877 I see a statement showing the number of indigent immigrants assisted, the number of meals and lodgings supplied at the Hamilton agency, and I find that in that year 939 indigent assisted immigrants were brought there; so that their being willing to receive pauper immigrants from Ireland, and to provide for them, was no new experience to these hon. gentlemen. Looking at the returns I find that a large number of mechanics were brought in that year. The hon. gentleman who spoke last read from the report of the London agent, Mr. Annand, that he was instructed to send out farm laborers, servant girls and tenant farmers; but it seems they sent out a large number of mechanics who were assisted in that year. To the Ottawa agency there were brought 72 mechanics; to the city of Montreal, 103; to the city of Halifax, 89; to the city of St. John, 80; to Dufferin, 23; to London, 145; to Kingston, 80; making a total of 592 at those ports. I have not yet gone through the other agencies, but I find to those mentioned that nearly 600 mechanics were brought and assisted out by the Government of hon. gentleman opposite. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) complains that we are not filling the North-West as rapidly as we should wish. Well, perhaps we are not; it is desirable that there should be more people in the North-West than at present. But he should not complain of us when he looks back at the five years they were in office. When they went out of office the population of Manitoba and the whole North West Territory was some thing like 30,000. At present they speak as if the 23,000 whites were all the population we have in the North-West. They leave out Manitoba, which has been growing very rapidly. The city of Winnipeg, in 1880, was assessed for about $4,000,000; in 1885, it was assessed for $20,000,000, in round numbers. The hon. member for Selkirk, one of the representatives of Manitoba, in this House, has now a list of 15,000 electors in his constituency. In the town of Winnipeg there is at the present time nearly as great a population as there were in all Manitoba and the North-West, in 1879, when the hon. gentlemen opposite left office. There are not many gentlemen in this House who have 15,000 electors in their constituency. These facts show how rapidly the population is growing in Manitoba and the North-West.

Mr. McLELAN.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not intend to prolong this discussion, especially as I had not an opportunity of listening to the early part of it. But I must ask the hon. Minister of Finance where he got his figures of 30,000 as being the number of the population in Manitoba and the North-West in 1878. I am not aware that any census was taken, and I am aware that the population in Manitoba and the North-West at that time, all told, was estimated by the officers of the then Government at a much larger figure.

Mr. McLELAN. I got it from an estimation of the Trade and Navigation Returns for that year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it is rather unreliable, and I think the hon. gentleman will find if he were to examine the matter carefully that the numbers were very largely in excess. But the point to which I rose to call attention was this: It appears to me the real question, if we could ascertain it—I know there are difficulties in the way of getting accurate statistics—is, what is, as near as we can make out, the present white population of the Dominion of Canada? Now, on that point, there was a difference between the Minister and myself. If I understood him correctly the other night, he estimated the total population at 4,700,000. I estimated it at 4,600,000, or 4,500,000 whites and 100,000 Indians. Now I just call the attention of the House to the evidence we have got, because this is a vital question. I think everybody who has examined the movements of population in the Dominion of Canada is tolerably aware of this fact, that, as a rule, for very many years back, and I think at this present moment, about one-half of the whole increase, usually speaking, is found in the Province of Ontario. Ontario contains, in any case, very nearly one-half of the whole population, and from various circumstances we know that the increase has unfortunately not been great in the Maritime Provinces. Now we have evidence, wholly and entirely apart from the evidence derived from American sources, as to what the increase of the population in the Province of Ontario has been. We have tolerably accurate municipal statistics; we have tolerably accurate registers of the pupils attending our schools. Now, I put, myself, and always have put, the American statistics entirely on one side, though those American statistics have been strongly corroborated by a great number of incidental pieces of evidence, known to me, and to all parties who have paid any attention to this subject. Well, Sir, what are the facts as to Ontario. We know that from 1871 to 1881 the municipal returns show almost exactly the total increase of population as verified by the census, and if there be any discrepancy it is probably due to the fact that our census was, in my judgment, erroneously taken on the de jure and not on the de facto system; and it is known that a great many persons were counted as inhabitants of Quebec, and probably of Ontario also, who were not residents of either of these Provinces. Now, we have only one substantial piece of evidence to guide us, and that is the municipal returns from 1881 up to the present time. These show that for the Province of Ontario, containing very nearly one-half the population of this Dominion, and certainly not the least progressive Province, the total increase has been less than 90,000, and it is probable that a portion of that is due to the fact that a very large number of its assessors, since their attention has been called to the subject by the repeated discussions that have taken place here and elsewhere, have been more careful and accurate in their enumeration than they were before, so that the apparent increase by their returns is greater than the real increase. If you can place any reliance on those returns, checked as they are by the registers of the school population, it would appear there is scarcely any reasonable probability that the whole population of the Dominion could have increased more than 300,000 in those five years; and that, I may add, is extremely, strongly corroborated by the fact that we know now that those three great Provinces of ours in the North-West only contain 23,000 souls all told, being an increase of 15,000 over the population in 1881. We know also in Manitoba, according to the estimates made by Mr. Brydges and others who have very good means of information in that country, the total increase is probably under 40,000 in the last five years. That is very unfortunate if it be so; we probably will have that estimate checked to some extent by the census the hon. gentleman proposes to take. But I say these facts, coupled with the information we have of the municipal returns in Quebec, which although not continued down to the present date, go strongly in the same direction—all tend very strongly to show that the estimate I made that the total increase in the whole population was barely 300,000 in those five years, is probably accurate. And if that be so, and I know no other evidence that hon. gentlemen have—although I have pointed out to them other means of obtaining evidence which they have not availed themselves of—there can be no doubt that one of two things has occurred with respect to emigrants who have been brought in from other countries. Either those emigrants who have come here have not stayed here; or they have, as a matter of fact, displaced our own population, a thing which I consider very seriously to be deplored. Now, I believe myself that it will be found always and everywhere that almost the only really valuable immigration agent is the prosperous settler. If you can bring into this country a number of people who prosper here, you will have no trouble, any more than the United States have had, in obtaining quite as large an immigration as we can absorb. But if the case is the reverse, if we find the men we bring to this country are not satisfied, and do not report well of the country, then you will find that all the immigrants you bring here rather injure our cause than help it. I know, and I regret it exceedingly, that there has been such a stream of emigration from Canada to the United States for that very reason, because I am aware that all the Canadians who have left Canada and gone to the United States, and have done well there, constitute a very powerful anti-Canadian immigration society from the nature of the case, and they have continued and will continue to attract a large emigration from our country to the United States. But I must say that I conceive it is a very grievous act of folly on our part to be bringing immigrants here, when we cannot keep them in the country; or when, if we do keep them in the country we only keep them here at the expense of expelling our own people, who are infinitely more valuable to us in every point of view than any immigrants who can be brought here. And I am bound to say that the officers and members of the various trades and labor unions throughout the country are perfectly within their rights in saying that it is a most grievous act of abuse on the part of the Government for them to take the taxes of the people and expend them in bringing in here persons who compete with them and their comrades in the labor market. You protect the capitalist, but you do not protect the laborer or the artisan whom he employs, and I say in that respect, if in no other, the policy of the Government is very seriously to be condemned. As to the other question which has been raised to-night, I certainly do not propose to go into it at this hour of the evening, namely, whether we are indebted to a policy which has largely added to the cost of living in Canada, whether we are indebted to a policy of railway monopoly which has tended in a very large degree to drive our own people out of the North-West and Manitoba—that we are indebted to either of those two causes for the prosperity of this country or for bringing immigrants into Canada I entirely deny. One thing is very clear, we have hardly added one million to our inhabitants within the last seventeen or eighteen years, and yet those immigration returns, which the hon. gentlemen opposite rely on, appear to show that we have brought 875,000 into the country in that time. Why, if even a moiety of those people had settled in this country the total population of Canada, allowing for the natural increase during those seventeen or eighteen years, ought to have been considerably in excess of the total population of Canada to-day, even taking the estimate made by the Minister of Finance. The truth is, there is no use in denying it, that from first to last during the whole of that period our immigration policy has been a total and absolute failure. We have not succeeded in bringing any valuable class of immigrants here; we do not appear to be in the least degree likely to bring them here, and I say again the way to bring them here is to lessen our taxes, abolish the monopolies which have driven our own people out of the country, and endeavor to make Canada a cheap country to live in. That is the best way you can bring immigrants here, and I condemn the policy of the Government in the main because it is directly opposed to bringing about such a state of things.

Mr. DAWSON. I shall not detain the House at this late hour in the evening at any length; but I may remark that it is some comfort, when this cry of exodus is heard all over the country, to know that there is at least one part of the Dominion where the population is increasing, and where there has been no exodus. In our part of the country the population has increased very rapidly of late years, and I believe it has more than doubled since the last census was taken. We want in that country all the immigrants we can get. There is no feeling or desire to keep them out; we want all classes, mechanics and others, and there is plenty of employment for them, and general prosperity among immigrants in that country. The hon. gentleman who preceded me very justly remarked that the true immigration agent is the prosperous settler. We have in the district I represent prosperous settlers, and they are increasing very rapidly. The exodus which has taken place from some districts may possibly be made up by the increase of population in Algoma, for the settlers there are chiefly from the older districts of Canada. Port Arthur has increased its population from about 1,500 three years ago to over 6,000 now. At Sault Ste. Marie the population has very largely increased, and for 150 miles eastward from that place, where a few years ago the wilderness was unbroken, except for the settlement at the Bruce mines, along that distance of 150 miles there is continuous settlement, extending back from Lake Huron in some places twelve miles and in others over forty miles. With all this cry as to the exodus, it is pleasing to know there is one part of the country where no exodus has occurred, and where the people are living in very comfortable circumstances. From that part of the country we have had considerable quantities of wheat exported, where a few years ago it was considered that wheat would not even grow. The truth is that the climate is admirably adapted for the growth of wheat, and the settlers there grow considerable quantities of it, and possess a considerable number of cattle. At the last census taken the whole of Algoma, not Algoma proper, but including that portion which lies northward and westward of the height of land, did not contain a population exceeding 30,000. Now, from the voters' lists made out under the Franchise Act, and estimates I have from different parts of the district, the population is not less than 60,000. Here is a very important increase—an increase of over 30,000 in four years. But, Sir, the true way to attract immigration is to open up the country. We have vast mineral regions in Algoma, and if they could be rendered accessible there is no doubt a still larger population would flow into that country. Just across the boundary,

In the State of Minnesota, they have now built a railway to what is called the Iron Range, and they exported last year from that region near our boundary line 225,000 tons of magnificent iron ore, and expect this year to export 325,000 tons more. That ore is considered to be of the very best quality for the manufacture of Bessemer steel. It goes across to Cleveland and from there, I presume, to Pittsburg and other places. This immense iron range extends across the boundary to our own country, and it comes within a short distance of Port Arthur to the southwest, and anything which could develop that region and bring miners into it would be of vast importance to the whole country. It is said that a great many Canadians are in the United States. It has been asserted here to-night that not less than a million people of Canadian descent are now living in that country. It is very likely that such may be the case without accounting for a very large exodus. It is well known that the most fertile part of the United States was not so long ago part of Canada—the whole Ohio Valley—and no doubt there are many people there who claim a descent from Canadians and that should be taken into account in reckoning the number of Canadians in the United States. I merely rose to say that there was no exodus from the district I represent, that the population there is increasing rapidly, and that they have all the advantages of soil and climate that are to be found in any part of Canada. No doubt the country is much broken with lakes and mountains, but there are very fertile valleys in the district, and one thing we can boast of is the clear, running streams that are to be found everywhere in that country. It is a well watered country; it is intersected by beautiful lakes with mountains and valleys and rivers, and that is more than can be said of the North-West which is so much praised, and which is no doubt an excellent agricultural country. But Algoma, which comprises a district occupying nearly one-third the width of the continent, presents advantages very little dreamed of.

Mr. ALLEN. I must congratulate the House and the country upon the growth and prosperity just mentioned by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson.) The district of country represented by him is some 850 miles in length and 200 miles in width, and it has a population of some fifty or sixty thousand. I am glad to hear it, and I do not know any part of this world in which there is a larger scope for immigration than in that district. I believe that its prospects will be bright as soon as its resources are developed. The mineral wealth of that country has not yet been ascertained. I am happy to learn that a line of railway is to be built from Port Arthur further south. I am glad that the Provincial Government of Ontario are setting apart a large tract of that country for free grants for actual settlement, and when prospectors go into that region and open up its mines, the result will be to attract a much larger immigration than we have yet seen in that part of the country. I believe too, that the prospects of the North-West are bright. I am happy to be able to agree with the Government in saying that we have the grandest, the largest, and the richest opening on the face of this earth for immigration. Our country to-day is superior to any other in the world for industrious, sober emigrants who want to make homes for themselves. The hon. Minister of Interior has referred to Australia, and other hon. gentlemen have alluded to Tasmania and the Cape of Good Hope and other colonies. These places should not be mentioned in the same day with Canada as fields for immigration, in comparison of climate, of soil, of the hardships that people have to undergo, we, in this country, have a great advantage over them. Take the climate of Australia or New Zealand where the thermometer stands at from 90° to 115° in the shade almost every day for six months, where there is not a shower of rain in the country for at least eight months in the year, where the thermometer stands at midnight at 95°, 100°, or 105°, and where the heat is so intense that the people pant for a breath of fresh air and are glad to move out of doors at midnight to get a mouthful of it. For my own part, having been in these countries I would rather spend three of the most severe, the wildest, and most wicked winters I ever saw in Canada than undergo one summer there; if hon. gentlemen present to-night had spent half a dozen years in those southern climates, they would pray more sincerely than they often do that they might come back to our Canadian winters, where although the weather is cold we raise the best class of humanity in this world. I believe the prospects of Canada are brighter than those of any country in the world and while I say this, I say we have advantages for immigration better than any other county, and yet I say that there is something radically wrong that our population has not increased more rapidly. I would like to bring this fact to the attention of the Government that for the last seven years our population has not increased as it should have done. According to the statement of the Finance Minister we find that the North-West in seven years has increased only 123,000. Sir, that is not what we expected. The country expected that more than that number of immigrants would go into the North-West in one year. Five years ago we were promised that more than that number would go in annually, and the Minister of the Interior should under these circumstances endeavor to ascertain what it is that is preventing the settlement of the country, the bringing in of men who will be actual settlers and citizens of that country, to advance its interests and promote its prosperity. He should see that every facility is given to settlers to obtain lands as cheaply as possible, and to become first owners and purchasers from the Crown. I believe if these things were carried into effect, and we gave the actual settlers the advantages they deserve in that country, our population would increase more rapidly. With these facts before the country, with the prospects we have, and the facilities we possess for building one of the grandest and most prosperous nations in the world; if that country is honestly and fairly governed; if colonisation companies and all other companies that take advantage of actual settlers are wiped out of existence altogether, and every possible encouragement is given to actual settlers, I believe our population will increase more in the next two years than it has done in the past five or seven years. But, Sir, under the present financial depression, when farmers find it so hard to pay expenses and produce so cheap, it would not be wise to spend money in further immigration for the present.

Mr. WATSON. I do not, like the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), represent a constituency adapted to mining, with bright lakes and sparkling streams; but I believe I represent a county which offers inducements to immigrants that are not surpassed by those offered by any other county represented in this House. I am sorry, however, that the best hopes of hon. gentlemen opposite, and on this side have not been realised from the large expenditure of money which has been made for immigration purposes. We have homes for millions in the North-West, and I only regret that those millions are not there; but I claim that if the amount of money we have spent had been properly spent, and a good policy had been pursued in regard to that country, instead of having only about 100,000 people, Manitoba would to-day have had a population of 500,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite have only one argument which they offer in reply to the statement that the Government of the day has not been successful in placing immigrants into that country, that is, that hon. gentlemen on this side were not able to do so when they held office. I maintain that that is no argument at all. The present Government have had far better opportunities to induce immigrants to go to the North-West than the previous Government had, and I do not think it is any justification to say that two blacks make a white—that if one party does wrong, the other party ought to do the same. I hope that in the near future the Government will attempt to inaugurate some policy which will more successfully promote the settlement of the North-West. One great reason why that country has not been settled as it should be, and why people have been so much discontented, and have so frequently left the country, is that hon. gentlemen opposite have made pledges with regard to the country, and have broken those pledges. The railway monopoly has been a great obstacle; and statements have been sent abroad made by the First Minister, that it was not the policy of the Government to allow American railways to be constructed into the North-West. According to the reports of the Minister of Agriculture, which have been placed before this House, we should have to-day in the neighborhood of 400,000 people in Manitoba and the North-West, whereas we have only 123,000 or 124,000 there. Secretary Manning's circular has been referred to, and he has stated that the system of keeping agents to make these returns has been given up. I believe if this Government had done that some time ago they would have saved money; and I believe we have evidence that the statistics collected by the Department of Agriculture have been nothing but a fraud. We find the Mail newspaper, in an article published about a week ago, stating that it does not expect that Manitoba and the North-West can be settled for at least seven years. If that paper represents the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite, I do not see much use in spending money for immigration purposes. I was surprised to see that paper making such a statement in regard to the North-West, and intimating that the United States had greater advantages to offer immigrants than we had. I believe we can offer greater inducements to immigrants in the North-West than the United States can. We have larger yields of grain; we have a better climate, and are less liable to damage by wind storms. I hope the Government will see fit to remedy some of their legislation, and to make their land laws more favorable to keeping the poor settler in the country. I do not see why a good mechanic, coming from the Old Country, will not make as good a farmer as a navvy. The mechanics, who have come to the North-West, have made good farmers, and if they have a surplus of mechanics in Ontario, I would suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that he should advise them to go to the North-West and take up farms. I think if the Government would not only help the poor settler to go into the country, but help him to take up his farm, it would promote the settlement of the North-West. We have Scandinavians there, and they make good settlers, because they conduct themselves well, and are accustomed to the climate, and I believe the Government would do well to encourage almost entirely that class of settlers.

Mr. WILSON. I will not at this late hour attempt at any length to reply to some of the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite in reference to the remarks I thought proper to make at the beginning of this debate. I do not know that I should have referred at all to any of those statements had not the various reports been brought forward to substantiate the assertion that the immigration policy of the Government was really in the interest of the labor community. We have heard a great deal of the reports of the Province of Ontario. We have been told that the Ontario immigration report strongly favors the bringing out to this country of a supply of farm laborers, as the supply was not equal to the demand. I have taken the trouble to look over the various reports. I have not only examined the reports of the Provincial Commissioner of Agriculture, but I have looked carefully into the statistical returns of the Bureau of Industries to which a very large number of farmers make reports. It is only natural, if we look to the various agents in the different Provinces for information, that they should make favorable reports, because they know full well that if they made unfavorable reports in reference to the needs and requirements of the country, their usefulness would be gone and they would no longer keep their positions or draw their large salaries. The argument, therefore, of the Minister of Agriculture is not one that should weigh heavily with us in considering this matter. The hon. Minister defied me or any one to show wherein one single line of the letter was not correct in any particular. I accept that challenge, and I think I will prove from reports from various parts of the country, that the importation of agricultural labor into this country is not countenanced by the majority of farmers, and that instead of the report of the Bureau of Industry sustaining that opinion, it condemns the Minister in toto, as regards the remarks he made to Mr. Ingram. To show I am not misrepresenting the case, take the May number of the Bureau of Industry. On page 54 we find:

"The supply of farm labor of this year seems to be fully equal to the demand, and the rate of wages for the working season is less than it was for the last year."

If you would examine the various reports coming from the different farmers throughout Ontario you will find that nine out of ten of them state the same thing, and it is upon those reports the secretary has compiled his. This is one instance in which the facts do not agree with this letter, and I suppose it is very unfortunate for the facts.

Mr. CARLING. Read that portion of the letter which you say is incorrect.

Mr. WILSON. I am glad to satisfy my hon. friend:

"As respects agricultural laborers and domestic servants, I find from the reports of all the Dominion agencies that there has been a steady demand for this kind of labor, and I find the same fact very strongly reported by the Bureau of Industries of the Ontario Government in their report for last year."

Mr. CARLING. I have last year's; at least I had it just a short time ago.

Mr. WILSON. I will pass my hon. friend the volume, and allow him to read it.

Mr. CARLING. How often published?

Mr. WILSON. The first number 15th May, 1885, and I have the August number of 1885.

Mr. CARLING. Take the later one.

Mr. WILSON. I will give the hon. gentleman the whole of them, and I think I will be able to show he was a little premature in writing the letter he did, without carefully examining into the facts of the case. On page 31 of the August number, it is said:

"The labor supply for hay and harvesting is reported to be this year quite adequate for the needs of the farmers in every section of the Province."

Does that bear out my hon. friend's letter to Mr. Ingram?

Mr. CARLING. The Commissioner of Agriculture in Ontario sums up all these monthly reports in his own report to Parliament, and it was the annual report I read in which he stated there was not a supply of agricultural laborers and domestic servants equal to the demand.

Mr. WILSON. Admitting that, it does not substantiate the letter. Will the hon. gentleman now deny that portion of the letter in which he said that the Bureau of Industries for Ontario reported as he says they did. If he denies the correctness of that letter, which he has not denied so far, which he has sent to the Knights of Labor and artisans in St. Thomas in order to mislead them, in order to convey to them a false impression; if he will now deny the correctness of that letter and promise me he will write a letter admitting the error, I will not go further. But that is not all. He asked me for another number. Take the November number, 1885, it says :

"There has been an abundant supply of farm laborers throughout the country during the season, and the general tendency of wages is generally reported as downward."

Mr. CARLING. That is late in the fall.

Mr. WILSON. Why did the hon. gentleman not refer to the August number when the employment of labor was in full blast. Why did he not say : "Oh, that was the summer," when the report said there was an ample supply of labor. Not only that, I will read a reply given to a question asked by the secretary of the Bureau of Industries, by one of the hon. gentleman's Conservative friends, a man who, no doubt, cheered him lustily as a faithful Conservative, Mr. Hagens :

"Wages are not likely to advance, as farmers will work within their own limit until there is more remuneration for their products."

Here is a Conservative who says distinctly that wages are going down, who says plainly enough that there is not that demand which was represented by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. This debate has taken a wide range. I calculated only that it should take the range intended by the original motion, but no member on the other side of the House has attempted in any way to justify the position which the Government are taking. Those hon. gentlemen have not told us plainly and truly that the amount of money which they are taking and which they apparently require for immigration purposes this year will be required, nor have they attempted to show that it is in the interests of the country that that amount should be taken. We are told that, during the year of 1885, 7,000 of these agricultural laborers and domestic servants were brought out, and that the Department paid some $40,000. I have no means of ascertaining definitely what were the numbers during 1885, but I will take the numbers for 1884-85, as shown by the Auditor's report. We find, under the head of assisted passages, 10,897 adults at $4.86½ a head and 2,491 adults at $4 a head. What is the cause of this difference? Why is it $4.86 in one case and $4 in another? We find, further, 2,028 children under 12 years, at $2.75 per head. Those are domestic servants and farm laborers, no doubt. These little creatures would do a very large amount of work indeed. Then there are 223 children under one year, at 24½ cents per head. These are domestic servants, no doubt. They would probably require a servant or two to take care of them. Further on we find a very strange item ; and, if you look at the Auditor's report, you will find some very strange developments. There is an amount for commissions to steamship companies' agents on adults' passages at $5 a head. The Minister of Agriculture says they take all the precaution and every means to prevent any people coming from that distance, except the class which they are desirous of bringing to this country, domestic servants and farm laborers. Does not my hon. friend know full well that the breach of the rules, if they have any, is winked at, and that many of those who come out here under the pretence of being farm laborers are not farm laborers. If the hon. gentleman only brought out, under the enormous expenditure which took place during 1885, 7,000 laborers and domestic servants, I say that the system of assisted passages and the system of advertising, the whole system of the Government in reference to immigration, is a mistaken policy. I am perfectly satisfied that any number of immigrants should go to the North-West or to my hon. friend's territory in Algoma, but I complain that, after this enormous amount of money has been expended, my friend from Algoma finds that, though we have a magnificent heritage there, there is no one to take possession of it, and that in the North-West only some 7,000 actual immigrants have gone there, while we have spent a hundred million of dollars of the public money in addition to probably fifty millions of private funds, have constructed railways and have gone on rapidly in public works, and the Government has been lavish in spending the public money in every Department without the result which should take place. How can we sustain a policy which has been without any favorable result to Canada? I therefore feel that he should not continue this policy any longer. I could understand the ease with which the Minister of Agriculture satisfied my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Beaty). He said he was so delighted to know that the Government only assist farm laborers and domestic servants and do not render any assistance to the artisan or the mechanic. He may be satisfied, but I advise him, before he presents himself again in West Toronto, to satisfy himself thoroughly that that class alone is the one aided. This system, I have no hesitation in saying, is not carried on entirely in the interests of immigration. I believe there is not a more fruitful source of extravagance and the useless expenditure of the public funds than the immigration fund. I suppose it would not be in order for me to charge that it is used to a great extent as a corruption fund. I think so, but I suppose I dare not say so. I believe that there are influences brought to bear and advantages obtained by the use of this large amount of money, that the Government are not fully justified in carrying out. I believe their course in this matter would not bear the light of day, and that investigation which ought to take place into all their transactions. I hope that we will continue to agitate this question, that the Government may feel that this course is unnecessary at present, and that they may adopt a wiser course or else give way and allow others to take their places, who will adopt a more prudent course and one better calculated to promote the welfare of Canada.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. McLELAN moved that this House do, on Thursday next, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution :—

That it is expedient to confirm the agreement, made subject to the approval of Parliament, between Her Majesty the Queen, acting for the Dominion of Canada, therein represented by the Honorable A. W. McLelan, Minister of Finance, therein called the Government, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, therein called the company, represented by the chief executive officer thereof, in the following form and words :

"(1.) That inasmuch as the amount actually advanced to the company by the Government on account of the sum of $20,000,000, secured by the first mortgage bonds of the company, to the amount of £4,103,500 sterling, is $19,150,700, it is agreed that the company shall repay to the Government with interest at the rate of 4 per centum per annum, as provided by the Act 48-49 Victoria, chapter 57, the said sum of $19,150,700, such payment to be made in two equal instalments, the first of which shall be paid on the first day of May next, and the second thereof on or before the first day of July next, both with interest as aforesaid.

"(2.) That upon full payment of the said two cash instalments and interest as hereinbefore provided, the land grant of the company shall be reduced by such number of acres as shall be sufficient, computing the value thereof at $1.50 per acre, to extinguish the balance of the loan of $29,880,912, mentioned in the Act 48-49 Victoria, chapter 57, that is to say, the sum of $9,880,912, with interest at the rate aforesaid to the first day of May next; and such reduction shall be effected by the retention by the Government of lands of equal average quality and value with the lands constituting the portion of the company's land grant not heretofore disposed of by the company.

"(3.) That upon the settlement of all accounts respecting the said authorised loan of $29,880,912, and payment and settlement as aforesaid of all sums of money due thereon, all the bonds of the company secured exclusively upon the land grant of the company, commonly called land grant bonds, now held by the Government in excess of the sum of $5,000,000 of such bonds held by the Government under the construction contract of the 21st October, 1880, shall be cancelled, and the debenture stock of the Ontario and Quebec Railway Company held by the Government under the Act 47 Victoria, chapter 61, section 1, shall be returned to the company; and the Government shall authorise the company under section 10 of 48-49 Victoria, chapter 57, to mortgage the Algoma Branch to such amount per mile as is authorised by the charter of the company with respect to the main line.

"(4.) That upon the settlement in manner aforesaid of the indebtedness of the company to the Government, the company may issue first mortgage bonds upon the remaining lands granted to them under their said contract, in such manner as is provided by their charter in respect of the issue of land grant bonds, and to such amount per acre as they shall deem fit, not to exceed $2 per acre, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, all of the outstanding land grant bonds obtainable being first duly cancelled, and a reserve being made from the new issue to cover such outstanding land grant bonds as cannot be obtained for cancellation. And in the event of the company making such issue, the Government will accept in exchange for the said $5,000,000 of the said land grant bonds, a like amount of the new issue or bonds, such bonds to be held and dealt with in the same manner as the Government were by 44 Victoria, chapter 1, intituled: 'An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway,' authorised to hold and deal with the said $5,000,000 so exchanged.

"(5.) That all necessary legislation required to carry the provisions hereof into force shall be asked for from Parliament at its present Session."

2. That it expedient to provide—

(a.) That the Government and the company be authorised respectively to carry out and perform the conditions of the said agreement, according to their intent and purport; provided that the Governor in Council may extend the time for the payment of the first instalment and interest mentioned in the said agreement, to a date not later than the first day of July now next.

(b.) That so soon as the payment and settlement of the sum advanced on the said sum of twenty-nine millions eight hundred and eighty thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars, and interest, shall have been effected, as provided by the said agreement, the company, under the authority of a special general meeting of their shareholders, called for the purpose, may issue mortgage bonds, secured upon the branch of the said railway, known as the Algoma Branch, constructed and to be hereafter constructed, completing the connection between the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the River Ste. Marie, which issue shall constitute a first mortgage and privilege upon the said branch railway, constructed and to be thereafter constructed, including the rolling stock and plant applicable thereto, and upon the tolls and revenues thereof, after deduction from such tolls and revenues of working expenses and of such rolling stock and plant appertaining thereto, as shall be declared and described in any deed of mortgage securing such bonds, which shall be executed by the company, in conformity with its charter. And before the issue of such bonds, the company shall make by-laws, prescribing the mode in which, in case of default in the payment of the interest on such bonds, or of the capital thereof, the rolling stock and plant (if any) included in such mortgage as appertaining to the said branch, shall be identified, and the tolls and revenues derivable from such branch, ascertained and distinguished from the tolls and revenues of the main line, and making such further provisions as may be just and expedient for the protection of the holders of the bonds secured upon the said branch line, without interfering with the rights of the holders of other securities of company. Such by-laws to be submitted for approval to the Governor in Council, and upon such approval, a certified copy thereof to be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State, and that thereafter such by-laws shall continue to be valid and binding upon the company, and shall not be altered or repealed by the company, so long as the bonds referred to therein shall remain in force.

(c.) That the mode of securing the said mortgage bonds, and the rights, privileges and remedies applicable thereto and available to the holders thereof, shall be such as are described in sections twenty-eight, thirty-two, thirty-three, thirty-four, thirty-five and thirty-six of the charter of the company.

(d.) That the company may also issue mortgage bonds to such amount as they shall deem fit, and as shall be approved by the Governor in Council, and according to the terms of the said agreement, secured in upon the lands of the company to which they shall then be entitled under the provisions of the construction contract executed on the 21st October, 1880, and the provisions of sections thirty, thirty-two, thirty-four, thirty-five and thirty-six of the charter of the company shall apply to such last-mentioned bonds: But that in making such last-mentioned issue of bonds, the company shall reserve and place in the hands of the trustees of the mortgage securing such bonds, if trustees are created by such mortgage deed, and if not, then in the hands of some person or company appointed for the purpose by the Governor in Council, an amount of the said bonds equal in value to the land grant bonds then outstanding and unsatisfied above and beyond the sum of five million dollars of such bonds in the hands of the Government, the exchange of which is provided for by the said agreement; and the bonds so reserved shall not be used or disposed of for any other purpose whatsoever, except for providing, by payment or exchange, for the land grant bonds so outstanding and unsatisfied.

(e.) That upon the completion of the said Canadian Pacific Railway according to the said contract, and upon its being duly opened for traffic, the disqualification of the shareholders thereof from becoming or being members of the Senate or House of Commons by reason of their being such shareholders shall be removed, and shall cease and determine."

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—EXTENSION FROM STELLARTON TO PICTOU.

Mr. POPE moved the third reading of Bill (No. 57) respecting the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from a point at or near Stellarton to the town of Pictou.

Mr. VAIL. Mr. Speaker: Before that motion is put, I desire to make a few observations on the position of our railways in the Province of Nova Scotia at the present time. There are two very important railways in the Province that are in an unfinished state. One runs from Halifax to Yarmouth, a distance of 213 miles. In the centre of this road, from Annapolis to Digby, there are some eighteen miles of unfinished road. The whole line from Windsor to Yarmouth was subsidised by the Provincial Government, and sixty-eight miles out of eighty-two or eighty-three between Yarmouth and Annapolis were completed five or six years ago. The remaining distance, eighteen miles, is in an uncompleted state, and it is very important to the whole railway system of Nova Scotia that this road or this link should be completed. It has now been lying in this unfinished state since, I think, 1877 or 1878. The road between Digby and Yarmouth was finished about that time, and this connecting link has been lying partially finished up to the present time for want of funds. This road requires more attention than the road to which this Bill refers. Again, there is a road in course of building between the Windsor and Annapolis road, near Middleton, running to the South Shore, which is being built by a company known as the Nictaux and Atlantic Company. That road is likewise in an unfinished state, and work is almost stopped now in consequence of the company not being able to provide funds to complete it. Again, there has been a great deal said in this House in regard to a line of railway through Cape Breton. Not a mile of railway has been built through that island up to the present time, and it is of the utmost importance, in view of the legislation passed here a year or two ago, that some consideration should be given to the people of Cape Breton in any expenditure there is to be made at the present time in extension of our railway system. Coming back to the Bill before the House, I observe that in 1882 a company was incorporated by this House called the Atlantic and European Shore Line Company. That company was chartered to build a road from New Glasgow, in the county of Pictou via Oxford, to a point on the Intercolonial Railway near Amherst. That work was commenced and vigorously carried on for some considerable time, but the company were eventually obliged to stop work on account of lack of funds. The completion of that road, upon which a large sum of money has been expended already, would to a certain extent give the town of Pictou the very accommodation that this Bill is intended to afford. After that company was chartered they made an arrangement with the people of Pictou that the road was to be carried to the town of Pictou, or, at all events, connected with it, and one scheme was to build a bridge across the harbor, connecting the road and the town of Pictou with the present Intercolonial Railway at Pictou Landing. For the reasons I have stated, this company have been in difficulties, and have not been able to go on with the work. Now, it seems to me, inasmuch as it is quite probable that that work may be resuscitated, and that the necessary funds may be secured for the completion of that part of what is called the Short Line, it is not necessary that this large amount should be expended for the purpose, as I stated the other day, of building a second line of railway to the town of Pictou. If the Short Line is completed, the wants of Pictou town will be fully supplied. It was said by some person in the House that it would be an advantage to the county to have this large amount of money expended there. It is true it may be some advantage to the county, but inasmuch as I understand, and as the Minister of Railways explained, that it was the intention to purchase the two lines of railway already built, which would cover the distance from New Glasgow to the town of Pictou, with the exception of about seven miles, that the advantages to accrue to the county from the expenditure of this money would not amount to a great deal after all, inasmuch as a great portion of that money is to be expended in the completion of two very large bridges, which the Americans or the people of Ontario get the advantage of supplying, as they are now doing, the Province of Nova Scotia, I do not imagine that the advantages which Pictou would derive from that expenditure would be very large. I think the House fully understands the question after what was said the other day, but inasmuch as this line may be called the second line to Pictou; inasmuch as the road already built will have to be kept up by the Government; inasmuch as the Government will probably be called upon in time to keep up the ferry as well as the railway; inasmuch as this line will be an opposition line to the Government road already built—in view of all these considerations, my opinion is that the money proposed to be expended in the completion of this line would be much better expended and be of more advantage to the public generally throughout Nova Scotia, if it were expended on the unfinished lines already projected and chartered, and on which a large sum of money has been expended. I, therefore, move the following amendment:—

Resolved,—That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be resolved that the expenditure of so large a sum of money as is contemplated by this Bill, in order to provide a second line of railway from Stellarton to the town of Pictou, is inexpedient, until other railway accommodation more pressing is extended to other places upon the main land of Nova Scotia and the island of Cape Breton.

Mr. TUPPER. I am afraid the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) does not pretend to be a practical politician, and that he does not ever hope to occupy an important and responsible position in the councils of the country. He surely has forgotten, when he now proposes to stop this great public work from being carried on in his native Province, that Parliament is already pledged to its construction. He surely has forgotten that under sanction of the vote which was passed last Session, and assented by him as member for the county of Digby, the Government has advertised for tenders for the construction of this railway, and offers have been received—if the contract itself has not already been made—for the prosecution of the work; and it is a curious time for him to choose to reverse the settled policy of this Parliament; it is a curious time for him to attack the policy under which it is proposed to spend a large sum of money in his native Province. I was not surprised at a member from the Province of Ontario acting in the spirit of the hon. member for South Huron in attempting to throttle this Bill; but I am amazed that the hon. gentleman from Digby (Mr. Vail) should give vent to an expression of opinion which shows that he is in favor of a dog-in-the-manger policy, and that because some roads have not been built elsewhere in the Province a little nearer Digby, therefore we should stop the building of all public works in the rest of the Province. He might as well, had he attended to the explanations which were given the other night when the House was in committee on this Bill, have protested against the erection of public buildings in any other portion of the Province of Nova Scotia until a railway was built in the county of Digby. He might as well have protested against the expenditure of public money generally in the Province of Nova Scotia until his whims and fancies were satisfied; because, had he listened to the explanations given and the reasons advanced for this work, he would have found that the proposition is not a proposition to build a local railway as such, or to extend railway systems such as those are to which he alludes, but to perfect and complete a national railway—the Intercolonial Railway, a Government work, a Government property, and that property a productive and remunerative one, at least that portion of it which this Bill proposes to extend and complete. After the lengthy debate on Friday night, I think the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) did well to make his remarks as brief as possible, and I will endeavor to follow his example. But the hon. gentleman is not only astray as regards the nature of this work, which is not local or sectional in that sense, but he is astray with regard to some other matters. He is astray in regard to some other matters. Although the hon. gentleman has attempted to look this subject up, I think he is not quite familiar enough with it to enlighten this Parliament much on its details. For instance, he says that in 1882 a company under the name of the Atlantic, European and Short Line Railway Company, was incorporated and obtained the contract for the building of a work which included this. I beg to give that statement a denial; there was no such company incorporated. A company under another name, now the Montreal and European Short Line Company, then the North American and European Short Line Company, did obtain a charter in 1882; but the contract that company entered into did not provide for this scheme, nor was the company compelled to build it. The company then incorporated did receive a contract in reference to the mileage subsidy of $3,200 a mile, and under that contract, in order to obtain that subsidy, was to construct a branch from the Short Line system in Nova Scotia, so called, to the town of Pictou; but how the communication was to be made was never arranged, and nothing definite was ever done in regard to it. The hon. member has also been misinformed in regard to the negotiations with reference to bridging the harbor, which took place between the town of Pictou and that company. The negotiations all fell through before anything definite was arrived at, and no arrangement or agreement was ever made. I think it is monstrous for the hon. gentleman to repeat again and again the statement that because these negotiations were carried on for a while in the years 1882 and 1883, and came to nought, therefore the demands of the people of that section of the country for the completion of this Government railway should be denied. I think the hon. member has not approached this question in the proper spirit. I do not think he has attempted to deal fairly with it. I think the reasons advanced in committee show conclusively that this is not a waste of money, that this is not a Bill which will impose burdens on the people for the gratification of the wishes of the people there, but that by using the funds that Parliament now grants every year in connection with maintaining a connection between the Intercolonial Railway system and the town of Pictou, this scheme will be carried out, and will not only meet the wishes of the people there, but will be of great advantage to the Intercolonial Railway proper, and therefore to the people of this country. Now, I fail to see why the hon. member or why other hon. gentlemen show such hostility to this scheme, when we remember that other branches of the Intercolonial Railway were not attacked. I cannot remember another instance in which such opposition was shown towards the completion of terminal facilities for the Intercolonial Railway or the building of necessary branches, or an instance in which such an amount of party spirit was evoked to obstruct and prevent the carrying out of such a scheme, although no other scheme has had for its recommendation that strong argument that this has, that the construction of the work would not add to the taxation of the people in any shape or degree. It is unnecessary for me to go fully into that matter again. It was stated in committee that the Government has to maintain a most awkward means of communication between the town of Pictou, a large and important town, and the Intercolonial Railway, and at a cost of $13,000 or $14,000 a year; and yet for that same cost this work can be constructed, and when built will be of advantage, not merely to the town, but to the Intercolonial Railway itself. The hon. gentleman has again attempted to draw to his aid sectional feeling, if sectional feelings can exist in the Island of Cape Breton, and has endeavored to embarrass the Government by importing into this question the claims of what are to a certain extent rival localities; but I am sure from the expression of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), as well as others in the Island of Cape Breton, that they are too old to be caught by a game like that, and that they are able to show that they have no more reason to complain of the Intercolonial Railway system being completed and perfected in the county of Pictou than of its having been from time to time completed and perfected in the county of Halifax. The hon. member for Digby has never attacked grants of money which have been voted from time to time for adding to the value of the Intercolonial Railway in the county of Halifax and in the city of Halifax, where he resides; but he chooses to attack the expenditure in a county where he does not reside. I do not know whether any such small reasons can underlie his actions; but it is significant that far more money than this has been voted to complete the terminus and improve the arrangements of the Intercolonial Railway at Halifax, and the hon. member has never attempted to arouse sectional feeling in other parts of the Province against that expenditure. The hon. member may be a courageous man; he may not know what timidity is; but he would not talk so glibly of the way in which the people of Pictou town are served by the Intercolonial Railway if he had occasionally to risk his life in crossing the harbor there in winter. I see that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) smiles. We had evidence of his ignorance of that locality the other evening, and I need only remind him that it is not a laughing matter. If lives as valuable as those of the hon. member for Bothwell and the hon. member for Digby have not been actually lost on that ferry, the lives of animals, valued down there perhaps as much as their lives, as well as valuable property, have been lost in transit from the town of Pictou to Pictou Landing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It appears to me that this Bill is out of order. You will observe that clause 3 declares that the money appropriated shall be available for the construction and acquisition of the work until the work is completed and paid for. Now, I submit that that is distinctly in the nature of a grant of public money. The grant at present available lapses on the 30th of June. Therefore this Bill ought to have originated in committee, and have gone through the requisite number of stages. It is an extension of the terms, and equivalent to a new grant.

Mr. SPEAKER. As I understand it, the money for this work has been already voted, and this Bill is only declaratory that the work for which the money has been appropriated is part of the Intercolonial Railway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If you will permit me, that is not the point. This money, which has been voted, was granted in Supply, and it lapses altogether on the 30th June. Now, this Bill goes on to declare that this $250,000 shall be available until the work is completed and paid for.

It may be, for aught we know, completed in four, five or six years off, as the necessities of the hon. member for Pictou may require, and I think that is substantially a new grant.

Mr. SPEAKER. It will have to be put in the Supply Bill again.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But here, Sir, is a new appropriation of public monies by Statute, that ought to have originated by resolution in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is not appropriating any part of public revenue. It is money already appropriated.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But only appropriated to a certain day.

Mr. SPEAKER. Any money that has not been, or is not likely to be, expended before the 30th June, will have to be revoted this year, or it cannot be used. The third clause says, "the money as appropriated as aforesaid," that is, appropriated by the Supply Bill; this Bill does not appropriate it.

Mr. MILLS. Supposing the Bill to be carried with the provision relating to the expenditure of money, would it not make that a permanent charge?

Mr. IVES. This money will not be all expended before the 30th June.

Mr. SPEAKER. This money appropriated by the Supply Bill lapses on the 30th June, and it is only that money which is appropriated. If it lapses it will not be spent after the 30th June. It will be available till the work is completed, but not after the 30th June. There must be a Supply Bill every year for the money.

Mr. DAVIES. The wording of the Bill will have the effect of extending the vote for an indefinite time. The third clause reads: "The money appropriated shall be available until the work is completed and paid for." In passing the vote through the Committee of Supply last year, the House merely authorised the expenditure of money during the current year; but this is an amendment extending the time, and, after this is passed, the Government have authority to expend the amount either before or after the 30th June. It is practically a revote of the money voted in Supply last year.

Mr THOMPSON (Antigonish). The money was voted last year for this work, and a doubt has arisen as to the right of the Minister of Railways to enter into a contract by which it is proposed to expend that money. Notwithstanding the fact that it has been voted by Parliament, his authority to expend it for the construction of a branch of the Intercolonial Railway, has been questioned. The effect of this Bill is simply to enable him to exercise the power he has under the Railway Act in respect of the Intercolonial Railway, and to apply the money to that purpose, not as a revote, or extended vote, but simply to make it available for the purpose.

Mr. MILLS. I do not think the Minister of Justice quite apprehends the position taken by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). The Government have put a Bill before us which must, so far as this clause is concerned, originate in committee under a resolution, unless a sufficient provision was made by the Appropriation Bill of last year. Now, the Bill is a charge upon the revenue of the current year only, and lapses at the end of that year, and a Bill founded upon that appropriation must be consistent with the appropriation itself. It must deal only with the appropriation for this year for work that can be completed within the year. But that is not the intention. The Minister proposes to take power to construct a railway which will be a general charge, not upon the revenues of this year, but upon the resources of Canada. It is a permanent charge upon them. If the Bill be carried, it will be a permanent charge, no matter whether there was an appropriation made in the ordinary provisions of the year or not. It will be as much a statutory charge as the charge for the Governor General's salary, or any other charge against the revenue of the country. It is not a charge against the revenues of the year founded upon the appropriation made for the year, but a permanent charge against the revenues of the country. Therefore the appropriation made last year is not sufficient authority for the third clause of this Bill.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). In so far as the Bill affects the construction of the railway by the expenditure of capital, it must be in order. The appropriation of $250,000 made last Session lasts until the first of July. We have the right, therefore, without the intervention of the committee, to say that that appropriation shall, until the first of July, be applicable for the purpose mentioned in this Act.

Mr. MILLS. You do not say that.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). To that extent it is in order, and if it is in order to the extent of the appropriation for one day, it cannot be ruled out of order. The hon. gentleman points out that this Bill involves a general charge on the public revenue, but that would apply to every Bill under the Consolidated Railway Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the words "and shall be available for that purpose until the work is completed and paid for" have any meaning, this is a distinct statutory enactment that the $250,000 voted up to the 30th June shall continue to be available for the purpose of carrying forward this road until the work is completed and paid for. It may be those words are wholly and entirely improper there, but still they remain in the clause, and I cannot see how it can be contended they do not confer power to use this appropriation after the 30th June.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I thought I had stated my view on that point before. It is this: The Bill assumes that the $250,000 has been appropriated for this work, but that there is a deficiency in the authority of the Minister to apply it to this work for want of suitable legislation in the Consolidated Railway Act. There has been doubt as to the application of that Act to a work of this description, and the Bill, without appropriating the money or extending the appropriation as regards time simply, makes it available for the purposes of the company.

Mr. DAVIES. The very argument the hon. Minister uses is one proof that the Bill is out of order, because in Committee of Supply this House authorises the expenditure of a certain sum until the first of July, but the Bill goes further and provides for expenditure beyond that date.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It does not necessarily go beyond the first of July. It is fully expected the work will be completed at that time.

Mr. DAVIES. Well, that is another question; but we will keep to the point. The Bill says it shall not be confined to the first of July, but the money shall be available for all time to come. Therefore, on the face of it, it is a justification for the expenditure of money which has never been initiated or voted upon in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. IVES. The hon. gentleman will see the position in which his contention would place the House. If he is right this year, he will be right next year; and if the work could not be completed by the 30th June, 1887, we could never complete it, because we could not begin it without an Act. Granted that you cannot do it one year, and granted that the Supply Bill is only good for one year, you are in a dilemma, and you could never do anything at all.

Mr. MILLS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would suggest that, in order to remove any doubts as to whether the money is intended to be available when the vote lapses or the Supply Bill of the present year lapses, the last words should be struck out of the Bill:

And shall be available for that purpose until the work is completed and paid for.

If these words are removed, and it were made plain that there must be a revote, that would remove any doubt, and I think it is desirable that there should be no doubt that this is to be revoted.

Mr. MILLS. It will have to go into committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, after this amendment is disposed of.

Mr. DAVIES. Whatever amendment might be moved might take a different form after the clause is amended.

Amendment (Mr. Vail) by leave of the House, withdrawn.

Order for third reading of Bill discharged, and Bill referred back to Committee of the Whole, amended and reported as amended.

Mr. POPE moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. VAIL moved the amendment which he had previously proposed (p. 661).

Mr. WOODWORTH. I do not rise for the purpose of intimating any intention of voting for the amendment, but I do think that there is a great deal in what the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) has incorporated in his amendment—that is, that there are other portions of Nova Scotia excepting the city and county of Halifax and the eastern portion of Nova Scotia. There are eight counties lying south and west of Halifax, and those counties have not got a fair share of public money in the extension of railways and the opening up of facilities for the people of those different sections. I do think that with the Nictaux and Atlantic Railway lying there, 75 miles in length, in a state of dilapidation and collapse, owing to the want of funds to go on with it, when Nova Scotia has given $6,000 a mile to that work, a sum which is totally inadequate to carry it on, and with the gap between Annapolis and Digby of some 20 miles lying unfinished, with a great deal of bridging to do—I say I think, in view of these facts, that the Government should give their attention to these matters, and other matters connected with the western part of the Province, and not to give all the public money to the city of Halifax and the eastern part. I do not object to give money to the city of Halifax and the eastern part, where it is needed, and I have no doubt that this is a very useful work which is contemplated by this Bill, and that it is very important that it should be done; but while these things are being done the Government should not leave the others undone. While I do not intend, as I said before, to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail), still I leave it with the Government to say if they think they have got sufficient funds—and they ought to know whether they have or not—whether they can meet the just and equitable demands of the western parts of the Province and the island of Cape Breton, which has no railway at the present time, and which has been in great need of it for many years. I presume that the Government know their business, and that they have undertaken to do this, believing that they will be able, during this Session, also to provide for the other parts of Nova Scotia.

Mr. KIRK. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have been charged with opposing this grant because it is a grant for Nova Scotia. For my part, I repudiate the charge. I am a Nova Scotian, and I am willing to vote for any reasonable amount of money, or any amount the Government choose to put in the Estimates, for any necessary public works; but I am not willing to vote away the people's money, the money that belongs to the people of Nova Scotia, money which is to be charged to the people of Nova Scotia, to build a second road for the town of Pictou, to build a road to a town of 3,000 inhabitants that has already a road, while, as the resolution put into your hands sets forth, there are other portions of Nova Scotia proper, and the whole of the island of Cape Breton, without a mile of railway at all. Now, Sir, I agree with what the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) has said with regard to the western counties. Here are several counties, for instance, Shelburne, Queen's, and Lunenburg, with a population of 60,000, and not a mile of railway in any of these counties; yet the town of Pictou must get two railways, while these have none. Then we have all the county of Halifax east of the city, and the county of Guysboro', with a population of over 40,000. These counties also have no railway facilities; yet, these counties ought to be considered before we build a second railway to the town of Pictou. Then there is the island of Cape Breton with four or five counties, and with an aggregate population of 95,000, with varied resources of mines, agriculture, and fishing, but with not one mile of railway; yet, here we are asked to vote money belonging to the people of Nova Scotia and to the people of the island of Cape Breton, in order to build a second railway to the town of Pictou. Sir, I repudiate the idea that we oppose it simply because it is going to the Province of Nova Scotia. It is not money voted to the Province of Nova Scotia, but it is money voted to the town of Pictou, which has already one road. The hon. member for Prince County, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Hackett), and the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), have sought to justify this vote because it would give employment to our people. Why, Sir, are we to vote away money for the special purpose of giving employment to the people. If the Government should propose to build a modern Tower of Babel upon some of the capes of Nova Scotia, would these hon. gentlemen vote for the expenditure of the money simply because it would give labor to our people? Surely not. Why, Sir, I opposed the expenditure of money which was voted by this Parliament for a work in my own county, and that at a time when I was running an election and asking the votes of the people; I opposed the grant because I thought the work was unnecessary, I considered it an absolute waste of money. Upon that ground I shall oppose any grant, I care not for what county, or for what Province. Sir, we are told by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) that the road will be a remunerative one. The present road you have there is a remunerative road, but will it be a remunerative road if there is another built to perform the same work that the present road is doing now. If you have to support two roads to do the same amount of work that is being done now by one, will the new road then be remunerative? I fancy not. Now, the hon. member for Pictou said that he did not oppose the grant to other branches. For my part, I did not oppose the grant to other branches of the Intercolonial Railway, and I would oppose a grant to no branch if the town to which it was to go was in want of a railway. I am sure I would not oppose the granting of money to build any road where I was sure the public interest would be served by it. But it is because the town of Pictou has already a road that I oppose the granting money to build a second one, and that, too, in view of the fact that provision has been made by this Parliament to build a road from Oxford to New Glasgow which will accommodate Pictou, whether this road is built or not. Now, Sir, I was sorry to hear a remark made by the hon. Minister of Justice in his speech upon this Bill on Friday last, which I cannot allow to pass unnoticed. I have to make an apology to that learned and exceedingly polite Minister for his high-minded and gentlemanly reference to myself in the opening sentence of his speech.

Had the hon. gentleman spoken in a higher tone of voice so that I could have heard him, I would have acknowledged the generous compliment at once, and I hope it does not come too late now to be acceptable. The hon. gentleman's remark is worthy of him, and shows the true inwardness of the man, and is one for which I shall ever bear towards him a grateful and kindly remembrance. Sir, the hon. gentleman is a very learned, wise and great man—in his own estimation, at any rate—and an exceedingly important man, and, like Sir Oracle, "when he opens his mouth no dog must bark." More than all that, he is a very brave man, which I shall show before I am done. The hon. gentleman, I have no doubt, has not forgotten the geography of his own county, a knowledge of which he obtained by riding by rail from Halifax to the town of Antigonish and back once or twice a year during the five years he represented that beautiful county in the Local Legislature. But a generous nature would have pardoned me if I, in common with all Nova Scotians, have forgotten that the hon. gentleman had been for four years the Attorney-General in a Nova Scotia Government. And why? Because those four years of the history of Nova Scotia, so far as railway enterprises are concerned, formed an entire blank. That hon. gentleman with his party obtained power in that Province in 1878 on the cry that Cape Breton and other sections of the Province required railways. He came into Parliament in that year with a majority of twenty-one in a Legislature of thirty-eight; and during that whole Parliament what did he do towards providing railways? The Government simply re-enacted a law which the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) the other day said was enacted by the previous Government for the purpose of depriving Cape Breton of railways. That was one of the acts which the hon. gentleman performed. I had almost forgotten another piece of history. The hon. gentleman also passed an Act incorporating a syndicate, a bogus syndicate, that was to build railways everywhere—a syndicate that had not one dollar of money and could not obtain one dollar. Those being the facts, the hon. gentleman might have pardoned me for having forgotten them. Then we come to the time of a general election. In 1882 the hon. gentleman went to the country having a majority of twenty-one. How did he return after the battle was over?

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to keep to the tenor of the Bill. The matter to which he is referring has nothing to do with it.

Mr. KIRK. The hon. Minister attacked me on that line. He pretended to pay me a compliment by saying that I had forgotten history. I want to point out that he had reminded me of some forgotten history.

Mr. SPEAKER. We must try to keep to the subject under debate.

Mr. KIRK. I have been talking about the hon. gentleman's performances in regard to railway building.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I think the hon. gentleman should be allowed to go on.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman is allowed to go on, it will lead to an answer, and remarks will be made backwards and forwards. Hon. members should keep to the question under debate.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I hope the hon. gentleman will be allowed to finish the speech which he got somebody to write for him since last Friday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rise to a point of order. I think the Minister of Justice was entirely out of order in making such a remark. It is not in consonance with his position in this House to throw such taunts across the floor to an hon. member.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman should have gone a little further, and said that the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) was distinctly out of order in reading his speech.

Mr. KIRK. I beg to say that I have not read my speech. The remark made by the hon. gentleman is just such as I might expect from an hon. member like the Minister of Justice. That I have notes of my speech indicating what I intended to say is true. I was going on to state that the time came when the present Minister of Justice had to appeal to the country for approval of his conduct. He went to the country, and how did he return? Not in a majority, but a hopeless minority.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. Some hon. members call "chair," and I must hold that the hon. member, if he has not the unanimous consent of the House, cannot refer to those old matters.

Mr. KIRK. Ministers should, if they do not wish to provoke discussion, treat members with courtesy and respect.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Vail.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

REAL PROPERTY IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 10) respecting real property in the North-West Territories. He said: Mr. Speaker, when this Bill was introduced I took that opportunity of stating to the House what the details of the Bill were, in so far as they were connected with the main principles. I propose, before coming to the second reading, to confine myself to a statement of the two principles which appear to me to be involved in this Bill, and a short statement with respect to the working of similar enactments in other parts of the world. I am glad to have the opportunity of making the few statements which I desire to offer on this subject in the presence of some gentlemen who have already given the subject a great deal of attention. I am aware that the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) on two occasions in two Sessions drew the attention of the House to the necessity of adopting a measure like this with respect to land in the North-West Territories. And the hon. member for Bothwell, while Minister of the Interior, introduced a Bill embodying the same principle, and he carried it through some of its stages in this House, and I understand he has given the subject a great deal of attention since, and has more than once, I think, brought the matter to the notice of Parliament. The two principles which, it seems to me, are involved in this Bill, and to which alone I propose to draw the attention of the House this afternoon, are these: First, the Bill proposes to give, in relation to titles to land in the North-West Territories, facility of proof; second, it proposes to simplify dealings with land in the North-West Territories. As regards the first, the mode by which facility of proof is to be attained, is principally the adoption of the system of certificates of title, issued by registrars of the different districts of the North-West, which certificates of title shall be indefeasible and incontrovertible evidence of title. The House is quite aware, Sir, without my going into detail this afternoon, of the system which prevails in the Provinces with respect to the registration of deeds—the House is aware that with regard to the proof of titles there, a great deal of difficulty and expense nearly always arises, and that as time goes on and titles become more complicated, and the transactions in land become multiplied, the difficulty is very largely increased. In order to establish a title we have to go back to the grant from the Crown, or so long a period back that there will be a presumption of a grant from the Crown, and then investigate every transaction that has occurred since that time in relation to the transfer of the property. We have, however not ended the difficulty when we have completed the searches, because, in relation to each transaction, whether it be a conveyance or the transmission of property by operation of law, we have to extend the enquiry, for the reason that at every stage of it, questions of fact arise—questions of pedigree, questions of marriage, questions of forfeiture—and as to the actual execution of instruments, and while the investigation is exceedingly laborious and becomes more so as time advances, the uncertainty increases at every stage. We propose, then, in accomplishing what I think a measure like this will accomplish, to establish facility of proof of the title by making the certificate of title which shall be issued by the proper officer after due investigation, after due proof, before him or before some competent authority—incontrovertible and indefeasible evidence of title which shall not be contradicted even by the true owner, in an action of ejectment, or in any other proceeding. The second object which we design to accomplish, that is simplification of dealing with land, is accomplished by establishing uniformity in all conveyances of the same class. We adopt the system of short forms of conveyance, carrying the implication of covenants which are not expressed.

The signature is attested and registration is necessary to validity, and so fully is this to be the case, that the instrument will not operate as a conveyance of the property until it is registered. At the time of the registration of the instrument of transfer, the outstanding certificate of title is to be given up to be cancelled, if the transfer is a complete transfer of the property. If it be only an encumbrance to the property, the certificate is to be produced, in order to have a memorandum endorsed upon it indicating what encumbrance is being made. As I said to the House, when I obtained leave to introduce the Bill, following the system which has prevailed wherever this method has been adopted, following the system which prevails with regard to other species of property, the transfer of which is like the transfer which is adopted by this Bill—as, for instance, regulations with respect to shipping—no trusts are to be recognised on the register, and no limitations affecting titles are to be there noticed. The doctrines of notice which affect titles in the Provinces are to be abrogated, and any trusts are only enforceable by the courts of law as against the persons who ought to be charged with them and not against the property itself. This is essential of course in order to ensure the indefeasibility of the certificate of title, and make the transactions accomplished preceding it, simple, plain and effectual. I may mention that the experience in South Australia, from which colony the Act is principally obtained, and where it was originally put in operation, has been the simplification of the dealing with land, which I have mentioned as the second principle involved in this Bill, has been so completely accomplished that transfers, whether by mortgage or sale, are said to be frequently accomplished in the space of an hour, and at an expense of 10 or 20 shillings at the outside. There is, it is true, some danger of fraud and of error in relation to any system whatever which aims at and accomplishes simplification. The more simple, the more direct, the more rapid these transfers are to be made, the more danger there is both of fraud and of error. It is quite true that it is barely possible that the transfer should be successfully forged, and successfully put upon the register, and the legal owner be deprived of his property by virtue of the indefeasible character of the certificate. It is likewise true that it is barely possible in the investigation which the officer has to make before issuing the certificate of title, that error may occur both as to persons and to boundaries. But the experience which I am able to refer to in the working of the Act in other countries, is satisfactory in that respect. Cases of fraud and of error are exceedingly rare, and an assurance fund has been established in almost every colony in which the system is worked, by a small tax on the value of the property as it comes on the register; and in South Australia a tax of one-fifth of one per cent. has been found far more than sufficient to establish a fund for that purpose. I see that in the Act of a like character which was adopted in the Province of Ontario for one portion of that Province, the fund was established by a tax of one-quarter of one per cent. on the value of the property brought on the register. Another circumstance which gives us some confidence as to the successful working of the system is, that in countries where it prevails, it has been found so advantageous to the owners of property that in advertisements, indicating that properties are for sale, it is put forward as one of the advantages, one of the inducements to purchasers, that the title has been registered under the Torrens Act, indicating to purchasers that there is a certainty of a good title and that the expenses of a long investigation can be readily avoided. I think, Sir, that the opinion will be almost unanimous in this House, that while the system itself, in relation to any country in which it is feasible to adopt it, has a great many advantages, we have peculiar facilities for putting it into force in the North-West, for the reason that we are there—as I stated to the House when I addressed the House before on this subject—near the root of the title. Comparatively few patents of land have issued, the great proportion of land there is still vested in the Crown, and in relation to those tracts of land which have been patented, the subsequent transactions are few in number. We have likewise the advantage of having in that country a system of surveys which tends to give some degree of certainty, regularity and uniformity to the boundaries of property thereby avoiding the complications which have been suggested as likely to arise in older countries, were the boundaries irregular, uncertain and changed from time to time. We have also the circumstance that in that country possessory rights are more notorious than in older portions of the Dominion. I have noticed that whenever a discussion has arisen in older countries as to the propriety of adopting the Torrens system, it has been readily conceded that in the colonies where it has been adopted it is a marked success, and the advantages likely to arise from its application in older countries have only been questioned on the ground that there are marked distinctions between the land systems of older countries and newer ones, so that the advantages derived from the system in new countries like the North-West are not possible in old countries like Great Britain, where this subject has received a great deal of attention. In one or two enquiries made by committees and royal commissions, after thorough investigation of the subject by the examination of witnesses and the obtaining of reports from different colonies where the system has been in force for some time, it has been conceded in the reports to Parliament and to the Crown that the system was successful in its operation in the colonies, although as applied to a country like Great Britain its success might be doubtful. I mention these circumstances for the purpose of expressing the opinion, in which I think the House will agree with me, that the North-West, in its present position, possesses peculiar advantages for the adoption and trial of this system. Now, I may detain the House for just a few moments in reading very brief extracts from the reports received from different colonies in which the system has been in operation. In reply to questions put in Lord Kimberley's circular sent to the several colonial Governments for the purpose of ascertaining the success of the system, the Examiner of Titles in Adelaide stated in 1880:

“Up to the present time no difficulty whatever has occurred in carrying out the ordinary transactions of land, such as transfers, mortgages, and leases; and there can be no question as regards such transactions. The Torrens system is a complete success. Land, in fact, being as easily and securely dealt with as stock in the funds.”

The Registrar General of Queensland states that since the Act had been brought into force there, 15 per cent. of the lands which had been alienated from the Crown before the adoption of the Act had been voluntarily brought upon the register, and that nearly 4,000,000 acres of lands, which had been alienated from the Crown since, had been brought under this system. As regards New Zealand, the report was equally favorable. “In fact, the system so far has been found equal to all the purposes of conveyancing.” The report of the Registrar General of Victoria was:

“The proportion of land under the Act is now about 7,557,000 acres, or nearly one-eighth of the whole land of the colony. Titles of every sort and kind, simple and complicated, have been registered, and from the value of £5 to £100,000 and more. The facilities for carrying out mortgages and paying them off are very great, and thoroughly appreciated by the public. The expense of either transactions is comparatively trifling.”

From New South Wales this is the report:

“Although the Act has been in operation eighteen years, no compensation has been made for the deprivation of property, nor has any claim been sustained against the assurance fund, which at the present time amounts to £38,000. The popularity of the Act is so well secured, and the public generally have become so accustomed to our certificates, and have such faith in their undoubted value, as in many instances to decline accepting a property unless the title is registered under what is universally styled Torrens' system."

From Tasmania the statement is:

"The real property Act has now been in operation in this colony for more than eighteen years, during which time 13,714 dealings, all sorts included, have been registered, and I consider that indefeasibility of title has been practically secured, inasmuch as I am not aware of any case in which a registered title has been upset upon reference to the law courts. More than one-sixth of all the lands alienated from the Crown in this colony are now under the Act. It may, therefore, I think, be predicted that the majority of transactions in real property will soon be conducted through the lands titles office, which may now be considered the statutory conveyancer of the colony."

From British Columbia this report came:

"The title to real property has been greatly simplified, without radical changes in the general law. Stability of title, with safety to purchasers and mortgagees, has been secured. The ownership of property, both in town and country, is shown by the register at a glance, and whether encumbered or not. It increases the saleable value of property. It enables both vendors and purchasers to accurately ascertain the expense of carrying out any sale or transfer. It protects trusts, estates and beneficiaries. It prevents frauds, and protects purchasers and mortgagees, and has operated so as to almost entirely dispense with the investigation of prior title. Loans on mortgage are effected, and transfers of the fee are made, with as much ease as the transfer of bank stock is made in England, a search of from five to ten minutes being all that is necessary to disclose the state of any registered title."

I have a report from the Registrar of British Columbia, coming down to the 31st of December, 1879, in which there are one or two additional observations which may be of interest to the House. The Registrar states:

"Lawsuits with respect to the ownership of registered lands are unknown, and must remain exceedingly rare so long as the principles of the present system are in force. * * * Considered in an economical point of view, I believe it to be unequalled by any system for the registration or record or assurances, the registry books alone are about one-half less, and one bookkeeper only is necessary, where, under a copying Act, at least three or four clerks would be required. Up to the present time the fees of office, though fluctuating, have as a whole been sufficient to pay all the expenses of the Department."

I may mention as one qualification of what I have read, that in British Columbia the system is not exactly the Torrens system. It is, so far as the registration of titles is concerned; but the methods of simplifying the dealings in land has not been adopted there; but the old system of conveyancing, which we propose to abolish so far as the North-West Territories are concerned, still exists in that Province. In Manitoba, as you are aware, the Torrens system has been adopted and is stated to have operated satisfactorily. Knowing that the Bill involves a great many details, the discussion of which would weary the House and be unproductive of any useful purpose, I confine myself at this stage to these two points, which appear to me to be the principles involved in the Bill, viz., the giving of facilities for the proof of titles, and the simplification of proceedings in dealing with real property. For the reason that the Bill does involve details which require careful thought and a comparison of opinions, I propose, if it be the pleasure of the House, instead of referring it to the Committee of the Whole House, which no doubt would be proper under some circumstances, to refer it to a select committee. In moving the second reading, therefore, I move that it be referred to a special committee to consist of Messrs. White (Cardwell), McCarthy, McMaster, Mills, Hall, Davies, Weldon, Royal, Shakespeare, Desjardins and the mover.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to Special Committee.

THE INTERPRETATION ACT.

Mr. POPE moved the second reading of Bill (No. 80) to amend the Interpretation Act.

Mr. MILLS. Explain.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman himself raised no objection to the Acting Minister. The second provision is Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish).

intended, if there are objections, to remedy them. The first section reads:—"Words directing or empowering a Minister of the Crown to do any act or thing shall include a Minister acting for him" and so on, in the same direction as the second.

Mr. MILLS. I called the attention of the Government to this subject last Session. Of course the patent issued to a Minister by His Excellency on behalf of Her Majesty authorises the Minister himself to discharge duties pertaining to a certain Department, and the hon. gentleman provides here to empower one Minister to discharge the duties of another. That has long been a principle acted upon, while there was a Minister responsible for the particular acts done by a colleague in his name and on his behalf, which it was possible for him to ratify, it seems to me it ought to be provided for by Statute. What I referred to last year was that there was no patent issued by the Crown and no one ever authorised to discharge any duties in the Railway Department. The Minister of Railways received his position when there was no person to whom the Crown had issued a patent for the discharge of the duties of that office. The office had been kept vacant contrary to the intention of the law, and the Minister of Railways was authorised to fill the office, as Acting Minister, by somebody in some other way than that which the law provides under the great seal of the Province. It is very plain that anyone who so acted was acting illegally. When the hon. gentleman who is now regularly appointed Minister of Railways, undertook to discharge the duties of Minister, without any patent under the great seal of the Province, he was simply, in point of law, a usurper, for he was undertaking to discharge duties he had no authority to discharge by law. The hon. gentleman proposes to provide for a regular instead of an irregular mode of proceeding, so far as the 28th paragraph of section 7 is concerned, but he goes on to provide that:

"All acts hitherto done by any Minister of the Crown, acting for another Minister, or, where such office was vacant in the place of such Minister, are hereby ratified, confirmed and made valid."

Mr. POPE. That is good sense.

Mr. MILLS. It would have been better sense if the hon. gentleman and his colleagues had advised His Excellency to appoint some person to fill the office, as the law had obviously intended some one should discharge its duties. The hon. gentleman's colleague (Sir Charles Tupper), Minister of Railways, came down with a Bill providing for the constitution of the office and the appointing of a Minister; but after succeeding in getting Parliament to agree with them, the hon. gentleman and his colleagues set the law at defiance by failing to appoint or advise the appointment of any one regularly to discharge those duties, and the hon. gentleman undertook to discharge them without an appointment. Let me suppose that he has entered into large contracts with certain parties, as Minister of Railways, without appointment under the great seal. Does he now propose to ask Parliament to ratify all that has been done, and make legal what otherwise was certainly illegal, and perhaps affect the rights of some parties who are disposed to contest what he did? That is practically what he is doing. There is another consideration; an office, a ministerial office, under the provision of this Bill, might be regularly kept vacant four or five years. Is it the intention of the Government that should be done? The hon. gentleman might, on the office of Minister of Justice becoming vacant, permit it to remain vacant, and without the appointment of any person under the great seal undertake to discharge the duties himself.

Mr. POPE. Not very likely.

Mr. MILLS. Well, it may not be very likely. We supposed it would be very unlikely that the hon. gentleman would undertake to act as Minister of Railways without being appointed, and yet, notwithstanding the remote possibility of such an act, it happened, and the hon. gentleman, under the provisions of this Bill, might keep a Department without a head for years.

Mr. POPE. Should the necessity arise, the appointment would be made; but, if the necessity does not arise, it would not.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman sees that the law says what the necessity is. Parliament has declared that such an office is necessary.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

FINES AND FORFEITURES BILL.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 82) respecting the application of certain Fines and Forfeitures.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of the Bill?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I suppose the hon. gentleman was not present when I made the explanation. I introduced it a few days ago, and I then stated that there were certain Acts of this Parliament imposing fines, penalties and forfeitures in respect of which there is no provision as to how those fines and forfeitures shall be disposed of. There is in the Interpretation Act a provision as to how fines and penalties recovered in a certain way are to be disposed of, but a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the Dominion has established that that enactment only applies to penalties which are recovered in suits for penalties, and not to criminal proceedings or quasi criminal proceedings. It is proposed, therefore, by the first section of this Bill to provide that penalties, fines and forfeitures in regard to which no other provision is made, shall belong to the Crown for the public uses of Canada. By the second clause we propose to take power to the Governor General to appropriate those fines and penalties in any manner that may be deemed for the public interest.

Mr. DAVIES. I think the decision of the Supreme Court to which my hon. friend refers is not exactly as he has stated it. It arose under the Interpretation Act, and as to the application of the fines under the Scott Act. The Interpretation Act provides that all fines, the mode of recovery of which was not specially provided for by the Act which imposed them, should be recovered before a civil court, and another part of the section provided for the disposition of the fines. The question before the Supreme Court was whether those two portions of the section were to be construed as one section or whether the latter part of the section was to be construed by itself, in reference to the disposition of the fines—in other words, where an Act like the Canada Temperance Act provided a mode for the recovery of fines, whether the specific appropriation of these fines in the Interpretation Act applied; and the court held, no doubt very properly, that it did not apply in such cases, and therefore, did not apply to the Canada Temperance Act; therefore all fines levied under that Act belonged to the Crown, except those levied in the Province of Ontario. I suppose the main object of this Bill is to appropriate these funds in a certain way. I have no doubt, as far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, that it is required; but whether the wording of the Bill will carry out the intention of the hon. gentleman is a matter of doubt. Perhaps it had better be discussed in committee, as I take exception to some of the phraseology. The hon. gentleman vests in the Governor in Council the power of deciding how those fines should be applied absolutely, and it is questionable whether that power should be vested in the Governor General in Council, and whether the House, now that it is seized of the subject, should not decide how those fines should be applied. A very large amount of money every year is imposed, levied and collected under the Canada Temperance Act. Whether the House would delegate to the Governor in Council, the application of those fines so levied, is a matter worthy of attention. Whether the person who prosecutes, or the municipality in which the offence is committed, should get a portion of the money is a very serious question. In the smaller towns and cities, the civic revenue used largely to be augmented by these fines, and now these moneys are lying there without any power on the part of the civic authorities to retain them. My impression is that the first part of the section is a good one, that the fines should remain in the municipalities; but the second part gives power to the Governor in Council which I do not know that the House is prepared to give them. In point of fact, it delegates to the Governor General in Council the whole power and responsibility of dealing with the fines collected under the Act, outside of the Province of Ontario. I think it is worthy of consideration whether the House itself should not designate the manner in which those fines should be applied.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). There is no objection to the second reading?

Mr. DAVIES. None whatever.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think there should be some provision for a due account of the fines and forfeitures and moneys received being laid before the House, either by formal communication within the first fifteen days of the Session, as in many other cases, or by a regular account being kept, debit and credit, in the Public Accounts, which, perhaps, would be the preferable manner of dealing with the matter. Has the Minister of Justice considered that point, or has he any proposal to make in reference to it?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I have not considered the mode of keeping the account to which the hon. gentleman refers, but I will give it my attention.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would call the attention of the Minister to the fact that this Bill is not printed in French. Of course, there is no objection to Private Bills going into committee without being printed in French, but a Public Bill is a matter of more moment than a Private Bill. I merely call attention to it, not to stop the legislation, but I do not think it is right.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS BEFORE MAGISTRATES.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 84) to make further provisions respecting Summary Proceedings before justices and other Magistrates. He said: The House, I presume, is aware that probably, the most technical branch of law is that which relates to convictions for offences against the criminal law, and the laws imposing penalties of any kind. That branch of our law has very largely to be administered by magistrates who are not skilled in legal procedure, in consequence of which great facilities are given for the setting aside of convictions which are required by the interests of justice and of order. This Bill, which has come to this House from the Senate, proposes to remove some of the technical objections by which convictions of magistrates are continually defeated, and it is warmly approved by members of the profession in almost every part of the Dominion. A statute in the same line was passed by this Parliament last Session, but owing to changes in one or two of the sections, which were altered during the passage of the Bill through Parliament, it was really made ineffectual, and the object of this Bill is to invite Parliament again to reconsider the original propositions of the Bill, which were to remove the serious technical objections which so often result in defeating convictions which are required in the interests of justice. I have a memorandum upon the subject with regard to the details of the Bill, with which I shall not trouble the House at this stage, but which I will give the House more fully when we go into committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

THE LIGHTHOUSE AT CAPE RACE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed resolution (p. 513) on the subject of the transfer of the lighthouse at Cape Race to Canada.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. The object of the Bill which is to be founded on this resolution, is explained in the resolution itself. It is to take over the lighthouse at Cape Race, which was built and hitherto maintained by the British Government, and which it is proposed to transfer to Canada. This lighthouse was built somewhere about the year 1856, and the fund out of which the expense of its maintenance has been paid, has been raised by a tax upon shipping passing through between Europe and America, north of New York, of, I think, one-eighth of a penny per pound. For a number of years back the Canadian Government, rather than submit the shipping, going from our ports to the Old Country, to that tax, has been itself paying the tax, amounting to some $1,200 per year. The time of the transfer is fixed in the Bill for the first of July of this year. The fund which has been raised in that way from a tax on shipping will amount to somewhere near $100,000, and that fund is to be transferred to Canada, as well as the lighthouse. There are some 300 acres of land in connection with the lighthouse, and the lighthouse itself is in a very fair state of repair. Under the system of management by the British authorities it has cost about $7,000 per year for its maintenance; but it can be maintained a great deal cheaper by Canada, owing to the contiguity of position and other considerations. It is supposed, after fairly estimating it, that the annual cost of keeping it up will be somewhere in the neighborhood of $4,000, so that we shall have the fund of $100,000 transferred to us, while we undertake the management of the lighthouse, which has cost heretofore, on the average, between $6,000 and $7,000, and which, it is believed, we can maintain for $4,000. It is a condition of the transfer that all lighthouse dues will be abolished, which have amounted to about $1,200 per year, so that altogether it seems to me that this arrangement will be a favorable one to Canada, as the lighthouse belongs to our system geographically, and it is very important to our commerce. The necessary legislation has been provided for in the Old Country, and we now ask for similar legislation here.

Mr. MILLS. I do not know in what way the hon. gentleman proposes that we should exercise control over the lighthouse and whether it is under the jurisdiction of Canada or whether we are simply to be regarded as private contractors acting under the Government of Newfoundland. I do not know whether the opinion of the Minister of Justice has been taken on this matter, but the ordinary rule that has been applied to us, I think, since Confederation, is that we have no jurisdiction beyond the marine league, and that our jurisdiction is confined within our territorial limits. I have, on two or three occasions before, expressed the opinion in the House that when control was given over the subject of shipping and navigation, and when control was given over maritime defence as well as over land defence, we might make regulations under the provisions of the British North America Act that would have force beyond the marine league. But I think there is a despatch in the possession of the Government, written by Lord Carnarvon, where our jurisdiction beyond the marine league is contested. Now I can understand how we might acquire property the same as any private individual, and how we might enter into a contract with some proprietor for the purpose of holding Cape Race lighthouse as a private property; but that we could exercise any legal jurisdiction over the party who might be put in charge of that lighthouse, or subject him to any regulation that might be made by the Department here, I do not understand. I think, before we undertake to acquire the lighthouse, and make regulations with regard to it, and to incur expense, we ought to know in what character and in what way we are doing this. It may be that this lighthouse, as the hon. gentleman has said, is a necessary part of our lighthouse system, and it might be considered that the whole island of Newfoundland is a necessary geographical part of our political organisation. But it is not so as a matter of law. It is outside of our Dominion, and so is the lighthouse. I should like to know in what way we are going to acquire this, and what sort of control we are going to exercise over it.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). There can be no doubt about the soundness of the principle stated by the hon. gentleman, but an Imperial Statute has been passed, or is on its passage now, through the Imperial Parliament, exactly in the terms of the Bill which my hon. colleague proposes to introduce in this House. The Bill sets out that we have the right to acquire this property by this transfer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does that legislation propose practically to give us jurisdiction over those 300 acres in Newfoundland?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Yes. The Bill to be introduced here is a counterpart of the Imperial Statute.

Mr. VAIL. I know there has been an arrangement existing for a long time between the Canadian Government and the Imperial Government in regard to this lighthouse. I never could understand why the Dominion should have to pay a large sum for the maintenance of this light and Newfoundland be exempt from payment. The light is as useful to Newfoundland comparatively as it is to the Dominion, and I repeat that I never could understand why Newfoundland should not have contributed a certain amount. It is quite true, as the Minister of Marine has said, that under the arrangement there is to be a transfer of $100,000, which will be equivalent in interest to the amount of $4,000; but if the lighthouse has cost $7,000 yearly for maintenance I do not know how the Minister expects to maintain the light and keep the building in repair for $4,000. It has cost us $1,200 a year towards its maintenance, and if it can be maintained without incurring any additional cost over $1,200, it is desirable to take it under the control of the Dominion Government, because in that way our shipping will be exempt from lighthouse dues, which will be rather a favor to them. It seems to me the Minister of Marine should have entered into some correspondence with the Newfoundland Government and ascertained if they would be willing to contribute a certain amount for this light and pass the necessary legislation to fulfil their part of the agreement.

Mr. McLELAN. We have already some three or four lights on the coast of Newfoundland which we are supplying, and judging by the cost of those, we decided that we could maintain Cape Race light at less cost, or at all events for the same amount we are paying yearly, and the interest upon the sum that would be transferred with the lighthouse. Having our vessels employed in the service, and visiting the coast where the other lights are, we considered we could maintain Cape Race light at very much less cost than is now paid by the British Government; and, therefore, we proposed to accept the proposition of the Imperial Government to take the lighthouse over and the fund connected with it.

Mr. DAVIES. What annual charge will this involve upon the revenue of the country?

Mr. FOSTER. The expense of maintaining it over a series of years has reached an average of from $6,000 to $7,000 per annum. It is estimated that it can be maintained by the Dominion Government for about $4,000 a year. We came to that conclusion after having gone fully and thoroughly into the matter. We now pay $1,200 a year rather than have vessels coming to our ports taxed for light dues. As has been said, we shall obtain the fund of $100,000, which at 4 per cent. will reach about $4,000 a year. We shall save the $1,200 and have the interest derivable from the fund. The cost cannot be more than it is now; the assumption is that it will be substantially less.

Mr. DAVIES. What gives the hon. gentleman the assurance that the Government are going to save about $3,000 a year. The light costs now $7,000 when maintained by the British Government, and the Minister estimates that it will cost Canada only about $4,000. On what basis does he make the calculation?

Mr. FOSTER. One basis of making the estimate is that we have already, as has been stated by my colleague the hon. Minister of Finance, maintained a number of lighthouses on that coast, and we know what the cost of maintenance has been, and what staff is necessary to maintain the lighthouse at Cape Race. Instituting a comparison of the cost of those lighthouses to Canada and the expense of Cape Race lighthouse to the British Government, with whom the expenses are on a larger scale than in our case, with these as base the estimate was made that the light can be maintained for about $4,000 a year.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman knows that that lighthouse is probably of far greater importance than some others; therefore the expense is larger. What is the state of repair of the lighthouse at Cape Race?

Mr. FOSTER. I can probably give more information with respect to that matter when the Bill is before the House; but I can state generally that the lighthouse is in a fair state of repair. We have had some examination made with respect to the matter, and the reports are in the Department. Those indicate that the building is in a fair state of repair, in as good a state of repair as lighthouses usually are, some expenditure having to be made on them yearly. Of course it is a large lighthouse, but yet we have the figures as to the cost of maintenance and the exact number of employees necessary, and it is not a difficult matter to arrive at the conclusion that it can be maintained more economically than at present.

Mr. VAIL. I understand that this light has been under the control of the Dominion Government and that they have contributed a certain amount annually towards its maintenance.

Mr. FOSTER. Nothing except the $1,200. In order to relieve commerce and make it free from Canadian ports to ports of Great Britain, the Dominion Government voluntarily assumed that payment rather than have our vessels charged with light dues. The hon. gentleman is right in this, that that amount of $1,200 went to the fund and it was out of that fund that this expenditure was made.

Mr. MITCHELL. In regard to the Cape Race lighthouse, I know some little about it from old associations with the Department, and I may say that it was very necessary for the trade of Canada. It was originally placed there at the instance of Canada. Canada could not undertake to construct the fog alarm, so representations were made if my memory serves me, by the Department and the work was constructed, and it has proved of greater service to Canada than any light or fog alarm that I know of. While it was done by the British Government on the representation of Canadian Ministers, a certain tax had to be levied for the purpose of maintaining it, and all vessels sailing north of New York contributed towards that light and fog alarm. But Canada found the sum so small, involving as it did much trouble to her ship-owners, that Canada agreed to pay, for removing the tax on her vessels, $1,200 a year, and they agreed to pay that and exempt Canadian vessels from the operation of making entries and all that kind of thing. Now, I do not know upon what basis the Minister estimates the cost of maintaining it, but whatever the cost may be, and I do not suppose it would be unreasonable, it would be money well laid out in the interests of Canadian shipping. I have looked into the matter fully, I have read all the correspondence connected with it and I am satisfied that the Bill is one in the right direction.

Mr. VAIL. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the lighthouse at Cape Race was erected at the request of the Canadian Government?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; what I said was that the fog alarm was erected by the British Government on representations made by the Canadian Government as to its necessity, and the plans and specifications were furnished by the Department over which I had control during my administration. The estimates of cost were also furnished by us, and it was at the request, as I say, of the Canadian Government that the British Government undertook the matter in the interests of British and Canadian commerce, and the commerce of the world—or at least that portion of the commerce of the world north of New York, because all vessels north of New York sailing to the British Islands had to contribute towards its maintenance, because it was assumed that they came in that direction and derived benefit from it.

Mr. VAIL. No doubt the hon. gentleman is right, but I understood that there was a light on Cape Race before the Provinces were confederated.

Mr. MITCHELL. There may have been a light, but there was no fog alarm; probably there was a light. However, a fog alarm was particularly needed because there was no point where more shipwrecks, and more disastrous shipwrecks, occurred than at that point, owing to the prevalence of fogs.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If I understand right, we are to get $100,000, which is equal to $4,000 a year forever.

Mr. FOSTER. The amount accumulated is about $100,000. That remains with Canada, we binding ourselves to keep the light free forever.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER introduced Bill (No. 100) respecting the transfer of the Lighthouse at Cape Race, Newfoundland, and its appurtenances, to the Dominion of Canada.

Bill read the first time.

CHIGNECTO MARINE RAILWAY.

Mr. POPE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed resolution (page 513) respecting the Chignecto Marine Railway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Explain.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman will remember that there was a vote for this railway a few years ago—I think in 1882. The company were to have time to carry out the arrangement and we were to give them a subsidy upon the road being built and running to the satisfaction of the Government. We were to pay them $150,000 a year for twenty-five years. That is the position in which the matter stood until last summer, when Mr. Ketchum, the gentleman with whom the arrangement was made, asked us to reduce the time to twenty years, and to increase the amount correspondingly to the sum of $170,602, which amount was arrived at by actuarial calculation. An agreement was entered into, dependent upon the sanction of the House to meet those views. There is no other alteration in the arrangement except one, and that is to this effect; that in case the earnings of the undertaking should exceed 7 per cent. per annum, the company agrees to pay over to the Government one-half of the surplus profits.

Mr. VAIL. Nothing is to be paid until the scheme is completed?

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. On the principle upon which I supported another vote to-day, I suppose I ought not to vote against this, because it provides for the spending of money in the Maritime Provinces, and as we never get anything like our share of public money, of course I could not consistently vote against it. I will say, however, that of all the votes I have ever had to give in this Parliament, there is none that suggests itself to my mind as so utterly useless as this vote of $3,750,000—because that is what it will cost before we are through with it. Of course the country is committed to it. But they are coming here asking for changes in the conditions under which that grant was made; and my hon. friend who always places this question so plausibly before this House, would only do what, in my opinion, would be in the interest of the country, he would refuse to make any alteration; he would say, there is the bond, we have been foolish enough to promise this money, but we are giving it for a public undertaking, as to which we have to ask ourselves if the work is ever completed—and I do not believe it will be—what vessels are to be carried over that railway. There is, comparatively speaking, no traffic; there have never been any reliable statistics presented to the House to show what vessels would be carried over it; there is no tonnage which would be carried to or from the Bay of Fundy that would not go around; and there would not be enough traffic to pay for the grease that would oil the wheels. But we are facilitating the means of getting money, and I suppose it would come from foreigners. The only justification I have for the vote is that it is going into the Maritime Provinces, and therefore I will not say any more about it, but I do not approve of it.

Mr. DAVIES. I am afraid I have not reached that exalted state of political righteousness that my hon. friend has. He seems to agree with the moral rule that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) has laid down, that it is a crime to oppose any expenditure in the Maritime Provinces no matter how absurd or ridiculous it may be.

Mr. TUPPER. I did not say that.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman did not use those exact words, but no other inference could be drawn from his language with reference to the hon. member for Digby. He said it was a curious time for the hon. member for Digby to object to the expenditure of money, and a curious thing that he should object to the expenditure of money in the Province of Nova Scotia. Now, I think it is time we called a halt in these matters, and got our common sense about us, and judged of the expenditure of large sums of money on the ground of their utility and necessity, and not on the ground that they are for the Maritime Provinces. I have no doubt that within a few days or a few weeks there will be an application made to this House for the expenditure of a few millions more or less, to build a tunnel between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

Mr. MITCHELL. You do not object to that, do you?

Mr. DAVIES. We will see when the proposition comes down whether it is feasible or not; but I suppose those gentlemen who defend the expenditure of money simply because it is for the Maritime Provinces, would be prepared to defend that proposition, whether the scheme were practicable or not. But I think this is too serious a matter to dismiss with a little badinage. This Parliament is not committed to this expenditure; the country is no doubt committed by the action of a previous Parliament; but this scheme, which has been so much laughed at, has never been seriously discussed in this House, and the House has never had any statistics on the subject placed before it.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not want to detain the House from going into Committee on this Bill. My main reason for rising at all was to express my surprise that we had not a little fuller explanation from the hon. Minister as to his proposed change in the subsidy he proposes to give to the Chignecto Marine Railway. The hon. gentleman is always very short, even if not very clear, in his explanations. I do not think we can complain that he occupies very much of the time of the House; on the contrary, we can complain that, being a Minister in charge of a very important Department, and controlling the expenditure of a very large portion of the public money, he relies so implicitly on the confidence his followers seem to have in his prescience and knowledge, that he is prepared to ask them to go it blind on nearly every occasion. The hon. gentleman will admit that on this occasion he has made a somewhat important change in the terms of the contract, which has not, to put it mildly, the approval of the practical men; and my only object in rising was to ask him to give some fuller explanations than he has done of the scope and effect of that change. I understand that this Bill, authorising a subsidy to be paid to the tune of $150,000 a year to this railway company—he proposes now to make it $170,000—was one of the last acts done by the last Parliament just previous to an election. I would not hint in the slightest that the vote of this subsidy was intended to have the slightest effect on the vote of the counties through which this railway was to run. But it is rather remarkable that the subsidy has lain dormant these four or five years, that not a single shovelful of clay has been raised or a stroke of work done during those years, and that now, when it is believed we are approaching another election, and the electors of those counties are to be asked again to express their confidence or want of confidence in the Government, the terms of the subsidy are changed so largely in favor of the company. I think the hon. gentleman might have explained to us a little more clearly whether or not there is any prospect of this company carrying out this work, whether it has made any, or what arrangements with capitalists, whether there is any possibility of the work being undertaken before another election takes place, and the terms generally of the agreement which the Department over which he presides entered into with the promoters of the enterprise after the Act was passed; because, if I understand the matter correctly, there was no agreement made between the Government and the promoters previous to the passing of the Act. The Act was a mere guarantee passed to secure the support of capitalists, and the agreement with the Government was arrived subsequent to its passage. Surely the House has a right to be informed of any agreement the hon. gentleman entered into.

Mr. POPE. I laid it on the Table.

Mr. DAVIES. When?

Mr. POPE. Some three or four weeks ago.

Mr. DAVIES.. The new agreement?

Mr. POPE. The Act was the old agreement.

Mr. DAVIES. The Act contemplates that the Department should enter into an agreement with the promoters. I want to know if the hon. gentleman did so, and when, and the terms of that agreement, as well as the terms of the new agreement he proposes to enter into now. In the very few remarks he made, so far as I was able to catch their purport, it was that we are not increasing the liabilities of the Dominion by this change in the subsidy. In one sense, that is true, but in another sense it is not strictly correct, when $3,500,000, which we are to pay to a company, and which was to be spread over a period of twenty-five years, is now to be spread over a period of twenty years instead. Although the hon. gentleman is accustomed to deal with millions, still when it comes to a matter of $3,500,000 he ought to explain a little more in detail the nature of the bargain he is making. However, I will not detain the House going into committee on the resolution, and in committee we can have the explanations.

Mr. POPE. I will explain the matter a little more fully now if it has not been fully explained before. Some three weeks ago, this contract, and it is the only one, was laid on the Table, and the hon. gentleman had only to look at it and he would have found out all the conditions and circumstances made with the company. It is true that the Act was passed in 1882, and Mr. Keifer, the promoter of the Bill, had not been able to get up his company until some time last summer, when he came and said it was desirable this change should be made. If the work is not built satisfactory to the Government, there is no harm done, for there will not be a dollar paid until the work is completed. The hon. gentleman knows well that when the Canal Commission was appointed some years ago, not only to examine Bay Verte Canal but the Welland and other canals, and report, it reported in favor of Bay Verte Canal, which, according to them, would cost $6,000,000, but, according to Mr. Page, would cost from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000. The object of this resolution is to keep faith with the Lower Provinces. This ship canal—

Mr. DAVIES. Does the hon. gentleman believe in it.

Mr. POPE. I have very good authority here for believing in it. Some of the most scientific men on this continent declare here they have perfect confidence in it. Whether I have or not, I do not know much about it, and I might be a little sceptical, but I say it is worth trying. If we can have this for one-quarter the cost of the Bay Verte Canal, I say let us try it. The hon. gentleman will find, if it works well, that we will have saved at least two-thirds of the cost of the Bay Verte Canal. We felt ourselves bound, as my hon. friend knows who rather objects to this to-night, to do something for the Bay Verte Canal. We felt we ought to keep faith, and so did this House, and when the Act was brought down by my predecessor, we felt if we could get this for one-fourth the cost, and if it answered the purpose, it was worth trying.

Mr. HACKETT. I cannot understand why there should be any great objection to the amendment proposed to the Act empowering the Government to enter into a contract for the building of the Chignecto Railway. At the time of Confederation this great work of building a canal, which would connect the waters of the St. Lawrence with the Bay of Fundy, was first proposed, and a board of commissioners was appointed to report on that question. Eminent engineers were sent to the Lower Provinces to make a survey of the route and an estimate of the proposed cost. Mr. Page also made a report in 1871, and a vote of $1,000,000 was placed in the estimates for the purpose of commencing this canal. Although there was no specific pledge made, it was tacitly understood this work would be commenced in the Lower Provinces, and I hope the policy of the Government will be to carry out, as far as possible, all the pledges made and agreements entered into, whether specifically or otherwise, with the different Provinces at Confederation. Hon. gentlemen have charged me with advocating the work in Nova Scotia, simply because it would give employment to local labor. That was not the argument I advanced as I do not care to raise the sectional cry in this Parliament, but we have heard in the Lower Provinces, from the hon. gentleman's own supporters and the Grit press of those Provinces, that the whole expenditure of the Dominion was used in the construction of public works in the west. While I was advocating, therefore, the building of the railway from Stellarton to Pictou, I only brought out the idea that now that the Government had fairly relieved itself with regard to engagements in the west, it was time they should pay a little more attention to the east. I am surprised that any hon. gentleman representing a constituency in the Maritime Provinces should raise his voice on this occasion to condemn the building of the Stellarton-Pictou branch, so as to prevent, if possible, the expenditure of money in the Eastern Provinces, for the hon. gentleman was one of the loudest among his colleagues in denouncing the Government for their course in spending the money of the country in the west. The hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies) has thought proper on this occasion to refer to a project which is now pretty well matured, that of constructing a sub-aqueous railway between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. He says we are asked to vote $3,500,000 for the building of the Chignecto Railway, and that the next startling expenditure will be about $5,000,000 for the purpose of connecting Prince Edward Island with the mainland, and he says it is time to stop large expenditures of this kind. That was not a very patriotic speech of the hon. gentleman. He should make no comparison, as regards the scheme introduced in another branch of the Legislature for the purpose of carrying out the terms of Confederation. That scheme has no connection with this. This idea of building a ship railway will, if carried out, be of great benefit to the trade of Canada. We know that vessels coming down the St. Lawrence on their way to southern ports have to circumnavigate the Peninsula of Nova Scotia, and the building of a marine railway will at once bring that shipping into the Bay of Fundy, and thereby reduce the great risk and expense and time required in coming around the peninsula. The hon. gentleman said there were no statistics at all in connection with the matter but that the House had blindly voted. I would tell him this question was discussed in 1882, though, of course, young men like him (Mr. Davies) and the hon. member for Northumberland had not seats then in the House, and are therefore not qualified to speak on this point, but we had the figures, statistics and facts before us, and it was clearly shown by the then Minister of Railways (Sir Charles Tupper), that he estimated 600,000 tons of shipping and freight generally would be taken across this railway. This was the report made, that a great deal of the trade from Upper Canada, from Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Quebec, going down the St. Lawrence and east for southern ports, would necessarily pass over this railway, and he convinced this House of the great necessity for building this railway, and the great benefit it would prove to be for the trade of Canada. Now, although four years have elapsed, and nothing very practical has been done, yet I do hope that the company having seen their way clear, after having considered the matter and placed their stock on the European markets—and I believe they have had a very fair offer of the money—no obstacles will be placed in the way of the Government carrying this out, but that Parliament will amend the Bill, and thus keep faith, as the Minister of Railways said, with the people of the Maritime Provinces, and will show that no interest which they had at heart at the time of their entrance into Confederation will be neglected, but that, now that the Government have fulfilled the pledges they made in regard to railway communication with the west, the pledges which were made to the Provinces in the east and the contracts entered into and the promises made at the time of Confederation will be carried out.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I desire to refer to a remark of the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island, (Mr. Davies) who said that so far no money has been spent and no work has been done on this enterprise. I believe that Mr. Ketchum, the promoter of the enterprise, has devoted his time almost entirely for a number of years to the work of bringing the scheme to its present position, and that also he has expended a large amount of money, that he has had a number of surveys made in connection with the location of this railway, and that a considerable amount has been expended in testing the undersoil in the district through which the railway is supposed to pass, in order to show that it is practicable. At the present time, that gentleman is in England negotiating with capitalists, in order that the company may raise the money which is necessary to carry out the scheme in view. I feel that that gentleman has been justified in taking the course he has by the action of Parliament in the past in regard to this matter. I feel that, whether this scheme is practicable, from an engineering point of view, or not, whether it has any commercial value or not, that gentleman, at all events, has had good reason to believe that this scheme would receive the sanction of Parliament, from the fact that, as the hon. member who last addressed the House has said, the importance of connecting the waters of the Bay of Fundy with the waters of Northumberland has been repeatedly discussed in this House and in the press of the country. Up to this time I believe the importance of this work has never been called in question. It is no doubt as the result of the action of Parliament and the discussion which has taken place, and the general expressions of public opinion in favor of this work, that the promoters of this scheme have been led to devote years to the study and development of this scheme, and in doing so to expend large sums of money. I know they have brought this matter to the attention of eminent engineers both in Great Britain and America, and in reference to its practicability from an engineering point of view, I know it has received the support of those gentlemen. Its commercial value has been recognised by the boards of trade in the various cities of this Dominion, and I am led to believe that the promoter of this scheme is now in a fair way to raise the necessary capital to enable him to construct the work. However that may be, after the action which Parliament has already taken and after the promoter has been led to make so large expenditure, it would be contrary, I believe, to all precedent that Parliament should even express a want of confidence in the commercial value of the scheme.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you believe in it? Do you believe in it as a commercial scheme?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Whether I believe in it or not is of no importance to this House or to anyone else; but, with regard to the commercial importance of the scheme, the hon. member who addressed the House last furnished a number of testimonials in support of the commercial value of the scheme, which I consider are deserving of far more weight than any opinion I could express. I believe that Mr. Ketchum, the promoter of the scheme, is at present in London, and I am not prepared to say just what position his financial arrangements stand in, but I am led to believe that if this legislation which is now asked from Parliament passes, he will be able to secure the financial aid which is requisite to enable him to carry through his project. I cannot see why there should be any objection raised by any hon. gentleman at the present time to the proposition which is made by the hon. the Minister of Railways. He does not ask for any additional subsidy. He simply asks for a change in the mode of paying the subsidy, and I think, in view of the position into which this scheme has been brought, and in view of what the promoters have been led to do by the action of Parliament in the past, it would be inconsistent and undignified for Parliament now to reverse the policy which it has adopted in the most public and emphatic manner, or even, by refusing to alter the terms upon which the subsidy granted to this company is payable, to express any want of confidence in this undertaking as a commercial enterprise.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not rise to speak of this measure particularly, because it passes through the county which I represent, nor do I favor it because the person who was mainly instrumental in getting the original Bill through Parliament was the distinguished gentleman who previously represented that county, but I am one of those who believe in this project.

Mr. MITCHELL. As a commercial speculation?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. As a commercial success. I believe in it also because the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) was one of those who pronounced in favor of it; and not only did he pronounce in favor of it, but members on the other side of the House did the same. The hon. gentleman may wonder why I make that assertion. I think he will agree with me when I say that any person who was in favor of the construction of the Bay Verte Canal; any person who voted for the large amount of money which was to be expended in that enterprise, must also be in favor of this one, for the same reasons which exist for constructing a canal through the Isthmus of Chignecto exist for the construction of this ship railway. Now, if the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and other gentlemen will turn to the records of Parliament of ten or fifteen years ago, they will find, I think, that a Canal Commission was appointed in 1871 or 1872, who made a most careful investigation of the matter from a commercial point of view, and reported unanimously in favor of the project. I have not before me, at present, the data on which they based their reasons for favoring the construction of that work, but I know their report was adopted as the policy of the Government of which the hon. member for Northumberland was a member. A certain amount of money was placed in the Estimates for it, but before anything could be done, the Government had resigned. When the Mackenzie Government came into power they did give up the project, not because they believed it would not be a great commercial benefit to the Dominion, but in consequence of the immense expense which the construction would entail. I think the statements I am making will be borne out by reference to the records. Now, I say that both the party now in power, and our opponents, are committed to this project. On referring to the records of Parliament on the subject of the Bay Verte Canal, it will be found that Mr. Mackenzie only abandoned it because of the great expense, and he stated in Parliament that if the cost would not exceed the amount estimated by the engineers, he would go on with the construction of the canal. I think the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the present leader of the Opposition, when in the Government at that time, also took the same view. Every argument in favor of the Bay Verte Canal can be adduced in favor of this project. I do not think that we ought to be called upon now to discuss the merits of this question because Parliament is committed to it, and it is only because objections have been raised to it, that I refer to these matters. I was surprised to hear my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) come out in opposition to this Bill. If there is any part of the Dominion that is going to gain by it from a commercial point of view, it is the Province of Prince Edward Island. That Province is so situated that it will derive more benefit, in my view, than any other part of Canada; therefore it seems to me the hon. member for Queen's is placing himself in a position inconsistent with the interests of his Province. Allusion has been made to the change of the terms in which this vote is submitted. There is no increase of the amount asked from Parliament. It is to be remembered that the company are not to receive one dollar until they complete the road and operate it; and more than that, they are not to receive a subsidy year by year unless they keep it in operation every year, until the money is all paid. Therefore, I think the Government have taken pains sufficiently to guard themselves in this respect. Now, with your permission, I will read an extract from a speech of the late Hon. John Young who was a great authority on the subject of the trade and commerce of this Dominion. Speaking of the canals of the Dominion, he said:

"It would be difficult to point out all the advantages which would result to Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick by the construction of the Bay Verte Canal. If the 900-ton propeller could deliver Canadian or western products at Halifax, or St. John, these places would thus become cheap depôts for such products. Assorted cargoes of fish, hops, shooks, lumber, &c., could be made up at these ports for the West India Islands and South America, and could bring back return cargoes from those countries of sugar, coffee, hides, tallow &c., to be again reshipped as return cargo to Canada, and the Western States by the inland propeller, and thus be delivered at less cost by such means than by any other possible route."

There is also a report from Mr. Patterson, of the Montreal Board of Trade, though I have not it in my possession, in which he expresses himself in similar terms as to the value of the Bay Verte Canal, and my argument, of course, is that everything favorable to the construction of that work tells equally in favor of the construction of this. I do not see how it can be contended that this work will be of no use. Let hon. gentlemen remember that there are 500 miles of navigation which will be saved by the construction of this canal, and it is hardly to be supposed that vessels and steamers from the St. Lawrence are not going to make use of this route instead of going round the coast of Nova Scotia. Then is it to be supposed that the fishermen from Gloucester and other parts of Massachusetts, are going away round Nova Scotia and Cape Breton instead of taking a short route to the fishing ground by crossing on this ship railway? This will be the first great work of the kind that has been constructed in the world, and I hope there will be no disposition on the part of this House to change the policy already adopted by Parliament, and especially in a matter of this kind where the risk is not in any way to fall upon the Dominion. I am informed that the necessary capital has been obtained to carry it out, and it has been taken up by men of the first standing in England, by distinguished engineers such as Mr. Fowler and others, who have pronounced on the feasibility of the work. I will not detain the House any longer, but I felt that I could not remain silent in a matter of this great national concern, and allow it to pass by without making these remarks.

Mr. VAIL. I am sure the members of the House who have sat here for a number of years are pretty familiar with this question, from the fact that this ship canal was made to do duty several times before elections were coming on, and four years ago the project was changed into a marine railway. Finding that the canal could not be carried out it was proposed that a ship railway should be built across the isthmus. The hon. member for Prince (Mr. Hackett) states that the previous Minister of Railways gave very full information to this House and explained that some six hundred thousand tons of shipping would go over this railway, and the consequence would be that it would be a paying work, and that there was a necessity for the railway being built. I think the very fact that this Act has been on the Statute-book for four years and nothing whatever has been done in regard to it, shows pretty plainly that it is a work that neither commercial men nor capitalists of this country or of England have much confidence in. I must protest against the idea that a vote of this kind of three million dollars odd, and some $300,000 or $400,000 voted this afternoon, for a branch of the Intercolonial Railway should be charged to the Maritime Provinces as a Maritime Province expenditure. The Maritime Provinces are not particularly interested in this work in any way, and notwithstanding the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Townshend) has pointed to a report made by Mr. Young on the ship canal and the amount of shipping that would go through and the advantages that would accrue to the people of Nova Scotia, I am quite satisfied that hon. gentleman could have known very little about the trade of the Lower Provinces if he supposed for a moment that vessels from Prince Edward Island would go through that ship canal to reach Halifax. Everyone knows in Nova Scotia that Prince Edward Island has a much larger trade with Halifax than with St. John or any other place in the Lower Provinces, and he would be a madman who would take a vessel over this proposed railway down the Bay of Fundy and round the coast of Nova Scotia to Halifax, when he could take his vessel through the Strait of Canso at much less cost and in much less time to Halifax. It is rather too late to oppose this grant, if it is to be carried out. I have no objection to it so far as I am concerned, but it must not be supposed that the work will be of very great benefit to the shipping interests of the Maritime Provinces, because only large vessels would be likely to use that railway, and one ship in three or four years might, if freights were very low in New York or Boston or some other eastern port, go to Quebec for a cargo of deals or timber. Any ship going from New York or Boston round to Quebec to load timber would never think of going up the Bay of Fundy and over this marine railway, but would go through the Strait of Canso and up the Gulf, as they have always done. It is nonsense to expect that ships would use this work to any extent. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) has stated that Mr. Ketchum spent a good deal of money in connection with this matter and that he visited England in order to enlist the aid of capitalists in the work. He has, no doubt, taken some trouble, but it will be remembered that that gentleman was voted a considerable sum of money for an old claim in connection with the Intercolonial, of which payment had been refused, and it was generally understood in the House that the vote was given to reimburse him for the expense of going across the water in order to carry out this project and raise the necessary money to build the ship railway. I did not rise to oppose the proposal, but I thought it necessary to make these observations so that it may be understood what our views are as to the benefit that shipping would derive from this ship railway, if it were built.

Mr. MITCHELL. Reference was made to me by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Townshend) in relation to this matter, and he said I was in favor of the Bay Verte canal. There was a time in the history of this country when

I was in favor of it. It was at a time when the country had not one-fourth part as much debt upon it as it has to-day, when the resources of the country were not mortgaged as they are to-day, when the great enterprises we have undertaken during the last few years—I say it to the credit of the Federal Government—had not been carried out, when we had not our present liabilities upon us. It was at a time too when I felt that in view of the large expenditures that were being made in the west we ought to use every means at our disposal to open up the resources of the eastern portion of this Dominion. I never felt warmly about the Bay Verte canal, although I supported it, because it probably would do some good. When you take into account the position of Canada to-day, the enormous increase of debt in the last fifteen years and the great facilities for transportation now afforded, we know that we possess means of transportation which the Bay Verte or any other canal or ship railway could not afford. If I was in favor of that canal it does not follow that I should be in favor of the Chignecto Ship Railway. They are two different things. I have no hesitation in saying this: That in 1882—and the hon. member for Prince County referred to the fact that I was not then in the House, which is true—when this scheme was proposed, I looked upon it as a visionary scheme, and every day's experience tells me I was right in my view. I have tried to inform myself in regard to trade and commerce. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) has stated his confidence that the Chignecto Marine Railway could be built. We all believe that it could be built; that science and mechanical art in our modern civilisation will enable us to do almost anything. I, however, asked the hon. gentleman: "Do you believe that it can be made commercially to pay?" I have too high an opinion of the honesty of the hon. gentleman to believe that he would do other than he did, evade giving an answer; but he left the impression on those who heard him that he did not believe that profitable commercial results would follow such undertaking. The hon. member for Prince County referred to the fact, and he was quoted by the hon. member for Cumberland as having furnished valuable statistics in relation to the question; I heard of no statistics from the hon. member for Prince County, I heard statements. He said, would not ships go from Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa, down the Gulf and over that marine railway to Boston and New York. The thing is simply ridiculous. Shipping go from Ottawa to Boston down through the Gulf of St. Lawrence and over this marine railway! The hon. gentleman could not have meant what he said. What he probably did mean was that commerce would go by that route to Boston or New York from Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal or Ottawa. Does not the hon. gentleman know that with the present railway facilities and the competition of the various railways, the rates of freight, the time of delivery, the cost of insurance, and other items enable the freight to be carried at about one-third the cost it could be carried if the Chignecto Marine Railway or the Bay Verte Canal was built. That is apparent to everyone, and no commercial man who understands his business would pretend to say that if he wanted to send a shipment from here to Boston it would be preferable to send it down from Ottawa to Montreal; thence down the enormously long navigation of the St. Lawrence, thence to go through the Chignecto Railway, thence to Boston and to New York. Sir, the whole thing is simply ridiculous, and is not to be spoken of. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Townshend) claims my attention for a moment in this matter. He argues that because we may have been favorable at one time to the construction of the Bay Verte Canal, we should still be prepared to sustain a motion for the same thing to-day. Sir, I am one of those who are not afraid, if they have been in error in the past in relation to anything, to acknowledge that error, and to hark back on that position. I say that to-day the Bay Verte Canal would be an act of folly, and that to construct this Chignecto Ship Railway would be an act of worse than folly, and I speak from a Maritime Province standpoint. No man in this House—and I suppose some men here will not think so highly of me because I say so—would be more in favor of appropriations and expenditures of the public moneys for the Province from which I come, and with which I am associated, than I would, but I would like to see those expenditures of such a character and expended in such a way as to do honor to the country, to do no discredit to this Parliament, to promote the commerce and civilisation of the localities in which they are made, and be of benefit to the whole country; but I say that to expend this sum of $3,750,000—to spend it as this money will be spent, if it is spent, if there are fools enough in England to furnish the capital which is to be brought out and put into that work—would be an act that will be pointed to in the future as one of the grand follies of the age, and in regard to which Canada will only earn contempt and this Parliament have discredit thrown upon it for encouraging such an expenditure. Where is the commerce to come from which would support such an enterprise? Is it to come from north of the St. Lawrence to go to New York and Boston? Will there be enough commerce from that direction to pay even for the grease for the wheels that this railway will require to run it? The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Townshend) said that the schooners coming from Gloucester to the fishing grounds, would supply a great traffic to that railway. Did the hon. gentleman read an interview with Mr. Batson—I suppose he did not—who is a great authority on these matters, the Collector at Gloucester, who stated in an interview the other day that there were only, I think he said, twenty-eight American fishing schooners that went from the New England ports into the Bay of Chaleurs altogether last season. Where is the shipping to come from which will pass through that railway from the North St. Lawrence? Is it to come from Miramichi, from Bathurst, from Restigouche, or any of the ports up the St. Lawrence, until you arrive at Quebec and Montreal? I appeal to hon. gentlemen who come from those various sections of the country to say whether there is any commerce that will come from those ports to go to the southern ports of the United States which would warrant an outlay of this kind, which would justify this expenditure of money—money which might be far more profitably spent in other ways. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Townshend) has charged those who are opposing this measure in the House with a breach of faith. He says the money is voted and the Act is passed. I look at the Act of which the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Townshend) is one of the corporators, and if he and his associates can get $3,750,000 perhaps it may benefit the country, and perhaps it may benefit themselves; I can tell nothing about that. But this I will say, that before we go on to expend such a sum of money we ought to look carefully into the enterprise. I am one of those who believe in keeping the pledged faith of Parliament, and I am prepared to do it in this case. I do not oppose giving the money that has been voted by Parliament, provided it is given in accordance with the letter as well as the spirit of the Act. What I do say is that the Parliament of 1882 made a mistake in granting this money. It was granted without the matter being sufficiently looked into and considered, without sufficient evidence being produced before Parliament that it was a work which would be profitable; and with the better light which recent experience has given us, I say that the Parliament of that day did an act which I cannot pronounce to be a wise one. Now, the letter of the law I am willing to carry out. These corporators have got an Act; they have the facilities and they have the guarantee of the country for the money. Let them keep to the spirit of the bond. They agreed to begin it in three years and to finish it in seven. The Act was passed in 1882, and we are now in the year after the year when they should have commenced operations, and what have they done in the way of commencement beyond speculating in charters and trying to raise money upon them. I know of nothing else they have done, and I think before Parliament lends itself to a matter of this kind, by amending the Act and giving them further facilities, we should make careful enquiry into it. I, for one, do not hold myself prepared to amend the defects and give greater facilities and change and alter the Act to enable these men to go to the British market and again perhaps fool the people of that country into putting money into a speculation which, in my opinion, will not only reflect discredit upon the country, but be practically useless, and have us pointed to as we have been pointed to for the last thirty years by the men who were induced to put money into the Grand Trunk Railway. These men have the Act; let them keep it and go on and do the work if they can, but do not let us endorse them by giving them additional facilities and additional time, so as to induce an outlay of capital, which will only result in disastrous failure without any benefit to the country. These are my views, and whether they please hon. gentlemen or not, I have stated them honestly. I am a Maritime Province man, and I believe in outlays in that part of the country. I believe in the development of the country where it can be done profitably, but I do not believe in uselessly expending public money on work which will be pointed at in future years as showing the want of judgment and the folly of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. GILLMOR. I think it would be a great misfortune and an act of folly if this Parliament and this country invested $3,750,000 in that undertaking. I cannot conceive where any commercial interest is going to be advanced by the building of that railway. I cannot understand how 600,000 tons of shipping are going to pass over it, or 100,000 tons or 50,000 tons. It is quite impossible that it can be utilised to any such extent as to justify such an expenditure. I endorse every sentiment expressed by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that it is a misfortune and a discredit to expend the public money of Canada in any such undertaking as that. I know that the late Minister of Railways spoke about 600,000 tons of shipping going over that railway. Well, he could always make powerful speeches and great appeals. He used to speak about 600,000,000 bushels of wheat coming down from the North-West and that was an astonishing argument, but no more so than to speak of 600,000 tons of shipping coming over that railway and being lifted up in the air and drawn fourteen or fifteen miles. If I had a ship of a thousand tons I do not think I would like to risk it on the railway. In the first place, there is no argument that I have heard in favor of the expenditure, and this is the way that money is going to be expended in the Maritime Provinces for the benefit of the Maritime Provinces. I for one raise my voice against it. I say that it will be money thrown away so far as the general interests of the Maritime Provinces are concerned. I do not like to make appeal with regard to political and electioneering purposes, but it is very singular that when an election approaches some person down in Pictou has to have $150,000 or $200,000 expended to build a road parallel to an existing line. Just before an election it is very convenient to have the promise of that money, and so with the Chignecto Railway. It is very singular that just about the time they are needed some enormous promises are made; sometimes the money is expended, and sometimes it is not; but I tell hon. gentlemen that the Maritime Provinces will not be benefited by any such foolish expenditure and waste of public resources. I do not believe, and I am satisfied that the majority of the members of this House as well as the country, do not believe, that our finances are in that condition to warrant us in expending such enormous sums of money in projects, which even if completed, would not compensate, in a commercial respect, for the expenditure. There is no doubt that railways have largely taken the place of ships. The fleet of schooners that used to ply up and down the coasts, giving employment to hundreds of men, have nearly all disappeared since the Intercolonial Railway was built; few vessels carry on that trade now. What do vessels that go to New York or Boston want to carry? The kind of lumber manufactured there consists of deals for the English markets; and the vessels carrying that lumber do not want to cross the Chignecto Railway or go through the Bay Verte Canal; and what vessels are to go through? Fishing vessels that sail in the Gulf would not avail themselves of that railway if it were built. I think it is folly to talk about such a work; but now that the subsidy has been voted, and the company asks us to renew the contract, I think the House should say that the circumstances have changed and we do not propose to renew the contract.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I do not propose to occupy the time of the House for more than a moment in stating my opinion in regard to this resolution. It has been observed by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), and justly and rightly observed, that the Act that incorporated this company, passed on the 17th of May, 1882, enacted that the work should be commenced within three years from the passage of the Act, and completed in seven. In thirty days, or thereabouts, from now, four years will have expired, and not a blow on this work has been struck.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). They are doing work now.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Doing what?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Clearing the track.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Well, although my hon. friend may think that is commencing the work, and that may be the letter of the Act, I think he will find that it is not the spirit of the Act. Men going down with two or three theodolites, and with two or three levellers, and looking around and taking lunch, is not commencing the work. Commencing the work has a technical and proper meaning. It means some vigor infused into the work; something done; something tangible shown, and not merely somebody going down and looking at it. The company were to complete it in seven years, and even if this resolution passed they could not do so. As has been observed that at the time the Act was passed in 1882, there was a plethora of money in the Treasury. We had a surplus; we had a great deal of money to spend, and an experiment might properly be tried at such a time. That may be a very fair way to look at the matter, but to-day we have other works on our hands. Since that time we have built the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has cost a great deal of money, and is to-day costing a great deal of money; which has taxed the energies of five millions of people, such as the energies of no five millions of people were ever taxed in the history of the world before; and I say that these men, not having gone on with their charter, and not having expended any money within the spirit of the Act, are not justified in coming to us and saying, augment the money, lessen the number of years, extend the grant, and let us go on. I have looked at the matter and I know something of the geography of the country there, and I do not see for the life of me what is to come over this railway from the Bay of Fundy to the Straits of Northumberland, or go from the Straits of Northumberland to the Bay of Fundy. It may be that I do not know, but I have not been informed. The question was asked of the able and intelligent member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) whose word in this House on affairs that he is acquainted with is credited with a great deal of weight, and I was curious to see what answer he would give. But he carefully and astutely and ingeniously avoided the question put to him, and did not give his imprimatur to the scheme.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I desire to say that the impression the hon. member for Northumberland said, and this hon. gentleman has repeated, that I conveyed to the House that I had no faith in this scheme—

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not say that; I asked if he had faith in the commercial results of the scheme.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I mean the commercial results of the scheme, and the hon. gentlemen both say that I conveyed that impression. If they received that impression, they should not have done so. The whole tenor of my remarks was that in my opinion it was improper, unwise, and uncalled for to raise that question at the present time—that while it might have been proper to raise it at the time the company got its charter or asked for the subsidy, yet after Parliament had sanctioned this scheme and voted the subsidy, and after their action had led the promoters of the scheme to spend a considerable amount of time and a large amount of money to bring the scheme to its present position, it was not proper or dignified for Parliament to discuss the commercial importance of the scheme, and the whole effect of my remarks was to protest against that discussion.

Mr. MITCHELL. What I want to get at is this: Does the House understand that the hon. gentleman has faith in the commercial results of this scheme?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I can tell the hon. gentleman that I have a good deal of faith in the commercial results of the scheme. I do not wish to refer to other schemes, but I feel tempted to ask the hon. gentleman if he has faith in the commercial results of some of the schemes he proposed last Session, and for which he asked large subsidies.

Mr. MITCHELL. One moment—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I cannot allow this to go any further.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have in my hand an amendment which I think it desirable to propose. What I want to say is this. The hon. gentleman asks me if I have faith in the commercial results of some of the schemes I have submitted to this House. I am prepared to answer the hon. gentleman, the only scheme I know of that I submitted to this House was in connection with the Miramichi Valley Railway. I submitted it as an act of public improvement, that would give facilities—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman has spoken, and the hon. member for King's has now got the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman had not the floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. MITCHELL. His honor will find he will best get rid of me in this matter—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for Northumberland has already spoken, and he cannot now address the House again.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was only going to give an explanation.

Mr. LANDERDIN. Let the hon. gentleman explain.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not going to be put down by him. What I wanted to say to the hon. gentleman was this—

Mr. WOODWORTH.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I will take another opportunity.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I was going on to say, when I was interrupted and gave way to the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) to allow him to make, not only an explanation, but another speech, for he speaks so seldom and so well, that I am always glad to give him the floor, even at my own expense and perhaps against the rules. I said the hon. gentleman did not seem to have faith in the scheme itself. Why? Because the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) asked him the question, and the answer of the hon. gentleman was not that which he has given now, and not that which will appear in Hansard tomorrow. His answer was to the effect that, well, a great many persons stated that they had faith in it, there were reports and different statements of eminent men, much more able to form an opinion than he. That was his answer to the hon. member for Northumberland, and he will find his explanation now given, in interruption to me, is entirely different from the answer he gave to the hon. member for Northumberland, and I rely on Hansard to prove my version correct. The hon. gentleman's memory may be a little defective to-night, as he will see by Hansard. Therefore, I have the right to say that he did not seem to have any faith in the scheme. Then, as to the opinion of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Pope), neither did he seem to have any faith in it, for when he was asked the question, he said there was a lot of documents, that they looked very well, but he would not read the whole thing; that it was likely a good scheme, and that if it was not carried out the Government would not spend the money. That was his answer to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies); so that we have no light thrown on the subject, nor can we find anybody who has faith in it, because the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Townshend), who supported the project, stated that he was the successor of the Minister who proposed this scheme in 1882, and felt bound to stand by it on that account, and also because it came from the county of Cumberland originally. So he supported it, although he did not know much about it. He stated, also, that Mr. Mackenzie, who was leader of the Opposition when the then Minister of Railways (Sir Charles Tupper), in 1882, introduced the scheme, was very much in favor of it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No, I did not.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Mr. Mackenzie is reported in Hansard as being entirely the opposite. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Townshend) stated that Mr. Mackenzie was in favor of the scheme, and considered it would be of great utility and advantage.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No, no.

Mr. WOODWORTH. As I have here Mr. Mackenzie's statement when the scheme was introduced, I will read just a couple of sentences, which are not contradicted by any others in his remarks. I quote from page 1471 of the Hansard of 1882:

"Now when it is said that a canal at this point would be of great public service, I am bound to say that our experience for two or three years, leads to the conclusion that the traffic which would pass through it, would be very small. * * * I do not say that the scheme is impracticable, but I doubt very much its utility from the reports made, from time to time, by maritime men on the subject. My recollection is that several New Brunswick members, and those from the neighborhood opposite St. John especially, were warm in favor of the construction of the canal, while those from Nova Scotia were entirely hostile to it, believing that the trade which would pass through it would be very much less than was anticipated by its friends. I think it was rather conclusively proved that vessels passing to the West Indies would never seek that route, but that it would be much cheaper and better for them to take a straight line eastward, until they reached the open sea and got into a direct line to the West India Islands. The trade from Prince Edward Island, and any trade from the lower St. Lawrence to Boston, would undoubtedly be benefited by a short course there, but that trade is comparatively light."

But the whole scheme seems to have taken another complexion to-night. I was not in this House in 1882, and did not hear these remarks, but, according to Mr. Mackenzie, the New Brunswick members were in favor of it and the Nova Scotia members were hostile to it. To-night, on the contrary, we find the New Brunswick members hostile to the scheme, and the only hon. gentleman from Nova Scotia who has spoken in its behalf, says he advocates the scheme really because it had been proposed by the hon. member for Cumberland whom he succeeded (Sir Charles Tupper), and although he was not in love with the scheme he was the only one who seemed to father it at all. All the New Brunswick members who have spoken, the hon. members for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), were certainly not very great defenders of the project, the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) opposed it, and the hon. member for Cumberland stands alone in its favor. This is a very large sum of money, $3,750,000, especially when we have all this war debt upon us, when we have our hands full with schemes that will pay, with railways that will pay, with canals that will pay, with measures, not tentative or experimental, but measures already inaugurated, and which it has been proved to the Administration will pay. If our Treasury were full, I would not say that this money should not be granted and expended to try the scheme; but before people indulge in luxuries they ought to be supplied with the necessaries. That is the proper economy to follow. While, therefore, I would be very glad to see this scheme worked, I think that with other schemes on hand of immediate necessity, with the breakwaters, with the piers that the different maritime interests, up and down our shores, are trying to have money expended upon, the people whose representatives we are, who are looking to us and watching what votes we give, and what opinions we express, in order to see whether we really reflect their opinions, who are wide awake to the interests of the country, who read the papers, who read everything that concerns the welfare of themselves and their children—the people will say: Before the $3,750,000 are granted here upon a tentative measure, give us the necessaries of life; and, then, if you have money to spare, you can afford to spend it generously. I think the Government ought to pause in this matter, especially as there is no father for the bantling, especially as there is no one in love with it, not a soul who will get up and nail his colors to the mast, and say that this Bay Verte Canal, or as it is now the ship canal, of ten or twelve miles, is a necessity in the interest of the country, and should be attended to immediately. I thought it my duty, when this resolution came up, to utter these remarks, which I do in all sincerity, not wishing to oppose unnecessarily the Government in this concern, but to state my opinion that the Government, unless they have more money on hand than they have, should pause before putting this sum in the Estimates, and proposing this resolution and asking us to pass them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know anything about the merits of the scheme, although I am bound to say that the experiment of taking large vessels across by railway has never yet been successfully tried, whether it be practicable or not. But what I want to call the attention of the House to is this: We have had a good deal of discussion here as to the true extent of the liabilities of Canada. I have pointed out a good many times, that in addition to the debt which we at present possess, there are very many millions of liabilities which are not usually taken into account, liabilities contracted under a great variety of Acts for the promotion of railways and similar projects of that kind; and, although, if the faith of the country is pledged to this, it must be carried out in accordance with the letter of the bond we have entered into, still it is a very serious consideration for us to remember, that in addition to the three millions and three quarters which are demanded by this project, there are probably twelve or thirteen millions more to which the country is at least equally pledged for the construction of various lines of railways or similar projects; and that, if you add that to our existing liabilities, it is only too clear as has been already stated, that the sum total will be a very formidable one, and one calculated to tax the resources of this country to the utmost. I understood that the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) stated that this work required to be commenced within three years.

Mr. DAVIES. By the Act of incorporation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then it is clear that this company have no locus standi here at all. This is nearly the end of the fourth year. I quite agree with everything that has been said as to the very doubtful nature of this experiment, and I think the House ought to pause in view of the certain fact that, over and above our present very large debt, we have many millions of liabilities yet undischarged which we will assuredly have to meet.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Shall the resolution be adopted?

Mr. MITCHELL. Not if I can help it. I was interrupted a short time ago, and I now desire to say what I had to say then. I simply wish to observe that the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) has chosen to refer to some scheme which I have had the honor of bringing before this House. I am not aware of any scheme demanding a vote of public money which I have brought before the House which has not been in the public interest, or in regard to which it is not recognised, where the money has been expended, that it has been of great public service. I have never had my name in any of these charters and I have never derived any benefit from them. What I did was done in the interest of the public, and the money that was expended was expended in the public interest. The hon. gentleman does not answer the question which I asked of him, whether as a commercial undertaking he believed in the result of this work. I have not got an answer yet from the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland, but I inferred, and I think I had a right to infer, from the manner in which he spoke, that he had no commercial faith in this undertaking. Now, that was all I intended to say some time ago, and all I intend to say now, and if I had been allowed to say it then, it would have saved some time now.

Resolution to be reported.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is the first time that I ever saw an important measure of this kind, involving an expenditure of nearly $4,000,000, pass through this House without anyone being able to show any practical benefits to result from it.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT.

House resolved itself into committee on certain proposed resolutions (page 601) to amend the Consolidated Inland Revenue Act and the Act amending the same.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 1,

Mr. COSTIGAN. At present, when a change takes place in the Excise duties, it involves a hardship to the manufacturers, or it might involve a hardship. For instance, they may manufacture goods during the month of April. The accounts have to be rendered up to the 1st of May, covering the whole of April, they may have disposed of part of their goods affected by the Excise duties. On the 24th April the Excise duty may have been increased, and, according to the strict reading of the existing law, they would be obliged to pay into the Treasury the difference between the duty as it stood when they sold the goods and the duty imposed afterwards. It is to remove that objection that the change is now proposed. If the goods manufactured are sold before the increase takes place, they should not become subject to the duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see clearly enough what the hon. gentleman proposes to do, but I do not see the desirability of it from considerations of general policy. This is practically to offer a sort of premium to the manufacturers of spirituous liquors or ales, and I suppose other exciseable liquors, to make as much as they can in the early part of the month in which the changes of the revenue take place, and perhaps to sell them. I do not think that these parties are deserving of any special consideration at our hands. The hon. member explained to us very learnedly last Session that in the case of spirituous liquors, and I suppose the same holds to some extent in the case of beer—if not, his colleague beside him can correct me—it is not desirable to sell these freshly made. There are special provisions to prevent their being freshly sold on the ground of injury to the public health. I think for that very reason the hon. gentleman's present proposition is inadvisable. It is not at all desirable that parties should be encouraged to manufacture largely just before they expect a change in the revenue laws, and should be encouraged, as they will be, if this passes, to sell their goods. I think that the old law did no practical harm. It added a little to our revenue, and prevented, to some extent, the anticipation of duties which always takes place, as we have had ample proof time and again, when a new tariff was proposed. I cannot see that there are any sufficiently good reasons for this, or that there is any hardship which deserves to be removed, caused by the operation of this law. We have worked under the old law for a great many years, and this is the first time I have heard any serious complaints made of the injury done to manufacturers.

Mr. COSTIGAN. This is not at all done with the view of giving special favors to the manufacturers of spirituous liquors or beer, nor is it in any way favoring them. It is a matter of simple justice, and it is only upon that ground that we propose this resolution. It applies not only to spirits and beer, but to all classes of goods subject to Excise.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is no other, except tobacco.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Tobacco, cigars and vinegars—everything that comes under the Excise law. After all, Mr. Chairman, we are going back to the old law after the experience we have had upon this principle of three or four years. I may say, for the information of the House, that formerly the accounts were made up semi-monthly; now they cover the whole month, so that the operation of this Act will give less cause of complaint to these men than when they made up their accounts twice a month. For instance, importers of goods subject to Customs duties are not obliged to pay those duties if they can take their goods out of the Customs at any day of the month and pay the duty then actually due under the existing law. Now, there is no reason why one Department should deal differently with the public than another Department. This will not involve any loss to the revenue, but it relieves men from paying duty, on goods they have already sold, subject to one rate of duty, at a higher rate of duty after the goods are sold.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All these parties anticipate habitually, whenever the tariff comes into force, and make considerable money out of the projected changes by their anticipation. That is constantly done, and that is one reason why I do not think they deserve any special indulgence. The hon. gentleman states, and there is no doubt he is correct, that these accounts were only fortnightly before, and that they may now be made monthly. I should like to know when that change came into effect.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The change was made under the Act of 1883.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do these monthly returns vary in the case of different distillers or manufacturers, or are they all on a particular day of the month throughout the Dominion?

Mr. COSTIGAN. In all cases on the first day of the month, throughout the Dominion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then the Minister of Finance has it a good deal in his own hands; if he brings down his Budget on the first days of the month, he can prevent any confusion arising.

On resolution 2,

Mr. COSTIGAN. This is to provide that the Governor in Council may have power to make regulations to dispose of fusil oil, otherwise than by destroying it. We have applications from parties engaged in manufacturing chemical articles, that this fusil oil would be useful in the manufacture of their preparations; and instead of wasting that quantity for which we have to pay the distillers, we provide that it may be utilised under proper safeguards.

Mr. BLAKE. Has the hon. gentleman found that it is utilised in other countries?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No, I have not heard that it is.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman stated just now that he had to pay the distillers. I was not aware that any special allowance was made to them. What has he been in the habit of allowing?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The percentage allowed has not exceeded 3 per cent. for such quantities of fusil oil or other refuse as is separated therefrom by a second process of manufacturing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a reduction in the tax, I suppose?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No, it is necessary that that fusil oil should be taken from the spirits as a poisonous substance, and it is on that ground that we charge the duty upon the actual quantity of spirits.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are other clauses on which the hon. gentleman has not touched. What is the meaning of the provision that abatement for shrinkage is to be allowed in reference to spirits maturing in ventilating tanks, and in what respect does it differ or modify the existing law?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The only change now proposed is to take the ground occupied during the discussion last year by the Department. The present Act provides for the shrinkage in maturing whiskey or spirits; but it provides that this process of maturing shall take place in wooden tanks or vessels. It has been found that the distillers have large amounts of money invested in copper tanks. During last year tests and experiments have been made with a view to establish the fact that the process of maturing spirits may be effected in copper tanks as well as in wooden tanks.

That is not yet established, but the Department has sufficient information to show that it may be accomplished by ventilation. It was thought at one time that the whole process of maturing was due to a portion of the objectionable elements being absorbed in the wooden vessels. It has been pretty clearly established that while some of the elements are soaked up by the wood, the greater proportion disappear by evaporation and the action of the air on the liquid itself, and that by the action of the air upon the liquid in the copper tanks, the same process can be carried out. The only change here is to take power so that if it be established that this object can be secured by the use of copper tanks, the Governor in Council shall have power to allow maturing to take place in copper tanks as well as in wooden tanks.

Mr. BLAKE. This subject was up last year, and at that time the hon. gentleman stated that he had not any data or basis on which he could rely, and the House, at my suggestion, declined to adopt the proposal. And I do not understand that the hon. gentleman has any more data or proof to-day. He says some experiments have been made since the close of last Session, that they may possibly prove that the arrangement suggested would be feasible. But the experiment should be continued, and after it had been ascertained that the new system was practicable, then the hon. gentleman should ask the House to legislate on the basis of the experiment which had produced such results. These are very serious questions. It is a very serious question to understand what kind of special provision in regard to the tank would accomplish the object, and to what extent evaporation would take place; on what principle the abatement should be made. Is it that we in Canada are so far in advance of all other countries that we are able to make a provision in the way of experimental legislation which has not been made in any other country? I asked that last year. The hon. gentleman said he did not think any such provision was made elsewhere. If such a provision has not been made elsewhere, and if the experiments made do not satisfy even the Minister himself that the proposition is practicable, the proposal should not be made. This must come from the distillers.

Mr. COSTIGAN. With regard to the principle of maturing spirits in wooden vessels I was not aware that that question was disputed last year. Last year I stated that so far as regards the effect of aging or maturing spirits in wooden vessels was concerned, that appeared to be generally admitted all over the world, and in Great Britain it had been acted upon for years—the distillers aging the whiskey in wooden vessels. The hon. gentleman says the proposal covered by the resolution is an experiment, and that we should not adopt it until the tests which we have been making are completed. We do not propose to act before that time. The distillers, however, have invested very large sums of money, many thousands of dollars, in erecting copper tanks—I dare say Gooderham & Worts must have eighty of those large copper tanks, which must have cost a very large sum of money—and it would be an arbitrary rule, while there is a probability of maturing the spirits in the copper tanks as well as in the wooden tanks, to say that the copper tanks shall be swept away and their places supplied by wooden tanks. We do not say that the law should recognise copper tanks; but as we have information that leads us to believe that probably the same results may be achieved with the copper tanks, that power should be left with the Governor in Council. If it can be established that the same results can be reached by maturing spirits in copper instead of wooden tanks, there can certainly be no injustice, in the event of the Government being satisfied with the experiments, to allow the distillers to use copper tanks.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sorry the hon. gentleman has forgotten the legislation he proposed last Session. He made last Session the same proposal. He struck it out on my stating that it was an objectionable principle to pass legislation until the experiments had been completed. His proposal in regard to wooden tanks is one thing, and that in regard to ventilating tanks is another thing. Last year his proposal was struck out because he did not place himself in a position where he was able to say that experiments had been completed. This time he says some experiments are going on; a certain degree of progress has been made; and probably it may be found that what he proposes is practicable. The experiment should go on to completion, and Parliament should not be asked to legislate in advance. If the experiments have produced certain results, let us have the reports of the Department, let us see what the experiments are and what are the scientific results; because we have to consider what abatement should be made. This has been arrived at by experience in regard to wooden tanks, but we have had no experience in regard to the evaporation with ventilating tanks. This is a proposal which the distillers have made to the hon. gentleman, because he says they have a large amount of money invested in copper tanks. They have told him that they think they can produce the necessary results with those tanks at a future day, therefore he says, legislate on trust. You legislate, you do your duty; it will be all right, if it is all right. I say the hon. gentleman has surrendered to the distillers who have put pressure on him.

Mr. COSTIGAN. We can settle the matter very easily. The hon. gentleman says when the subject was introduced last year, on his raising an objection on this point I allowed it to be struck out. At that time no experiments had been made. Now we have experiments, and they have satisfied me that they indicate that the maturing of spirits can be done in copper tanks. I have suggested it, knowing that we have had experiments made during the last few months, and the best officers of the Department have reported that they have no doubt that this arrangement will produce the same effect. The hon. gentleman asked me for additional information and I yielded to his request, and now I ask him to return the same favor and allow me to go on.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not take this to be a matter of favor from the hon. gentleman to me or from me to the hon. gentleman. I do not understand those to be the principles upon which legislation is conducted in this House, or the principles upon which it would be proper to conduct it in any House. It is a question of what is right in the interests of the country. The hon. gentleman has enlarged his statement because he told us first that the officers of his Department thought it was possible; a little later he said it was probable; and now he says there is no doubt of it. According to the hon. gentleman's process of reasoning, I am afraid myself that these experiments which have produced such varying effects in the hon. gentleman's mind, must have been conducted on a distiller's premises. One would like to know how much information has been derived during these eventful nine months, upon which information the hon. gentleman proposes to make this change. What principles of action are to be applied? You cannot apply the same principles as were applied in the case of the wooden tanks, because there is ventilation from the tanks themselves as well as from the ventilating holes and the draughts of air. I should say, therefore, that the experiments should last a considerable time in order that one might ascertain, first of all, whether the practical results were obtained; and, secondly, at what rate they were obtained, and at what rate we should allow abatement. I do not think the hon. gentleman has shown any greater basis for legislation today than he did last year; and I do not think we should allow this large abatement to be made by the Government until the Government brings down the practical results of the experiments, which will show whether the change is a feasible one or not. I asked the hon. gentleman for the experience of other countries in which spirits are manufactured, but he is not able to say.

Mr. COSTIGAN. We do not ask power to legislate directly, but if there is no shrinkage we have no abatement to make. If the shrinkage does not produce the expected results, we know what the shrinkage is when the liquor is matured in the wooden tanks. The hon. gentleman does not, of course, put confidence in the Government in dealing with these questions, but such powers are frequently taken by every Government. We simply ask power in case these tanks are found to answer the purpose, that the same law with regard to shrinkage shall apply to them as to the wooden tanks, but not otherwise.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not think there is any use in my pursuing this branch of the subject any further. Will the hon. gentleman state what application is proposed to be made, mechanical or otherwise, of the fusil oil which is now destroyed?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not allude to any particular application.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, that is the reason I ask.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Some of the manufacturers claim that they can make illuminating oil of it, and it may be used in several ways. We simply ask power to have it utilised without injury to the public instead of destroying it as we do at present.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly, but the hon. gentleman has passed a law which declares that it cannot be utilised with safety to the public, but must be destroyed, because that is the only use which could be made of it—if it can be called a use.

Mr. COSTIGAN. We propose now to make regulations to guard its use so that it shall only be used under regulations of the Department.

Mr. BLAKE. Under the law which the hon. gentleman passed, he prescribed its destruction, and, therefore, unless some new state of things has arisen, it should be destroyed. But the hon. gentleman does not tell us that a new state of things has arisen. It would be easy for him to defend this proposition, by simply stating the Department had been shown that a good, safe, mechanical or mercantile use could be made of the oil. But he does not say that; he says somebody has told him that perhaps it might be so used. All I ask is, who said it, and what use can be made of it?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Most of these communications from the public come directly to the Commissioner, who is an experienced officer, thoroughly familiar with the work of the Department, and I get my information from him. I can furnish the hon. gentleman, to a reasonable extent, at a future stage, with the information he wants with regard to the use that may be made of fusil oil.

Mr. BLAKE. I am, unfortunately, unable to make myself intelligible to the hon. gentleman. All I ask him to do is to show us some reason why the law should be amended at present. He simply says that if the condition of things that existed when he passed the law has changed, then it would be right that he should change the law, and I quite agree with him. But I ask him to say how the conditions have changed, and he says he will give me that information at a future stage. Perhaps he will also give me some information as to the extent that it is possible or probable that evaporation can go on with the ventilating tanks.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I will not promise to do anything of the kind. I will give the hon. gentleman the information I promised in regard to the fusil oil. On the other points I think I have given him all the information he can reasonably desire, and I know the hon. gentleman does not think it in the public interest that he should have all this information that he calls for. I think the House looks on the proposition as a reasonable one and will accept it, and with regard to the uses made of fusil oil under the control of the Department, I will furnish information on that subject.

Mr. BLAKE. Whatever the hon. gentleman knows, I think he had better not say that I know that the information I am asking is not required in the public interest, because he cannot know that. I admit at once that he is a complete master of his Department. On every occasion he shows that to the House; but he has not a knowledge of the mind or the views of every member of the House. Now, I conceive it to be a very important question, this whole question of abatement for the evaporation of spirits. Last Session we took the views of the hon. gentleman based on the experience of other countries. We declined, on that occasion, to take his views with regard to the ventilating tanks, which were thoroughly theoretical; and now he says he has made some experiments which have not satisfied him so far, and he says he does not intend to act on them before being satisfied. I maintain that that is putting the cart before the horse. I maintain that when we are called on to legislate, we should legislate on experiments which have succeeded, and not legislate on the theory that if the Government find they can do this or that, the law is to be changed at their instance. That, in fact, would be abnegating our functions, and handing them over to the Governor in Council. Our laws ought to be based on our reasons being reached, not on the hon. gentleman's, however much he may be the master of his Department, saying I won't put the law in force unless I am satisfied it should be put in force.

On resolution 3,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the alteration here?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The object is a further protection to the revenue, by making provision that malt may not pass into the hands of persons who might make illicit use of it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that may be convenient; but in what respect does that differ from the existing law? This refers, I suppose, simply to malt produced in a distillery or a brewery, or does it refer to malt made elsewhere?

Mr. COSTIGAN. All malt is manufactured under the control of the Department. This is a protection to the licensed brewers and distillers as well as to the public.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. Minister will have to remember that bakers use malt largely. I do not know whether this will inconvenience them seriously or not. I think there might be an exemption made in their favor.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I think under the Act they can get a permit to use the very small quantity of malt they require.

Mr. BLAKE. There would have to be a permit for each case—a daily permit.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It would be a pity to have the baking industry hampered in that way. I think the law should be altered to exempt bakers.

Mr. COSTIGAN. When we come to the Bill we can deal with that without any difficulty by amending the clause.

On resolution 4,

Mr. BLAKE. What is paragraph 2 of section 226, which he proposes to vary?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The effect of the change is to benefit the manufacturers of chemicals and other products in which spirits are used, to the extent that the distillers in Canada will not be enabled to charge extravagant prices to the manufacturers of Canadian spirits, as by these regulations they will be brought into competition with foreign distillers.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the variation proposed to be authorised by the fourth line of this paragraph?

Mr. COSTIGAN. At present the importer has to pay the difference between the Excise and Customs duties, and this authorises the Governor in Council to vary the duty, which would be oftener less than higher.

Mr. BLAKE. It is proposed to give the Governor in Council power to lower or increase the duty at their pleasure. If power is given to vary, it must be to increase or diminish. The hon. gentleman said that, under the practical operation of the law, there was, to a certain extent, a monopoly among the distillers, who might charge too high prices to the manufacturer who requires these particular goods which the distiller produces, and who has practically no redress unless he pays the Customs duties, and then the hon. gentleman proposes to give the Governor in Council power to vary the duties.

Mr. COSTIGAN. To vary them so far as regards the difference between the Excise and the Customs duty. The law allows the goods to come in bond for manufacturing purposes, and to be taken out of bond at the difference between the Customs and Excise duties.

Mr. BLAKE. What is proposed to do?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is proposed to leave that open to be varied by the Governor in Council as the interests of the public require.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know about the interests of the public; but it seems to me a very extraordinary proposition that Parliament, which fixes the duties, which fixes the amount that the public or the manufacturer is to pay, should now be asked to leave it to the Governor in Council to fix what the rate of payment should be. At present, the operation of the law is, as the hon. gentleman says, that the goods which are imported for use as raw material by those who require them are allowed to be used by those persons on their paying the difference between the Customs and Excise duties. But, under this proposition, the duty may be varied by the Governor in Council. It may be heightened or it may be lowered, and there may be an increased charge at the pleasure of the Governor in Council. The principle upon which the change is to take place is not stated, and it is proposed, contrary, as I conceive, to the rules of Parliament, to give the Governor in Council power practically to make the impost.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Power to reduce it.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman's proposal does not say it shall be lawful to diminish, but that it shall be lawful to vary the charge. A variation must be created by an increase.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Would the hon. gentleman be satisfied if it were provided that it should be a decrease?

Mr. BLAKE. I think it would be an improvement.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I propose to add to the fourth paragraph: "Provided that no increase shall be made in such duties."

Amendment agreed to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman did not say anything in regard to the effect of this resolution in reference to the prohibition of the removal of methylated spirits without a permit. What is the reason for that alteration?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is found that methylated spirits find their way into public use and are very often sold as a beverage when mixed with alcohol. That, of course, is very objectionable, and it is to protect the public against that that this clause is inserted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are there not many persons who require, in connection with their business, to have possession of methylated spirits, and would not this subject a very large number of such persons to be fined if they were found in possession of any quantity, however small? I am not conversant with all the trades that use methylated spirits, but I think that might cover a very large number of people that the hon. gentleman would hardly propose to fine for having possession of such a small quantity of this article. There is a danger in making them so wide that they will be practically inoperative.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is difficult to meet all these points that may possibly arise. But the greater evil is dealt with. I am informed this same provision is in the English law.

Mr. BLAKE. That may be quite true. But we all know that if we are obliging those who require to use an article in numerous trades, to obtain permits, we are putting a considerable restriction upon trade, and considerable vexation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the fee demanded for the possession of a permit? It is not granted as a matter of course, I know. I think a considerable fee is usually required from all parties carrying on business.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No, I think that we shall not ask any fee at all in such cases as the hon. member suggests.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it to be granted as of courtesy?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should be glad if the hon. gentleman would, if he could, give us some details, when this comes on to the next stage, as to the number of trades that are affected. My own impression is that a considerable number would be affected by it, much larger than any body would suppose.

Mr. BLAKE. Are methylated spirits used for illuminating purposes at all?

Mr. COSTIGAN. In some cases, I am informed, they are used—not generally.

On resolution 5,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the variation between the present law and this provision?

Mr. COSTIGAN. This change is to facilitate the business transactions by the manufacturers in disposing of their stock. It reduces the quantity required for ex-warehousing, from the present Act. At present the manufacturer of tobacco from the Canadian leaf labors under a disadvantage from which the manufacturer from the foreign leaf is free. The foreign leaf may be brought into the country in bond, and when manufactured removed in bond from one warehouse to another, without paying duty until disposed of, while the Canadian leaf can only be bonded once, and, therefore, we propose to extend the privilege of removing tobacco, manufactured from the Canadian leaf, from one warehouse to another, when the packages are not less than ten pounds.

On resolution 6,

Mr. BERGIN. Before the resolution is adopted, I wish to call the attention of the House to the oleomargarine question. I do not think, Sir, that the House and public generally are sufficiently acquainted with the method of the manufacture of oleomargarine, or with the materials of which it is prepared. The great centre at which oleomargarine is prepared, is Hunter's Point, in the State of New York. It is true, as a gentleman behind me remarks, that there are large factories at Chicago also, but the manufacturing at Hunter's Point are the largest in the States. At that point the factories are entirely in the hands of Jews. Dead cattle, dead hogs, dead horses, dead cats, too, I might say, are used for the production of this article, which is thrown upon the market as human food, and as a substitute for one of the most wholesome and healthful foods employed by the people. Animals which die in the cars from over-crowding, or are strangled to death, animals that die from disease, are purchased at a nominal sum by these people. Hogs that die from disease, from hog cholera, and from charbon, horses that die, and cattle that die from pleuro-pneumonia are used in the manufacture; and the counties around New York furnish a large number of cattle which die in the distilleries and in the cattle byres from that terribly infectious disease, pleuro-pneumonia, and are taken to these factories by the hundred and by the thousand, many of them in such a state that if you take hold of them by the leg you draw the leg off. These are thrown into vats where they are subjected to a heat of over 300 degrees, until the fat separates from the flesh and the bones and the hides and floats upon the top, and the offal goes to the bottom. When this separation takes place, after the heat has been applied long enough—a heat that, I make bold to say, does not destroy the germs of disease in those dead carcasses—the vacuum pump is applied, the vats are cooled until the temperature comes down to about 150 degrees, when ice is thrown in and after a time the fat separates and becomes hard. Then the man-holes are opened, water is poured in until a couple of feet of water are between the offal and the hardened fat, the water is run off, the offal is allowed to escape from the bottom, the fat is taken out and then bleached by the application of sulphuric acid and other chemicals. It is contended by the parties who own those factories and make human food out of the rotten, decayed carcasses that the chemicals destroy all the diseased particles. No proof of that has ever been produced. On the contrary, we know, as was stated by the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Hickey) the other night, that where animals, which died of a certain disease, were buried as deep as eight or ten feet under ground, a year afterwards healthy animals feeding on the ground under which those diseased animals had been buried were infected with the same disease and it spread among the cattle throughout the surrounding country. Yet this is the material from which human food, an article designed to take the place of butter, is manufactured, and it can be produced at so cheap a rate that it is impossible for the honest dairyman or for the honest butter-maker to compete. In preparing this food the manufacturers designedly go to work to deceive. By machinery, after they have bleached this fat to the color they desire, by means of chemicals so as to place the article on the market, they granulate it so as to give it the appearance of butter. They imitate what is called gilt-edge butter so closely that it is impossible for anyone to tell whether it is the genuine article or not. The manufacturers also add chemicals so as to change the odor to that of first-class butter, and they add chemicals to give it a flavor. Whether those chemicals added to make oleomargarine are likely to add to the healthfulness of the product or not, I leave for the House to declare. But I do say that the Government should hesitate before they allow to be manufactured in this country or sold here an article which is the product of rotten and diseased carcasses. What I think the Government should do under the circumstances is to issue a commission and send that commission to Chicago and the State of New York, to Hunter's Point, to see for themselves the matter from which this oleomargarine is manufactured and the way in which it is manufactured, the fraudulent processes through which this is being put in order that the manufacturers may be able to place it upon the market as human food and so deceive the public that they will buy this article as pure butter when they are really buying the vilest compound ever manufactured by chemical means. I think the Government would not err just now if they were to confiscate the oleomargarine that is to-day in the country. At all events if they do not do that, I think it is their duty to prohibit the sale of the oleomargarine now in the country until the commission reports, and if after the report of that commission the Government decides to allow oleomargarine to be manufactured here, it should only be for exportation. Canadians ought to be fed upon something better than oleomargarine. We ought not to allow any class of men to come here and impose upon our people as human food that which we would not give to our dogs if we saw the manner in which it was manufactured and the materials from which it is made. It is monstrous to suppose that material like that should be sold to our people as pure butter, and I think the Government, now that their attention has been called to it, and they have, at all events, the evidence I offer them of the kind of material of which oleomargarine is compounded, should listen to the suggestions we offer. I am far from believing that oleomargarine is not a source of disease. I am far from believing it can be safely used, and we are yet to be convinced that many of the diseases to which people in the large cities and towns are subjected are not the result of using oleomargarine. At all events, we know that since the introduction of that food certain poisonous blood diseases have become more frequent and more deadly. These remarks I offer to the Government in the hope that they will take heed and that they will not allow factories of this kind to be established in the country until a most thorough investigation has been made. I know that of which I speak. I know that the evil has grown to such an extent that the authorities of the United States, not only the Federal Government but the several State Governments, have had their attention called to it. Last year a meeting was held—true it was a secret session—at the Cooper Institute, in New York city, at which prominent dairymen of the United States were invited to be present. The most able of the internal revenue officers were present at that meeting. Evidence was produced more terrible, more horrible and disgusting than anything I have put before the House to-night with respect to the manufacture of oleomargarine. Excuses were attempted to be made on the part of manufacturers of that vile compound by stating that butyric and butyric acids and all the noxious compounds were removed by the chemicals used in its manufacture. But they failed to prove their assertion. At that meeting at which there were present most of the prominent dairymen of the State, including representatives from Orange county, which is famed for the character of its butter the wide world over, probably the most prominent man, who kept silent during the whole of the proceedings, was the greatest authority. When asked what he had to say he replied, in a speech characteristic of his countrymen, leaning his hands on the table: "I have heard it all. I have got the best bred and best fed cows in the State of New York, but I can tell you that the best bred and the best fed cows are nowhere when they come into competition with a dead rotten hog." What that man said in his homely Yankee phrase was the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth as regards oleomargarine.

Mr. JACKSON. The hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) has been spreading it a little thick. My opinion in regard to this matter is that hon. members who have been asking the Government to prohibit the article, do not know anything about it. I have had considerable experience with oleomargarine and butterine. The fact is that this article is equal to the common class of butter. If such is the case, and if it has been analysed and found not to be injurious to the public health, then I say it should be allowed to be manufactured in this country, but my opinion is that if it is not injurious to the public health, it should be allowed to be manufactured free of Excise, because it will go into common use with the poorer classes of the country, and if it cannot be detected from butter it must be a good article. I have seen the article. I have bought it and tasted it, and the sample which was handed round this Chamber within the last few days is a very inferior article. I went to Chicago last fall buying supplies for my lumber camp. I had always bought butter, but on this occasion the dealer asked me why I did not buy this article, oleomargarine or butterine. I said I did not think it was fit for people to use, and he replied: You are entirely mistaken; try it. I tried a sample. I tasted it and examined it, and I made up my mind it was equal to good, fair butter, and I bought a large supply for one of my lumber camps in Michigan. To tell you the truth of the matter, I had always taken in butter before, but the men always complained that the butter got strong, but since this particular occasion there has not been a single complaint against this oleomargarine. They have used it, and of course they did not know it was oleomargarine —

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. JACKSON. So long as they did not know it, and so long as they thought it was good butter, and if it was not injurious to health, I do not see why they should not use it. My opinion is that the Government, instead of putting an Excise duty on the article, should reduce the Excise so that it could be manufactured in this country. The general public cannot tell it from butter, and it can be used by the poorer classes because it is better than some butter. If they cannot tell it from butter, and if it is not injurious to health, let them stamp the article for what it is; do not deceive the people, but allow it to be manufactured in this country, as it is cheaper and better for that purpose. I believe it would be doing justice to the poorer classes of this country, if, instead of putting the Excise duty at 8 cents, it should be reduced to 4 cents, or taken off entirely.

Mr. BERGIN. I did not suppose the day would ever come when any man in the Parliament of Canada would dare to stand up and advocate the feeding of the product of such rotten carcasses as I have described to the people of this country instead of butter. But when, in addition to his hardihood in advocating that view, the hon. gentleman tells us that he has been in the habit of feeding it to his employees; that he found it to be cheaper than butter, and that they did not find it to be worse than the butter with which he fed them, all I can say is, I can well believe it. But, Sir, we know that butter will become rancid and strong, and we know that oleomargarine remains always the same rotten thing, with the smell and taste disguised to the end. It cannot get worse. It may be good enough in that hon. gentleman's opinion to feed to the men he employs, but it is not good enough to feed to good, honest Canadian citizens. It was urged very strongly the other day, in the progress of this debate, that on account of its cheapness it should be admitted as human food, but I contend that this is an argument which should be scouted. We, Sir, in this Parliament have a duty to perform to the country. We ought not to permit anything which is diseased or poisoned to be used as human food. We owe it also to the farmers of the country that we should protect them. Theirs is the largest and most powerful interest in the country, and we ought not, because there are men who think that anything is good enough to feed those whom they employ, to allow poisonous products of this kind to be introduced into the country and used daily for human food. How do we know that many of the diseases which carry off such large numbers of children, particularly in larger cities and towns, are not due to the consumption of these villainous compounds. We know that the three hundred and odd degrees of heat to which these carcasses are subjected, is not sufficient to destroy all of the poisonous germs, and I do not think there is anyone in this House, who gives the matter proper consideration, who will for a moment believe that it is as well to fill the stomachs of our people, be they adults or children, with the fat from rotten or diseased animals, combined with chemicals which we know are destructive of human life. I think the Government will receive with consideration what I have offered, and I think they will scout the suggestion offered by the hon. gentleman opposite. All we ask the Government to do is to enquire whether the statements I have made are correct or incorrect. If they are found to be true then there can be no excuse for allowing oleomargarine to be manufactured or sold in this country. If they are found not to be true then I shall be obliged to admit what the hon. gentleman from South Norfolk (Mr. Jackson) says — that anything is good enough to feed his employees.

Mr. JACKSON. I did not say anything of the kind, but the hon. gentleman is so prejudiced against this article that he could not deal with it fairly. I said if it was not injurious to the public health—as the Minister stated it was not—if it could be produced so that consumers could not tell it from butter, we should allow the consumers to have it. The hon. gentleman referred to me as though I fed my men on poor articles. If they will go to my lumber camp in Michigan they will find that Michigan lumbermen do not starve their men. They feed their men on the best there is to be got, and I say that the butterine that I supplied those men was equal to, if not better than the butter which I had always supplied them. They found no fault with it, but the hon. gentleman is so prejudiced that he could not look into the matter fairly.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am glad to see that what opposition exists to the policy of prohibiting the manufacture of oleomargarine comes from the other side of the House. I would like to ask the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Jackson) if he informed his men to whom he fed this oleomargarine or butterine what the article really was? He says that the Government should properly brand the article, but did he brand what he fed to his men; did they know what it was? My hon. friend from North Leeds was sent a sample of oleomargarine yesterday. A friend of his who was in the States bought two pounds, at 9 cents a pound, and that sample is in the House, and it was that sample which I showed my hon. friend yesterday. It requires an expert to tell it, if it was only nine or ten days old when it was on exhibition. I wonder if the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Jackson) would like to have the farmers of his county compete on the market with this article which sells for 9 cents a pound? I think that hon. gentleman made a speech a few years ago in favor of lowering the standard of oats from thirty-four pounds a bushel to thirty-two pounds a bushel, so that farmers could get as much for thirty-two pounds of oats as they used to get for thirty-four. That was the substance of his argument. Now, he wants them to put their butter in competition with oleomargarine at 9 cents a pound. I am glad the lumbermen that he fed with this article were in the United States and not in Canada. I am glad to know there is not a gentleman on this side of the House who favors the production of that article in Canada.

Mr. GILLMOR. Well, Sir, the Government the hon. gentleman supports intend to have it manufactured here. Is that the way the hon. gentleman wants to protect the farmers—to force them into competition with oleomargarine manufactured in this country as well as that imported from the United States. I, myself, made some remarks on this matter the other day, and I certainly was not aware that the article was made from the decayed bodies of animals. I really cannot conceive of that; I think there must be some mistake. I know that some years ago, when I was in New York, I found that the poor people of that city were in the habit of buying an article of this kind because they were not able to buy butter, and I am sure it was a healthy article. I do not think there can be any objection to it if it is not injurious to public health; but if it is to be manufactured, and if those who manufacture it will be buying the dead bodies of horses and cows, as we are told they do in the United States, I think both its manufacture and importation should be prohibited.

Mr. IRVINE. I have nothing to say in favor of the manufacture of this article. I think there is plenty of butter in the country, and it is cheap enough. But while I am of that opinion, I think the statements made by the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) are very highly colored and very much exaggerated. If we took all the dead animals in the country, I think they would yield very little fat out of which to make oleomargarine. I have never seen the article; but I have always understood that it was made principally out of tallow. We know that the price of tallow is from $4 to $6 per cwt., and tallow is certainly not an unwholesome article; and at that rate oleomargarine could be manufactured and sold at a handsome profit for 8 or 9 cents a pound. But this is the first time I have learned that there were so many dead animals in the country or that there was so much fat in them. The hon. gentleman sneered at my hon. friend about feeding his men on that article, which was good enough for people on the other side of the line. I know the average American, and he is quite as able to tell a good article when he sees it as a Canadian. If oleomargarine is anything worse than the butter which comes from Ontario down to St. John, N.B., it is certainly not worth much. I am willing that the article should be put alongside of butter, and I will guarantee that you will not deceive a New Brunswicker with it. You might deceive an Ontario man, who has eaten the stinking stuff which is sent down to us, but not a New Brunswicker.

Mr. GAULT. If this article is all that it is represented to be, I think we should not manufacture it in Canada to send to people on the other side of the Atlantic. I know that a man was arrested in Liverpool for selling spurious butter there, and he had great difficulty in getting away. If this article is what the hon. member for Cornwall says it is, it should not be allowed to be manufactured at all. But I hope the members who represent farming constituencies will make it a point to go around and ask the farmers to instruct their wives how to make butter. A great deal of the butter we get in Montreal is not fit for use.

Mr. FISHER. Before this resolution passes I should like the Minister to make some explanations with regard to the means he intends to use for restricting the manufacture and to insist on a healthy product being put on the market, if after what we have heard it is possible that oleomargarine can be healthful.

Mr. HESSON. I should be glad if the Government would take the whole matter into consideration as to whether there is not enough butter in the country and whether the price of it is not sufficiently low as to make it unnecessary to permit the manufacture of an article of this kind at all. There is not a gentleman in this House identified with the agricultural interest who does not know that there is abundance of butter produced in this country and that the larger proportion of it is very good indeed. It is only the handling that it gets in the country stores that makes it inferior for use by the time it reaches a distance from where it is made. After it has passed through the hands of many country merchants, by whom a variety of quantities are packed together in tubs, is then shipped in hot cars, is frequently left standing on the wharves of towns and cities on the way to its destination, and is then retailed in some filthy store. It is not reasonable to suppose that farmers' butter will always be as nice as the tasteful housekeeper would like to have it on the table. If we have a quantity of butter that is inferior in its quality when it reaches the market, is it not fair to assume that it would be unwise to introduce a substitute even in our own market for those who are obliged to buy a poor article, when that substitute is more unhealthful still than the strong-tasting butter that is so properly objected to now. I do not think it would improve the manufacture of butter in Canada, or that it would give employment to many extra hands; and it would be simply, as appears from what the hon. member for Cornwall says, to get rid of the dead stock, such as cattle dying on railway trains, or in passing from one stock yard to another. Now, I think the Government ought to prevent both the manufacture and the importation of it. If 8 or 10 cents a pound is not sufficient duty, I would certainly advise the Government to put on sufficient to prevent its importation altogether. There is no necessity for it. Butter is cheap, and our people are not so poor that they cannot buy good butter and pay the price for it. There may be some poor families who cannot afford to buy the best butter; but is it advisable to put an article in their way which is going materially to damage the health of the family as well as the reputation of our butter in the market? What would be the result? You would put on the market here an article that would enter into competition with dairy-made butter, the product of our farms. And as hon. gentlemen say that you cannot even detect the one from the other, what would be the result? It would probably be to force on the foreign market, as best Canadian dairy butter, an adulterated substitute. I should be glad if the Government would take means, as they can, to prevent the manufacture of oleomargarine, by imposing so high an Excise duty on it that it would be impossible to manufacture it with any profit.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

Mr. COSTIGAN introduced Bill (No. 101) to amend the Consolidated Inland Revenue Act of 1883 and the Acts amending the same.

Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Department of Indian Affairs..... $36,257 50

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The small increases on this item are as follows:—Chief clerk, an increase of $50, the ordinary increase; in the third-class clerks, there are two increases of $50 each; second-class clerks, also $50 increases. The fact is they are all increases of $50, except those of Mr. Shore and Mr. Hunton, who have a $100 increase, because they passed on special subjects and obtained each $50 besides the statutory increase; in the third-class, there are two increases. In the one case the clerk receives $612 and in the other $500. Then the housekeeper has an increase of $30, which brings him to $400, and the messenger has also an increase of $30, making $375. Those increases are all ordinary increases.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe a promotion is mentioned; who is the gentleman intended to be promoted?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. McNeill, who is promoted to the first-class at $50. Mr. McNeill had $1,400 and he will now have $1,450. The first-class begins at $1,400 and goes to $1,800.

Mr. WALLACE. Did he pass his promotion examination?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In all cases of promotion, they must pass this examination.

Mr. VAIL. Who is the Solicitor for Indian Affairs?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He is the Deputy Minister of Justice, who receives $3,600, and these $400 make up his salary to $4,000.

Mr. VAIL. It would be better to give him $4,000 at once.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This has been the practice for many years.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It would be inconvenient to have such a difference between him and the other deputies.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the Minister of Justice looks at the next charge, he will see that other deputies are marked $4,200 or $4,000, and in one case I think something more; and, although it is perfectly true, as the Minister of Public Works remarked, that that has been the practice, it appears to me that it is a very unnecessary practice, and that it would be better to call the salary of our Deputy Minister of Justice $4,000, instead of distributing it in two places. In the case of the Deputy of the Minister of Railways, and I think also in the Public Works, the Deputy Minister has $4,100, the Chief Engineer of Canals, $4,500, and so on. I am not objecting to this, but I really think my hon. friend is right, and that it would be better to put the two amounts together.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps so.

Auditor General's Office..... $21,300

Mr. McLELAN. There were nine third-class clerks provided for last year, and I think only eight were appointed. Provision was made for one, but the Auditor-General did not fill it, and continued a temporary clerk, and this year he has provided for the appointment of Mr. J. W. Ried at $800. Last year he was a temporary clerk. He has also provided for him for special qualifications as an accountant. That and the statutory increases are all the alterations since last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Incidentally I might observe that it appears to me that the question of the deputy heads requires a little consideration. Here is an officer of very considerable importance, that is to say, the Auditor General himself, who is in a certain sense our officer, the officer of the House, and who is the supervisor of all these parties, and he is put at a considerably lower salary than most of our deputy heads. I am inclined to think that, now that officer has been so many years in the service, and has proved so efficient an officer and one so useful to the House, the Statute should be amended so as to put him on an equality with the deputy heads who receive $4,200 or $4,100. That, however, is a matter for the consideration of the Ministers, and one which, I know, must be done by Statute. It could not be done by a parliamentary vote.

Department of Finance and Treasury Board..... $53,067 50

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are many alterations here and a considerable reduction, which is particularly due, I know, to the appointment of the Assistant Financial Inspector.

Mr. McLELAN. Of that reduction, $1,700 is for the transfer of the Assistant Inspector to charges of management. Then there have been two deaths in the Department. One officer who died received $1,800, and his place has been filled by one at $1,475. Another who died was receiving $1,437, and a promotion was made to fill his place at $1,400. Then, it is proposed in the coming year to superannuate one or two of the officers who are advanced in years and are receiving high salaries, and to appoint others at lower salaries, and in this way the saving is effected, reducing the amount from $57,000 to $53,000.

Inland Revenue Department..... $37,760

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is no change in the number of officers, and the only change in the salaries is the statutory increases.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Looking at it casually, I should imagine that somebody had more than the statutory increase. I find twenty-four gentlemen among whom an increase of $1,300 is divided, which is more than $50 a piece.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am quite satisfied that there is no increase except the statutory increases, although apparently the amount slightly exceeds that. I will get the information for the hon. gentleman on concurrence.

Mr. WILSON. I find that in 1884-85, he expended something like $35,000, and here we have him asking for something like $37,000. Why is he asking for $2,000 more this year?

Mr. COSTIGAN. A portion of the $36,000 voted last year, was not expended. But every year we base the estimates upon the same principle, that is, the sum that is likely to be required. But it sometimes happens that an office becomes vacant, and no salary is drawn for that office for sometime, and this accounts for the non-expenditure of the whole amount.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Minister please explain why it was that the whole amount was not expended, and what offices became vacant?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have been so accustomed to be called upon to explain increases of expenditure, that it is something new to be called upon to explain a diminished expenditure.

Mr. WILSON. I do not complain of a diminished expenditure, but I do ask the hon. gentleman to explain why it is that he is asking this year $2,000 more than the expenditure of last year for the same service. I want the hon. gentleman to make a closer approximation of the amount that it will be necessary to expend.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is clear that somebody here in the second-class has received more than the statutory allowance, there are twelve second-class clerks and they divide among them $712.50; now it is quite clear that the statutory increases would only amount to $600; therefore some of these persons have received at the rate of $100 each, who are they and what is the reason for giving them the extra allowance?

Mr. COSTIGAN. All I can do is to tell the hon. gentleman that I will explain this on concurrence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But when the hon. gentleman comes down here and tells us that they are only ordinary increases, and it turns out that that is not the case, he ought to acquaint himself better with the details or postpone the item.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is customary, when gentlemen criticise the estimates, that where a discrepancy so very slight occurs, to make and accept the explanation on concurrence. I told the hon. gentleman that there was apparently, amongst the second-class clerks, an increase beyond the statutory increase, and I promised him an explanation on concurrence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not want to detain the House upon a matter of $50 or $60 extra, but really I must say that the hon. gentleman ought to have acquainted himself with the details of that kind before asking for the vote. It is not at all desirable to postpone this to concurrence, when nobody can rely on remembering these matters, and when they may slip through without the slightest notice.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I may tell the hon. gentleman that I had been furnished with all the details regarding increases, but I did not expect to use them to-night, and the officer who has them has gone home. But I will furnish the information required by the hon. gentleman.

Department of Customs $33,100

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How has the Minister of Customs managed to ask for $1,300 less than last year.

Mr. BOWELL. That is customary in my Department. This decrease is partially owing to the fact that Mr. Peachey, who was formerly chief clerk at $2,400, has been superannuated. His position has not been filled, but a third-class clerk appointed. Then there have been a number of changes. When an officer dies, or is removed, some one else is appointed at a lower salary. The only increases that have taken place have been the statutory increases. The office of assistant commissioner and chief accountant has been separated, and the assistant commissioner now has that work to attend to exclusively, together with the work that is imposed upon him through carrying out the Chinese Act. Mr. Watters, a first-class clerk and assistant accountant, is now made the accountant, and it is proposed, when he has passed the promotion examination, to make him a chief clerk.

Department of Postmaster-General $168,585

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a considerable increase both in number of officers and cost.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They are the statutory increases for the first and second-class clerks. The chief clerk has a statutory increase of $50 and the first-class clerk has a similar increase. Next come the second-class clerks. One of these has been promoted and the vacancy has been filled at $100 less. The total increase is $150. Of third-class clerks there are six, the total increase being $1,495. In the accountant's office there are some statutory increases. There are in that office twenty-three third-class clerks who have obtained statutory increases, the total increase, after deductions are made, being $1,500. In the money order office the principal increase is $700, being increases given to third-class clerks. In the savings bank office there is a small increase.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who are the packers, of whom there are twenty, and what grade do they hold?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They occupy about the same position as messengers, and pass the same examination. They are not entitled to more than $500.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt the $4,000 or $5,000 increases are pretty well covered by the same $50 statutory increases, but I desire to point out that this Department is continually increasing its number of employees. The number has swollen from about 100 to 188 within the last five or six years. It is becoming a serious matter. We have here $200,000, including contingencies for the Post Office Department under Civil Government. Looking on a little further we have $2,840,000 asked for the services of this year, in all, a little over $3,000,000 on post office service. When you recollect that the total revenue that the Finance Minister expected was about $1,850,000, the annual deficiency appears to be greatly in excess of any addition to the service that has been rendered within the last seven or eight years. In 1878, the expenditure was $1,724,000. Now, the expenditure is $1,841,000, and it corresponds precisely with the increase here. I cannot, for my own part, understand how that can be justified by the growth of the post office within the last six or seven years. It appears to me that there is a great laxity in the Department to allow of such an increase.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no doubt there is a large increase in this Department, but if there is a large increase in the expenditure, the hon. gentleman will admit that there is a very large increase in the service. The post office service in the North-West for example, is extending every day, and must extend, and it cannot give a return in accordance with the expenditure. The distances are very great, the population is scattered and not very numerous, and yet we have to give them the same postal facilities that we have for other portions of the country and wait until the country becomes more settled, when the revenues will increase. For many years no doubt that service will not repay the country in that way, but if we do not obtain a revenue from the post office service, we will obtain it from the sale of lands, from Customs, Excise, and so on, and so will recoup ourselves in that direction. The hon. gentleman will remember—we have been long enough in Parliament together for him to remember—the time when other portions of the country were about in the same position as the North-West and Manitoba are now, but matters have improved very much and the revenue has increased largely. We cannot expect that both ends will meet for years to come. Nevertheless I may say that, so far as I recollect, this Department, which at a certain period I had the honor of administering, is well administered, the officers are up in their work, and the Postmaster-General and the previous Postmaster-General have given great attention to the service, and tried to curtail the expenses as much as possible. However, the wants of the people are such that we cannot refuse all the applications that are made. If the Postmaster-General would grant all the applications that are made, I am sure that the hon. gentleman would see that the expenditure has grown much more than it has grown. We have to refuse; we have to select and do the best we can, and I have no doubt that Parliament will not refuse to give the necessary amount for this service, which is a very important one, as the hon. gentleman knows.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is true there are perhaps few Departments as to which the House would be less disposed to be critical than the post office. But I must observe that the deficit has increased enormously. In the time of Mr. Mackenzie's Administration a very great change was made. We reduced the rate, if I recollect aright, from 5 cents to 3 cents, and as a matter of course a considerable loss was inflicted on the revenue at the same time. That, however, was in a fair way of being recovered, and after doing that our total deficit was only about $600,000; now it threatens to be a million and it may be more, it would be a great deal more if we were to take into account the increases of this particular Department under consideration. I think this is more than can be fairly accounted for by any growth in Manitoba and the North-West. There the total expenditure would not be more than $250,000, and it always was very considerable, even seven or eight years ago. So though that may account for part of it, it would not account for the whole of it.

Department of Agriculture $47,705

Mr. CARLING. The increase amounts to $1,070. The statutory increases amount to $1,470, but this is reduced by the fact that only $100 was paid for a private secretary last year when the usual amount is $600. Then there has been the death of Mr. Fraser, creating a vacancy which has not been filled, which with the difference in the amount for private secretary leaves the increase of $1,070.

Mr. VAIL. I find by the Auditor General's report that the total amount for extra services in this Department is over $18,000. That would seem rather irregular. If these clerks are required in the Department, I think their salaries should be in the amount we are now voting. I can understand that it is quite impossible to get along with such a Department as this without some extra sums in this way, but this seems an exceedingly large one. Are these clerks still kept on, and is it the intention to keep them on, because as the vote stands now it is rather deceptive?

Mr. CARLING. A number of the clerks have been employed in connection with the census of the North-West Territories and criminal and other statistics, and also in connection with the patent branch. The number of patents issued has increased very largely, while the receipts of that branch have increased very much more than the cost of the number of clerks employed, and I think a large number of the extra clerks are employed there. The patent fees give $69,000 a year of receipts in round numbers.

Mr. VAIL. We have the amounts which go to make up this sum summarised in the Auditor-General's report. There is nothing among them for the patent office. Here is one item, for instance: M. C. Woods, 70 hours, at $1 an hour.

Mr. CARLING. M. C. Woods is not employed in the Department at present.

Mr. VAIL. I am not charging my hon. friend with any neglect of duty. I am simply pointing out that this requires some explanation.

Department of Marine $23,912 50

Mr. VAIL. How is it that the Minister of Marine has not allowed his clerks the $50 increase?

Mr. FOSTER. They have been allowed the $50 increase. The number of clerks is the same, but one clerk has been transferred from the Department of Marine to the Department of Finance, by which a saving of some $400 has been made; and the regular increases of $50 taken in connection with that, make up the whole increase of $40.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who is the clerk that has been transferred?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. McLelan. He was private secretary in the Department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There appears to be precisely the same number of clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. There is the same number. One has been transferred as I have stated, and a third-class clerk has been appointed at $400.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What salary had Mr. McLelan?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it was $900.

Department of Fisheries $13,100

Mr. FOSTER. There are regular statutory increases and there is to be a promotion to the place of a second-class clerk who died. Otherwise the number of clerks is the same as before.

Department of Public Works $42,020

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The increase is altogether due to the $50 increases.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe that the clerks must be of the highest quality, because it does not seem necessary in any Department to deprive a single man of the increase.

Department of Railways and Canals $47,447 50

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are these all statutory increases too?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigenish). There are the various increases, and there appears to be a second-class clerk promoted to a first-class clerk—I cannot give his name.

Mr. VAIL. What is the meaning of the note at the bottom of the page:

"An Order in Council, dated 13th December, 1882, allowed $2,000 a year to Mr. Schreiber, as Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to be paid out of the appropriation for that railway."

Is it intended to have an engineer appointed for the Canadian Pacific Railway now that it is supposed to be completed?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That will be continued until the railway is completed.

Mr. VAIL. This vote is not to come into effect until the 1st of July, and the railway will be completed before then.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. His regular salary is $4,000. The note is only to show the committee that besides that he has $2,000 as engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but it is not noted here.

Resolutions to be reported; Committee to sit again.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12:20 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 14th April, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 99) relating to Druggists (from the Senate).
—(Mr. Hickey.)

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would suggest to the leader of the House whether, in view of the fact that it looks as if we were to have a fairly short Session, it would not be well to facilitate the business of the House by taking up these Notices of Motion and pass through all the undiscussed ones, so that the Departments could get the papers ready in order to bring them down to the House and thus avoid, as much as possible, any delay in our private legislation.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In answer to the hon. gentleman I may say that it is our desire to meet the wishes of the House, and the wish seems to be general to have as short a Session as possible. But I would say to the hon. gentleman that as to-day we only go on to six o'clock with the Notices, we might proceed as usual to-day, but that on Monday, when we take up Notices, we will be prepared to meet the view of the hon. gentleman, if it is the desire of the House, and go through Notices which are not opposed, and then proceed to the other business of the House.

LETTERS PATENT FOR INDIAN LANDS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (for Sir JOHN MACDONALD) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 102) to expedite the issue of letters patent for Indian Lands. He said: The object of this Bill is to place the issue of letters patent for Indian lands in the same position as the issue of letters patent for the ordinary lands of the country. It provides that a Deputy Governor may be appointed by the Governor General, who shall have power, under the instructions of the Governor, to sign those letters patent: that the Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs or his Deputy, or some other person thereunto specially authorised by Order in Council, may sign those letters patent; and that they may be registered in the Department of the Secretary of State, and be signed by the Secretary of State or the Under Secretary of State.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE FISHERIES OF MANITOBA.

Mr. ROYAL asked, Whether, in view of the exportation which has been going on for the last two or three years, it is the intention of the Government to make provision for the effectual protection of the fisheries in the Province of Manitoba?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government is now making provision for the more efficient protection of fish in Manitoba. There is an inspector, Alexander McQueen, residing at Winnipeg, and it is proposed to increase the number of local guardians. It is also intended to fix the close season in Manitoba for whitefish from the 1st of November to the 1st of February, giving the Indians only permission to fish through the ice for food, but not for export or for sale, and to charge a license fee for seine and net fishing.

HARBOR MASTERSHIP OF SARNIA.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. LISTER) asked, 1. Whether W. F. Taylor was lately appointed to the office of harbor master at the port of Sarnia? and if so, what is the date of his appointment, and how is he compensated? 2. Is the Government aware that the said Taylor has left Canada and removed to the United States, and that before removing he appointed a deputy to discharge the duties of the office? and if so, was such appointment made with the authority of the Government, or is it the intention of the Government to sanction such appointment? 3. Have representations been made to the Government, by petition or otherwise, with a view to the abolition of the office of harbor master at the port of Sarnia? and if so, is it the intention of the Government to abolish the office?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. W. F. Taylor was appointed to the office of harbor master at Sarnia on July 25, 1885. He was compensated by fees. The Government has been made aware that the said Taylor has left Canada and removed to the United States, and that before leaving he appointed a deputy to discharge the duties of the office. The appointment was not made with the authority of the Government, and it is not the intention of the Government to sanction such appointment. Representations have been made to the Government to abolish the office of harbor master at Sarnia. It is not the intention of the Government at present to abolish the office.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

THE GEOLOGICAL DISPLAY AND THE COLONIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. HOLTON asked, How many members of the staff of the Geological Survey have been sent to England in connection with the Colonial and Indian Exhibition? What duties have been assigned to each, and how are their expenses to be met?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Four members of the staff of the Geological Survey have gone to England in connection with the Colonial and Indian Exhibition: Dr. Selwyn, with general superintendence of the geological, natural history and raw products, including timber exhibit; Professor Macoun, in special charge of botanical and natural history collections; Mr. Adams, in special charge of mineral exhibits; Mr. Willmott, in charge of minerals, and giving general assistance. The travelling expenses of these gentlemen are paid through the Department of Agriculture on exhibition account. Their maintenance in London will be chargeable against the Geological Survey in the same way as if they had been working in the field here.

TERMS OF UNION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. McINTYRE asked, Has the Government received any communication or communications from the Imperial Government in relation to the visit of Hon. Messrs. Sullivan and Ferguson, members of the Government of Prince Edward Island, to London, or in relation to the non-fulfilment of the terms of union with Prince Edward Island? If so, will such communication or communications, and the answer of the Dominion Government thereto, be laid before this Parliament?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There has been no communication sent to the Government since these gentlemen left for England.

Mr. DAVIES. That is not the question, whether any communications have been received since they left.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The question, as I have it here in French, is whether the communication had been received since they left, relative to their visit to London; and I said there has been no communication, since they left, received either from the Imperial authorities or from themselves.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. Minister will see that the question is alternative—Has the Government received any communication in relation to the visit of these gentlemen? Such communication may have been prior to their going to England, or subsequent. It also asks: Has any communication been received in relation to the non-fulfilment of the terms of union with Prince Edward Island?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That is not the same question. There were some communications informing the Government of the demands made by these gentlemen to the Imperial authorities before their departure, and since nothing has been done. If such communications are asked by the House, they can be laid before Parliament.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I desire to call the attention of the House to a question of privilege, before the Notices of Motions are gone on with. In the Ottawa Free Press, of the 13th of April, 1886, I read an editorial paragraph in reference to myself, which is as follows:—

“Mr. Kirk, of Guysboro’, brought to the attention of Parliament yesterday a matter which was so grossly dishonorable and unfair on the part of the person responsible for it, that Mr. Speaker unhesitatingly pronounced it to be very improper, and stated that he would call the attention of the Chairman of the Debates Committee to the subject. It appears that by an arrangement with the publishers of the official Hansard, individual members are permitted to obtain at a nominal price to cover expenses, reprints of their speeches as officially reported; and these are circulated with the official headings and the official imprimature. But Dr. Cameron, of Inverness, thought he could do better than that. He obtained a pamphlet printed with the official heading, and the official imprimature, containing a report of a debate, together with such portions of the division list as suited his own peculiar views as to 'political exigencies.' The cooked pamphlet also boasted this heading: 'Better terms for Nova Scotia—The insincerity of the Grits exposed—Only one from Ontario and one from Quebec in favor of better terms for Nova Scotia—The member for Guysboro' caught in his own trap by Cameron (Inverness) and McDougall (Cape Breton).' Dr. Cameron can circulate any falsehood he pleases so long as he does not libel his political opponents; but when he issues from the Parliamentary printing office, with the official heading—the official imprimature—a pamphlet professing to be official which is a partisan effusion, he resorts to a species of warfare as contemptible as it is dastardly and dishonorable. Abuses of this kind of a useful privilege is likely to result in its abolition. The only person who condoned this gross offence was Mr. Thomas White, and the possible reason he did this was that Mr. Speaker had impartially condemned, a few minutes before, this abuse of the privileges granted to members of reproducing their speeches."

This editorial paragraph had reference to a discussion on the question of privilege which took place on the 12th instant. This question of privilege was raised by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), whose remarks were as follows:—

"Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the House, to a matter which has just come under my notice. I find, with respect to a debate which occurred on a motion moved by myself for papers and correspondence in regard to better terms in the Province of Nova Scotia, that this debate is published with interpolations and corrections under the official heading of the Debates of the House of Commons. This is done for the purpose of creating a false impression, and for the purpose of giving the authority of this House to that false impression. I have the paper here. It is under the official heading: 'House of Commons; Fourth Session, Fifth Parliament, 49 Victoria—Better terms to Nova Scotia—The insincerity of the Grits exposed.'"

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not read a speech made the other day. He should state what the question of privilege is.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It is necessary to point out the remarks made in connection with this question of privilege, to show there was no ground for them, so far as I am concerned. If it be contrary to the rules of the House to do so I shall submit, but I shall unquestionably be able to show, as far as I am personally concerned, that there was neither design, nor intention, nor reason why the very strong language used against me should have been used on that occasion. To-day I addressed a letter to the firm of MacLean, Roger & Co., Parliamentary Printers. I have no personal acquaintance with any member of that firm, or anybody in their employ, and I considered that, to place myself right before the House and the country, the proper course for me to pursue was to address a letter directly to these gentlemen, believing they had honor and honesty enough to answer the questions I considered it my duty to ask them. This morning I addressed them the following letter:

"OTTAWA, 14th April, 1886.

"GENTLEMEN,—I called at your printing establishment, a few days ago, and there enquired how much, per hundred copies, it would cost to publish the debate under the heading—'Money Subsidy to Nova Scotia'—in the correct Hansard reports of the House of Commons Debates of the 1st April, on page 474, including the whole debate on that subject, and containing the 'yeas' in favor of my amendment to Mr. Kirk's motion on that subject, on page 481. I was then and there informed that it would cost seventy-five cents 'per 100 copies,' with any heading that I might desire. I then wrote what I considered to be a very suitable heading to the said debate, as follows: 'Better terms for Nova Scotia—The insincerity of the Grits exposed—Only one from Ontario and one from Quebec in favor of better terms for Nova Scotia—The member for Guysboro' caught in his own trap by Cameron (Inverness) and McDougall (Cape Breton).'

"I frankly submit that this was a fairly appropriate heading to the discussion in question. I had a perfect right to demand this heading to that publication, as it was neither misleading nor unfair, in the circumstances. And, as the whole debate on the subject of a 'money subsidy to Nova Scotia' would be published, the reader might infer from the facts if the head-lines were incorrect.

"As your right to publish that debate in that manner, under the official heading—'House of Commons Debates'—was severely criticised, in the House of Commons, on a 'question of privilege,' on the 12th instant, by several members of Parliament, I beg to demand a categorical answer to each of the following questions, as I did not desire nor require any violation of your duty to the House of Commons:—

"(1.) Is it most improper for the Parliamentary Printers to publish statements of this kind?

"(2.) Have you the right to use the official heading—'House of Commons Debates, 4th Session, 5th Parliament'—over a correct report of the whole debate on a question of this kind?

"(3.) Have you the right to state that such an issue was 'printed by MacLean, Roger & Co., Parliamentary Printers'?

"(4.) Have you given me a correct Hansard report of the debate on the 'Money subsidy for Nova Scotia,' on the 1st April last, with heading as agreed upon, and for which I paid you in good Dominion currency, before delivery?

"An early answer will oblige,

"Yours truly,

"H. CAMERON (Inverness).

"MESSRS. MACLEAN, ROGER & CO.,

"Parliamentary Printers,

"Wellington Street, Ottawa."

To this letter I received the following reply:—

"OTTAWA, April 14th, 1886.

"DEAR SIR,—We are in receipt of your letter of this day's date, submitting to us certain questions, to which you ask us to give categorical answers. You ask:

"1st. Is it most improper for the Parliamentary Printers to publish statements of this kind?—Answer: We are authorised by our contract to supply 'any member requiring extra copies of his own or any speech.'

"2nd. Have you the right to use the official heading 'House of Commons Debates, Fourth Session, Fifth Parliament,' over a corrected report of the whole debate on a question of this kind?—Answer: It has been the invariable practice; the question of right has never arisen; no matter what the question, if the subject of debate in Parliament.

"3rd. Have you the right to state that such an issue was 'Printed by MacLean, Roger & Co., Parliamentary Printers'?—Answer: Yes; we claim the right.

"4th. Have you given me a correct Hansard report of the debate on 'the money subsidy for Nova Scotia,' &c.?—Answer: We gave you what you ordered, the Hansard report of Mr. Kirk's speech and your own.

"We have the honor to be, your obedient servants,

"MACLEAN, ROGER & CO."

Now, in view of this correspondence, I claim that I had just as much right to give that heading to that publication as other hon. members who have given similar headings to papers published by themselves. I referred to a number of pamphlets, issued in a similar manner with similar headings, and, therefore, I claim that I have done nothing that is not justified, nothing but what is done by several hon. members of this House; that there was nothing either misleading or unfair in the headings of that debate, and, as far as that is concerned, I assume all the responsibility. I had no intention of circulating the debate except in my own county, but, owing to the very public manner in which the debate has been referred to, I now feel at liberty to give it a little wider circulation.

Mr. KIRK. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no question before the Chair.

THE RIEL QUESTION.

Mr. Landry (Montmagny) moved for:

Copies of correspondence, whether by telegraph or otherwise, between the Government and Drs. Jukes, Valade and Lavell, or any of them, officers of the Government appointed to enquire into the mental condition of Louis Riel.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I asked the hon. gentleman the other day to be pleased to postpone his motion and I would ask him again to postpone it.

FISHING RIGHTS OF INDIANS ON LAKES HURON AND NIPISSING.

Mr. O'BRIEN moved for:

Copies of petitions or letters from the Indians on the north shore of Lake Huron or Lake Nipissing with reference to their rights of fishing in those water; and correspondence on the same subject between the Department of Indian Affairs and the local Superintendents.

He said: By this resolution of which I have given notice, and which I now beg leave to move, seconded by Mr.

Dawson, I desire to call the attention of the House and of the Government to a clause of the treaty, commonly known as the Robinson Treaty, by which the Chippewa Indians on the north shore of Lake Huron surrendered their lands to the Government of this country. By this clause the Indians reserved the right to exercise in future those rights of hunting and fishing which they had hitherto enjoyed. It is evident, from the terms of the treaty, that they were apprehensive that that would happen which has since happened, that those rights would be seriously impaired as the progress of the country went on. Although it is evident that, in many respects, it is impossible to prevent this from happening, yet if it could be shown that the Government of this country, either by its own acts or by the acts of others, has placed the Indians in a worse position than that which they occupied before, I think they are entitled to compensation. The clause in the treaty embraces two things—the right of fishing, and the right of hunting. The right of hunting would be necessarily limited, in the nature of things, as the position of the country changes. It is worth while to look for a moment at the very close connection of the fur trade, from which the Indians at one time derived a very considerable benefit, with the great events which have happened to this country. It was the fur trade, carried on as these Indians were in the habit of carrying it on, which brought about the disputes between the English and French colonists, which resulted in devastating wars, and finally in the conquest of Quebec. It was the fur trade which led to the sending out in the early days of this country of the couriers des bois, the progenitors of those Metis whose discontent with the changed condition of affairs was the main cause of that rebellion which we had so much reason to deplore. And it was the fur trade which brought into this country the company of Gentlemen Adventurers trading to Hudson's Bay, who exercised until recent years almost regal authority over the northern portion of this continent. But with regard to the claim of these Indians, the Government have, for several years, allowed these rights to be impaired. They have established a close season which has prevented the Indians from enjoying the right of fishing as it was at the time the treaty was made, when there was no close season. By their legislation in regard to the fisheries, they have practically deprived the Indians of the fishing which they previously enjoyed, because they have issued licenses and encouraged in various ways the trade in fishing, which has destroyed practically the inshore fisheries which were for the benefit of the Indians. While it must be admitted that the hunting, in the nature of things, must come to an end, yet the fishing is a matter which is very largely regulated by the action of the Government, and, if it appears, as it must, that the position of the Indians is very inferior to what it was when the treaty was made, they are entitled to equitable consideration. There are several ways in which this can be done; and, as I wish this motion to have a practical result, I want to point out to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries one way in which it can be done. At the time this treaty was made, the Indians could fish where they liked, and I think it would be only fair if the Department would agree to set apart some portions of the coast, conveniently situated to the Indian reserves, where the Indians might have exclusive rights of fishing. That is only a reasonable proposition. By the action of the Government, directly and indirectly, the Indians have lost the control of the fishing, and it would be only fair for the Government now to give them certain places where they would be in something like the position in which they stood before. There is another way in which I think the Government might fairly deal with the Indians. There are many of the bands whose reserves are comparatively worthless, from an agricultural point of view. There are others who have had no timber on their reserves, and consequently have not had the same income from the sale of timber which other tribes possess. It would be very simple for the Government, it would be a very inexpensive experiment, and it would encourage the Indians to carry on agricultural operations, which it is most desirable that they should enter into, if the Government would set apart a small sum of money to distribute to the bands, on the principle that, if the bands set apart out of their treaty money any sum for the purpose of purchasing agricultural implements or stock, the Government would set aside a similar sum. Supposing the band sets aside $50 or $100, the Government should do the same thing, and place it in the hands of a proper person to purchase these implements or this stock. This would satisfy the Indians to some extent, and would also encourage them in agricultural pursuits. I had the opportunity, a few years ago, of visiting most of the reserves on the shore of Lake Huron, and the House will be gratified to know that those Indians are progressing very favorably. I was surprised to find such comfortable houses, well kept, clean and tidy, well furnished, and comparing very favorably with many of the houses of the white settlers of that locality. I notice in their case that they had every comfort that men living as they do, could possibly possess, and altogether, so far as a casual observation could lead one to form an opinion, they were doing as well as they could desire. Many of them are working in the mills, and many of them go to the lumber camps and earn fair wages for a considerable portion of the year. I think the Government should do everything they can to encourage them in industrial pursuits, and in so doing they will, to a great extent, remove the present discontent which prevails among them with regard to their rights of fishing and hunting. I can assure the Government that this question is one upon which they feel deeply. Fishing, especially, has always been one of their principal sources of livelihood, and I think the Department of Marine and Fisheries ought to see whether it cannot, in various localities, set apart a portion of the coast for their special use and benefit. I think the Government generally might also help to remove their distress by adopting some measure to encourage them in their industrial pursuits in the way I have referred to.

Mr. DAWSON. In seconding this motion I may say that it is not very often that the case of the Indians comes before this House, and I am sure the House and the country will feel very much indebted to the hon. gentleman for bringing it up. There is no more important question connected with the Indians than that of their treaty rights to the fisheries. Their rights to certain fisheries and to fish everywhere about the great lakes, were secured to them by solemn treaty. By this treaty they were given the right to fish as they had always done up to one time, when they relinquished to the Government all that vast territory bordering on the great lakes to the north of Lakes Huron and Superior. With the leave of the House I will read a short extract from the treaty by which they relinquished their territorial rights:

"And further to allow the said chiefs and their tribes the full and free privilege to hunt over the territory now ceded by them, and to fish in the waters thereof as they have heretofore been in the habit of doing."

Now, Mr. Speaker, this right of the Indians to fish, thus secured them by treaty, has been ignored upon a great many occasions; and I invite the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the fact that that right has been so completely ignored that leases have been given on the grounds where the Indians were accustomed to fish, and boat licenses have been issued so that people go wherever they choose, and deprive the Indians of the food upon which they have been accustomed to subsist. I am happy to hear the hon. gentleman say that the Indians are progressing well, that they are in a comfortable condition, and that he had seen comfortable Indian houses among them. I can also say, with regard to many parts of the district I have the honor to represent, that the Indians are advancing, that they are becoming materially well off, and that they show every readiness to adopt habits of civilisation. Within the bounds of the district which I represent, there are 12,000 Indians or more. In Algoma proper there are 5,200; then west of the height of land, on the waters of the Rainy River, there are 4,000, and on the waters of the Moose River, leading towards Hudson's Bay, there are 3,000 more, and, if I draw attention to the condition of these people for a moment I am sure the House will bear with me. Some of these Indians are engaged in agriculture, and are fairly well off, especially in certain parts of the island of Manitoulin, and also in certain sections along the north shore of Lake Huron; but in some sections on the north coast of Lake Huron, where they have been accustomed to depend on the fisheries, they are at present deprived of the means of living because those fisheries have been leased. Last fall new fisheries regulations were published which the Indians did not notice in time. The regulations came upon them unexpectedly, and deprived them of the privilege of fishing in the fall, and it was in the fall of the year that they had formerly been accustomed to lay in their winter store of fish. But last fall these regulations came upon them so suddenly that they had not sufficient notice to prepare themselves. In a particular place called Garden River, where the people are not Indians, but rather French half-breeds—and the population on the coast of Lake Huron are partly French and partly of Indian origin—at this particular place the people were deprived of the privilege of fishing in the fall, and the consequence has been starvation among them in the past winter. I drew the attention of the Department of Indian Affairs to this matter, and, as usual, met with a very kind response. They were ready to do everything they possibly could, and, I believe, they made the poor Indians in that section an advance on account of their annuity moneys, in order to help them through the winter. But that was not enough, and their suffering has been very great. Now, Sir, the Indians of the North-West, when deprived of the food to which they had been accustomed for centuries, the buffalo, received aid from the Government. The Government had to aid them, because these Indians are able to take their own part; they are powerful, and they make themselves felt, and their grievances ring from one end of the Dominion to the other. But these poor people on the shores of the great lakes, although they suffer as much as the Indians of the North-West, from the white men coming into their waters, and sweeping off the food on which they have been accustomed to depend, their suffering does not attract so much attention. There is another feature connected with this question which the hon. gentleman has mentioned, and that is that certain payments were to have been made to these Indians under a solemn treaty. The Government of the day engaged to make certain payments to the Indians on the great lakes on account of the lands they had relinquished, lying between the lakes and the summit of the watershed. Under the two treaties it is ascertained and acknowledged that there is a sum of over $300,000 due to these poor people. Now, Sir, a dispute is going on between the Government of Ontario and the Government of the Dominion, as to which Government should pay the arrears due to the Indians. The Government of Ontario claims that it has nothing to do with the Indians, and the Government of the Dominion, on its part, claims that as the land was apportioned to Ontario on which the payments were, in fact, made dependent, on the sale of the land, and were a lien on the land, Ontario ought to pay the arrears. What I maintain is this, that no matter what Government should ultimately pay the amount, the Indians in the meantime should be paid, and this matter settled between the two Governments afterwards as to which should furnish the funds. The Indians in many places are suffering now; while undoubtedly in many places they have advanced in prosperity and are very well off, in other places they are very badly off. There can be no doubt that this amount is due. It is acknowledged by the Indian Department and by both Governments to be due them, and I think the payment of that amount should not be longer withheld.

Mr. ALLEN. The more I hear of the Indian question the more I am satisfied that the proper way to treat the Indians would be to enfranchise them, to give them their property and let them have possession of it, the same as white people. The Indian fishermen of whom we have heard to-day are located along the different rivers and lakes, but they are not qualified to go into fishing profitably. They depend on white people for their fishing, and if the fishing grounds were allowed to remain in their possession the Indians would not make them pay. They would catch some fish for themselves, but it would be a hardship for the white fishermen on those lakes if any arrangement should be made to prevent them fishing in all those waters. The Indians would be far better off if they got their lands and were taught farming, as a number of them now cultivate considerable quantities of land. If they were to attend to their farming business it would pay them a great deal better than fishing, because they have not the capital, the experience, or the judgment to guide them in carrying on the fishing business as extensively as white men do, in large quantities, pack them in ice, and ship them to the United States. The whites engage the Indians to fish for them, and that is the only way they can make a living at the present time, and in this way they do better and make more money than if they had the fishing-ground to themselves. I would recommend the Government to act differently with the Indians. Give them their lands; make them work those lands. They would then be better off, be better citizens and more comfortable, and such a result would be better for the country, better for the citizens at large, better for our fishermen, better for all persons concerned, and would involve less trouble, annoyance and anxiety to the country and to the Government. But it would be a hardship to fishermen, who have gone to great expense and labor to establish fisheries, if they were deprived of those grounds—and at the same time be of little or no benefit to the Indians, who have not the means or facilities to work profitably.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I followed what the hon. gentleman who put this motion before the House, and what the other hon. members have said on this subject. Of course, there is no objection to the motion and to the papers being brought down. The mover of the motion has made two or three suggestions to the Government. The first was in regard to the fisheries. He thinks the Indians are not properly treated in that respect, and that a source of revenue to them, or of subsistence has ceased, and that those fisheries are now in the hands of private individuals, and therefore the Indians cannot use them. I observed especially what the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) stated when he read an extract, which I understood to be an extract from a treaty made with some of the Indians, by which it would appear that certain fishing rights were reserved to them. Of course that Department is not specially under my direction, and I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman now. But I will not fail to call the special attention of the sub-head of that Department to the point, so that he may lay it before the Superintendent-General as soon as possible. There cannot be any intention on the part of the Government to deprive the Indians of their rights, no matter what those rights are. If they are entitled to certain fisheries according to their treaty, the Government will, no doubt, take means to recognise those rights, and have them again placed in the possession of the Indians if possible, and if not, to compensate them for those rights. Another suggestion is made by the mover of the resolution, namely, that in order to encourage Indians to improve their stock and agricultural implements, the Government should give them an encouragement in money, and that when a band of Indians would put aside for that purpose $100 the Government should add an equal sum or other amount in order to encourage them. This is a suggestion which I am not ready to say the Government would accept or not, but it is worthy of consideration; I thank the hon. gentleman for having put it before the House. The hon. member for Algoma also spoke of arrears due to certain tribes amounting to a large sum of money, and the hon. gentleman said the difficulty is this, that the question is whether the Federal Government should pay it or whether it should be paid by the Ontario Government. I think if the question has come to that point some settlement might be found between the two Governments, the powerful Government of the Dominion and the important Government of that large Province, so that they would not, on such a question in dispute between the two Governments, deprive the Indians of that to which they might be entitled. Some means must be found by which this difficulty between the two Governments may be removed and the Indians have the amount due, if it is due to them. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Allen) made another suggestion. He would go at once and enfranchise the Indians. I do not suppose the House or the community would object to enfranchise the Indians, but only when they are ready for enfranchisement. They have been under the care of the Government, which has done everything possible to improve their position in social life and to educate them, and there can be no doubt that before many years have passed a large number of Indians will have been enfranchised. But I differ from the hon. member for Grey, and I do not believe it would be for the benefit of the communities near which those Indians live, to enfranchise them before they are ready. It would not be in accordance with our duty as a Government and Parliament to give them perfect liberty and place them on the same footing as white men before they had attained that degree of civilisation and education which would enable them to advance in life. You do not do it with children. You try to educate them and bring them up, and then, after a number of years, when the young man or the girl is able to get on in life, then freedom is given to them, if I may use the word. I think, therefore, we should take care not to enfranchise the Indians too soon, but as soon as they are ready for enfranchisement then it should be given them. There is no objection to the motion.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose the hon. Minister has not forgotten that the very parties he is now condemning as unfit to manage their own affairs are the parties to whom he gave the vote last year.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I could answer the hon. gentleman, but I do not suppose that we should, on a side issue like this, begin again the long discussion we had last year, in which the hon. gentleman took so prominent a part.

Mr. MILLS. We are not beginning a long discussion, but just referring to the subject and beginning another.

Mr. GUILLET. I feel sure that the granting of the vote to the Indians would be the means of promoting their education and preparing them for the exercise of the franchise. There is good evidence of that in the fact that some of the hon. gentlemen opposite who were opposed to the enfranchisement of the Indians have been going among them—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.
Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would seem that the hon. gentleman believes that though the Indians are not capable of managing their own affairs, yet they are abundantly able to manage ours, and I am free to say that I do not think they could manage them worse than they are managed at present.

TRIALS FOR TREASON-FELONY AT REGINA, ETC.

Mr. MILLS moved for :

1. Copies of all correspondence and telegrams between Henry J. Clark, Q.C., Counsel for the Half-breed or Metis prisoners sentenced to imprisonment in the gaol at Regina and in the Provincial Penitentiary of Manitoba, and the Honorable Minister of Justice; together with all the depositions or other evidence submitted in favor of the prisoners, and forming part of such correspondence. 2. Copies of all correspondence and telegrams between Henry J. Clark, Q.C., Counsel for André Nault and Abraham Monteur, Metis prisoners confined at Regina and Battleford, and the Honorable Minister of Justice; together with all depositions submitted on behalf of said prisoners.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I may state that there is no objection whatever to bringing down to the House the petitions and representations on behalf of the prisoners referred to in the motion, and these I understand are the documents which the hon. gentleman principally desires to have. There is no correspondence with Mr. Clark, excepting a letter from him and a letter acknowledging its receipt by myself. There are reasons why I think it would not be expedient to bring that letter down, as I have mentioned to the hon. gentleman, but I would not urge those reasons if there appeared to be any information whatever in the letter itself. If the hon. gentleman will be good enough to omit that part of the motion I will have great pleasure in bringing down the rest.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

CLAIM OF JEAN BAPTISTE PLANTE.

Mr. AMYOT moved for :

Copies of all documents addressed to the Honorable the Minister of Railways, praying on the part of Jean Baptiste Plante, of St. Charles, that his claim for two horses killed on the Intercolonial Railway may be referred anew to the Dominion Arbitrators.

He said: This is a very simple matter and I am sure that the Government will think it just and proper to accede to my request. My object in moving for these papers is twofold. I want first to get a copy of the letters in full, and secondly to draw the attention of the Government to the facts of the case. Some two or three years ago when the St. Charles Branch was undertaken, there was a surveying party engaged there, and they went on the farm of Jean Baptiste Plante on which there were two horses among other cattle. They came back in the evening, and the next morning it was found that the two horses had left the farm and were killed on the Intercolonial Railway, which adjoined the farm. The contention of Plante was that the gate had been left open by the party, and he claimed to be paid for his horses. The case was referred to the Dominion arbitrators and a regular enquete took place, and the evidence was so clear and conclusive that the arbitrators decided in favor of Plante, and the judgment was that the Government should pay the value of the horses. Plante was informed of that and expected his money, but something or other occurred and the case was referred back to the arbitrators without his knowledge, and a second enquete took place. He was never informed of it, and new witnesses were heard. Instead of receiving his money, Plante learned that the case had been dismissed by the arbitrators. Hearing this, he procured affidavits and established before the Government the facts of the case—that witnesses had been heard without his being informed, that they had been heard ex parte in that second instance. He produced affidavits to establish that he had other witnesses to contradict those who were heard ex parte, and he applied to have, not payment for his horses, but a reference to which he would be made a party, so that he might be able to cross-examine the witnesses brought against him and bring forward new witnesses. The answer of the Railway Department was that this could not be done. I humbly submit that this should be done, and that a second reference should be given to him. The papers before the Department establish two things: First, that he was not aware of the second reference after the first judgment in his favor; and secondly, that had he been aware of it he would have not only successfully cross-questioned the new witnesses, but would have procured new evidence, which would have entirely demolished the case of those who appeared against him in the second reference. Under the circumstances I hope the Government will again consider this case. I hope they will take into consideration that the first case, in which Mr. Plante had an opportunity to cross-examine the Crown witnesses and to produce his own witnesses, was adjudged in his favor; that they will also consider the affidavits which proved that he was not informed of the second reference, and could not cross-examine the Crown witnesses or produce his own witnesses; and that they will order a new reference.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no objection to bringing down the papers; but I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman's suggestion that there should be a new reference. I shall call the attention of the Minister of Railways to that, and he may take it up when he thinks the matter should be considered.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very glad to hear the hon. Minister say that, and I think, after the distinct statements made by the hon. member for Bellechasse, that some explanation should be made to the House at a convenient season; because it is quite clear, from the statement made by the hon. member for Bellechasse, if he is correctly informed, that the arbitrators proceeded contrary to the very first principles of justice. After a decision in favor of this individual, that an order for a new reference should be made without notice being given to him, seems strange; but the order having been made that that reference should be proceeded with without notice of the intention to proceed being given to him, is a violation of the very fundamental principles of justice; and arbitrators who have done that and are unable to explain it, have by that action declared themselves disqualified for any further arbitrations.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not enter into any explanation on that part of the hon. gentleman's statement. I assumed that he made it on information he received; therefore, I cannot discuss that matter. But I am sure, when the papers come down, that it will be found that there must be some misapprehension, because, whether a man is poor or wealthy, if he has a just claim against the Government, of course the claim must be paid.

Mr. AMYOT. I may say that the notification of the second trial reached Mr. Plante after the trial had taken place. I do not want to charge the arbitrators with any improper conduct; but I must say that they have very often proved themselves in these cases to be most arbitrary. I am sure, when the Government examine the papers with a spirit of justice, they will come to the help of this man. The killing of his two horses has destroyed about half of what he is worth in this world.

Motion agreed to.

CLAIMS FOR FISHING BOUNTIES.

Mr. LANGELIER moved for :

Copies of all claims for fishing bounties by Louis Pinault and Michel Pinault, of Ste. Océile, Bic, fishermen; of all affidavits or declarations in support of the said claims; of all correspondence in relation to such claims between the Department of Fisheries or any other Department of the Government and the said Louis Pinault and Michel Pinault or other persons; also of all reports of fishery overseers in relation to the said claims.

He said: By the Act 47 Vic., chap. 18, the Governor in Council is authorised to grant every year $150,000 to be distributed to our fishermen to aid them in building craft and vessels. During the seasons of 1882, 1883, 1884 and 1885, Messrs. Louis Pinault and Michel Pinault, both of the parish of Bic, in the county of Rimouski, were engaged in sea fishing in the schooner Amarilda, which they built for that purpose. During those seasons they carried on their fishing for more than three months in each season, which, I understand, is all that is necessary, according to the regulations of the Marine and Fisheries Department, to entitle fishermen to the bounty under the Statute of 1882. They carried on their business at a place called St. Margaret's Point, or Jambon, on the north coast of the St. Lawrence. They applied for their bounty like all the other fishermen engaged in sea fishing at the same place and under the same circumstances, who have all received the bounty; but the bounty was refused to these gentlemen. I cannot bring myself to believe that it was refused to them because they did not hold the same political opinions as the party in power. Until otherwise informed, I shall be obliged to believe that the Government have been misinformed by the overseer of the station at which they were engaged in sea fishing, one Mignault. The answer they received from the Government was that the overseer had made an unfavorable report—had reported that they had not been engaged long enough each season to be entitled to the bounty. They have sent to the Department a great number of statutory declarations, showing that the Government, if they received such information from the fishery overseer, had been misinformed. Unfortunately, they have not been able to obtain redress up to this moment. I do not wish to detain the House by reading all these declarations. I shall content myself with reading two which prove most conclusively that they were entitled to the bounty, and that the representations of the overseer, if they were as stated, were false representations. Here is one of these declarations :

"I, the undersigned, Auguste Michaud, of the parish of Isle Verte, county of Temiscouata, navigator, solemnly declare that the schooner Amarilda, belonging to Messrs. Louis Pinault and Michel Pinault, of Bic, has been engaged in sea fishing during more than three months in the summer seasons of 1882, 1883 and 1884, at St. Margaret's Point, commonly called Jambon, on the north coast of the River St. Lawrence; that the said schooner Amarilda has passed the fishing seasons mentioned with us at Jambon, and I declare that the said schooner Amarilda has been engaged in sea fishing exactly in the same manner as the schooner Emerillon, of which I am the owner, and for which I obtained a fishing bounty, except for the season of 1883, which I hope to receive."

I shall read another declaration showing the motives of Mignault for the report he made to the Department :

"I, Thomas Deschêne, senior, of the city of Sherbrooke, fisherman, solemnly declare that the schooner Amarilda, belonging to Messrs. Louis Pinault and Michel Pinault, of Ste. Océile du Bic, fishermen, has been engaged in sea fishing during more than three months during the summer seasons of 1883, 1884 and 1885 at St. Margaret's Point, commonly called Jambon, on the north coast of the River St. Lawrence.

"I have passed the summer season above mentioned at Jambon, and I can state and affirm that the schooner Amarilda was employed and engaged in sea fishing, exactly in the same manner as the other schooners which were fishing at the same place during the seasons above mentioned, and which have received the fishing bounty. I declare further, that towards the middle of October, 1884, at Jambon, the fishery overseer, Mignault, said and declared in my presence, that as long as he would be fishing overseer, the Messrs. Pinault would not get the fishing bounty, and he used the following words: 'While I will be fishery overseer I will do all I can, and you will not get the fishing bounty.'"

I call the attention of the Minister of Fisheries to this, that he may see justice is done to those men. It may be that the Department has been misinformed, but I am sure, if the Minister will take the trouble to read the numerous solemn declarations sent to the Department, he will see that the Department has been deceived by the overseer who has a personal spite against the parties. Those parties, he will find, are as much entitled to the bounty as any of the other fishermen who gave in their declarations.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to bring down the correspondence, though it is very voluminous. The hon. gentleman will find from it that there are two sides to the question: I have not read the whole correspondence, but have acted largely on information I have received, and I can assure my hon. friend that, whether the parties he named belong to one party or the other, the fact has had nothing to do with their case, and will have nothing to do with any such claims in the future.

Motion agreed to.

IMPERIAL TITLES.

Mr. EDGAR moved for:

Return showing:—1. The names of the officers of the Canadian Militia, of the Imperial Army, or of the Canadian Militia Department, including its political head who received titles, honors or decorations from Her Majesty in connection with services rendered in repelling the Fenian raid of 1870, and services rendered in the Red River expedition, under Colonel Wolseley; 2. The names of the officers of the Canadian Militia, of the Imperial Army, or of the Canadian Militia Department, including its political head who received titles, honors or decorations from Her Majesty in connection with services rendered in quelling the North-West Rebellion of 1885. 3. Copies of reports or recommendations of Major-General Middleton upon the subject of conferring titles, honors or decorations upon any of such officers in connection with services in quelling the North-West Rebellion of 1885.

He said: Although I make this motion, I must confess that the granting of a few titles more or less is not a subject about which I individually feel a very profound interest. I must admit that I may have rather strong views upon the subject of titles and decorations which are purely honorary. Perhaps my notions are Republican or Democratic. At any rate, I do not believe that any Canadians are much better for such titles, and I fail to learn that they are any the worse for not having them. I have a strong prejudice against Canadians holding titles who do not, directly or indirectly, come from the Canadian people. I do not think we can be made, and I am rather inclined to think we do not want to be made, an aristocratic people in this country. However, there are some amongst us who hold quite different views on that subject, and I know that among the military men in this country there are certain titles which are considered equivalent to professional promotion, and therefore they are valued by our military men. We are all agreed that the Canadian volunteers did well in 1885; we know they did their duty in the first place, and that in doing it they suffered very great hardships. We know that they not only submitted to hardships, but they actually fought in the field and were victorious too, and, for Canada, there was a comparatively large number of men engaged. The Fenian raids and the Red River expedition were trifling affairs, as compared to the troubles in the North-West, yet the honors, as far as I have been able to ascertain them from an unofficial source, were showered upon the officers engaged in the Fenian raid of 1870 and the Red River expedition. I dare say, when this return is granted and brought down, we may find that I have omitted a number, but, so far as I know, in the Fenian raid of 1870, General Lindsay received a K.C.M.G.; Col. Chamberlin received a C.M.G.; Col. Fletcher, a C.M.G.; Col. McEachren, a C.M.G.; Col. Osborne Smith, a C.M.G. Then we come to the bloodless Red River expedition under General Wolseley, we find that that distinguished warrior was made K.C.M.G.; on that occasion Col. Boulton was made C.M.G., Col. Casault, C.M.G., also Col. Feilden, Col. Jarvis, Col. McLeod, Col. McNeil and Comptroller Irvine. Now, so far as the world knows, only two titles have been conferred upon the officers connected with the quelling of the rebellion of 1885, one a knighthood on the distinguished leader of the forces in the field, and the other, also a knighthood, on the distinguished leader of the forces in the western block. It is true all the brave commanders of regiments and of brigades and of separate corps received no recognition, but perhaps that omission was made up for by the honors secured in the western block. Now, surely, it cannot be that this state of things will be allowed to remain so much longer. I dare say, if we could only see the report of the gallant general, which I have asked for, if it were consistent with the public interests, that it should be brought down, that it would be found that he had promptly recommended a number of his comrades in arms to a small share in the honors which were lavished so largely upon him. Is it possible that there is any hitch? Is it possible that any different view has been taken by the general in the field and the head of the War Department? Perhaps we will know where the mystery is some day, but, after nearly a year has elapsed, I think it is time that the public and the military men who are concerned should know something about it. No complaints have been made that I have heard of by any officer. Canadian soldiers do not make complaints, but, in the face of what I have told you about the honors conferred in 1870 and how well we know they were deserved in 1885, I think an opportunity should be given to the Government to give a little explanation to the country. I do not refer at all to the question of medals or clasps for the men. I think we know from the public press all that has been done there. We are told that medals have been struck and sent out to the men, and clasps for a certain number among them. Now, I believe in rewarding our brave volunteers in every reasonable way, in giving them grants of land or scrip, and I believe in giving most liberal pensions to those who were wounded and have suffered for the country, and to the families of those who have been killed. But I cannot say that I sympathise at all with the idea of giving our volunteers war medals for that unfortunate affair of 1885. I do not think that we should give them medals to commemorate a contest which we all regret, a contest in which the whole power of Canada was turned against a small and oppressed and a brave people, who, after all, are our fellow citizens and fellow Canadians; and I am very much mistaken if the volunteers want these medals. I do not think they have ever asked for them; I do not think many of them will wear them, and I doubt if some of them will accept them at all.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman has asked for a return which, of course, there is no objection whatever to bring down; but, in asking for that return, the hon. gentleman took occasion to express his views as to the honors which had been conferred upon some Canadians, and upon the leader of the military force which was sent out to the North-West to put down the unfortunate troubles of 1885. The hon. gentleman also took advantage of the opportunity to express his views as to the aristocratic tendencies of some people in Canada, and to state that, so far as he was personally concerned, his views were more republican than they were aristocratic, and that he disapproved of honors which were conferred upon Canadians and which did not come from the Canadian people. So far as the hon. gentlemen's republican views are concerned, if those views are merely based upon the question of receiving honors from the Imperial Government, it is just possible that the hon. gentleman may not be interfered with in keeping as long as he chooses the republican views which he has just expressed, and that he may not be placed in the rather disagreeable position to him of having to refuse any honors which might be conferred upon him. The hon. gentleman stated that the volunteers of 1885 had done very well indeed, and I am very glad that the hon. gentleman should have found one occasion to express what the people of Canada as a whole, I believe, think of the manner in which the volunteers, during the trying times of 1885, fulfilled the duty which was thrust upon them by the circumstances, and fulfilled that duty to the fullest extent, better even than could have been expected by their own countrymen. But the hon. gentleman stated that the honors which had been conferred by our Gracious Sovereign had merely been conferred upon the general who was in the field and the general who was in the western block. I have no manner of doubt that the hon. gentleman was not consulted by our Gracious Sovereign when she decided to confer upon those who had taken some part in the suppression of the troubles in the North-West the honors which have been conferred. The hon. gentleman went further, and said that this kind of thing cannot continue any longer. I have no doubt that, when our Gracious Sovereign reads the utterances delivered by the hon. gentleman to-day, she will be induced to change her mind, and, in sending out more honors, so as to avoid the possibility of making any mistake, will consult the hon. gentleman as to who should be the recipients of such honors and how many of those distinguished marks of her approbation should be sent to Canada. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman also stated that he disapproved entirely of war medals having been granted by Her Majesty to those who took part in the suppression of the rebellion in the North-West. I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman should express himself in that way; I am not surprised that he should feel in that way. When the hon. gentleman displayed such energy in defending the rebellion and in defending rebels, it is hardly to be supposed that he should consider it fit and proper that medals should be given to those who took their lives in their hands and went up to the North-West to put down that very rebellion, and to put an end to the very troubles which the hon. gentleman has defended. I can only tell the hon. gentleman that, in so far as I am concerned personally, I attach the greatest importance possible to the manner in which those troubles were suppressed by our own people, by our own Canadian volunteers, and I attach also the greatest importance, as a Canadian, to the manner in which the distinguished services of our volunteers were recognised in England by our Sovereign, and rewarded by her. It may be that when the hon. gentleman takes up the returns, which will be brought down, he may find examples, not only in 1885, but during the troubles which the hon. gentleman has referred to, of the manner in which our Canadian volunteers have always behaved when called upon to defend their country and their flag. It is not a new thing to Canadians to know that Canadian volunteers, whenever called upon to defend their country, have done so in a manner creditable to both themselves and their country. I say again that I feel very proud, indeed, that the services which have been rendered by our volunteers have been recognised in so distinguished a manner. The hon. gentleman has spoken about other distinctions, and other honors being conferred. Well, I am not at all in the secrets of Her Majesty, I do not know whether she intends to confer further distinctions, or to give further rewards, for the services which have been rendered; but it seems to me that we should be grateful for those which have been so far conferred, when Her Majesty considered that it was due to the valor of the Canadian troops to have these medals struck in order to commemorate the manner in which they have fulfilled their duty to their country, and to herself as our sovereign.

Mr. GAULT. I was sorry to hear the hon. gentleman belittle the services of the volunteers who went to the front at the time of the Fenian raid. I may say that on that occasion four or five regiments went from Montreal, and my hon. friend for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol) took off his gown and put on his sword, and marched out at the head of his regiment. I think that was a much more serious affair, perhaps, than that of the North-West, although the latter was at a much greater distance and more difficult to put down. But still our volunteers behaved at Pigeon Hill in the most noble manner, and I have always regretted that nothing was done to confer any mark of favor upon the men and officers who then went to the front. Many of them feel, and have felt to this day, I know, that they deserved some mark of recognition which they could have shown to their children and I think that if this had been done they would have prized it very highly. I regret exceedingly that nothing has ever been done by our Government in that respect. I desire to say, Sir, that I am very proud, indeed, of the conduct of our volunteers in the North-West. We all felt, the whole country felt, that they had gone forth on a most perilous expedition, and little did we know the perils they were to encounter. I am very glad we have a Minister at the head of the Militia Department, a young man, who was able to do the work so efficiently as he did; because a great deal depends on him and on his energy and his efforts. I am also proud that we had General Middleton to lead our troops, and glad to know that he displayed the greatest valor, while at the same time he did all he could to protect the men from danger, and both the Minister and General richly deserved the high honors conferred upon them by Her Majesty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before that motion passes, I would like to say a word or two. I do not precisely agree with my hon. friend in all the sentiments he has expressed. I am inclined to think that so long as we remain subjects of a monarchy, honorary distinctions of that kind, if they are freely and spontaneously tendered may fairly be accepted. But that is not a point, on which, for obvious reasons, I wish to prolong discussion. But I desire to say that I think the Ministry themselves will see, on reflection, that there is a good deal to be said for the views suggested by my hon. friend who moved this motion. We are bound, in these cases, to regard the custom of the service. Now the custom of the English service always has been that when any success was achieved in the field, the general officer in command was not the only one to receive a decoration. You must recollect, Mr. Speaker, that in cases of this kind our volunteers will feel themselves, to a certain extent, governed by the rules which prevail in Her Majesty's service, and had this thing happened in the regular service, there can be no doubt whatever that one conclusion could have been drawn, and that is, that the officer in command was the only one who deserved well of Her Majesty's Government. Now, I am quite sure that the Ministers, that this House and the country, will agree with me in saying that the officers and men who served on that occasion deserve all the recognition that their country could give them, and, by implication, that they deserve, I think, the usual recognition at the hands of Her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty is, of course, as the hon. member remarked, the fountain of honor, but being at a distance of three or four thousand miles she must derive her information from Her Majesty's advisers on this side of the ocean. I think, Sir, that when the Government comes to reflect they will see that, bearing in mind the custom of the English service, this omission to recognise any of these gallant men except the officer in command, has been, to say the least of it, unfortunate, and that it would be well that it should be remembered. It is a pity, I think, that it has not been remembered earlier. Now, I am quite aware that the distribution of honors of the kind is more or less invidious, is more or less troublesome, and it may well be said that it would give rise to a certain amount of heart-burning, and that it is unfortunate that anything of the sort should exist on such an occasion. But I submit that it is part of the necessary duties of a Government to make a selection on their responsibility, after taking all the pains they can to inform themselves who are the parties best entitled to the recognition. Now, Sir, as to these officers, and in particular to the officers on whom devolved the responsibility of leading bodies of men in the North-West, everybody knows that many of the gentlemen suffered very considerable hardship, as did also the men and officers under their command, and very probably exposed themselves to considerable loss by being absent from their ordinary avocations at such times. But human nature being human nature, it cannot be wondered at—although I am bound to say I believe that they have made no sign and given no indication of their feelings but it cannot be wondered at if these gentlemen do feel in their hearts a little aggrieved at seeing that their services are apparently altogether ignored. I repeat, Sir, it is unfortunate that they should be ignored. The House should recollect that we were in a very serious dilemma about a year ago, and it was mainly due to the gallantry of the officers and men who formed that North-West expedition, that what might have been an exceedingly dangerous revolt, was promptly suppressed before it was possible for it to spread to the Indian tribes, and I doubt, with all due respect to my gallant friends who took a share in suppressing the Fenian raid in 1869-70, or in the first expedition to Red River, if any men rendered better service to their country,—and in rendering service to their country they rendered service to the British Empire be it remembered—than did the officers and men that took a share in the expedition of 1885; and, therefore, although it is not for me, although it is not for us, to dictate to Her Gracious Majesty what she should be pleased to do in the matter of honors, I think it might be as well that in some indirect method or fashion that expression of opinion, which I venture to say is shared by a great many gentlemen on both sides of the House, should be brought through the proper channel to the notice of Her Most Gracious Majesty, who may, when it is brought before her, be thoroughly depended upon to do what is right and proper in this matter.

Motion agreed to.

FLAG TREATY BETWEEN SPAIN AND THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. VAIL moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Dominion and the Imperial Governments on the subject of the flag treaty between Spain and the United States, whereby American products are admitted to entry in Cuba and Porto Rico on more favorable terms than the products of the Dominion of Canada.

He said: This is the third time I have moved for this correspondence. The importance of the subject, and the interest taken in it by commercial men who are engaged in the trade with the Spanish islands, must be my excuse for occupying a few moments in making a further explanation beyond the statements made last year and the year before. As I stated at that time, previous to 1884, the United States Government obliged all persons entering goods from Porto Rico and Cuba to pay 10 per cent. additional over the goods entered from any other country. But in the beginning of 1884, I think in February, an arrangement was made between the Spanish Government and the American Government that in consideration of the American Government removing that restriction of 10 per cent. on Spanish goods brought to the United States or entered in United States ports, the Spanish Government agreed to place the goods landed from the United States in Porto Rico and Cuba on the same footing as goods landed from Spanish vessels or from Spain. Our annual shipments of dried fish to Porto Rico alone is about 150,000 quintals. In addition, we ship a large quantity of pickled fish. Besides this, we ship a large quantity of fish to the Island of Cuba.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

The change made in favor of the United States Government is equal to about 20 per cent. of the duties paid, and the duty paid on dried fish by our merchants is about 13 cents per 100 lbs. over what the Americans are called upon to pay on their fish. In addition, the United States vessels when discharging cargoes are admitted to entry on payment of 62½ cents per ton, while our vessels, and, in fact, the vessels of every other country except France and Germany pay $1.25 per ton. For loading cargoes our vessels pay $1 per ton while American vessels are only charged 50 cents per ton. I explained all this to the House in 1884, and the Minister of Finance replied as follows:—

“Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The attention of the Government has been called to this subject previous to the statement of the hon. gentleman. We have obtained some information with reference to the effect of this treaty or arrangement between the two countries, but as far as we have received it, if it includes the question of tonnage, it does not bear out the statement he has made, though I dare say he may be right. The arrangements between Spain and the United States were not really as favorable as those between Canada and Cuba or Porto Rico. There were charges made that did not exist here. They have been removed and the United States have been placed in the third list of duties. The Government are quite alive to the importance of having our trade on as good terms as that of the United States, and no time will be lost in endeavoring to bring about such arrangements as will place us on quite as favorable terms as they have.

“Mr. MACKENZIE. What treaty is it that governs the traffic at present? Is it a recent treaty?

“Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is an arrangement made, such as this, I presume. It is not a treaty.

“Mr. MACKENZIE. It is independent of any commercial treaty?

“Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes. This is an arrangement by which this anomalous state of things is to be removed, and, as far as I have seen the correspondence, they propose to go still further and make treaty arrangements even wider and broader in their operation than those referred to by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail.) This is an arrangement made by the representative of the United States and the Spanish authorities placing the imports entering into Cuba or Porto Rico under what is called the third list. There are four rates of duties and charges, and they are now placed in the third column. The exact effect of this we have not yet been informed of.”

The matter stood over from that time till last year, when I again moved in the matter, and went over pretty much the same ground as I have gone over to-day. I pointed out then that a year had elapsed and nothing apparently had been done. I pointed out that we were placed at a very great disadvantage; that it was a matter that required the attention of the Government, and I was a little disappointed on finding that nothing had been done, so far as I knew, up to that time. Last year I was in a position to show pretty conclusively the statements I had made were quite correct, and I produced at that time a price current from Cuba by which I showed the exact amount of duty paid on American goods at those islands, and the duty paid on our goods. Perhaps I had better read to the House the short table I then submitted, which, however, contains only a few of the articles. It is as follows:—

	All Countries except Spain and United States.	United States.	Difference.
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
Apples	1 47½ per 100 lbs.	1 15 per 100 lbs.	0 32½

Now, Sir, the House will see at once that it will be next to impossible, with these restrictions on our trade, for our merchants to compete at all with the United States. On that occasion the Minister of Finance replied to me as follows :

"I may say to the hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution, that early after the return of the High Commissioner to London, he was instructed by the Government to take certain steps with a view to securing the same advantages to Canada as were secured to the United States by the treaty referred to. Instructions were given to him to make certain propositions. If those failed, he was to make other propositions. Correspondence was entered into between the High Commissioner and the Imperial Government, and it was settled that he was to act in conjunction with the British Minister in Spain, in negotiating a treaty of this kind. It was stated at the time the treaty was made that a more extended treaty would likely be arranged between Spain and the United States during the summer. It was found that negotiations of a much more extended character were being prosecuted between the representative of the United States and the Spanish Government. It was found desirable—in fact our High Commissioner was communicated with—to say that understanding, as we did, unfortunately, through the Imperial Government, through the foreign office, that the negotiations, the proposals to cover the ground of the treaty to which the hon. gentleman referred, would not be sufficient to meet the larger ground through the negotiations which were going on. Under these circumstances he waited until the larger treaty was agreed upon, and then he was instructed to put himself in communication with the foreign office, and the foreign office with the Government of Spain. The answer of the Spanish Government was, that they declined to enter into further negotiations with the representative of the Government of Canada until the decision of the Senate of the United States was known, as to the other treaty; and therefore the matter stands in that position until the action of the Senate is known. I might state that it would not be in the public interest to say what instructions were given to Sir Charles Tupper to cover the ground of the original treaty. If the treaty made is ratified the Government will probably be in a position to give decided instructions to the High Commissioner in the larger and more important question. The Government think it would not be in the interests of the public to state exactly what the instructions were or to bring down the papers which would show exactly what we propose in the first place, and then as an alternative proposition."

Now another year has passed, and, as far as I know, it seems that no progress has been made; at all events, we have never been told that any progress has been made. We were told in 1884 that certain negotiations were going on, and that the papers could not be brought down. In 1885 we were told that the correspondence was still going on, and that certain instructions had been issued, but that nothing could be done until it was decided by the United States Senate whether the enlarged treaty which had been entered into early last spring between Spain and the United States would be confirmed. Now, nearly a year has elapsed since the Senate of the United States refused to ratify that treaty, and of course, nothing was done. But the flag treaty, which affects us really more than the more extended treaty would if it had been carried into effect, is still in existence, and I hope that the Government, having had two years now to consider this question, to carry on correspondence with the British Government and point out the difficulties under which our commercial men labor under this arrangement between Spain and the United States, will be in a position to tell me that they have made such progress that in a very short time our merchants will be placed on the same footing as the United States merchants are at the present time. I shall not make any further remarks until I hear the reply of the Government.

Mr. STAIRS. I am sure the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) in bringing this motion to the notice of the House and by the remarks which he made, has not in any way over-estimated the disadvantages under which the trade of Canada, and particularly the Maritime Provinces, now labors in regard to the trade with Cuba and Porto Rico on account of the flag treaty between the United States and Spain, to which he has referred. It is certainly to be desired that all possible means should be taken by the Government of Canada to secure from the Imperial Government equal concessions to our trade. But I must say that I do not see how the remarks of the hon. gentleman are in point in this connection. The only object he can have in introducing this subject in this way must be to endeavor to cast some blame on the Government for not doing more than he thinks they have done. I am quite confident that the members of the Dominion Government acknowledge and recognise as fully as he does the importance of this question to the trade of Canada, and are prepared to do everything they possibly can to secure for us equal advantages with the United States. I can state that the more confidently because the hon. gentleman himself in his remarks a few moments ago referred to the efforts which the Government have been making during the past few years to secure for Canada equal advantages, by sending their High Commissioner in London to Spain, to endeavor to secure these advantages. But the difficulty is, Mr. Speaker—and I think the hon. gentleman has hardly been fair in bringing this question before the House in the way he has brought it, without acknowledging that difficulty—the difficulty is that the question rests not with the Dominion Government, but that in order to get a fair settlement of it we must go to the Government of Spain, and if they refuse to enter into treaty negotiations with the Imperial Government to give us these advantages, what more can the Government of Canada do? I was not a little surprised at the hon. gentleman, in the first part of his remarks, stating that the Government of Spain gave these concessions to the United States because the United States gave up 10 per cent. additional duty which they had imposed on products from Porto Rico and Cuba; and I would ask the hon. gentleman if he would advocate our imposing an extra 10 per cent. on Cuba and Porto Rico products, simply that we might have the privilege of taking it off again, and thereby induce the Government of Spain to give us that advantage. Does he think such a dodge as that would be at all likely to succeed.

Mr. KIRK. Just what was done with the National Policy in the United States.

Mr. STAIRS. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I do not think the cases are the same at all. Now, I think the hon. member for Digby would have done the Government more service if he had shown the Government and the House how it is possible to induce Spain to give us this treaty. Although he has not stated any good reasons which we could use to induce Spain to give us this treaty, still I am not without hope that this question will be satisfactorily settled. I would impress on the Government the importance to our trade and the trade of the whole country of the relations between Canada and the Spanish West Indies. I myself feel its importance, and I may, on a future occasion, bring it more prominently before the notice of the House and the country.

Mr. McLELAN. There is no objection to bringing down all the papers that can properly be laid before Parliament. The hon. member for Digby, who moves in this matter, speaks as if the whole case rested with the Canadian Government. No doubt it is a great disadvantage to the merchants of the Maritime Provinces not to be able to trade with the Spanish West Indies on the same terms as the merchants of the United States. The hon. gentleman forgets that the United States are able to offer greater inducements to Spain for a treaty than the Dominion of Canada, as their markets are very much larger than ours. He speaks as if we had nothing more to do than to demand a treaty. We have been in communication with Spain for a number of years. I think Sir Alexander Galt commenced the negotiations during the time he was High Commissioner, and whenever the temper of the Spanish mind seems to be such as to offer the least inducement to our High Commissioner in London to strike for a treaty, he is there, prepared and watching and anxious to do so; but to take the ground that all we have to do is to demand a treaty from Spain is not the proper one. The papers will be brought down.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not understand why the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) should have adopted the tone he did towards the hon. member for Digby. He reproved that hon. gentleman for bringing this matter to the notice of the House, and at the same time he admitted that the Province from which he comes had a very great interest at stake in the proper adjustment of our trade relations with the Spanish Antilles. The hon. gentleman says he has the most unbounded confidence in the Government that they will do what is right. Well, he may have that unbounded confidence in the Government; but I do not think the conduct of the Government in this matter has been such as to justify or challenge confidence. The hon. gentleman says he would like to know whether the dodge of putting on duties would bring the Spanish Government to their knees, and bring about the desirable result of reciprocal relations between Canada and the Spanish Antilles; but the hon. member for Digby was not making any such proposition, and that suggestion was a purely gratuitous one. If he had made such a suggestion, he would have been only following the line the Government have adopted regarding our relations with the United States. They thought that by putting duties on United States products, they would bring about reciprocal relations between this country and the United States, and what had been the result? The result has been most lamentable. It appears that we are farther away than ever from reciprocal relations with the United States. The hon. member for Halifax has misinterpreted the object of my hon. friend altogether. He explained clearly that this is the third time he has brought this matter before the House, with the object of obtaining from the Government a statement of what action they are taking to have Canada placed on the same footing as our neighbors. He said he had brought forward this motion in 1884, when he was met with the statement by the Finance Minister, that negotiations were proceeding. He brought it up again in 1885, when he was met with the statement, that inasmuch as a provisional treaty was made between Spain and the United States, Spain declined to enter into negotiations with us on the same terms until the Senate had ratified that treaty; but in the meantime, the old flag treaty is going on, and the produce of the United States is being admitted into the Spanish Antilles on much more favorable terms than ours. Last year, the hon. First Minister said in reply to the hon. member for Digby:—

"I believe we never stood a fairer chance of making an arrangement with Spain."

Surely, with such language as that coming from the leader of the Government, it was proper for the hon. member for Digby to endeavor to ascertain if the Government had done anything this year. The hon. member for Halifax is perfectly satisfied with the policy they have adopted. As far as we have been enlightened by the hon. Minister of Finance, that policy has been a do-nothing policy. He has not stated that anything has been done during the last year. He knows that the Senate of the United States has not ratified the provisional treaty; he knows that the treaty now in existence is the old flag treaty, and he hears the statement made by the hon. member for Digby that under that treaty we are placed at a great disadvantage. The hon. member for Halifax admits that; his constituents feel it; they memorialised Parliament and the Government last year; they are anxious to find out if the Government has done anything; and the statement of the Finance Minister is that he will bring down the papers. We want to know if the Government have done their duty. What is that duty as stated by the First Minister last year?

"Meanwhile, all we can do is to be constantly on the watch; to be vigilant. We are vigilant; we believe we have done everything we could do; and we will continue to watch every opportunity of pressing for a treaty."

Mr. McLELAN.

We want to know what direction their vigilance has taken; we want to know what they have done. Surely the House is entitled to something more than the bald statement of the Minister that they will bring down the papers. It appears that we are in equally as bad or a worse position than we were in last year; and so far as one can judge, there does not appear to be any kind of desire on the part of the Administration to remove the disadvantages under which we labor. I think the hon. member for Halifax does not discharge his duty by simply expressing to the House his belief that if we had freer trade relations with Cuba and Porto Rico, it would be a great advantage. It is his duty to press upon the Government to take such action as is in their power. The hon. gentleman says we cannot force Spain into a treaty. Who is asking them to do so? We want to know if the proper representations have been made; we want to know whether anything has been done, or whether another year has been allowed to drag along without anything having been done either by the Government or by our representative at the Court of St. James. We have an ambassador there who has been instructed to exercise vigilance, which the leader of the Government last year stated should be exercised in this matter. Has he opened up any negotiations since the new treaty with the United States has been refused sanction by the Senate? Have the Government attempted to re-open the old negotiations which have been closed—negotiations, the object of which was to put us on the same basis as that which the United States occupies under the flag treaty? That is what I understand my hon. friend to have asked for, and it is something which, if obtainable, would be a great boon to the country, especially to the Maritime Provinces who are particularly interested in the matter. Now that our fish is excluded to some extent from the United States; it becomes doubly the duty of the Government to try and open to us the ports of other countries for the admission of our products. I am sorry that the Minister of Finance is not in a position to be more explicit; I am sorry he is not in a position to make a satisfactory statement instead of simply stating that the papers would be brought down without giving the slightest intimation of the nature of the business done if any, or about anything pertaining to an object the achievement of which would be a most desirable consummation.

Mr. VAIL. I have not, as the hon. member for Halifax seems to think, desired to cast reflections on the Government for not having managed this business better, but I desired to have some statements from the Government as to what has been done, especially as I have brought this matter before the House twice, and that already two years have elapsed since I first brought it under their notice. I am much disappointed to-day to find that the Government are not in a position to tell the House they have done something. I am aware that any negotiations on our part must be carried on through the British Government, but I think, as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has said, as we have an ambassador to the Court of St. James and as he seems to be in close communication with the higher powers there, he ought certainly to have been instructed by our Government to have brought the matter before the Government of Great Britain and been able and have had an answer from them of some kind. I think the Minister of Finance should have been able to tell the House that the Government had given instructions which were carried out, and had the assurance of the British Government they were doing their best to get the restrictions we complain of removed. I have no desire to say a word against the Government as to their action in a matter of this kind, but we must presume they have taken some action, and I would like to know what is its nature. I know how they are hampered, and I am willing to make every allowance, but I think they should be in a position to give some information in reference to this matter. I know a little about it, more, perhaps, than I have stated to the House. When I spoke before, I did not mention the fact, which is a very important fact, that both France and Germany are placed in the same position as the United States with regard to the entry of goods in Porto Rico and Cuba. What excuse is there for any arrangements of this kind going on without the Government keeping itself cognisant of them, and calling the attention of the British Government to the fact that here are three other nations which enjoy the privilege from which the British people and colonists are shut out? A long correspondence has taken place between the British Government and the Government of Spain with regard to the trade relations between the two countries. The reason given by Spain for making a special arrangement with the United States was that the United States people are near neighbors of the islands in question. I think our commissioner should have told the British Government, if the British Government did not know it, that the people of the Dominion of Canada are also near neighbors of those islands as well as the people of the United States, and if Spain saw good reasons for giving advantages to the United States on that ground, they had certainly good reason on the same ground for giving our people the same advantages. Our people have been laboring under this disadvantage and our trade has been suffering in consequence, when, I am satisfied, if the Dominion Government had done their duty in pointing this out to the British Government, there is no reason why this restriction should have remained to operate against us. Because the United States Government charged goods from Porto Rico and Cuba 10 per cent. more than they charged other goods, and agreed to remove this extra charge on condition that they should have these advantages, there is no reason why Spain should refuse to cede this right to the people of the Dominion or to the British people, because it is well known that England is a free trade country and goods are admitted to England at a much lower rate of duty than they are admitted into the United States. The leader of the Government last year in answer to the leader of the Opposition said:

"I think Canada will have more than a fair chance of making an advantageous treaty. I can only assure the hon. gentleman that there will be no neglect, but that there will be continual watchfulness and pressure on the part of the Canadian Government upon the Government of Spain; in the first place, directly through our own officers, and then constantly, every day, through the intervention of Her Majesty's Ambassador."

Is it then unreasonable for any hon. gentleman in this House to ask the Government whether their reticence and apparent want of action is in accordance with the statements made by the leader of the Government last year that this subject had been pressed every day on the Spanish Government. What is the result of that constant pressure? The Government should say whether they have had any answer from the British and Spanish Governments, through the ambassador spoken of in the remarks, which I have quoted, by the leader of the Government. If so, let us have it. Do not let three years pass, after having led the people to suppose something would be done within a given time, without telling us what has been done. I must say the Government have been neglectful of their duties in this matter, when they are not in a position to state that some progress has been made, and that within a given time we will have the restriction that bears so heavily on our commerce removed.

Motion agreed to.

MEMORIAL OF THE NORTH-WEST COUNCIL.

Mr. WATSON moved for:

Address to His Excellency the Governor-General for a copy of the memorial of the North-West Council presented to the Government by Messrs. Wilson and Ross, members of said Council, and of any answer made to said memorial and of any correspondence between the Government and the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Territories or other parties in reference thereto.

He said: This memorandum ought to be laid on the Table and the House made acquainted with the facts and statements it contains. The North-West has no power to send representatives to this House, so that the only means we have of acquiring knowledge of the local requirements of the people of that section is the representations made through the North-West Council. As a member of this House I feel that the Government ought to make provision, at the earliest possible moment, for local representation from those Territories, so that representatives would be elected there so that they would have part in making the laws that govern the country. The Government will find they are making a great mistake, if they think they will govern that country successfully by appointing a number of men from Ottawa to act as the representatives of that section, to make laws to govern its people. The North-West Territories to-day have as large a population as the Province of Manitoba had when it was granted responsible Local Government, and I do not see any reason why the Territories should not be granted as many privileges as are possessed by any other portion of the Dominion. The Government must have correspondence from the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West with reference to the last Session of the Council, as we are aware, from what has appeared in the press, that they had a very lively time, and that the Lieutenant-Governor and his following, if I may call them so, the members of the Council who are appointed by the Government, were defeated by the voice of the people, notwithstanding all the patronage of the Government in that section of the country. The result was that a very strong memorial was drafted, setting forth the grievances and the requirements of that section of the country against the Government at Ottawa, and that a deputation was appointed, as stated in this resolution. As I hope that this memorial will be laid before the House in time to be considered before the close of the Session, I shall not at present detain the House any further.

Motion agreed to.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE AT PORT ROWAN.

Mr. JACKSON moved for:

Copies of correspondence, not already brought down, between the Government and the captain of any of the crew of the life-saving service at Port Rowan, Province of Ontario.

He said: I called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine to the inefficiency of the life-saving service at Port Rowan in 1884 and again in 1885. On those occasions I pointed out to the Minister that that was one of the most exposed points on the whole of the inland waters; I pointed out that there had been more loss of life and property in the vicinity of Long Point than at any other place on the chain of lakes; I stated that the service was not properly provided for, that the men were only provided with a second or third-class boat, that they were not provided with life jackets or even with common life preservers, that they had no lines nor mortars, which are essential on some occasions, as in 1883, when the brig Siberia was wrecked there, and the crew had to remain in the rigging for twenty hours or more, because the men of the Life-saving Service were not provided with proper apparatus to rescue them. In order to show what the press of that day had to say on the subject, I will quote from the Spirit of the Age, published at Port Rowan, dated 1st November, 1883. It reads as follows:—

"On Tuesday morning, about 8 o'clock, a large three-masted schooner was seen above this port going down the lake. From the erratic course of the boat it seemed that something was wrong with her. This observation was soon verified by her striking heavily on the bar, south of the west light, on Long Point. As soon as it was seen she had struck, preparations were made to man the lifeboat and start to the rescue of the crew. About 9 o'clock she started with the following crew: Wm. Woodward, captain, John Woodward, R. Gifford, A. Nisely, C. Glover, W. Glover and F. Pelton. The Hanlan followed with the crew who had rescued the men off the Vanderbilt a couple of weeks ago. On arriving at the beach it was found too rough to attempt to reach the stranded vessel."

This was early in the morning of a certain day; and because the service was not provided with proper material to give the crew sufficient energy and courage to attempt to get to that vessel, these poor people had to remain there for twenty hours, till the next morning.

"Early on Wednesday morning Mr. Woodward, captain of the lifeboat, offered to give place to any one who was more competent than himself, and allow such to select his own crew. Mr. Crooker was selected, who took with him the captain, pulling stroke, Thos. Gordon, bow, Jas. Hill, John Baker, W. Glover and C. Glover. Five out of the seven selected were men who assisted in the former rescue. They manned the boat and started for the wreck, which they reached, and, as before, succeeded in saving every one on board, and brought them safe to shore, where they were well cared for by the light-keeper and his wife. The captain, first mate and a couple of the crew arrived at this place at 12 o'clock, the remainder of the crew remaining at the Point. The following is the captain's statement:—

"She is named the Siberia, of Kingston, from Toledo to Kingston, loaded with square timber, and owned by Calvin & Son, of Garden Island. There were eight of a crew and a woman, cook, two horses, one of which was drowned. She lost her topsail, four other sails and three jibs. The vessel became waterlogged about 41 miles above Long Point.

"Again has the metal of our brave boys been tried, and again they have proven themselves heroes. All honor to them.

"The captain desires to thank them, on behalf of himself and crew."

This was not the only occasion that this crew had to risk their lives without proper implements to protect themselves. They had to take their lives in their hands, and go to the rescue of these unfortunates without anything to protect themselves against accidents. In 1884 another accident occurred there. I read from the Port Dover Maple Leaf of 31st October, 1884, one year later. This is from the Port Rowan News published in that paper:

"The lifeboat stationed at this place was the means of saving a lot of sailors from being drowned last week. The Fortune, a steam barge from Buffalo, was wrecked off Port Royal on the evening of 23rd October. On Friday morning, she was seen from Port Rowan, and the following crew nobly volunteered to rescue the sailors at the risk of their own lives:—J. C. McCall, R. Crooker, J. Hill, W. Smith, D. Benedict, J. Baker, W. Glover and A. Becker. They reached the barge after a hard struggle, and the whole crew of nine men and a woman were safely brought back to the village. While giving the boys all the credit they deserve for their skill and bravery, we think they were a little slow in getting started. Two hours does not seem long in a warm house, eating a hearty breakfast, but it must have seemed an age to men out on the cabin of a vessel for ten or twelve hours, exposed to the wind, with the water splashing over them and expecting every moment to be cast into the lake. Suppose the boat had gone to pieces while the lifeboat was being made ready, and some of the crew drowned, would not some one have been guilty of a crime? Just here let us note a remarkable fact."

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BONDS.

Mr. GAULT. I desire to call the attention of the Government to a notice that appears in the Free Press this evening, saying that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have received applications for over $60,000,000 of their bonds, and that $20,000,000 have been accepted, and that too at a premium. I should like to know if the Government have any information on the subject, as this is one of the most important matters that has been before the country for a long time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I should be very happy to answer that question in the affirmative, but I am not in a position to do so. We have no official information in regard to the matter.

PROTECTION OF WOMEN AND GIRLS.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 20) to punish seduction and like offences, and to make further provision for the protection of women and girls.—(Mr. Charlton.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to the second clause of this Bill. The hon. gentleman will observe it provides that any person who has carnal connection with a female under promise of marriage shall be guilty of misdemeanor. If there was no other punishment and no other remedy against the offender I should have no objection to it, although I think it might be open to objection. But the hon. gentleman will observe that under this clause an accused person is liable to three different punishments. First, he is liable to be punished under this clause and to be imprisoned for a period of two years. Under the local law he is liable to an action for breach of promise of marriage, and he is liable to another action for the result of the carnal connection. So that in reality a man is being punished three times for the same offence. That is contrary to the policy of the law and ought not to be. If we had control over civil actions we could very easily provide for that by inserting a clause in the Bill that, in case of any prosecution under this Bill, the right to bring a civil action should cease and be at an end. But we have no power over that here, I apprehend, as it is a matter of civil rights which belong to the Local Legislature. As the Bill stands it leaves a man liable to pay three times over for one offence, which appears contrary to the rule of law and should not prevail.

Mr. CHARLTON. I believe it is a recognised principle of the law that a person cannot be tried twice for the same offence, so that I doubt if any provision would be necessary to prevent a second trial for the same offence. However, in the 10th clause an amendment is proposed after the word "prosecution," which I think will meet the difficulty. It is proposed to add the words "provided always that proceedings under this Statute shall be a bar to all other remedies."

Mr. CURRAN. The difficulty mentioned by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), would not arise in the Province of Quebec, as there the promise has to be proved by what we call commencement of proof in writing. Last year when the same section of law was introduced, I gave my reasons for opposing it, and I have not changed my mind as to the value of the authorities which I cited then. I feel now as I did then with regard to the great risk we are running of encouraging blackmail by introducing such legislation as this. That has been proved beyond controversy by the experience of all countries that have introduced this system. I was under the impression that the committee—from the meeting of which I was unfortunately absent—would introduce into the section a provision requiring that there should be a commencement of proof in writing so far as the promise of marriage was concerned. However, I understand that certain amendments have been made as to the nature of the proof, and that would meet to a great extent the objection I have made to the law as it now stands.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I was in the same position as my hon. friend who has just spoken, in not being able to be present at the meetings of the committee. As to the question raised by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), I think that is purely a question of policy for this House, if the House thinks that the offence is one which we should legislate against, as a criminal offence we should pass the section, but we cannot make the criminal proceedings a bar to the civil proceedings, even to the extent of providing that the civil proceedings may be suspended until after the criminal proceedings have been taken, because I take it that the function of this Legislature in dealing with offences of this kind, is purely in relation to the criminal law. We should leave to the Local Legislatures the question of the curtailment of the civil remedies, if they are found to be too severe, after this House has attached the penalty under the criminal law.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would ask the Minister of Justice if he would advise the dropping of this clause?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Not at all. My view is that it must be accepted as it stands in the Bill, if at all, as attaching the penalties of a misdemeanor to the offence, notwithstanding the existence of the civil penalty to the injured party. If it is thought to be too severe, I do not think it can be mitigated by any remedy on our part with reference to the civil penalties.

Mr. CHARLTON. In the United States and in other nations where this crime or misdemeanor is dealt with at all, the crime of seduction under promise of marriage is treated with greater severity than that of any other offence under this law. In New York the penalty for seduction under promise of marriage is a fine of $5,000 and five years imprisonment—one or both in the discretion of the court. In Michigan the fine is heavy and the period of imprisonment may be ten years in the discretion of the court. Under these circumstances, and believing that the betrayal of a woman under promise of marriage is one of the basest acts a man can commit, I should be very reluctant to drop this clause of the Bill.

On section 4,

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). By this section the Bill interferes with the right of the owner of premises to rent. I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to it, as it is doubtful in my mind whether this is not an interference with property and civil rights, and whether under pretence of making this offence criminal it is within the competence of this Parliament to pass a provision like this.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I think it is within the power of Parliament. The subject with which we are dealing is the criminal law, and I think Parliament has power to deal with that subject, even if it does interfere with the civil rights of a landlord.

Mr. CHARLTON. I move that section 4 stand as it was originally printed, as it was copied from the Imperial law, except that the age be changed from twelve to ten years, in conformity with our law as it exists at present.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 5,

Mr. CHARLTON. The first and second sub-sections of this section were struck out by the committee, as they were held to conflict with the laws of the Provinces with respect to seduction.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It seems to me it would have been better left alone. As it is now you define what shall be the offence of detaining, but you have not made it an offence, because you have struck out the passages that make it an offence,

Mr. CHARLTON. That difficulty would be met by restoring the section to its original form. I move, in conformity with the suggestion of the Minister of Justice, that section 5 stand as section 6 in the original Bill copied from the English Statute and compiled from section 8 of that Statute.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). That clause can be passed by making it a proviso or amendment to section 54 of our own Statute, which makes it a felony to allure or detain any woman under twenty-one for the purpose of having carnal connection.

Mr. DAVIES. This is not for the purpose of carnal connection?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Yes, it is.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). If it is intended to make this an amendment to the existing law, that ought to appear on its face, otherwise it would appear to be a clause relating to the Bill itself. It had better be amended, or be stated that these words shall be appended to that section.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I opposed that portion of the Bill entirely in committee, for the reason that in our Province there exists a provision in our local law covering it. I was not aware of the condition of the law in the other Provinces, but in our local and municipal laws we have ample power. If passed at all, it should be made a proviso to section 54 of our Statute, which I partly read: "Whoever fraudulently allures or takes away or detains, a woman under twenty-one years of age, out of the possession or against the will of her father or any other person who has care of her, etc., is guilty of felony." The penalty is much more severe than under the provision of the hon. member for Norfolk. If, therefore, this clause is to remain in the Bill, it ought to be a proviso to the one I have read, or it will come into collision with it.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). This provision does not seem to be necessary. I presume the offence is almost unknown in this country, as regards young persons who might be made victims, and the provisions are sufficient as regards older persons.

Mr. CHARLTON. There is one point contained in this clause which I think is of importance. That is as regards females detained against their will in brothels, and detained very often because they are in possession of wearing apparel which has been loaned them, and for the possession of which criminal proceedings will be taken against them, should they leave against the will of the proprietor. This clause is intended to meet that hardship:

Where a woman or girl is in or upon any premises for the purpose of having any unlawful carnal connection, or is in any brothel, a person shall be deemed to detain such woman or girl in or upon such premises, or in such brothel, if with intent to compel or induce her to remain in or upon such premises, or in such brothel, such person withholds from such woman or girl any wearing apparel or other property belonging to her, or, where wearing apparel has been lent or otherwise supplied to such woman or girl by or with the direction of such person, such person threatens such woman or girl with legal proceedings if she takes away with her the wearing apparel so lent or supplied; no legal proceedings, whether civil or criminal shall be instituted against her under such circumstances.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The object may be accomplished this way, if necessary to pass the section at all: In line 45, omit the words "a person shall be deemed" and say it shall be a misdemeanor; again, on page 3, strike out the words "whether civil or criminal."

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). This clause of the Bill is simply an interpretation of our Statute, and our law is sufficiently explicit on that point. It makes no difference how or for what reason a person is detained, and Mr. Justice Taschereau, commenting on this, says it means the mere detention against the will. What necessity is there then to put an interpretation on the word "detained." It will simply complicate the law unnecessarily. I think it would be better to strike out the clause altogether.

Mr. CHARLTON. It may be true that Mr. Justice Taschereau referred to detention, and the law covers that. But this makes a definite provision with regard to an indefinite abuse, and a woman would not find it necessary to go to a lawyer to have it explained to her that she might escape and still use any wearing apparel she has, whether her own or lent to her.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The section my hon. friend refers to, and on which Mr. Taschereau has commented, is in the English Act, but in England it has been deemed necessary to describe that the artifice of keeping clothing shall be a detention.

Mr. DAVIES. I read the Act differently from the hon. member from Huron. The Act says a person who "fraudulently" allures or detains. But this section goes further than is provided by the Statute at all: "detention against her will, whether by fraud or not."

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). There are three classes of offences under this Statute. There is one of fraudulently alluring, and another for taking the woman out by force or in any other way. That would appear to be the interpretation put upon it by Taschereau and also by Russell. Then section fifty-six also provides that whoever unlawfully takes or causes to be taken any unmarried girl under the age of sixteen for any purpose shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. I think these clauses cover the case.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). As far as I know, the provision of the Bill is not requisite, but the object of the introducer of the Bill is to define, or to enlarge the definition of, the word "detain," and to make it an offence to detain, not only by fraud or by force, but by using the artifice of concealing the clothing. Whether it is necessary or not is another question, but it has been found necessary in England. I do not know that it will interfere with the existing law. It will be an enlargement of it.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is not a matter that we are theorising about here. This clause is part of the English Statute passed last year, and I think we may assume that the Imperial Parliament, in dealing with this question, knew something about what they were doing. I think I see very clearly the necessity for this provision. I think it is an important practical provision, more important, perhaps, than anything else bearing on that class of cases, so I should be very loath to see it struck out of the Bill. However, I will bow to the wish of the Committee if it is thought to encumber the Bill, and if it is desired to strike it out, let that be done.

Mr. DAVIES. My hon. friend will remember that the English Statute was passed under an exceptional state of things which, fortunately, does not exist in this country. I agree with the Minister of Justice that there are no cases of which we are aware which call for our interference in this matter, and I think my hon. friend would be well advised to drop this clause.

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), is not aware that the Statute in England passed the House of Lords twice, and that it was only the favorable action of the House of Commons that was necessary to make it law. It was not merely the excitement which existed last Session which caused its passage, but the growing public sentiment which had for some time been surely making its way.

Mr. DAVIES. My only ground is that a new criminal offence ought not to be created by Parliament without its having some facts to justify it. We have already on the Statute book a law which sufficiently provides for fraudulent detention.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have frequently heard of cases of of this kind, where females were detained in brothels because they were unable to leave without making use of clothing which did not belong to them, and feared they would make themselves liable to criminal proceedings. These poor creatures were detained in worse than dungeons, because this threat of criminal proceedings was held over them in terrorem by those merciless wretches in whose power they were, and it is for that reason that I am anxious that this feature of the Bill should be adopted.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I think the object of the legislation in England was not so much the purpose which would be met by this clause, as the protection of young persons, and we have left out those portions of the clause. As regards criminal proceedings, there would be no danger of the conviction of a person under such circumstances, and in regard to civil proceedings, we have no power to legislate.

Section 5 struck out.

On section 6,

Mr. CHARLTON. Here the objection raised by my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Curran) has been met by the committee, I think, pretty fully. The section now requires corroborative evidence to the seduction, as well as the promise of marriage, and the next clause makes the accused a competent witness in his own behalf. I do not know of any provision in any law in the world that so protects the individual against blackmail as this does. In fact, I fear that the provisions made for his safety are so great that they render it almost impossible to procure a conviction.

Mr. DAVIES. I think the effect of the amendment of this clause by the committee will be simply to nullify the Bill altogether. The amendment requiring supplementary evidence in regard to the promise of marriage is very good, but the other amendment requires additional evidence to corroborate in some material point the evidence as to seduction, will render the Bill inoperative. If that is to be inserted, the committee might as well rise without doing anything more. We had better either legislate to some effect or not legislate at all. It is useless to introduce words into the Bill which are going to nullify the Bill altogether. We know that practically it would be impossible to get this corroborative evidence in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, in reference to seduction, whatever may be the case as to promise of marriage. I think, as to promise of marriage, it would be just as well to require some corroborative evidence, but as to the other it seems to me monstrous, and I hope the promoter of the Bill will not consent to it.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the committee would accept the clause standing 8 in the Bill as it is printed, and which is an exact copy of the English Statute, section 3, chap. 69, 48 and 49 Vic., it would suit my views better, of course. Then it will read as follows:

No person shall be convicted of any offence under this Act on the evidence of one witness unless such evidence be corroborated in some material particular by evidence implicating the accused.

Then, in addition to this safeguard, we have in the next clause, the provision that in every case arising under this Act the defendant shall be a competent witness in his own behalf, which provision does not exist in the English Bill; so that we give a double safeguard, even if we strike out these words as regards both seduction and the promise of marriage. If the committee will permit the provision to stand as it is in the English Statute, with this added safeguard, that the accused shall be a competent witness in his own behalf, I think the Bill will be better than with the other provision left in, which I fear will nullify the Bill entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion before the committee now is that the words which were added by the special committee to whom the Bill was referred, namely: "Both as to seduction and as to promise of marriage" be struck out, which would leave the clause as it was originally.

Motion agreed to; yeas 42, nays 23.

On section 6 (section 9 in original Bill),

Mr. CHARLTON. I move that the words added by the special committee, which are now rendered unnecessary by dropping the clause to which they refer, be struck out.

Motion agreed to, and Bill reported.

Amendments read and concurred in, and Bill read the third time.

HOLES IN THE ICE.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 2) to amend the criminal law and to declare it a misdemeanor to leave unguarded exposed holes cut in the ice on any navigable or frequented waters. He said: I do not think I need occupy the time of the House in pointing out the different provisions of this measure. It has now been before Parliament several Sessions, and no doubt has been well considered by every hon. member. The Bill as now introduced is the same as that reported by a special committee to which the Bill of last Session was referred. It was entered on the paper but not reached. This Session I have re-introduced the Bill as reported by the committee, and I hope the House will consider that it is a measure which should receive its sanction. One of the principal reasons for the Bill is that experience has shown that great carelessness is practiced by parties who are engaged in harvesting ice in and about cities and towns, and the consequence is that very serious loss of life has occurred on many occasions. Only the winter before I introduced this Bill, some three years ago now, a valuable member of society in Hamilton had occasion to cross over the bay in his cutter, and it being dark he unfortunately drove into an ice hole, and was drowned. His death was a matter of very great grief, and the public were very much excited and considered that some legislation should take place to compel parties who were making money out of harvesting ice, to protect the holes they made.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

CARRIERS BY LAND.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 7) respecting carriers by land.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). In regard to this Bill I may say that the Minister of Railways thinks it very desirable that the commission which he proposes having appointed should take up this subject and deal with it in connection with the whole question.

Mr. McCARTHY. On the understanding that it is to be dealt with in that way during the recess, I shall ask that the order be discharged.

Order discharged, and Bill withdrawn.

CONSOLIDATED RAILWAY ACT, 1879.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 8) to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

LAW OF EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 23) further to amend the law of evidence in criminal cases.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I think I should say a word or two on this Bill although in discussing it I am addressing hon. members who have already debated the subject on two or three occasions. I shall confine myself to giving my personal views upon the question and I therefore speak altogether for myself. I am in favor of the principle of the Bill and concur, generally speaking, in the arguments by which it is supported. But I am opposed to its being passed at present simply for the reason that it makes a most important change in the criminal law, one that has not yet been adopted in the Mother Country, but which is likely to be adopted either at the present Session of Parliament or at the next Session. It is, no doubt, quite true that this Bill is framed on the Bill which is likely to be passed in Great Britain. It may be, however, that the enactment there will receive important modifications as it goes through Parliament. I understand the probabilities are much more in favor of its passage during the present Session of the Imperial Parliament than they have been heretofore; but I think, in respect of the criminal law, much more than in respect of any other branch of the law, it is desirable to follow the beaten track of legislation and judicial decision. It is very desirable, at all events, not to adopt so fundamental a change as this is in the whole system of criminal procedure without either the sanction which such a change would receive from its adoption in the Mother Country or the advantage of the decisions of the tribunals of the Mother Country, which we know are almost implicitly followed in matters of criminal jurisprudence, and are the safest guides we have in administering that jurisprudence. While, therefore, I am in accordance with the hon. gentleman as to the principle of this Bill, I think, for many reasons, it would be inexpedient to adopt it, and perhaps more inexpedient just now, in view of the probability of its being adopted in the Mother Country in some modified form. I think it would be undesirable, and I think that next Session we would probably regret having adopted a measure which was found in its passage through the Imperial Parliament to have undergone important modifications.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I must confess that I cannot follow very well the logic of the Minister of Justice—it may be from my obtuseness, but at any rate I cannot follow him. He says he is in favor of the principle of the Bill; he thinks it is a good Bill; he thinks it ought to become law, but because the Imperial Parliament have seen fit not to pass it yet, we ought not to adopt it here. I do not believe in that doctrine. I do not think we should always follow the lead of English lawyers or the leading strings of the Mother Country in matters of this kind. If the principle is a sound one and the Bill is a good one, it should become law. It has received the sanction of the English Parliament several times; it passed the English House of Lords in 1885 without a dissenting voice, or rather a Bill of which this one is an exact transcript. It passed the second reading during the present Session of the present Parliament in England, I believe without a dissenting voice, and with the almost unanimous assent of the English Law Lords, all of whom, with few exceptions, pronounced strongly in its favor. The principle of the Bill has been assented to in this Parliament on four different occasions, and on each occasion with the assent of the First Minister. It passed through every stage of this House during last Session; it passed the second reading by a majority of 32, and it was finally passed in this House and sent to the Senate, but owing to the late period at which it was sent there and the pressure of other important business, it did not receive very much consideration at their hands and the Bill was dropped without a division. After having already received the sanction of this Parliament, I do not see upon what ground it should not again receive the sanction of this House. If the principle is a sound one, and the Bill ought to become law, why should we wait another year—what does the Minister of Justice expect to gain by waiting another year? I will only refer to some of the observations made by several of the English law lords when this Bill was before the English House of Lords for the third time. It was introduced during the present Session of the Imperial Parliament by Lord Bramwell, and a similar Bill was introduced in the House of Commons. The Bill introduced by Lord Bramwell received its second reading on the 10th of March last, and on pressing it on the House of Lords Lord Bramwell made use of the following words:

"Of all persons in the world the man who knew best whether an accused person was guilty or not was the man who was charged with an offence, and yet under the present law that was precisely the man whose mouth was closely shut. It must be a most grievous thing to an accused person that when he could prove his innocence he was not allowed to give evidence. Already steps in the direction of allowing an accused person to give evidence in his own behalf have been taken to a limited extent, and this Bill merely proposed to go further in that path. The principle of the measure had been recognised in the Criminal Law Amendment Act which was passed in the last Session of Parliament. The part of the law of evidence which he proposed to repeal was the last remnant of the very unreasonable condition of that law which existed some fifty years ago."

Why, Sir, it is the law of England now—not to the full extent it is true, but in many cases of felony and misdemeanor. We know that in 1871 the principle was recognised by the English Parliament in the Plimsol Act which made it an offence to send an unseaworthy ship to sea, and for such an offence the accused person could give evidence on his own behalf. Under the English election law a person accused of an offence under that law may give evidence on his own behalf. On an indictment under the English Explosives' Act the person accused can give evidence on his own behalf. Under the law passed last Session by the Imperial Parliament for the better protection of women and girls, a law which created new offences, some misdemeanors, and some felonies, the person accused is a competent witness in his own behalf. The principle has been recognised in Canada. In 1868, I think it was, a Bill was passed by the Parliament of Canada making a person indicted for assault a competent witness in his own behalf. A year or two subsequently the provisions of that Bill were extended to men indicted for assault and battery, and they can now give evidence in their own behalf. Under our election law a man can give evidence on his own behalf, and to-night a

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

Bill has passed this House of Commons, with the assent of the Minister of Justice, creating new offences, some misdemeanors and some felonies, and on an indictment for any one of these offences, the defendant can be a witness on his own behalf. Now, I say it is an extraordinary proposition that having recognised this principle in cases of felony and misdemeanor in England and in Canada as well, we should not now make it the law of the land. Upon that discussion in the House of Lords on the 10th of March last, Viscount Cranbrook said:

"He felt bound to say that it was by a gradual growth in his own mind that he had come to the conclusion that what had already been done in that direction it was almost inevitable that they should go still further. The principle of that Bill had been partially introduced already in some cases. The precedent of the Explosives' Act had been mentioned. It was introduced into a measure which was carried in the House last year; and if it were accepted to meet the difficulty of getting evidence in some instances they could hardly reject it in others."

Lord Fitzgerald said:

"He believed that there was no noble and learned lord present who had a larger experience of the criminal law than he had. The result of his long experience had induced him to believe that the present state of the law inflicted a good deal of hardship, and not infrequently much injustice. In many cases where a prisoner had been tried on a serious charge the accused might have been able to dispose of the whole case against him if the state of the law had allowed him to go into the witness box and be subjected to examination. Many convictions indeed, were passed because the accused person was not allowed to give evidence. The Bill being intended to remedy this state of things, he would give it his support. If a prisoner was competent to be heard as a witness they ought to get rid of all those hindrances which at present prevented his going into the witness box, and which sometimes led to the accused being unjustly convicted."

The Lord Chancellor of England pronounced strongly in its favor, and the late Lord Chancellor in the Session of 1885 gave his opinion very strongly in favor of this measure. The Lord Chancellor in the late Conservative Government also pronounced in favor of the principle of the Bill; and with the almost unanimous opinion of the first lawyers practising at the English bar, the first judges on the English bench, and nearly all the Law Lords of the House of Lords in favor of the Bill. It does appear to me extraordinary that it should be opposed now. The hon. Minister of Justice also pronounces in favor of the principle of the Bill. And yet, as I understand, the hon. gentleman intends to oppose its second reading. I have heard no reasons from the hon. gentleman why it should not receive a second reading. If the Government undertake to deal with the question, I would gladly give it up to them. I believe the principle of this Bill is a sound one, and ought to have formed part of our legislation long ago. Every year it is left off our Statute-book, a great injustice is done. Suppose before Parliament meets again some unfortunate should be improperly convicted because he could not tell his own story—and we know from the testimony of some of the first men in England that that has taken place over and over again—it would not be a very pleasant or agreeable reflection for the Minister of Justice or any other hon. member that that injustice was simply due to our refusal to pass a Bill which a large majority in this House admit is based on a sound principle. If any amendments can be made to perfect the Bill, I would be glad to receive them; but in the meantime I desire to press the second reading of the Bill.

PRAYERS.

VISITS OF MILITIA REGIMENTS TO GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. GAULT asked, Have any of the militia regiments of the Dominion made application for permission to visit Great Britain this summer, on the occasion of the celebration of Her Most Gracious Majesty's 50th anniversary of her coronation, and is it the intention of the Government to grant their request, when willing to go at their own expense?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The 5th Battalion of Royal Scots, Lieut. Col. Caverhill, have made application to visit Great Britain this summer. As the Militia Act has no force outside of Canada, the men of the battalion would not be subject to its provisions if taken outside of the country. It was thought advisable, in consequence, not to grant the request.

THE NATURALISATION ACT.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Is it the intention of the Government during the present Session to amend the Naturalisation Act, so that those Germans and other aliens who settle in Canada may be enabled to become citizens by a more simple, cheap and expeditious method than they have under existing laws?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I think it is not the intention.

MAIL SERVICE IN LOTBINIÈRE.

Mr. RINFRET asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to extend a daily mail service to the parish of St. Narcisse, Newbois Post Office, in the county of Lotbinière?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter is still under the consideration of the Government. The Postmaster-General was informed that the service would cost $40, while it now appears that it would cost at least $200. Therefore, the Postmaster-General has not decided whether he will extend the service or not.

FRAUDS UPON THE REVENUE.

Mr. GAULT asked, Is it true that extensive frauds have been committed upon the Revenue by a Montreal firm of dry goods importers; and, if so, is it true that a compromise has been effected by the acceptance of a sum of money and a guarantee given that no further proceeding is to be taken by the Government, and what was the amount paid?

Mr. BOWELL. There have been frauds discovered on the part of certain dry goods importers in the city of Montreal. A settlement was effected by one of the officers, who agreed, upon the payment of a certain sum, not to prosecute beyond that. As soon as the report was shown to me after its arrival, I at once repudiated, on behalf of the Government, the terms of the settlement, and returned the papers to the officer in Montreal, instructing him to so inform the importers. The amount paid and deposited was between $36,200 and $36,300.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—BRITISH COLUMBIA CONTRACTS.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. CASEY) asked, 1. Have sections A, B, C and D of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia been fully completed according to the specifications, and has a final estimate been made by the engineer-in-charge? Has the work been accepted by the Government, and taken over from the contractors? Has it been accepted by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? Has it been completed within the amount of the original estimate? 2. Why was Mr. Marcus Smith removed from the position of engineer-in-charge and placed in an inferior position? 3. Has the Port Moody contract been completed within the time limit named in the contract, and according to the schedule of prices in the contract? If not, what are the variations from such time limit and schedule? 4. Who is now operating the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia? Does the Government pay anything towards the maintenance of that portion of the railway? If so, how much, and for what purposes?

Mr. POPE. Sections A, B, C and D of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia have been fully completed according to specifications. A final estimate has not been made by the engineer-in-charge; engineers-in-charge do not issue final estimates, the chief engineer issues such estimates; he has not yet done so in this case. The work has not been formally taken over in its entirety. It has not been accepted by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; it has been completed within the amount of the original estimate. Marcus Smith was in charge of the Emery-Port Moody section, and when the work was drawing near completion he was appointed to oversee the work being done by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, east from Savona to Eagle Pass, a very important position, not inferior to that he occupied before, and where his services would be of greater value. The Port Moody contract has been completed within the time limit named in the contract. The contract is for a lump sum, and not a schedule contract. The lump sum was not exceeded. Mr. Onderdonk is now running trains over the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia for the conveyance of mails.

TERMS OF UNION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I wish to supplement the answer I made yesterday to the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. McIntyre), concerning the deputation of the Prince Edward Island Government to England on the subject of the conveyance of mails between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion mainland. My answer was correct, that no communication has been received from the Imperial Government; but on arriving at the Department I made further enquiries, and I find a despatch has been received from the High Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper, transmitting a letter of the Colonial Office to him, asking him to be party to a conference to be held between the Colonial Secretary and the Prince Edward Island delegation. That despatch includes also a copy of his answer to the Colonial Office, the memorial of the delegates, and the answer of Sir Charles Tupper to their memorial, to be submitted at the conference. These papers are being copied, and will be brought down when the Address, notice of which appears on the Notice Paper in the name of the hon. member for King's, P.E.I., is voted.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION ACT, 1882.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act, 1882.

He said: Since 1870, masters and mates who were granted certificates by the Marine Department of Canada, have been allowed equal privileges in the United Kingdom with masters and mates certificated by the Board of Trade. The same privilege has now, upon the recommendation of the Board of Trade, been extended by Order in Council to include engineers of first and second class. The object of the resolution is to prepare the way for introducing a Bill to make the necessary legislation to give effect to that. Other amendments are introduced into the Steamboat Inspection Act. The principal one provides for the separation of the certificates granted by hull and boiler inspectors. Under the present law, the hull inspectors did their duty and gave their certificates, but their work had to be revised by the inspector of boilers. It is proposed now to make the certificate of inspection of hulls sufficient without that revision. It is proposed also to make the certificates granted to engineers equal to those granted to masters and mates in point of continuance, as under the present Act they have to be renewed yearly. Under the amendment proposed, these certificates, once granted, are held by the engineers during good behaviour, or while they fulfil the conditions proposed. This will reduce the expenses of examination, and remove a grievance long complained of by the engineers. To obviate danger from fire on certain passenger steamers carrying between decks hay and other combustible material, coal oil lamps cannot be used. This with some minor particulars make up the resolution.

Mr. POPE.

Mr. COCKBURN. It is high time some Bill was introduced to amend this Act, and I hope this one will be sufficiently comprehensive. Otherwise, I will deem it my duty to offer amendments which will have the effect of removing any anomalies that the hon. gentleman's Bill may not deal with. I hope the Bill will apply to all our navigation interests, including the minor waters. In the latter a hardship arises through the fact that fourth-class engineers cannot get out of that class, and are not allowed to take charge of a passenger vessel, no matter how small, although well qualified to do so. I addressed a letter on that subject to the Department; and if I find the difficulty is not remedied in the new measure, I will have to propose an amendment, and test the sense of the House on the matter. But I am in hopes that the present Minister of Marine will be more practical than his predecessors, and enquire into the matter. Hitherto the Steamboat Inspection Act has been the laughing-stock of practical men. They have laughed at the Ministers and at some of the steamboat inspectors, and have ridiculed the absurdities and the impracticable regulations in regard both to masters and engineers. I cast no reflection. We must judge the measure on its merits when it comes; but I throw this out as a note of warning that past legislation has been anomalous and defective.

Resolution considered in Committee, reported and concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER introduced Bill (No. 103) further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act of 1882.

Bill read the first time.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. ORTON. I ask the indulgence of the House to allow me to introduce Bill (No. 104) to amend the Canada Temperance Act of 1878. As one of the reasons which constrain me to introduce this Bill, I have received from the town of Orangeville, in my county, in which the Act has been in operation for twelve months, the following resolution, a copy of which I have transmitted to the Secretary of State:

"Mr. Foster moved, seconded by Mr. Booth, that whereas the Scott Act has been in force from 1st of May last without furthering the cause of temperance or morality, and at the same time a large monetary loss to this town; that we believe an Act of Parliament cannot be properly enforced where a large number of the people are opposed to its working, and only tends to educate the people to be law-breakers rather than good citizens; that we believe the only successful course for temperance people to pursue is moral suasion, and that a well-regulated licence Act is far superior as a temperance measure than any Act of total prohibition: Therefore, be it resolved by this council, that the wise course of the Federal Parliament to pursue at the present Session would be to amend the Scott Act by allowing the issue of wine and beer licenses; that the clerk forward this resolution to Dr. Orton to present to the Government."

I move the first reading without further remarks at this stage.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the object of the Act?

Mr. ORTON. The object of the Act is to amend the Canadian Temperance Act of 1878 by allowing the sale of beer, wine and cider, not containing more than 15 per cent. of alcohol; and to allow, in counties where the Scott Act is in operation, the privilege to the people, by a similar petition of a similar number of the electors in a similar manner, to have an election to decide whether the people shall agree to have beer, wine and cider exempted from the operation of the Scott Act after a certain time has elapsed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As I desire to strike out one word in the second sub-section of the first section of Bill (No. 77) further to amend the Post Office Act, 1875, I suppose it will have to go back to Committee of the Whole. This portion of the section is as follows:—

And if such acknowledgment has not been received by the depositor through the post within such ten or such eighteen days respectively, and before or upon the expiry thereof he demands such acknowledgment from the Postmaster-General, by registered letter addressed to him at Ottawa.

Instead of "registered letter" it should be "letter." The reason is that, if the man complains of the postmaster, and has to register the letter, the attention of the postmaster is called to the fact that he is writing to the Postmaster General, so I wish to strike out the word "registered."

Order for third reading discharged, and Bill referred back to Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. I cannot understand the reason which the hon. gentleman has given, namely, that in all cases in which the acknowledgment has not come back by reason of some default on the part of the local postmaster, this is giving that local postmaster a notice that complaint is being made. But, on the other hand, the neglect to send a certificate may have arisen from several other causes, and very great difficulties will, I am afraid, be created if a conclusive title is to inure to the depositor, capable of being continued, simply by the statement that he has sent a letter and not a registered letter. There will be disputes as to whether he did send a letter or not. How is that fact to be proved? It is clear that the object in the original Act, saying "by registered letter," was in order that there might be a means of proof satisfactory for the party. But now you say if he sends a letter it shall be conclusive evidence during a term of eighteen days. Now, supposing the letter does not reach its destination. At a small country office the postmaster knows a good many letters that are sent besides those which are registered; he may know the handwriting of the depositor, for instance. There is no security, then, that it will go, and there is no proof, either, to the Department, that such a letter was actually sent. While we are incurring very considerable liability in the convenience that we are affording to the public by these deposits, we are incurring a liability for the honesty and good management of a large number of officers all over the country, and the prudent precaution which, up to this moment, has existed, that the title shall inure only on condition of a registered letter being sent, is now proposed to be dropped. I think there are reasons on both sides.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps so. But the party who has to send the letter, if he wishes to have a guarantee, may register it if he pleases. He might do so if he thinks that will be an additional guarantee to him. But if you make it an obligation by the Act that he must write a letter and have it registered, and if he has reason to believe that the acknowledgment has not been received, and that it is the fault of the postmaster, then he will not register the letter. At all events, it will be for him to decide whether he should register it or not. The section now reads:

And if such acknowledgment has not been received by the depositor through the post within such ten or such eighteen days respectively, and before or upon the expiry thereof he demands such acknowledgment from the Postmaster-General, by letter addressed to him at Ottawa."

But you put here "by registered letter," and compel him to have the letter registered, and if he sends a non-registered letter he will not have complied with the law. Then the entry in his book will not be conclusive evidence of title during another term of ten or eighteen days. So that I really believe, if you do not make it a necessity for him to register his letter it will be better, because you leave it to him to select the one course or the other.

Mr. BLAKE. This provision has not been inserted for the security of the depositor at all; this provision as to registration is a condition imposed by Parliament upon the depositor for the security, not of the depositor, but of the Department and the Government. I quite admit that the depositor is entitled to register if he chooses, although he be not obliged to register; but it was in order to make a security to the Department that he shall perform this duty, which is the condition of a continuing of the liability on the part of the Government for money that it may never have received. The condition of registering it is a means of being quite certain that there shall not be a trumped-up sending of letters. If no registration takes place, then, after an interval of two or three months, the depositor comes forward and says: I want my money. The Department replies: But you never received an acknowledgment from us within the ten or eighteen days. He answers: True, but I have sent you a letter. How is it going to be proved; what sort of proof are you going to admit of that fact having taken place, which, under the law as it has been ever since the system was introduced, was provided for, and it was provided for by the registration that it is now proposed to alter.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course the hon. gentleman knows this is not my Department, but I am informed by the Postmaster-General that the registration of the letters was not in the previous law.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh, yes.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. So I am informed, and it is at his special request that I am moving to strike out this word, because the Post Office authorities believe that the word "registered" should not be there, and they think they will have a better guarantee by leaving it to the party to do so if he chooses. Of course I admit what the hon. gentleman says about the guarantee being in favor of the Department; but, on the other hand, if the postmaster is dishonest enough not to send the money forward, he would also take care that the registered letter did not reach its destination.

Mr. BLAKE. I assumed that the law was the same in this particular, upon the statement the hon. gentleman made when he took the first stage in the Bill, because he then informed us that the only change he was making was to apply to the North-West Territory and Manitoba. There is a further change, I see. Upon looking at the Bill I find that the depositor may demand the acknowledgment of the Postmaster-General, and if the acknowledgment shall not have been received by the depositor within ten days, he shall then demand a further acknowledgment from the Postmaster-General. The law up to this time made a still greater precaution to the Department than even the Bill as it now stands; because it was necessary that he should make a demand through the Postmaster-General, but it was not necessary it should reach the Postmaster-General. The demand might be good provided it reached, but if it did not reach it would not be a good demand. Then there is a proposed acknowledgment which he is to demand by registered letter addressed to Ottawa, which is a still further extension of time. There is a very considerable extension of time even as to the older Provinces, because, whereas by the existing law you would have to make your demand on the Postmaster-General within ten days, now you have only to commence the demand within ten days, so there is an extension of the time and there is also a relaxation of the method. As the hon. gentleman now proposes, the party will make a demand by letter without registration, and the result may be the Department may know nothing about it, and yet it becomes liable. This is a matter, however, to be largely disposed of according to the practice and experience of the Department. I do not know in how many cases it has been found that there have been defaults through accidental delay, or mistake or fraud—because I daresay the first causes are more common than fraud—or how far the Department has found the law unsatisfactory in other respects. But in the first instance when the Bill was presented to the House, it was supposed only to alter the practice by giving an extension of time—it was simply provided that the time should be enlarged in the remote districts of the North-West Territory and British Columbia. We have, therefore, had no opportunity of obtaining statistics and information as to the practical working of the plan, so as to show us that there is an evil to be remedied. What I fear is that claims will be made by persons who have not received acknowledgments, on the plea that a letter had been posted by a man's children or his wife at a certain time, and in that way inconclusive evidence after a lapse of months would be presented in regard to claims pressed against the Department; whereas that is at present impossible.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman may be correct in what he states that the clause goes a little further than was stated when the Bill was read the first time. I understood, however, at the time, and the memorandum I had was to that effect, that this clause was an extension of the time from ten days to eighteen days as regards the North-West and British Columbia. Now, as to the registration of the letter: The Department is of the opinion, and it is at their instance that the motion is now made, that there is a better guarantee that the letter would reach than if the letter was registered, because if complaint is made, and the district postmaster is actually dishonest, he would be likely to tamper with a registered letter. His attention would be called to it, because he would see that it was registered and addressed to the Postmaster-General. If the letter was dropped in the post office with others in the usual way, it would have a better chance of reaching the Postmaster-General, as the attention of the local postmaster might not have been called to it. There may be good reasons on both sides. The registered letter may reach in very many instances; but, on the other hand, the Department, which has had experience in this matter, believes the plan will work much better in the public interest if the letter is not registered. I, therefore, move to strike out the word "registered" in the 42nd line.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported as amended, and read the third time and passed on a division.

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY.

Resolutions (p. 513) respecting the subsidy to the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company concurred in.

Mr. POPE introduced Bill (No. 105) to amend the Act to provide for the granting of a subsidy to the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company, Limited.

Bill read the first time.

THE INTERPRETATION ACT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 80) further to amend the Interpretation Act (from the Senate).—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS. How does the Minister propose to confer by this first section, power upon a Minister to discharge the duties that pertain to an office, when no Minister is appointed under the Great Seal?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). We propose to do so by Order in Council; and I would move the insertion of the words "by authority of an Order in Council" after the word "Minister" in the 11th line.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. MILLS. That might serve very well in the case of a Minister acting for another who may be absent, but not in the case of a Minister discharging the duties of an office which is vacant.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Of course it is necessary to make provision for temporary vacancies, and though the Bill does not designate such a case as that suggested by the hon. gentleman, yet it seems reasonable to regard such a vacancy as a temporary vacancy.

Mr. BLAKE. It sometimes happens under the present regime that they are far from temporary. In one case, I think the vacancy lasted more than a year.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The hon. gentleman must have hope for the future.

Mr. BLAKE. I did hope for a long time, but after long experience of hon. gentlemen opposite I have ceased to hope.

Mr. MILLS. There is besides the question of public policy. The Government have submitted a measure to Parliament to provide for a certain number of offices. They told us, for instance, that the office of Minister of Railways was a necessary office, and they provided for it by law. But now the hon. gentleman proposes to make provision for the discharge of the duties of a Department to which no Minister has been appointed, and under the conditions of this Bill the office may continue vacant during the whole period of the existence of a Parliament, although the law itself requires that the Minister shall be appointed. Now, while it may be important, and I think it is important, that some means should be devised for the discharge of the duties pertaining to any particular Department of the Government during a vacancy, it does seem to me that it is also necessary that Parliament should take care that that vacancy should not be indefinitely continued, as it might be under the provisions of this Bill.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I do not think the Bill will effect a change of policy in that respect. There was necessarily a chance under the existing law of an office becoming vacant, and it is reasonable that we should take steps to prevent that vacancy operating to the public disadvantage. I do not think that making provision for a contingency of that kind, implies at all a change of policy or invites the Ministry to hold the position vacant.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 2,

Mr. MILLS. Will the hon. gentleman explain this clause?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). There may have been a great variety of acts performed by one Minister through the absence or illness of another Minister, and some, of course, during the vacancy of the office. As to none of these, I am informed, has any question arisen by which litigation might be caused; but as the doubt has been suggested, it seems proper to remove any question on the matter, and I think it is apparent to the House that such legislation is proper. For instance, it has been found necessary in many cases during the absence of the Secretary of State, that some other Minister should sign public documents for him; in other cases contracts have been signed, performed and executed, and no question has been raised by the party interested as to the validity of these acts. However, it seems advisable to remove any doubt on the subject, and hence this clause.

Mr. MILLS. Can the hon. gentleman say how long the office of Minister of Railways was vacant?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I think from twelve to sixteen months.

On section 3,

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). This has been inserted because the issue of public Statutes and private Statutes has been very much increased since the Act of 1867, and it has been considered reasonable that a larger share of the expense of printing should be borne by persons who have obtained private Acts.

Bill reported as amended, read the third time, and passed.

APPLICATION OF CERTAIN FINES AND FORFEITURES.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 82) respecting the application of certain fines and forfeitures.—(Mr. Thompson, Antigonish.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). As some members of the House are here who were not present when I explained the provisions of this Bill, I may state that it is found necessary to make some further provision for the application of fines, penalties and forfeitures imposed for the violation of some of the Statutes of Canada. This has been made the more necessary by a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, in 1885, in the cause of Fitzgerald vs. McKinlay, which is not yet reported. I stated the substance of that decision the other day, and I think the interpretation put upon it by my learned friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) was not substantially different from mine. It was to the effect that the clause of the Interpretation Act which makes provision for the disposition of fines, penalties and forfeitures does not provide for the imposition of these fines or forfeitures, when imposed in course of criminal proceedings. Therefore, the first clause of this Bill provides that they shall belong to the Crown and be for the public uses of Canada, and the second clause provides that the Governor in Council may from time to time direct in what way they shall be applied. One class of cases was mentioned the other day, the cases arising under the Canada Temperance Act; and I understand that the suit under which the decision of the Supreme Court was given was a cause under that Statute. But there are various other Statutes in respect of which the same difficulty arises. An instance occurred a little while ago in which the intervention of the Minister of Justice was asked for the enforcement of justice. The Minister of Justice did intervene, in deference to the public sentiment of the place, and the evident necessity that public order should be enforced more strictly than it would be if the prosecution were left to the private authorities. The result was that the supposed offender was made to give sureties for his appearance; he subsequently became a defaulter in respect of his sureties, and there was no legislation indicating to what destination the sum forfeited should go. I mention that as one of a class of cases different from the cases mentioned the other day. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) suggested to me that it would be desirable that a return should be made to the public Treasury of the fines and forfeitures. On looking into that matter, it appears to me that the present enactments on the subject are sufficient. The present Statute requires that the convicting magistrate shall make his return to the Clerk of the Peace for the county; for it seems to have been the policy at the time of Confederation to make use of the existing municipal officers, and since that time the returns have been made to them. A subsequent clause provides that the Clerk of the Peace or other officer of each district or county, within twenty days after the end of each General Sessions of the Peace, shall transmit to the Minister of Finance, or the Receiver-General, a true copy of all such returns made within his district or county. On page 54 of the last Auditor-General's report, will be found a statement of a considerable amount of the fines and forfeitures which have come into the Dominion Treasury under these provisions. It is true, most of these fines and forfeitures have been returned by Federal officers, and the returns, which have been heretofore made by the convicting justices, have been comparatively few. Some returns, however, have been made, and the returns can be enforced under this provision. I admit that it seems desirable to have a more efficient machinery, and I propose, as early as possible, to present to the consideration of the House a Bill for the simplification of proceedings and the recovering of fines and penalties. I think, however, that a leading principle such as that in this Bill, may be adopted, by which we shall avoid considerable confusion which now exists for the recovery of fines and forfeitures under the existing Acts.

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me that the proposal the hon. gentleman makes is open to some objections. It, in fact, throws into the hands of the Governor in Council the whole disposal of this important question. I think it would have been well if the hon. gentleman had some scheme for the disposition of fines and forfeitures which he thought proper in the public interest, and submitted that to the judgment of Parliament. We are really more and more, session after session, becoming a mere machinery for handing over additional powers to the Governor in Council; and now this important power is proposed to be added. The hon. gentleman will agree, I think, that this is a matter which, for very obvious reasons, ought to be dealt with upon large and general principles. To give a power of this kind enables the Governor in Council practically to deal according to his discretion with individual cases—to make a disposition of a fine or a fee according to one principle in one case, and according to another principle in another case, which does not seem to me to be correct. Of course, I am not now discussing the application of the prerogative with reference to a remission; I am discussing the disposition of the exacted fine or penalty. The hon. gentleman made an observation which, I think, calls for a remark. He mentioned an instance in which, in deference to the public sentiment of a particular locality, and in order to secure a more efficient result than would have been secured if the matter had been left to the private authorities, the Dominion Government had intervened. Of course, I do not know the particular case the hon. gentleman refers to; but it seems to me that between a class of cases, as, for example, prosecutions in reference to the revenue, and so forth, in which the Government occupies rather the position of a private prosecutor, and cases under the general administration of justice, there is a very clear line of distinction; and it would be an unfortunate thing if, upon an application from a locality, and in deference to what the hon. gentleman calls the public sentiment of a locality, the Dominion Government should interfere to do that which is after all the duty of the local authorities. With the local authorities rests, under the Confederation Act, the administration of justice. If the arrangements for the administration of justice are ineffective, then public opinion ought to direct itself to the remedying of whatever defects there may be. If the arrangements are sufficiently effective, and are not properly carried out, then public opinion ought to act on the officers whose duty it is to carry them out; but I think it would be unfortunate if either such arrangements, or the action taken upon such arrangements, should result in proceedings being taken in Ottawa with reference to the administration of justice. I suppose the hon. gentleman's difficulty was that after he had deferred to the public sentiment and taken proceedings, he found himself put to some expense, and would be willing to pay the expenses out of such fines and fees as he could collect. This would involve confusion and complications undesirable in the extreme.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The particular instance I mentioned has no special relevancy to this Bill, otherwise than as a mere illustration. No facilities will be given by this Bill for doing what the hon. gentleman thinks is unwise. If I were quite at liberty to mention all the particulars of this individual case, I think the action of the Department in that respect would meet with his approbation. It was not a case, as he seems to think, of personal difficulty of my own, because it occurred a long time before I became connected with the Department, but there was some ground for asking the intervention of the agent of the Dominion Government to prosecute. I quite acquiesce in the general principle stated by the hon. member, that the administration of criminal law should be left to the Provincial authorities. It is not the desire of anybody to have the Orders in Council deal with individual cases, but the hon. gentleman will see that the Statutes which will be affected by a Bill of the kind suggested are numerous and of great variety. Some involve for their execution expense on the local authorities, and it seems fair that in respect of those, the local authorities should be entitled to the advantage of the penalty imposed, to recoup them for the cost of prosecution; others are at the expense of the Provincial authorities, and these authorities should receive consideration for that expense. I expect this Bill to be a temporary measure, and I hope to relieve all apprehensions that this matter is to be left to the Governor in Council, by presenting a Bill which will deal comprehensively with the whole subject. There are cases in various parts of the country which urgently call for some provision like this, as otherwise the enforcement of the penalty will be at an end.

Mr. BLAKE. If the difficulty is pressing and urgent, and the hon. gentleman is not able to deal with it in the way he deems preferable, that will be reason for temporary legislation; but it must be understood that this is avowedly temporary legislation, and that we are not to place on the Statute-book as permanent that which the hon. gentleman agrees should only be temporary. The hon. gentleman cannot bring down a measure at present, he states, on account of the numerous and varied Statutes which have to be considered, and which he has not time at present to collate, and therefore this Bill, on his own statement, is to be but a temporary measure, to remain in force not later than the end of next Session. But there is a class of fines and fees with respect to which the hon. gentleman might act on the other view. I refer to those in connection with the administration of the Temperance Act. Under that Act a good deal of difficulty has been created and a good deal of public feeling aroused, and the local authorities, who are called on to enforce it, are under special difficulties by reason of the existing state of the law. I do not see why the Government should not, with reference to that Act, at any rate, state what the principle is upon which they propose to deal with it, and legislate in that direction. If there be numerous other Statutes which the hon. gentleman has not time to collate, so as to give a particular consideration to the precise method in which the fines and fees should be dealt with, that might be a reason for temporary legislation; but there can be no difficulty in dealing with the case to which I allude, and the case is urgent. I presume the hon. gentleman intends to deal with it, and I would prefer he would do so by proposing it as a measure of legislation, rather than ask authority to deal with it by Order in Council. Representations have been made already by the Provincial authorities to the Central Government as to the difficulties existing in connection with the Temperance Act, and these representations may have alluded to the proposed disposition of fines and fees which, in the view of the Provincial authorities, would be most desirable. Will the hon. gentleman state how that is? The last paragraph of section 2 reads, "or that the same be applied in any other manner deemed best adapted to attain the object of such a law, and to secure its due administration." So that I do not think, irrespective of what the hon. gentleman said as to the particular instance he referred to, the clause itself is wholly free from the observation that it is an indication of the intention—I am glad to see now, of no very marked intention—to interfere with the administration of the law.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It would be practically impossible for me to decide now in what way it is proposed to deal with the class of cases mentioned. The difficulties which have arisen are different in almost every Province. In different localities in the one Province, there are different arrangements. In some places, the municipal authorities carry out the law, in others purely local authorities within the Province, and in others voluntary associations. The circumstances are not so fixed and uniform in the different Provinces as would enable us to deal satisfactorily with the whole subject. I can illustrate this matter no better than by informing the hon. gentleman that while representations have come from Prince Edward Island on the subject within the last few weeks and have been pressed on my attention by members of the House, on the other hand, representations of a different character have come from Ontario this afternoon; and as respects the condition of affairs in Ontario and the wishes of the Government, I have not yet seen the communication which has come, but I have been informed that it has come stating the wish that the disposal of the penalties be placed at the disposal of the Provincial Government. Instead of making now a hard-and-fast rule, these powers should be entrusted to the Government until opportunity is given us to ascertain the wants of the country, and to consider the different Statutes.

Bill reported.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish) moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE moved in amendment:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to Committee of the Whole to amend the Bill by defining the application of the fines, penalties and forfeitures.

Amendment negatived on a division.

Mr. BLAKE moved in amendment:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole to amend the same by providing that the Bill shall have force only until the end of the next Session of Parliament.

House divided on the amendment.

SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS BEFORE MAGISTRATES

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 84) to make further provision respecting Summary Proceedings before Justices and other Magistrates.—(Mr. Thompson, Antigonish).

On section 1,

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Is this exactly the Bill which was before the House last Session, and which did not become law, though it passed the other branch of the Legislature?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It is substantially the same Bill.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). There is no change?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). There are one or two changes. There is no change in the first clause. I will call attention to the changes when we reach them.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I opposed the passage of the Bill last year, and gave my reasons for doing so. I do not intend to oppose the passage of the Bill this Session. Upon reflection, I think the Bill is a good Bill. I am inclined to favor the principle of the Bill. I have no doubt that the Bill will become law, if not this Session, at some future Session of Parliament; but I think it has not passed the Imperial House of Commons or the House of Lords. I do not think there is a Bill on all fours with this that has received the sanction of Her Majesty the Queen, and I think, therefore, that it ought not to be carried here. I think the proper rule is that no legislation should pass this Parliament until it passes the Imperial Parliament; and therefore, though I am in favor of the principle of the Bill, I think it should not pass at this stage.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman has changed his mind since last night, but I think the objection ought to have come at the second reading of the Bill, at least.

Mr. MILLS. If that is a proper rule, it ought to have been applied at an earlier stage. The hon. gentleman has laid down a rule, and has affirmed it again, that would practically render the existence of this Legislature unnecessary. If we are not to legislate on a subject of this sort without its first being dealt with by the Imperial Parliament, then there is no particular reason why the Imperial legislation should not extend to this country and this Legislature be dismissed and sent about its business. It seems to me that we may exercise some discretion ourselves and investigate a subject on our own account. But this Bill certainly goes a long way in the way of rectifying every wrong that a magistrate may commit, and taking from the party, who may consider himself aggrieved by the action of the magistrate, all possibility of redress.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I did not suppose the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) was serious when he referred to what took place last night, as applicable to this Bill, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) seems to be. He will excuse me, therefore, for saying that the two cases are not at all analogous. My objection to the Bill last evening was not merely that it should not be passed until passed by the British Parliament, but that inasmuch as our criminal code was framed very closely upon that of the Mother Country, and the Bill proposed to make extensive amendments in the procedure by which that code is worked, and inasmuch as that subject was under the consideration of the Imperial Parliament, it would be better to defer that Bill. I do not think this is quite in similar circumstances. The convictions have to be made in this country by a class of officers who are not as experienced or skilled in the technicalities of convictions as are the magistrates administering similar laws in England, and I think the necessity is much more apparent in this country for removing the chance of taking successfully purely technical objections to the proceedings of Justices who may happen not to be skilled in the practice or administration of the law. In the Bill of last year it was proposed to provide that the convictions should not be set aside if it appeared from the depositions "or other affidavits" that an offence had been committed. The words "or other affidavits" are omitted from this Bill.

Mr. DAVIES. I think it is very unfortunate that this matter should be dealt with in this way. Our Act relating to summary convictions was largely based upon the English Statute, and in all those cases where it deviated from English Statutes I think it made a mistake. I think, in the first place, that some of these sections go a great deal too far. In our Summary Jurisdictions Act we have discretion given to the Supreme Court where application is made to quash a conviction made by a magistrate, a very extensive discretion, indeed, where application is made to quash convictions on matters of mere form or any technicality, and even in matters going further than mere form. They have power to dismiss the conviction, or to maintain and amend all the proceedings, from the summons right down to the conviction. Then we had commissioners appointed to revise our Statutes, and they revised this Statute and made a re-draft of a number of sections of this Summary Jurisdictions Act. They were legal men drawn from all parts of the Dominion, assisted, I believe, to some extent, by members of the Government, and they gave a great deal of consideration to each of these sections, and the Act, as they amended it, is now before a special committee to whom the Consolidated Acts were referred, and I think they are a better tribunal to judge whether the amendments proposed by this Bill should be introduced. The result of the passage of this Bill, I fear, will be to create carelessness on the part of the magistrates. I agree with the Minister of Justice when he says that many of the magistrates in Canada are not as well educated, or as capable of drawing up legal forms, as English magistrates are, but I say the existing law provides fully for that state of things. My experience has not been that injustice has been done from want of sufficient power vested in the Superior Court under the existing Statute. I think that injustice will be done, and may be done, if this Act passes, because, really, some of the powers given to magistrates are so great, and some of the errors which they commit are so great, that if they are to be cured in the manner proposed, no magistrate may pay any attention to the law. He may state the wrong offence, or he may state two or three offences, either in his summons or in his judgment, or do anything else, and you cannot take any advantage of it on application for a certiorari. I do not know whether the Minister of Justice has given that consideration to it that he ought to have given, nor whether he would not think it better to leave this matter in the hands of the committee to whom the consolidation of the Statutes was referred. The law, as it now stands, contains, at any rate, the opinion of the commissioners as to the extent to which changes should be made. I think, so far as I have been able to examine it, they have attempted to bring it as nearly as possible to the English Summary Convictions Act.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Will the Minister tell us what classes of cases are intended to be covered by section 2 of this Bill that are not already sufficiently covered by the law as it now stands? Under the law as it now stands no conviction can be quashed by reason of any defect, either in matters of form or substance, and the Court of Quarter Sessions is bound to hear an appeal upon the merits, quite irrespective of whether the conviction is defective in point of form, or in point of substance; and the court amends the conviction so as to make it conform to the evidence which has been given. I believe that is the practice that prevails, and I believe that it is justified by the law. I think the Minister will find, if he refers to the law as it now stands, that it is broad enough to cover almost every defect, whether it be a matter of form or of substance, so long as the magistrate has jurisdiction over the subject matter of complaint.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The principal object of the clause is to enable the judge to say that the conviction shall be maintained. Although it has not been described by its technical name, there are many cases in which decisions have been recorded different from those which were rendered, and although the proceedings have been regular, the charge regular, the offence proved and verdict rendered, yet the magistrate has called the offence by its wrong name, and the prisoner appears to have been tried for one offence and convicted for another.

Mr. McCARTHY. It does not appear that the second clause was intended to meet the case mentioned by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron). On an appeal to the Court of Sessions the depositions are not referred to, but the case is re-tried. This clause will not affect cases at Quarter Sessions, but it will meet cases on certiorari.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) Before Quarter Sessions the presiding judge has power to amend a conviction then and there, either in matter of form or in substance.

Mr. McCARTHY. Under what Act?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) Under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, so that class of cases is covered by the present law and the 2nd clause of the Bill is therefore wholly unnecessary and would simply come into collision with the existing law. The hon. gentleman should send the Bill to a select committee.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I have known many cases in which the existing provisions were held to be insufficient. I am not able to cite them from memory, but I have two on a memorandum here which will fully illustrate the operation of the law. One is that of a person charged with being a frequenter of a house of ill-fame. The offence was proved, but on the conviction it was stated that the defendant was an unlawful frequenter of such place, whereas the phrase should have been a habitual frequenter.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). How was the matter disposed of? Was there a writ of certiorari to quash the conviction?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Yes.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). In that case there was no power to amend when an application was made by certiorari. But if there had been an appeal to Quarter Sessions the judge would have had power to amend the conviction either in form or in substance.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Another case is one which was decided last year before Hon. Mr. Justice Rose in Ontario. The conviction was for unlawfully selling and disposing of intoxicating liquor to Indians. The conviction failed, because the magistrate stated that the offender was "charged" instead of saying he was "convicted."

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I quite agree that if this clause is intended to apply to cases of writs of certiorari only it should pass. There is no reason why the judge in such cases should not have power to amend, such as is possessed by the judge at Quarter Sessions. But as regards proceedings in appeal at Quarter Sessions the law is ample, and is even greater than that of this section.

Mr. DAVIES. The point is worthy of consideration.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). In order to meet the objection, I propose to insert the words "on being removed by certiorari."

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think there is the least danger of conflict between the proposed provision and the existing law. The depositions only are returned, and can only be perused by the Superior Court when the certiorari is issued. They are not before the court in the other proceedings.

Mr. DAVIES. They can come up as a matter of practice.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not see how they can as they are officially before the court, and even if they do, where is the conflict? I do not see the slightest conflict, because these words, if they do apply to the Quarter Sessions, do not conflict with what we had before.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). It is now introduced in different language and much more strongly. The convictions are all returned in the Quarter Sessions, and the first thing objected to is the validity of the conviction on the face of it, and then the judge refers to the depositions. Of course subsequently if the conviction is held to be good, they get in the evidence, and if the evidence does not sustain the conviction it may be amended. But the depositions are before the court and are constantly used.

Mr. McCARTHY. My recollection may be all wrong, but I should have said that the depositions were not returned. In summary convictions the conviction itself is returned, but the depositions remain in the hands of the magistrate.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 3,

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It sometimes happens that the magistrate uses the past tense instead of the present, in stating his conviction, putting it in the narrative form. Sub-section a refers to such cases as that. Sub-section b refers to the imposition of a less punishment than the one assigned by law to the offence stated in the conviction. Sub-section c is to prevent the conviction being defeated in consequence of the omission to negative circumstances.

On section 4,

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It sometimes happens that magistrates, in order to avoid the difficulty of giving a technical description of the offence, describe it a second time, and many convictions have been set aside on this ground.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). It seems to me that the tendency of this amendment will be to encourage carelessness and laxity among the magistrates, many of whom are not the best men in the world to deal with criminal cases. It is of great consequence that there should be certainty as far as possible in stating the offence. The same certainty ought to exist with respect to the conviction as to the indictment in order that a man may be able to understand exactly what he is charged with and could prepare to meet it. The law is very fair with respect to that matter now, as the magistrate can amend the information before the case is finally disposed of. Unless there is some grievance which is not met by the present law, I do not think this clause should pass in its present form.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The difficulty is, as I have already stated, that the magistrate frequently describes the offence twice over, sometimes using technical language the first time and conventional language afterwards, and such convictions are almost always set aside.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). That could not be the case under the Bill, because the judge could amend it.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Yes, with reference to the conviction, but this is as to the summons and information as well.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think it should state the information or summons because that is always amendable. If any difficulty is found in the disjunctive or conjunctive statement of offences, the prosecutor should certainly have the right to amend, and the matter might be adjourned if necessary. Whatever force there might be in applying this amendment to convictions and orders, there seems to be no necessity for it so far as the information or summons is concerned.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I do not think it is intended to take away the right of objecting and having the proceedings amended, but it is to prevent the proceedings after conviction being adjudicated invalid. That, I think, is the only case in which it would be desirable to make the change.

Mr. McCARTHY. Practically it takes away the necessity for amendment, because if the information is not had by reason of the double charge, the parties insist on going on as it is and therefore the proceedings would be valid.

Mr. DAVIES. I take it that applies to a case where a party is summoned and does not appear.

On section 5,

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The magistrate is now amply protected under the law as it stands. It is almost impossible to bring an action successfully against the magistrate unless you can show that he has been actuated by corrupt motives or by malice. It appears to me that under this 6th clause, although a magistrate may be actuated by the most corrupt and malicious motives, the court may have power to protect him. Now, I do not believe that a magistrate actuated by such motives ought to receive the slightest protection at the hands of the court or anybody else. While he acts in good faith under what he considers the law to be, and happens to make a mistake unintentionally, I think the law ought to protect him, but we find that occasionally decisions have been given and have been sustained against magistrates who acted from bad motives. It may be said that a judge before whom the validity of a conviction is contested can decide whether the magistrate has acted from corrupt motives or not, but we know that is impossible, because, when an application is made to a court to quash a conviction, the court will hear no evidence as to the motives by which the magistrate was actuated, and the result is that magistrates who do not deserve the protection of the court will probably receive its protection.

Mr. McCARTHY. I quite agree with what has fallen from the hon. member for West Huron. It appears to me that the section goes altogether too far. In fact, I cannot imagine that under any circumstances the section ought to be there. If the magistrate acts without having jurisdiction, and inflicts a wrong on a person, either by imprisonment or fine, I do not see why he should not be answerable as he is now, if, on the other hand, he acts maliciously, the reason is still stronger for the omission of the clause.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It is not desired to give protection to a magistrate who acts maliciously, but it is intended to restrict actions against magistrates which are brought by reason of convictions made without jurisdiction. The judge who sets aside a conviction, it is true, cannot enter into the question of malice, but he can enter into the question of jurisdiction, to ascertain whether it was purely by mistake or otherwise that the magistrate acted. When he makes a mistake of that kind, he is liable to a civil action, and it is proper to protect the magistrate and to restrict the actions brought against him; and I propose to amend the clause in that particular. In cases connected with the liberty of the subject when the prisoner is discharged, it frequently happens that the persons who have had the prisoner in custody are protected against actions. I think it is more reasonable to protect a magistrate who has made a conviction through a mistake in jurisdiction. If that will meet the objection, I will amend the clause in that way.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not see any reason, as the hon. member for Simcoe states, why a magistrate who acts without the slightest power or jurisdiction should be protected. I will give the hon. gentleman an illustration within my own knowledge. I know a magistrate who within the last three years convicted a young man under the Masters and Servants Act because he did not pay the tailor who made a pair of trousers for him, fined him, and ordered that he should be sent to goal if the fine was not paid within thirty days. Now, I would ask if that magistrate ought to be protected, or if he ought not to have been removed from the bench. If actions were brought against a few magistrates who exceeded their duty in that way, they would teach them that they should not interfere with the administration of justice unless they know something about it. I quite agree with the hon. member for North Simcoe that the clause should disappear entirely from the Bill, as under the law as it stands there is the fullest protection.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). There is the fullest protection except where the magistrate exceeds his jurisdiction, and it may be that whether or not a magistrate exceeds his jurisdiction requires a great deal of consideration to determine. As the hon. gentleman knows, it has been decided by the superior courts sometimes by a majority of only one that a magistrate has exceeded his jurisdiction. I think in such cases he is entitled to protection, and I apprehend that the operation of the clause, amended as I propose, would be not so much to change the position of magistrates acting under the criminal law as to free them from what is now really a terror and a threat against them continually, at the instance of defendants who are arraigned before them. Magistrates are frequently induced, from fear of prosecution and from doubt as to their protection, to refrain from enforcing the law. I think it would be wise to let them know they are protected, first of all, in a class of cases in respect of which it is necessary to prove malice, and, secondly, in a class in which they exceed jurisdiction but acted in good faith.

Mr. McCARTHY. In my experience I cannot recall any case in which a magistrate has been sued and damages recovered except where his conduct was deserving of the censure pronounced. It is imaginary to suppose the cases of magistrates who are victims improperly at the hands of defendants. We can imagine every thing. On the whole, I think it would be better for the magistrates not to interfere in a case of that kind, if the law be so doubtful that it invokes a different opinion in the final determination of the question of his jurisdiction. The amendment does not meet my view, and I will vote against the clause. We might insert after the word "peace" the words "on the ground that such justice has exceeded his jurisdiction."

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The effect of the amendment is simply this. The magistrate has jurisdiction over a case, which jurisdiction gives him power to send a man to goal for 30 days. He sends him instead to goal for 6 months, and there is no remedy against the magistracy. I do not think any such amendment should be made. Magistrates must, like others, learn to know the law.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The remedy is not taken away, but power is given to the court or judge adjudicating on the question to make an order taking away the remedy.

Mr. McMULLEN. I sympathise with the view expressed by the hon. Minister of Justice. I have sat on the bench for 20 years, and I know there are many cases in which magistrates are unwilling to act, owing to their fear of being put in for the costs. Every encouragement should be given to magistrates, when they undertake to discharge the duties of justice of the peace, to discharge those duties.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 6,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It has been suggested to me that in the 26th line of section 6, the words "justice or justices" should be struck out, and the words "clerk of the peace" substituted. It has been stated that instances have arisen in which "straw bail" was taken, and it would be much better to make the person named in the Act the clerk of the peace instead of justice of the peace.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I would have no objection to that amendment, but I think it would entail great inconvenience in some places, where the applicant would have to travel a considerable distance to enter security.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not understand the intention to be to strike out the parties named in this section, but that the clerk of the peace shall also have the power. In some towns it is difficult to get a magistrate, but one can always get a commissioner, as every lawyer is a commissioner, and I would propose that the power be also given to commissioners.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I see the difficulty which the Minister of Justice suggests, namely, that the amendment might entail a good deal of expense, but his object seems to me to be to make the clerk of the peace, instead of the justice of the peace, act; the reason being that what is termed "straw bail" is sometimes taken, and that would be better avoided by taking away the power from the justice and giving it to the clerk of the peace.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The difficulty can be met by adding the clerk of the peace.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not know what object there is in having the clause. I thought you never could get a writ of certiorari without giving security.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The law is not the same in all the Provinces. I would in line thirty-six have the word "confirmed" altered to "affirmed." I understand the hon. member from Brant does not want the justice of the peace to be authorised to take the bail, but that the clerk of the peace should be substituted for the justice of the peace, as if both were left in it would only aggravate the difficulty which he states. We will leave the clause as it is, and discuss the point later on.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish).

The Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish.) The clause which was under consideration at six o'clock is one taken from the Imperial Statute, 5 George II, and I should like to give the matter a little further attention. I therefore move that the Committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice that the amendments made by the eleventh and twelfth sections ought to be printed in full. They are amendments of certain words in certain lines of certain Statutes, and it is difficult to understand them, and it will be difficult, when the Bill is passed, to construe them in their present form.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUPPLY—INDIAN ADMINISTRATION IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I regret very much that the First Minister is not in his place to-night. I regret the occasion of his absence and I regret the fact of his absence, because I propose for a short time to discuss the administration of the Department over which the First Minister presides, and I always prefer discussing a question of that kind in the presence of the head of the Department. The First Minister, in his report for the year 1885, recently submitted to Parliament, states:

"That the Indians who revolted had no reason for so doing, in so far as their treatment was concerned, is sufficiently established by the concurrent testimony of all those connected with the management of the Indians in the North-West Territories.

I say that no statement could be further from the fact, and no allegation could be more at variance with the reports of the Department of Indian Affairs. But, even if that statement were true, it would not in any sense relieve the Department from the responsibility for the uneasy, dissatisfied and discontented state of the Indians, and for their ultimate outbreak in open revolt against the sovereign power of this Dominion. The officials of the Department are by no means reliable witnesses. Those who offended against the Indian; those who sinned against the Indian; those who robbed and cheated and swindled the Indian, as I shall establish before I sit down, and those who permitted the Indian of the North-West Territories to be frozen to death and starved to death, are not very reliable witnesses, are very unlikely to disclose their own misconduct and to admit their own criminality. The hon. gentleman ought to have fortified the statement he made in the report of his Department as to the conduct of the officials of that Department and the administration of Indian affairs by other and more reliable testimony than that of the officials incriminated. I shall, in discussing this question, pursue a different course. I shall establish the charges that I propose to make against this Government and the officials appointed by this Government by the reports of the honest, the few honest men that are connected with that service in the North-West, and by a mass of independent testimony that in my judgment is simply startling. The reports of the Department for the last four or five years are eloquent with statements of wrongs done to the Indian, of promises broken, of violated treaties made with the Indian, of gross injustice done to the Indian, of shameful official misconduct on the part of those appointed to administer Indian affairs in the North-West, of lying, cheating, and robbing the Indian; and I propose to establish these propositions in their order by extracts from the reports of the Department and by the testimony of individuals thoroughly conversant with the situation of affairs in the North-West Territories. Let me then, first, deal with the kind of officials which this Government placed over the untamed, uneducated, uncivilised, unchristianised wards of the nation with whom this country was bound to deal honestly and fairly, because Canada induced the Indians of the North-West to surrender their possessory rights to what is practically an empire for the merest pittance. Writers upon the Indian question, and especially such writers as the authoress of "One hundred years of dishonor," speak of the Indians as easily managed, peaceable, quiet, inoffensive, docile, so long as he is fairly and honestly treated; but as faithless, turbulent, and rebellious when he is injured, when he is deceived, when he is wronged, when he is defrauded. In order to retain the confidence of the Indian, in order to educate, to elevate, to civilise and to christianise the Indians, it was of the first consequence that men of character, men of honesty, men of truthfulness, men of high moral standing, should have been selected to preside over and administer Indian affairs in the North-West Territories. I regret to say that, in so far as I have been able to gather the facts, such men have not been selected. Some of the men selected by the Government of this Dominion from the swarm of camp followers that usually surround this Administration, were men who were utterly unfit for the positions they were called upon to fill. Men who were unfit for positions in the public service in the older Provinces of the Dominion, were shipped off to Manitoba and the North-West Territories, and given charge over the Indians there, men who have proved themselves to be utterly unfit for their positions, who have proved themselves to be dishonest, careless, immoral. I say, Sir, that the conduct of the officials of the North-West Territories, more than anything else, created dissatisfaction and discontent among the Indians; I say that the misconduct and the mismanagement of the Administration in connection with the Indian affairs in the North-West Territories, as much as anything else, produced uneasiness, dissatisfaction and discontent among the Indians, which ultimately broke out into open rebellion. I charge, Mr. Speaker, that many of the officials appointed by this Administration, from Commissioner Dewdney down to the lowest official in the service of this Government in the North-West Territories, are wholly unfit to discharge the important duties that devolve upon them, and that these men ought to have been dismissed from their positions by this Government many, many years ago. The Indians, Sir, have no faith in Commissioner Dewdney, they have faith in but few of the officials in the North-West Territories, but none in Commissioner Dewdney, they know him too well, they have been deceived by him too often. He has been charged, and correctly charged, with being domineering, arrogant, tyrannical, unfair, untruthful in his dealings with the Indians. With such a commissioner, and with a similar class of officials, we could expect nothing else than uneasiness, dissatisfaction, discontent, and ultimately rebellion in the North-West Territories. The charges I have made against the Administration and the officials of the Administration in the North-West Territories, I propose to establish out of the blue books submitted to Parliament and by the testimony of independent men, and of journals supporting this Administration. The Winnipeg Times, an organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, a Conservative paper, published in the city of Winnipeg, thus describes Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney:

"But the dross of gold is not Mr. Dewdney's god. He is eminently a philanthropist. His delight is to advance the interests of the savage and promote the welfare of the more wretched white man under his sceptre. For example, when Long Lodge, chief of the Assiniboines, who were camping last summer near Indian Head, complained that the contractor's bacon, costing the Canadian taxpayer's nineteen cents per pound, was not suitable to the Indian palate, the Indians feeding always on buffalo meat; when Long Lodge offered to accept half a pound of steer beef, costing a York shilling a pound dead weight, in place of a pound of bacon costing nineteen cents; when Long Lodge said the bacon was "hurting his people because it was not their food," Mr. Dewdney said "the Indians should eat the bacon or die, and be damned to them." This was not said in haste, but at his honor's leisure. He did not say it because his friend the contractor, who happened to be in a land syndicate with him, had 90,000 pounds of that bacon to dispose of, but because he wished to indoctrinate the savage with the tastes of the average white man. Mr. Dewdney, let Piapot witness, is the Indians' friend. To the white man also he sets a noble example. He teaches the raw settler a new code of morals. He shows him by precept and example that in these degenerated days it is not necessary for a man holding a trust not to abuse it. He illustrates in his own walk and life the modern principles that every man should fight for his own wallet. He is, in this great country, the most signal exemplar of the science of how to get along regardless of the means or methods of locomotion. Mr. Dewdney, therefore, deserves well at our hands and at the hands of the Indians of these Territories. It would hardly be appropriate to present him with a homestead, for he has several, also preemptions in abundance. Money would also be out of place, inasmuch as while Sir Leonard has a surplus and Sir John remains in power, he will not want. Could anything be more appropriate than to present him with a petition to leave, to get out, to go elsewhere and teach other Indians and other white men the ethics of grab, greed and shamelessness which he has introduced here?"

That extract, Sir, is from a paper published in the interests of the Government, and was published three years ago, and up to this hour this Indian Commissioner, so described by an organ of the Government, still retains his place as Commissioner of Indian Affairs in the North-West Territories. The Ottawa Sun, another paper not unfriendly to this Administration, speaking of the officials in the North-West, says:

"The country has been cursed with an unscrupulous and tyrannical officialdom, and to this cause may be traced the origin of the present trouble. Officials were selected purely from political reasons, without regard to fitness, or, in many cases, character. And the last thing to be considered has been the wishes or interests of the settlers, who have no representative in Parliament, and no recourse against the tyranny of these officials. Almost every official made it his business to get rich by speculating in the lands which the interests of the country required should be administered in the interest of the actual settler. Land agents have been in partnership with claim-jumpers, and used their advantages to rob honest settlers by treacherous technicalities for the benefit of the land sharks. Junius tells us something about public men who suddenly became rich, which may be properly applied to Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney. That gentleman, when he came to Ottawa in 1872, was practically a pauper. To-day he is a wealthy man. He did not save his wealth out of his salary. When he personally drove off the settlers from the county of Kent, who had gone in under very great difficulties and at great expense at a trying season of the year, built houses, and started to break land for cultivation—when he insulted men who went in mistaken confidence to him for protection against the outrage perpetrated by Major Bell—he was at the time, it is alleged, in receipt of a present of $10,000 in the stock of the Bell Farming Company."

Now, you must bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that this Commissioner Dewdney, so described by two organs of the Government, is the official who has charge of the Indians in the North-West Territory, and has had charge of them for a series of years. The attention of the Government has been drawn to the conduct of this man, to the actions of this man, yet up to this hour the first step has not been taken to remedy the wrong that is alleged to have been perpetrated by him. The Farmers' Union, a body of respectable men in the North-West, thus speaks of the character of the officials this Administration sent to the North-West to administer Indian affairs in that region:

"We point with a sorrowful pride to the fact that whilst we are trying to secure consideration and justice our sons and brothers have left their farms to grow to weeds while they are away in the North-West Territory, risking and laying down their lives like loyal sons of Canada to defend the supremacy of the flag of our forefathers from the contaminating touch of half-breeds and savages driven to despair by misgovernment, and by the acts of incompetent and dishonest Government officials."

Mr. Jackson, a member of the North-West Council, a life-long Conservative, a man who boasts that he has been an unswerving and faithful supporter of the First Minister of this Dominion for a period of twenty-five years, in a speech delivered by him at Qu'Appelle in January last, thus speaks of Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney and the officials of the North-West Territory:

"Everything is quiet, there is no danger. I say that if the Indian agents were not in a position then to tell what was the state of the Indian mind at that time, then they were unfit for the position they held; and a stronger argument that the chief of the Department was not fitted for his post I do not want than that he allowed his Indian agents to persuade him that everything was peaceable and quiet, while the whole thing was a seething volcano, ready to burst forth at any moment, and Mr. Dewdney was the only innocent man in the country. That shows that things in the Indian Department are rotten to the core, and should be weeded out (Hear, hear.) Had he exercised his proper functions, and done what was expected of him, the Government would have been induced, because of the gravity of the situation, to deal with the matter, and thus have averted this great rebellion. He failed to do that; and if the Government care anything at all for the feelings of the people of this country, they will sweep away that which is rotten and I despise, and place an honest man, who will fulfil his duties, in the position of Lieutenant-Governor. (Cheers.) I have shown you that he had neglected his duties, and prostituted his position as Indian Commissioner; that he has allowed people to starve to death. I can show you that he said at Qu'Appelle Station that the Indians of the north might give trouble, but that he felt sure the Indians of Treaty No. 4 would give no trouble to the Government. If that is the fact, and if he allowed men, women and children to go to their death without a warning, that man was accessory before the fact. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, these are all facts. At the Session of Parliament, I think 1883-83, or 1883-84, when Sir John Macdonald, whom I have followed for twenty-five years, and who has always found me an active supporter, got up in his place as Premier of the Dominion, and said that Mr. Dewdney was one of the best appointments he ever made, I confess it completely knocked the wind out of me. (Laughter.)"

I do not wonder that it knocked the wind out of this member of the North-West Council. The extracts I have read from the organs of the Government, and the revelations I shall make before I resume my seat, together with the statement made by the First Minister with respect to Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney, will prove enough to knock the wind out of anyone. The Mail newspaper of 2nd February, 1886, reports an interview which the correspondent of that paper had with a person by the name of Mr. James Grier, who lives in the neighborhood of Old Man's River, and was a former resident of the county of Grey and had been reeve of the township in which he resided for 15 years. Mr. James Grier says, on this subject:

"Another great grievance in the North-West is the importation of carpet-baggers to fill official positions. This is not, however, so seriously felt now as it has been. But on all sides but one opinion is expressed—that the North-West now has men capable of filling the offices, and that they should be chosen, all other things being equal, for the vacancies that occur."

Let me now give the opinion of clergymen:

"At the Presbytery meeting at Brandon, Manitoba, Rev. Mr. Cameron, who spent many years among the Indians about Battleford, contended that "Indian uprising was in a great measure due to the character of the instructors and agents appointed by the Government. If the Government officials had been the right kind of men the uprising would never have taken place. In many cases their treatment of the Indians was calculated to have a most injurious effect—some of them treating the Indians like dogs—never speaking to them without an oath, and paying no regard whatever to their word." The rev. gentleman remarked that it would spoil good Indians to make them like some of the Indian Department officials who are over them, and supposed to be civilising them. Mr. Cameron's statements were confirmed by Rev. Messrs. Robertson, Flett, and other Indian missionaries, who maintained that the Indian revolt was in a great measure due to the character of the Government officials sent amongst them."

I say that is an extraordinary condition of affairs. Those people are on the spot and know whereof they speak, and so knowing whereof they speak, they so described the officials sent by this Government to administer Indian affairs in the North-West. Mr. McDougall, one of the Methodist missionaries, who has devoted his life to the service of elevating, educating, civilising and christianising the Indians, thus speaks of the officials:

"Mr. McDougall points out the great difficulty of governing from Ottawa, and says that 'laws were enacted which could not be enforced'; Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

furthermore simply unfit men were appointed to office without any knowledge of the nature of the work expected of them, the Indians and the country, and Government having to run the risk in the meanwhile of being experimented upon."

Hon. Lawrence Clarke, at one time a member of the North-West Council thus speaks of the class of men who were sent by this Government to administer Indian affairs:

"Brutal ruffians were appointed as farm instructors over the Indians, who maltreated the poor people in the most brutal manner, answering them with kicks and blows, accompanied with showers of profanity and disgusting epithets; of the farm instructors killed by the Indians two were universally known to be brutal wretches such as I have mentioned, and the priests lost their lives in attempting to save them from the pent-up wrath of the savages."

Mr. MITCHELL. Whose report is that?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). That of the Hon. Lawrence Clarke, formerly a member of the North-West Council. He proceeds:

"Let a commissioner be appointed or a Committee of Parliament, and I pledge myself to show to the people of this Dominion such a picture of the facts as will make them wonder how it is that rebellion did not break out years ago. Had not the Indians been restrained by the priests and ministers, the farm instructors and other paid politicians appointed over them, would have been killed long ago."

Archbishop Taché, in his manifesto, speaking of the Indian troubles, says:

"There were some well qualified men, but important posts were assigned to men totally unqualified for the position, while other persons perfectly apt have been dismissed or left aside because ten, fifteen, or twenty years before they were political opponents."

Mr. Jackson, in his speech at Qu'Appelle, from which I have just quoted, said:

"A white man never believes in him. The Indian thinks of him as a man who does not tell the truth to-day, but might to-morrow; but that to-morrow never comes. (Laughter.)"

The Winnipeg Times, speaking of Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney, said:

"For the first time in the history of the British nation the representative of the Queen is known to the savage as a liar."

Such are the opinions of the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite; such are the opinions of the press supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, as to the character of the officials appointed by this Government to administer Indian affairs in the North-West, from Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney down to the farm instructors appointed by this Administration. I say it is a marvel to me, not that the Indians took up arms against the sovereign power of this country, but the marvel to me is that long years ago the Indians did not protest in the only way known to them against the misconduct, maladministration, incapacity and culpable neglect of this Administration. I go still further. I say the Government and the officials appointed by this Government have not only broken faith with the Indians, but many of the officials in the North-West Territories have debased and degraded the Indian character, until now, Sir, there is nothing left but the bare memory of what was once the noble red man of the plains. An organ of the Government, three years ago, called public attention to the fact that one of the agents of this Administration was living on a reserve, beneath the shadow of the Methodist mission, in open adultery with two young squaws. The Government were aware of it, but the Government never moved, never enquired, never investigated, and up to this hour, this unworthy representative of Ottawa officialdom administers Indian affairs in that particular locality. A young Englishman, unfit to do anything in his native country, was shipped off to Canada, consigned to the care of the First Minister of this Dominion. He was provided for in the Indian service of the North-West Territories, and he has been living there for three or four years revelling in the sensual enjoyments of a western harem, plentifully supplied with select cullings from the western prairie flowers. We send missionaries of the Cross to the North-West to educate and elevate, to civilise and christianise the Indians. We send missionaries, official missionaries, to the North-West Territories to humiliate, to lower, to degrade and debase the virgin daughters of the wards of the nation, and yet we find people expressing their surprise and astonishment that the Indians do not take kindly to the ways of modern civilisation, and that after the munificent donations which Parliament votes every year to feed, clothe and keep in comfort the wild Indians of the plains, they are still dissatisfied, still discontented, still rebellious. I say again that to my mind the marvel is that years ago the Indians did not use the tomahawk and scalping knife and clean out of the North-West Territories the lazy, indolent, incompetent and immoral class of officials who have been appointed by this Administration to administer Indian affairs in the North-West Territories. The statements I make may be considered somewhat extravagant, but I shall prove every one of them before I resume my seat by official documents submitted by this Government to this Parliament, and a mass of independent testimony that, to my mind, is simply overwhelming. If you refer to one of the reports of one of the Departments brought down last year, you will find that 45 per. cent of one class of officials in the North-West were under medical treatment for a peculiar kind of disease in one year. That you will admit, is an extraordinary showing for a class of men paid by the people of this country to control, manage and set an example to the Indians of the North-West Territories. Sir, that report speaks in unmistakable terms of the condition of those guardians of public peace and public morals. At one station it points out that there were fifty-eight cases in one year; at another station there were forty-seven cases under medical treatment in ten months; at a third station there were in eleven months seventy-four cases under medical treatment; at a fourth station in 1884 there were sixty cases under medical treatment. In a division of the force in eleven months there were twenty-one cases, and the aggregate shows that there were at least 45 per cent. of this class of officials in the North-West Territories who were suffering from this class of disease. The Mail newspaper, to which I suppose hon. gentlemen will not object as a witness in this part of the discussion—the Mail newspaper of the 30th of January, 1886, publishes an interview with one of the missionaries employed by one of the leading churches of the Dominion, to civilise and christianise the Indians. That missionary said :

“But what we want in our reserves are married men as employees, and a few hundred dollars expended in putting up houses for them would pay in the end. And, let me say, get Christian men: thank God there are such to be found; and don't employ a man because some influential man down east wants to get a situation for him. Again, put a stop to white men living with Indian women unless they are lawfully married to them. Where are the young girls of 13 to 16 that have been partly taught in our schools; and others before them? Sold to white men for from $10 to $20! Where are their children? Running about the reserves wearing rags! Where are the women themselves? They are prostitutes hanging around the towns. Stop the sale of Indian girls to white men and another great step is taken.”

Now, Sir, I say that every calm, thoughtful, thinking man will conclude that this is an extraordinary condition of affairs. This missionary tells us that the very children from the mission schools are absorbed into this population for the vilest and most unholy purposes. Mr. McDougall, who is the missionary to whom I have alluded, in the same interview when asked to explain the true condition of affairs, said :

“He urges a change, and the Indians given a fair chance; he wants the Government's Indian policy—to make the Indian a responsible citizen—carried out in its true spirit. To do this he asks for employees of the Indian Department who will be true to their country if not to their God, who will refrain from licentiousness, blasphemy, drunkenness, and laziness, who will have force of character enough to command general respect, and who will by precept and example teach the Indians industry, thrift and obedience to the law.”

The Mail newspaper of the 2nd of February, 1886, publishes an interview with Mr. James Grier, to whom I have already alluded, in which the following occurs:—

“Then the conversation drifted back to the Indians, and I asked him if he knew of any frauds that had been committed on them. He answered: ‘I know any amount of corruption exists in the Indian Department, and I know that many of the officials have one squaw or two. This is a matter of public notoriety.’”

I ask you, after having heard this evidence, whether I am not amply justified in the charge I have made against this Government, that they appointed to positions of public trust in the North-West Territories, from among their army of carpet-baggers and camp followers, some of the most unfit men that ever occupied public positions. I say this condition of affairs is well known to the Government, and has been well known to the Government for a number of years. I say that it is a scandalous condition of affairs to exist in any country, and a disgrace to the Government that would tolerate it for one hour. I say that they have not only been guilty of sending this class of people to the North-West Territories, but they have been guilty of breaking faith with the Indians. The solemn covenants entered into with the Indians have been shamefully, openly, persistently and systematically broken by this Government. The confidence which the Indian usually has in the Sovereign of this Dominion, has been shaken. He can no longer rely on the faith of the Crown, and the result has been a rebellion in the North-West Territories, in which the Indians took no unimportant part, and the result is that to-day I solemnly believe, from the testimony that comes from the North-West, that this Dominion is standing on the brink of a volcano, which may burst forth at any moment. The evidence upon this point of broken faith, violated treaties, unfulfilled obligations is so clear that it is almost unnecessary to discuss it. But in order that the matter may be put beyond peradventure, I propose to establish it out of the blue-books submitted to this Parliament during the last four or five years; I propose to prove it by the testimony of the organs and friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. The Mail newspaper of the 13th January, 1886, publishes another interview with the Rev. Mr. McDougall, the missionary from the Methodist Church to the Stoney Indians near Calgary. In that interview Mr. McDougall says :

“The ‘Government is false to the treaty, the white men have lied to us, we are deceived,’ the Indians said, and it required the services of loyal old-timers to point out to them why, through unavoidable delays, lack of speedy transport, &c., the obligations of the Government were sometimes unfulfilled. But Mr. McDougall says: ‘We could not find, nor did we try to find, any excuse for the promises made but not fulfilled, for the cut-throat policy often exhibited and sometimes enforced by officials of the Indian Department, for the shameful and immoral lives of many of the employees of the same. Some of these were a disgrace to the lowest barbarism, let alone civilisation. Nor how could we, when earnestly trying to teach Indians habits of industry and thrift, be expected to excuse the laziness and incompetency of many sent into the country to teach the wards of the Government those lessons we have been working for them to acquire for so many years. Moreover, could we be blamed when we felt strongly that something was wrong in the system which allowed such men in its branch of the service. The inconsistency has oftentimes appeared to us very glaring when we looked at a department claiming to have a certain object in view, set aside by the country at large, whose servant it is, to attain this object, and yet within its own grasp and power doing those things and adopting those methods which are defeating their object.’”

The Rev. Father Scollen, a missionary priest for twenty-four years among the Indians of the North-West Territories, and now, or at all events recently, in the service of this Administration, speaks as follows of the treatment of the Indians by the Government:—

“That the half-breed rising had not necessarily been the cause of the Indian rising, from the fact that the Indians had been prepared to rise long before the half-breeds had made any movement at all. They had been prepared to take the first opportunity no matter what it was. If any other parties had got into trouble with the Government or caused the Government trouble, the Indians would have taken advantage of that just as they did the half-breed rising. They had known, and they know to-day that they could not fight the white man, hence they had been watching an opportunity. One cause for dissatisfaction among the Indians had been the fact that the treaties had not been carried out on the part of the Government agents."

Such is the testimony of two men whose evidence cannot be controverted in this Parliament or elsewhere. I go further. I say that the reports of the Department establish still more clearly that broken promises and violated treaties have characterised the dealings of the Government with the Indians for a long number of years. A. McKay, an Indian agent at Grand Rapids, in his report states that the inspector of Indian agencies promised to supply them with all they might require, and that they were urged by that gentleman to make their demands on the Department for the same, which they did, but they were not complied with. Mr. McColl, inspector of Indian agencies in the North-West, writing of the Swan Lake bands, says that waggons were promised them, and that he is apprehensive of serious consequences unless their claims are recognised. Mr. McDonald, an Indian agent under Treaty No. 4, publishes a letter from Poundmaker, in which Poundmaker uses the following language:—

"It is Poundmaker who takes the liberty of sending you a few lines. We entreat Your Honor to send him the grist mill with horse-power you kindly presented him at Cypress. We expected it last summer, but in vain."

These had been promised to the Indian chief by Commissioner Dewdney, twelve months before this complaint was made; but up to that hour the pledges of the Crown, made by Commissioner Dewdney, had not been fulfilled. Poundmaker says further:

"Let me have the 22 oxen you promised for my band."

J. McRae, an Indian agent at Carleton, speaking of the Okenasis band—and Mr. Tompkins corroborates the statement—says that Inspector Wadsworth promised him a large lumber waggon last fall, but he did not get it. G. McPherson, Indian agent, says:

"The clothing for the chiefs and councillors was good, except the trousers and shirts, which were inferior and worn out in three or four days."

Now, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is not that an extraordinary condition of affairs? If you refer to the accounts of the contractors for supplies to the Indians, you will find that they were bound to supply articles of a reasonably fair quality. Instead of so doing they supplied the Indian chiefs and the Indian councillors with an article that lasted them but three days; and yet we are surprised that the Indians are dissatisfied and discontented, and that they have broken out into revolt, as they may break out into revolt again. J. W. Herchmer, Indian agent, speaking of the Salteaux band under South Quill, says:

"Hunting having failed in their neighborhood, the band have been obliged to sell most of their horses to buy supplies, and are now miserably poor."

Miserably poor! With the munificent donation voted by Parliament, and expended last year, of some $1,109,000. Miserably poor! And why? Because this Government negligently and carelessly permit their contractors to supply these Indians with an article of wearing apparel that lasts the Indians only three days. A. McKay, Indian agent, says of the Indians on Che-ma-wha-win reserve:

"The harrows and ploughs were lying partly buried in mud and weeds in different places. Some of them have never been used or put together yet, and are spoiling for want of care."

We have an army of officials in the North-West; we have Indian agents, sub-Indian agents, farm instructors, all kinds and classes of men there to look after the interests of the Indians; and yet we find that so little attention was paid to those supplies that they were dumped off in the mud and filth and left there to rot. And we are surprised and astounded that the Indian is not satisfied with the attention he receives. Mr. McColl, the Inspector of Agencies, says:

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

"I also notice in the same records that nearly all the bands within this agency have received more axes than they were entitled to under the treaty, and that only two or three bands have received their complement of hoes, spades and scythes, notwithstanding the representation made to the contrary to the Department as well as to the Indians in reference to this matter."

Notwithstanding the representations made to the contrary, to the Department as well as to the Indians, in reference to this matter. In other words, our agents in the North-West, in charge of the Indian Department, were so indolent, so lazy, so indifferent and so careless, that they delivered to some bands of Indians far more of one class of tools and implements than were required, while to other bands they gave none at all. The same inspector further reports:

"The potatoes and barley received last spring were half rotten."

Now, I ask the Acting Minister of Indian Affairs if his attention was ever drawn to that report? Is that the kind of treatment we ought to mete out to the wards of the nation, to the men with whom, above all others, we are in honor bound to deal fairly and honestly? We pay for these things, and we supply them, but when they reach the Indians they are wholly unfit for use. The same inspector again says:

"That the councillor complains that the quality of the hats, trousers and shoes received by him were inferior."

He further reports that John Harcus, one of the councillors of the Cumberland band, complains that the agricultural implements forwarded by the Department for their use, were refused to them. We were under obligations, we were in honor bound to give the Indians these things; they were bought and paid for, yet when they reached their destination, some wise agent of the Administration would not hand them over to the Indians. Was any enquiry made into this? In so far as I am able to gather from the reports, none was made. C. E. Denny, another Indian agent, speaking of the breach of contract by the contractor, says:

"I sent a messenger to Fort Benton, to I. G. Baker & Co., informing them that flour was needed, and to ship at once. I had, on two occasions, to purchase cattle from others than the contractors, as they failed to keep me supplied, and beef would have run out on the Black-foot and other reserves had I not done so. I had to pay half prices, and notified the contractors before taking this step."

There you see how a portion of the fund which Parliament voted was expended. The contractors either did not supply the articles at all, or supplied it of an inferior quality; yet, no investigation was made, no enquiry made, and nothing was done. Mr. Herchmer, speaking of the Sioux bands, says:

"A great deal of sickness has visited them lately caused by the want of fresh meat."

W. Pocklington, speaking of Stoney Indians, says:

"During last winter there was a great deal of distress among them for want of clothing, many of them not having a blanket to cover their nakedness."

T. P. Wadsworth, speaking of the Day Star band, says that:

"They complained that they did not get their treaty pigs, and they asked for more oxen, tool chests, moccasins and milk pans."

He reports as to Mistowasis band:

"They complained that they did not get treaty pigs, and Wadsworth recommends that Mistowasis and Ahtahkakoops get them."

Mr. Wadsworth says of the Bobtail band:

"They complain that still due them, under treaty, a cow and bull."

And further:

"The Ermine Skin's band complain of want of a mower and some carts."

These are not the only complaints that the Indians have been making for a number of years. We promised, and were under obligations to supply the Indians, just fresh from the plains, from which the buffalo had disappeared, with fresh beef. But instead of fresh beef, we supplied them with salt pork, though we could get fresh beef at from 8 to 15 cents per lb., and had to pay for the pork, some of which was rusted at that, from 20 to 25 cents per lb. The table I submit, culled from the vouchers in the Indian Department, shows the following rates:—

“At Fort Macleod, in 1882-3, beef was worth per lb. 8½ cents and bacon 20 cents; in 1883-4, beef was worth per lb. 14½ cents and bacon 23½ cents; in 1884-5 beef 15 cents and bacon 18 cent per lb. In the Saskatchewan District, in 1882-3, beef was worth 15 cents and bacon 25 cents; in 1883-4, beef 20 cents, and bacon 22½ cents per lb. At Battleford, in 1882-3, beef was worth 12½ cents per lb., and bacon 23 cents; and 1883-4, beef 17 cents, and bacon 20 cents. In Calgary, in 1882-3, beef was worth 8½, and bacon 21½ cents; and in 1883-4, beef 14½, and bacon 24½ cents per lb.”

And this, although the Department was made aware of the fact, by its agent Mr. Herchmer in his report for 1883. Mr. Herchmer there says :

“A great deal of sickness has visited them lately caused by the want of fresh meat.” The Indians, under treaty 4, received in 1884-5, $15,290.92 worth of pork, and $1,288.45 worth of beef, although it is known that beef is life to the Indian, while salt pork is disease and death to him.”

This bountiful, humane and attentive Government, whose duty it was to look after the interest of the Indians, supplied them with twelve pounds of disease and death to one pound of life. And this, although the reports of the Department are literally teeming with warnings to and remonstrances against the Government for the inhuman treatment the Indians received at their hands, by supplying them with pork instead of with fresh meat. Agent Herchmer, in his report dated the 24th July, 1885, speaking of the types of disease among the Indians says :

“To these might be added I think the sudden change from fresh meat on the Prairies to flour and bacon in comparative confinement.”

And again at page 61 he says :

“At Oak River, eleven men have died out of 88 heads of families, and seventeen children under three years old. This is very distressing and is hard to account for—the change of diet, owing to the failure of hunting and scrofula, being probably the cause.”

It is very distressing, the agent pathetically says, while all the time these very agents were doing what they knew they ought not to have done; namely, supplying these men with salt pork at 20 to 25 cents per pound when they could have got fresh beef at from 8½ to 15 cents per pound. Mr. Magnus Begg, Indian agent, in his report dated 28th July, 1885, says :

“During the month of April there was considerable sickness on the Stoney reserve; and it was thought favorable to issue beef, which was done and with satisfactory results.”

In other words, we fed the Indians on salt pork until they became sick unto death, and then we fed them on fresh beef to restore them to health again. Has the Government of this country, has the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in the North-West Territory not considered that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, that it would be better to feed the Indian on fresh beef to prevent disease rather than to feed him on fresh beef to effect a cure, especially as fresh beef can be purchased at a much lower figure in the market than salt pork. The reports, with few exceptions, of the agents of the Department for the last four or five years show that there have been constant complaints made to the head of this Department of the inhuman treatment received by the Indians at the hands of the officials of this Government. Those complaints have been renewed from year to year; those complaints have not been investigated. I charge that this Government, although these complaints have been made by their own agents, have not investigated them, and, where the truth of the charges was brought home to the agents of the Department, these agents have not been dismissed as they should have been. Mr. Wadsworth, the Superintendent of Indian affairs, in his report for 1882, speaking of the Rivière qui Barre Indians, says :

“The flour and bacon received as supplies was bad, and the flour received by the Indians at Battleford, had become lumpy.”

Mr. Wadsworth, in his report for 1883, speaking of the Indians in the Sekaskoots reserve, says :

“I could get no account of the supplies sent in by the contractors or the Government.”

He further says :

“The flour received by those Indians only averaged 93 pounds per sack.”

And again, speaking of Poundmaker's band, he says :

“The flour was inferior and of light weight.”

A. McKay, Indian agent, in his report for 1884, says that the Inspector of Indian agencies promised to supply them with all they might require, and that they were urged by that agent to make their demands on the Department for the same; that they did do so, but the supplies were not sent. E. McColl, in his report for 1882, says :

“Waggons were promised these Indians, and that he was apprehensive of serious consequences, unless their claims were recognised.”

Mr. T. P. Wadsworth, in his report for 1883, speaking of Day Star's band says :

“The chief complained that he could not get his treaty pigs, and that he wanted more oxen, a tool chest and milk pans.”

Also that :

“Mistowasis' band and Ah-tah-ka-koop's band did not get their treaty pigs, and he recommends that they get them.”

He further reports that :

“Bobtail's band complained that there was still due them under the treaty a cow and a bull.”

He further reports that :

“Ermine Skin's band complained that there was due them under the treaty a mower and some carts.”

Francis Ogiltree, Indian agent, in his report dated 14th October, 1884, says, in speaking of the Sandy Bay band :

“They are very anxious to get the cattle they are entitled to as well as some of the tools.”

John McIntyre, Indian agent, in his report dated 6th October, 1884, says in reference to the Lac des Mille Lacs band :

“This band is still entitled to three cows.”

And of the Wobegan and Eagle Lake bands :

“I took an inventory of all their tools and implements and find they are short of a good many for which I have made requisition.”

And of the Mattawa and English Rivers band :

“This band asks for one plough and one harrow, twenty grubbers, one morticing pick, one single yoke, and two cows still are due them.”

And of the Fish River reserve :

“They again ask for a steel grist mill. They also request to be supplied with two brush breaking ploughs, two iron harrows, and four sets of strong chain traces as those previously furnished were worthless.”

I have shown not only that we have sent bad agents to administer Indian affairs in the North-West Territories, but that we have broken faith with the Indians in many respects. I now propose to prove that we have by our negligence and misconduct allowed the Indians, in the midst of plenty, to be frozen to death and starved to death. I have shown that we have allowed them to be robbed, swindled and cheated out of what they were entitled to, by the agents and the middlemen, that we gave them little or no clothing, and, to cap the climax of our criminality, we have allowed them to be frozen and starved to death. Let us see how far this is proved by the records submitted to Parliament:—Mr. McDonald, Indian agent, under Treaty No. 4, published a letter from Poundmaker, dated 10th November, 1882, in which the old chief says :

“There is to-day a great distress in my band. Their rations are suspended now for 41 days and, of course, everybody is busy roving about and hunting. It is impossible to work on an empty stomach.”

C. E. Denny, Indian agent, in his report for 1882, says :

“I found the Blackfeet willing to work had they received assistance, but they had been badly neglected and, in consequence, were wild and unsettled.”

Commissioner McLeod, in his report for 1879, says :

" I have experienced great difficulty (with the distress and suffering) applications for relief being constantly made to me by the starving bands of Indians "

Again the commissioner says :

" A Stoney Indian and his family had been without food for many days."

Superintendent Walsh, in his report for 1880, says :

" Hunger and suffering prevailed. In some places persons became so reduced as to be unable to help themselves. The want of food followed by disease caused an epidemic, which marked its results by the many graves now to be seen in Wood Mountain."

Was there ever such a picture as this painted by the most skilful artist? Was there ever such an indictment preferred against any Government? Was there ever such an indictment preferred against this incompetent Government as that framed in this report of one of their own agents in the North-West? Nothing but the weakness, the incompetency of this Administration would have permitted this condition of affairs to have existed one hour after it was made known to the Government, but, with a full knowledge of all these facts, with a full knowledge on their own part, on the part of the Superintendent-General and of Commissioner Dewdney, not the first step was taken to rectify the wrong done to the Indians. The breach of faith, the violated promises, the broken pledges, the fraud and misconduct of the officials, the robbing and cheating all around, the negligence and incompetency of this Administration, are all marked by the graves of the Indians on the side of Wood Mountain. Still the Government never moved, never stirred, never investigated. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs in the North-West Territories never moved, never stirred, never investigated. No, he luxuriated in his comfortable quarters in Regina, and the Indians whom we are bound to protect might starve to death and freeze to death as far as he was concerned. Let me establish this statement by a mass of testimony that cannot be successfully assailed. The Moose Jaw News, a paper by no means unfavorable to the Administration, on the 14th March, 1884, writing of the condition of the Indians in that neighborhood, speaks as follows:—

" In this connection the case of several Indian families in this vicinity may be cited. A friend driving by one, a few days ago, was given to understand that death had been in their midst. On entering the tepee a pitiable sight was discovered. Starvation was visible in their countenances, and a glance sufficed to show the cause of the warrior's death. One can hardly imagine how they had lived at all. The canvass of the tent was old and torn. Not a vestige of anything edible was to be seen, but a few rabbit-skins lying around showed what had composed their last meal. Everything in the way of blankets was under or over the dead braves. Around a cheerless fire were huddled an Indian and three or four squaws. They stated that they had been without food for two days, and appearances would go to prove the truth of their assertion. Can we in this enlightened age, allow scenes like this to take place in our midst without uttering an indignant protest to the proper authorities? Would these Indians have left their reserves, and run the risk of starvation, if they were sure of being supplied with the necessities of life there? "

The same paper, on the 13th June, 1884, discussing the injury inflicted by the Government upon chief Pi-a-pot, says :

" But even this will be utterly insufficient to wipe out the past. Its record will remain a foul blot in our history. The sufferings of the Indians in the Assinibioia reserves during the past winter are a burning shame to us, a lasting reproach to our Government. What would be thought of us in England, or in any other Christian country, were it clearly understood that for weeks large bands of Indians, the wards of the nation, poor, wretched creatures, whose primitive sources of supply had been cut off by our invasion, and whom we were bound by solemn treaty, as well as by every consideration of justice and humanity, to feed and care for, were dying by scores, partly from semi-starvation and partly from disease resulting from the bad quality of the food supplied by the agents! It is no excuse to say that the facts were not known. Why were they not known? Were there not high officials whose first duty it was to know the facts? If it should prove that the want of knowledge, or to the fearful ravages of scurvy, were due in any degree to a petty economy which dispensed with the services of a competent medical inspector in order to save his fees, this would be an aggravation of the guilt of those responsible for it.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

" We write thus strongly because we feel strongly on this subject. It is a subject on which every Canadian and every settler in the North-West in particular, is in duty bound to feel strongly. As we have before pointed out, the gravest issues, involving not only the paramount claims of humanity and right, but also the security of life and property, are wrapped up in the maintenance of friendly relations and good faith with the aborigines.

" We do not remember to have met with a settler from the neighborhood in which those events occurred, who has not sympathized with Pi-a-pot and admitted that, however wrong-headed and cantankerous the chief may have shown himself on other occasions, he is, in this instance, the injured party. We have returned to the matter because it is of the first importance that the record of last winter's treatment of the Indians should be thoroughly examined, and such measures taken as will render the recurrence of such scenes impossible."

Commissioner Irvine in his report of 1882, says :

" For a considerable time they made no demand for aid from the Government, but as the cold weather came on being very poorly clad and insufficiently supplied with food, they experienced much hardship from exposure and starvation."

Mr. Jackson, in his speech to which I have already referred, said :

" Now, I charge that at Indian Head, in the winter of 1883, several of the Indians died of starvation. When I stated that fact, I knew it to be a fact. The Lieutenant-Governor in his reply to me, brings a lot of documents, and the report of Dr. Edwards says that five men starved to death. Mr. Dewdney said there was so much provisions at Indian Head. I know they were there; but his fiat had gone forth not to feed them so much, that Pi-a-pot was a bad piece of muslin, and that they must cut down the rations. And now, instead of five dying, it is a matter of my own knowledge, a matter I can prove on oath, that instead of five dying there, 10 per cent. of all the Indians on the Indian Head reserve died through starvation in six months (that is 20 per cent. per annum). He became very anxious about the File Hill Indians. What has he done with them because of their turbulency, because they showed a disposition, perhaps, to rise up and join the Indians of the north in fighting? He has reduced them at the present time to that state that in the case of one Indian (I am prepared to prove this and to give the name of the man too), within two months seven of his children died because they had not the necessaries of life. I tell you what I know to be a fact. The Indians on the File Hills reserve believe that if one of their number falls sick there is no use in trying to make him get well, they have not sufficient nourishing food and they must let him die."

This policy of starvation was adopted by the Agent General of Indian Affairs six years ago. It is a cruel and atrocious policy, it is a policy that ought not to prevail in any civilised country. Six years ago the Agent General of Indian Affairs openly and deliberately adopted this policy in the following language:—

" I must say, however, that it was a dangerous thing to commence the system of feeding the Indians. So long as they know they can rely, or believe they can rely, on any source whatever for their food they make no effort to support themselves. We have to guard against that, and the only way to guard against it is by being rigid, even stingy in the distribution of food, and require absolute proof of starvation before distributing it "

Sir, this policy was adopted six years ago, and it has been persisted in ever since. During the last four or five years this policy has proved to be a failure, but its failure taught the Government no lesson. The experience of the past, the reports of their own agents in the North-West Territories, taught hon. gentlemen opposite no lesson; the reports of the best of their officials transmitted to this Administration fell upon deaf ears. They neither opened their eyes nor unscaled their ears. They slumbered on from year to year, and even the unmistakable signs of the coming storm in the North-West Territory did not arouse hon. gentlemen opposite to a sense of the danger in which the country was placed. Last Session the Agent General of Indian Affairs used the following language:—

" When Louis Riel was sent for last summer he was sent for by these poor people suffering from hunger; because, while we went to a large expenditure in keeping them, we did not give them such a quantity of food as would make them hang around the different stations and become habitual beggars. We kept them on short rations, on short allowances, and we tried to force them—I am speaking now of the Indians—and we have forced them upon their reserves."

Sir, let me give you another piece of testimony upon this subject. Mr. Jackson says this :

"The Indians on the File Hill reserve believe that if one of their number fall sick there is no use in trying to make him get well, they have not sufficient nourishing food and they must let him die. The man I speak of came down to the fort the other day absolutely in rags, with his two squaws, and said to a man in Fort Qu'Appelle (I do not mention his name now, but at the proper time, if necessary, I can produce this man):—'What can I do for anything to eat? We are dying of starvation.' He was told:—'You had better go to Regina, and the Lieutenant-Governor may be able to do something for you.' ('Oh, oh.') The old squaw had an old piece of tea-chest wrapping, which you could throw hailstones through, to serve as a blanket. These are the wards of the Government! The man was so thinly clad that he was frozen below his knees, and yet he was going to Regina to try and move the heart of that man whose heart is stone—to move the heart of that man to give something to keep life in him. ('Shame.') Is such the proper conduct of the man who has charge of the wards of the Government? Why, he deserves to be hooted and hissed and driven out of the country (Loud cheers)."

One of the agents, Mr. Herchmer, writing upon this subject, says in his report for last year:

"During the winter I visited the Pas reserves a number of times and witnessed the actual condition of the Indians. For three months—January to March—many of those in the Pas Birch River and Pas Mountains suffered keenly. It was impossible to supply food as it was actually needed, for there was not sufficient in the district. Undoubtedly the amount of relief given last winter, though unprecedentedly large, has been the means of preserving numbers of these Indians alive."

They were suffering keenly, he says; there was no food in the district, simply because the policy of this Administration was a policy of reducing the Indians to submission by a policy of starvation. In the same report Mr. Herchmer says:

"About the same time an Indian came from the Pas Mountain, telling me of the privation from which the band were suffering and asking for relief, and further, that the Mountain Indians were suffering from want."

Mr. Pocklington, in his report, says:

"In January, while visiting the Piegan Reserve, I received a letter from Lieut.-Col. McLeod that 75 Stonies were in Pincher Creek in a starving condition. I started for their camp at once, and found them in reality starving, except for assistance given them by Col. McLeod and other residents."

Now, Sir, I submit that I have established beyond all controversy the charge I have made against this Government, that the Indians of the North-West Territories have been subjected to the greatest possible suffering, that the Government have permitted them to freeze to death and starve to death, and that in the midst of plenty, and with the bountiful donations of this Parliament for feeding and clothing the Indians. I go further than that, Mr. Speaker, I charge that last winter many of the Indians on the reserve at Indian Head were starved to death. I charge that Dr. Edwards, an employee of this Government, so reported to Commissioner Dewdney, and so scandalous and outrageous was the nature of that report, that Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney suppressed the original report, and it has not seen the light of day to this hour. I charge that this scandalous state of affairs was well known to this Administration, and that this is true is beyond peradventure, because I hold in my hands part of a speech made by Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney to the North-West Council during its last Session, as reported in the Regina Leader of the 10th December, 1884, in which he says:

"Shortly after they had taken up their residence on the reserve, hearing that there was a great deal of sickness in their band, we instructed Doctor Edwards, who was then in our employ, to make an inspection of Pi-a-Pot's people. In his report which I now have before me he states in these words, 'some of these Indians have died of starvation this winter. They were ill and could not eat the bacon and flour.'"

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, I ask this House of Commons, I ask the people of this country, if it is not a scandalous outrage that, right under the shadow of the vice-regal establishment at Regina, at Indian Head, on the borders of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Indians should have been allowed to starve to death during last winter, and that in the midst of plenty, with the enormous sums voted by this Parliament for the purpose of feeding and clothing the Indians. And yet we have it out of the mouth of Governor

Dewdney, and from the report of Dr. Edwards, employed by him to examine into the condition of the Indians, that many of the Indians on that reservation died of starvation last winter. I charge still further: That many of the Indians on the File Hills died of starvation last winter; that seven children of these Indians died of starvation within two months last winter; that those facts were made known to Commissioner Dewdney, and that he instructed the agent to go to the reserve and warn the Indians that if they disclosed to the public their misery, hunger and starvation their rations would be stopped. I challenge this Administration now to issue a commission to investigate the matter, to appoint a commission of sensible and honest men to investigate this whole question, and I believe that every statement I have made upon this subject is capable of the clearest possible proof. I say a Government which has so neglected the first duties of a Government towards its wards deserves condemnation, deserves the severest condemnation at the hands of the people of this country. That is not all. I say further, that the Indians, as I have shown, have been robbed, defrauded and swindled, frozen to death and starved to death, and yet we expect them to be peaceful, submissive, faithful and loyal subjects of the Queen. And that in the face of the statement of the Agent-General for Indian Affairs made in 1880 and re-affirmed in 1885 that the policy of this Administration was a policy of submission by a policy of starvation; and that in the face of the report of Agent Herchmer sent to the Department that a little starvation would do the Indians good; and that in the face of the declaration of Governor Dewdney that if they did not eat salt pork they might die and be damned to them. With this cruel and brutal treatment of the Indians, with this cruel and brutal report of agent Herchmer, and with the admission of Lieut.-Governor Dewdney, need anyone wonder that the Indians are dissatisfied and discontented. I should like to see the experiment tried on the officials of the Government; from the commissioner down to agent Herchmer, and from agent Herchmer down to the lower officials, and a little starvation might teach them common sense. A policy of fraud; a policy of violated treaties and broken promises has been tried in the neighboring republic for 100 years, and without success. It has been tried in this country for a number of years also without success, and it will be tried without success to the end of the chapter. The authoress of "One hundred years of dishonor," speaking of the practical results of this policy in the United States, says:

"The history of the Government's connections with the Indians is a shameful record of broken treaties and unfulfilled promises."

And then the authoress points out the result:

"Under all these conditions it is not a matter of wonder that the frontier was a scene of perpetual devastation and bloodshed; and that year by year there grew stronger in the minds of the whites a terror and hatred of Indians, and in the minds of the Indians a stronger and stronger distrust and hatred of the whites."

Then the authoress points out the true policy that ought to be pursued by a Christian Government:

"The reports are filled with eloquent statements of wrongs done to the Indians, of perfidies on the part of the Government; they counsel, as earnestly as words can, a trial of the simple and unperplexing expedients of telling the truth, keeping promises, making fair bargains, dealing justly in all ways and in all things."

Such have been the results of the policy pursued by the Administration. Hon. gentlemen have sown the wind and they must expect to reap the whirlwind. Nothing but discontent and dissatisfaction and rebellion could be expected from the course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite. This statement I propose still further to confirm by the evidence of Mr. McDougall, from whose statement I have already largely quoted. He says:

"I have thrown down the gauntlet," he replied. "If my letter is challenged I am prepared to substantiate every word of it, but not before it is contradicted. We have reached a certain crisis in the Indian question. There have been in the past grave irregularities in the Department, for exposing which I was denounced as a traitor and a liar, and brought twice before the conference of my church, but the verdict of the investigating committee always supported me. The Indians have been defrauded by the contracts not being carried out as specified in the treaty; and the Indian is being defrauded, and so is the Government, which is made to believe that the Indians receive a certain amount when they don't. But of course the Indian is the greatest loser."

Mr. Grier from whom I have already quoted says:

"That corruption exists is commonly reported and commonly believed. The fraud comes in by arrangement between the contractors and officials on different reserves. I can't give particulars. I know it exists. The money thus lost if expended on educating the young Indians would do a great deal of good. There is no use trying to teach the old, they won't learn."

This being the condition of affairs, one would naturally like to enquire into the expenditure of the enormous sums voted by Parliament to feed and clothe the Indians. It can be accounted for; a large portion of it can easily be accounted for. The Indian is charged with what he never gets; he is charged two prices for the articles he gets. He is charged with articles that ought not to be charged to him at all; he is robbed right and left by the officials and by the middle men, and that I propose to prove beyond possibility of dispute. The Indians, under Treaty No. 1, in 1833, 1834, 1835, according to the Sessional Papers, are charged with agricultural implements and tools, to the amount of $863.50; Indians under Treaty No. 2, $504.23; Indians under Treaty No. 3, $1,178.71; Indians under Treaty No. 4, $27,441; Indians under Treaty No. 5, $2,346; Indians under Treaty No. 6, $37,420.13; Indians under Treaty No. 7, $22,581.99. The Indians under those seven treaties are charged in those accounts, in three years, with agricultural implements and tools to the amount of $92,337.13. Now, Sir, according to the reports for 1886, the Indian population, resident on the reserves under Treaties Nos. 4, 6 and 7 was 12,102, and they had under cultivation 4,614 acres. It does appear to me extraordinary that an Indian population of 12,102 souls with 4,614 acres under cultivation would require agricultural implements and tools in three years amounting to the sum of $87,444. And you must recollect, Mr. Speaker, that this was not all, because they are charged with large sums in the year 1882. I say there is something rotten here. It is simply incredible, it is simply impossible, that these Indians ever required or utilised implements costing so much in so short a period of time. Now, let us take Treaty No. 4. According to the Sessional Papers for 1884, the Indians under that treaty numbered, in 1883, 6,886, little and big, old and young, men and women, and yet in three years they are charged with agricultural implements and tools amounting to $27,441. Did the Indians ever get those implements? I say they did not, or that if they did get them this expenditure was nothing more nor less than a scandalous and wilful waste of public money, voted by this Parliament to clothe and feed the Indian and keep him from starving or freezing to death. According to the reports, so far as I can discover, they had under cultivation, in 1883, 554 acres; in 1884, about 1,000 acres; in 1885, 1,590 acres, or an average of 1,000 acres in the three years; and yet, in these three years, for half cultivating 1,000 acres, they are charged with the sum of $27,441 worth of implements and tools. Take Treaty No. 6. It appears from the Sessional Papers of 1885 that the Indians under this treaty in 1884 numbered 6,673. Under this treaty the Government paid for implements and tools in three years for these Indians $37,420. There are not more than 500 able-bodied agriculturists in this band, and yet they are charged with this enormous sum. I say that 500 of the best farmers of Ontario who farm from 100 to 150 acres each, do not spend as much money in three years on farming implements and tools as we spent on this band of

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

Indians. Now, according to the Indian Report for 1886, the Indian population of the North-West Territories resident on the reserves, numbered 12,102, and they had under cultivation 4,614 acres, and to half cultivate this land the Government charge the Indian account in three years with $87,444 worth of agricultural implements and tools. All I can say, all that any man can say, on a subject of the kind is that these charges on the face of them bear the clearest possible evidence of fraud on the part of somebody. The Indians are charged with this sum; it is paid out of Indian moneys voted by Parliament, but I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to show that half these articles ever reached the Indians. Is it not the fact—I charge that it is the fact, and I challenge them to a scrutiny; I challenge them to appoint a commission or a committee of this House to enquire into the matter—is it not a fact that in one of the bands numbering 1,150 families, they are charged in one year with 1,160 hoes, and the very next year this same band is charged with 1,014 additional hoes. Is it not the fact—I charge that it is the fact—that one band received in one year 50 ploughs, 320 scythes, 320 hay forks, and the very next year this same band are charged with 63 ploughs, 63 harrows, 140 scythes and 140 hay forks; and the following year this same band is charged with $2,209 worth of ploughs, besides more scythes and hay forks, and $5,490 of implements under contract. Will any man tell me that these articles ever reached the Indians? I say it is an outrage on common sense and decency; I say it is quite impossible that they ever reached the Indians, and I say further that if they did receive them, it was a wilful misapplication of the money voted by Parliament for the purpose of supplying the Indians with the absolute necessaries for the cultivation of the soil. The Indian was robbed and the country was robbed, and the only men who profited by it were the agents and the middlemen. I say still further: In the Sessional Papers for 1884, No. 4, as showing the extraordinary kind of items that this Government charge to the Indian account, I find that K. D. Graham is paid the sum of $1,984 for medicines supplied to the Indians. That is not all, for there are several other men whose accounts are charged to the Indians for supplying medicine. I say that is enough to physic every Indian in the North-West twice over, and keep them physicked nearly all the year round. That is not all. In 1883 the Indian account is charged with $3,630 for commission paid to those pets of the Government, I. G. Baker and others, as commission for advances made to the Indians. I ask you, Sir, and I ask this House, when the Parliament of this country liberally donated $1,109,000 to feed, clothe and support the Indians, why we should pay the sum of $3,630 as commission to I. G. Baker and others for advances made by them. The Government had the money, Parliament voted the money, it was in their hands, and it was their business to supply the necessary funds to purchase supplies; it was their business to have bought the articles for cash, and to have paid for them instead of having the Indian account charged with this sum in one year as commission for advances. This is not all. In the account for 1883, the enormous sum of $26,312 is charged to the Indian account for the travelling expenses of the agents appointed by this Government over the Indians in the North-West Territories. And recollect, we supply these men with horses, buckboards, sleighs, and camping outfits and everything required for travelling; and yet there is this enormous sum of $26,312 charged in one year for travelling expenses. I tell you, Sir, and I say it without fear of successful contradiction, that every agent in the service, from the Lieutenant-Governor down to the humblest farm instructor, can travel in the North-West Territories from the 1st January to the 31st December, all the year round, and not spend $26,000. It is the cheapest country in the world to travel in. All you require is a few Indian ponies and a buckboard, and in the case of these agents these things are supplied. Out of this sum the Commissioner of Indian Affairs got nearly $2,000. In addition to that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs gets his camp outfit, his tent, his horses and harness, and everything that human skill and human ingenuity can devise as necessary for travelling on the prairie; and yet he draws nearly $2,000 for travelling expenses in one year. I say again, it is a gross injustice to the Indians that these sums, voted by Parliament to clothe and feed the Indians, should be wasted and frittered away. It is a still greater injustice that the men placed over the Indians should supplement their handsome salaries by all these casual advantages stolen out of the funds voted by Parliament to maintain and support the Indians. Let us see how much further this system is acted on to the injury of the Indian. The same scandalous expenditure is not for one year only; it continues from year to year. In the Sessional Papers of 1884, I find that the Indian account is charged with $2,836 for travelling expenses. By the same Sessional Papers, I find that I. G. Baker and others obtained $1,417 for commission on advances, which is charged to the Indian account. I find further, by the Sessional Papers of 1884, that the number of Indians in Treaty No. 6, in the year 1883 amounted to 6,639, and the Indian account is charged with having paid that number of Indians. I find by the Sessional Papers of the following year that the Indians in Treaty No. 6 were then said to number 8,157. In 1883 the Indian account is charged with a payment to 6,639 Indians, including chiefs and headmen. In the following year the Indian account is charged with a payment to 8,157 Indians, or an increase of 1,518 Indians, although it is clear that instead of there being an increase in that band, there was a decrease, and the concurrent testimony of all who know anything about it is that there was a decrease. There is evidently something wrong here which requires investigation, but which never was investigated. I find in the Sessional Papers of 1885 that all the items making up the sum of $17,670 are entered twice, I do not know whether they have been paid twice; all I know is that they are entered twice in the blue-books submitted to Parliament. Some of the items are worthy of the consideration of Parliament and the people of this country. I find that the Indian account of last year is charged with $10 paid to the South-West Stock Association as Mr. McHugh's membership fee. Will any one tell me why the Indian account should be charged with the cost of making Mr. McHugh a member of the South-West Stock Association? I find that Mr. P. G. Hallam was paid $5 for taking an affidavit. The fee in the Province of Ontario is only 25 cents. I find that $85 is charged for taking a threshing machine to Poundmaker's reserve, which is about half the value of the machine. It should not have cost more than $12 or $15. I find that P. J. Paterson is paid $5 for 50 pounds of flour. Everybody knows that in the markets of the North-West flour can be got for $5 a barrel. I find that the Indians are charged with $5,676 as one-third of the cost of the mail service. I ask why the Indian account should be charged with that? The mail service is necessary for the convenience of the white settlers, and ought to be charged to the ordinary fund, and not to the Indian account. It looks to me, on examining this account, as if the object of the Government was simply to spend the Indian funds in the interests of their friends. Last year the expenditure on Indian account was $1,109,604. Mr. Dewdney, in his report, says it cost $454,000 to feed and clothe the Indians. Will the hon. Minister explain to the House and the country what became of the other $645,000? If not, I will give some explanation. We paid Commissioner Dewdney a salary of $3,200, and if he were a good man, I would not object to that charge. We paid an army of officials of all kinds over $90,000. We paid the Tory press from the Ottawa Citizen down to the Montreal Gazette, $8,028, which is charged to the Indian account. We paid for agricultural implements and tools in three years, half of which the Indians never received, $92,337. The Indian account is charged with sums paid to Indians who were not in the band; it is charged with sums paid to Indians who never were in the band; it is charged with sums paid to Indians after they were dead and before they were born, as the following statement made by Mr. McColl in his report shows:

"One of the councillors having two wives is represented on the May sheet as receiving annuity in 1881, for a family of 11 including 2 infant children, whereas at the date of payment, only one of these children was born."

We pay for travelling expenses of the employees of the Government in the North-West in many cases more than their salaries amount to, and that in a country where all a man requires for travelling is an Indian pony and a buckboard. Some of the items that make up the accounts are curious, and deserve the consideration of Parliament. In one of the accounts I find that we paid J. Creighton for a silk handkerchief, 90 cents. Why should the Indian account be charged with the price of a silk handkerchief? If the Indians are starving to death, they do not require silk handkerchiefs. We paid Wm Williams for repairing boots, $7.75. We paid Mr. Laurie for football, $5. If they want to play football, let them buy their own football, and not charge the Indian account with it. We paid for a magic lantern, $81.15. We paid Louisier & Morin, for superintending Indians' fishing, $135.76. Will any man tell me why we should pay this sum for this service? I think the Indians know more about fishing than the Government or their officials do. The account was also charged last year with a payment of $453 for venetian blinds for the Regina Office. A more scandalous charge was never made than that. $153 for venetian blinds for a little office in Regina! I venture to say that there is not a gentleman's house in Ottawa where the venetian blinds cost $453. Let me refer to some other items that bear on their face indications of fraud on the Indian. Take the Indians under Treaty No. 4. They are charged with seventy-one yoke of oxen in three years. The Indians under Treaty No. 6 are charged, in 1883, with forty-five yoke of oxen; in 1884, forty-two; and in 1885, forty-two, or 130 yoke of oxen in three years. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to tell me why the Indian account should be charged in three years with 130 yoke of oxen under this treaty, although this band of Indians had not, so far I am able to judge, a thousand acres under cultivation? It is nothing less than a wilful waste of money. These 130 yoke of oxen cost the people of Canada $26,470; and many of the oxen were aged, crippled and unfit for work of any kind when delivered, so that in a year or so many of them died from old age, and such of them as did not die had to be sold or killed, as they were unfit for work. Francis Ogiltree, Indian agent, writing of the oxen supplied the Swan Lake band, says:

"The two oxen owned by this band are of very little use, as one of them is blind and the other one is very old."

A. Mackay, Indian Agent, speaking of the Berens River Band says:

"There are only one ox and one cow alive out of the seven supplied by the Department."

E. McColl, Inspector of Agencies, speaking of the Long Plain band, says:

"As the oxen are useless, one blind and one very old, they want the agent to be allowed to exchange them for others."

Thus two agents report the same thing. The truth of the matter is that the oxen, for which we paid this enormous sum, were so useless that they had to be disposed of within the year. The whole thing is an outrage Parliament should not tolerate. The Government should be held to a strict account, and I propose to hold them to a strict account, for this wasteful expenditure of public money. I find further that the Indian account is charged with payments to Mr. Baker of $95 each for three waggons, although I find that the Government could and did buy from other contractors better waggons at $57.50 each. In other words, the people had to pay, $37.50 more for each waggon than they were worth. There are still some items to which I would draw, Mr. Speaker, your particular attention. The Indian account was charged a year or two ago with still more curious items. Among them are a table cloth and a napkin for His Grace the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in the North-West, $6.70; for washing his blankets, $6.50; 150 yards of cotton, $21.20; 109 yards of cotton, $13.62; painting, varnishing and cleaning Government house carriage, $10; kitchen utensils, $37. Now, we pay Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney, as Lieutenant-Governor, $4,000 a year; we pay him further, as commissioner, $3,200 a year; and we pay him yearly for travelling expenses nearly $2,000; we supply him with other contingencies required for travelling, such as horses, sleighs, buckboards, &c., and surely he ought to wash his own blankets and varnish his own carriage, instead of charging these things to the Indian account. In 1882 the Indian account is charged for a horse for the commissioner, $160; repairs to harness, $18.25; sundry articles, of which the items are not given, $146.45; sundries again, $57.50; two other horses, $375; two other horses for the commissioner's interpreter, $165; two horses again for commissioner, $340; two horses for Mr. Wadsworth, $110. So that Mr. Dewdney, in that year, got from the Indian Department five horses for his own use that cost $775, every one of which was charged to the Indian account. Why, in the name of common sense, should Commissioner Dewdney get out of the Indian fund five horses in one year, costing the people no less a sum than $775. Mr. Wadsworth, who does a great deal more travelling and ten times the work that Mr. Dewdney does, got a span of horses for $110 or $55 each, while Mr. Dewdney's cost as high in one case as $170 each. In 1883, the Indian account is charged with another horse for Mr. Dewdney at $100, and again in the same year with a buckboard at $150. Now, I state here that there is not a gentleman in this House, who knows anything about the North-West Territories, but who will declare that a buckboard, fit for any gentleman to travel in, can be obtained there at from $40 to $60; yet the country is charged $150 for this one. Mr. Dewdney also got another buckboard, in that year, at $80, making two buckboards costing $230, which were paid for out of the Indian fund, and which were charged to the Indian account. In the following year, I find charged to that account, one set of harness for the commissioner, $35; another horse for the commissioner, $150; washing the towels of the commissioner, $6; 2 waggons and harness for the two inspectors, $528. I would like to know what kind of waggons were those two that cost $528? In that year again, there is charged to Indian account, one buckboard, $117; one waggon and harness, $100; and another buckboard, $115. In 1885, another buckboard is charged to Indian account at $125. In the report for 1886, the same account is charged with one mare for commissioner, $125; one pair of horses for Mr. McRae, $365; one buckboard for Mr. McRae, $90; one horse for Mr. McRae, $166; one sleigh for commissioner, $40. Why, every single thing is charged to the Indian account; yet Mr. Dewdney draws nearly $2,000 a year for travelling expenses. In the same year, we paid $1,192 to Baker & Co., and others, for advances made, and this same year $20,150 was charged to Indian account for travelling expenses. Among some of the items not open to discussion are the following: P. G. Williams, paid for travelling expenses from Piegan Reserve to Crooked Lake, $183; J. A. Hargrave, $125 for one desk for Winnipeg office. Can you imagine, Sir, the kind of desk that would cost $125 for an Indian office? My knowledge is too limited to enable me to grasp that great subject. Mr. Wadsworth was allowed $100 for a buckboard—$40 is the average price. I now come to a couple of other items, which will be found interesting. Three thousand nine hundred and forty-eight dollars is charged as spent on potatoes for one band of Indians, the Indians under Treaty No. 4. The Indians under Treaty No. 6, are charged with $473.87 for garden seeds in 1883; in 1884 the same Indians are charged with $742.89 for garden seeds; and in 1885, the same Indians are charged again with $310.78 for garden seeds, so that, in the three years I have given, these Indians were charged with $2,027 worth of garden seeds. I mean to say that the Indians never got these seeds to this extent, or if they did it was a scandalous waste of the public, or rather Indian, money. I mean to say, Sir, that $2,000 worth of garden seeds would seed every garden in the whole North West, from the western boundary of Manitoba to the foot of the Rocky Mountains, and then leave enough to seed part of the Province of Ontario. And yet these Indians were charged with $2,027 for garden seeds during the past three years. This item alone exhibits an extravagance, recklessness and waste on the part of the Administration, which is simply incredible. It is simply disgraceful that any Government should tolerate this condition of affairs for a single year, and the fact that this Government has tolerated it reflects no credit upon them. I have thus shown by evidence which cannot be contradicted that the Indian service in the North-West is filled with carpet-baggers and camp followers, with men incompetent to fulfil the duties they are called upon to discharge, with men of bad habits and worse morals, with men who minimise the truth, with men who yet have not been able to distinguish between meum and tuum. I have shown you that we have dealt harshly and cruelly with the Indians, that we have broken our solemn promises, that we have violated every line of every treaty that we made with the Indians, that we have permitted our agents and middlemen to rob and steal from the Indians, that our agents have allowed those Indians to be frozen to death and starved to death, and that in the midst of plenty. Sensible men, reasonable men foresaw long ago what would be the inevitable result of the foolish and mad policy pursued by this Administration towards the Indians, the policy of submission by a policy of starvation. Sensible men could see that the only ending would be that which was shown in the terrible outbreak of last year. Sensible men can see now that the condition of the Indians there requires the earnest attention of this Parliament. Is it possible to open the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite? I have almost despaired of it. The Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, in his report for 1886, says:

"The Indians who rebelled do not plead grievances in extenuation of their having done so."

I know that the supporters of the Government, in Parliament and out of Parliament, and the press supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, and all those who clamored for the blood of Louis Riel, in order if possible to increase his criminality, have declared that, had it not been for him, the Indians of the North-West would not have taken up arms. That is true in a sense and it is not true. It is true that the action of Louis Riel was the spark which fired the train, but I say the combustible material was there all the same. It slumbered for seven years, but it only slumbered. It is not true that the action of Louis Riel was the only or the main cause of the Indians joining their kindred, the half-breeds, in the recent insurrection in the North-West Territory. The Indian on the whole is a quiet, peaceable, law-abiding, loyal subject of Her Majesty the Queen, and it required a good deal more than the mad freaks of a lunatic to induce the Indians to take up arms against the sovereign power of this Dominion. I say that every man not blinded by party prejudice, every man whose eyes are open, or who is willing to have his eyes opened and his ears unstopped, must see that the policy, the avowed policy of the Administration and of their officials in the North-West had a great deal to do, had everything to do, with the outbreak of the Indians, and that that policy would sooner or later eventuate in an armed insurrection. The way to maintain the loyalty of the Indian is not by violating solemn engagements, not by breaking every treaty entered into with the Indian, not by unfulfilled promises made by the Government, not by cheating, robbing and swindling the Indians, not by cruel and harsh treatment, not by death from cold and starvation; and of all these things I charge that this Government through their agents have been guilty. I propose to read one or two other extracts to establish the proposition I have laid down. The Rev. John McLean, Methodist missionary to the Blood Indians near Fort Macleod, discussed the half-breed and Indian question in the August number of The Canadian Methodist Magazine. He says:

"The causes of the present discontent among the Indians are legion. Some of the men employed by the Department on the reservations have been granted their positions through political influence, even though they have been utterly incompetent for the respective duties of their office. They receive good salaries, and yet the Indians derive very little benefit from their services. Promises have been made to the Indians by Government officials that have never been kept. The Department has professed to give these people food enough to sustain them, yet at different times their rations have been cut down. They have been told that they were to remain on their reservations, but it was impossible for them to do so on their daily allowance. About a million dollars a year is now granted by the Dominion Parliament for the Indian service, but a high official in the North-West has stated that not one-fourth of this sum, or the equivalent of one-fourth, ever reaches the Indians. The money is filtered through the hands of jobbers, supply men, agents, and other speculators until the Indian's share is reduced to very little, indeed."

Archbishop Taché says:

"The Indians, who should have been cared for and protected by the Government, were 'left a prey to the seductions of men revoltingly immoral, and when this was pointed out the friends of humanity had another regret to register.' He alleges that in other cases 'the Indians were deprived of the pittance assigned to them, or it was given to them as if they were dogs!' They were too often deceived. At the risk of creating great surprise, I affirm that the massacres were not committed without previous provocation. I here invoke the testimony of one of the victims himself. The Rev. Father Fafard said, in conversation with another missionary, who in turn related it to me:—'Such a one (naming an official) acts with shameful brutality towards the Indians. He will be killed some day.' The person alluded to was killed, and two devoted missionaries increased the number of victims they were striving to protect. A gentleman whose veracity I cannot question assured me that some Indians had told him in 1884 that an individual, whom he mentioned, 'treated them like dogs,' and the same individual was killed by the Indians who had lodged the complaint against him."

Rev. Mr. McDougall says:

"We could not find, nor did we try to find, any excuse for the promises made but not fulfilled, for the cut-throat policy often exhibited and sometimes enforced by officials of the Indian Department, for the shameful and immoral lives of many of the employees of the same. Some of these were a disgrace to the lowest barbarism, let alone civilization. Nor how could we, when earnestly trying to teach Indians habits of industry and thrift, be expected to excuse the laziness and incompetency of many sent into the country to teach the wards of the Government those lessons we have been working for them to acquire for so many years. Moreover could we be blamed when we felt strongly that something was wrong in the system which allowed such men in its branch of the service. The inconsistency has oftentimes appeared to us very glaring when we looked at a department claiming to have a certain object in view, set aside by the country at large, whose servant it is, to attain this object, and yet within its own grasp and power doing those things and adopting those methods which are defeating their object. Very little rebellion in these men ten or fifteen years ago, and had the conduct of Government officials of every department sent into this country been such as to command the respect of the natives there would have been no rebellion on the part of the Indians last spring, nor would the smouldering influences thereof still rankle in the hearts of many. The same system is being continued without change. Not one of the officials complained of has been removed or interfered with. The Government have refused to accept advice from any quarter."

Mr. Jackson, in the speech from which we have already quoted, says:

"I heard some of the men say, who took up arms against the police to protect themselves (it was said before some responsible citizens of Fort Qu'Appelle): 'We had to do it or starve to death, and we preferred to die by the police bullets rather than die by starvation.'"

Instead of dealing fairly and honestly by the Indian, as we ought to have done; instead of maintaining unbroken our treaty obligations with the Indian, we pursued, and we still pursue that mad and reckless and inhuman policy of sub-mission by starvation. The Indian agent, in his report of 1883, speaking of Way-way-se-Cappo's and Gambler's bands, says:

"They have become particularly independent, and have undertaken to compel me to give them what they required. Gambler's band were also very independent, and did not sow much, as I refused to give seed wheat to those who received it last year and kept none for seed; consequently most of the others refused to take seed. However, both these bands can get work if they want it, and a little starvation will do them good."

I say it is worse than folly for the First Minister to say that the Indians who rebelled did not plead grievances in extenuation of their having done so. It is stopping one's ears; it is closing one's eyes; it is being wilfully blind to the evidence that is submitted to Parliament in almost every page of the reports of the Department of Indian Affairs and of the North-West Mounted Police. The hon. gentleman knew, the Administration ought to have known, the terrible experience of the neighboring republic with just such a policy; we ourselves knew from our experience and the reports of our agents in the North-West, what the effect of such a policy would be. But the Government may not be satisfied with the evidence I have given that broken promises, violated treaties, fraud and peaculation, starvation bordering on death, drove the Indians into the arms of the rebellious. I shall now submit a piece of evidence, the weight and authority of which even this Government will not question. The First Minister of this Dominion has over and over again declared in Parliament that Governor Dewdney was the best official in the whole North-West to deal with the Indians. I took, and still take, issue with the First Minister on that question. I say he is the most dangerous official that ever this incompetent and reckless Government appointed to fulfil any position of trust in the North-West Territories. But let us see what Governor Dewdney says of the Indians of the plains in connection with the insurrection. In his report for the present year he makes use of the following language:—

"The bands implicated in the rebellion were those of One Arrow, Beardy, Okemasia, and part of Petequakeys, in the Carleton district, and the whole of the Indians in the Battleford and Fort Pitt districts, excepting Moosomin's and part of Thunder Child's, the latter refusing to approach the rebel camps until starvation drove him and his followers to do so."

So, Sir, you have here, out of the mouth of the Lieutenant-Governor himself, the statement that these Indians refused to join the rebel camp until starvation compelled them to do so. You have the statement out of the mouth of the commissioner that starvation compelled the chief of this band, and the whole of his followers, to join the armed insurrection. The Minister of Justice told us not long ago, in his speech in Parliament, that:

"The man who undertakes in the North-West to incite the Indians to rise and commit war and depredations on the settlers, takes his life in his hand, and if he appeals to me for mercy he will get justice."

That sentiment was vociferously cheered by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I agree with that sentiment. It commends itself to my judgment; but I tell the Minister of Justice that if he is disposed to mete out merited justice to those who, by their misconduct, by their maladministration, by their incompetency and by their criminal neglect, provoked the Indian uprising, the hon. gentleman will sit alone upon the Treasury benches. There is nothing that hon. gentlemen so much fear as justice, that justice they will receive at the hands of the people of this country, if not at the hands of this Parliament. Sir, believing, as I honestly do, that the Administration of Indian Affairs in the North-West Territories has been harsh and cruel; believing, as I honestly do, that many of the officials appointed by this Government to administer Indian affairs are not only unfit for their position, but are men of bad character, and of worse morals; believing, as I honestly do, that the Indians have been robbed for years in the interest of the officials of this Government and the middlemen; believing, as I do, that the Government have, year after year, persistently refrained from investigating the complaints made by the Indians, and submitted to them by their own agents in the North-West Territory, and have kept incompetent and immoral men in the public service for a long series of years; believing that the Indians have been persistently robbed, cheated and swindled, and in many cases frozen and starved to death; believing, as I do, that the recent uprising of the Indians was the direct result of the maladministration and the incompetency of this Administration; that, in fact, the whole policy and the whole conduct of this Government, in the administration of Indian affairs in the North-West Territories, has proved disastrous in the past and is fraught with danger in the future, I beg to move the following amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—the administration of Indian Affairs in Manitoba and the North-West Territories under the present Government has been characterised by extravagance, mismanagement, incapacity and culpable neglect.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must congratulate the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat on the generosity he has shown this evening in bringing this motion on in the absence of the First Minister. The hon. gentleman knows that the First Minister has been kept away from this House several weeks by a severe illness. But he knows also, and was rejoiced to hear, that the First Minister had recovered somewhat from his illness, that he could already leave his house, and that there was a hope and a certainty that he would take his seat in this House in a few days. It would not have damaged the statements of the hon. gentleman had he waited for a few days until he could have made his charges against the First Minister in his presence. He knew perfectly well that the First Minister, being the head of that Department, was really the Minister who knew most about the figures and could answer all the charges in respect to the financial statements he made, and which, of course, the hon. gentleman thinks this House will take for granted. Well, Sir, I do not suppose that the large majority of this House will agree with the hon. gentleman in his statements, or that they will support him in these charges, when they know fully how the Department, presided over by the First Minister, has administered the affairs of this country. The hon. gentleman complains that the Government have expended too large sums of money in support of the Indians, in providing them with implements and provisions, and in supplying their wants. But I wonder what has happened to the hon. gentleman since last year. Last year he was in a different mood. Then, we did too much for the Indians, we fed them too much, they were spoiled children of the Government, and the Government were censured by him for taking such good care of them. These lazy Indians, as he called them, should be put to work, and the Government should cease to feed them out of the revenues of this country. The hon. gentleman, to day, has changed his mind altogether. He thinks that because he can pick up in the newspapers and in the reports of certain officials some complaints and individual charges he may make a charge against the

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

Government and its policy. He may accuse the Government of all the charges he has brought this evening. He may make against the First Minister all those charges; but the country will never believe and the House will never admit or believe that the First Minister of this Government and his colleagues have shown cruel treatment to the Indians. They will never believe that this Government, which has had the support of the country for the last eight years and has the support of the people to-day—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Hon. gentlemen may say "no"; but at the bye-elections during the last three years what has been the fate of hon. gentlemen and their party? Have hon. gentlemen opposite recruited their ranks at the bye-elections? On the contrary, have they not lost seats at those elections; and if they had the support of the country, as they claim, why would the people elect members to sit on this side of the House? No, the people of the country are in favor of this Government, and when the general elections take place they will demonstrate that fact, as they have done again and again. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to say that they are anxious to have a general election. That is said to keep up the courage of the rank and file of the party. They know perfectly well the answer the people have given at the bye-elections and that the same answer will be given when we again go to the people. We are not afraid to go to the people. We have shown that we are not afraid, and when we appeal to the country our conduct will be endorsed by an overwhelming majority in support of the Government.

An hon. MEMBER. Drummond and Arthabaska.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Hon. gentlemen dare not defend that election. Let it be scrutinised, and it will be made clear how they obtained a majority of the votes in that district. But at the general elections hon. gentlemen opposite will see whether Drummond and Arthabaska will give them a member to sit on their side of the House. The mover of the resolution has said that we have allowed Indians to be frozen to death or starved to death. If certain Indians have been frozen to death or starved to death, those were accidents such as have occurred in all parts of the world when food has been wanting. They were not the fault of the Government or the officials of the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh; but the time will come when they will not laugh so much as they laugh to-day. The provisions that were sent to those Indians were handed to them; but hon. gentlemen opposite know that you may give provisions to Indians to-day sufficient for two days, and within twenty-four hours they will all be gone. We do not propose to expend large sums of money to give them food from the first day of the year to the last. We must give them enough to keep them alive; but the Indians must, under the regulations that have been sanctioned by Parliament, go to their reserves and cultivate their land. They must provide partially for their wants. And therefore, if, by accident, an Indian should starve, it is not the fault of the Government nor the wish of the Government. The Government do not desire there should be starvation. On the contrary, every time when starvation has been feared we have taken means to give them fresh supplies; and the other day when the half-breeds were on the point of starvation, or in great want, the Government immediately issued an order to come to their relief. And if we do this for the half-breeds, and it is the proper thing to do, we will never refuse it to the Indians. The Indians of this country have been treated with the greatest possible care; they have been treated a great deal better than the Indians of the United States, though a much larger sum of money is annually expended there than in Canada. The hon. gentleman says that the Indians have been cheated and robbed. It is quite possible that Indians may have been cheated and robbed, but every time complaints have been made or complaints have come to the notice of the Government there has been an investigation into the matter in order that justice might be done. If an officer has acted badly he has been discharged.

An hon. MEMBER. How about Governor Dewdney?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is all very well to make charges against a man, as the hon. gentleman has made charges against the First Minister, behind his back when he cannot answer for himself. The hon. gentleman had no doubt in his pocket or his friends have in their possession other motions to propose, and why did they not take some other motion and give time to the First Minister to be here? No, it is much more convenient to attack the First Minister when he is away; but I hope there is a spirit of justice in this House that will show hon. gentlemen opposite that they selected their time badly, and that a large majority of the members will not allow the First Minister of the Crown to be accused of all crimes, except that of murder—but even as regards that the hon. gentleman said that the First Minister allowed Indians to be starved to death, and so the whole calendar has been traversed and even murder is charged against the First Minister. The hon. gentleman has gone further and said that the Indians have no faith in Governor Dewdney. This has been said by several persons in the North-West and elsewhere. I do not think they were very friendly to the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West. The Lieutenant-Governor may have his faults—every man has his faults—but to say that the Indians have no faith in him is a sweeping charge that could not be sustained on an investigation. I have seen the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West with the Indians, and while the First Minister was away in England I had an opportunity of seeing the reports that came from the North-West, and I found that whenever the Lieutenant-Governor visited the Indians he was well received by them and they showed they had confidence in him. The hon. gentleman brings here charges made by Mr. Jackson, a member of the North-West Council, against Governor Dewdney. Well, I do not suppose we should go into all those charges made by Mr. Jackson, but Mr. Jackson had the opportunity of meeting Mr. Dewdney face to face in the North-West Council, and Mr. Dewdney answered the charges made by him, and I think the explanations given by Mr. Dewdney were satisfactory, and that they proved that Mr. Jackson had gone too far or had been misinformed. But the hon. member read only the charges. He took great care not to read the defence of Mr. Dewdney. It would have been only fair to Mr. Dewdney that the answer should have been read. The hon. gentleman then goes on and he speaks of the charges made by the Rev. Mr. McDougall. He says that those charges were very grave, and that there has been no investigation. Well, Sir, these charges were made by Mr. McDougall, and if I am well informed, when Mr. McDougall was asked to particularise those charges, he declined to do so. If I am rightly informed the Government have taken care to have an investigation made so that the charges made by Mr. McDougall may be sifted. The hon. gentleman quoted from the Mail, of Toronto, and he will not, therefore, find fault with me if I quote from the same authority. The Mail says:

"It will be remembered that a special correspondent of the Mail, who took a tour during the winter amongst the Indians living south of the Canadian Pacific Railway, made public certain grave charges preferred against officials of the Indian Department and others by Rev. John McDougall, of Morley, the well-known Methodist missionary, and Rev. Mr. Trivett, a Church of England missionary amongst the blackfeet. The Indian Department at once instituted an enquiry."

Now, the hon. gentleman said the Government never enquired about any of these charges, that the Department remained silent, that they allowed these charges to be made and did not investigate them or take any steps to protect their officers against those charges. That statement is disproved; it is not the fact. Every time a charge was made which was not a mere vague assertion but a charge in which facts were advanced, the Department took care to have an investigation made. The Mail goes on to say:

"The Indian Department at once instituted an enquiry. Assistant Commissioner Reed being despatched to take evidence from the reverend gentlemen who made the accusations and from all who could throw light upon the subject. The Fort Macleod Gazette says Mr. Reed has 'gone straight to those who put forward the charges' of corruption and immorality, but those persons, when asked to give particulars, were unable to do so, nor could the commissioner discover any proof in any other quarter. Some who were examined 'supposed' that the charges must be true, 'because everybody said they were,' but no one could establish a single case. Mr. McDougall does not appear to have been examined yet, but Mr. Trivett was pointedly asked to substantiate his charge relating to a traffic in Indian girls, and failed. Immoral intercourse is no doubt carried on, but no instance of the actual purchase of an Indian girl could be found. Rev. Mr. McLean, the Methodist missionary at the Blood reserve, 'takes no stock in the clap-trap about the abuses practised upon the Indians by Government officials,' his opinion being that the agents are honestly endeavoring to do their duty."

This testimony of this reverend gentleman surely is as good as these charges made by anonymous writers in the newspapers, and by others of less value. The Fort Macleod Gazette says:

"No man should make a charge of fraud in any department of the Government unless he is prepared to prove that there is fraud, and to point out the guilty parties. It is not fair or just to place all the officials in any district under a cloud of suspicion because a man 'supposes' there must be fraud."

But according to the hon. gentleman, all the officials of Indian affairs, all the officials of the Government in the North-West, from Mr. Dewdney down to the last porter or messenger, are a band of robbers, a band of miserable men who should be dismissed. That is the sweeping charge he makes against all those officials, some of whom are most able, respectable and trustworthy men. Such charges I think should never be made, especially by a member of Parliament under his responsibility as such, and under the protection which he enjoys here as a member of Parliament.

"The reputation of an Indian Department official is probably quite as dear to him as to any of us, and there is no excuse for any one who sullies that reputation by mysterious hints of fraud and embezzlement, which exist only in the imagination."

Now let us go to Battleford:

"The Battleford Herald, another good authority on Indian affairs, thinks the story about the traffic in girls arose from the fact that according to Indian ideas marriage is simply a bargain and sale, and that the parents of a young woman are always on the alert to find a buyer for her. The buyers, as a rule, are men of mixed blood, half-breeds and the like. Now and then some degraded white man buys a wife in this way, but the Herald says it is a rare occurrence. Rev. Mr. McDougall's evidence is awaited with some interest. It is not to be supposed that he made charges without having proof in his hands, and if he can point even to a single black sheep amongst the officials he will receive the thanks of the country, for it is absolutely necessary, upon moral grounds and for the sake of peace in the North-West, that the Indian Department should be beyond reproach.

I say ditto. I say that is a proper sentiment, and the Government wishes that every charge of that kind, when accompanied by facts or statements, should be investigated, and I have no doubt the First Minister, when he hears of the charges made by the hon. gentleman, will see that such charges, as can at all be made the basis of an investigation, are investigated. The hon. gentleman speaks of the immorality, not only of the Indian agents, but he charges all the officials from the Lieutenant-Governor down to the lowest messenger or porter in the North-West. Without naming them, he also charges the Mounted Police with the greatest immoral conduct possible. The hon. gentleman says here is a book in which there is a statement of the diseases for which these men have been under medical treatment in that region. That may be so. I have no doubt that in that corps, as in every corps of the same kind, the same as in the Queen's troops, the regiments of the line, there will be immorality; and if any cases of that kind were brought under the notice of the Government in such a way as to make them proper subjects of investigation, I have no doubt that they would be investigated. But the hon. gentleman should not forget that the same state of things existed in these vast territories long before our time. If you look at one of the books of Sir George Simpson you will find that he states that at that period there was immorality amongst the Indians, and when you find that immorality exists in the centres of civilisation, how can you suppose, that amongst these savages, no immorality will be found? But he charges all that to the Mounted Police or the officials of the Government. I think it is very unfair that this charge should go abroad without contradiction or protest. But the hon. gentleman says that we, the Government, were all responsible for this; if a policeman or an official misbehaves himself as a private individual, he holds us responsible for that. Well, I must decline that responsibility. That soldier or that official, if he misbehaves himself as a private individual, must be personally held responsible for that; we have nothing to do with his personal conduct so long as it does not interfere with his official duties. But the hon. gentleman while so speaking, all at once perceived that the charges he was making might produce some effect in the North-West; and he exclaimed all at once: I would not be surprised if, at this very moment, we are on a volcano. The hon. gentleman should have reflected a little before he began his speech, and made these charges and tried to excite the Indians in the North-West. He should have remembered that an appeal having been made to these Indians by Riel, last year, produced the unfortunate insurrection which we all so much deplore; and these appeals of the hon. gentleman and these charges against the Government that we are culpable, that we have allowed the Indians to starve and to be frozen to death—these appeals are not calculated to keep the Indians quiet and to make them law-abiding citizens of the country. On the contrary, they are calculated to make these men feel that we must expend much larger sums of money in order to feed them, from the first day to the last day of the year—that they need not work—that we need not take any means to compel them to stay on their reserves. No; the hon. gentleman says, you must not diminish their rations; they must be fed as if they were working; though by reducing their rations you compel them to go on their reserves. How will you compel them to go on their reserves if you do not use some means of that kind? If they see that the Government are feeding them all the time, they will never go on their reserves or become civilised enough to work and to cultivate the soil, while the country will be obliged every year to spend millions of money to maintain them. I say that the policy of the Government, in compelling the Indians to go to their reserves is a proper policy. If you do not, by means of their rations, compel them to go on their reserves, how will you get them there? Will you send the volunteers of the country up to drive them on their reserves? No, that cannot be the desire of this House or of the country. Our desire is to treat the Indians well, to give them as much as is necessary to keep them from starvation, and to make them strong enough to work; but they must work and the sooner they understand that the Government will not keep them unless they go on their reserves and work, the better for them and for us. The hon. gentleman says that the hunting having failed, the Indians have been obliged at certain places to sell their horses, and are miserably poor. At another place, he says, they have been obliged to give large sums of money for cattle and implements. Well, the hunting grounds having failed them the Indians had to sell their horses, and I suppose the Government seeing that they had no horses had to give them others. With regard to their oxen, too, they worked on their land for a while, and then they killed their own oxen for food. The result has been that the Government had to expend another large sum of money to provide them with new cattle and new horses, and therefore it is not surprising that our Indian expenditure in the North-West should be so large. I do not say that there is not some abuse; most likely there is; it cannot be otherwise; but the moment the Government lay their hands on an abuse, the moment they see that they are cheated and that the money is not properly expended, of course the Government applies a remedy, and sees that the money goes to the proper object for which it is voted. I am not here to say there have been no abuses; I have no doubt there have been some; and if a charge were brought against a particular official, we would be prepared to put that official on trial and see whether he was guilty or not. But to make a charge, as some of the newspapers do, by saying that everybody says so, that the Indians are suffering, is unfair. But let it be stated that such a band was suffering on such a day, or that the missionary visited the band and found that it was so, and then the Government will be in a position to investigate the case, and would do so. The hon. gentleman also says—and it is a most odious charge against the Government—that the policy of the First Minister, the head of that Department, is one of starving the Indians—that we adopted that policy six years ago, and that it was followed by the Agent General of Indian Affairs, he meant the Superintendent of Indian Affairs. The hon. gentleman knows that this is a charge that has no foundation in fact. He knows perfectly well that the First Minister is not a man to act cruelly towards the Indians. The First Minister has never shown any such propensity or desire. He has always shown the greatest care towards the Indians, and has taken their part on every possible occasion. When he saw that Parliament had not given him the necessary funds and that a larger sum was required during the recess, he did not hesitate to ask for the Governor General's warrant for the balance, though it was a large sum, and then come down to Parliament and state that the sum voted was not enough, that the Indians were starving, that their wants were greater than we had foreseen, and that we had to come to their relief to the tune of $200,000 or $300,000 or $400,000; and Parliament assented to it, because Parliament had the same desire as the First Minister, that is, to relieve the Indians and try to prevent them from starving. The hon. gentleman charged us with being extravagant, with having mismanaged affairs, and with having shown incapacity and culpable neglect. Well, I deny these charges; I deny them on the part of my absent colleague and leader, the First Minister. I deny them on behalf of the other Ministers, his colleagues, and myself, and I do not think my denial will be disallowed by those in whose name I refuse to admit these charges of the hon. gentlemen. I say I repel these charges on behalf of the Conservative party in this House; I say the hon. gentleman will not persuade the country to believe that this Government, which the people have supported for the last eight years and which they intend supporting for another eight years, is an extravagant Government. If we have been extravagant, hon. gentlemen opposite are as guilty as we, because they never charged us with extravagance before this evening. They charge us with mismanagement of Indian affairs. The hon. gentleman has worked for the last five or six weeks, ransacking all the blue books he could find, selecting special items from them and bringing them together, clubbing together three, four or five years of items carefully selected out of the immense sums that have been expended by the Government. I have no doubt that if we took the Public Accounts for the five years, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, and find out year by year the amount they expended for Indian affairs, or under any other head, we would find also large sums of expenditure; but this is not a fair way of attacking the Government. The fair way is to bring one charge at a time, and let us investigate that charge. But the hon. gentleman spoke for two hours as fast as he could, charging the Government under every possible head, and then concludes by saying: You are extravagant, you are incapable, and you have shown culpable neglect. I again deny the charge; and I have no doubt that when the vote is taken, this House will show that it does not sanction the charge. This House will say: The Government we have supported for the last eight years, the Government which has been supported by the people for that time, has still the confidence of the people, and we do not consider it an extravagant Government. This House will find that the Government is managing the affairs of the country with due regard to the interests of the country; that we have not shown incapacity in our management; that the people have shown they have confidence in our capacity by maintaining us for the last eight years in office. We have done our best. I have no doubt there may be some officials who have mismanaged affairs in the North-West; but whenever we find out any mismanagement, we cause an investigation to be made, and every time we find an official who does not do his duty, or who is guilty of mismanagement in the North-West, against the authority and against the instructions of the Government, that officer is punished accordingly. I leave to others now to answer the hon. gentleman, if another answer is required.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It will not be necessary for me to detain the House at any length as the very strong speech by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), backed by the facts and the figures which he gave, remains practically unanswered. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat seems to have contented himself with defending the Government simply by boasting of their strength in the country. He seems to have contented himself by simply relying on the statement that my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron) had been guilty of something that was reprehensible in introducing his motion at present. He has told us, what we all regret to know, that the First Minister is incapacitated by illness from being in his place, and he was pleased to taunt my hon. friend with a desire to introduce his resolution while the First Minister was unhappily in that condition. I think that was rather ungenerous on the part of the hon. gentleman. No one would seriously believe, not even the hon. gentleman himself, that the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) is afraid to formulate any charges he conceives it his duty to make, in the presence of anybody, and I am sure it would have afforded my hon. friend greater pleasure to formulate his charges while the First Minister, who has more particularly charge of the affairs of the Indian Department, was in his place, than to be obliged to formulate them in his absence. I think that the First Minister would not have adopted the line taken by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken on his behalf to-night, he would not have asked that public business should stand still because he was unable to take part in it. I think he would have had a higher opinion of the members of his Cabinet. I believe he would have said: I am surrounded by capable men, men whom I have selected from the flower of my party to associate with me, and in whom I have implicit confidence; they will have sufficient knowledge of the general working of all the departments to be able to answer anyone who will prefer charges and substantiate them, after diligent search and enquiry through the books with which the Government themselves have furnished the House. I, therefore, have no faith in the argument put forth by the hon. gentleman. The argument that consists simply of the proud boast that the present Ministry have had the confidence of the country during the past seven years, and will have it in the future, seems to me scarcely to answer the different concise statements put forward by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). I do not know that it is necessary to allude to the idle boast made as to the position the Government hold in the country and the probable result of another election. The Minister has been pleased to tell us that the Government were ready at last election, that they were not then afraid but were prepared and willing to meet the people, and that they will be prepared also when the next one comes. We recognise that to be a fact. They were fully prepared at the last election, they had done everything to fortify themselves by means of the Gerrymander Act; and that they will also be prepared the next time is evident because their revising officers have completed their work so far as they have been able to complete it. It is not an answer to specific charges, backed up by statements and figures from the blue books, to say: We have done everything well, and when we appeal to the country you will find such to be the case. Without desiring to be unduly harsh on the Department of Indian Affairs or on its officers, the Opposition have a duty to perform, and that is to examine into the way the affairs of the country are conducted; and I think gentlemen opposite, even those independent members among them, even that hon. gentleman who manifested his independence to so remarkable an extent that he was willing to call in the members after the charge had been made and not one word had been said in reply or in rebuttal by anyone on the Government side. Or with that other equally independent member who, before you, Mr. Speaker, could read the motion, after listening to the indictment and not hearing a word of denial or refutation, was pleased from his place in the House to cry "lost." I think even gentlemen manifesting as much independence as these will admit that there is a duty devolving upon the Opposition, and that if the Opposition makes statements which are not correct in point of fact, and adduce incorrect evidence in support of them, that should be pointed out. That has not been done up to the present time. The hon. gentleman has stated that those who will follow him will be able to deal with the matter in that light. I had prepared myself to reinforce many of the statements made by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), but, in view of the statement of the hon. gentleman, the House will no doubt consider it to be my duty to abstain from doing so under the present circumstances, inasmuch as the charges which have been made remain unanswered and it is therefore unnecessary to reinforce them. I point out that the hon. member for West Huron has taken his facts from the blue books. It is true that he has fortified himself by statements made by parties outside of the House, but I ask if the authorities that he has used are not gentlemen to whose words some importance ought to be attached. He has quoted statements of the Rev. Mr. McDougall, the Rev. Mr. Robertson, and the Rev. Mr. Trivett, and other gentlemen of the like standing. They affirm these matters, and they re-affirm them, as in the case of the Rev. Mr. Robertson, only a few days ago, when his statements were contradicted, and he in plain and emphatic language re-affirmed his previous charges. I have the extract under my hand in which that gentleman re-asserts what he had stated previously. I will read a sentence or two to show that he is prepared to abide by the statement he has previously made. The Rev. Mr. Robertson, taking cognisance of some statements made by a gentleman in contradiction of what he had stated, says:

"Mr. Andrews asks, where are the Indians starving, searching refuse heaps and swill barrels, and ravenously devouring crusts of bread and scraps of meat?—At Minnedosa, Birtle, Broadview, Fort Qu'Appelle, Prince Albert, Battleford, Moose Jaw, Medicine Hat, and the rest, I have seen them doing this. It might have been because they were very curious or preferred dirty crusts and decaying meat to tender, well bled beef, but I did not think of accounting for their action that way. I know the eager look, the shrunken form, and the wolfish face that speak of want in the adult, and the wan, pinched face that speaks of starvation in the child; and I have seen them near Fort Ellice, Fort Pelly, the File Hills, and other places, and have had my sympathies drawn out towards the owners. I have seen Indians eating horses that had died of disease, when the flesh was half rotten. I have seen them picking up the entrails of animals about slaughter houses—when these entrails were fast decomposing—aye, and eating them without cooking, or even washing. They may prefer such carrion to good beef, well bled and cool when killed, but I doubt it."

That is the statement of Mr. Robertson, reiterated as late as this month, to which he attaches his name in the public prints, in reply to the question which one who had questioned his previous statements asked. He points to the fact which the member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has pointed to, that, in the documents which the Government themselves have submitted to the House, there are evidence of want and destitution among the Indians; and the hon. Minister says he does not doubt that there have been cases in which there has been a misappropriation of funds—perhaps that is not the term he used, but at all events irregularities and transactions that were blameable. What we have a right to expect is that that should not go on year after year. If that thing was found in 1881, and was repeated in 1882, as the records will show, and was repeated in 1883, as the record will show, and was repeated in 1884, as the record will show, and was going on in 1885, as I believe I can find inferential testimony, if not direct testimony, in the report of this year to show, I ask if the Government were not blameable in not instituting more rigid enquiries and taking more decided steps to prevent these abuses. I moved the other day for a return in reference to a report of experts to whom samples of flour supplied to the Indians has been submitted, having ascertained from previous enquiry that there were such reports in existence. The report was brought down, and I find that one of the medical attendants of the Indians under Treaty No. 7, reports that the flour supplied to the Indians there was unwholesome and unfit for human food, and, still more, that it was the cause of the death of a large number of those Indians. Is not that a serious charge? How was the gentleman dealt with who had that in charge? Let me read what Dr. Girard says in reference to the matter. I quote from the report, which is dated Fort Macleod, 6th November, 1883:

"Sir, After my visit to the Piegans I left for the Bloods, who were anxious to see me, for the sickness was raging among them, the same sickness as at the Piegans and Blackfeet, but not with the epidemic form.

"I visited their camps and some of their lodges, saw their sick, and gave near 200 prescriptions.

"Besides the common ailments in the last days I was there, I found many cases of bronchitis, caused by exposure to cold weather and want of good shoes for the rainy season.

"Since the 27th September over twenty deaths occurred on that reserve, and most of them from the same complaints—erysipelas, swelling of the glands of the neck, dyspepsia, &c.—on all the reserves. Except at the Stoneys, I found the houses of the Indians too close one to the other, and on the first occasion I will advise them to pull them down another year and to leave a space of about 100 feet or more between each house.

"The beef issued is of first quality, but the supply of flour is very poor and of bad quality.

"The instructor told me he used some and the dough, though prepared with hop yeast, makes a poor and doughy bread. The quantity now on hand will last till May or June next. I pity them."

Here were those Indians supplied with flour which was unfit for human food, and living upon that had brought upon them sickness, and there was a sufficient stock in hand to last from the date of that report, in November, till the June following, and the medical attendant who stated this adds: "I pity them." Now, I cannot go over the whole return, but I will read part of a memorandum submitted by the Deputy Minister to the First Minister with reference to this subject, in which he gives the analytical report of the flour supplied to these Indian. The memorandum reads as follows:—

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

"In connection with the report of Dr. Girard, the medical attendant upon the Indians interested in Treaty No. 7, North-West Territories, to the effect that he considered the sickness that has prevailed among these Indians during the past year, which resulted, in many cases, fatally, attributable to the quality of the flour, the undersigned begs to report that he has obtained samples of the flour delivered by the contractors at the Blackfoot Crossing and the Sarcee Reserve, and has submitted them for test to experts in this city."

The result of the analysis of those samples of flour is as follows:—

ANALYTICAL REPORT.

"1st. Sample of flour from the Blackfoot Crossing. This sample marked No. 1 is not sound and should not pass inspection for grading. Either the wheat has been full of weeds, or the cleanings of the wheat have been ground into the flour; as there is a strong smell and taste of cockle, tares, &c., in it. We think there is frozen wheat in it also, but would not say positively. We do not consider this flour wholesome, and cannot put a price on it.

"2nd. Sample of Indian flour from the Sarcee Reserve, branded"—

It is better not to give the name of the brand nor the names of the contractors as, if I did that, I should have to read their correspondence with reference to that subject, and I do not wish to weary the House by so doing.

"This sample marked No. 2 is the lowest grade of flour, and is known by the trade as 'Red Dog.' Its value in Ottawa is about $1.25 per 100 pounds, compared with superfine at $2.25, or Strong Bakers' at $2.75 to $3 per 100 pounds. It is just one grade above mill feed."

Now there is a report upon the flour that had been supplied to these Indians, from experts in the city of Ottawa to whom the samples were submitted, after there had been a report from the Government's own medical officer that men had died because of this unwholesome flour. Is there not some neglect here? How did such flour come to be? The price asked for was for good flour, and here one of the grades is given as wholly unfit for human food, and the other grade is described as just one grade above mill feed. Those who are acquainted with the different kinds of flour will know what this "Red Dog" flour is, and it is reported to be just one grade above mill feed. Now, what did we pay for this flour?—for that question comes in. The Minister who just spoke said the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) was on a different track last year, that he was then finding fault with the money that had been paid for supplies for the Indians. I think he did not do him justice there. I think the members of the Opposition have not objected to grants to destitute and starving Indians. But what they complain of is that the money that has been voted by Parliament has not been used to the best advantage, but that in many cases it has been frittered away, and as we think we are warranted in stating, that it has even been misapplied in some cases. The memorandum states that the contractors, whose names I do not mention now, which are mentioned here however—

"The contractors ——— were, under the contract, to deliver flour, equal in quality to No. 1 superfine, Toronto inspection; and they have been paid for doing so on the certificates of the agents in the following quantities, and at the following rates: 1,755 sacks, at $8.25 per sack, Blood Reserve."

That is a sack of 98 pounds net, $8.25.

"1,225 sacks at $8.25, Piegan Reserve; 2,113 sacks, at $7.50, Blackfoot Reserve; 266 sacks, at $8, Sarcee Reserve. The total quantity delivered, and paid for at the above rates, was 5,359 sacks of 98 pounds each net; and this Department has been informed that this supply will be sufficient until the end of the present fiscal year, so that the whole quantity required for Treaty No. 7, has been supplied by Messrs. ———, of the inferior quality above described, for which they have received first-class prices, as also shown above, the whole amount paid them being $41,683."

Mr. MITCHELL. Let us have the name.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman has asked me for it, and I will give it, but in doing so, I will be bound, in justice to the contractors, to read what they have to say hereafter, and which I did not wish to do in order to save time. The name is I. G. Baker & Co.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thought so.

Mr. GAULT. I hope that is the last contract they will get out of this Government. I know the greatest scandal ever committed in Montreal was committed by these people.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The testimony of the hon. member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault) is very valuable, for I understand him to allege that this firm ought never to have had the contract.

Mr. GAULT. The first contract was taken through the old Government.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Still, they were entrusted with furnishing the supplies after very strong evidence had been given against them, and I think, if the hon. gentleman looks through the Indian Department accounts, he will see, year after year, enormous sums of money paid to this firm. Now, I need not read the whole of it, in which the Deputy Minister brings before the Minister the fact that while they have the remedy in their own hands, as they have the unpaid vouchers of this firm in their hands, they may make a reduction on that flour and keep that out. And he points out the fact that many lives have been lost which, he truly says, are above all monetary considerations, and which cannot be offset by any deductions that might be made, however, the funds of the Department might be saved, in taking that legitimate course.

Mr. BOWELL. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask whether that return from which he is now reading, does not prove that the moment this irregularity took place the Government took the most active steps to prevent it in future, and to punish those, as far as possible, who committed it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am coming to that. I know that the Government took steps to see that the money—

Mr. BOWELL. To investigate the whole thing.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes, and the money was refunded.

Mr. BOWELL. We could not have had that analysis if the Government had not taken steps immediately to rectify the wrong.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am not denying that. The Minister of Customs surely would not lead us to infer that the Government could be so totally insensible to their duty as that after a medical attendant had reported to them that men were absolutely dying because of the bad quality of the flour, they should not have taken some action.

Mr. BOWELL. The whole gravamen of the charge brought against the Government is, that they did neglect their duty in not looking into it.

Mr. MITCHELL. But the Government continued to give contracts to the same men for the same things afterwards. That is the point.

Mr. BOWELL. Not since that was done.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the gravamen of the charge lies as well in this direction, that the Government have maintained persons in their employ in the North-West who have evidenced by their past conduct that they are not worthy of the position that they hold.

Mr. BOWELL. That is one of the charges.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Now, in this very report, this Denny is said, in the memorandum, to have certified to this account, and he is blamed by the deputy to the First Minister here, but I am not in a position to say whether Mr. Denny was punished or not. But this I do find, that his name appeared in the pay list of 1884, but I do not find in the pay list of 1885, whether he is in the employ of the Dominion Government. Could the Minister of Customs tell me if he is?

Mr. BOWELL. I could not tell you.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does the Minister of the Interior know?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) I know nothing about it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I can only say that I found his name in the Indian report of 1884, and his salary up to March, 1884, but I do not find him in 1885. I hope, for the credit of the Government, that he has not been taken on in some other capacity, because he certified to this flour. But you will see, from reading through this report, what I. G. Baker & Co. say with reference to this flour, and what the agents of the Government state in reference to it. In reply to a letter from the Department of the Interior, I. G. Baker & Co. say:

"Referring to the papers you allowed me to peruse to-day respecting a report of Dr. Girard that the flour supplied by our firm to the Indians in parts of Treaty No. 7, being inferior and injurious to the Indians, we beg to say that the flour referred to was purchased by us from the well known milling firm of"—

I leave that blank unless I am to read their letters also—

"Winnipeg, and is of better quality than that eaten by the majority of the people in the North-West."

An hon. MEMBER. Name, name.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Well, it is Ogilvie & Co.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let us have the whole of it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) will have to share with me the blame of making a longer speech than I intended. It continues:

"It is not possible that frozen wheat was used in the manufacture of this flour, as it was supplied before the autumn frosts. It is the same brand of flour we supplied at Fort Walsh last winter, of which no complaint was made.

"I would call your attention to the statements of Agent Denny and Sub-Agent Pocklington, contained in the papers. Agent Denny says the flour could not be better. Pocklington says the cause of the sickness could not be poor flour, that it was as good as that used last winter; and, if flour was the cause, why were they not sick at other agencies? or words to that effect."

I have said I fail to find Mr. Denny's name in the accounts of 1885, and therefore in my mind I gave credit to the Government for having removed him for reporting favorably on such flour as that proved to be. But I find Mr. Pocklington's name in the accounts of 1885; he is the agent of the Government at the present time, this gentleman that the firm of I. G. Baker & Co. used as an agent to prove that the flour which spread disease and death among the Indians of the North-West was pure flour. I ask are the Government maintaining a gentleman like that in their employ? If they are how can they justify themselves in that regard? The document goes on to say:

"Dr. Girard's report is not so much against the flour as the bread, and he recommends the issue to the Indians of baking powder."

I suppose, from that statement, that there must be another letter from Dr. Girard which has not been brought down in the papers, or at least I have not been able to find it, because from the letters nothing appears to have been said about baking powder. It continues:

"It is difficult to make bread without leaven of some kind, an article which the Indians seldom have to use, and their bread is simply flour and water mixed, fried in a frying-pan with tallow or grease of any kind they can get.

"I think that the trouble complained of by Dr. Girard, is the result of the changed mode of living of the Indians; while roaming on the prairie, hunting and exercising, their stomachs could digest, without inconvenience, the indigestible fried bread that they make, but now they are on their reserves, with comparatively little exercise, and eating it daily, it is not to be wondered at that they suffer from eating indigestible food.

"The issue of baking powder would, we feel certain, remedy the trouble, that, however, would become a very expensive item, and, I think, by keeping at the agency a supply of hop yeast, or furnishing them soda or some inexpensive leaven, that you will hear no further complaints about the flour.

That is the idea this gentleman had as to the article which was spreading disease and death among the Indians. He reports: The flour is all right; if the Government would only give the Indians a little soda, matters would be satisfactory. Now, the Government might have spared some soda, if that was all that was necessary. We read further:

"I ate bread made of the same flour during my stay at Calgary in October last, and it was sound and sweet and good baker's bread.

"I trust this explanation will be satisfactory, as we aim and do furnish goods equal and better than the samples we tender on.

"Begging a reply to-day, if practicable, as I have important business to settle with the Canadian Pacific Railway in Montreal, and cannot well return.

"I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

"Your obedient servant,

"W. G. CONRAD,

"Of I. G. Baker & Co."

That is what he said in regard to the flour. Having mentioned the name of the milling firm it would not be right if I did not read the letter of the milling firm with respect to this same flour; because however much we may find fault with the Department, I hold that we have no right to do injustice either directly or indirectly to business firms in the country. I shall therefore read the statement of the milling firm with respect to this flour. Messrs. Baker had written to O'Gilvie & Co. with respect to it, to which the latter replied:

"MONTREAL, 17th May, 1884.

"Messrs. I. G. Baker & Co.,

"GENTLEMEN,—Yours of the 14th to hand, referring to the flour we delivered during the season of 1883. The superfine you ordered from us for the Indian Department was equal to the Toronto standard of superfine, and sound when it was shipped. When we were informed last month that complaints were being made of the quality of the flour, we sent one of our best men as far west as Calgary to enquire into it. He examined the flour at Indian Head, Blackfoot Crossing and other places. He reports our flour all right except what was damaged by exposure. He complained of the storehouses in which it was kept not being suitable to keep flour. One place in particular, he saw a lot of our flour out of condition from the dampness in the building in which it was stored. We were so particular in the delivery of this flour, the quality asked for, namely, Toronto superfine, being low, that we frequently had bread baked from it and submitted to your agent, Mr. Howard, at Winnipeg, which was accepted as satisfactory. We are also aware that Messrs. Langdon & Shepard, contractors on the C.P.R., borrowed two car-loads of this flour from your agent, and used it for themselves and were satisfied, when the flour they generally used was strong baker's. Not having heard any complaints of this flour till quite recently, we think it must come from what has been injured from exposure, and certainly we are not responsible for it. And, moreover, the grade asked for, namely, Toronto superfine, is a low grade flour and not suitable for the requirements. Our man also informs us that he consulted Mr. Reed, of the Indian Department, at Regina, and he expressed himself satisfied that we were in no way to blame, so we hope this explanation will be satisfactory.

"Yours truly,
(Signed) "A. W. OGILVIE & Co."

That is what the milling firm say for themselves, and it is said that in addition to Denny and Pockington reporting on the flour Mr. Reid, assistant commissioner, expressed himself satisfied that they were in no way to blame. But what were the facts in regard to the matter. There is a report from Mr. Wadsworth; he alluded to the letter of the milling firm as a letter written with a view of setting themselves right. If I could find the document, I would read it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I hope the hon. gentleman will read Mr. Wadsworth's letter, because it is one which will have great weight with hon. members.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have it here. It is a report from Mr. Wadsworth, addressed to the Department of the Minister of the Interior:

"200 SIMCOE STREET,
"TORONTO, 25th January, 1884.

"L. VANKOUGHNET,
Deputy Supt.-Gen. of Indian Affairs.

"SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 8533, dated 23rd instant, and in reply beg leave to state that the amples of flour forwarded to you by the Indian Commissioner were handed to him by myself having procured them during my inspection.

"Preparatory to making a report to the Department, I wrote the Messrs. Ogilvie regarding this flour, knowing that they had supplied the contractors, and being branded with their mill brand, a copy of which letter I herewith send you, also their reply to the same; their letter is evidently written to protect themselves."

What was the remark I was trying to recall. I do not know whether hon. members want to hear the balance.

Mr. O'BRIEN. We do.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The letter continues:

"In taking stock of the flour upon the different reserves in Treaty No. 7, it was necessary to handle most of it, as the different stores had to be emptied and then carried back again; I may therefore say that it all came under my immediate notice.

"I was satisfied that the flour upon the Blood and Piegan reserves was of fair quality and filled the spirit of the contract, although I came upon an occasional sack that was inferior, but they would not amount to one per cent. of the whole; the weights were also satisfactory, more sacks weighing over 98 lbs. than under. There was also a few sacks of 'sour' flour at these points (this was old stock), but this is the natural consequence of keeping flour through the summer.

"The flour at Blackfoot Crossing was similar to the sample I brought down (that submitted to Thos. McKay & Co.), with the exception of some Montana or American flour (say 200 sacks) left over from last spring, having been stored in the back part of the building and could not be got at until I had this removed.

"My opinion of this (like sample) flour is that it is barely No. 1 superfine, and that there is some frozen wheat in it; I do not consider it unwholesome; the white men on the reserve were using it and did not complain; I ate some of it (bread made from it) and found it palatable.

"Compared with No. 1 superfine at $2.25 per sack, I consider this worth $2.10—two dollars and ten cents.

"With regard to the sample from the Sarcee reserve, I agree with the opinion expressed by Messrs. McKay.

"I do not think the flour has been the cause of the disease lately epidemic amongst the Indians of this district.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"T. P. WADSWORTH,

"Inspector of Indian Agencies, &c."

Mr. SPROULE. That is from a practical miller.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I did not know the gentleman and therefore I am not actuated by any malice in the matter. I notice that he gives his opinion with reference to the effects upon the constitution of the Indian of this flour, against that of the medical gentleman who testified that in his opinion it was injurious, and I would submit that a doctor, a licensed practitioner, would be better able to understand the effects of a certain article of diet upon the constitution than even a practical miller. He reported his views to the Department and they were so implicitly believed that the Deputy Minister made a memorandum to the First Minister in which he alludes to the loss of so many lives in the past, and for that reason I am unable to accept the opinion of Mr. Wadsworth in opposition to that of the medical gentleman. Now, if he was a practical miller, I suppose he would know that the supply of flour with the weeds in it as described by these experts, it certainly did not come up to No. 1 Superfine Toronto, and that the other which was somewhat better and still no better than Red Dog, would come within the category. He says himself that he wrote this milling firm because he was prepared to report to the Department that it was not up to the mark, and how is it that as I read to you, the 5,100 sacks were received and paid for by the Department. We know very well that the Indian Department are not in the habit of paying their accounts very quickly. That flour must have been in store and used for some time before, and yet it was paid for and there was enough left to be used for some time afterwards. It had received the approval of an agent named Pockington, who is to-day a servant of the Government. If he certified in ignorance that the flour was of that kind, if he did not know any better, I submit that he is not capable of discharging the duties of an agent, one of whose duties it is to see that the supplies given the Indians under his control, are right. With reference to Mr. Denny, I do not know whether he is now in the employ of the Department or not, but the fact that his name is not to be found in the blue-book would seem to show that the Government did themselves the credit of removing him. Some of the Ministers will perhaps be able to say whether that is the case nor not. Now, with reference to this flour, are we to believe the testimony of these experts or not? How shall we be guided? The Deputy Minister believed that these statements were true, for he had calculations made for a reduction in the price of flour, and those reductions were to be made in the following way:—

An hon. MEMBER. Fifteen cents a sack.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman will find that it was a good deal more than 15 cents a sack. That was Mr. Wadsworth's estimate but we have something different here. Here is a notification from the Department by Robert Sinclair, acting Deputy of the Superintendent General to I. G. Baker & Co. in which he says:

"I beg to inform you that it has been decided to reduce the price of flour for destitute Indians in Treaty No. 7, supplied by your firm during last year, to the following figures, on account of its inferior quality:—

"On Sarcee Reserve to.....	$3 19
Blackfoot do	4 31
Stoney do	4 75
Blood do	4 43
Piegan do	4 43

"A corresponding reduction has therefore been made on the unpaid vouchers, and a reduction of those already paid as per statement herewith."

This is the letter to which I referred, but of which we have these particulars. On the 15th September, 1884, he writes:

"I beg to transmit to you herewith, copy of a letter by this Department, on the 1st inst., to Messrs. I. G. Baker & Co., at Fort Benton, Montana, showing the figures to which it had been decided to reduce the price of flour for destitute Indians delivered by your firm within Treaty No. 7, during the last year; also copy of memorandum showing the aggregate amount of said reductions.

"I beg to inform you that the basis upon which these reductions were made is as follows:—

Sarcee Reserve.

"The value of the flour delivered at Ottawa.....	$1 50
Add for approximate value at Winnipeg.....	0 40
Add freight from Winnipeg to Calgary	0 40

"Value at Ottawa.....	$2 40

Add freight to Morleyville	0 50
Hauling	0 25
	$3 80
Add 25 per cent for handling.....	0 95
Total.....	$4 75

"The reductions are as follows:—

Sarcee Reserve.

"Contract price.....	$8 00
Reduced.....	3 19
Total reduction per sack.....	$4 81
On 300 sacks.....	$1,443 00

Blackfoot Reserve.

Add 25 per cent for handling.....	1 13
	$5 68
On 155 sacks.....	$880 40
Total reduction.....	$7,802 40

The result is that there is a total reduction of $7,802.40. That was the decision of the accountant with reference to the flour. Then there is a letter here from Messrs. I. G. Baker & Co., in which they demur to the reduction which is being made and they contend that the basis of calculation is scarcely fair, inasmuch as while the rates have been reduced since the time of writing they were entitled to the amount for freight which it cost them at the time they contracted, and there is some force in that we must admit. Some further correspondence was had with them, and it seems that he had a conversation with the deputy head of the Department as well, and the result of that conversation I will now read:

"24th September, 1884.

"Sir,—I have the honor to inform you in connection with the conversation which you had to-day with the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, that a deduction of $2,500.00 will be made by the Department from the amount of your contract to supply flour for Indian purposes within the limit of Treaty No. 7 during the year 1883-84.

"The deduction is made as being apparently the best method of settling the contract—with respect to which the Department has been advised that a portion of the flour delivered thereunder was inferior in quality to the grade provided for delivery in the contract. A portion of the flour supplied during that year also was delivered after the date of the last delivery provided for in your tender to supply that flour; and it has been considered that under these circumstances the flour should have been furnished at a price lower than that provided for by the contract.

"It is therefore in view of these several circumstances that the deduction of $2,500.00 has been made, and I shall be glad to receive from you an acknowledgment of this letter and a statement of your acquiescence in this settlement.

"I enclose a copy of the mutual agreement between yourself and the Deputy Superintendent General.

"I have the honor to be, Sir, your obedient servant,
"R. SINCLAIR."

To which the firm replied:

"25th September, 1884.

"Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 24th instant, and to say that under the circumstances I agree to the deduction of $2,500.00 on flour furnished in 1883-84.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"W. G. CONRAD,
for I. G. BAKER & Co."

Now, I think I have shown, at greater length than I intended, that the agents of the Government did receive flour that was but 98-lbs. to the bag, that that flour was unfit for human food and was so pronounced by experts who examined it here; that the medical superintendent reported that as the result of using that flour there was sickness and death among the natives; that that flour was used for months; that flour sufficient to last for months was still on the reserve at that time; and that the agent who pronounced the flour to be sound, is still in the employ of the Government, while the name of the other gentleman who was responsible for its receipt has been dropped, which I take as an evidence that he has been relieved from his duty. All these circumstances seem to me to point in the direction that there has been inefficiency, mismanagement, extravagance, and I do not know that it is too strong an expression to use, on the part of some individual, culpable neglect. It is a serious matter. The Indians of the North-West are entitled to humane treatment at the hands of the people of Canada. We have a rich domain there; we have a great country; it was theirs before it was ours; we have endeavored, I believe, in the past to do what is right and proper towards those Indians; we have entered into treaty obligations with them. I hold that the Parliament of Canada wish the treaty obligations made with the Indians of the North-West to be observed to the very letter, and if there be any deviation, that it be in the direction of giving the Indians even more than was secured to them by their treaty rights. Sir, they have been a loyal people to Great Britain in days gone by. They might have remained a loyal people to Canada, as I trust many of them are still; but I warn the Government that we must have men in the management of our Indian affairs who will see that there is honest and fair dealing with these Indians. We must not proceed on the line that they are little better than animals, that we can break faith with them, and that our policy must be to toss their food to them as to dogs. It is in our power to secure the good will of the Indians. It was our proud boast a few years ago, when our neighbors on the other side of the line had their turmoils, unrest and massacres among their Indians, to say that it was due to their agents taking advantage of the Government, and to point to our own country where we had no such difficulties. Sir, I am sorry to stand here, only a few years later, obliged to confess that we are not in a position to point to our Indian policy as proudly as we did before, and why? Because some of our Indians have been under arms against the Government, and I believe the necessities they were under made them ready to be worked on as they were. The Indian agents cannot avoid reporting upon the supplies which have been granted to the Indians, and on the treatment to which they have been subjected. You have also the statements of men in independent positions, who have seen these Indians, and they depict their treatment in language that goes to the heart of every humane man. And yet we find a Minister of the Crown saying, we do not deny that mistakes have been made, but when a case is brought to our notice we look into it. I ask if the charges made by such men as the Rev. Mr. McDougall and Rev. Mr. Robertson, as well as by many officials, do not warrant an investigation; and I ask if there has been an investigation of charges emanating from such sources? Instead of hon. gentlemen boasting of what they will do at the next general election, and being in a position to say, we had an investigation of these matters, and there is our report, what did the Minister do? He simply contented himself with saying; I deny the statements made, in the face of the fact that the documents showed that the Indians had been given food that was unwholesome and that was causing sickness and death. I am sorry to say that the head of this Department, no longer ago than last year, spoke in reference to this subject in such a manner and such a spirit as I could wish he had not shown. Last year, when the hon. member for West Huron was condemning the management of the Department and stated that frauds had been perpetrated on the Indians, the First Minister replied in these words:

"The hon. gentleman says there is a fraud on the Indians because the food is imperfect. It cannot be considered a fraud on the Indians because they have no right to that food. They are simply living on the benevolence and the charity of the Canadian Parliament, and, as the old adage says, beggars should not be choosers. But the Government attempts to get the article they advertise for, and they are pretty successful on the whole. Even in Ontario, the hon. gentleman has seen and heard of contractors sending in inferior articles, which were afterwards condemned. Up there, when they are sent to a distant post, they cannot be condemned, they have to be used. I do not think there has been any unwholesome food given, although it has not, perhaps, come up to the standard."

I say I could wish that these words had not been used, and that such was not the spirit on which we proceed in our treatment of the Indians. Sir, we may go beyond our treaty rights a little in aiding these Indians; but the Ministry have not the excuse that the Parliament of Canada would not vote them their money. The Parliament of Canada have not hesitated to grant them their money; the Parliament of Canada will not hesitate to do so, but will aid the Government in every legitimate way to induce the Indians to live on their reserves and become self-supporting. The Government have been using their energies in that direction; I give them full credit for what they have done, and I hope they will be successful in it; but I tell you, you cannot expect to accomplish that at once. You cannot expect to change the nature of the red man all at once. It is impossible to take men who have lived by the chase, and who delight to roam, band them together in a reserve, make them abstain from their roving habits, and settle down to cultivate the fields, raise food for their own support. It is impossible all at once to get them to secure supplies for themselves, but if they are unable to do that, must we say that they do not deserve anything, that they have no claims upon us? That they must, at any rate, have no right to any claim for frauds committed upon them, if we feed them with bad flour and send them to early graves? Shall we say to them: You have no claims on us, and beggars should not be choosers? No, we must deal with them in a larger spirit; we must give them time to change their habits before withdrawing from them that care which they demand at our hands. There are other considerations that ought to induce us to have regard for them. It is painful to read the reports of the Indian Department. I am sorry to say that, not in one or two years, but in the blue books for years back, you will find agents repeating the oft-told tale, that, unfortunately, owing to frosts, the crops of the Indians were destroyed. No doubt, you may say it is owing to inferior husbandry, and I trust the frosts will disappear from the North-West, as they have disappeared, through improved cultivation, from parts of Ontario, which suffered from them years ago; but the Indian is not to blame if these frosts occur under his present system of cultivation, and if he has become impoverished on that account, the Parliament of Canada should not lend a deaf ear to the statements made by the agents, to statements which have been made again and again, by responsible people who have seen these Indians so pressed by hunger, that in places whither they were forced to go to find sustenance, they sustained life by eating garbage from swill barrels and by feeding on carcasses of diseased animals. We have a right to expect that there should be better management of the Indians. Why, we keep up a small army of officers in that country. If you take the regular salaried officers there, you will find that, according to the Auditor-General's account, without the farm instructors and other hired agents, there are over forty regular agents or special agents among the Indians in Manitoba and the North-West. In that country, there are about 39,000 or 40,000 Indians, and there is an agent to about every thousand souls. Surely, with those agents and farm instructors, the Government ought to be able to look better after these Indians. It should be impossible that any misery should fall upon them, such as the miseries we read of, or that they should be compelled to take as supplies flour of the description I have mentioned, taken from the reports of the Government agents themselves. I might go further into details in this matter, but it is unnecessary, as the statements of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) have not been controverted or attempted to be met by any denial; and how can they be denied, when the authority is the reports of the Government's own agents, contained in the Government's own blue books. Were it necessary, I could read reports from the same source of bands of Indians almost destitute of clothing and almost in a starving condition, and who were only enabled to sustain life through the efforts of benevolent people, missionaries and others, who did all in their power to prevent these unfortunate people from starving. We profess to be a christian country, and I believe the people will hold Parliament severely to account, should we hesitate in placing money enough at the disposal of the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches, to meet the wants of the Indians, and prevent these harrowing tales of want, destitution and misery, reaching our ears in the future. The people look to us to exercise a strict supervision over the manner in which the Ministers, who are entrusted with the expenditure of this money, fulfil their duty. The people will demand that the money given the Government to be expended in relieving the necessities of these people shall not be used in upholding a horde of officials who are not properly discharging their duties; they will demand that two or three prices shall not be paid for provisions or implements of agriculture; and that the cost of travelling shall not be piled up to an exorbitant sum; and they will require that the whole cost of the machinery will not involve such a charge on the country as to cause the continued existence of a feeling, which has already pervaded to some extent the minds of the people, that the Indian problem is becoming a grave and serious one, and threatens to load us down with a burden too heavy for us to bear. Out of the vast expenditure charged on Indian account, only half a million dollars have gone to supplies for destitute Indians, and that has gone in prices paid for articles such as I have described and such as the hon. member for West Huron has quoted. If the money were properly expended, if some better system were established, if the Government agents deal with the Indians honestly, the money spent by the Government and properly put to use would have prevented any such tales of destitution and misery as those we have heard. In addition to the testimony of the reverend gentleman I have quoted, there is a gentleman holding an official position in the North-West; a gentleman who has been elected to the North-West Council, and who has been a staunch supporter of the hon. gentlemen opposite for the last twenty years—will they say we must not accept his testimony? This gentleman, Mr. Jackson, has stated, and his statement is published in the Qu'Appelle Gazette, that when he read the description given by the First Minister that Mr. Dewdney was the best officer he had, he lost faith in man. He condemns Mr. Dewdney as one who is insolent, whose word has been broken and is no longer relied upon by the Indians, and nothing could be more dangerous than to destroy the confidence of the Indian. I am simply stating what has been stated publicly, and the hon. Minister has not attempted to deny the statement. These facts press upon our consideration, and the charges made by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) press upon our consideration, and must remain on our minds unless hon. gentlemen opposite are able to give some proof of the correctness of their denial. The impression is borne home on the minds of many hon. gentlemen in this House, as it will be on the minds of the people, that there has been gross extravagance in the management of Indian affairs, that there has been neglect and incapacity, and that the charges made are amply borne out by the facts. I would it were otherwise; I trust the Government, while they may be able to vote down the resolution, because there are enough gentlemen who are as ready to support them, even without any attempt at defence on their part, as the hon. gentleman who cried out: "Call in the members," before a word in reply was uttered, will rise to a sense of their duty and cause a searching examination to be made into the affairs of the North-West. I hope they will allow no favoritism to individuals to tie their hands, but that incompetent officials will be removed, and that the Indians will learn again to have implicit faith and reliance in the word of the Government and in the word of their agents; and that thus having this confidence, they will be more ready to receive instruction, become fitted at an earlier day to hold their own in the race of life, and ere long cease to be as heavy a burden upon us as they are at present.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I do not propose to deal with the general attacks made upon the Government by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) and the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) but simply to take up some special charges. I shall confine myself to a few of the specific charges that have been made. The general charges I shall leave the public to judge of. Great weight has been laid upon the character of the food, especially the flour, given to the Indians in the South Alberta District, and it has been stated that great distress, death and disease have resulted from the use of that flour. It so happened that I was in that country for three months during the epidemic from which these Indians died, and I had experience, not only by observation, but actually by medical treatment, in regard to those Indians who died during that time. For the first time, I have heard it declared that the food was the cause of the death of those Indians. I have not seen the report, and I do not know the professional position of the medical man who attributed it to the flour, but I am prepared here and anywhere else to give the most unquestionable testimony that it was not caused by the food. I make that a distinct and specific statement.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then they have an inefficient medical attendant there?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I do not know who the gentleman was, nor do I know his professional status, but I take the responsibility of making this statement on my own judgment and I am prepared to defend it. The cause of the disease and death of the Indians in that district was chiefly this: They were camped on their reserves along the river flats, and any person who has ever travelled in that country and visited the Indian encampments must have observed their specially filthy habits both in regard to their camps and to their persons. There are from five to twenty wigwams on an acre, occupied by from eight to ten persons each, and the Indian removes his wigwam or his tepee as it is called there, only when it becomes difficult from the filthy accumulation to get in and out, and he will shift it just far enough to get out of the way of that accumulation. The result is, especially since they have been confined to their reservations, that in summer, especially in August and September, which I think the hon. gentleman will find is the date at which this epidemic took place, a disease broke out which they call autumn fever or mountain fever, but is a sort of typhoid; and it was from that, and not on account of the food, that these Indians died. As an evidence of that I may mention that, when I was at Medicine Hat, it was my duty and opportunity to have charge of three or four men professionally, whom I found there from my own immediate district, two of whom were officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Medicine Hat is on a flat similar to the Blackfeet reserve and the Sarcee reserve. The village was composed of board houses and tents, all without the ordinary conveniences of civilised life about them. Another cause of this was the great quantity of canned meats used there. I saw a great number of empty cans, containing a little meat, thrown out, and this accumulation of animal matter, and the exhalations from it, produced the same effect at Medicine Hat as the filth did in the Indian camps, and they had the same fever there. I had five or six men there moved to the upper grounds, and in a few weeks they were all right, and were able to go back to their work. I drew the attention of the official at the Blackfoot Crossing to this matter, and tried to induce the Indians to leave the flat ground where their reservation was and to go out on the plains. They did so a short time afterwards, and, when I returned in a month, the agent told me that the disease had entirely disappeared, which fully corroborated my view as to its origin. As to the flour, I know nothing about the quality generally, but I am certain that neither the flour, nor any of the other food had anything to do with the disease or the death of the Indians in that district during that period. Instead of the Indians being dissatisfied with the treatment they were then receiving, the chief Indian, the Indian king, as I may call him, Crowfoot, whom everyone has heard of, expressed himself perfectly satisfied.

An hon. MEMBER. Were your first patients among the Indians?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I have been twenty-seven years practising medicine, and I can afford to take that remark for what it is worth. Crowfoot was one of my first patients among the Indians. He gave me, on my departure, a pocketfull of tobacco, and a cake baked, I suppose, with that same flour, which I kept as a souvenir. For five days and nights, I lived in the chapel with the priest in charge of that district. We eat the bread made from that flour. I examined all the stores with the store clerk, and was careful to enquire if the bread was made from the same flour that was furnished to the Indians. He said: "Yes." I saw the meat that was furnished, and it was a great deal better meat than I am getting in Ottawa, to-day. And I am not growling, because I think it is as good as the vicinity can afford.

Mr. PATTERSON (Brant). In what month and what year was the hon. gentleman out there?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I was there from June to October, 1883. I stated that I was there during that epidemic, and I think the hon. gentleman might take my words for that statement. I also found that the Government had provided and had instructed the agent and the storekeeper that, when an old woman or a young woman or an old man that was sick, should receive sugar, tea and rice, which were given out not as a portion of the rations allotted to them, but as a sort of kindness, and I saw them getting it every day. The question of poor food never occurred, we were eating beef, and bread made from the same flour which the Indians were getting. It was baked in the farm cookery and was carried to the little chapel where I had my meals with the priest. As to the clothes, more from curiosity than anything else, because the idea of complaint never occurred to me, I got the storekeeper to unpack two or three cases. The clothing was good, substantially woven tweed. I am not a clothier, but the goods were good heavy Canadian tweed coat, pants and vest, a suit of clothes which would do no discredit to any member of this House. The only addition was a set of brass buttons. As to wearing out the pantaloons in two or three days, the hon. gentleman who stated that must have known very little about the pantaloons or the pantaloons habits of the Indians. During the whole time I was there I never saw a pair of pantaloons on an Indian. They will not wear the pantaloons. They wear a coat and a hat, and that is all. On the first opportunity they have, when some half-breed trader comes in, they trade off their pants for a red shirt or a hat, and, when they are taken to task by the agent about the pantaloons, they say they were worn out, when they have traded them off, perhaps for candies, which they have eaten in the meantime, and in this way the three day story may have originated. Now, there is this difficulty with the Indians. Many of them,

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds).

doubtless complain of disease, and one great cause of it I do not know how any Government can get over. The Indian when he was hunting for his food, and riding about over the prairie, got exercise which helped him to digest his food. Now the buffalo has gone, and the Indian is on his reservation, and he gets his pound of beef and pound of flour a day, for every soul in his family. When the beef is carried to the camp the Indian head of the family, in which we will say, there are five persons, sits down to the meal, and the chances are that he eats the whole five pounds before he gets up. He will roll about on the ground for the next four or five hours, like a snake in the grass before he is able to get up. There are hundreds of these men to-day who have charge of families, and who can get these large rations, that are suffering from chronic dyspepsia, the result of over-eating and no exercise, and the children who have nothing to eat are starved by their own parents. The moment they can toddle out of their tent they are cast off. The Indian boy or girl, from 8 years old up to 14, you may find wandering over the prairie eight or ten miles from the reserve, with a string made of raw hide, like a fiddle string, with which they snare the little gophers, a little animal like our Canadian chipmunk, but they are a little fatter, they burrow in the ground. The Indian children travel around in pursuit of these gophers. They lie down on the ground beside the hole with their strings, and the moment the gopher comes up to look about, directly he is trapped, and then he is divided into as many pieces as there are children present, and when they have eaten it up they hunt for another gopher. There is no doubt that in cold and unhealthy weather these children die largely from the want of subsistence, but that is under circumstances that no Government can control. The hon. gentleman made reference to the statements that appeared in the newspapers of a Rev. Mr. Robertson. I happen to know something about Rev. Mr. Robertson, which I do not care to disclose or discuss here, and which, to my mind, does not add much to the weight of his statement on this subject. I am not going any further on that point just now. Then, as to the Indians that he saw in Winnipeg, Portage la Prairie, Brandon and Minnedosa, filching their living out of swill barrels and the refuse heaps behind houses—these were the American Sioux Indians, with whom our Government have no treaty, to whom they furnish nothing, and furnishing which the bands of our own loyal Indians resisted, these are the remnant of the Minnesota massacres, and they are in a most destitute state, and I think that the Government should, out of common humanity, in some way come to some understanding with our own Indians to permit them to give those unfortunates some relief. Before I left my friend Crowfoot, he thus expressed himself to me: "The buffalo has gone, but the Great Spirit has sent the white man to take care of his red brother. We will be loyal." He found out that I had something to do with the Parliament, and he said to me: "We have a great friend at Ottawa; please thank him for the kindness and care he has already taken of us, and under these circumstances we will continue to be loyal." This is the way the interpreter gave it to me. Now about the women. I am not going to sit down without defending even the character of an Indian woman. They have peculiar notions about the marriage relationship; there is no doubt about that. Now, I have as high an opinion of the average—I was going to use the words virtue and integrity—of civilised women as any man in this country, or anywhere else. And while I know that their views and notions of the marriage relations and outside of that relation are not the same as those of white women, I say that the Indian women of the North-West, judged by their own code of both public and private morality, would not compare unfavorably in this with their civilised white sisters. That is the result of my observations, and of conversations I have had with a priest that has been living there for years. If I had made such a statement with regard to the Indian women as the hon. member for West Huron has made, and it became known on the Crowfoot reserve, and I were to visit them, I would be in danger of losing my scalp. The hon. member for West Huron, in his long speech, gave one specific instance of absolute starvation, and that was the Moosejaw case. I think I have heard of that case. It was a case of an isolated family who, for some reason, had left their band and gone out of the reach of supply. The Indians, like the white men, do not always live in harmony together, sometimes they quarrel and drive the bad ones away. I was frequently cautioned among the Blackfeet and Sarcees, to have nothing to do with certain Indians because they were bad Indians and not to be trusted. In this Moosejaw case I have no doubt the man had wandered from the reserve, or had been driven away, there may have been such a case, and it might occur, even under the most careful supervision of the Government. I only got up to reply to some of the specific statements made by the hon. gentleman; the general charge of incompetency, extravagance and all that sort of thing, it is possible for any man to answer, and impossible to deny except by denying the whole thing, as the Minister of Public Works did. I am attempting to answer some of the specific charges. I was going to say something about the disease, and touching the amount of criminality which the hon. gentleman says exists among the Mounted Police and white men in that country. I think that is a most ungenerous, and, I believe, a most unwarrantable charge. I am satisfied of that; I am satisfied from the character of the men who are there, and I am satisfied from the character of the women with whom the men come in contact, that such a sweeping state of corruption as he represented, is practically impossible. I was tempted a little while ago, when the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) was speaking to say, "Call in the members." The hon. member knows that sometimes when an hon. member is speaking, although he may think that what he is saying is very important, it is possible to be nevertheless dull to those who have to listen to it. I only mentioned that as a joke more than anything else. As for the disease existing among the policemen themselves, to which the hon. gentleman referred in unmistakable terms, I may say that the disease of the character to which the hon. gentleman in unmistakable terms alluded is an incident of the human family in semi-civilised communities and one which you will find all over the face of the earth. Instead of that having been brought in, developed and spread by white men, by the Mounted Police and by officers of the Government, I know from the evidences I saw on grey-haired men and women, wrinkled men and women I saw, that that disease had existed in the country long before the policemen ever went there, and long before officers in connection with the Indian Department were established in the country. And so universal is that condition with the Indians, not so much from a state of immorality in the sense pointed out by the hon. gentleman, but as inherited, transmitted, and propagated by their filthy personal habits, at least 25 per cent. of the grown Indians have impaired and imperfect eyesight. Those observations I made on the ground, I made at the time in the country, and I think they cover all the specific charges which the hon. gentleman has made against the Department. A few words as to the cost of implements. The hon. gentleman made a comparison between the cost of implements in Ontario and the North-West. A large number of those implements in the North-West to which reference has been made were taken in the country before there was a railway and were transported by cart 500, 600 or 700 miles. No doubt some of them fell into the hands of unskilful men and became damaged; and there being no means of repairing them, the only course open was to substitute new ploughs or harrows. Owing to the condition of affairs a large supply had to be kept on hand and furnished, and the expenditure cannot be fairly judged by simply taking an equal amount of farm cultivation in Ontario.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), who moved this resolution has indulged on former occasions, as well as on the present, in such wild extravagance of statement and such violence of language as to place himself beyond the pale of that consideration which is due from one gentleman to another. In regard to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) the case was very different. His remarks were such as could be listened to with patience and temper, and answered in the spirit in which they were made. Last year I had an opportunity of observing some of the matters to which the hon. member who last addressed the House referred, and in general terms I can most strongly confirm everything he has said with respect to the conduct of the Indian officials, and with respect to those particulars to which he has alluded. As to the statement that Indians wandered around and eat garbage I may say that when we were encamped at Qu'Appelle for several weeks our camp was always surrounded by women and children who remained there day and night to pick up food. But those were wandering Sioux, not treaty Indians, and not entitled to any food and had no share in our country whatever. But supposing they were Crees, and were from the File Hills or other parts of the country, their conduct arose from the circumstances to which the hon. gentleman has mentioned. You never saw grown men, men able to earn a living, about the camp; but you did see aged and decrepit women and children. At the very time those women and children were around the camp the bands of Indians to which they belonged were most lavishly fed; they were well fed at that time if they never were before. A missionary or stranger seeing those poor creatures, who were most pitiful objects, waiting from hour to hour about the camp would have formed unquestionably a most unfavorable impression as to the condition of the Indians, and would very probably have gone away with the idea that all the race was in a starving condition. But hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House have not touched the real evil existing in regard to this matter. The hon. member for West Huron charged the Government with wrong-doing, while the real evil exists not with the Government but with this House, which alone can remedy it. The fact is, so far as I can form an opinion from my own observation, and what I ascertained from enquiries made among people of every condition, lawyers, traders, settlers and others, in regard to the treatment of Indians, that the fault is not extravagance on the part of the Government, but that Parliament has never consented to place in the hands of the Government sufficient means to treat the Indians as they should be treated. There have been cases in which the Indians have suffered. I know one case, and it is familiar to the Department, and that is a most glaring case. It is the case of the band at Crooked Lakes. They were really suffering from want of food. It arose partly from the fact, I believe, that the Indian authorities, acting with perfect honesty and good faith but yet anxious to make a good showing in the books of the Department at Ottawa, failed to give the Indians sufficient rations to enable them to live in health and comfort. The hon. gentleman has talked about starving Indians, as if it was the easiest thing in the world to feed them. Nothing is more difficult than to apportion rations to Indians. The point is to treat them sufficiently well, that is not to have them feel the pangs of hunger or they will not work; you must give the Indian sufficient food to keep him exactly in a state in which he is driven from sheer necessity to exert himself. Nothing is more difficult to Indian officials than to apportion the amount of food given to Indians living on a reservation, so as to stimulate them to work and keep them at work. I believe the fault has been that the Indian officials have endeavored to exercise economy—the Government has been pleased that economy should be exercised—and the House would be prompt to find fault if the Government dealt with the Indians in the liberal spirit advocated by the hon. member for Brant. A great deal has been said in the country about dishonesty in the Indian Department. I took the trouble to enquire into that matter, and I asked in the whole Qu'Appelle District whether the people knew of dishonesty on the part of Indian officials, and only one case was mentioned, and that was by a man who has such a notoriously bad character that no one would believe his statements in regard to such a matter. I came to the conclusion that the Indian officials were honest men, that the only fault was that some of them had been too rigid for economy, and had committed errors in giving Indians food under the circumstances in which they were placed. As to their honesty, no charge against their honesty was brought against them. There is one point with which no doubt the Indian Department are aware, and it is worth considering when speaking of Indians, and that is as to their physical condition. It is a common complaint that they cannot live upon the pork supplied, and it is necessary they should have fresh meat. There is nothing that causes among them so much disease and suffering as being compelled to eat salt meat, which, of course, the Government are occasionally obliged to give them. I speak, of course, under correction by members who are more familiar with the subject than I am, but I know the Indians can hardly be induced to eat salt meat, although they generally receive it of very good quality. With respect to the charge of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) as to the quality of the flour, I think the evidence he laid before the House afforded a sufficient refutation of the charge he made. At any rate the evidence he brought in support of his charges as to the quality of the flour, was no stronger than that adduced in the opposite direction. I pressed him to read Mr. Wadsworth's statements, because Mr. Wadsworth is a gentleman who is well known to many members of this House from the Province of Ontario as a man upon whose word the most implicit confidence can be put, a man well acquainted with the matters with which he has to deal, and one in whose integrity every man who knows him will place entire confidence. I think, that in dealing with Indians hereafter, the great trouble will be to feed them just exactly in that proportion which will stimulate them to work, and, at the same time, will be sufficient to keep them from suffering from want of food. I may have expressed myself clumsily, but I think hon. gentlemen understand the difficulty, and that it is in endeavoring to hit that happy medium that the Indian officials have failed and have not supplied them as far as they ought. That is a difficulty to which, I have no doubt, the Government will pay every attention.

Mr. FAIRBANK. I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging the debate, which has already been amply handled on this side of the House, but I rise to call attention to a very improper remark made by an hon. gentleman opposite. He has spoken in reference to the Rev. Mr. Robertson, a gentleman with whom I happen to have a slight acquaintance, having met him in the discharge of his duties in that country, having listened to his preaching, and knowing him very well by reputation. When an hon. member in this House stands up in his place and makes a remark like this: "I know something of the Rev. Mr. Robertson which I am not going to refer to here," I submit that that gentleman has either said too much or not enough.

Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I regret, Sir, that the statements which have been made so specifically upon this side of the House have not met with the reply from the Government which was to be expected, from the seriousness of their character. We cannot, under the circumstances as they have been submitted to this House to-night, but say that, whether the general denial that one or two gentlemen have made covers the case or not to the satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite, there must be left in the country a considerable amount of misgiving as to the management of Indian affairs in the North-West. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Ferguson) said he was prepared to defend the character of the Indian women with reference to the charges which have been made against them on this occasion, and have frequently, before now, been made with reference to them in the House. Unfortunately, I do not think that the case lies in that direction, as much as in the necessity for defending the Indian officials in the North-West, and not only the Indian officials, but the North-West Mounted Police, in reference to whom the reports of the Department submitted to this House, too closely bear out the statements which have been made as to their immorality and their treatment of the Indian women. We have had some representations by the same gentleman as to the character of the food supplies, and, particularly, speaking from his own observations, of the flour supplies of 1883. But the hon. gentleman will recollect that the Department itself has practically given a contradiction to any statements of the character that he has submitted here to-night, from the fact that they made a very decided reduction in the amount of the bill of I. G. Baker & Co., who had the contract for those supplies. I think we have had a sufficient number of denials of similarly specific charges against the Government to make us perfectly satisfied that when they find no other means open for successful defence, a general denial is their resort. We know that hon. gentlemen opposite denied the sale of a particular railway charter, when at the same time there was plain proof of its sale. We know besides that there was a denial in this House that the rebel Riel had been paid to leave this country, when it was known on the statement of Archbishop Taché that such was the fact. We know, too, that there were denials that there were grievances in the North-West, at the same time that a commission was on its way from the Province of Ontario to settle these grievances, and that, as a result, in the neighborhood of 2,000 of the claims that were being preferred against the Government were practically settled by that commission. Now, I propose for a moment or two to examine the accounts which have already been referred to some extent by some of the speakers who have preceded me on this side of the House. But before doing so, I would say that in the neighboring country they have had difficulties similar to those in this country. While these difficulties existed there, we took pride in the reflection that in Canada the Indians had until recently been so well treated, that under no circumstances had they been forced into an uprising such as had been of frequent occurrence in the country to the south of us. Unfortunately we are not able to claim credit for the existence of such a state of affairs any longer. It is still more unfortunate that while in the neighboring country the Indian was the prey of the frontiersman and the cattle driver, in Canada he has been the prey of the Government of the day. Large appropriations have been made during the past five or six years; large enough certainly to have justified the expectation that the 21,000 or 22,000 Indians who are under treaty, living on their reserves in the North-West, would have remained reasonably satisfied. We know that the Indian nature is one of childlike contentment with its surroundings so long as he is fairly treated. The misfortune in our case was that the question was not, apparently, how many Indians which have been supported by the generous provision made by this House, but how many white people could be supported out of that appropriation. It is clear that such a policy, based on such a proposition as that, must necessarily be a failure, and I will proceed to show why, in my opinion, the policy that has been pursued by the Government, with the appropriation that this House has made, has so lamentably failed. We find that the average Indian population from 1880 to 1885 was 20,384. And I may say that that includes the Sioux, who, contrary to the statement made on the other side of the House, are in receipt of some provision towards their sustenance. During these years the expenditure on the Indian population in Manitoba and the North-West has increased from $621,057, in 1880, to $1,008,930, in 1885. During those five years the total expenditure has been $5,509,441, or an average of $918,240 a year. This sum will average $46 a head for all the men, women and children on the reserves in Manitoba and the Territories, or $230 per family of five persons. But assuming, what I do not think the accounts will bear out, that the nomadic Indians in the Territories are participating to any great extent in the provision made by this House, I still find, taking the average of the years from 1880 to 1885, that of the 35,000 Indians in Manitoba and the Territories, according to the report of the Inspector-General of Indian Affairs, that amount of money would furnish them with $26.50 a head, or $132.50 for each family. I hold that that ought to have been enough. I hold that had justice been done, and had the administration of our Indian affairs in that country been such as this Parliament and the country expected, the uprising which disgraced our country and brought shame and misfortune and loss of life for many, would not have marked the past year in our history. Basing my calculation on the amount divided among the 22,000 Indians who are residents on reserves, I hold that there are many families living in Canada, to-day, who have scarcely as good provisions made for their sustenance as those Indians have had. There are many white people supporting families in Canada, who are not able to calculate on more than $230 a year for a family of five, throwing in what is practically to the Indian house rent and many other conveniences. If that is the case where, as the hon. member for West Huron has said, everything of reasonable necessity is correspondingly cheap, it must be that his charge, which to this moment stands uncontradicted, that there was mismanagement and misappropriation of the public funds, and that many of the charges made in the public press against those having the administration of affairs in that country are proved. Now, Sir, it will be observed that while the provision for the Indians in the North-West has rapidly increased from 1880, the number of Indians in that country is reported to be the same, and it is a peculiarity that must strike every man who has examined the circumstances of the case with any closeness whatever, that with the increased appropriation has grown the discontent. We know that six or seven years ago the Indian population was reported to be not only contented, but comfortable. It is true, their changed circumstances are attributable, to some extent, to the fact that the buffalo is becoming rapidly extinct; but, on the other hand, there is an increase in the expenditure of about $400,000 to represent all that should have arisen of a necessitous character in their altered circumstances. Now, I propose to show, by a few extracts from the departmental reports that while this House assumed that it was making ample provision for all the requirements of the Indians, there had been leakages of a most serious character, and that what we have voted has by no means gone in the direction contemplated. I find, Sir, what will strike this House and the country with a good deal of surprise, as it does me, that from 1882 to 1885, four years, there was expended on implements, for the use of the Indians, under the seven treaties in Manitoba and the North-West, $92,346; for tools, $21,820; for wages to farm laborers on the twenty-six Indian farms, $159,634; for farm maintenance, which includes supplies for these farms, $130,625; or in these years a total of $404,427 for these four items. Now, while that is the case, I find that in those years the cultivated area of land in Manitoba and the North-West was as follows:—In 1880, 3,953 acres; in 1881, 3,393; in 1882, 4,490; in 1883, 6,636; in 1884, 8,800; and in 1885, 5,978; or a total area of cultivated land in those years of 33,248 acres, and the expenditure on these four items is equal to $1,338.50 a year for every 100-acre farm that was cultivated. Now, Sir, I can appeal to any man who can discuss a matter of this kind practically from any experience, no matter how limited, and he will agree with me that the fact of expending $1,338 under such circumstances on every 100 acres, certainly bears on its face evidence of extravagant management. But, Sir, in those six years I find that we raised of wheat, on the twenty-six Indian farms, in the North-West and on the reserves, which practically embrace all the agricultural operations that are undertaken there, 48,600 bushels; of oats, 21,500 bushels; of peas, 3,500 bushels; of barley, 82,000 bushels; of potatoes, 289,000 bushels; while at the same time we paid for grain and seeds in 1881, $14,067; in 1882, $22,957; in 1883, $13,620; in 1884, $10,786; in 1885, $24,443; or a total of $85,763. I believe this amount expended for grain and seeds is larger than the entire product these farms yielded. Wherever a leakage like that has occurred, it is manifest there must be somewhere or other mismanagement, whether on the part of the Indian farm instructors, Indian agents, Indian Inspectors or the Superintendent General, I leave the House to decide. In the same year, and I have already given some insight as to the quantity of implements that are used on these farms,—in the same year of 1881 of a total of 15,819 implements used on these farms, 4,040 were hoes, 170 ploughs, 120 harrows, thirty-five tool chests which cost $30 each, and thirteen which cost $100 each. In the meantime we had spent $114,168, as I have said, on implements and tools between then and 1885, and increased our stock of implements and tools from 15,819 to 22,114, in which there were 410 waggons, thirty-one fanning mills, forty-seven threshing machines, 566 harrows, and 772 ploughs. But, at the same time, it will be manifest, with such a vast expense as is indicated here, an expense larger, I venture to say, than that on the same number of hundred acres anywhere in Ontario where farming is similarly conducted—where it is solely confined to grain farming—it will not be found there has been an equal expenditure for farming implements within the same year. But the price paid for these is an incidental circumstance, and will, to some extent, be a guide to the reason why the expenditure is as large as it is. I find that the ploughs which were purchased in 1885, as is indicated by the report of the Auditor General, numbered 124, at an average of $25; breaking ploughs, 70, average $34; waggons, 33, at an average of $63; hoes, 1,341, at 79 cents; mowers, 3, at $101; reapers, 6, at $143; axes, 1,015, at $1.40; tool chests 12, at $81 each—indicating clearly to my mind that the large expenditure indicates the fact that very liberal prices were allowed, and that somebody was making a very satisfactory return out of the appropriation for these Indian supplies. And these facts, divulged by the reports of the Department of Indian Affairs, leads me to the conviction that the Indian, while he may be child-like in his disposition, as we have been led to believe by the books, has characteristics that enable him readily to detect an act of unfairness towards him. No matter what may have been the experience of hon. gentlemen, necessarily that experience must be limited, because, as I understand their explanation, it was confined to a visit in each case that extended only over a few months, and then when pressing duties of an entirely different character must have engaged their attention largely; and surely they would not assume that they are in the position of an official of the Department, as to their capacity of judging the condition of the Indian population. I have already shown that, as far at least as the Indian supplies are concerned, we have furnished the Indians with a lavish hand. I believe, also, that if a proper supervision had been exercised over the distribution of supplies to the Indians, if the Indian agent had exercised over them that control which would have made them feel their responsibility to the House and to the country, much more would have been got out of that $500,000 a year, which this House generously appropriated towards furnishing the Indians with food. In 1831, I find among other things, on looking through the reports for a number of years past, that the first direct instance of frauds in the supplies furnished for distribution to the Indians occurred in 1831, and in that year, among other frauds that are reported by Indian inspectors was one in the supply of tobacco. It was reported as being in almost every case bad, and one agent reports that his supply was largely composed of pulverised coal, brick-dust, and refuse. In fact, it appears, from his expressive language, doubtful whether it was the tobacco or the coal-dust that was adulterated. All the reports of one or two subsequent years abound in complaints of this kind, but it seems a peculiar circumstance that the reports of the later years do not furnish as much evidence on the surface of the discontent indicated by statements such as that which I have just read. Whether it is that the Indian inspectors became more convinced, as the years rolled on, of the desires of those who were in authority over them, either at Regina or elsewhere, and knew it was more satisfactory that everything should be reported correct, whether so or not, I am not prepared to say. There is very little reference in the departmental reports of that year, to the supply of flour, which was, by the medical gentleman to whom the question was referred, reported in 1833, as being productive of disease and death among the Indians to whom it was issued. It is not necessary, however, to confine ourselves to the records of the Department of Indian Affairs, during those years. I find that, in the earlier years, the reports of the North-West Mounted Police also furnished evidence that the Indians were suffering and starving, as a result of the policy of the Department. In the year 1830, Commissioner Irvine reports that since the disappearance of the buffalo the Indian situation had assumed a different aspect:

"As long as buffalo lasted the Indian was self-supporting, independent and contented. Now, however, he is in a very different position; his only means of support is virtually gone, and he has to depend on the Government for assistance, but forced in so doing to remain about the police posts. This population will, irrespective of the aid received from Government, be a starving one."

Then, again, Superintendent Walsh reports in the same year that:

"The horses that died from scurvy and carcasses of horses that died during the autumn and early winter were gathered up and eaten."

I ask the attention of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), whose statements, confined to his own observation, I would not for a moment attempt to dispute, to a statement such as this, showing clearly that the officials have reported that much more serious destitution existed than was indicated by merely a few old weather-beaten men and women gathering around the camp when he was on active service in the North-West. I am perfectly satisfied that he has stated the case honestly, as far as his observation has gone, but it will be apparent to the House that his opportunities must have been limited, and, extending over only a few months, his visit must have very little influence in the direction of contradicting the very positive statements made by Superintendent Walsh. Mr. Walsh proceeds to say:

"The conduct of these starving and destitute people, their patient endurance, their sympathy and the extent to which they assisted each other, their strict observance of law and order, would reflect credit on the most civilised community."

And the report continues that the utmost consideration was shown by the Mounted Police at that time, even to dividing their rations with the Indians. In the Report of the Mounted Police for 1831, there is also evidence of a similar kind. The Commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police that year expressed his apprehension of disturbance and his fear of starvation existing among the Indians by reason of the change in their condition. The Commissioner also reports:

"I foresaw that, if no aid was accorded them, they would starve and in a starving condition might have attempted to commit depredations."

And further:

"I would call your attention to the fact that, in a letter of the 20th of May last, I impressed on the Government the necessity of the Indians being well received in the north, also the fulfilment of all treaty obligations. * * The treatment the Indians receive particularly on arrival should be kind."

And, as if giving a warning of what would follow a contrary course of conduct towards the Indians, he says:

"They are quiet and law-abiding as a whole, and no fear need be apprehended at their hands so long as the Government continues to act justly towards them."

Mr. Simpson, who is on the Indian survey party, states in the year 1834 that he found Chief Alexis' camp, and he and his Indians were in a very destitute condition and almost naked. Besides this, there are a number of reports from Inspector McRae from the Battleford agency with which I will not trouble the House, but which bear out the contention of the hon. member for West Huron, and I think that has been amply proved. It has not been disproved, at all events, that the Indians have been in a starving condition, and therefore the charge made by the mover of this resolution is in every respect borne out. Seeing that these statements have not been controverted, I will refrain from using much of the evidence which it was my intention to submit in support of this proposition. But I will ask the attention of the House to the fact that, while much doubt has been attempted to be thrown on the statement of the Rev. Mr. Robertson, the superintendent of Presbyterian Missions in the North-West, and while the statement of the Rev. Mr. McDougall has been questioned, and while the Department has stated to us to-night, by the mouth of the leader of the House, that they examined into the charges which he made in reference to the conduct of the white settlers in the neighborhood of the reserves, there has been no answer whatever to the very grave charges that were made by Mr. Jackson in his place as a member of the North-West Council, and subsequently at a meeting in his honor held at Qu'Appelle. I think the charges there made are of the gravest kind, and until they are more successfully controverted than by any statement which has been made to-night, they justify the language of the resolution moved by the hon. member for West Huron. But I find that even the Mail furnishes reasonably strong evidence that the destitution which has been referred to did exist. From a letter dated Hamilton, 13th January, and signed "Westerner," which appeared in the Mail of the succeeding day, I make this extract:

"The position of the Indians at present is, as you well said the other day, critical. * * * To say that these poor creatures have no grievances is absurd. But few who have not been among them realise the hardships they are forced to contend with. By way of illustration I may refer to an incident which occurred during my stay at Crowfoot, about sixty miles east of Calgary. It was after the trouble was pretty well settled, when an old Cree chief came into camp, bringing a sample of flour which he had received from the Indian agent. Pointing to a heap of ashes on the ground, and then to the flour in his hand, he gave me to understand that the flour resembled more the smouldering embers than that for which it was intended; and I could not but think that he was but little wrong in his judgment. At once it occurred to me that the so-called flour was nothing but the waste from a grist mill floor."

Such is the evidence furnished by that correspondence. The hon. gentleman may recollect that the very same paper stated that the Indians had suffered from destitution, and that some had even died of starvation. Now, Sir, it must not be forgotten—and if this House forgets the country will not—that many of these gentlemen who occupy positions in the North-West, were practically nominees of the gentleman who, in the vote that is about to be given, are themselves partially responsible for these appointments. I suppose there is no gentleman opposite who has not had, on some occasion, to intercede for some of those officials who are now practically on their trial. I think the Government ought to have exercised more than ordinary care for these wards of ours, who are so entirely dependent upon us. And under these circumstances, and in view of all the facts I have stated, I hold it is clearly proved that the Government has been culpably negligent in their treatment of the Indians in the North West.

Mr. CHARLTON. I merely rise to call attention to a charge made by the hon. gentleman for Leeds, (Mr. Ferguson) against a very respectable and highly esteemed clergyman of the Presbyterian Church. If these insinuations made by the hon. gentleman meant anything, he should have gone further, for, as the hon. member for Lambton says, either he said too much or too little. I think it is due to the Rev. Mr. Robertson, and due to this House, that the hon. member for Leeds should specify what the charges are that he insinuated against that gentleman. There is one feature of that gentleman's character that, I presume, would not commend itself to the hon. member for Leeds. He is, I believe, a Liberal, and has been for many years. Sir, the Rev. Mr. Robertson is a gentleman of the highest respectability. I have known him for over twenty years, have known him intimately. His position in the church is a high one, he has for many years been in charge of the Presbyterian Missions in the North-West, and in discharging those duties he has proved himself to be an efficient and an able man. It is to be regretted that such insinuations should be made against that gentleman, insinuations that leave us to imagine almost anything we please with regard to him. I claim on behalf of the reverend gentleman that is due to this House, to him, and to the country that we should know what the charges are against him; whatever the charge may be, let the hon. member from Leeds tell us what it is.

Mr. WATSON. I would not have spoken at this hour were it not for an insinuation that has been made on the other side of the House by the member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Ferguson) against the Rev. James Robertson, and also the insinuation made by the Minister of Public Works in reference to the Rev. John McDougall. Now, I consider that if there are two gentlemen in the North West who have rendered a service to this country in civilising the Indians, it is those two gentlemen. I was surprised to hear hon. gentlemen opposite slander them to-night. The Rev. Mr. Robertson I have known for the last ten years, and he is a man who is above reproach. He did not go to the North-West on the same mission as did the hon. member for Leeds, who has been slandering him; he did not go to the North-West for the purpose of having bond fide settlers' patents cancelled by his Government influence; but the Rev. Mr. Robertson went to the North-West for the purpose of doing good to the white settlers and the Indians. As to the Rev. Mr. McDougall, the Government were glad to recognise his valuable services during the troubles of last spring. He went amongst the Indians where the volunteers were afraid to go. He guided the volunteers from Calgary to Edmonton during the rebellion last spring, and I was surprised to hear the Minister of Public Works say that the Rev. John McDougall had made statements which he could not back up. I believe that gentleman has never made a statement that has reflected on the actions of the agents, that was not true; and I feel satisfied anything he has ever stated or wrote to the press, has been in the best interest of the North-West.

The Minister of Public Works also referred to the First Minister's pet, Mr. Dewdney, and said that he was always welcomed by the Indians wherever he went. Now, such is not the case. I believe there are gentlemen in this House who were present at an interview between Piapot and Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney, when Piapot, in council, told that gentleman to his face that he was a liar and a thief. Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite call that reception a welcome reception, I fail to appreciate their judgment. There has been another reference made to the Chief Long Lodge. Now, I will repeat a statement made to me by a gentleman who was present at an interview between Mr. Dewdney and Long Lodge, at Qu'Appelle, some three years ago. Long Lodge visited Mr. Dewdney for the purpose of getting food for his family. He was fed at that time on what was well known as rotten pork. A contract was made for 45 tons of rotten pork. It is reported that pork was bought in Chicago for 1½ cent a lb, and sold to this Government for 19 cents; also that the Governor shared in the profits of the contract, but of this I know nothing. When Long Lodge went to get food for his family he stated to the Governor that one of his children had died the day before from starvation, and another was at the point of death, and unless he got fresh meat for his family he was afraid they would all die. He was a good Indian, an Indian who, a few years before, was in good circumstances, who had his ponies, his ammunition and game, and everything an Indian wanted on the plains. He was generous to all travellers whom he met, and was highly spoken of by the Mounted Police. He had accepted a treaty about two years before, and was compelled to go on his reserve, and we must all remember that an Indian placed on a reserve is something like a man in prison—he is not accustomed to it—that Indian was reduced to starvation by accepting a treaty from the Government, which was never carried out in good faith, and he went to the Lieutenant-Governor to ask for food to keep himself and family from starvation. And what was the reply? The reply was: "You have got to eat that pork or die." That was the reply of this great and good man, Governor Dewdney, who always treated the Indians kindly, and that same chief, Long Lodge, and three of his family did die shortly afterwards. They did not receive any other food. His reply to Mr. Dewdney was that he might as well feed his family on the poison with which they poisoned wolves as to feed them on that rotten pork. I fully endorse the statements that have been made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and which have not yet been answered. I observed some hon. members taking notes, and I expected to hear them reply; but I suppose the charges and facts were such that they considered the best course to pursue was to leave them alone. I believe the charges are unanswerable, and cannot be sufficiently contradicted; and, feeling that such is the case, I shall support the amendment.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I rise to a personal explanation. An hon. gentleman alluded to what I said with respect to Rev. Mr. McDougall. What I said, and what I intended to say, was this, that Mr. McDougall had made certain general charges, that when he was called upon to substantiate them and particularise them he was not ready to do so, and the investigation is going on.

HALF-BREED CLAIMS.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) presented a detailed statement respecting half-breed claims in the North-West.

Mr. LAURIER. Is this the report anticipated in the issue of the Mail this morning?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). That is the report. I may say to the hon. gentleman that a good many people have seen proofs of it, it being a matter I brought down of my own accord to the House without an order.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 2 o'clock a.m., Friday.

PRAYERS.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 106) to amend an Act to restrict and regulate Chinese Immigration into Canada. He said: It is almost a repetition of the Act of last year with very few additions, especially in the framing of the Bill, so as to render the working of it more practicable. The few additions or alterations may be thus summarised: The administration of the Act is put into the hands of the Department of Customs, for the reason that in almost every seaport or port of entry the officers of Customs will necessarily be the controllers of Chinese immigration. The second feature of the alterations is an organised system of registration. Registration was provided for last year, but it was rather left to the good-will of the resident Chinese, at the time of the passing of the Act, to register or not as they pleased; and, therefore, Chinese residing in Canada, not registered as such, might have lost the privilege of claiming they were residents, through not having their certificate of registration. By this Bill the registration is made compulsory; and not only citizens but all children, births, deaths, and even departures from the country, must be registered, so as to enable the Department to have always statistics of the number in the Dominion. Besides that, there is also a little addition assimilating conductors of trains, in which Chinese immigrants might pass through Canada or might travel in Canada, to masters of vessels, who were specially pointed to in the legislation of last year. It is a repetition of the Act of last year with these few alterations.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ELECTORAL DISTRICTS OF VANCOUVER ISLAND.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 107) to amend the Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons (35 Vic., chap. 13) as affecting the electoral districts of Vancouver Island. He said: When the Act was passed, in 1872, fourteen years ago, certain provisions were made for the election of members to represent the Province of British Columbia in this House. Sections 4 and 5 read as follows:—

"The electoral district of Victoria shall consist of those portions of Vancouver Island known as 'Victoria district,' 'Esquimalt district' and 'Metchosin district,' as defined in the official maps of those districts which are in the Land Office, Victoria, and are designated respectively, 'Victoria district official map, 1858,' 'Esquimalt official map, 1858,' and 'Metchosin official map, A.D. 1858; and shall return two members.

"The electoral district of Vancouver shall consist of all the remainder of Vancouver Island, and all such islands adjacent thereto, as were formerly dependencies of the late colony of Vancouver Island, and shall return one member."

Until very recently there was great doubt as to whether the islands off-lying the district of Victoria, which I have the honor to represent, belonged to my district or to the district of Vancouver. The islands are right off the coast line of the electoral district of Victoria, and at the next election there are persons there who will have to cast their votes for a member to represent them in the House of Commons. Unless those islands are placed where they rightly belong, in the district of Victoria, those persons will be compelled to go to the electoral district of Vancouver to cast their votes, according to a recent decision of the Department of Justice. There are two islands, one in the mouth of the harbor of Victoria and another in the mouth of the harbor of Esquimalt, upon which there are lighthouses, and there are persons living there. Previously there was no reason for bringing this matter under public notice, but now that these islands are inhabited, and are likely to be more thickly populated, the time has arrived when the ambiguity which exists in my own mind and in the minds of the people there, and especially in the minds of the revising officers, should be set at rest. They should know whether they belong to the electoral district of Victoria or to Vancouver.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADULTERATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 108) to amend the Adulteration Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient further to amend the "Weights and Measures Act of 1879," and to empower the Governor in Council to define what weights, measures and weighing machines shall be admitted to verification.

Mr. BLAKE. Explain.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The only change effected by this resolution is to define what weights and measures shall be verified, and what shall not. The Act of 1879 gave the Governor in Council power to make regulations in regard to this matter, but doubts have since arisen, and this is intended to remove those doubts.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is it intended that the Governor in Council shall decide what manufacturers shall be compelled to have their weights verified, and what shall not?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That power has been exercised by the Department ever since the Act of 1879, but it is a question whether the Department had the power, and this is intended to remove the doubt.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. I can hardly conceive that the Minister understood the question of my hon. friend, otherwise he would not have given it an affirmative answer. My hon. friend enquired whether it was the intention to empower the Governor in Council to prescribe to manufacturers what machines of weight and measure should be admitted to verification.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The power that has been exercised up to the present time is to define what weights and measures shall be deemed fit for public use.

Mr. BLAKE. Would the hon. gentleman state what has been done in countries where there has been legislation of this description—whether the regulations have been made by the Governor in Council, or by the Legislative body?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have not looked into this question. I have simply been advised that there is room for doubt, under the Act as it now stands, as to whether this power is really given to the Governor in Council.

Mr. BLAKE. Who has raised the doubts?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The attention of the Department was called to the fact that there was a doubt.

Mr. BLAKE. Have Orders in Council been passed as a matter of fact, defining the classes of weights and measures for classification? And is it proposed at present to make any change in the classification?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No; of course, it simply legalises the Order in Council.

Mr. McMULLEN. This matter undoubtedly affects all classes of business men in the country, and those who will be under the necessity of purchasing weights and measures; and if the Government intend to take to themselves this power, it ought to be explicitly defined.

Mr. BLAKE. I would like to know what Orders in Council have been passed under the authority of this Act, and how far the hon. gentleman has undertaken, under the authority of this Act, to go beyond the defining of the materials and the proportions of weights and measures to be admitted to verification.

Mr. COSTIGAN. So far as Orders in Council are concerned, I do not think this would change the Act or give any greater powers than we already have. The Governor in Council has the power to define the dimensions and proportions of weights and measures, and the material of which they may be made, and those that are not of such material and such dimensions shall not be certified. For instance, a manufacturer will send to us samples of balances or scales that he makes, and these are tested by the Inspector of Standards. No complaints have been received as to the working of the Order in Council.

Mr. BLAKE. The meaning of the hon. gentleman's proposal is this: that he wants to superadd a negative to an affirmative, and I do not believe it is at all necessary. If I rightly understand the effect of the whole law, it is that unverified weights, balances and weighing machines are not lawful to be sold or used. Verification is essential to their lawful sale and use to-day. The law provides that the Governor in Council may make regulations for the materials and proportions, and so forth, of the machines which may be verified, and unless a particular machine, weight or balance complies with those regulations, it cannot be verified, and being unverified it cannot be sold or used. So that negative exists now; but what the hon. gentleman proposes in the motion is that the Governor in Council shall be empowered to define what weights, measures and machines shall be admitted to verification, not what shall not be admitted, which is quite unnecessary, because if none can be sold except those admitted to verification by the Governor in Council he has at present sufficient power to declare what shall be admitted to verification, and you want no more power. The trouble is the different form of words used in the proposal and in the Act, for, while the Act speaks of proportions and materials, it is now proposed that the Governor in Council shall have authority to declare the specific machines which shall be admitted to verification. The hon. gentleman has not made good his proposition.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The section I propose to add to the Act cannot do any harm. If this resolution is allowed to pass I will simply introduce the Bill, and before the next stage I will consider the suggestions made by the hon. gentleman, and if the section is not necessary I will not press it.

Resolution concurred in and reported.

Mr. COSTIGAN introduced Bill (No. 109) to further amend the Weights and Measures Act, 1879.

THE EASTER HOLIDAYS.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask what arrangements the Government propose to make in regard to the Easter adjournment?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The intention of the Government is—and it appears to be the desire of the House to have as short a Session as possible—to ask the House to adjourn on Thursday evening until Tuesday at 3 o'clock.

Mr. VAIL. I hope the Government will arrange so that the House will meet on Monday. We who live a long way from Ottawa suffer great disadvantage by long adjournments. I see no reason why we should not meet on Monday, as we did last year, and as it was done on several similar occasions. It is very convenient for members living within a few miles of the city to have adjournments, but it is inconvenient for members from the Maritime Provinces, and we seem to be sacrificed on every occasion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Monday is a statutory holiday, and, of course, the Government thought that by adjourning on Thursday evening they would meet the wishes of the House and conform to the holidays that have been fixed by law; that is to say, we adjourn over Friday and Saturday and Sunday, of course, and Monday, which is a holiday by law.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). I have no doubt this arrangement will suit a majority of the members, but, at the same time, I think the remarks that have fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) are very appropriate. If there is an adjournment until Tuesday only, it will be utterly impossible for the members from the Maritime Provinces to visit their homes and return in time for the sitting on Tuesday, as they will not be able to return until Wednesday. Therefore, the Easter adjournment will be of no advantage to them, but will simply leave them with nothing to do for four or five days, while those who live near here, and they are the majority, will no doubt be accommodated. Although we living in the Maritime Provinces are in the minority, we ought to be thought of occasionally, and, if possible, the same accommodation should be given to those who live a few miles further away. Let us all work together or all play together.

DOMINION LANDS ACT, 1883.

Mr. WHITE moved the second reading of Bill (No. 94) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act, 1883.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

CAPE RACE LIGHTHOUSE TRANSFER.

Mr. FOSTER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 100) respecting the transfer of the lighthouse at Cape Race, Newfoundland, and its appurtenances, to the Dominion of Canada.

Motion agreed to, Bill read second time, considered in Committee and reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Ways and Means:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the following rates of duty shall be assessed and collected on each of the articles hereinafter named, and to repeal all Acts or parts of Acts now in force in so far as they provide for assessing and collecting any different rates of duty than the rates hereby provided, or which are inconsistent therewith:—

Almonds, shelled, a specific duty of 5 cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman intend to make any alterations in any of those duties, because, if so, it would be as well to state them before discussing the items in detail.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. McLELAN. We are going to make some alterations in Nos. 6 and 9; we propose to omit No. 16, and to make some alterations in Nos. 32 and 33. These we propose to allow to stand for the present and take up the others.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that, as each item comes up in detail separately, he would be good enough to inform us of the amount of revenue he expects to receive, and of the reasons which call in each particular instance for a change of duty.

Mr. McLELAN. In introducing the Resolutions, I stated in general terms the reasons for making the change from ad valorem to specific duties, so far as it was possible to amend them in that way, and these articles are of that character. The duty on the article at present before the House, almonds, can very well be made specific, and, I think, without greatly increasing the amount we ordinarily receive as duties on those articles. During the past year they have declined in value very much, and the amount received from them has been considerably less than hitherto.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would call the attention of the House to the fact that on this article apparently the increase of duty would amount to about 60 per cent. Now, the total amount of revenue from shelled almonds, it is true, is not very large, but at the same time it is precisely one of those articles which enter pretty largely into the consumption of households that are poor, and it does appear to me that an additional 60 per cent., as it appears to be from the amount we imported, is rather a large addition, considering that it brings very little revenue into the Treasury, and will take a considerable deal more out of the pockets of the consumers than the sum which is represented, as the hon. gentleman knows. Apparently we receive a matter of $2,400 or thereabouts under the duty as it stood last year, and I understand that this change will raise the duty to some 4,000 and odd hundred dollars, which is quite 60 per cent. additional.

Mr. BLAKE. The object must be to protect the industry of shelling almonds, because I observe that there is 3 cents on the unshelled and 5 on the shelled.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman probably knows, if he has bought them, that there is a difference in the value of the two articles.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly, the shells are not worth as much as the kernels.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, we know that, and consequently the duty on the unshelled is not as much as on the shelled. Neither would it be under the ad valorem duty, because the shelled would cost 30 cents and the unshelled 10 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Customs apparently puts 60 per cent. additional on the shelled and 150 per cent on the unshelled.

Mr. BOWELL. No, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, that is apparently the result from the Customs returns.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman will bear in mind that I was not discussing that point.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But that is the fact, all the same, and the Minister of Customs does not dispute the accuracy of the statement.

Mr. BLAKE. If the hon. gentleman puts 60 per cent. on the shelled, and 150 per cent. on the unshelled, it still verifies my observation that the hon. gentleman's tariff must be to further protect the industry of shelling almonds.

Almonds, not shelled, and nuts of all kinds, not elsewhere specified, a specific duty of 3 cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under this, taking the first cost, we receive about \$1,300 on about 100,000 lbs. We raise the duty $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents, although I see it varies in a trifling degree, according to the place from which the almonds come. The amount, it is true, is small, but I again submit to the hon. gentleman that all these duties do bear hardly on a considerable number of small housekeepers throughout the country. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the persons who deal in these articles invariably indemnify themselves by adding considerably to the amount put into the revenue. What the exact value of these unshelled almonds is it may not be easy to determine. I suppose they are worth 5 or 6 cents per pound.

Mr. McLELAN. From 5 to 7 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman is really laying a very heavy tax on these articles of housekeeping—50 or 60 per cent. on articles which come daily into general consumption, and largely among the poorer classes of the community—perhaps more proportionately than among the richer.

Mr. McLELAN. They are more in the nature of a luxury than an article of real necessity, and they may without any great inconvenience yield us a slightly larger revenue than they did last year. The hon. gentleman knows that the duty is very much less in both of these cases than the duty under the American tariff. The amount collected in the United States on this class of goods is between \$3,000,000 and \$4,000,000, and I think they start at $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound, running down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. An hon. gentleman behind me suggests that this is interfering to the detriment of an established industry in Canada, as people will not any longer crack almonds with their teeth, and thereby you injure the dentists.

Baking powder, a specific duty of 6 cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman explain what the value per pound and the additional duty may be?

Mr. McLELAN. The value of the better kinds ranges from 20 cents to 27 cents per pound. There is a great deal of adulterated powder which comes in at a small price. The duty is, if anything, not quite so high as it was upon the better kinds.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The duty was 20 per cent. before.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes; and upon the adulterated kind it will be considerably higher. It depends on the amount of adulteration in it, and the price at which it is sold. But there is no very great change in the duty on baking powder that is fit for use.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What quantity was imported?

Mr. McLELAN. 520,000 lbs. last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then the hon. gentleman adds 50 per cent. to the tax on baking powder.

Mr. McLELAN. No. Something is added on the adulterated article, which was imported at a low price, but I am informed that the average price of pure baking powder, or what is in general use, is about the same under this specific duty as it was before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At present we get $20,000 on 500,000 lbs., and this duty of 6 cents per pound will yield $30,000.

Mr. McLELAN. If it were all imported.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You expect a diminution, then.

Mr. McLELAN. I expect a diminution, because there is a proposition to establish a manufactory on this side.

Boxes, cases and writing desks, fancy and ornamental, and fancy manufactures of bone, shell, horn and ivory, also dolls and toys of all kinds and materials, ornaments of alabaster, spar, terra cotta or composition, statuettes, beads and bead ornaments, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. McLELAN. This is for the purpose of simplifying the tariff and bringing all these articles under one class. Under the old tariff many of these articles were differently rated and specified.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman can, no doubt, give me some idea of the average amount of increase, and also of the amount of duty collected, and the total value of all the articles comprised in this class.

Mr. McLELAN. The value imported last year of these articles was $152,000, and the duty collected $30,000. It is expected, of course, that there will be an increase in the amount collected.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The increase would be $15,000 on the same quantity.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

On blueing—Laundry blueing of all kinds, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. McLELAN. That is an increase of 5 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it for revenue or protective purposes?

Mr. McLELAN. For protective. It is being largely put up now in the Dominion. In Hull a large business is done in preparing it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It appears this is rather running protection to the ground. Articles of this kind are in daily use by all classes of the population, but particularly by a very deserving and industrious class, the washerwomen. It is rather hard, it is going rather low down, to tax an article in general use by that industrious and not overpaid portion of the community. Twenty per cent. ought to be enough, in all conscience, to charge washerwomen, without increasing the duty 5 per cent. What amount may be imported—a rough estimate?

Mr. McLELAN. I am not able to say, but a considerable quantity is. I believe the duty will tend rather to lessen the amount received.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, this increase makes it prohibitive.

Mr. McLELAN. By having the home market completely, the manufacturers will be able to produce at less cost than when they had only a part of the market.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This includes simply the article commonly in use by the washing women.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes, button blue.

Mr. BOWELL. You may have to pay 10 cents more for your washing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman is going to add a rider to his proposition, so as to increase the wages of the washerwomen, there is a good deal to be said in favor of it.

Mr. BOWELL. I am quite ready to second a motion of the hon. gentleman to that effect.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But I am not entitled to increase the burdens of the people.

Feathers, ostrich and vulture, undressed, 20 per cent. ad valorem. do do do dressed 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was that before?

Mr. McLELAN. It was 15 per cent. undressed and 25 per cent. dressed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What amount of revenue is expected from this increase?

Mr. McLELAN. About $5,000 or $6,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Apparently, we imported last year about $200,000 worth of dressed feathers, on which the duty is to be raised 15 per cent. I do not think that will at all diminish the consumption, as the ladies will have their feathers. The undressed feathers appear to be a small item; and I should compute the increase on dressed at about $10,000.

Mr. McLELAN. Fashions change very much. If there be the same importation as last year, the increase will be about $9,500. Some years feathers are up, and some years they are down.

Fruit, dried, viz.: Raisins, a specific duty of 1 cent per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. McLELAN. Taking, first, the raisins, we imported last year 7,762,000 lbs. and collected a duty of $70,691. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the Trade Returns of 1882, he will see that in that year we imported 7,041,000 lbs., on which we received a duty of $109,325. We received on the same quantity this year only $70,000, in consequence of their great reduction in value. Assuming the same quantities would be imported this year, the rate I have fixed will bring the duty to $113,000, $3,000 more than was received in 1882. The object will be to reach about the same amount of duty that we collected in 1882 and 1883 upon these articles at their then value under a 20 per cent. tariff.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will see that in practice there is here an addition of about 50 per cent. of a duty. The duty last year amounted to about $70,000; now it will be $113,000. It is quite true that there has been a drop in the value of raisins; but if, as is not unlikely, the value of raisins should rise again, then the consumer will be saddled with a much heavier duty than he had to pay in 1882. The hon. gentleman does not propose to reduce the duty if the value of raisins gets up, but he puts it on because the value has been going down.

Mr. McLELAN. No; the difference will not be so much if it goes up, because a part of the duty is specific, 1 cent a pound, and the reason for putting on the ad valorem duty is that there is a great difference in the value of raisins.

Mr. McMULLEN. This ad valorem duty on raisins is a very unjust imposition. It strikes directly at the poorer classes.

Mr. BOWELL. It is the other way.

Mr. McMULLEN. Take a pound of raisins that cost 5 cents, to that you add 1 cent a pound of specific duty.

Mr. BOWELL. You said ad valorem.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then you add 10 per cent. ad valorem to the duty on the pound of raisins. Take the case of a pound of raisins worth 20 cents. You only add 1 cent specific, and 10 per cent. ad valorem. So the man who buys a pound of raisins at 5 cents will pay the 1 cent a pound and the specific duty of 10 per cent., while the man who buys a pound of raisins at 20 cents will, in the same way, pay only 1 cent a pound and 10 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. That is only 3 cents.

Mr. McMULLEN. But the other is 1½ cents. The poor man pays 1½ cents on his 5 cent a pound raisins, and the rich man pays only 3 cents on his 20 cent a pound raisins. These gentlemen claim that they try to protect the poor man, but this is in the other direction. The specific duty on the article of raisins is wrong. If you put on an ad valorem duty, everyone pays the same share, but this commodity is very largely used by the poorer classes, and consequently they are paying the largest portion of the duty, while the richer class escape in consequence of the duty in connection with this article. I say that, in regard to dried fruit, such as raisins and currants, which are used by the poorer classes, the duty should be ad valorem and not specific, because, otherwise, you strike at the poorer classes and make it better for the richer classes.

Mr. McLELAN,

Currants, dates, figs, prunes and all other dried fruits not elsewhere specified, a specific duty of 1 cent per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is not very easy to trace. The hon. gentleman had better give us the sum total of the whole.

Mr. McLELAN. The duty collected in 1885 was $63,145, and it is expected that from this source we will get from $75,000 to $80,000. These are very much of the same value, and, therefore, there is not the same variation in regard to value as there is in raisins. This duty is left wholly specific, because it is simpler.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is true of some, but not of all.

Mr. McLELAN. Very nearly of all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Practically speaking, and speaking at the present moment, taking, for instance, such an article as currants, I find that 5,000,000 lbs. of currants were imported last year, which paid $35,000. It is quite clear that here also the actual duty will be raised 50 per cent under the operation of the present tariff, as compared with that of last year. It may be, and no doubt is, the case that, a few years ago, these articles were dearer, and that this will bring them back, as far as the revenue is concerned, to about the same position; but, at the same time, it is an addition of 50 per cent. on articles entering into general consumption.

Mr. McMULLEN. My remarks in regard to raisins hold good in regard to currants. When they are a season or two old, they drop very much in price. For instance, the currants of the season of 1883-84 will sell for less than those of the season of 1885-86. The fresh fruit always brings the highest price. You place a cent a pound on the currants which are sold to the poorer classes, while the fresh fruit will be sold to those who are able to pay the higher price, and that will have only a cent a pound duty on it also. This fruit is imported and largely sold to the lower classes. It is used by almost every family, and, by putting a specific duty of 1 cent a pound on it, you strike at the poorer classes and make them pay the largest share of the duty.

Green fruit, viz.: Blackberries, gooseberries, raspberries and strawberries, a specific duty of 4 cents per pound, the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am very sorry to see that the hon. gentleman has been induced to impose this particular duty. It appears to me that this is very objectionable. It will do no practical good to any of our fruit growers, and it tends directly to deprive a large number of our people, especially those living in cities and towns, of a natural and wholesome luxury, which it is not expedient to interfere with. The amount of duty is very small; in fact, I think, as I am advised, that the trade in this fruit will be altogether killed off, for people will not use it. I do not know precisely what the weight may be, but as the package in which the fruit is to be imported is included in the rate for duty, I think from 6 cents to 8 cents per quart will be levied on all those articles which are brought in. Unless I am misinformed, the Americans have amended their tariff, and allowed us to export those articles free. I think there is no duty on those goods imported into the States at present.

Mr. BOWELL. What? Green fruits?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This class of fruits. I think they removed the duty a little time ago.

Mr. McLELAN. It may be so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am speaking under correction. I ask the Minister of Customs how that is? My impression is that they did on a good many of these articles.

Mr. BOWELL. I am not aware of that. I was under the impression that their duty formerly was much higher than ours.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That has not been verified.

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would be as well to see, because the statement was made, not only from the Treasury benches, but I think it was embodied in one of our Acts of Parliament, that in cases where the Americans removed the duty, we would follow suit.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, on special articles mentioned in the resolution of the tariff. It stands on the Statute-book.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the principle was intended to be a general one.

Mr. BOWELL. No. That resolution confines it to certain articles, covering nearly all the articles which were formerly admitted free under the old Reciprocity Treaty; and the power is given to the Governor in Council to put them on the free list, in case the Americans pass a similar law.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I read the article as giving the Governor in Council pretty wide power. I am inclined to think that the Minister will find that he could give a large reduction of duty under it if he chose to exercise his power. However that by the way, what I really object to is this: That, as anybody can see, by looking at the present Trade and Navigation Returns, the amount of revenue that has been derived is small, the amount of revenue that will be derived is very small, and, in point of fact, it will really amount to cutting off the great body of consumers of fruits from any chance of obtaining these fruits a little earlier than they are grown in our own country. That will be the practical result of it, and I think it is an injurious step in legislation. I do not believe it will give any sort of protection, because certain portions of the States can furnish us with these fruits several weeks in advance of the time at which it is possible for our own fruit growers to do it. All, I think, the hon. gentleman will make by this will be to put an end to this trade, such as it is, which is undoubtedly a useful trade—very useful to our people when they are just emerging from a long winter. I must say I regret that the hon. gentleman has been induced to incorporate this in his tariff.

Mr. McLELAN. It has been represented to me, and I believe, that the growth of strawberries and other fruit has become a very large industry in the west, and if reasonably protected, the western strawberry fields will be sufficient for the supply of the whole Dominion. At present strawberries ripen on the other side of the line a week or so earlier than they do on this side, and they have been sent in at 2 cents a quart, while they cost here 30 cents a pound. The hon. gentleman will see that that is a very small percentage of duty, even looking at it in that light—when they were sent in here costing 25 and 30 cents a pound, and we collecting only 2 cents a pound duty. The duty will be 20 per cent. on an article costing 20 cents, and sold here from 30 to 35 cents when the fruit first comes. It is thought that this will not stop the early importation of fruit any more than if we had placed it at 20 per cent—it will not tax them any more until they have fallen in price on the other side very low. The two cents enables American growers to flood our market with berries, to the disadvantage of our own growers, and I think it is but right and fair to our own people that they should have the benefit of our markets when their strawberries are ripe.

Mr. CHARLTON. The duty proposed upon strawberries and small fruit will not operate as a protection in any way at all, because, when our small fruits are ripe, those on the other side are not imported. Our fruits are fresh from our own growers, and are of better quality and sold at a lower rate. But before our fruits are ripe, strawberries and other small fruits from Maryland, Virginia, and other Southern States, reach our market before our fruits do. Now, the hon. gentleman proposes that the sick and invalid who require a delicacy of this kind, before it is ripe in our own market, should be taxed this exorbitant rate of 4 cents a pound; and this fruit, bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, being brought a long distance, generally arrives, a portion of it, in bad order and unsaleable, and the duty will be levied upon the saleable and unsaleable portions alike, and the portion of fruit that arrive in good order will bear a duty enormously out of proportion to its value. It is a vexatious duty. The amount of revenue realised will be very small. The benefit to our own growers will be nothing. It makes no difference at all to them, because they control the market when their fruits are ready. It is a tax upon weakly people who desire to use early fruit, and chiefly persons in delicate health, invalids. I do not see a duty on the list which is more objectionable than this duty. I can see no reason that can be urged in favor of it, because it is not benefiting our own growers, but in enormously increasing the cost of the early fruit's brought from a distance for classes of people who desire a delicacy of that kind.

Mr. HESSON. I do not see the validity of the argument of the hon. member for Wellington, that this is going to be a tax upon the poor man's fruit. I look upon that quality of fruit out of season as being one of those luxuries that gentlemen and wealthy families wish to have, and they ought to pay a duty for it. Now, I think the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat represents a county which, above many others, is interested in the growth of fruit.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, and we get no protection.

Mr. HESSON. The county of Norfolk produces a large quantity of small fruit, and the growers must feel keenly, at times, the competition of American fruit in our market.

Mr. CHARLTON. They do not feel it at all.

Mr. HESSON. These small fruits are produced largely in gardens in the neighborhood of large towns and cities, and we know that an immense number of people make a living by this industry. Their gardens being so productive, they get a large return from them, and I am satisfied they are very much interfered with by American fruit being put into the market in competition with their own, although it may be but a few days earlier. Now, I am satisfied that the importation of early fruit, if only a few days in advance of our own, injuriously affects fruit growers in the Elgins, the Norfolks, Welland and other counties. I know that the frontier towns and counties produce in abundance very early and good apples, and there is scarcely a county in the Dominion that does not now produce these small fruits. They may be a few days later than American fruits, but, at the same time, I think that a protection is absolutely necessary for the growers of small fruits in Canada. It is not a question of obtaining a large revenue, I presume. The duty will not work any injury to those who want early fruit, except, perhaps, in the case of invalids, to whom it may be looked upon as a luxury. Well, I have no doubt they will always find means of obtaining, even after they are taxed 4 cents a pound, fruits a few days earlier than they are grown in Canada.

Mr. CHARLTON. I must deny the assertion of the hon. gentleman that my own county and the counties along Lake Erie that are largely engaged in fruit growing, require protection, for the reason that when their fruits are ripe they control the market. Such a thing as the importation of American small fruits, after our own strawberries are ripe, I never heard of, because we produce fruits much cheaper than are produced on the other side, and of a much better quality. The cost of transportation and the damage to the fruit settles the question in favor of our growers. No competition exists, and there is no necessity for protection whatever, so far as our own growers are concerned, and certainly as regards the counties on the shores of Lake Erie, engaged in the industry are concerned, the necessity of a duty as a protective measure is not felt. There is no demand made for it, and it will be no benefit whatever, because our growers control the market as it is.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The importation of strawberries into our market always takes place before our own berries are ripe. To increase the duty will not enhance the price of the strawberries we produce in this country, but it will raise the price of strawberries used by those people who desire them early, for whose use foreign berries are brought in before our own are ready for market. When our berries are ripe importation ceases. I think this increased duty is not in the interest of the people, and it will impose an unnecessary tax on those who may require strawberries before our own are ripe.

Mr. McCRAVEY. I cannot quite agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Living, as I do, in one of the largest fruit-growing sections in Ontario, I know the disadvantage under which our fruit growers suffer from competition with American fruit. A large quantity of fruit which is a surplus from the United States markets, is thrown into our markets and sold for anything it will realise. The result is that it ruins the market for our own producers. With regard to growing fruit in our own country, taking the western counties of Essex and Kent, and coming eastward along Lake Erie shore and the shore of Lake Ontario, you have two months at least that you can have this fruit. We have as good a country for raising small fruits as any on the face of the earth. I feel that this increased duty is all right. Although I am not in favor of the principle of protection, at the same time we are going to protect other industries in our country, I say that certainly the growers of small fruits have as much right to protection as others. There are a number of people who make a living out of growing small fruits. I am in favor of the proposal.

Mr. HICKEY. I think the last speaker has fully answered the remarks of the hon. member for North Norfolk and the hon. member for East Grey. Strawberries in that hon. gentleman's county are as early as they are in the United States—at all events, as early as those that come into our ordinary markets. If the American berries do not come into competition with our own, it is as well to tax them when they do come.

Mr. SCRIVER. I can say, from personal observation and experience, that American berries do not come into competition with Ontario berries. When we have in Montreal a large quantity of Ontario berries we have no American berries. That has been the case under the old tariff, and this additional duty will, as the hon. member for

Mr. HANSON.

North Norfolk has stated, not further the protection to the growers of small fruits in Ontario.

Mr. VAIL. It is rather a hard case to make our people, who very often purchase green fruit coming from the United States three or four weeks before our own fruit is ripe, pay this additional duty. I do not, however, see how this proposal can be carried out, for the reason that, as I am informed, the American Government removed the duty and made strawberries free in 1883. If that is so under an Order in Council that was passed in 1879, our Government will be obliged to allow American green fruit to come in on the same terms as the Americans allow our fruit to enter their markets. I do not see any object in placing a duty on that fruit if the case is as I have stated it. The Finance Minister should know about the matter.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am glad to see hon. gentlemen opposite divided on this question, as they are on all others. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. McCraney) advocates protection to strawberries, because they are produced largely in his constituency. We who live in the river counties adjoining the State of New York, find our berries ripen as soon as theirs do. Last year we had a lengthy session of Parliament, and it was my duty to pass from Gananoque here every Monday afternoon. At Mallorytown, a station on the Grand Trunk, every Monday afternoon, two or three cars of strawberries for Montreal would be on the track, and the same state of things prevailed at Lynn in the adjoining constituency. Those berries were shipped to Montreal, and they were ripe as soon as those in the State of New York. I am strongly in favor of giving protection to our growers and berry pickers. There are a large number employed in picking berries during the summer season at Halton and in my own county. These are of the laboring class, and I am glad to see them protected by increased duties on strawberries.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. gentleman is disposed to make all the other Provinces that have to wait three or four weeks before their fruit ripens, pay duty in the meantime for the benefit of a few people who happen to live on the lake shore in Ontario. If it is true that our fruit ripens as quickly as does that in the United States—

Mr. TAYLOR. I said the State of New York.

Mr. VAIL. If so, there is no necessity for increased protection.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. gentleman has entirely misconceived the statements made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. No one has contended that the berries we receive from across the lines can compete with those raised in this country. But in Montreal we receive strawberries from New Jersey and south of New York city three or four weeks before Ontario berries come in. As soon as Ontario berries reach Montreal the United States berries cease to arrive, being displaced in the market, the Ontario berries coming a much shorter distance and being grown in a more favorable climate for the perfecting of the fruit. The result is that the United States berries, brought upon that market, at all events, do not at all interfere with the sale of the Ontario berries. But in the meantime, Sir, in consequence of the duty which has been put on, everybody who eats strawberries and other small fruits a little earlier in the season, will have to pay this increase without benefit to our growers. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he thinks any of those berries that are grown a mile across the river, ever come into this country? They do not grow there to any extent. I do not believe they do. At any rate, I do not believe that the berries which ripen at the same time can possibly come into the country. This increase is a very serious one. The duty used to be 2 cents per quart; now it is 4 cents per pound, which will be about 8 cents a quart when you include the weight of the package.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would ask the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) to answer the question of the hon. member who has last spoken. He says the berries come in from New York down in his part of the country, and if they do, they must compete with our berries, because ours ripen as soon as those in the State of New York, right opposite.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman really think that the Ontario growers send fruit to Digby?

Mr. TAYLOR. They come into Canada.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. gentleman must remember that the State of New York extends very far south, while, on the other hand, he will hardly say that the Ontario berries are shipped down to Digby in Nova Scotia.

Mr. IRVINE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the American Government have imposed an import duty on small fruits?

Mr. McLELAN. They have imposed a duty on almost everything we send or can send across the line except eggs.

Mr. KING. Have they imposed a duty on berries?

Mr. McLELAN. I think so.

Mr. VAIL. Is it true that the Americans removed this duty on the 1st July, 1883? I think the Finance Minister ought to tell us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My recollection is the same as that of the hon. member for Digby—that the duty has been removed.

Mr. MILLS. The duty on fruits, seeds, plants, trees, &c., was removed in 1883. There is nothing to prevent competition across the border, and I suppose if American berries grown in the immediate vicinity of the boundary line are imported into Canada, Canadian berries can also pass into the United States on the same terms. I do not apprehend that competition will do any more harm on the one side than on the other, but the inconvenience is that mentioned by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that you prohibit the importation by this largely increased duty on berries which are grown in a more southerly climate and are brought into our markets and consumed before our own berries come into use at all. I think the hon. gentleman knows that, unless in the immediate vicinity of the border the Canadian growers supply the Canadian market during the season of Canadian production.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I am called upon to say a few words on this subject, because in the constituency that I represent this is getting to be a very large industry, and it is important in this sense—not that it supplies the local wants of the people, but that it supplies the markets of Montreal, Ottawa, and other large cities in our own country. Now, I do not know, I have not learned whether the Americans have imposed a duty on berries going into their country from this or not. However, it makes no difference from my point of view. I would favor the imposition of a duty to prevent the Americans getting control of the markets of those Canadian cities, and in the absence of the duty there would be very great danger of that being done, to the destruction, or, at all events, to the injury of the Canadian industry. So far as the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) has touched upon the subject, it would appear that it was simply a question with him whether the tastes of a few, who, I presume, are among the wealthier classes of Montreal and other cities, would be gratified just a week or two before they would be gratified by the importation into their cities of berries from the other districts of Canada. I think, everything considered, and for the sake of preserving our own local market to our own local dealers, and preventing the Americans from competing with us in the larger fields to which our berries are exported, we should have the duty raised.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I represent a constituency which produces strawberries to a very large extent. The experience of the Fruit Growers' Association in both Lincoln and Welland counties is that for about ten days before the Canadian strawberries are ripe berries are brought from the States to the south of the lake—indeed, from almost as far south as Philadelphia—into this country in large quantities, in crates, as high as twenty tons a day sometimes crossing the Niagara River. For these berries the American producers realise on the quart, and when the Canadian berries come in the price is down, and the Americans cease to send them into the country. The importers of these American berries realise a very large price, and by the time any berries are ready the market is so glutted that the price at once falls. The market is filled with these American berries, and remains filled for a week or ten days after the Canadian berries come on the market. I contend that the consumer in Canada would not be injured by the imposition of the duty, except those who can well afford to pay. Those berries which come in early are purchased by hotel-keepers and others who can well afford to pay for them, and pay a small increase of duty. Nine-tenths of the consumers of Canada would receive their berries at as low a rate with this duty as they now do, because, as I have said, the market is only reduced in value when the Canadian producer puts his berries on the market. Now, I believe it is the duty of this Parliament and this Government to protect the Canadian producer, and give him the early market, or, at all events, curtail as far as this duty will curtail, the importation. It costs about 5 cents a quart to produce strawberries, and berries in my own neighborhood were sold last year as low as 3 cents per quart. Half the berries rotted on the ground as there was no market for them. The effect of the increased duty would be to lessen importation and prevent a glut of the market by the American producers, and give the Canadian producer their own market for their product. The small increase of duty of 2 cents would not prohibit the introduction of the American berries into this market, for this reason: that the American producer when he sells in our market, as we all know, gets from 12 to 25 cents per quart for his berries, so that the additional 2 cents would not prohibit them from coming into the country, but it would the amount imported.

Mr. KING. I do not think this duty is calculated to increase the price of berries in the Maritime Provinces at the season of the year when they are in general use, but I think it my duty to point out a danger to which our people are likely to be exposed from this duty. At the present time a large trade is growing up in New Brunswick in the export of strawberries, raspberries and blueberries to the United States, and the effect of imposing a duty of this kind may be to cause the American Government to retaliate and exclude our people from their market. If that were done, it would destroy a very large trade.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would really call the attention of the Government to the point raised by my hon. friend. Information has been given to me that a trade in various kinds of berries has begun to spring up between this country and the United States. That was the reason why I stated that I believe the duty on green fruit going into the United States has been abolished. We had an experience of the result of rash intermeddling with the duty on malt, by which the hon. gentleman's predecessor afforded an excuse to the Americans to destroy a very valuable branch of our trade; and this duty, which is practically a prohibitory one, may altogether destroy this export trade in fruit which is beginning to spring up. This charge of 8 cents per quart, including the package, practically amounts to 12 cents, because everybody knows that a very large portion of the fruit brought in is damaged in transit, and certainly not more than two-thirds of it finds its way to the Canadian consumer.

Mr. IRVINE. I think the Government should ascertain whether it is a fact that the Americans have abolished the duty on these small fruits, because there is an important consideration that we should look to as much as protecting Canadian agriculturists—that is, our self respect and honor. I understand that there is a standing resolution on the part of the Canadian Government that as soon as the American Government takes off certain duties this Government will reciprocate. I know that the duty has been taken off apples, and I understand, from hearsay, that it has also been taken off small fruits. The hon. gentleman opposite speaks on behalf of the Ontario gardener; I speak on behalf of the New Brunswick gardener and farmer when I say that our crop of fruit is gathered when all the other crops have gone out, and it would be a great hardship to our people in New Brunswick if a duty were imposed on an article from which the American Government have taken the duty off. I think the Government should ascertain whether the Americans have taken the duty off or not.

Mr. GILLMOR. I am aware myself that there is no duty on green fruit sent into the United States; and in the Province of New Brunswick, the export of blueberries and cranberries has become quite an industry. From the parish in which I live 1,000 bushels of blueberries are sent to the States every year, and perhaps an equal quantity of cranberries; and if this duty has the effect of causing the Americans to put a like duty on the fruit we send to the United States, it will act injuriously to that industry. Strawberries are not cultivated to any great extent in my neighborhood, but I understand that strawberries are shipped in large quantities from St. John. The truth is, I do not believe any interest is served by this principle of protection; but not to go into that question, I think it would be well for the Minister to ascertain how this duty would act. I do not believe this duty is going to produce such favorable results for the fruit growers of Ontario as the hon. gentleman who spoke on their behalf supposes. He says that after this dear fruit went out, their strawberries were rotting on the ground. If there is a surplus of that kind, I do not think the people can be injured by a few early fruits coming in in season.

Mr. VAIL. I am opposed to this duty because it would result in a very great disadvantage to our people. It is well known that the Tariff Act of 1879 provides that when the following articles, that is to say, animals, green fruit, hay, straw, seeds of all kinds, and vegetables, are allowed to go into the United States duty free, the Government of this country shall be empowered to pass an Order in Council authorising the admission of the same articles into Canada duty free.

Mr. BOWELL. It says they may, not shall.

Mr. VAIL. I hope they will make up their minds that they will, after they hear what I say. I am quite sure, from what I have heard, that green fruit has been admitted into the United States free since the 1st of July, 1883. I may state that we have steamers running from Yarmouth to Boston, and from Digby to Boston and Mount Desert, in the summer time. Mount Desert is now a great watering-place, and thousands of boxes of strawberries are shipped from Annapolis county and some portions of Digby county, after the American strawberry season is over, to these watering-places. Some also are shipped from the county of Yarmouth, and besides that, the quantity of blueberries that are shipped, I may state, amount to hundreds of barrels from the Annapolis valley. Suppose the Americans chose to take advantage of this and return to the old duty, it will result to our disadvantage. I hope the Minister of Finance will let this stand, until he has had an opportunity to enquire more fully into the matter.

Mr. McMULLEN. In this matter there should be more time taken to consider the whole question. The duty is really prohibitory, because 4 cents a pound is equal to about 8 cents a quart. This fruit realises, in Toronto, about 10 cents a quart, and the Government, by this duty, are charging 100 per cent. on green fruit brought into the country. While we are willing they should extend protection to people in this line, as well as in others, it is unfair to the consumer that the Government should give this trade such an absolute monopoly by imposing a duty of 100 per cent. Two cents per quart is ample protection. If the Fruit Growers Association had sufficient influence to exact a pledge from the Government that this protection would be afforded, the Association must have gone away, laughing in their sleeve at their success, because the duty is practically prohibitive. There is no class which does not use this kind of fruit, and this duty will enable the fruit growers to form a combination and put up the price to the highest figure the people will be willing to pay. If you are going to protect at all, protect in a uniform way, so that one class will not be able to complain that another class has greater protection. In this case the Government are protecting the fruit growers 100 per cent. against the 30 per cent. protection afforded other industries.

Mr. McLELAN. The reason for increasing the duty was that, as a matter of revenue, we were taxing a luxury. At the time this duty will be collected, the fruit is sold at very high prices and regarded as a luxury, to be bought and consumed only by the rich. At 2 cents a pound as previously charged, the duty did not equal 10 per cent. The fruit is sold about 30 cents a pound here, and in putting on 4 cents a pound, we are only charging 20 per cent. on an article which is considered a luxury, just as wines and silks are.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; but you will not get revenue out of this.

Mr. McLELAN. We thought we should increase the duty, and at the same time afford protection when the price goes down and our own people can supply the market fully. Then the duty will be no hardship. The hon. gentleman says we should admit these free or not change the duty, because they may be free in the United States. Our desire is to obtain reciprocity in more important articles than strawberries, and when anything like a general reciprocity is proposed we have the authority, under Act of Parliament, to declare these free, so that no impediment exists on that score.

Mr. BLAKE. For some years, when we contended it was the duty of the Government to approach the Government of the United States with reference to negotiating freer trade relations, we were told, no; they had nothing to do with it. Why? Because there was standing over upon our Statute-book an Act declaring that the moment the Legislature of the United States repealed or reduced the duty on certain specific articles, we would do likewise. We asked: Do they know that? Oh, of course they do; very well, was the answer; there is our invitation on our Statute, and there it has been since 1879. In the end this invitation has been partly acceded to by the United States, and the hon. gentleman's response is to increase the duties on the articles they declare free.

Mr. KING. The hon. Minister of Finance admits the United States allow these articles to enter free of duty, and I would ask if he has considered what the result would be should the American Government retaliate by imposing again a duty on these articles. I find from the Trade and Navigation Returns that one-half the small fruits exported go from the Province of New Brunswick, and form a large portion of the traffic upon one of the principal lines of railway in that Province, so that New Brunswick would be very much affected by any change of policy on the part of the Americans.

Mr. KIRK. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the duty, because that would be useless, but for the purpose of pointing out that the Government have different policies for different articles, different policies for different systems. The policy as laid down by the Minister of Customs is :

"That in all cases where you can open trade relations either with a colony of Her Majesty or with a foreign State, where you can receive equal privileges, by being allowed to send to their markets either the products of the soil or the products of the manufactories, it is to our advantage to obtain those markets, and, if we can do so by getting privileges equal to those given by us, it is our duty to obtain that in every part of the world."

There is the principle laid down by the Minister of Customs at a time when I brought this question up in the House, but in this case the Government ignore this principle, whilst in the Province of Nova Scotia or the Maritime Provinces they have a different policy. Whilst they impose a protection in the interest of an industry purely or almost altogether belonging to Ontario, they refuse to adopt that policy towards one of the greatest industries of the Maritime Provinces, the fishing industry; because they allow the fish to come in from Newfoundland free of duty, and refuse to protect the fish of the Maritime Provinces in the interest of the people there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman did not state what additional revenue he expects. I ask for that, because I shall be curious to compare the results.

Mr. McLELAN. We expect the same revenue.

Mr. BLAKE. The same revenue from strawberries? The hon. gentleman stated a little while ago that he expected more revenue.

Mr. McLELAN. We get it on a less importation, as there will be a larger amount of home produce.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman said he wanted more revenue, and at the same time more protection for the home growth.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. member was not here during the whole discussion. I said we wanted protection as well as revenue.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman said he wanted more revenue as well as protection, and he was to get more revenue, and he did not see any harm in getting that from a luxury. Now he says he does not expect any increase in revenue. The people will get less fruit, but there will be the same revenue.

Peaches, a specific duty of 1 cent per pound, the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. About what does the hon. gentleman expect on this? What is the weight of a bushel of peaches?

Mr. McLELAN. About forty-five pounds.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is forty-five pounds the weight? What does my hon. friend from Welland say? Is it not about sixty pounds, counting the stones?

Mr. SCRIVER. I should think it would be about fifty pounds.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the duty now?

Mr. McLELAN. 40 cents a bushel.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose, when the package is included, it will be sixty pounds.

Mr. McLELAN. Including the package, it will be about fifty pounds.

Gimps, cords, braids, ribbons and bindings, when imported by hat manufacturers for use in their factories, 15 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. McLELAN. I find that there are a great many difficulties connected with this. A great many people call themselves manufacturers of hats who are only sewing cloth hats. It was intended that this should apply to machine-made hats, and should be for the benefit of those manufacturers, and it was thought that a reasonable protection could be given and that it would not be abused, but, finding that there will be so many difficulties in the way, I move that the item be not concurred in.

Mr. BLAKE. In fact, the hon. gentleman found the trade was as mad as a hatter.

Item struck out.

Gas, water and soil pipes of cast iron, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the duty now, 20 per cent.?

Mr. McLELAN. 25 per cent., I think.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does the hon. gentleman put this on for, revenue or protection?

Mr. McLELAN. The present duty is 25 per cent. It is an increase of 5 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much revenue is expected?

Mr. McLELAN. Not any revenue is expected from this.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would point out to the House that the hon. gentleman expects no revenue, and these matters are very intimately connected with the hygienic apparatus which are required in cities and towns, and I think the hon. gentleman is acting very injudiciously in adding to the necessary cost of these articles. Anyone with experience in practical building knows that the quality of the pipes supplied is and has been injuriously affected by the duty put upon them, and that the health of the inhabitants in many places is more or less injuriously affected by the very indifferent character of the plumbing apparatus connected with closets and things of that kind in our cities and towns. That is an evil which is constantly complained of and which is growing, and I think the hon. gentleman, whatever his intentions may be, will aggravate that evil by adding to the cost of these articles. He says there is no revenue in it.

Mr. BLAKE. Has the hon. gentleman received an application from manufacturers for the increase of the duty?

Mr. McLELAN. It has been represented to me that, as the hon. gentleman says, a great deal of inferior pipe has been imported and entered at reduced rates, compared with a year or two ago, and the quality of the piping used from the importation, not from the manufacture at home, has deteriorated very largely. I am assured, by gentlemen who are acquainted with the business, that we are manufacturing a better article of pipe in the country now than that which is imported at reduced rates, and that it can be manufactured here of good quality at the same rates as poor qualities can be imported. So, I think, it is desirable to encourage our own people to extend their operations a little, and also in order to keep out the inferior qualities which have been coming in, as the hon. gentleman has represented.

Mr. BLAKE. It is the health of the people which the hon. gentleman is anxious to protect. Would it not be better to prevent these wicked importers of gas pipes from bringing their wares into the country at all?

Mr. McLELAN. It is attending to the health of the people if you give the people employment, and if you keep out an inferior class of piping and plumbing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Which is the cause that so many people are leaving Canada, I perceive.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite clear that, instead of getting revenue from this change we are going to lose revenue, because the Finance Minister admits that a quantity of inferior pipe has been imported, and his object is to shut it out. Thus we shall lose revenue, and he is making a change which will cut down the revenue at a time when we want it.

Mr. MILLS. I am unable to understand how it is, if the imported article is inferior and dearer, that it is imported at all, and why it is necessary to keep out a dear and bad article when a good and cheap article is made in the country. I think the matter is so extraordinary that the hon. gentleman ought to give the House some information on the subject.

Mr. McLELAN. I did not say we manufactured a good article here cheaper than a poor article was imported. I said that inferior articles were being imported at lower prices than a good article could be introduced from abroad.

Mr. FISHER. Did the hon. Minister obtain his information as to the quality of the imported article from the manufacturers in this country or from the consumers who had made complaints?

Mr. McLELAN. From both.

Mr. BLAKE. I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman enquired of the consumer in this case. May I ask whether the consumer invited the hon. gentleman to increase the tax on the imported article?

Mr. McLELAN. I have been a consumer myself.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman may be a consumer, but I did not credit him with knowing anything about this. It was the information he obtained I wished to be communicated to us.

Mr. MILLS. It is clear the hon. gentleman has consulted the party in whose opinion he has the greatest possible confidence.

Gloves and mitts of all kinds, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here there is an increase of 5 per cent. Does the hon. gentleman expect in this article to obtain a revenue, or is this another addition to the burdens of the people, under the guise of protecting some half a dozen, to the detriment of some half dozen millions?

Mr. McLELAN. There were two or three rates on gloves previously. I put them all together and make them a uniform rate. We were manufacturing certain descriptions of gloves in this country, but the finer and higher priced gloves have been imported, and I assume will be for many years. They are importing into England and the United States French kid gloves, and as we are charging upon silks 30 per cent, I did not see any reason why silk gloves or fine kid gloves coming from abroad, should not be charged at the same rate as the silk dress that is worn with them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What additional amount do you expect to obtain?

Mr. McLELAN. We get from $15,000 to $20,000.

Mr. BLAKE. Is this an additional amount?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Was there any application from manufacturers in this case?

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. They evidently have had a monopoly in the manufacture of gloves in Canada ever since the National Policy was introduced, particularly in poorer classes.

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes; they have. There are only a few manufactures here, and this increase will enable them to put their heads together and raise the price. Gloves have been sold cheap, I admit, because there is a competition at home, but that was owing to the fact that they come in competition with imported articles. Now, by this increase, you place the manufacturers of these gloves in a position that they can arrange among themselves for an all-round increase upon all classes of gloves that are manufactured, and the public have to pay for them.

Mr. BOWELL. There were $362,920 worth imported last year.

Hairecloth of all kinds, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What has been the amount of imports?

Mr. McLELAN. There are two rates upon haircloth, and this is making the two rates uniform. All kinds are being manufactured here, and there is difficulty in the Custom house as to what is furniture; the total value imported last year was $30,000.

Mr. BLAKE. How many manufacturers are there?

Mr. McLELAN. I do not know the number. But I have seen samples, both of furniture haircloth, and for other purposes, from the manufacturers.

Mr. BLAKE. I presume they accompany the samples with an application for an increase of duty?

Mr. McLELAN. They said: We are manufacturing this description of cloth, and you have a duty upon these goods of 30 per cent., we are making this description of cloth, and you are charging only 20 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. And they asked the hon. gentleman to lower the 30 to 20?

Mr. McLELAN. No, they did not ask that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was there any revenue in this at all?

Mr. McLELAN. There would be a little revenue, about $500. It is more for the sake of uniformity than for the sake of revenue.

Harness and saddlery of every description, and parts of the same, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How did that stand? I thought that part of that was 30 per cent., if I remember aright.

Mr. BOWELL. Portions of it. If you look at the tariff you will find that some is 30 per cent. There are certain products, that are parts of machinery and parts of carriages, which are also charged 30 per cent., and some are 25 per cent. A difficulty has arisen as to what really constitutes part of a carriage, take for instance the snap; if it comes in straight, it is ruled as not a part of the carriage, and pays 30 per cent., if bent to go over the fills, it has to pay 35 per cent. The object of this change is simply to do away with the difficulty that has existed. There is no revenue expected from it.

Mr. SCRIVER. The hon. member is speaking of carriages. This is harness and saddlery.

Mr. BOWELL. It is precisely the same thing. The same principle applies.

Mr. SCRIVER. There are no large manufacturers of harness and saddlery in the country. The present duty is 25 per cent., is it not on saddlery?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. SCRIVER. I can see no good reason why the duty on this article should be increased. 25 per cent. ought to be a pretty good protection.

Mr. BOWELL. I thought I was referring to hardware. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for calling my attention to it. This is simply an increase of duty of 5 per cent. upon harnesses and saddlery manufactured in the country.

Mr. SCRIVER. Can the Minister give the House any good reason for that increase of duty? It can hardly be made in the interest of protection, I think, because harnesses and saddles are not manufactured here on any large scale, so far as I am aware.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total importation of harness and saddlery?

Mr. McLELAN. $42,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. $42,000 is all we imported, I should think that the direct result of this will be to add, as my hon. friend behind me says, a considerable sum of money to the burdens of the people. Practically speaking, the price of harnesses and saddlery is regulated by competition from abroad. If $42,000 is all we imported, I should suppose that a million would about represent what was made in this country, because the quantity consumed of harnesses and saddlery must be very large if, for the sake of getting a few hundred dollars revenue, you are going to add to the price of a much larger quantity of goods manufactured in the country. It may be all very well for the manufacturers, but it is pretty hard for the consumer.

Mr. BOWELL. I find, on reading this item again, that I was literally correct in my first remarks; I was misled by the remarks of the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver). Take the hames, for instance, as part of the harness, they come in at 25 per cent., but are ruled, in some cases, by some collectors, as a manufacture of wood, and by others as hardware, as there is some hardware upon them, if it came in separately, would pay 30 per cent. The real object of this item is to make the harness and hames, and everything connected with it, whether as a whole or in part, 30 per cent. Some parts of the harness, particularly the hardware, now pay 30 per cent., while the harness itself, when manufactured as a whole, only pays 25 per cent., and so with the plated ware that formed part of it.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 95) to incorporate the Victoria and Sault Ste. Marie Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee on Ways and Means.

Laces, braids, fringes, embroideries, cords, tassels and bracelets; also braids, chains or cords of hair, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. McLELAN. This is an increase for the purpose of revenue, and to place these articles with goods of the same class that are now paying 30 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the amount imported, or supposed to be imported?

Mr. McLELAN. I imagine it would come to over $750,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much duty is expected?

Mr. McLELAN. About $45,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Five per cent. on $750,000 would not give $45,000. The increase must be nearer 10 per cent.

Mr. McLELAN. On some of the articles there is 10 and on some 5 per cent. increase.

Mr. BOWELL. This is one of the articles to which the deputation of merchants who came here referred. Their contention was that all these classes of goods should bear one rate; they were not particular what it was; but in order to avoid any difficulties in the appraisers' department in the different Customs houses, they thought it better that they should be all under one head; and from a Customs standpoint, I think their suggestion was a good one.

Lead pipe and lead shot, a specific duty of one and a quarter cent per pound.

Mr. McLELAN. This is classed under the manufactures of lead. We have now a duty on lead scraps of 40 per cent. per cwt., on bars, blocks and sheets of 60 per cent, on shot of 30 per cent, and on manufactures of lead of 30 per cent. This does not change the duty very much from what it was.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is quite clear there is a large addition in the duty on shot. What additional revenue is expected?

Mr. McLELAN. I do not expect any additional revenue. The sum collected last year was about \$10,000, and we expect to receive about the same this year. There is considerable lead pipe manufactured from the refuse of acid tanks in chemical works, which is rather of an inferior description and is manufactured very largely for export. The manufacturers here import the new lead, and give a better class of pipes. The increase is only about $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The duty on 482,000 pounds was $4,500. The duty now, under this regulation, will be a little over $6,000. That is an increase of one third. If the duty before was 30 per cent, it will now probably be about 42 or 43 per cent., at one and a quarter cent on shot. Lead pipe I cannot trace here.

Oleomargarine, butterine or other substitute for butter, a specific duty of 10 cents per lb.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). With reference to this item I desire to say a few words. The articles here mentioned, and on which it is proposed to levy a duty of 10 cents per lb., are articles which, in the estimation of many, are not wholesome, and should not be allowed into the country, or allowed to be manufactured in the country. The only plea that has been urged for their manufacture is that they would provide a cheap substitute for butter, but the House will see at once that the proposition of the Minister will not accomplish that object, because, if we impose a duty of 10 cents a lb. upon that article, it will not be a cheap substitute for butter, and the price will range very often as high as that of butter itself. The inevitable effect, therefore, under this proposition, would be that oleomargarine or butterine, such as would be imported into this country, could not possibly be manufactured out of the pure article; but must of necessity be made of the inferior article described so graphically by the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) the other day. There is also the proposition that we should have it manufactured in the country and charge an Excise duty of 8 cents per lb. on its manufacture. I feel we have heard sufficient already to make us hesitate before permitting this article to become an article of consumption in our midst. I do not propose at present to deal with its manufacture, because we will have an opportunity of discussing that question when we come to consider the resolution imposing the Excise duty, but I take this opportunity, the first which has come before us in which a motion can be made in reference to this matter, to move:

That all the words after "butter" be struck out, and the following inserted: "The importation of these articles into Canada is hereby prohibited, under a penalty of $200, together with the forfeiture of such goods and the packages in which they are contained."

Mr. McLELAN. In reference to this amendment, it goes squarely to the point aimed at by the proposition we have here. We supposed that a duty of 10 cents per lb. on oleomargarine, approaching anything near the quality that the hon. gentleman opposite says he gives to his employees in the lumber district, would be to raise it to a price which would prohibit its being brought into the country. The intention of the Minister of Inland Revenue was that there should be such an arrangement made for the inspection of the article, when being manufactured or being imported, as would warrant that it was, in so far as it was possible to discern by scientific analysis, made in the manner described by the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) the other day. It was counted on that the duty of 10 cents per lb. upon an article such as the hon. gentleman supplies to his men and the better class of this oleomargarine, would have practically a prohibitive effect; but if the House would prefer that we should say squarely the article should be prohibited in all respects, we have no objection to give practical effect to the will of the House. The hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) and several others made very strong cases and gave us instances respecting the manufacture of this article which were not before us when the decision was arrived at to impose this duty, and perhaps the sense of this House might now be squarely in favor of prohibition.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It will be seen at once that my proposition is the better of the two. If the intention of the Minister was to prohibit the article, why not have said so? The effect of his proposition was not to prohibit its importation, but to give us the lowest and worst kind. I propose squarely that, in the interests of the country, its importation ought to be prohibited completely.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension as to the remarks of the Hon. Minister of Finance. What was stated in the House was this, that 10 cents per lb. would be considered as a prohibition, in so far as it affected the cheaper qualities of this article, and then the provision was made by the resolutions which have been introduced by the Minister of Inland Revenue for a thorough and complete inspection of the article before it could go into consumption in the country. So that the poisonous article to which the hon. gentleman has referred and which he desires to keep out of the country altogether would, under the resolutions and under the inspection which it is proposed to give them under the provisions of the inland revenue law, be prohibitive.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is no inspection of importations.

Mr. BOWELL. I beg your pardon. Provision was to be made not only for the inspection of the article manufactured in the country, but of that which was imported into the country, and the Adulteration of Food Act itself would provide for that if there was no provision proposed to make it stronger; if the Adulteration of Food Act is not sufficiently strong, the Government would take the precaution to prevent the possibility of an article of this kind coming into the country and so entering into consumption. However, I am not at all opposed to the proposition made by the hon. gentleman from Brant (Mr. Paterson). If this article is not a fit article for food, and if it is going to injure the agriculturists and the dairy interests of the country, and can do no good to those who are to consume it, by all means prevent it coming into the country.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman, in accepting this resolution will be obliged to do a great deal more. This resolution is not merely a fiscal regulation, but one relating to the adulteration of food, and upon that ground my hon. friend who moved this motion has based his objection to the proposition that the hon. gentleman proposed to make. Now, if the hon. gentleman excludes the article of oleomargarine manufactured abroad, he will have to take steps for the purpose of prohibiting the manufacture of a similar article in this country. It is not enough that the hon. gentleman should undertake to prevent the importation of an article that is deleterious to the health of the community. He will be required to go further. The very reasons which are sufficient to justify him in interfering with trade, are also sufficient to justify him in interfering with the manufacture. If the hon. gentleman proposes to prohibit the importation of this article altogether, and permit it to be manufactured in the country, he will defeat the object which is in view in this resolution. The hon. gentleman admits that this article is one that is unfit for food, that it ought not to be made an article of consumption. He, on that ground, accepts the resolution of my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson). Having done that, he will require to go a step further and prevent the manufacture of an article of the same kind in the country. I trust that we shall have some declaration from the Minister of Finance on this subject so as to see how far he proposes to make this regulation effective. It would be a monstrous thing to prohibit the importation of the article and at the same time to make provision to encourage its manufacture in the country.

Mr. McLELAN. This is a matter which the Minister of Inland Revenue will deal with.

Mr. JACKSON. I think the attempt of the hon. gentleman to put on my shoulders the ground for the introduction of this comes with a very bad grace from him. It is only two days ago that I spoke on the subject, and this resolution was introduced on the 20th March, I said that an article which was not injurious to the public health, if it could be produced cheaply, should be allowed to go into consumption, but that, if an Excise duty of 8 cents a lb. was placed upon it I would not agree to it, because I wanted it to be a cheap article for the use of the poorer classes in the community. The article which I imported was a good article, and if an article of that kind could be produced cheaply, so as to become common throughout the country, I should support that measure, and I recommended the Minister of Inland Revenue to remove the Excise duty entirely in order to let it come into common consumption, if it could be done without its being injurious to the public health.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I hope there will be no misunderstanding as to the position of this question which is before the House. I regret to say that it appeared that I stated this was not injurious to health. What I said was, that it was not necessarily injurious to health. I shall be as well satisfied if the decision of the House is that this should be excluded from the country as if it were the reverse, but the House and the country should not be under a wrong impression as to the conditions under which it was intended that this article should be imported. While I am satisfied, from what I have heard, that some of this oleomargarine or butterine is of an objectionable character, still I am of the opinion that some of it may be manufactured in such a way as to be a really useful substitute for butter, and a really wholesome article of food. There would be no danger, if that is the only objection, of not preventing the importation of the poisonous article. Provision could be made for inspection under the importation before it entered into consumption, as well as for the inspection of the article manufactured in the country and for the inspection of the ingredients which enter into the manufacture in Canada. Another restriction that would be placed upon it would be to limit the number of ports in the country through which it could enter into Canada, providing that it could only be entered at the principal ports, where we could have it inspected so as to provide that the poisonous article should not be imported. If the House thinks it should not be allowed to be imported at all, I am quite willing to accept that decision, but I do not think the House is compelled to come to the conclusion that it is absolutely necessary in the interests of the health of the country that this article should be excluded, because I think it can be dealt with both in regard to its importation and manufacture in the country.

Mr. BLAKE. The Minister of Finance has stated that the object which the Government intended to accomplish by their proposition was to prohibit the importation of oleomargarine into this country. Oleomargarine consists either of that cheap article which is injurious to health, and which he was going to prevent by the fiscal regulations for inspections, or of the dearer article to which, if you add 10 per cent., you get it prohibited by the Customs duty. The cheap were to be prohibited through the Inland Revenue Department, and the dearer through the Customs Department; so the net effect of the two provisions of the Government, the one of the Minister of Inland Revenue, who is going to restrict the number of ports through which you may import oleomargarine, who was going to have an inspection, who was going to take care that none of the objectionable articles came in through his sieve, and then the 10 per cent. upon the dearer article which would prevent it from coming into competition with butter at all—the combined effect of these two complicated provisions was to prohibit the introduction of oleomargarine into the country. That is what the Finance Minister stated. I quite agree with the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) and that if what we want to do is to prohibit the introduction of oleomargarine, we had better prohibit the introduction of oleomargarine into the country, we had better do what we want to do. We had better do it directly. We had better say, we wish to prohibit the introduction of oleomargarine, and because we wish to prohibit the introduction of anything prohibited, we do so. Instead of proposing to prohibit it directly, we whip the devil round the stump, and prohibit it in part by the Minister of Inland Revenue, and in part by the Minister of Customs. Now we have found out, through the process of discovery, that the hon. member for Brant has sent on foot, what the real intention of the Government is. I quite agree, also, that the same views which subsist with reference to the importation subsist also with reference to the domestic production, and subsist in the minds of the Government. The hon. gentleman says: I am going to prevent the manufacture of the inferior and objectionable oleomargarine; made of cheap materials, by my system of inspection, and as to that which is unobjectionable, and consequently made with the dearer materials, why, there is an 8 per cent. Customs duty.

Mr. BOWELL. The deductions drawn from the remarks made by the Minister of Inland Revenue are not at all correct, even though they have fallen from so great a statesman as the leader of the Opposition. It does not follow that because you propose to prevent the importation of an article into the country, for any reason, that therefore you should prevent its being made in the country. You may prevent the importation for many reasons, and particularly on account of the difficulty which presents itself at every port, that the collector having to ascertain the difference between the better class of oleomargarine and butter itself. You may very properly say that any article bearing that name shall be prohibited; but it does not follow that the manufacture of an article, if made in this country, say, out of pure, clean tallow, should also be prevented. A large quantity has been made during the past year in the city of Montreal, out of pure tallow, and exported to a foreign country. When we made provisions for putting an Excise duty upon the manufacture in this country, it was with the same view with which we had put 10 per cent. upon the importation. The question arose at once: Will you prevent the manufacture of a good article in this country? If you prevent the manufacture of an article which is not deleterious to health which may be manufactured out of pure lard or tallow, then you should put a sufficiently high duty upon it to prevent its coming into competition with dairy butter. We had no desire to prevent the manufacture of it in this country, provided it is made from pure materials and exported out of the country. I do not think we would be justified in preventing the manufacture of any article for exportation. The attack has been constantly made upon us under the National Policy that though we protect articles in order to increase their manufacture, our export trade has not increased, and now it is proposed to prevent the manufacture of an article for export. By a thorough inspection such as can be provided there is a possibility of preventing an inferior or deleterious article either from coming into competition with dairy butter, or if it does come into competition, it would have to be made of an article of sufficient value, together with the Excise duty, as not to drive butter out of the market. If the article is not poisonous, if it is not made from those putrid carcasses to which the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont (Mr. Bergin) referred the other night, but out of a pure material, then there can be no harm in its being manufactured in this country, either for use or exportation.

Mr. PLATT. The Minister overlooks a very important point when he says there is little or no danger from the manufacture of an article under the name of oleomargarine or butterine if manufactured from good healthy material.

He forgets the success with which it has been made actually to counterfeit butter. If the article were manufactured in this country it would be entered for consumption as butter. The argument, as I understand it, from this side of the House, is not so much an objection to the manufacture and sale of an article under the name of oleomargarine, but against a base counterfeit of butter. Our objection to the Government proposition is allowing the importation of an article that is almost continually sold under the name of butter, of which it is a counterfeit. Statistics in the United States show that of the vast amount of butterine or oleomargarine sold in that country only 1 per cent. of it has been sold under its proper name. Of the 200,000,000 lbs. annually sold there for the last few years, only about one one-hundredth of it was sold as butterine or oleomargarine; all the rest was sold and consumed as butter. I agree with the hon. gentleman who said that such a substance as oleomargarine, made from pure, clean beef suet, cannot be considered as an unwholesome diet. We are in the habit of using fats in various ways, that are not only an unobjectionable but a really wholesome diet. I do not know that we are prepared to define what people may eat to such an extent as to say that no more fat of any kind should be used. But as I have already stated there is danger to the community, and that danger has not been overcome in those States that have legislated expressly on this matter. There can be no doubt that the Minister of Inland Revenue is very confident in his ability to combat this threatened danger with the machinery at the command of the Department. But if he should succeed in regulating the sale he would do far more than has been done in the various States of the Union. Twenty States of the Union have legislated on this subject for years and have exhausted the machinery at their command to regulate or suppress the nuisance, and they have given up in despair, and are at this moment asking Congress at Washington to come to their relief, acknowledging their utter inability to cope with this difficult subject. In taking this stand, Mr. Speaker, I am not dealing with it entirely as a trade question; far from it. There are reasons why we should refuse to support the resolution submitted by the Minister, separate altogether from the question of trade. To the first, I have already alluded—danger to the public health from the importation of an article, which we believe the evidence already placed before the House, is quite sufficient to condemn as unfit for food. It is our duty not only to prevent the importation, but also the manufacture, sale and use of such an article. If we could guarantee the manufacture of bond fide oleomargarine, no one would object, but experience has shown that it is utterly impossible, so perfect is the counterfeit, and so easy is it to escape detection, to prevent the importation of a dangerous article, which is sold not as good oleomargarine, but as pure farmers' butter. Therein lies the danger. First, we have a right to protect the public health by preventing the use of such a deleterious article; and, so far as regards the trade question, we have a right to protect the farmer, not from the importation of an article of known quality that goes into competition with his product, but from a fraudulent compound. We wish to protect the farmer from a counterfeit of one of the products of his farm. If the Americans or foreign manufacturers wished to import a good article of butter to come into competition with the butter produced by our farmers, that would be a very different question. They do not import butter, but a spurious, deleterious article, and they bring this into the country in competition with our farmers' butter. We are justified, aside from the trade question involved, in reaching out our arm and protecting the farmers of the country. I do not use the word "protection" in any political sense; I simply use it as I might use protection from fire, lightning, or anything of that kind. There is the strongest objection, in some quarters, to the prohibition of this article, on the ground that it might be made, if properly manufactured, to constitute what we might term the poor man's butter. It is said that the poor man uses oleomargarine, and that it would be entirely too bad to deprive him of the right of using that substance if he wished. I say that every argument brought forward during the previous discussion, every argument presented in the proposition made by the Minister, shows that it was not the intention of the Government to give the poor man cheap butter, but their object is to make both good and bad butterine or oleomargarine a dear article. It will not only prevent the importation of the cheap article and the manufacture of a cheap non-deleterious article but all the taxation and interference with trade goes to increase the expense of manufacture. Therefore cheaper material can be used, and instead of giving the people a good article of oleomargarine or butter substitute at a cheap price, it has the opposite effect of giving us a very nasty article at a very dear price. I believe that if we looked at the matter as protectionists, talking as we would if we belonged to the other side of the House, we would certainly be justified in protecting the farmers. As advocates of a revenue tariff we feel ourselves equally justified in standing by the farmers. So far as I am individually concerned I have always said that as an advocate of a revenue tariff I would extend incidental protection to the chief industry of the country. I have always looked upon farming as the industry of this country. There are many other reasons why agriculture is deserving of protection far beyond the whole of the other industries in the country. We know very well what the farmers require—and I cannot better express my views upon this subject than by giving those of an eminent man who is fully acquainted with the subject. In addressing a committee of the House of Representatives at Washington, Mr. Joseph H. Reall, President of the American Agricultural and Dairy Association, said:

"Of the entire annual products of the farmer, amounting to millions of dollars and exceeding all other products together, there is no adulteration or fraud in a single item. His grain, meat, fruits, and everything he produces are sold in their pure state and at the minimum price. Corn is made into glucose and bad whiskey after it leaves his granary. Adulterated crackers are made from the flour long after the wheat leaves his bins, and lard is converted into creamery butter after the hog has gone out of his pens. But it is not so with what he buys. About every article sold him is adulterated or misrepresented. He gets impure sugar, glucose for molasses, adulterated coffees, teas, spices and tobaccos, short weight soaps and candles, adulterated cloths and calicoes, shoddy clothing, imperfect machinery, fraudulent fertilisers. He is swindled with patent rights, lightning-rods and spurious seeds, and consumed with taxes and interest. He sells pure foods at the lowest possible price, and buys inferior ones at the highest. And while he stands all this he cannot live if a principal article of his production must compete with a base counterfeit made at half the cost of his honest product. Of all the farmer's productions butter is the only one that can be counterfeited. The speculator cannot make imitation milk, cheese, corn, wheat, oats, meat, fruit, or any other article of farm produce, or he would do it."

It may seem strange to many hon. members that this subject, which has so recently been taken up in this House, has engaged so much attention in this country. During the last several months the farmers' institutes and dairymen's associations have met and discussed the question in various parts of Ontario, and they unanimously came to the conclusion that the danger which has so long threatened the farmers of the United States is now beginning to threaten the farmers of Canada, and I believe a deeper interest is felt in this subject among the farming community than has been felt on any other subject for some years past. With respect to the other point, as to how the farmer can be protected from this counterfeit, I will read the remarks made by the same gentleman to whom I have alluded. He said:

"The fraudulent sale of butterine will, unless stopped, drive out the sale of butter entirely: first, because it always has been and always will be sold for butter. It is a perfect counterfeit, and consumers are not microscopists or chemists. Honest butter cannot compete with it. It can be made and sold at 10 cents per pound wholesale and retailed for 15 cents. While we can sell butter at a low price it cannot be sold for this. Genuine butter must therefore be driven from the market. We can make pork at 3 cents, beef at 5 cents, wheat at 50 cents, corn at 25 cents more successfully than we can butter at present figures, and God knows none of these prices pay the farmer. We ought to have 30 cents for good butter. It is an expensive article to make, but we can produce the finest for 30 cents on the average. That is the bottom, and we have been forced to find that bottom."

Now, Sir, I shall not trouble the House with any more quotations further than to show the extent to which this hon. gentleman thinks that the farming community on the other side of the line are interested in this very interesting subject. Speaking of the difficulties by which the farmers of that country encounter in making themselves heard and understood, as they wish to be heard and understood, he says:

"The average dairyman cannot come here to represent his interests. If he could we should have two millions here to-day urging the adoption of measures for relief, for from one end of the country to the other they are aroused as no class of farmers were ever stirred up before. They see their lands and homes going to ruin, and if their prayer for relief is not granted, their industry is doomed.

"They would come here in person and voice their sentiments, but a trip to Washington would cost more than the profits that a majority realised last year. They must remain at home and toil and struggle to keep from bankruptcy.

"Few realise how by what slow degrees the farmer earns his money. God knows that he and the laboring man get little enough at best, and no condition of affairs can give either too much. And as the laboring people have begun to assert their rights, and they have only begun, so will the farmer soon begin to demand his. Both have been too long and too much neglected, while other interests have been fostered; but the march of intelligence is teaching them their power and impressing them with their rights. The coming union of the farmers and laboring men of America will constitute the greatest power ever organised in any country."

I believe these remarks are made with a great deal of truth so far as the American Union is concerned, and if we on this side of the line temporise with a question of this kind, it will be but a few years when the same remarks may be made with equal truth of the farmers of this Dominion. I believe that the Parliament of Canada is justified in prohibiting not only the importation but the manufacture of this article in the country. It is not needed here; it is not going to help anybody; it is not going to increase the price of the raw material which is needed for other purposes, and the more we hamper it with legal restrictions the further we will go towards insuring a dear and deleterious article as the produce of our manufactures. The heavier the tax you place on its manufacture, the more roguery and evasion of the law will you find practiced; that has been the experience of other countries, and that will be our experience. If we are to believe one-half of what has been stated on the other side of the House as to the character of the materials which enter into these compounds, the House should rise as one man in favor of a proposition to prohibit their manufacture and importation. Let us not allow the difficulty to gain a foothold in this country. The difficulty in the United States is that they have allowed it to go on until it has attained such proportions that legislators find it almost impossible to combat it. Now, we have taken hold of the matter in its early stage; we have it in our power to prevent the evil gaining a foothold in our country, and it is our duty to exercise that power. If we make a mistake now in prohibiting the importation and manufacture of the article, it will be easy to retrace our steps, but if we find that by adopting the suggestion of the Minister of Inland Revenue we have made a mistake, we will find it extremely difficult to retrace our steps; we will find ourselves surrounded by the same difficulties that were met with on the other side of the line. In conclusion I beg to suggest to the Minister of Inland Revenue as well as to the Minister of Customs, that so great has become the extent of this fraudulent industry on the other side of the line, so constantly are attempts being made to export these deleterious articles to other countries, and so perfect has the counterfeit article become, that any substance said to be butter coming from across the line and entering our Custom houses should be carefully examined. It is unlikely that they would import a good article of genuine butter into Canada, but under the name of butter they could import this oleomargarine, and bring it into competition with butter. This is all the more likely to occur since the recent stringent enactments in the State of New York.

Mr. BOWELL. If we adopt the resolution as proposed by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) it would necessitate some other action on the part of the Government to make provision for the prohibition of this article. I would propose the following as an amendment, or, perhaps, the hon. gentleman will be disposed to accept it instead of his own. I would move that this item be dropped, and the following be substituted:

The importation into Canada of oleomargarine, butterine, or other substitutes for butter, is hereby prohibited under a penalty of $200, together with the forfeiture of such goods and packages in which they are contained.

That would mention the articles which are to be prohibited, whilst the resolution of the hon. gentleman simply says that this is to be struck out, and these articles are to be prohibited. Then, of course, we should have to provide a similar resolution of this kind in order to provide against the importation of such articles as are herein mentioned. We might, of course, adopt another plan by moving that this item be struck out, and then moving this as a subsequent resolution.

Mr. HESSON. It is gratifying to observe hon. gentlemen on the other side one by one announcing their belief that the people of Canada require legislation of this kind; and I observe that when these hon. gentlemen do make a move in that direction they seem determined to go even further than the party which have been considered peculiarly the advocates of protection in this country. It is true that some hon. gentlemen are against the Government on the principle that they should not increase the rate of duty. But hon. gentlemen are coming to view this matter in the interests of the country, and to believe that it will not do as in the past to make it a party question, but that all will find it desirable to pull together for the general interest—a result which will not only be successful in its object but gratifying to the people of Canada. With reference to excluding this article from our market, I would be prepared to go as far as to require that the Government should prohibit its importation altogether. There is one difficulty, however, which arises, and it was pointed out very strongly a few days ago by the statement made by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Jackson) when he declared that the article of oleomargarine which he purchased in the United States was so good that neither experts nor the people who were using it from day to day made the discovery that it was a fraudulent article, or that they were using anything else than good butter. This circumstance proves how difficult it will be to shut out that article entirely from the Canadian market, while at the same time permitting American butter to be imported into the country. I do not think that we would likely be fortunate enough to succeed in excluding these substitutes for butter unless we excluded American butter at the same time. I do not think that is contemplated or that it would be desirable. It is well enough to obtain a revenue from it, and I will be glad if we would exclude that which is entirely worthless, and at the same time I would support a resolution in favor of prohibiting oleomargarine from this market altogether, until it has been shown that it can be manufactured, or is now manufactured, of wholesome and cleanly ingredients. If it can be made out of such articles under the inspection of a competent Government official or a medical man, if it can be put on our market cheap and healthy and good, I do not see that any objection could be made to its being manufactured and sold to those who are willing to buy it. If it is unwholesome and uncleanly, we should protect our people from being in a position to purchase it under any pretence whatever.

Mr. TAYLOR. When I introduced my resolution I expressed the hope that it would meet the unanimous approval of the House. I stated further that I was surprised to see some of the newspapers of the country taking exception to the course being pursued. To my further surprise I found the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) opposing the motion altogether, and the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Jackson) asking that the Customs and Excise duty should be reduced. Now, I find the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) saying that he and his friends on that side of the House are not only protectionists, but are willing to go one better. The hon. gentleman who moved this resolution no doubt saw that the subject was popular in the country, and was willing to swallow protection; and, from the remark of the leader of the Opposition, I judge that this resolution means, if it means anything, that hon. gentlemen on that side of the House want the importation of oleomargarine to meet the views of the hon. member for South Norfolk. In discussing this question with the Finance Minister, the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Inland Revenue, it was suggested that as soon as these resolutions passed, every manufacturer of oleomargarine in the United States would export into Canada this article under the name of butter; and if my hon. friend's resolution passed, it would be imported into Canada as butter paying a duty of 4 cents a pound. In discussing the matter with the Finance Minister, the proposition was made that the Customs officer, at any point where the article was imported, should take a sample and send it to Ottawa to be analysed. The leader of the Opposition says the resolution if carried will save all the expense of an inspection. If this resolution is adopted, and other precautionary measures not taken, we shall have more oleomargarine in Canada than we know what to do with. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), stated the other day that he was in Wisconsin last fall on a visit, that he found that the hog cholera had been raging there for some time, and that the oleomargarine manufacturers sent agents through the country to buy up hogs that had been dead three weeks, to make them into oleomargarine. I am willing to go one better, but I thought the matter could be best guarded through the Customs Department or Inland Revenue Department, and by having a proper inspection, and that 10 cents a pound would amount to prohibition. I am prepared to support the motion.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman appears to be quite willing to adopt the course laid down by my esteemed friend at my left. I would just draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the resolution that was introduced by himself on the 7th of the month to show that he is prepared to go one better, and two better now than he was then:

"Mr. Taylor moved, that the House do now go into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain resolution:

"That it is expedient to bring in a Bill to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, butterine and other substitutes for butter."

Now the hon. gentleman is willing to prohibit altogether. Then he was willing to regulate the manufacture.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not think the gentlemen on your side of the House would go that far.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am very glad the Minister of Customs has intimated his willingness to accept the proposition of my esteemed friend at my left. I look on this as one of the most important questions in the interest of the farmers of this country that have come before the House this Session. Butter is a very important production of this Dominion; and if you permit the importation or manufacture for exportation of oleomargarine or butterine, you strike a direct blow at the standing of our Canadian butter in the British market. It is well known that genuine American butter does not to-day bring the price in the British market which it ought to bring, owing to the fact that oleomargarine is sent over there, and the people of Great Britain have got so suspicious of American butter that they hesitate to buy it; while Canadian butter in the same market finds ready sale and brings a good price. Therefore if you are going to permit the manufacture and exportation of oleomargarine in Canada, you are going to injure the value of our genuine butter in foreign countries, because the people of Great Britain would say, we cannot tell, when we are getting butter from Canada, whether we are getting the genuine article or only oleomargarine. Butter is becoming a most important product of the farm in Canada. In the Province of Ontario butter factories are springing up in many places, and in the English market our butter is sought after and commands a good price; but if you are going to reduce the standing of our butter in the foreign market by permitting the manufacture or exportation of oleomargarine, you are going to strike a serious blow at our whole butter industry. It would not be as objectionable to permit it to be imported at a duty of 10 cents a pound as it would be to allow it to be manufactured in Canada and exported. We do not produce a considerable quantity of inferior butter; but I am glad to say that the quality is improving very rapidly; and if left alone and properly protected, and not allowed to be interfered with by an article of this kind, the butter of Canada is going to have a very respectable status in the markets of the world.

Mr. FAIRBANK. The only objection I have to make to the remarks of the last speaker, is that he has been saying exactly what I wanted to say. The proposition to legalise and regulate the manufacture of oleomargarine is too important, and is interfering with too important a Canadian industry, to be dealt with lightly. Those who have sat on one of the large parliamentary committees for some years past, will remember that a considerable portion of the time of that committee has been occupied by sitting on either a patent churn or butter firkin, and we have discussed tin pans and various things looking to the improvement of Canadian butter; the fact being fully recognised that the improvement of its quality meant many hundreds of thousands of dollars of profit to Canada. The products of the dairy in Canada have now assumed proportions of considerable magnitude. We not only supply our own demands, but we are exporting to the value of something like $10,000,000. When the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) remarked that you were striking a blow at the exportation of butter when you sanctioned the manufacture here of an article to take its place and to injure the character of the whole, I think he struck a bull's eye. This, undoubtedly, is the very time to nip that in the bud. We are informed a manufactory is already established. What are we to do with it? It would be much better to buy the establishment, look up the door, and throw the key into the St. Lawrence, and charge it all to capital account. Yesterday we were discussing the question of "red dog" flour for the Indians; oleomargarine I would consider the question of "red dog" butter for the white man. I am opposed to both. Who would think for a moment of divesting the dairy maid of the romance, the beauty, and the associations that surround her, by encouraging the manufacture of oleomargarine? Perish the thought. I will grant you that putting the business under the Excise law would pretty nearly crush it, for I do not know anything that can successfully resist the Excise except whiskey and tobacco. But I think we had better go still further by putting the heel on it at once, crushing it completely and ending the matter at the very beginning.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I do not want to take up the time of the House by discussing the question at great length, but I cannot resist the strong desire to compliment the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) on the comfort they extract out of the resolution before the House. I must say that if it is necessary to get comfort for the National Policy out of a resolution like that, the poor old National Policy must be in a very bad way. In fact to extract comfort out of the resolution is equal to the traditional feat of extracting sunbeams out of cucumbers. The fact of the matter is that the resolution is not put up with the intention of protecting our farmers from the competition of the foreign article, but for the express purpose of protecting the consumers of the country against deleterious articles, and also for the ulterior purpose of protecting our butter in the markets of the world. It is done for a higher reason still; it is done to protect the good name of our people in the foreign markets of the world. What is it that makes the cheese of Canada stand higher in the English market to-day than any foreign article? Simply because we give an honest article. What we want to provide is that, in the matter of butter, also, when we send it to a foreign country, people will know they are buying an honest article. That is the object of the resolution now before the House. It may be said that in that way we are giving protection to farmers. If such be the case we cannot help it, but that is not the object of the resolution, and I may say too, it was not the object of the Government in proposing their resolutions. We have the statement of the Minister of Finance, made only a few minutes ago, that the practical intention of the resolution he put before the House was to prevent the importation of oleomargarine altogether; that, in fact, he had taken only a roundabout way to accomplish what the hon. member for South Brant proposed to do directly.

Mr BOWELL. You denied that was his intention.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Well, as to that, if the only reason for allowing this importation was that it was going to become the butter of the poor man, I could not see the reasonableness of imposing 10 cents per lb. duty on it. The Minister of Customs also told us that the Minister of Inland Revenue was going to prevent the use of oleomargarine in this country by placing an Excise duty upon it, sufficient to prevent its use in this country, but not its export to other countries. What, however, we require to do is to prevent its export as well as its use, and it is a strange way of encouraging the manufacture of an article in this country by placing an excise duty upon it nearly equal to its value. It seems to me the question is a very simple one. Either the article under discussion is a wholesome article fit for food or it is a deleterious article made from material not fit to be used, and made in the manner described by the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) the other night. If it is a good wholesome article, made from clean wholesome material, there is no reason, in the nature of things, why it should be prohibited at all, but we do not know whether such is the case or not, and while we are told, on good authority, that it is deleterious and made out of material unfit to be used, it is but right to prohibit the use of the article altogether, apart from the considerations I have mentioned before. We ought, therefore, to adopt the resolutions of the hon. member for South Brant.

Mr. TROW. I approve of the motion of my friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson). It strikes at the evil at once; it leaves no alternative. If the statements made by hon. gentleman to night describing the materials from which this article is manufactured be correct, it is evidently not desirable that it should be manufactured in the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite probably are prepared to encourage its manufacture and use in the country; they are apparently committed to that policy, and several of them have said so on the floor of the House. There is something not very logical in their statements. For instance, the Minister of Customs thinks there is no harm in manufacturing the article for export, but at the same time he condemns the hon. member for South Simcoe for having purchased a portion for the use of his men in camp in the State of Michigan, which that hon. gentleman honestly confessed he had done on one occasion as an experiment. I think the Finance Minister is entitled to some credit from his friends on that side of the House. He has shown considerable discretion. It appears he is a creature of circumstances—yields to circumstances. There are some Ministers who do not, but who force their measures through the House in a crude and undigested state, knowing they have supporters who will endorse their measures without any reasonable discussion being had; but the instant the Finance Minister, when the motion was moved by the hon. member for Brant, heard the response congratulating that hon. gentleman, from his own supporters, he yielded to circumstances, not daring to sink or swim by his measure, but prepared to do anything my hon. friend from Brant proposes.

Mr. HICKEY. I think I may compliment the gentlemen on the opposite side, as they all seem to be inclined to compliment the gentleman who has interpreted the motion asking that the 10 per cent. duty be interpreted as a prohibition. It only shows that those gentlemen are getting back to their first love, and I have no doubt that in four or five years they will be out-and-out protectionists. I am sure it is pleasant to see that they are getting this glimmering of light. It is said that the manufacture of this article ought to be prohibited, and the member for Wellington said the export duty was the worst feature in regard to it. Hon. gentlemen must remember that Canadian butter has not now been heard of for the first time in the foreign market. It has held its place in the foreign market for some years, and it has been nearly driven out, and its character has been ruined, particularly in the English market, by the importation of American butter into this country and its being shipped to London as Canadian butter. I know that well from those who are dealing in that article. One of the largest exporting places in Canada is Morrisburg, in my own constituency, and Morrisburg butter is quoted on the English market. I know that for the past two years Canadian butter has been injured by United States butter being imported into this country and shipped to the English market as Canadian butter. The exports will not be injured if this oleomargarine is admitted into Canada. It will be no worse than a great deal of the butter which is shipped in here from the United States, if it is so good an article, as has been stated, that it is impossible to tell it from good butter. When you remember that the Government provide that the article made in Canada shall be made of clean tallow and clean fats and proper oils, and that these articles shall be subject to inspection before manufacturing, and that the whole factory shall be subject to inspection, and that, when the whole article is made out of healthy materials, or at least out of materials that are not deleterious, it shall be branded for what it is, and shall not go into the market as butter, but shall be put upon the market branded as oleomargarine or butterine. I do not think there can be an objection to this proposition when thus dealt with. The only way to look after an article of this kind is to keep your eye on it carefully. It will not injure our butter in the foreign market, because, if the Canadian-made article is branded, and every precaution is taken against the importation by making it a criminal offence and subject to a fine as well, the interest of the farmer will be protected as far as the butter is concerned; and, when the article is manufactured and is branded for what it is, no one can object to that. The hon member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) rode the farmer's horse for a time and then got on the poor man's horse. He did not know how the Government would balance themselves exactly, but he thought he would balance himself. He thought that, if this was to be allowed, the farmer should have some consideration; and then the poor man loomed up before him, and he thought the poor man should have some consideration; but he soon left that when he saw his dilemma. I think the Government is taking the wisest course possible. If this article is to be made at all, it is better that it should be made under our own supervision, depending on the integrity of our officials, so that no injury will be done to Canada or to the butter interest.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. gentleman, in trying to place upon our shoulders on this side any idea of protection, in consequence of the action of the hon. member for South Brant, and other hon. members on this side who have spoken, has perhaps forgotten what would be the definition of protection given by him and his friends on that side of the House. On this side, we are not protectionists, but we are prohibitionists.

Mr. HICKEY. You go a step further.

Mr. FISHER. What is protection? It is to protect your manufacture in the country by the duty which you put upon the article from abroad. We do not want to do that, but we want to prohibit the importation of the article and its manufacture in the country as well. Where is your protection?

Mr. HICKEY. I suppose you want to prohibit all manufactures.

Mr. McLELAN. Protect the farmer.

Mr. FISHER. Is the hon. gentleman going to protect the farmer by allowing this butterine and oleomargarine to be sent to Europe? The member for Perth came forward to-night as the advocate of this manufacture in this country. I was surprised to hear this from him, from a gentleman who poses in this House and elsewhere as a friend of the farmer and of the dairyman. He wants this article to be manufactured here and to destroy our dairy interest in the European market, which is our only salvation. In the United States they have had the same experience which hon. gentlemen wish to carry through here. A few years ago, this manufacture was started in the United States, and it was started expressly for the purpose of the export to Europe, especially to England, Holland and Belgium. The result was that, for some time, an article was manufactured from a really good material, so that probably it was not unhealthy to eat at all; but in a short time the people manufacturing this article found that besides displacing butter in the European markets, they could, by manufacturing a poorer quality at a cheaper rate, displace butter in the American markets themselves, and I think we shall probably find the same thing in Canada, which would be a great misfortune in my opinion to the people of Canada as well as to the farmers. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), as I understood, said he was a little surprised to hear us speaking in this strain, because the other day he did not think we were ready to go so far as he did. The other day he proposed a Bill to regulate the manufacture and introduction of oleomargarine and butterine. At the same time, the Government had upon the paper a resolution in the same direction, and the Finance Minister had made propositions in the same direction. It seemed to me that it was of very little use for a private member to introduce such a measure when the Government had taken upon themselves to deal with the subject. Therefore I said that I did not think it was expedient, and that I wanted to see what the Government were going to do. I have since found out what the Government are going to do. I found that they intended to put a Customs duty upon this article and an Excise duty also, and I have also seen the Bill of the Minister of Inland Revenue by which he proposes to take to the Governor in Council the power to regulate this matter. I understand from the hon. gentlemen opposite that they expect the Governor in Council will in this way obtain such a perfect control over this trade, that they will be able to prevent any bad effects from an inferior quality being manufactured or used in this country. Well, Sir, the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson), a little while ago, said if we prohibited the importation of oleomargarine from the United States, we would not be able to prevent its being imported under the guise and name of butter.

Mr. HESSON. I beg your pardon, I did not say that. I said it would be difficult to distinguish whether it was oleomargarine or butter, and I gave the evidence of the hon. gentleman from South Norfolk (Mr. Jackson).

Mr. FISHER. I accept the hon. gentleman correction, but it does not invalidate my argument. While the hon. gentleman has perfect confidence in the power of the Minister of Inland Revenue to see that this article is inspected when manufactured in this country, or imported from the United States under its own name, or any other name, he thinks, if the article is prohibited, the Minister would not be able to exercise the same supervision over it. It seems to me this is entirely inconsistent, in one case he has perfect confidence in his Minister, in the other case he has no confidence in the Department of that Minister. I still understand from the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite, that it is proposed to allow the manufacture of this article in Canada. I think myself that the only legitimate sequence to the motion of my hon. friend for South Brant (Mr. Pater-son) will be the absolute prohibition of its manufacture in this country as well as of its importation; I would not myself care to prohibit its importation if we could not also prohibit its manufacture. One of the great reasons put forward for allowing the trade in oleomargarine has been to provide a cheap substitute for butter for the poorer classes. If we put an Excise duty on this product made in the country, we are not going to produce a cheap food for the poorer classes unless the Government expect that the people, whom they are going to protect in this manufacture, will make it out of impure materials. Therefore, I say that the only excuse for the existence of this article in our trade at all is removed entirely, and then its existence here is simply for competition with the article of butter. I am not an advocate of protection in the same sense of hon. gentlemen opposite, or in the ordinary sense of the word, but I am an advocate of protecting our community from any improper and illegitimate competition in their own legitimate trade. Therefore, when I find that this article will not do the community any good, but may possible do harm to the class in which, I confess, I am most deeply interested, the class to which I belong as a dairyman, I am desirous of seeing this proposition carried out in its entirety. Now, Sir, I find that the people of the United States began to regulate the traffic in oleomargarine and butter in 1877, when the State of New York passed a regulating law. At that time this article was made almost entirely for exportation, and of a comparatively good quality. But, in the course of a few years, the people of that State had so waked up to the dangerous character of this trade, that in place of their restrictive law, they substituted, in 1885, an absolutely prohibitory law. I find that the dairymen's association of New York, meeting in that city, passed resolutions declaring that the only safety to the farmers against this illegitimate competition was absolute prohibition. They have had a good deal of experience in this matter that we in Canada have not had; and from their experience it seems that it is absolutely necessary to prohibit instead of attempting to regulate. I understand that the Government has accepted the proposition of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), and I trust that when they reach the proposition in regard to the Excise duty, they will adopt a similar line of procedure in that matter also. The hon. Minister said that he wished to attain the same end as the member for South Brant. Now I cannot congratulate the Minister who attempted in this roundabout—I had almost said crooked—way to accomplish a certain object. I am afraid the Government wish to obtain this object by a way which would not serve this purpose, but that would protect somebody who may, perhaps, have appealed to them to protect the manufacture in this country. Before I sit down I will ask the Finance Minister if any petition was presented to him, if any request was made to him, by any firm intending under the new law to manufacture this material in the country? I would also like to ask him whether any petition had been sent to the Government from any agricultural association in regard to this matter?

Mr. HESSON. I hope the House will allow me a moment to set my hon. friend right in regard to some remarks which he charged me with having made. I think if he had been present when I spoke he would not have charged me with being in favor of the manufacture of oleomargarine in Canada. I said distinctly that a difficulty would exist in distinguishing it from American butter when both articles were imported, and it was desirable to exclude American butter from our market. I pointed out that the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Jackson) had stated that he had purchased it himself for the use of his men, that it was as good as Canadian butter, and with difficulty could be distinguished from a fair article of Canadian butter, and said it was possible that it could be manufactured here under the supervision of a doctor, or at least of an inspector, who would examine the materials used in the manufacture, and so far the Government might secure that it should be fit for human food. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) said that if oleomargarine is any worse than the butter that goes from Ontario down to St. John, N.B., it certainly was not worth much.

Mr. GILLMOR. I do not remember saying anything of that kind.

Mr. HESSON. I beg your pardon, it was the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Irvine). This is literally what I said:

"I should be glad if the Government would take the whole matter into consideration as to whether there is not enough butter in the country and whether the price of it is not sufficiently low as to make it unnecessary to permit the manufacture of an article of this kind at all."

I said further:

"If we have a quantity of butter that is inferior in its quality when it reaches the market, is it not fair to assume that it would be unwise to introduce a substitute even in our own market for those who are obliged to buy a poor article, when that substitute is more unhealthful still than the strong tasting butter that is so properly objected to now. I do not think it would improve the manufacture of butter in Canada, or that it would give employment to many extra hands; and it would be simply, as appears from what the hon. member for Cornwall says, to get rid of the dead stock, such as cattle dying on railway trains, or in passing from one stock yard to another. Now, I think the Government ought to prevent both the manufacture and the importation of it."

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it is necessary for the hon. member to read the speech.

Mr. HESSON. I have only a few more words to read.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is not in order in reading a whole speech.

Mr. HESSON. I am not reading a whole speech, I am only taking a few words out of it. The hon. member had no right to make the charge against me. I repeat that I am not in favor either of the importation or the manufacture of oleomargarine.

Mr. McLELAN. I desire to answer the question put by the hon. member for Brom (Mr. Fisher). The hon. gentleman asked me how the matter was brought to my notice. I am not able to say as to how it was first brought to my attention. I know I discussed it with the Minister of Customs and my colleagues and several members of the House, chiefly with the member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), and after a full discussion with my colleagues and considering the information I could gather, I decided to propose a duty of 10 cents per lb., which I concluded would be prohibitory, and I so stated to the House when I first laid the resolution before the House—that I believed it would be prohibitory, and intended it to be prohibitory. I have looked at the report of my speech, but I find that has not been noted. I have a distinct recollection of saying to the House that I believed that duty would be prohibitory if it were imposed. I have no recollection of any petition being sent in in regard to the matter.

Mr. FISHER. Then I understand that no firm is making arrangements to start its manufacture.

Mr. McLELAN. I have not had any communication from any firm desirous of starting its manufacture.

Mr. BAIN. I have listened with a good deal of interest to the explanation now made by the Finance Minister with respect to his object in imposing a 10 cent import duty on oleomargarine, in which he states that it was with the view to prohibit the importation of that article. We coincide in our views in that respect, because, from my standpoint, I think it is desirable to prohibit that article, and so far we are agreed. But when, from that side of the House, we find coupled with that proposition an arrangement by which the article is to be manufactured in this country at a duty of 8 cents per lb. Excise, we begin to look at the matter from different aspects, and I confess I realize the difficulty under which the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) is laboring, in view of the last turn the matter has taken. He spent much time in endeavoring to demonstrate that he did not say on the last occasion when the question was up what he said to-night. If I understood what he said this evening it was, that he proposed by this adjustment of the respective duties of 8 cents Excise and 10 cents Customs, to enable a manufactory of this kind to be started for the purpose of exporting oleomargarine.

Mr. HESSON. I never mentioned the rate of duty at all.

Mr. BAIN. I am quoting the rates as announced in the official papers of the House by an hon. gentleman he supports; and if that statement is not correct I am open to correction now. It strikes me as very remarkable in view of the hon. member's idea of protection that his idea of the manner in which agriculturists should be protected, and the manufacture of oleomargarine here for export encouraged, was to place an Excise duty of 8 cents and a Custom duty of 10 cents to enable the manufacturer to ship it. Where do we send all our surplus products? If such a business were established and developed the product must find a market where our Canadian surplus butter finds a market. What would be the result. The manufacturer of oleomargarine would be able to produce it at a very low price, and every pound sent to the English market would displace a pound of the butter which our farmers have honestly produced and have a surplus for sale. I do not wonder that the hon. member for Perth feels a little uneasy at the position of the matter; I respect his judgment in feeling uneasy. It is decidedly creditable to his judgment, because he had evidently become so accustomed to believe that the Ministers in charge of the Departments of Finance, Customs and Excise could not do anything wrong, that he simply accepted their statements and declared that they were protection opinions. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) who brought the question up—and I think he deserves credit for bringing it up—also seems to be exceedingly anxious with respect to our opinion. When the question was discussed he thought fit to await the action of the Government on their measure, and he was quite content that the farmers should be protected after that fashion, and I do not remember that he foresaw any difficulties arising from the arrangement. Yet that is where it strikes me there is a very serious difficulty in connection with the manufacture of oleomargarine either for exportation or for any other purpose. What has been the difficulty of every farmer for many years? Hon. gentlemen opposite told us that times would be good under the National Policy, but the world seems to have been blessed with productive years and to have surpluses in every direction and to be sending them to the Mother Country. The result of all those surpluses finding their way there has been unprecedentedly low prices for the products of the farm. Under those circumstances hon. gentlemen opposite propose to aid the farmer by encouraging the manufacture and exportation of an article that will undermine one of the great industries of the country, the dairy industry. Hon. gentlemen opposite have no doubt this to say: You gentlemen on the other side are supporters of a measure of this kind because one member happened to say that if this article was good and cheap, he thought poor men should have the benefit of it—a sentiment which every hon. member should echo; and another hon. member said he bought a quantity of that article and sent it to his lumber camps in Michigan and no complaints were made. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite in their innocence never saw the effect of the line of argument used by them and that their proposal was one that would almost destroy the dairy interest of the country. I think the matter is one of prime importance, not as affecting single individuals on this side of the House or that, but as involving the question as to whether imitation butter was a desirable article of which to encourage production and manufacture in our midst for the purpose of taking the place of the natural butter now supplied in such abundance. Granted that some of our butter is an inferior article, yet, Sir, I say, that increasing competition with it by the production of that article would not, by any means, facilitate the production of a purer and better article, but I believe the policy we are looking towards now, of prohibiting the importation of the article, would; and I need not say, as a fair equivalent along with that, that the prohibiting of the manufacture of imitation butter in our midst is the proper course to pursue in the interest of both the farmer and consumer. Let us glance at the experience of the American people with regard to this matter. I am not a particular admirer of American precedents, but I think we should look at the experience of a nation who have displayed a great deal of energy in initiating new systems of production and manufacture, and see what has been their experience with this article. In looking at the American records, I find, that away back about 1878 they first began to legislate with reference to oleomargarine. A large number of the States that bordered on the Canadian boundary, in my own observation commenced about 1878 to pass legislation regulating the manufacture of this article, which shows that for some years previously it had quietly been creeping into their markets, and the influence it was having on their butter market was now beginning to tell. The first effort of this legislation in a general way was simply to provide that if this article was put on the market in any form, the boxes or packages containing it had to be distinctly branded or marked with the name oleomargarine, butterine, or whatever other imitation compound it might be, according to the nature of the raw materials from which it was manufactured; and to-day a large number of these States have upon their Statute-books a statute of this nature.

Mr. BAIN,

These statutes were backed by penalties running from from $10 up to $100 for the first offence, with or without thirty to ninety days imprisonment. So it went on for two or three years. In 1882 the difficulty seemed to have spread so much that the Federal Legislature at Washington had two Bills introduced and placed upon the records of the House, approved by the committees to which they were referred, making further restrictions respecting this article, and providing that it should be placed under the charge of the Inland Revenue Department, each package to be distinctly defined with stamps showing the amount of duty that was paid upon it; and providing also that in default of the presence of these stamps the packages should be forfeited and heavy penalties collected. However, with over 700 other Bills which were similarly reported, Congress failed to reach them and both Acts were allowed to lie over. So that matter remained at Washington until this Session; and last week I read a paragraph in the Ottawa Citizen setting forth that a gentleman from Pennsylvania had introduced a measure revising these Acts and providing that no manufactory should be allowed in the United States without paying a license of from $150 to $200, and that such factories should be under the direct supervision of the Central Government, and that no goods should be offered for sale or exported from these manufactories until these stamps were attached thereto, and severe penalties were prescribed on parties retailing these goods without furnishing with each package a printed or written label correctly describing the article. But the State of New York had taken still further action in this matter. In 1880 when the general census of the United States was taken, it showed that the product of these factories was then no less than $6,000,000 worth per annum of imitation butter turned out; and when Congress undertook to secure additional statistics from that time downwards, their officials were compelled to admit that they were not in a position to realise correctly what the returns from the manufactory of these goods were, for the reason that the manufacturers held them as secret in a large measure, and declined to give them accurate information. But in 1884 when the State Board of public health under the order of the Senate of New York had a special investigation into this matter, and after taking evidence which was brought before them from different sections of the country, they stated in their report that one manufactory in Chicago alone admitted turning out from six to eight millions pounds per annum. One member of that committee referred to a small factory in Chester county, New York, the buildings and plant of which were not worth $1,000 and yet that factory turned out 1,600 lbs. daily of this finished product of imitation butter, all the season through. Their estimate was that of the 100,000,000 pounds of butter that passed through the State of New York, either for domestic consumption or export, one-half to two-thirds of it was this adulterated product. And as an additional proof how far this adulterated product has found its way into general consumption, 90 per cent. of the dealers in New York and Brooklyn petitioned the Senate of New York on that occasion to take prohibitory measures, as they found it injured their business, and that the finished article, when well made, was so difficult to detect from genuine butter that nobody but an expert could detect it. It was shown by their investigation that, out of thirty samples they purchased in New York from the most respectable dealers, given to them under the assurance of its being genuine butter, it was found when they were analysed by the State analyst that 20 out of the 30 were oleomargarine, some of them with a trace of pure butter, but in the majority nothing but a slight trace—in no case more than 10 or 12 per cent. They estimated that the loss to the agricultural population of the State of New York alone was at least $4,000,000 annually in consequence of this adulterated product. Now, I say it is wisdom on our part to take the benefit of the experience of our American cousins before we license or aid in establishing manufactories of this kind in our midst. We should consider these difficulties, and I think every hon. member will agree with me that the wise plan is to stop the whole thing at the beginning, and as far as possible prevent such a business growing up in our midst. What has been the effect on the exportation of butter from the American market? Take the port of New York. In 1880 when the census was taken in the United States, the exports of butter at that time were $6,600,000 worth, and the export of oleomargarine, which was then comparatively in its infancy, was about $2,400,000 worth. Take last year, when these two rival industries had grown up side by side and the western dairy hog had an opportunity of getting into fair competition with the New York farmer's dairy cow, and what was the result? I find that the exportation of butter from New York last year had shrunk to $3,500,000 in value, and that the exportation of oleomargarine had risen to $4,500,000; and in addition to that, from the best evidence that the State committee could find, they were forced to say that from one-half to two-thirds of the article which was consumed within the State at home was this fraudulent imitation of butter. And yet we are asked to-day to encourage the manufacture of this article for exportation, by giving them the advantage of at least 2 cents over the prohibitory 10 cents per lb. by which we propose to exclude it as Customs duty. I say this ought to be a warning to us. The State of New York felt so strongly on this matter that, in 1884, on the report of that committee, they passed an Act absolutely prohibiting the manufacture of this article in any shape or form within the boundaries of the State; and they not only passed an Act, but they backed it up, which was the best proof that they believed it to be necessary. They appointed a commissioner whose special duty it was to enforce the Act, at a salary of $3,000 per annum; and gave him all the assistance necessary to carry it out; they appropriated $30,000 from the State Treasury for the purpose of effecting the suppression of the manufacture of this article in the State. Under these circumstances we have a right to pause and consider whether it would be wise in us to attempt to encourage the manufacture of this article even for export. From the City of New York alone, the export of oleomargarine to foreign countries, has reached no less than 30,000,000 lbs. per annum, the quantity having steadily grown from 1880 to the present time. What is the result of that exportation? On looking into the Imperial returns made last Session, when some member brought up the question in the British Parliament, I found that the British Government had written to their representative at Washington, and secured a copy of the official returns of the investigation in the State of New York; and in his report, the British Ambassador at Washington stated that the largest proportion of the oleomargarine exported found its way to Holland, London and Liverpool, and that that which went to Holland was mostly manufactured into butter, for shipment into England. A very comforting reflection that must be, both for our agriculturists who produce butter, and for the English consumer, if they could have heard the speech of the hon. member for Cornwall, as to the origin of the vast quantity of this oleomargarine. But New York was not the first State to inaugurate measures against this article. Perhaps you will tell me that action was first taken against it in some great dairy State. The subject in the State of New York, was relegated to the State Board of Health, and the Act that was passed through the Legislature of New York, was a copy of an Act passed in a western State, where the dairy interest did not predominate, I refer to the State of Missouri. At an early day the people of that State—perhaps from their nearness to that great hog centre, Chicago—determined that they would re-olutely stamp out the manufacture of this article in Missouri. The manufacturers held a meeting, and determined to contest the right of the State to prohibit it. They employed one of the highest legal luminaries in the country—Rosee Conkling—to fight the case out on their behalf. A manufacturer had been imprisoned, and they had him brought up on appeal by a writ of habeas corpus. The result was that the gentleman was sent back to prison, and the highest court in the land sustained the right of the State of Missouri to prohibit the manufacture of this article, when they decided that it was unhealthful for their population. There was the commencement of the absolute restrictive legislation, not in the interest of the dairy farmers of the State, but in the interest of the great consuming population, because they considered it detrimental to public health. After the New York State Legislature had put their Act into operation for six months, we find them at their last Session in 1885, amending their Act so as to make it more rigorous. Although the commissioner reported to the Government at the close of the year that he had made sixty prosecutions under the Act, and that he was satisfied that he had broken up from 60 to 80 per cent. of the manufacture of this deleterious article in the State, yet the Legislature increased the grant for the suppression of its manufacture from $30,000 to $50,000, and again appointed a commissioner at a salary of $3,000 per annum for two years, to devote his whole attention to enforcing the law against the manufacture of oleomargarine, and other imitations of dairy products, and to see at the same time that farmers supplied consumers with pure milk. In the light of these things I think the hon. member for Brant deserves credit for stepping in to-night and moving that the importation of this article be prohibited altogether, and as far as possible its manufacture be suppressed in the country. I need not say that I will heartily support that resolution, and when the proper time comes will vote for heavy penalties being imposed on anyone attempting its manufacture here, being satisfied that it is not a safe article for domestic consumption.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In presenting the motion I had the honor to present for the consideration of the House, I did it as soon as we reached the article under discussion, the earliest moment at which I could move. The Minister of Customs has stated that he accepts my amendment, and suggests as a matter of convenience, instead of inserting the clause in this part of the Act, that this item shall be struck out on the understanding that he will insert a special clause in the terms of my amendment. Of course I accede to that at once as a matter of convenience, and at the hon. gentleman's request; and I am very glad that the Ministry have thus far conceded the object I had in view. As I stated at the outset, I confined myself to the prohibition of importation because we are dealing now with a Customs resolution. Further down we shall come to the Excise resolution which makes this article subject to Excise duty. While the Ministry have stated their willingness to accede to my proposition to prohibit the importation, I understand that they are not opposed, but intend to regulate the manufacture of oleomargarine in the country. I did not move on that subject, because it was not the proper time; but I feel compelled to say that, when that clause is reached, unless the Ministry change their minds in the meantime, and concur in the views, we, on this side of the House hold, that it will be equally injurious to health and the great dairy industry of this country to permit the manufacture of this article, I shall offer a resolution under that head as well. Meanwhile, I accept the proposition of the hon. Minister of Customs.

Mr. McNEILL. Being myself a farmer, and feeling a deep interest in this subject, I wish to say just half a dozen words on this motion. Having followed the discussion with some attention, I have found some difficulty to learn exactly where hon. gentlemen opposite stand in reference to this subject. It seems to me that their position is somewhat conflicting with what it was when I was in the House a short time ago. I have always considered that strawberries and cream were closely connected with one another. When I was in the House this afternoon I heard hon. gentleman opposite protesting vehemently against any protection to the growers of strawberries. I came into the House again this evening, and I was surprised to find hon. gentleman from the same benches condemning the Government because they were not sufficiently protecting the interests of the farmers in the article of butter, which is closely allied to cream. Some hon. members have endeavored to get out of the difficulty by saying it was not protection to the farmer which was under discussion, but protection to the consumer from the use of a deleterious article. I venture to say that if the speeches of many hon. gentlemen opposite, especially that of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) be perused, it will be found that they upheld protection to the farming interests of Canada about as strongly as it was possible for the most extreme protectionists to do. I am aware the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) disclaims all intention of supporting any policy of protection. He says he is not a protectionist in this matter, but a prohibitionist; that is, he would consider a duty of 10 cents protection, or a duty of 25 or 50 cents until it came to such a pass as to become prohibitory. Then it would cease to be protection. He considers it would be protection to impose a duty to prevent the introduction of shoddy cloth, if by so doing we protected our manufactures against the slaughtering of shoddy garments by the Americans, but he would not consider it protection to prevent them from slaughtering their shoddy butter on our market. He goes further, and says he would not care to prohibit the importation if he did not prohibit the manufacture also. It seems to me the two positions are perfectly dissimilar. It may be perfectly correct to prohibit the importation from a protectionist point of view in order to protect the agriculturist from undue competition with such a commodity as this, but, at the same time, it may be right to allow the commodity to be manufactured in this country for the purpose of exportation; making due provision that it be not sold in our markets and thus come into competition with our farm products; and providing further that it be branded as oleomargarine or butterine, so that when it enters the foreign market it will not, being thus branded, come into competition with our butter. Or if it did come to some extent into competition with our butter, it would be an indirect competition. It would first compete with American oleomargarine. In these respects, therefore, I find it quite impossible to follow my hon. friend's argument. I think, however, that it would be very much better if this commodity were not manufactured in the country at all; and I hope the Government will arrive at this conclusion. It is no credit to us to export a produce of that kind. It is said there will be careful inspection. I must confess I have little faith in such inspection, for I do not see how it is possible to have any inspection of value in this respect at all. It is often a difficult thing for an expert to tell, in looking at meat in a carcass, whether it is that of a healthy beast, and "there will be still more difficulty when the fat and tallow are taken from the carcass, to tell whether the fat and tallow are wholesome or not. I have little or no faith in the value of such inspections, and I hope the Government will make up their minds that this abominable stuff shall not be manufactured in the country at all. Of course, I speak now judging from the opinions we have received in this House and from what I have heard elsewhere. It may be I have put the case too strongly, but at all events I hope the Government will come to the conclusion that it is very necessary, before permitting the manufacture of this article, that the whole matter be carefully examined, and that they should take particular care to obtain thoroughly reliable evidence as to what the nature of oleomargarine really is—whether it is really possible to secure its being in all cases a reliable and wholesome article of food. If not, I would oppose the manufacture of it altogether, just as the hon. Minister intended to prevent the importation of it when he introduced his measure in the first instance.

Mr. McLELAN. Does the hon. gentleman withdraw his resolution in amendment.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes; I withdraw it.

Mr. McLELAN. I would move that this be disagreed to.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me rather strange that when this question was introduced by the hon. member on the Government side, most of the hon. members representing the Opposition condemned it, and that gentleman was stigmatised as having introduced it for the purpose of political clap-trap; but now the same hon. gentlemen have changed their minds. I notice especially the arguments of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher). In his first speech he started out by saying that the duty proposed to be put on the article was practically a prohibitory duty, that it was impossible it could be introduced with such a duty as the Government proposed. After that, he said: "I do not believe that oleomargarine and butterine will be able successfully to compete with really first-class butter in this country or anywhere else." Consequently he must have been of opinion that it was unnecessary to impose any duty on oleomargarine. Then he said:

"Anxious as I am to see the agricultural interests, and especially the dairy interest, of the country carefully guarded—and I say this as representing one of the greatest dairy counties in this Dominion, the county, according to last census, which made the second greatest amount of butter of any county in the Dominion—still I do not wish to see the dairy interest guarded at the expense of any other interest in the Dominion. If any person chooses to put upon the market an article which is not hurtful in itself, and which is properly stamped and shown to be such an article, if it does compete with the producers of butter it will be merely an extra stimulus to them to make a better article, with which this spurious article cannot compete. But I do not believe it would be right or wise for this Parliament absolutely to prevent all the people in this country from producing an article which in itself is not hurtful, and which, at the same time, would be stamped so as to show its true nature. I am quite at one with any gentleman in this House who wishes to see that the butterine or oleomargarine are not sold as butter, and do not take the place of butter, because that would be injurious, not only to the dairy interests of the country, but also to the consumers, who might be led into buying the spurious article under the impression that it was the genuine article they wanted. But if these articles are stamped so that the public know what they are buying, and if the oleomargarine or the butterine are composed of materials which are not injurious to the health of the consumer, I do not see why the production of these articles should be forbidden in this country, and if it does work any inconvenience to the dairymen of the country, their true remedy would be to manufacture a still better article of butter. Let the dairymen of the country see to it that they make the very best butter possible, and no butterine or oleomargarine can compete with that article."

The hon. gentleman and his friends to-night have changed their minds entirely. Finding that this was an important question to the agricultural interests of the country, through the press, since it was taken up by the member for Lanark (Mr. Taylor) and others, they are now prepared to go one better, and prohibit the importation of the article into the country. It is strange that these gentlemen are so ready to change their opinions in a few days, so long as it can be done with advantage to themselves and to the political support of their party. It is only necessary to go back a few days and read their speeches in order to see that their speeches to-night are almost entirely opposed to the opinions which they promulgated before.

Mr. FISHER. I ask permission to say a few words, as my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) has alluded to my speech the other day.

Mr. SPROULE. I read the words.

Mr. FISHER. Yes, but my hon. friend did not read the whole of the speech by any means. As I pointed out before, I was at that time alluding to a proposition made by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) to regulate this traffic, and I was discussing it with reference to a proposition of the Government for another system of regulation. I stated then, as I have stated to-night, that at that time I did not know what the propositions of the Government were exactly, or what the proposition of the hon. member for South Leeds was exactly, I did not see the use of having two propositions coming from that side of the House in relation to the same matter, and I did not think it was necessary in view of what the Government had proposed to do. I may say that, since that time, I have looked into the matter more than I had then, and I find that the experience of the United States so far has not been successful. In consequence of that I have decided that it is best not to try to regulate it and to commence here at the point where the United States are leaving off. It is best to jump the whole distance, instead of taking a small step first and then another one afterwards.

Amendment withdrawn, and item dropped.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will you put it in committee?

Mr. BOWELL. When we go into committee, then I will move it, and will add it to the tariff.

Printed or dyed cotton fabrics, not elsewhere specified, 27½ per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What change is there?

Mr. McLELAN. It is only explanatory of what is intended to be covered by the old duty of 27½ per cent. It was printed cottons, and a question has arisen as to a certain make of cotton muslin or fabric of some kind, cambric being imported under a less duty, while it was intended to cover all printed cotton goods.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Customs inform us what has been the practical effect of the imposition of this duty of 27½ per cent.? It was formerly 20 per cent., and was increased to 27½ per cent. It was stated by the former Minister of Finance that that was done rather as a protective than as a revenue measure. I should like to know what the practical effect has been, whether more revenue has accrued, or whether the revenue has remained stationary, or whether any revenue has been lost by the operation. The House may remember, or the Minister may remember, that a very considerable doubt existed upon that point at the time that this increase took place. Now, a year, or perhaps two years have elapsed since the imposition of the increased duty, and I should like to know the practical result.

Mr. McLELAN. The practical result, as far as I can gather, has been that there has been less importation of certain kinds of printed cottons, and less revenue collected, but that the increase of manufactured goods has been very large; that the mills employed in the manufacture of grey cottons and bleached cottons and the lighter fabrics have been very busily employed manufacturing for the print works, and that thus a large portion of the output of the cotton mills of the country has been utilised by the print works and put into sale and consumption in that way, and that with a very excellent quality of cloth. The variety of style and patterns is not so large as can be found abroad, and so there are still importations under the 27½ per cent. duty, on some of the newer and more fancy styles of prints, but for all practical purposes and strong wear, as good cottons we find are being manufactured at the print works as can be imported and at as low a rate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the Minister give any figures?

Mr. McLELAN. I have not the figures here, but I have had figures from the parties engaged in the work and in the mills, from parties who know that there has been a very large output.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman has the figures, I would request him to bring them at another stage. When the change took place, the late Minister of Finance was not in a position to state definitely much about it, but he then declared, if I recollect aright, that the matter was under investigation, and details would be laid before the House as soon as it was possible to verify the statements made by the trade. As a matter of information I should like to get them.

Mr. McLELAN. I had forgotten that he made that statement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was made casually across the House as I am now making this remark to the hon. gentleman; but, if he has the information, it would be as well for us to get it.

Spirits and strong waters, not having been sweetened or mixed with any article so that the degree of strength thereof cannot be ascertained by Sykes' hydrometer, for every Imperial gallon of the strength of proof of such hydrometer, and so in proportion for any greater or less quantity than a gallon, viz: Geneva gin, rum, whiskey, alcohol or spirits of wine, and unenumerated, unmixed and not sweetened spirits, by whatever name called, a specific duty of $1.75 per Imperial gallon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is as it was?

Mr. BOWELL. There is a slight change. It was found necessary in consequence of the difference of interpreting the different items in the tariff as they exist at present. The item as it read in the tariff was as follows:—

"Geneva gin, rum, whiskey and unenumerated articles of like kinds."

If the hon. gentleman has the tariff before him, and will refer to item 112, he will see:

"Spirits and strong waters not elsewhere specified, $1.90 per Imperial gallon."

It was contended by some of the importers and by some lawyers also who gave opinions that spirits of wine or alcohol, no matter what the strength was, could be imported under the latter item to which I have called the attention of the committee at $1.90 per Imperial gallon, while the general provision regulating the matter is $1.75, and a proportional amount for each degree above it. The contention of the Department has been that spirits of wine and alcohol could not be brought in under the interpretation that has been given by some importers who have received legal opinions on the subject, and we thought it better, while changing the tariff, to put the fact beyond doubt, consequently we now make it read:

"Geneva gin, rum, whiskey, alcohol or spirits of wine, and unenumerated, unmixed and not sweetened spirits, by whatever name called."

The rate of duty is not changed. I may also state that old tom gin is printed $1.90 the Imperial gallon; it should have been printed $1.75, to make it the same as the rate levied upon whiskey and other spirits. In the old tariff it was $1.32½ per gallon. That is the only change. Spirits and strong waters mixed with any ingredient, or otherwise, that is, items 27, 28 and 29, have had the duty increased, and that increased duty is placed upon spirits so that the manufacturers of these strong waters and perfumed waters in this country, would have a protection equal to that which they enjoyed before the increase of duty upon alcohol and spirits. We therefore propose to make these articles $2 the Imperial gallon, instead of $1.90, being an increase of 10 cents and 40 per cent. ad valorem instead of 30. This is in Cologne water.

Mr. McLELAN. I move to amend this item by making specific duty on old tom gin $1.75 instead of $1.90.

Amendment agreed to.

Cologne water and perfumed spirits in bottles or flasks weighing more than four ounces each, $2 per Imperial gallon, 40 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. McLELAN. There is an increase of 5 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman expect to obtain any revenue?

Mr. McLELAN. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What additional revenue is expected on the whole from the alteration as to spirits?

Mr. McLELAN. On the perfumery, $3,000.

Mr. BOWELL. $3,000 on the one item of spirits and strong waters is the estimate based on the importations of last year, and $2,700 on Cologne waters. I presume that no increase is expected from Cologne water or perfumed spirits in bottles or flasks, because it is imported in them for mixing in this country.

Tubing, wrought iron, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What amount do you expect on this item?

Mr. McLELAN. We do not expect any increased revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this again a simple addition to the tax without any expectation of revenue?

Mr. McLELAN. It is for protection—the same reasons that we gave for the cast tubing.

Whips of all kinds, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is this?

Mr. McLELAN. Whips are being largely manufactured in the country, of a very excellent quality, I think, from what I have seen of them, and at very low prices.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then they don't want protection?

Mr. McLELAN. It is considered that they are able now to supply the market, and that they should have the market, at all events to the extent of this protection of 5 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Upon my word, Mr. Speaker, I must say that this protection business, in which I do not believe in the slightest degree, in any shape or form, looking upon it as clear robbery of the consumer, is being run into the ground. Surely these people, if they can make excellent whips, can afford to make them under 25 per cent. protection, and still you put on an additional 5 per cent. Does the hon. gentleman know how many people are engaged in this manufacture and what is the quantity of whips manufactured in the country? Has he informed himself on any of these points?

Mr. McLELAN. I have not the figures here, but there is a very large number engaged in the manufacture, and a large number of whips turned out daily.

Mr. PLATT. The strangest thing it seems to me is the reason given for this increase. This factory, it seems, has risen to manhood and become able to make first-class whips, the Minister tells us, under this lower duty, and now that they have strength and ability, and capital, I suppose, and everything to go on successfully, the duty is to be increased. I always understood the system was to protect while they were infant, while they were weak, and when they became strong enough to stand alone and able to manufacture as good whips as anybody else, the protection was to be lessened.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Probably they have more goods now, and they have more rights.

Mr. FISHER. This policy of protection prevents their ever reaching the strength of manhood, although they may attain the years of manhood.

Wire, iron or steel, galvanised or not, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. McLELAN. I want to move an amendment that the words "not elsewhere specified" be added.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of this?

Mr. McLELAN. There has been a large factory established within the last year for the manufacture of wire and the intention is to extend the principle which we have extended to all other manufactures to the manufacture of wire of certain gauges. Capital to the extent of from $50,000 to $100,000 has been invested.

Mr. VAIL. Where is this manufactory?

Mr. McLELAN. At Lachine.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the quantity of the importation at present?

Mr. McLELAN. 87,000 cwt., of the value of $216,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman expect that that factory will manufacture all that wire, and that the revenue will be lost?

Mr. McLELAN. I expect a large portion will be manufactured there; but the consumption of wire is largely increasing, and a considerable quantity will still be imported. The capacity of the works at Lachine is from fifteen to twenty tons a day.

Mr. PLATT. What constitutes the raw material of the manufacture of wire? I suppose it is what we call English steel rod, which I understand, is not subject to any duty.

Mr. McLELAN. English steel rod is rolled in lengths of about 100 or 200 feet, and that is at present subject to a duty of 5 per cent.

Mr. PLATT. Wire of gauge fifteen is used for wire fencing.

Mr. McLELAN. The smaller wires are free, and they are used largely for the manufacture of fancy wire work. The sizes are not changed.

Mr. PLATT. The wire manufacturer is only to be taxed 5 per cent. while the raw material of the manufacture of wire fencing is to be taxed 20 per cent. The wire manufactured by this firm constitutes the raw material of the manufacture of fencing.

Mr. FISHER. The wire intended to be protected is the raw material out of which the things in the following items are manufactured. If we increase the duty on the raw material I suppose it is likely it will necessitate an increase of duty in the following items, and consequently we shall naturally increase the cost to the consumer of those goods which are to the utmost importance to the agricultural community. Of late years the manufacture of barbed wire has become a great one, and the farmers, especially the farmers of the North-West who are now being obliged to enter into stock raising, are compelled to use this fencing. The Government is thus increasing the duty on that which is a prime necessity to the agricultural community. This is the raw material out of which the farmer, especially in the North-West, and in other Provinces as well, makes his fencing, and it is practically action in the same direction as when the Government increased the duty on agricultural implements and other articles necessary to carry on the business of farming. I regret exceedingly that this duty should have been increased, and cannot understand the reason, when I find the raw material of the company at Lachine is only taxed 5 per cent. The difference between their raw material and what is their manufactured material, but which is the raw material of the farmer, is considerable. In the one case there is a great difference between the raw and manufactured material, and in the other case there is no difference in regard to the farmer, because he has a high protection on the raw material and no protection on the finished article.

Mr. McLELAN. There is very great difference between twisting the wire after it is manufactured and rolling and preparing the wire—rolling it out of the steel rods, galvanising it and fitting it to be manufactured into wire fencing. That requires very extensive machinery and the employment of a large number of hands, but a very few hands can produce large quantities of wire fencing. So there is no comparison as to the raw material.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; but no doubt in the North-West, where timber is very scarce, such a tax as this will be very severely felt. It is very important for us not to infringe more than we can avoid on the small amount of capital our pioneers in the North-West possess, and there is no one item on which it will be more severely felt than on the article of barbed wire. Even in many settled portions of the older Provinces it is being largely used, and in the North-West it is a practical necessity to the farmer.

Mr. COLBY. This is not an addition of 5 per cent. on wire fencing. It is a duty which will fall very lightly upon the manufactured article. But for hon. gentlemen to say that the Government, which is committed to a policy of protection for manufacturing industries, should not vote to give an industry recently established, and in which $100,000 are invested in building and plant, a very small protection, not even equivalent to that under a revenue tariff, they are asking us to concede their views and abandon the whole protection policy we have been supporting for a considerable time past. I think it would be an abandonment of that policy if the Government did not, in some measure, encourage such industries and appropriate to them some share of the benefit which arises from the development of such industries.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At the expense of the most valuable industry of all.

Mr. COLBY. I do not say that, and the hon. gentleman, in saying it, begs the entire question. We do not, by any means, admit that the imposition of an increased duty means necessarily the increased price of the manufactured article. We differ toto celo from gentlemen on the other side of the House on that question, and we can cite the largest manufactured products of the country as evidence in favor of our view. We can refer to agricultural implements, to woollen goods, to cotton goods, to all the great industries of this country which are protected, and to the cheap prices at which they are being sold to the consumers of this country. It does not follow because the duty is increased on a given article that necessarily the price is enhanced. The experience we have had and the facts show precisely the reverse. It means the exclusion of the foreign article to a certain extent; it means the stimulation of the industries of our own country; it means competition—domestic competition. We believe on this side of the House that competition regulates the price—it matters not whether it be domestic or foreign competition. We believe that by imposing a higher scale of duties we invite manufacturers to establish these industries in this country, and that competition amongst the home manufactures while it employs labor and keeps it in the country, at the same time sufficiently regulates the price and the matter adjusts itself in that way. I am simply replying to arguments thrown out on the other side.

Mr. FISHER. I am really surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby). The hon. gentleman commenced by saying that really if the Government were to abandon the system of putting on duties on certain articles, they would be abandoning the whole protective policy. I would almost imagine that the only reason they were continuing in putting on these duties, was because they had to be consistent, because it was part of their protective system. It must be continued—not because it was good or necessary, but simply because they started a protective policy, and they must continue it. I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman thinks he is bound to stand or fall by his policy, because I believe that in the near future he will fall by it. I was also surprised to hear the argument from him that because $100,000 was invested in this enterprise at Lachine, we must protect it. Does the hon. gentleman mean to compare that paltry $100,000, invested at Lachine, with the millions that are invested in agriculture in this country? If it is necessary to protect anything in this country, one would think it would be necessary to protect the agricultural interests and not the manufacturing interests, especially when by protecting the manufacturing interests, you injure the farming interests. I am surprised to hear such doctrines from the hon. member for Stanstead, who represents an agricultural constituency—

Mr. COLBY. He represents a manufacturing constituency as well.

Mr. FISHER. Yes; I know he has built it up to that, by the imposition of heavy duties on certain manufactures which are carried on there; but I think he should remember that there is a manufactory in his constituency, which was attempted to be built up by protection, but to-day is standing idle.

An hon. MEMBER. What one is that?

Mr. FISHER. The sugar factory at Coaticook.

Mr. COLBY. The only protection given to that factory was that proposed by the Hon. Mr. Joly, when he was a member of this House.

Mr. FISHER. That may be; I am not responsible for the Hon. Mr. Joly. That was the principle of hon. gentlemen opposite, and this was one of the legitimate conclusions of that principle when fully carried out. This question is intimately bound up in the assertions of the hon. member for Stanstead that these things are not to be enhanced in price—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not go into the general question.

Mr. FISHER. I was only trying to reply to the last speaker.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely, Sir, my hon. friend can treat of the question of this duty, whether it is going to have the effect alleged, whether the additional duty is going to bring about those things which the hon. gentleman has so eloquently and logically described. That question may largely influence the decision of the House. If it can be shown that the imposition of the duties will make wire fences cheaper it may influence the votes of many of us.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should confine himself to the details, and not refer to the general principle.

Mr. FISHER. I bow to your decision, and only regret that I cannot answer the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby).

Mr. WATSON. As I do not, like the hon. member for Stanstead, represent a manufacturing constituency, I am sorry that the Government has raised the duty on wire. There is no doubt that the wire which goes into the construction of wire fences is included in this, and there is no doubt that the farmer will have to pay an increased price for his wire fences. As there are hundreds of thousands of tons of wire in use in the North-West yearly, I am sure this is one change in the tariff which will not be appreciated by the farmers in the North-West. I am sorry to see it introduced, for it is one which, as the hon. gentleman has said, is in the interests of the manufacturing towns of the east, but at the expense of the farmers of the west.

Mr. ORTON. If the hon. gentleman wishes to refer to the history of the North-West, he will find that that portion of the country has realised the benefits of protection.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is out of order in referring to the general principle of protection.

Mr. ORTON. With reference to the protection of wire, it is a fact that the manufacture of wire for that country is highly important to the North-West Territories and to Manitoba, and anything which will encourage our people to manufacture wire will result in giving to the people of the North-West a cheaper wire than they have to-day. The more manufacturers of wire we have in this country, the more the price will tend to be reduced.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Better put on 3 cents more.

Mr. WATSON. I do not believe in the principle of the hon. gentleman. I would rather believe in the doctrine of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) that competition regulates the price, and if you have only one manufacturer of wire in Canada, you have not competition.

Mr. BOWELL. There are several.

Mr. SCRIVER. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if any representations have been made to him by those who are engaged in the manufacture of wire fencing that they are not sufficiently protected by the present duty. I believe there are some manufactories of this article already in existence in the Dominion of Canada, and it is within my knowledge that it has been made a very profitable investment.

Mr. McLELAN. There has not been very much done in the manufacture of wire. Some wire has been drawn for special purposes, but until last December there was no large business attempted, and of course it was represented that the same policy should apply to this branch of manufacture as to others—not with the object of increasing the cost of it, but to give them the market that they might have a large output and manufacture at the lowest possible rate.

Wire fencing, buckthorn, strip and other similar fencing wire of iron or steel, a specific duty of 1½ cts. per lb.

Mr. McLELAN. I propose to amend the wording of this item by making it read as follows:—

Barbed wire fencing of iron or steel, a specific duty of 1½ cents per lb.; buckthorn and strip fencing, of iron or steel, a specific duty of 1½ cents per lb.

The buckthorn and strip fencing is cheaper than the barbed wire fencing, and we make it bear a lower rate of duty. The present duty is 25 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the present average value per pound of the wire?

Mr. SPEAKER.

Mr. BOWELL. It averages from 5 to 6 cents. Formerly it was higher. We have taken about the medium value. Buckthorn ranges from 4 to 5 cents.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to see barbed wire fencing imported into the North-West as cheaply as possible. I would move the addition of these words:

Except when imported for use in Manitoba and the North-West Territories, in which case it shall be admitted free.

Amendment (Mr. Watson) negatived.

Mr. PLATT. There are other varieties of wire fencing manufactured in this country than those mentioned here. I have special reference to woven wire fencing.

Mr. McLELAN. That is already provided for, and there is no proposition to change the duty upon it.

Yeast cakes and compressed yeast in packages or bulk, of 1 lb. and over, a specific duty of 6 cents per lb.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the difference in value between this and baking powder?

Mr. McLELAN. This is made specific for the same reason that we made the duty on baking powder specific, that there is a great difference in the quality imported, and a great deal of difficulty has arisen in the Custom houses in respect to its valuation. It is recommended that a specific duty of 6 cents be put on for an ad valorem of 24 cents a pound.

Mr. BOWELL. This change increases the duty only on the adulterated articles. It is a lower rate of duty on the better qualities.

Portland and Roman cement to be classed with all other cement at specific rates as now provided.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). What change in the revenue will result from the change in duty on Portland and Roman cement?

Mr. McLELAN. When the present tariff was enacted Portland and Roman cement was valued at about $3.50 a barrel, and the duty was 20 per cent, which amounted to from 70 to 80 cents a barrel. The other qualities of cement were charged a duty of 40 cents a barrel. The Portland cement has declined in price until it is imported at about 5 shillings sterling a barrel and some of it at less, so that it is imported at a lower rate of duty than the other quality at 40 cents a barrel. It is proposed to fix one uniform duty of 40 cents a barrel.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). The result, however, is to increase the duty on Portland and Roman cement.

Mr. McLELAN. The duty on Portland and Roman cement will be slightly increased at the present price.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the prevailing price is not more than half what the price was when the original duty was imposed, and consequently the ad valorem duty is having a different effect from what it would have had, had the prices remained the same. I am given to understand that the prices differ somewhat from what the Finance Minister stated. I have had very recent communications with reference to this matter, and the price of Portland cement is stated as being between $1.85 and $2.35, the latter price prevailing during last season, but the former price being that expected to prevail during the present year. Now, to whatever extent this alteration in the duty is intended as a protection to the home manufacturer, it is clearly going to effect prejudicially some interests that are of considerable consequence to some localities in the west. Portland cement is an element that enters very largely into the manufacture of artificial stone, and I am given to understand that no Canadian product has proved equal to that article in the manufacture of such stone. Many hon. members in the House are aware that artificial stone is a manufacture of considerable magnitude in some localities, particularly where stone is not abundant as it is in the immediate vicinity of this city. No native cement, no other imported cement is equal to Portland cement, or at all fitted to be used satisfactorily in the production of artificial stone. Consequently, to whatever extent the alterations in duties will prejudice these manufacturers, it is clearly going to detrimentally affect the production of that article. I had expected from the Trade and Navigation Reports that the alteration was merely from ad valorem to specific, so as to be more convenient for the Customs officers, but I was not able to arrive at a definite conclusion, as the returns of last year give no statement of the number of barrels imported. I admit the advance is not a very heavy one, still with the price of the cement decreasing it is apt to affect that industry more seriously in the future.

Mr. BOWELL. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that his latest information was different to that which had been stated by the Finance Minister with reference to the value of Roman cement. I understood him to say its cost was about $1.85.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). $1.85 to $2.35.

Mr. BOWELL. Has the hon. gentleman taken the trouble to calculate what the effect of the alteration will be, taking the prices he has given the House as basis? If the duty on Portland cement remained as it is now, at 20 per cent., the hon. gentleman would have to pay 46 cents a barrel, which is 6 cents more than we propose to add. At $1.85, the duty at 20 per cent. would be 37 cents, or a decrease of 3 cents per barrel. When the tariff of 20 per cent. was established, a few years ago, the value of Portland cement was about $3.75 and $3.50. Then it paid 70 cents; so that, taking the prices the hon. gentleman has given and taking a medium between $1.85 and $2.35, he will find the duty is really less than it would be at 20 per cent.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I am prepared to admit what the hon. gentleman has stated, but he will recollect that my suggestion to the Minister of Finance was that he should do nothing to prejudice in the future that particular industry, in the alteration of the tariff he proposed from ad valorem to specific. As the price of the cement decreases, this alteration would have the effect of prejudicing to a greater extent the industries which depend on this Portland cement. This is borne out by the reason he gave for the alteration, namely, the continued decrease in price.

On sugar, &c., when imported direct from the country of growth and production, for refining purposes only, not over number thirteen Dutch Standard in color, and not testing over seventy degrees by the polariscope test, a specific duty of one cent per pound, and for every additional degree, or fraction of a degree shown by polariscope test, three and one-third cents per one hundred pounds additional.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT: What is the average percentage over 70 degrees that the hon. gentleman thinks will be imported?

Mr. McLELAN. It runs from 85 to 86. Including all the lower grades, it will hardly run to 85.

On all sugars above number 13 Dutch Standard in color, all refined sugar of all kinds, grades or standards one and one-half cents per pound, and 35 per cent. ad valorem on the value thereof free on board at the last port of shipment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On this point I think that the hon. gentlemen will find they are giving an undue advantage to the refineries. Practically speaking, all the sugars consumed in this country are above No. 13. Now sugar is very low at present, but in a general way this means that the consumer will have to pay, though not into the Treasury, at least three cents per pound. I put the figure, in my reply to the Budget speech, at 2½ cents, but in reality it appears it is quite 3, that is to say, as regards the grades of sugar which go really into consumption. If the interests of the consumer is to be regarded at all, No. 13 ought to be raised to No. 14 or 15, which would very materially benefit the sugar trade of the Lower Provinces with the West Indies Islands. Most undoubtedly it is desirable. If you are making alterations in this duty, that they should be made so as to give some advantage to the very depressed industry of shipping in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. VAIL. What was the object of reducing it from 14 to 13? Do you propose to shut out all grocery sugars?

Mr. McLELAN. We did not propose to shut out all grocery sugars, but the hon. gentleman knows any number of grocery sugars are going out. And nearly every retailer now takes sugar that has passed through the refinery, perhaps not that which has gone through the higher stages of refining, but he prefers to have sugar that has been through the refinery for one or two stages, and very little of the old grocery sugar which was formerly imported from the West Indies is used in the shops. Provision is made here that a certain portion of these refinery sugars in a cargo may be used for refining purposes as 13 taking a polariscope strength. I am informed and I believe, from all that I can gather, that the trade in the old grocery sugars imported from the West Indies has now become very small, and that where cargoes have been imported by wholesale dealers for retail purposes, the only market they can now find for them is with the refineries.

Mr. VAIL. There is a great deal of West Indies grocery sugar used in the Lower Provinces. I am free to confess that there is not so much used as there was formerly, as they use refined sugar instead, but there is a great deal still, and I do not see why it should be discriminated against in this way.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the House will do well to understand the nature of the sugar duties, and that we should know, to some extent, how we are taxed in that direction. I think the proposition of the Minister is to very seriously increase the duty on an article which is already very heavily taxed. He has reduced the grade and increased the duty. He proposes to make the duty 1½ cents and 35 per cent., while he reduces the number from fourteen to thirteen. The effect will be to shut out grocery sugars altogether, and to give a complete monopoly to the sugar manufacturers of this country, to give a greatly increased protection to the refineries. We sometimes hear hon. gentlemen when we speak of the increased taxation levied upon the country by hon. gentlemen opposite, say that tea and coffee have been placed on the free list. I want the House and the country to understand that, in the propositions made to night, these articles, which are already taxed beyond what they should be taxed, are having an increased taxation placed upon them which will take from the people more money than was levied on the articles of tea and coffee under the Mackenzie Administration.

Mr. McNEILL. I rise to a point of order. I understood you to rule, Mr. Speaker, that the discussion of the general question of the imposition of an increased duty—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is talking in reference to the duty on sugar. I think he is speaking in reference to the question before the House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I was pointing out that, while we have nominally left tea and coffee on the free list under the tariff, the imposition of the increased taxation on sugar is taking more money out of the pockets of the people of the country than was taken from them when there was a duty on tea and coffee; so that the position is that hon. gentlemen, with tea and coffee nominally on the free list, but virtually taxed as highly as they were under the tariff of the last Government, with sugar taxed much higher, and with every other article taxed very much higher than before, yet have a deficit of three or four millions. I protest against this proposition of the Minister of Finance. If he wants money, as there is no doubt he does, it would be better for the people of Canada if he put the increased duty which he proposes to put on sugar, on tea and coffee. The people would pay no more; it would all go into the revenue; while under this they will pay as much as they paid before, and a portion will go not into the revenue but into the pockets of others. It is only right that a strong protest should be entered against the excessive duty which is being placed upon this article, and that the House should understand that it is equivalent to taking as much money out of the pockets of the people of the country as if the Government had put the duty on tea and coffee at the rate at which it stood under the late Administration, provided the import was the same. Of course there is a little larger import, but, if the taxes were made what they were before, that import might go down. The fact remains.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman has referred to tax on sugar under the late Administration. In 1878 we imported 105,000,000 lbs. of sugar; the tax was $2,515,656, or equal to $2.39 per 100 lbs. In 1885 we imported 200,000,000 lbs. of sugar, and collected $2,544,921, or only $1.27 a 100 lbs.—just about half as much as was paid upon it in 1878. If our duties had been as high in 1885 as they were in 1878, we should have taxed the people $2,240,000 more than we did. My hon. friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) is ready to get up and say: "Oh, but the refiners put it on." I think the country know that there has been sufficient competition between the refiners to keep the prices of sugar down to the lowest possible point.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Did they do it?

Mr. McLELAN. I think they did. We have never had sugar at so low a price as we had it last year. We have refineries now which turn out about 1,000,000 barrels a year, and the competition between those five or six refineries is sufficient to keep the price down at a low rate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We are paying to-day more than $5,000,000 on this 200,000,000 lbs. of sugar, the only difference being that half of that is virtually paid over to the sugar refiners, though I do not mean to say they made that amount of profit, and the other half goes into the revenue, while, under the tariff which was imposed in 1878, all, or nearly all, the tax went into the public Treasury and the people got the benefit as now they do not get the benefit of it. As to the concluding statement of the hon. gentleman, I think he will find that the price of sugars is regulated by the price at which the refiners can sell so as to keep out American and English sugars. That is the point which regulates the price, and not the private competition. My hon. friend beside me, who deals very largely in sugar, knows this to his cost, and can inform the hon. Finance Minister on this point. The effect of this will be that we shall have to pay three cents a pound more on all sugar that goes into consumption, although not more than one and one-half cent a pound will go into the Treasury of the country. Our tax, if we lose 10 per cent. on the conversion, would amount to $5,500,000 in round numbers; if we lost 15 per cent. in conversion, it would amount to $5,100,000, or thereabouts. The hon. gentleman will get about $3,000,000 in the Treasury, and the people will be taxed either $5,100,000 or $5,500,000, as the case may be, and the remaining $2,500,000, or $2,100,000, will be either a dead loss, or will be the prey of a small number of manufacturers. As to the relative tax, I think it was 1 cent per lb. and 25 per cent. ad valorem in 1878, in other words taxation amounted to 42 per cent., and it now amounts to 78 per cent. odd on the present values of sugar, supposing that it be estimated at 3½ or 4 cents per lb., that is to say, the class of sugar which would go into consumption if the tariff did not interfere.

Mr. BOWELL. If the values were the same as in 1878 there would not be that difference.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not to the same extent. The Minister is right as to the question of percentage, but I am speaking as to the question of actual fact. Under the old tariff the Treasury and the people at large got the benefit of all the tax, but under the present system very little more than one-half the tax goes into the Treasury.

Mr. BOWELL. I differ from the hon. gentleman's opinion that the higher duty, which he says prevails to-day upon sugar, increases its cost to the consuming community. Now, if you take the duty which is proposed in this resolution, and apply it to the value of sugar in 1882—I have not the calculation of 1878—the amount the revenue would lose would be between $300,000 and $400,000, that is calculating the rate and the amount as provided for in the tariff as it exists to-day, and the value of the sugar in 1882. But I admit that taking the prices of sugar to-day, as low as they are, and should there be the same quantity imported during the coming year, the increase to the revenue would be from $400,000 to $500,000.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). A little more than that.

Mr. BOWELL. My calculation is based upon the polariscope test of about 85.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is right enough. Now, there is a difficult point to which I would call his attention. I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman has not alluded to it, but probably it has not escaped his attention. What does the hon. gentleman suppose is the loss of converting the sugar which is brought in? How many pounds in the hundred do either of the Ministers suppose is lost in converting this raw sugar into refined sugar, suitable for consumption?

Mr. McLELAN. It is a refiner's secret that is difficult to get at.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am well aware of that, but where you are making changes of this kind, which I do not think I am unjust in saying were made after conference with some of these refiners, it is a secret that they ought to be compelled to divulge. You cannot deal with these gentlemen properly and accurately, with due regard to the public, unless some hypothesis is come to. It may not be perfectly correct, but the Minister must have in his own mind some idea as to what the loss is. I should say it cannot be more than 15 per cent., and it probably is not less than 10. I suppose the Minister has some idea of what it is. I know very well that in dealing with the sugar refiners—and the same has been the case in every country where they have, I was going to say, bedevilled the tariff in their own interest—they have always refused to give this information, which I think the Government ought to have.

Mr. McLELAN. It is estimated at about what the hon. gentleman has stated, from 10 to 15 per cent. I sounded one or two of them on that point, but was not able to get the exact amount.

Mr. VAIL. I think my hon. friend has stated that amount too high. I think it is from 6 to 12 per cent., sometimes as low as 4.

Mr. STAIRS. This question depends largely upon the quantity of sugar they are making. Though I have had some experience with refining lately, but not as practical man, I am not in a position to answer the question, I would not undertake it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You would not if you could, would you?

Mr. STAIRS. I would not commit myself. Besides, I do not think it would be fair to the refiner or the country for me to give an answer which would be only hearsay. I have to join issue entirely with my hon. friends opposite as to how much is taken out of the pockets of the people by the refiners. This is part of that general question of protection upon which the two sides of the House will always differ. But I want the hon. gentlemen to bear in mind that in discussing this question, if we do not deny their charges, it is not because we admit them to be true. I think the hon. member for South Huron has altogether exaggerated, as he has in previous years, the cost to the people of this country, of refining our own sugar. I believe that the competition that exists among refiners is quite sufficient to keep the price down to a fair one, and as far as my own knowledge goes, I can say that is a fact. Now, in dealing with this question of the tariff, I want hon. gentlemen to bear in mind—and in this I think I will be borne out by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail)—that this change was not made in the interest of the refiners. The adoption of the polariscope, though some of the refiners in Halifax were in favor of it, in the main, was made at the request of the people of Nova Scotia, and in the interest of the West Indian trade; and I may say, as I am reminded by the Minister of Customs, that it was done in opposition to the wishes of some of the largest refiners in the country. Some of them only accepted it because they could not help themselves. Now, the reason why this change was made was to meet the wishes of those engaged in the trade between the Maritime Provinces and the West Indies. And why they wished it was that they felt that to a large extent the ad valorem principle of calculating the duties on refined sugar was to the disadvantage of the West Indian market as compared with the markets of the East Indies and many distant points where sugar is produced. The disadvantage, though not very large per 100 lbs., was sufficient they said on importations from the West India Islands, as compared with the more distant countries of China, the Phillippine Islands and the East Indies to discourage importations from the West Indies. Every hon. member will admit that it is more in the interest of Canada to encourage trade with the West Indies than with the East Indies, that it is more in our interest to encourage trade with countries to which we can send our goods than with countries which are a long distance off, and with which it will be probably a long time before we have any very considerable export trade. As this change was made in the interest not of the refiners but of the traders with the West Indies, it is but fair that this should be stated freely and fully to the country, and that the people should know that what the refiners wanted was not any more protection than they had under the tariff as it existed, but simply that if any change was made in the tariff that protection should not be interfered with. In considering the question it was found that the duty provided in these resolutions on the raw material used in refining sugar under 13 Dutch standard with present prices was such as to require an increase in the duty of about half a cent per lb. on refined sugar and the higher grades of grocery sugars, which practically have not come into Canada during the last few years under our present tariff to counteract the increase put upon the raw material. I do not know whether I have stated this quite so clearly as I should have done, but I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will apprehend my meaning. The question of the importation of grocery sugars would be an important one to the Lower Provinces and to some parts, perhaps of the rest of the Dominion if in the present state of affairs it was found that grocery sugars could be used or would be used to any extent. But, having thought the matter over very carefully, much as I would like to foster the West India trade, I came to the conclusion that the best way to foster that trade was as largely as possible to encourage refining and let our merchants trust not to the importing of grocery sugars, but to the importing of sugars for the refiner, and in that way I believe it will tend in the largest extent to the benefit of the whole country.

Mr. GUNN. The sugar trade has turned out I think as regards results quite different from what was expected under the tariff. I hope the new tariff will prove more satisfactory. It seems to be satisfactory to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), but I doubt very much whether the results will be more satisfactory than they have been during the last eight years. Prior to 1878 there was a prosperous trade with the West Indies. Halifax merchants were prosperous and so were the St. John merchants. What trade have they had under the tariff which has been in existence for the last eight years? There has been no trade whatever, nothing but loss and disaster. Instead of cultivating and fostering the West India trade, as hon. gentlemen opposite bragged they were going to do, the reverse has been the case, although the tariff was introduced with the avowed object of encouraging that trade. But what trade has it encouraged? None; it has destroyed the trade, and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) could tell how many men have failed and lost their fortunes under this tariff. The hon. gentleman should not come here and withhold those facts.

Mr. STAIRS. The hon. gentleman has no right to come here and say I have not told the truth.

Mr. GUNN. The hon. gentleman could have told us if he had pleased, as he is so satisfied with the tariff, he should tell us any beneficial results that have flowed from it. The trade is no longer with the West Indies, but with China, Manila and other points. The West India trade has gone out of our hands altogether. The Finance Minister has informed the House that competition will keep the trade all right, but he failed to submit any figures in proof of that statement. The hon. gentleman should bring down the proof and show whether competition is really keeping sugar a fair value. I say it is not so. The day your new tariff was introduced, 30th ultimo, you could have bought granulated sugar in New York at 6½ cents, when it was 6½ in Montreal; and yet under our tariff we were paying only $1.25, or $1.27½; while in New York they were paying from 50 cents to 65 cents per 100 pounds more, and are selling sugar at 25 cents less per 100 lbs. The Finance Minister should come down with those statements and show whether competition is keeping prices correct or not. He has not done so; he has simply given the House his ipse dixit, and said that competition would keep it all right. No Finance Minister in a civilised country should be allowed to come down and make such bald statements without facts and figures in proof of them. Why should not the Canadian Finance Minister come down to the House as does the Finance Minister in England and prove his statement, and not simply say that competition will keep us all right? The tariff is most unjust. It has destroyed the importing trade of Ontario, of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and if the Government had done what was right they would have appointed a commission to investigate the question instead of coming down here with bald statements.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I desire to give some idea of the amount of duty paid, in reply to the statements put forward to lead the House to think that we are not paying so very much duty. The class will cover granulated sugar, as that is the basis. I will give the figures, and it will be open to any business man to make the calculation for himself. Take sugar, $6\frac{1}{2}$ cents American granulated in New York, which I believe is the ruling price now. A buyer from Canada going over there would buy it at $6\frac{1}{2}$, less $\frac{1}{2}$ and 2.79, which they get by way of drawback. In other words, the purchaser buys American granulated at \$3.43 nett per 100 lbs. The tariff which the Finance Minister proposes to us now is to put $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb. and 35 per cent. upon that sugar; not upon the price it costs, \$3.43, but upon the larger price of $6\frac{1}{2}$. So that on this granulated sugar at \$3.43 per 100 lbs., in order to bring it into this country under the tariff proposed by the Finance Minister, the buyer would be required to pay \$3.68 per 100 lbs. duty. In other words, he would have to pay 107 per cent. ad valorem. Now, what was it under the Mackenzie Administration? Taking the same basis, with the duty at 1 cent per lb. and 25 per cent. ad valorem, that sugar would have been laid down at a charge for duty of \$1.86, instead of \$3.68. And a singular fact in this connection, is that this enormous difference does not go into the Treasury. A calculation, made by any business man, will show that on American granulated sugar, under the Mackenzie tariff, more money would go into the public Treasury at $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb., and 25 per cent. Such is the way the tariff is arranged. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), the amount of money that goes into the Treasury does not represent the amount of the taxes of the people. It is an extra tax upon them, which leads me to say that if the Minister would come down and instead of increasing the duty for revenue as he has done on an article already excessively taxed, would propose to put it as before on tea and coffee, it would be cheaper to the people, and their sugar would not be more highly taxed than before. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) can work out the figures I have given; any one can, and no one can make them any different. It is all right to rise up and make general statements, but as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Gunn), said, will any hon. gentleman come down to a calculation; will any hon. gentleman controvert the figures I have given? I say it is a monstrous thing that a person cannot bring granulated sugar, for which he pays \$3.43 per 100 lbs., into the country, unless he pays \$3.68 per 100 lbs. duty. Of course it does not come in under the duty; it does not go into the Treasury, but is not that a proof that it is a loss to the people? It would be a good thing if they were capable of doing it and yet, if you calculate upon it, you will find that American sugar can almost—not quite—be brought into this country with that duty upon it and sold about as low as the current price. As the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Gunn) has said, and as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) as a business man must know, and as others must know, the Canadian refiners are above the New York prices for their sugar. They may not at all times, but they generally do as any gentleman does who is protected—they take advantage of all the protection they can get. I do not want to weary the House; I speak so often on this question of sugar that I suppose hon. gentlemen consider I talk too much, but I say that if there are any other number of gentleman in this country who have a greater hold on this Government than the Canadian Pacific seem to have, they are the sugar refiners; and yet no matter how clearly you put the figures before the House, no matter how clearly they are demonstrated, they have not been confuted, though they may have been presented year after year. The duties have been set by the Minister in obedience to their wishes—perhaps that is too strong an expression after what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) has said—but agreeable to the wishes of the refiners of this country and so it remains.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. BOWELL. You are wrong.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The money is taken out of the pockets of the people of the country and it does not go into the Treasury. I do not object—no one on this side of the House objects—to an advantage being given to the refiners to a moderate extent; but I say this advantage is excessive; it has not benefited them, and if there be, as we are told there are, capabilities for producing more sugar than we require, then it is true that capital has been lost thereby. Hon. gentlemen argue that because some existing sugar refineries have lost money there cannot be this burden on the people of Canada. They lose sight of the fact that it is possible that you cannot produce the article as cheaply in some countries as you can in others. They lose sight of the fact that circumstances must be equal; that our refiners must be able to produce sugar as cheaply as in other countries; that by the sharp competition of the outside world they would be forced to use the best machinery and avail themselves of the best markets to enable them to compete. But giving them such a protection as you now give tends to dwarf the energies of even able business men, and, instead of doing good, will, in the long run, result in injury. We are told that we have refiners able to produce in this country more than we want. How many have we after all? Three or four. It is perhaps a difficult thing to get up a combination amongst your cotton manufactures, numbering, it may be, forty or fifty, or your iron men or those engaged in other industries, but where there are only about three men interested in an industry it is not so difficult to have an understanding; for perchance while they may fight for a time and send the weakest to the wall, when the number is reduced it is easy to form a combination that is not to the advantage of the people, but that enables them to put money in their pockets. I do not charge that upon them, but we are liable to it in this country at any day, and we cannot get relief until we go to the extent of the 107 per cent. which we put on at the outset. I shall speak no more on the subject; I have gone into it very carefully; I cannot make the figures different; I have submitted them to the House, and if any hon. gentlemen can controvert them I shall be pleased, and if they cannot I think 107 per cent. ad valorem duty on sugar coming into the country is a pretty severe tax on our people.

Mr. McNEILL. I am exceedingly glad to learn at all events that there are three or four sugar refiners in this country.

An hon. MEMBER. Six.

Mr. McNEILL. Sir, I am glad to learn there are six. There were no sugar refiners in the country when hon. gentlemen opposite went out of power. I am glad also to know that the Government have realised the effect of these drawbacks in the United States, and that they have not fallen into the error which the Government of the Mother Country have fallen into of allowing the sugar industry to be destroyed by the bounties and drawbacks of other countries. It is well known that the sugar refining industry of England has been almost annihilated, because the Government have not had an eye on these bounties and drawbacks, and therefore I am glad to learn from hon. gentlemen opposite that our Government has such an interest in our industries, and has so wisely protected them. We have heard it repeated ad nauseam that the imposition of duty causes a proportionate increase in the price of a commodity. I am not going to enter into a discussion on that question, because you have ruled that the general discussion is out of order, but I will not sit here and listen to the statement made over and over again from the other side of the House, without giving it a flat contradiction. It is a statement made without proof, time and again, from the other side. We are not allowed on this side to discuss it, but I have as much right to say that it is incorrect as hon. gentlemen have to say it is correct. I will just recall to hon. gentlemen's memory the fact that they told us in 1878 or 1877 that the result of the National Policy would be probably to increase the price of commodities 50 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So it has.

Mr. McNEILL. So it has? After that statement I will sit down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that any reduction in price which has taken place has not been in the slightest degree due to the National Policy, but to the alteration in the prices of the raw commodities of the factories all over the world. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to this fact that so far from the sugar industry in England having been destroyed, the last report of the English Board, specially charged with that industry, conclusively showed that a great many more people were employed in England now under free trade in sugar, in industries connected with it than were employed under the old tariff, and if the hon. gentleman chooses to look at the very interesting report which was published eight or nine months ago on that point, he will see that not only were as many persons employed in the sugar trade in England, but that there were a very large number of important minor trades which had sprung into existence by reason of the free trade in sugar, and which altogether gave employment to a vast number more persons than were employed under the old tariff.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Gunn) has favored this House with some remarks on a question which he really understands, and he has challenged any hon. gentleman to dispute his figures. I regretted that he pointed out by his figures that we have lost the trade with the West Indies. I regretted that he had made such a charge. I have the Trade and Navigation Returns in my hand, and they prove that we have not lost the West India trade, but that our aggregate trade with the West Indies has very considerably increased. During the past five years it has averaged $6,300,000 a year, whereas, during the five years hon. gentlemen opposite were in power from 1874 to 1879 inclusive, it averaged only $5,000,000. I think that is a complete answer to the hon. gentleman's statement, and if the rest of his statements are based on similar ill-founded calculations, I think we have a right to distrust them. Although there is apparently a slight decline in the West India trade this year as compared with last year, it has arisen from this fact, not that we have had less trade with them, but that values have declined so enormously. But if the hon. gentleman will look at the quantities, he will see that our trade with them has really largely increased.

Mr. STAIRS. I would like to say a word in reply to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Kingston with reference to the trade between the West Indies and Nova Scotia. I am sorry to say that that hon. gentleman's usually accurate memory has in this case failed him. He stated, I think, that, under the tariff that was in operation prior to 1879, the West India trade with the Maritime Provinces had flourished. Now, that is a statement to which I must give a direct contradiction. If I turned up the Debates of the House of Commons for 1876 and 1877, I could prove the truth of my statement from a speech of the then member for Halifax, who almost went down on his knees to the then Minister of Finance, the hon. member from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), and begged and prayed him to change the sugar tariff, because, if he did not, the West India trade would be ruined. At the close of the Administration of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the importations of sugar from the West Indies into Canada had become as low as about 6 per cent. of the whole of the importations of sugar into the Dominion of Canada; I am speaking from memory, and subject to correction, but I am almost confident I am right. The hon. member for Kingston also stated, just as strongly, that this tariff, which had been framed to a certain extent to encourage the West India trade, had had in its operation the opposite effect. Now, the importations of sugar from the West Indies under this tariff have reached during some years as high as 62 or 63 per cent. of all the importations of sugar into Canada. If the hon. gentleman says that an increase from 6 per cent., in 1878, to 63 or 64 per cent. is a falling off in the trade, he understands figures differently from what I do. I acknowledge that in the last year or two there has been a slight diminution proportionately in the importations; I think that during the last two years they have averaged about 44 per cent. of all the importations of sugar; and it is owing to the fact of that diminution that the merchants of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia engaged in the West India trade have asked the Government to make this modification in the tariff. This shows the difference between the two Governments, that one of the strongest supporters of the former Government, a man who knew more about the West India trade than any man who sat in this House at that time, went and told the hon. member for South Huron what the effect of his policy was, and the hon. gentleman would not budge to help that trade, whereas the present Government have been willing to listen to our arguments and to see if they can do something to help us.

Mr. GUNN. What I said was that the trade of Halifax and St. John had a profitable trade under the tariff prior to 1879 for eleven years. I do not think anybody can dispute that.

Mr. STAIRS. I have just endeavored to dispute that.

Mr. GUNN. I will leave it to the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail). I say they had a profitable trade prior to 1879, and that they have had an unprofitable trade since.

Mr. WALLACE (York). The hon. member for Kingston, I think, said more than that. He said the bulk of the trade was done with the West Indies before 1879, but that since that time the sugar trade has gone in other directions. Well, I have taken the trouble to consult the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I find that in the year 1878, of all the sugar imported into Canada, 45,000,000 lbs. came from the United States, 53,000,000 lbs. from Great Britain, and 6,000,000 from the West Indies and other places combined; while, in 1885, 163,000,000 came from the West Indies and adjacent countries, not more than 22,000,000 lbs. from the United States and Great Britain, and 20,000,000 lbs. of concentrated extracts from all parts. In other words, in 1885 four-fifths of the sugar consumed in the Dominion of Canada came from the West Indies. There is another point that seems to worry hon. gentlemen opposite, that is, the fact stated by the Minister of Finance, that the duty paid on sugar during the past year was $1.20 per 100 lbs., while in the last year that hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, the duty was precisely twice as much, $2.39 per 100 lbs. We contend, as a truism, that in the case of an article which is not produced at all in the country, the duty paid to the Government must be added to the price paid by the consumer. Therefore, instead of paying $2,500,000 to the Government and $2,500,000 more to the refiners, as the hon. member for South Huron stated, I think it can be demonstrated that although we pay $2,500,000 to the Government, we have the sugar so much cheaper by manufacturing it here, and that instead of paying $2,500,000 extra to the refiners, by the competition that has existed among half a dozen different refiners, we saved another million dollars to the consumers of this country. We saved again by that, in getting our sugar so much cheaper. You will find that granulated sugar in New York is retailed to-day at 10 lbs. for $1, and in Ottawa you can buy 13 lbs. of it for $1 retail and the quality is as good if not better.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Who told you that?

Mr. WALLACE (York). I can show you the figures in black and white.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to see them.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I saw a letter from a grocer, who formerly was in business on Rideau street, and who is now in New York, in which he said that you could only get 10 lbs. in New York for $1 while you could get 13 lbs. in Ottawa for the same money.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Look at the papers and find out for yourself.

Mr. WALLACE (York). Look at the papers and you will find the fact that sugar is sold cheaper in Ottawa to-day than in the city of New York wholesale. You can get an excellent quality of sugar to-day in Ottawa for 5½ and 5¼ cents, a quality much superior to Scotch refined sugar supplied to us in 1878 at from 7½ cents to 9 cents a pound. No doubt this is due largely to the reduction in the cost of the raw material, but it is also due to the fact that we refine this sugar here ourselves, and that we paid the Government then $2.39 while to-day we pay them just one-half the amount or $1.20. I am satisfied the fiscal policy of the Government with regard to sugar is giving us a cheaper article than we had before, and much superior to any that was in use in Canada in 1878. Just consider the fact, that when sugar went from the West Indies to Great Britain, where it was refined, and then sent out to Canada; while now we employ our own coopers, refiners and shippers; we produce the coal necessary for the manufacture of sugar ourselves, and have the whole production of it within our own country; and we have the money kept in the country, while the consumer gets a cheaper article than he could, under any circumstances, under the fiscal policy of the late Government.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) says there are as many people employed in refining sugar in England to-day as forty years ago. That is a great result of free trade in England.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There were more employed.

Mr. McNEILL. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say more were employed to-day than in 1860?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. McNEILL. There are not so many.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. More in the whole trade.

Mr. McNEILL. Are there as many employed directly to-day as in 1860?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am speaking of the whole trade depending on sugar.

Mr. DAVIES. Let us hear your figures?

Mr. McNEILL. Allow me to finish. The hon. gentleman is well aware it is only a very few years ago that a deputation, representing between 40,000 and 50,000 people who were out of work in this very sugar trade, and whose enforced idleness was caused by the policy of free trade, waited on Mr. Gladstone and asked him to protect the perishing industry against these foreign drawbacks. The hon. gentleman must be perfectly aware of that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am.

Mr. WALLACE (York).

Mr. McNEILL. These people have been thrust out of employment by reason of that policy. A deputation representing a vast number of employees also waited on Lord Salisbury with the same request. It is true a number of people are employed indirectly by reason of cheap sugar, but if a proper policy had been introduced in England the people would have had their sugar just as cheaply as to-day and a great many more would have been employed.

Mr. GILLMOR. What is the price of sugar now in England?

Mr. McNEILL. Pray do not interrupt in the middle of a sentence. If the policy of protection had been pursued in England, the people would have had sugar as cheaply as to-day.

Mr. GUNN. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), gave the quantities of sugar that came into Halifax. I do not think he is aware that the majority of them were in transitu. The hon. gentleman says sugar is cheaper here than anywhere else. I omitted to give the price of granulated sugar in England, but I have a letter, dated 1st April, in which that sugar is quoted at 17s. 6d. or 4 cents per lb. per barrel.

Mr. VALL. No doubt the sugar tariff has been in an unsatisfactory state, so far as our people are concerned, for a long time. I am free to admit that, even under the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, we wanted some changes made which the Finance Minister was not quite willing to make; and I am pretty well satisfied, from what has occurred since, that he was wise in not touching it for the moment; because since the present Government have undertaken to deal with the matter, refiners have been here from day to day pressing the Government for changes in the tariff, until they have had to adopt the polariscope which I suggested last year and the year before. I consider this an improvement, as it places the sugar duties on a more satisfactory footing, and hereafter I hope the duties will be somewhat equalised. I am afraid that when the Government decided to make this change, they overlooked the West India trade again, and in order to give a little sop to the refiners they made this alteration with regard to grocery sugar, which is a serious matter for the people of the Lower Provinces. I hope the Minister will consider this, because a large quantity of sugar comes in from the West Indies, that as far as color goes, will be over thirteen, and subject to a higher duty, and it is the sugar consumed largely in the Lower Provinces. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) undertook to show figures to the House to convince some of his friends that the importation from the West Indies to Halifax showed a great improvement in business, but, as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Gunn) states a large portion was in transitu, and a further large portion was imported in the first year or two, when the duty was changed, because it was thought the change would result in great advantage to the West India trade, and they imported largely of sugars which they had had to export again to New York and Boston to find a market for them. So that really the figures given here do not show that any increased quantity of West India sugar has been imported into Halifax in the last year or two for refining purposes. I hope the Minister of Finance will reconsider this matter and make some alteration.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I desire to say a word as to what has been stated by the member for Kingston (Mr. Gunn) in reference to the price of sugar in London to-day. I find that the price is 17s. 6d., or $4.25 per 100 lbs. If you add $2.29 for duty, that will make $6.54, and if to that you add 60 cents for freight, it will make about $7.25, and you can buy for $1 a better quality of sugar in Canada to-day.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would ask the hon. gentleman if he is figuring on 100 lbs. of sugar.

Mr. WALLACE (York). Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But does not the hon. gentleman know that the quotation in England is always for 112 lbs?

Mr. WALLACE (York). We get it cheaper even then.

On all sugars not imported direct without transshipment from the country of growth and production, there shall be levied and collected an additional duty of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the whole duty so otherwise payable thereon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the difference?

Mr. BOWELL. Hitherto there has been a difficulty in computing the amount, and we propose to place the duty in this form which will make it about equal to that which was imposed under the old tariff. If there is any difference, it is a little higher than the old tariff, which is in favor of the direct trade.

Provided that when any cargo of sugar for refining purposes is found to grade, to the extent of not over 15 per cent. of the whole, above number thirteen Dutch Standard in color, the whole of said cargo may be admitted to entry by polariscope test as above provided for refining purposes only.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This, no doubt, is one of those provisions which I suppose are introduced by the refiners, and my experience of them is that any suggestion of this kind made by them usually conceals what is vulgarly called "a nigger in the fence." It appears to me, looking at it on the first glance, that some considerable abuses may creep in under a clause like that. It is a dangerous clause.

Mr. STAIRS. It is not particularly in the interests of the refiner, it is far more in the interest of the West India trade. The West India sugars are not graded so strictly as to color, and the West India merchants were afraid that, if a cargo was imported for refining purposes and a certain portion ran over 13 Dutch standard, it would have to pay a rate of duty which would be practically prohibitory, while some of the East India sugars and other sugars are graded more closely, and the tendency would be to avoid the vexatious difficulties which might arise, to turn this trade towards those distant countries, which it is not desirable to do.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the result is that the refiner may import at a lower rate a sugar to go into direct consumption, but the ordinary merchant cannot do so.

Mr. BOWELL. It must be for refining purposes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The refiner gets it into his hands, and you cannot say how he will deal with it. A good many of these sugars are of a very high quality, some of them ranging up into 93 and 94 and even higher.

Mr. McLELAN. It enters under a polariscope test.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, but that would not bring it up to the level of $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents and 35 per cent.

Mr. STAIRS. There is not the slightest danger of what the hon. gentleman fears.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would rather have the opinion of the grocery trade on that than the opinion of the refiners.

Mr. STAIRS. This was not asked by the refiners at all, but by those interested in the West India trade. There is no difficulty at all in the matter when the Government provide that these sugars shall be used for refining purposes only. It would not pay a refiner to alter his mode of handling his sugars for the sake of a little that he might deal with as the hon. gentleman suggests.

Mr. BOWELL. Before the statement is repeated again, and it has been made by the hon. member for South Brant, and the hon. member for South Huron over and over again, that these changes have been dictated to the Government by the refiners, I say, once for all, that the changes made in the tariff in this matter are in direct opposition to the representations made by the largest refiners in the country; and that, if we had yielded to their appeals, we should not have changed the tariff at all.

Syrups, cane juice, refined syrup, sugar house syrup or sugar house molasses, syrup of sugar, syrup of molasses or sorghum, whether imported direct or not—a specific duty of 1 cent per pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is not this much higher in proportion than clause 38?

Mr. BOWELL. No, the same proportion is carried all through.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But, if I recollect aright, the value of these syrups per pound is very much less than the value of sugar not over 13 Dutch standard. The specific duty is, I think, a good deal higher in this case than in the case of clause 38, though, of course, ad valorem duty is not affected.

Mr. BOWELL. The figures are all based on the same calculation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you consider that all these syrups are likely to be of equal value per pound with the sugars coming in under clause 38?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It used not to be the calculation. They may concentrate them now more than they used to. Can the hon. gentleman tell me what he supposes to be the average value per lb. of this syrup of molasses or sorghum?

Mr. McLELAN. A calculation was made in the Custom house, from the prices given there, to carry about the same values as in clause 38.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should imagine that a pound of sorghum, for instance, would be worth a good deal less than a pound of syrup.

Mr. GUNN. Not more than half.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Gunn), who is probably the best authority upon the subject, says the value would be about one-half. That is a point on which, at the next stage, I should like to have some information.

Provided that the change in the rates of duty on sugars and molasses shall apply only to importations arriving in Canada on and after the 31st day of March instant, and not to such articles warehoused prior to that date.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now, what is the object of this? If I read it correctly it means that those gentlemen who did not choose to pay duties in advance, and who had goods lying unwarehoused, shall be made a present of the difference between the duty paid formerly and the duty now imposed. If I am correct, I am bound to say that I think it an exceedingly dangerous precedent, and an exceeding improper one. There is no reason whatever why a man should be spared the duty because it did not suit his convenience to take the goods out of the warehouse. He ought to pay exactly the same as his neighbor. This is either giving an accidental advantage, or giving some parties a highly improper advantage, over their neighbors in the trade.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is right in saying it will give some parties an advantage who have sugar unwarehoused, incidental or accidental over others who have not. This remark will apply to all changes in the tariff. The real reason for not bringing the polariscope test into operation the day on which the resolutions were placed upon the paper, was the difficulty that presented itself in testing sugar which might be in the various refineries throughout the Dominion. The hon. gentleman knows that by the rules which have existed from all time, when a cargo of sugar is brought in to the country, after having been tested by color and the duties computed upon the quantities by the Dutch standard, it is then taken into the refinery, each refinery been made a bonded warehouse for the purpose of storing the sugar until it has been refined and sold; when a cargo of sugar has been placed in a refinery of various grades upon which duty has to be collected, it might be one-half or two-thirds, and probably may have been all refined, and then lying in the warehouse ready for the market and the duty not paid. Under these circumstances it was impossible to test that sugar by the polariscope and arrive at any correct conclusion as to its real dutiable value. There might be no difficulty in applying the present tariff to sugars which were in the warehouse, or which had just arrived the day before, and that were not going into the refinery. But we considered it better to put a general clause in the tariff exempting all sugar that might be in the country at the time, whether in the warehouse or just arrived. Now, that is the only reason which existed for doing it. I know the general practice is that when changes are proposed in a tariff to make them take effect immediately upon all goods that are in the country. I have a distinct recollection of a Governor having been hurried down to Parliament to sanction a new tariff in order to catch a vessel that was coming up the St. Lawrence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When was that?

Mr. BOWELL. That was in Lord Elgin's time when Sir Francis Hincks had brought down a tariff, and when they had to issue shiplasters to pay the Customs officials, then it was absolutely necessary to obtain money. The hon. gentleman will remember that when the 27½ per cent. was placed upon print goods, it did not come into force for some months afterwards, until, I believe, the 1st of July succeeding the Session of Parliament, and upon one or two other occasions stated periods have been provided at which the tariff should come into operation. I know, unfortunately, that no matter what is done by a public man, there is some dishonest motive attributed to him. I do not say the hon. gentleman's remarks were intended in that light, but I know it has been stated in the public press, and I daresay it will continue to be so, that if there be a merchant who cannot take advantage of the tariff, or who can take advantage of it, and if he happens to suffer by the change, he is very apt to attribute improper motive to those who were endeavoring to administer the law. However, I suppose that is the fate of all public men, whatever they do.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it would have been better to have confined that to such sugars as have actually changed condition, so to speak, where the test could not have been applied. I agree with the hon. gentleman there was a reason where the sugar duty changed condition. I think it would have been the better course to have applied it to everybody—not imputing dishonest motives, but because it is quite evident that the change is giving to one man over another an advantage. Is the hon. gentleman in a position to state to the House, roughly, what was the quantity affected by this clause?

Mr. BOWELL. I cannot say. A question was placed upon the notice paper yesterday and, I daresay, it will come up on Monday. As soon as the notice was put upon the paper I telegraphed to ascertain, and have not yet received the information.

Mr. BOWELL.

Grease, the refuse of animal fat, to be struck from the free list.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is this for the manufacture of oleomargarine?

Mr. BOWELL. If hon. members will look at the old tariff they will find that grease has been admitted free, and that this is in a restrictive direction. Formerly the wording was so wide that people brought stearine and other kinds of articles in as grease for the manufacture of soap.

Mr. McLELAN. I propose to amend it by using the words grease, refuse, animal fat, for use as soap stock only, not otherwise provided for.

Iron sand or globules and dry putty for polishing granite, to be struck from the free list.

Mr. GILLMOR. I should like to enquire what is the duty these articles will be subjected to after they have been struck from the free list.

Mr. BOWELL. 20 per cent.

Mr. GILLMOR. Are they manufactured in the country?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, at St. John.

Mr. GILLMOR. Has it been established long?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. EVERETT. Iron globules are manufactured there and exported to the United States.

Mr. GILLMOR. Is dry putty manufactured there?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know that it is manufactured there, but it is manufactured in the country.

Mr. GILLMOR. There is an industry for manufacturing granite in St. George, and I was informed only a few days ago by the gentlemen who manage it that this would prove a very heavy charge upon that industry. They stated that while there is a protective duty of 20 per cent. on imported granite, and so far is an encouragement for that industry here, the imposition of a duty on iron globules, which had to be imported because they were not manufactured in Canada, would prove a very heavy tax on that industry.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Burpee, of St. John, has been manufacturing that article two or three years and exporting to the United States. It is a new industry.

Mr. KING. It does not require protection if those conducting it are able to export to the United States.

Mr. EVERETT. We want to give them the same encouragement as others.

Mr. GILLMOR. It is a most singular thing that this Granite Co., which has been conducting operations in St. George for ten or twelve years and has a quarry right alongside of Mr. Burpee's quarry, should not be aware that iron globules could be obtained in St. John. They have written me to the effect that they cannot be obtained in Canada. The information given by the hon. gentleman is new to me. It may be so—I do not know to the contrary.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Burpee informed me that he had been manufacturing two or three years; that he made more than he could use and sell in Canada, and therefore he did, what the Americans do, sent his surplus to the United States.

Mr. GILLMOR. It is most remarkable that our manufactures of granite have not found it out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They will find it out to their cost. An old industry is handicapped for the benefit of a new one.

Mr. EVERETT. The article is being sold as cheaply here as in the United States.

Philosophical instruments and apparatus, including globes, to be struck from the free list.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a direct discouragement to education. Everybody who knows anything about these matters is aware that it is very unlikely that for a great many years to come it will be possible to manufacture these kinds of articles in a country like Canada, as well or anything like as well as they can be manufactured in England, and it is very desirable, in a large sense, that educational institutes in particular shall be able to procure instruments of the highest possible quality, and as cheaply as possible. Several gentlemen connected with the educational institutions of Canada have complained to me very bitterly of the fact, that with their limited resources, they are subjected to heavy duties on articles of this kind, and I think, as a matter of fact, that delicacy and fineness which are necessary in the manufacture of these articles can only be obtained in a very large market. You cannot manufacture the articles satisfactorily except in England, France, Germany and possibly the United States. You cannot manufacture these articles anything like as cheaply as in the countries I have named, and I think the Government would do well to reconsider this item.

Mr. BOWELL. It is somewhat singular that any gentleman should have complained of the high rate of duty on these articles, seeing that there has been no duty upon them for years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not these articles, but similar ones. I mention as one gentleman who has complained of this matter, Principal Grant of Kingston.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, he wrote me for privileges which I could not concede. The heads of all educational institutions and the clergy think they should have everything required for educational and religious purposes, or what they deem to be for those purposes, free; that it is a sin and a wrong to collect any duties from that class of people. The Finance Minister has received a statement from Mr. McLellan of the Normal School, Toronto, stating that these articles could be manufactured in Toronto of as good a quality as those which are now used for educational purposes, and considering the fact that there is an establishment in Toronto where they are manufacturing, and that much of the material out of which they are made, pay a duty of from 20 to 30 per cent. We deemed it right and proper, especially after the evidence given by a gentleman of Mr. McLellan's standing, to place this manufacturer in the same position with others by striking these articles off the free list.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I regret that the Minister of Customs has taken the retrograde step indicated in the course proposed by this resolution. If we refer to the tariff in the country adjacent to us, that on which the tariff of Canada was presumably modelled, and which ours has followed to some considerable extent, we find that they have exercised a generosity similar to that which has been exercised by us for the last few years. There philosophical instrument for schools and colleges are on the free list. In addition to that, I cannot realise what particular advantage can be expected to accrue to the country or to any particular industry in it by the imposition of a 20 per cent. duty on those instruments. We find that the importation in 1884 of philosophical apparatus and instruments for colleges and schools, was only $10,284; in 1885 the imports were $12,293. Now, that is a comparatively small sum, and yet while small in amount the proposed duty will be a very serious tax on a comparatively small number of schools. I find that of the $12,000 worth of philosophical apparatus, there were $7,742 worth imported by the Province of Ontario, and that importation was largely for a fraction of the 105 high schools of that Province. As hon. gentlemen well know, during the past year the Educational Department of that Province introduced very stringent rules as to the minimum requirements in the way of apparatus that would make these schools eligible for the Government grant. It means that these schools, with their necessarily limited resources, have to pay 20 per cent. for the increased supply of apparatus. That is a peculiar necessity with them, owing to the altered regulations of the Educational Department with reference to high schools. As a member of the Collegiate Institute Board in my own town, I was commissioned to secure a quantity of apparatus for that institute, and the apparatus had scarcely been used before it was condemned by the teachers as being unfit for use, as being in every respect such as made it impossible for those teachers to use them in their classes, and the result has been that that Institute was obliged to go elsewhere for the apparatus, in order to comply with the regulation of the Department. I say that such a policy as this is putting a tax on education. The sum is not large, but it is decidedly a heavy tax on the high school and collegiate institute boards, who find it a matter of considerable difficulty now to comply with the exacting regulations of the Educational Department. I have before me the importations of the United States during the year 1884-85, and I find that on somewhat similar basis, perhaps embracing a larger variety of philosophic and scientific apparatus, the importations were, in 1884, $93,040, and in 1885, $81,950, showing that the people of that country, wedded as they are to a protective system, realise thoroughly the advantage there is in securing all the appliances necessary for their educational institutions, wherever they can be secured of the best kind, and at the lowest price. I hope that a step so retrograde as that now proposed will not be taken by the Government.

Resolved,—That it is expedient to amend Schedule "D," relating to prohibited articles, by striking out the item relating to copyright works, and substituting the following in lieu thereof, viz:—

Reprints of Canadian copyright works, and reprints of British Copyright Works, which has been also copyrighted in Canada.

Resolution 5,—That it is expedient to provide that an Excise duty of eight cents per pound be levied and collected on all oleomargarine, butterine or other substitute for butter manufactured in Canada, being read a second time, was postponed.

Resolved,—That it is expedient to provide that the foregoing Resolutions, and the alterations made in the duties of Customs and Excise on the articles therein mentioned, shall take effect upon and after the thirty-first day of March instant.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 1.40, a.m., Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 19th April, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

COMMISSIONS TO PUBLIC OFFICERS BILL.

Mr. CHAPLEAU introduced Bill (No. 110) respecting Commissions to Public Officers of Canada.

Bill read the first time.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. EDGAR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to have the permission of the House to make a brief personal explanation about a matter to which I did not attach much importance at the time it occurred; but since then circumstances have arisen which, I think, render it necessary for me to take some notice of it. On the 12th March, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) professed to read certain cablegrams in this House between the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and myself, every word of which was pure fabrication, and I supposed it was so understood by the House at the time. I supposed either that the hon. member had been the victim of a practical joke, by some of his friends handing him as genuine these bogus telegrams which had been previously published in a Conservative newspaper—and I felt some sympathy for him in his unfortunate position—or else I thought that perhaps he was under the impression that he was displaying biting and cutting wit to the House when he read those bogus telegrams, and I felt even more sympathy with him if he was laboring under that huge mistake. However, what has occurred since? The speech of the hon. member, containing these bogus telegrams, has been, I am told, distributed by the thousand all over the country. Let me refer for a moment to Hansard to see how the hon. gentleman introduced these telegrams. He said:

"I hold in my hand some telegrams which are said to have passed between two gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, one being in London, England, and the other in Toronto."

Then followed the telegrams. Now, it may be said that people would see there was a joke in that, and I admit that hon. members of this House would probably see the joke, but I am very much afraid that many who read that speech, as distributed through the country, will not see it in that light. Everyone is not so intelligent as the members of this House, and to show that, I have here an extract from a Conservative newspaper, in which the intelligent, large-headed and conscientious editor of that organ uses this language in reference to these cablegrams. This is from the Picton Gazette. It is an editorial headed "Significant," and it goes on in this way:

"Some acute observer of human nature has said: 'Oh! that mine enemy would write a book.' If he had lived in later times he might have added, 'or sent a telegram.' The following interchange of thought through the cable, during Mr. Blake's absence in England, between himself and Mr. Edgar, will throw much more light on their motives and conduct than all the speakers in Parliament, pro and con, on the Riel affair."

Then it gives the telegrams, and winds up thus:

"This is a pretty condition of affairs between the high minded gentlemen, supposed to be seeking after truth and justice in this miserable case, but they have fallen into the pit they have digged for their enemy."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that it has become necessary for me, in the House, under the circumstances, to deny that any such cablegrams, or any cablegrams at all, for that matter, passed between the leader of the Opposition and myself, during his last visit to England. I would also like to give the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) an opportunity, in the House, of going through that very disagreeable process of explaining his own joke, because I cannot believe it possible that an hon. member of the House intended it for a trick.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I beg to inform the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) that these telegrams were come by legitimately. They were not stolen, as other telegrams were which hon. gentlemen opposite have used for political purposes. I obtained these telegrams from the public press. They were given in good faith. We have to depend very largely on the press for our political information, and I give these telegrams as they appeared in the public press, and they require no apology from me. It is very singular that hon. gentlemen opposite have been such a long time in waking up to the fact that it was time to deny the paternity of those telegrams. I think the country will accept those telegrams as the substance of whatever communications passed between those hon. gentlemen. The public know what the machinations of those gentlemen were, and the public will accept—

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not in order to argue the question.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I am explaining. The public, Mr. Speaker, from what they know of those gentlemen—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has no right to go into any explanation.

Mr. WALLACE (York). Those hon. gentlemen—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it would be very improper to go into a debate.

Mr. WALLACE (York). They want to have their own say, but they are not willing the opposite side should be heard. This, Mr. Speaker, will enable the public—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I do not think it is in order to go into a discussion about these telegrams, more than to say how you came by them.

Mr. WALLACE (York). The hon. gentleman who got up this matter indulged in reflections of various kinds, and I should have the same opportunity of replying.

Mr. EDGAR. No. I said it could not be a trick, surely.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I state that I am not given to tricks. Can the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) say the same? I would say, Mr. Speaker, that these telegrams that have been read express what a large portion of the country believe to have been the policy adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite.

THE SABLE AND SPANISH BOOM COMPANY.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 36) to grant certain powers to the Sable and Spanish Boom and Slide Company of Algoma, Limited.—(Mr. Sutherland, Oxford.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I understand from the promoter of the Bill that he accepts certain amendments that have been suggested to him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). The amendments proposed by the Government are all satisfactory to the promoters of the Bill.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps it would be as well to state to the Committee, before we go on, what the amendments are. First, in the 3rd section it is stated that the company shall have power, so long as the said works are maintained in an efficient state. The question was, how is their efficiency to be determined? If there is a complaint, how is it to be settled? The hon. gentleman agrees that it should be settled by an officer, or by the Minister of Public Works through his officers. Then, about the tariff. We have already two other companies of the same kind; one, the Upper Ottawa Lumber or Boom Company, and another, and the basis of a tariff has been adopted by Parliament under which those companies conduct their business to the satisfaction of the public, and it is understood that an amendment will be moved to insert one of these tariffs in the Bill. Then I received from an hon. member opposite a letter, before he left, to the effect that the river is a navigable river from its mouth for the largest lake vessel, and an amendment should be made providing for the free navigation of the river to boats, rafts, logs, etc.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). I will just say with regard to the amendments proposed by the Government, that they are perfectly satisfactory. With regard to the free navigation of the river, the promoters of the Bill thought that was amply provided for in the Bill as it stands. However, in order to make it doubly sure, and to satisfy those gentlemen who are not satisfied, I am willing to adopt the amendments they propose.

On section 1,

Mr. CHARLTON. The amendment referred to by the Minister of Public Works, and which I am now about to move, will be attached to the first clause, and is as follows:—

Provided always, that none of the said piers, booms or other works, shall interfere with the free navigation of the north channel of the said river, by steamer or other craft, rafts or logs and booms.

Amendment agreed to, Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

CENTRAL ONTARIO RAILWAY COMPANY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 67) respecting the Central Ontario Railway Company.—(Mr. White, Hastings.)

(In the Committee.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The clause as amended provides that owners of said shares shall have all the powers and rights of ordinary shareholders, and shall be entitled to dividend to the extent of 6 per cent. over the ordinary shareholders, and after both classes of shareholders have received 6 per cent., the owners of preferred shares shall rank for dividend with the ordinary shareholders for any surplus over and above 6 per cent. When the question came before the committee we were under the impression that there were only ordinary shareholders and not preferred shareholders already, and although two gentlemen practically own the property, Mr. Ritchie and Mr. McLaren, we have to take the ordinary precautions as if there were two hundred shareholders. Mr. Ritchie explained to me that for the new preferred shares he would prefer not to have 6 per cent. but 5 per cent., the same as the preferred shareholders that exist now, so that they would be on the same footing; that they should not afterwards share with the ordinary shareholders, but that the ordinary shareholders should receive their 5 per cent. as the preferred shareholders would receive, and, when all the different shareholders have received 5 per cent., they should share equally any surplus. The clause will, therefore, be amended to read thus: The shareholders shall have all the powers and rights of ordinary shareholders to the extent of 5 per cent., and after all the preferred shareholders have received 5 per cent., then the ordinary shareholders shall be entitled to a dividend not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum on any surplus over and above those 5 per cent., after which all preferred and ordinary shareholders shall share alike in any surplus over and above those dividends.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know anything about the original legislation, but it appears to me, from the statement made by the Minister, that this legislation may alter the rights of the existing preferred shareholders. They have, I understand, a dividend of 5 per cent., and after that they share in the ordinary shareholders' dividend.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That point is covered by the preamble, and thus it is only settling the matter without selling the road.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand that, but it seems to me that those preferred shareholders at the present time existing—those preferred holders of securities which exist, and whose interest it is proposed to create a prior charge, have at the present time a right in respect to the future interest to share with the shareholders, after the 5 per cent. has been paid to them; and the hon. gentleman seems to me to be about to propose to arrange that they shall not share with the shareholders until the shareholders have received 5 per cent. They first, 5 per cent.; then the shareholders, 5 per cent.; and after that they shall share in the surplus profits. That seems to be an alteration of the position of the existing shareholders, which may be quite right, but it has not been made noticeable enough here.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That was in the Bill as it stood originally, but the other thing that was there was that the preferred shareholders created by the new Bill would have 6 per cent. It was found that was too much. The two proprietors of the railway said: No; we will reduce it to 5 per cent., the same as the preferred shares. That being so, they will all be on the same footing of 5 per cent. The only difference is that, as these coupons are now due and may be collected on the railway in preference to anything else, they say: No; we will take preferred shares and come in with the others. I think it is the best arrangement, under the circumstances.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 78) to amend the Act to incorporate the Guelph Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Innes.)

Bill (No. 64) to amend the Act incorporating the Pictou Coal and Iron Company.—(Mr. Stairs.)

LIFE-SAVING APPARATUS, &c.

Mr. MASSUE (for Mr. CURRAN) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to propose any amendment to the Canadian Shipping Laws, by providing for the carrying of life-saving apparatus, and inextinguishable light by Canadian vessels?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not.

SUBSIDY TO QUEBEC CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. GUAY asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant, during the present Session, an additional subsidy to the Quebec Central Railway Company, to assist that company in extending its line from Beauce Junction through the valley of the Chaudière to the boundary line, and thence to the line of the International Railway, at a point on or near the River L'Original, in the State of Maine?

Mr. POPE. I have not yet had an opportunity of bringing the matter under the consideration of the Government.

DEPREDACTIONS BY AMERICAN FISHERMEN.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. ROBERTSON, Shelburne) asked, Whether the Government have taken steps to ascertain the correctness of statement telegraphed to the press, reporting depredations by American fishermen upon the traps of lobster fishermen at Clark's Harbour, in the county of Shelburne, Nova Scotia; and if the report of such aggressive action is correct, what steps do they propose to take in reference to this matter?

Mr. FOSTER. Steps have been taken to ascertain the correctness of these reports. Until the facts are ascertained it is not possible to say what steps will be taken.

SUGAR IN BONDED WAREHOUSE IN MONTREAL.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. ROBERTSON, Shelburne) asked, What quantity of sugar was there in bonded warehouse, Montreal, on the 31st March, 1886?

Mr. BOWELL. I would ask that the question be allowed to stand for a future day, when probably I will be able to give an answer. I have not yet received the information from Montreal.

SALE OF TIMBER ISLAND, LAKE ONTARIO.

Mr. FISHER (for Mr. PLATT) asked, Has Timber Island, Lake Ontario, been sold by the Government? If sold, who is the purchaser, and what is the sum paid? If not sold, who is the present lessee or occupant? When was the lease granted, and when does it expire, and what is the annual of rental?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Timber Island, Lake Ontario, was sold on the 1st July of 1884 to Mr. Paul Finlay McCuaig for $500.

THE INSPECTION ACT.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Is it the intention of the Government during the present Session to amend the Inspection Act by declaring what shall be the legal weight of a barrel of salt?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That question is now engaging the attention of the Government.

SQUAW ISLAND, GEORGIAN BAY.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. COOK) asked, 1. Whether the Government is aware that a number of the Georgian Bay fishermen have heretofore built cabins on Squaw Island, and have been in the habit of drying their nets and packing and shipping their fish from that island? 2. Whether the Government has leased the said island, or any part or parts thereof, to any person or persons? If so, who is or are the lessee or lessees? What land and privileges are covered by the leases? What rents are received, and how are such rents payable? 3. Whether the leases reserve a right to the fishermen, in the first question mentioned, to use the said island in the way they have heretofore done? 4. Whether the Government is aware that Clark & Co., of Collingwood, claim to have leased the said island, and refuse to allow the fishermen mentioned in question 1, to occupy their cabins, dry their nets, and pack and ship their fish unless the fish caught by such fishermen are sold by them to Clark & Co.? If so, do Clark & Co. possess this right under any lease or other authority from the Government?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. 1. The Department of Indian Affairs, to which branch of the service the disposal of Squaw Island, in the interests of the Indians who surrendered it, together with other islands to be disposed of for their benefit, appertains, is not aware that a number of the Georgian Bay fishermen have heretofore built cabins on Squaw Island, and have been in the habit of drying their nets and packing and shipping their fish from that island. 2. The Department of Indian Affairs has leased the said island to Messrs. Noble & Clark, of Collingwood, they being also the lessees of the fisheries surrounding said island, as shown by the description received by the Department of Indian Affairs from the Department of Fisheries before the lease of the island was issued to said Clark & Noble. The lease covers all the island, with the proviso that the lessees shall protect the trees remaining thereon, and that they shall not prevent the Indians from landing for the purpose of shelter, or for landing fish. The amount of rent payable by the lessees for the island is $225 per annum, payable half-yearly in advance. 3. The lease to Messrs. Noble & Clark does not reserve a right to the fishermen in the first question mentioned to use the said island. 4. The first part of this question is answered in the reply to the second question; and with regard to the remainder of the question, the Department is not aware that Messrs. Clark & Co., the lessees of the island, refuse to allow the fishermen mentioned in question No. 1 to occupy their cabins, dry their nets, and pack and ship their fish, unless the fish caught by said fishermen are sold by them to Clark & Co., who possess no other rights in the island, so far as this Department is aware, than those given them under their lease thereof.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—CLAIM FOR DAMAGES.

Mr. LANGEVIER asked, 1. Whether Jos. Simard, or any other Dominion arbitrator, has made an enquiry and report on the claim of Elzéar Marois, of Cap St. Ignace, whose horse was killed by a train on the Intercolonial Railway in July, 1884? 2. What is the nature of the said report? 3. Is it the intention of the Government to pay to the said Elzéar Marois the value of the said horse?

Mr. POPE. We have had strong pressure from the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) in this matter, and we have referred it to one of the official arbitrators, who recommends that a settlement should be made. No decision has yet been arrived at. I am obtaining further information on the subject.

CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. VAIL asked, What amount was collected for tolls on the Canals of Canada between the 30th June, 1885, and the 31st December, 1885?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The amounts collected during the period named were as follows:—

Welland Canal.....	$100,620 34
St. Lawrence Canals.....	42,989 59
Chambly Canal.....	12,743 45
Rideau Canal.....	4,148 91
Ottawa Canals.....	36,887 88
Burlington Bay Canal.....	876 61
Newcastle District Canals.....	434 32
St. Peter's Canals.....	1,083 75

Total..... $199,494 85

About $15,000 of this amount was refunded on account of reduction of tolls on grain passed down to Montreal.

REPRESENTATION OF MANITOBA.

Mr. WATSON asked, Is it the intention of the Government to give Manitoba increased representation in the next Parliament?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It is not the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill upon this subject during the present Session.

IMPROVEMENT OF ASSINIBOINE RIVER.

Mr. WATSON asked, Is it the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates for the purpose of improving the channel of the Assiniboine River, between the town of Portage la Prairie and the city of Winnipeg, so as to prevent the frequent overflow of water during freshets?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am informed by the Chief Engineer of my Department that no examination has yet been made of the river for the purpose of the improvement the hon. gentleman's question refers to.

Mr. ROSS asked, Is it the intention of the Government to take any steps this year to improve the navigation of the Assiniboine River, and also to cause the necessary work to be done to prevent its overflow?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to say that it is the intention of the Government to take any steps this year to improve the navigation of that river. As for the necessary work to be done to prevent its overflow, that is a very large question, and I have no doubt the hon.

gentleman will give me a little time to enable me to answer it.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

Mr. COURSOL (for Mr. GAULT) asked, Is there a probability of closer trade relations with the British West India Islands, in consequence of the visit of the delegation from the Island of Barbadoes last year?

Mr. McLELAN. It is hoped there will be closer trade relations with the British West Indies.

HARBOR MASTERSHIP OF WINDSOR, ONTARIO.

Mr. LISTER asked, Has a harbor master been appointed for the port of Windsor, in the county of Essex? If so, who is the appointee, and what is the date of his appointment? If such an officer has not been appointed, is it the intention of the Government to make such an appointment at that port?

Mr. FOSTER. A harbor master has not been appointed for the port of Windsor. The matter is not engaging the attention of the Government.

PETITION OF JAMES TRESTON AND OTHERS.

Mr. LAURIER asked, At what date was the petition of James Treston and others, to Sir John Macdonald, printed at page 68 of Sessional Papers No. 116f (1885), received by the Government?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The petition of James Treston and others, without date, was received by the Department on the 16th of November, 1881.

DEPUTATION TO LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Have the Government among the North-West papers a letter to the Minister of the Interior from the Chief Commissioner of the Hudson's Bay Company, written in the early part of 1884, notifying the Government that the deputation was going to Montana for Louis Riel, and warning them of the danger of the situation? Will such letter be brought down?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I am informed by the officers of the Department that there is no such letter on record in the Department of the Interior.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE AT PORT ROWAN.

Mr. JACKSON. When the House took recess on Wednesday last (p. 703) I had been pointing out that on several occasions the life-saving service at Port Rowan had performed noble work in saving lives there under very difficult circumstances. I had shown, by quotations from the Spirit of the Age, that this crew had saved, in the fall of 1883, the crew of the Siberia, consisting of eight men and one woman, under very trying circumstances. These people had to remain twenty hours on the Siberia after she had struck, before they were rescued, and on that occasion the captain asked another to take command. By that act, he showed he did not consider himself competent, under trying circumstances, to take charge of the boat, and the boat was taken charge of by another gentleman, and the crew successfully rescued. The Maple Leaf, in its Port Rowan correspondence, shows how this life service had rescued the crew of nine men and a woman from the steam barge Fortune, which was wrecked off Port Rowan on the 31st October, 1884. I was about showing, when the House took recess, that there was a remarkable fact connected with this rescue, namely, the absence of the captain of the lifeboat. The correspondent goes on to relate:

"Just here, let us note a remarkable fact. The captain of the lifeboat is never in charge when rescuing a crew. At the present time he is at Long Point, shooting ducks. This is a scandalous state of things, and the Government should see that he attends to his duties as captain, or appoint someone that will. The crew always appoint Crooker their leader. They all have perfect confidence in him, and he should have the pay and honor, as well as the work and danger.

"Then the keeper of the lighthouse should be provided with signals, as he generally sees the wreck first, but has no way of letting it be known. In the case of the Fortune, he could have saved the half-frozen, half-drowned, half-dead sailors a whole night of misery.

"Then, a man should be employed for a couple of months in each fall, to patrol the coast and keep a constant look-out for signs of distress. Had this been done, the crew of the Fitzgerald might have been saved last year. It is to be hoped that immediate steps will be taken to have the case properly represented to the Government, and the various defects remedied."

I just want to call your attention to the fact of the crew of the Fitzgerald being drowned in 1883, when, as this correspondent states, had there been a man patrolling the coast, by whom signals could be given, no doubt the crew would have been saved. In connection with this, I want to read another article from the Norfolk Reformer, dated a year later, October, 1885:

"Within twenty-four hours at this season of the year our lifeboat-saving station may be called into action. The Government authorises two practice days each month from the opening to the close of our waters. Two seasons has given the captain at this station ample time to select and hold in readiness a competent crew to man the boat when brought out for action. On Monday morning, the usual practice day, a matter of form was gone through with. We are much surprised to learn that the captain has not been in a position to command the same crew more than on two occasions during the whole season. Men who now volunteer for this duty only act for the money they receive at the time. And should they be called into action they could not be persuaded to take an oar. We ask why is this? This station now should possess a competent, well-practiced crew, consisting of men accustomed to the water, able-bodied, active, strong, and ready for any case of emergency. But we fear this station possesses none of these characteristics, and unless men volunteer, the captain would find it a difficult task to man her if called into duty. This should certainly not be the case. These men are paid for their services by the Government, and why cannot we have an effective crew to render services to poor distressed shipwrecked sailors in time of need."

These are the articles written by correspondents who know the facts of the case and the feeling in that vicinity, and in my opinion the facts they give go very far to support the petition that was sent into the Government a short time ago, whereby the people of that place prayed for a change of captain. I have not a word to say against the captain; he is a gentleman respected by all who know him, but all respected gentlemen are not competent to be captains of life-saving crews. Therefore, I recommend the Government to give this petition their most favorable consideration. If they would change the captain in that place, it would not only give general satisfaction, but, in my opinion, might be the cause of saving many valuable lives in the future. In reference to life-saving service, I do not think it would be out of place for me to state what I have seen at the American stations which I visited last year, in October, 1885. I visited the life-saving stations at Michigan, at Hammond's Bay, on the main shore of Lake Huron. Captain Valentine, who was in command, took very great pains in showing me the outfit and explaining the different uses it was put to, and giving me all the information he could regarding it. The service was supplied with six men and a captain, making seven. Of these men two were on duty at one time, four hours out of every twelve. During the day they watched from the top of the station-house, and during the night they patrolled the beach for three miles each way. When they left the station the captain gave them a register, something in the shape of a watch, but on a larger scale. These men used this register. They travelled three miles each way; at the end of the three miles a key was fastened to a post, and the patrol man, when he arrived at that post, took the key and inserted it in this instrument, which caused it to register the hour and the minute when he was there. At twelve every night the patrol men returned and delivered up to the captain those instruments, by which means he was able to know that they had been there, and there was no way of deceiving him. Then he showed me his boats and other equipments. That service was supplied with several boats. One was called a surf-boat. Another was a self-bailing and self-righting boat, a very fine boat, and he also showed me the improvements which had been introduced. They had dispensed with the mortar gun and the Merriman, and had introduced the Lisle gun, a small cannon, from which they shot a projectile with a small line attached to it, which they throw over the wreck in desperate cases when they cannot reach the wreck; and by means of this small line they haul on a larger line, by means of which they rescue lives that might in other cases be lost. Then they have their practising boat. They have their temporary structures by means of which they practice daily, and upon the whole their equipments are ample for everything required by them. I brought this to the notice of the Minister of Marine in 1884, in reference to the inefficiency of the service at Port Rowan, and he stated that he was getting two lifeboats made. I will read what the hon. gentleman said:

"I am aware that the boat at that station does not possess all the improvements of the lifeboats of the present day. I have, however, had two of the most approved lifeboats made in Buffalo; and I have had specifications of those made, and they are now ready. I intend to have a number of lifeboats of the most approved pattern in use manufactured as early as possible; and, if the hon. gentleman's statement is correct, that that is the most exposed position in the west, we shall place one of the improved lifeboats at that station."

Again I brought it to his attention in 1885, and he answered me in this way:

"I may say further, that, on the specifications prepared last season of the Dobbins lifeboat, I called for tenders for twelve of them, and six were ordered for construction in Ontario and six in the east. As it is a new work for the boat-builders, some delay occurred, and we were not able to get the boats in time for last fall's service; but I had enquiries made a few weeks ago as to the condition of the work, and I am assured that the boats will be ready for the spring service. They are of the pattern the hon. gentleman describes—self righting and self-bailing. We have procured two of them from the United States, and they are very excellent boats and give great satisfaction."

Now, the hon. gentleman promised on the first occasion that he would send a new lifeboat to Port Rowan. Two years have elapsed, and we have had no addition to the service there. It remains in a very inefficient position. They have only an old-fashioned lifeboat there. They have no life-jackets; they have not even common life-preservers. The system of life-jackets is a very important thing, to which I want to call the Minister's attention. There is a life-jacket in use among the Americans, which I omitted to mention in my statement about the Michigan station. It is called the Merriman rubber jacket. The sailor slips into this jacket, and then it is filled with air, which enables him to float himself and two or three drowning persons. If he has this he can rely upon it, so that he can feel himself perfectly safe in going to the rescue of drowning persons, and can very often save the lives of others. But the service at Port Rowan has not even a common life-preserver. They have nothing. They have to go out under very trying circumstances, and take their lives in their hands, and in some cases their lives are seriously jeopardised. Since last year we have had a change in the Minister of Marine. We have now a young, energetic man at the helm, and I hope that, during the next spring and summer, this service will be supplied with a good boat and with sufficient material to enable those men to protect themselves in case of accident; and I really feel that, as it is one of the most exposed places on the whole chain of lakes, the Government will see that something should be done in that direction.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman's statement as to there being no apparatus at Port Rowan and their being without the ordinary life-jackets, is not quite true. Since I have come into the office I have ordered a complete outfit, and I think it was sent down there three or four weeks ago. At least, orders were given for it, on the expression of his view by our Chairman in Toronto. At all events, they will be there in readiness for the spring operations.

Mr. JACKSON.

Mr. JACKSON. I saw the captain in January, when I left, and he said nothing had been sent then.

Motion agreed to.

SCATTERIE FOG-WHISTLE SUPERINTENDENT.

Mr. KIRK moved for:

Copies of all correspondence and telegrams between the Government of Canada, or any member thereof, and the late Superintendent of Scatterie Fog-Whistle, and any other person or persons, and any Order or Orders in Council relative to the dismissal or resignation of the said Superintendent and the appointment of his successor.

He said: During the delivery of the Budget Speech of the Minister of Finance, he spoke of the importance of efficiently lighting the coast of the Dominion, and he complimented very highly the efficient manner in which the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), had performed the duty while Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It is not only important to have good and efficient lighthouses and fog-alarms established in important places on the sea coast, but it is just as important that they should be well kept. It is useless, in fact, to have lighthouses and fog-alarms unless they are well kept; it is better to be without them altogether unless they are provided with good keepers. Now, Sir, I am credibly informed that the superintendent of Scatterie fog-alarm was dismissed, or, rather, forced to resign, for the alleged reason that he was incapable of performing the duties of that office; and I am credibly informed that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had already made up his mind to dismiss that official, and a friend of the superintendent, having ascertained that that was a fact, advised him to resign, and he did resign. I understand that the reason the Government decided to take this action was that the superintendent was not capable of making any repairs which might be necessary to the engine or boiler, and that he was forced to resign because he was not sufficient of a mechanic to make the repairs to his engine or boiler. Another was appointed in his place, and, according to the newspaper reports, in the month of July last the boiler broke down, and during a dense fog a steamship, in making Sydney harbor, ran on the shore and became a total wreck. I will read an extract from the North Sydney Herald, of July 15th, 1885, which will show the position of affairs in that regard:

"Lost on Scattarie.—S.S. Colombo from Oosaw to this port for bunker coal, went ashore on the night of the 9th on Scattarie, during a dense fog, and is a total wreck. A few hours before the Colombo went ashore the fog-whistle on the island had broken down, and to this unfortunate event Capt. Payne ascribes the loss of his steamship. The Colombo belonged to Watts, of London. She had a cargo of phosphates for Dublin. The crew came to this port on Saturday evening by the tug Merrimac."

Now, Sir, I have no reason to find fault with the Government for forcing the resignation of an incapable superintendent. The Government would be perfectly right in doing so, but they should take care to appoint a competent person in his place. I am informed that the man whom they appointed to replace the first one, was not a mechanic either; he was neither an engineer nor a mechanic, and he knew nothing at all about running an engine; he knew nothing at all about a boiler except what he had learned, during a few years, from the superintendent who had been dismissed. I am informed that the reason why the boiler broke down was that the new superintendent was unable to repair it; the boiler sprang a leak and was unable to generate sufficient steam to sound an alarm, and for the want of that alarm the steamer ran ashore. I am informed, also, that when the steamer ran ashore, the new superintendent was obliged to call in the very man that was dismissed to repair the boiler in order to start the fog-alarm again. I cannot say this is true, but I have it on very good authority. I think people have a right to know whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has properly performed his duties in this matter.

Mr. McLELAN. After the remarks of the hon. gentleman I may be allowed to say a word or two. I remember something about a dispute between the keeper of the lighthouse and the keeper of the fog-alarm. I think the one was dependent upon the other for assistance at times, and a quarrel arose. It was desirable to have greater harmony between the two men residing at the station, and also to have men capable of repairing the fog-alarm should it get out of order. The hon. gentleman says that after the new engineer was appointed the boiler gave out, and that an hour or two before, a vessel ran ashore. Well, it is nothing extraordinary that an engine should be idle for a short time while repairs are being made. I may state to the House that while I was in the Department, in order to guard against such accidents, I had contracted for some fifteen or sixteen fog-horns to duplicate all the more important stations, that is, to place two alarms at each so that if one broke down there would be another to start, so as to prevent such an accident as the hon. gentleman says occurred at that station. My recollection of the stranding of the steamer Colombo, was not that it occurred in consequence of the fog-alarm being out of order, but that it was complained of by the captain that for the want of a fog-alarm at some point near Sydney harbor, the vessel went ashore. I think it is desirable, in the interest of navigation, that at all the more important stations there should be two alarms, so that when one is disabled the other may be put into operation; and before I left the Department last year I had contracted for some twelve or fifteen, and I suppose my successor is taking steps to have them placed.

Mr. KIRK. The hon. gentleman has not answered the charge at all. He has admitted the necessity of having a superintendent who is capable of repairing the engine and boiler should they get out of order, but he has not explained why he dismissed a superintendent who was able to repair the boiler, and who did repair it, and appointed another man who was not able to repair the boiler. I can understand the hon. gentleman's desire of putting the country to the cost of having a duplicate system of fog-alarms in dangerous places, in order to avoid the necessity of dismissing or displacing some unfortunate superintendents to make room for friends of the hon. gentleman. But it appears to me that if good and efficient superintendents are appointed who are mechanics, there will be no necessity for a duplicate alarm being kept in order that it may be sounded whilst the other one is out of repair. Now, the charge is that the hon. gentleman dismissed a superintendent who was capable of performing his duties—

Mr. McLELAN. No.

Mr. KIRK—and placed a man in his stead who was not capable. Now, the report in the North Sydney Herald does not say one or two hours. I do not know how many hours the fog-alarm was idle, but the paper says a few hours. It may have been a dozen hours, and perhaps it was more than that. I daresay the man who was newly appointed would be very reluctant to call in the man who was dismissed to repair the engine. It is likely he would wait an hour or two before attempting to do so. It was only after the steamship was lost the man was called in to make the necessary repairs.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman did not make any charge; he did not state whether the report was correct or not. The hon. gentleman had moved for the papers, and having stated that he was not aware whether the report was correct or not, I did not think it worth while to trouble with it. When the hon. gentleman gets the papers he will obtain all the information on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. This illustrates what I spoke of the other night, that it is not always the best plan to make a charge before the papers are laid on the Table for the information of the House. I venture to say that the papers, when brought down—I have gone through them, not very carefully, but still I have gone through them—will not substantiate the hon. gentleman's implied charge, namely, that a competent engineer was dismissed and an incompetent one put in his place. The hon. gentleman will find, when he looks over the papers, that the engineer was dismissed for cause, upon the recommendation of one of the best engineers in Nova Scotia, and the recommendation as well of our agent in Nova Scotia; and he was dismissed for incompetency, because his work was not up to what it should have been when it was inspected, and he was not considered to be a competent engineer judged by the work he performed. There was also another point: There were two heads and they were constantly quarrelling, and it was impossible to have the work fairly well carried out.

Mr. KIRK. What about the engineer who was appointed?

Mr. FOSTER. In regard to the engineer who was appointed, so far there has been no charge brought against him of incompetency. The hon. gentleman to-day has not made one. If the hon. gentleman thinks that to take up an item from a newspaper and found a charge on it is the best and fairest way of treating a matter coming before the House, he is entitled to that opinion; but few will agree with him in regard to this. The hon. gentleman said a moment ago that he had stated a fact. Of course, the fact of the wreck was stated, but there is a wide difference between the fact of the wreck and the conclusion that the wreck was due to incompetency on the part of the officials appointed to take charge of the lighthouse.

Motion agreed to.

PORT HOOD HARBOR.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Since I tabled this motion I have received some information relative to the subject which necessitates a change in my notice. I, therefore, deem it necessary to make an explanation as to why I desire that change. In answer to an Order of the House, dated 5th March, 1886, for copies of all correspondence with the Department of Public Works relative to the protection required to the north of Smith's Island to prevent the total destruction of Port Hood harbor, Inverness, N.S., also a copy of the engineer's report thereon, the chief engineer makes very important statements. He says:

"Under the lee of Smith's Island is to be found the safest anchorage on the western coast of Cape Breton, and this great benefit is in a fair way of being destroyed by reason of the inroads which the sea has made, and is still making, on the comparatively low neck of land at the northern end of Smith's Island on the plan herewith."

After referring to the danger of the severance of the island whereby the harbor would be destroyed, the chief engineer states:

"It is stated by residents on the island that thirteen years ago the cliff at the neck of low land extended fully 200 feet beyond its present position, and that the rate of wear or erosion was about fifteen feet per year.

"Assuming that this rate of erosion would not increase, the edge of the bog would be reached in about seventeen years; beyond this point the material being softer would offer less resistance to the action of the sea, and the injury would therefore proceed at a more rapid rate, and probably twenty years might elapse before a complete severance of the island would be effected."

The severance of the island at that point, I repeat, would totally destroy Port Hood harbor, which is one of the most important harbors in the Maritime Provinces. In the north bay and along the north-west coast of Inverness County will be found during the fall of the year the largest fishing fleet from the Maritime Provinces and the United States in any part of Canada, and this is the only safe harbor of refuge available for that fleet from the Magdalen Islands to the Strait of Canso, along St. George's Bay and the north-west coast of Inverness, a sea coast line of about 130 miles. This question was repeatedly brought before the attention of this House. During the discussion on 29th April, 1878, Mr. Tupper said :

"He would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works if the Government had arrived at any conclusion with reference to a work of considerable importance in Nova Scotia, which had been under the consideration of the late Government, and which had been brought to the notice of this Government from time to time. He referred to the closing of Port Hood Harbor, Cape Breton."

Mr. Mitchell, now member for Northumberland, said :

"The work was of great importance; he had seen over 100 vessels in that harbor."

Mr. Macdonnell, member for Inverness, said :

"He had seen over 300 vessels in this harbor at one time during a storm. The only harbor of refuge on the north-west side of Cape Breton, on the gulf side of St. Lawrence and Bay St. George, which formed an almost direct coast line, was that of Port Hood, and for ships blown by storms from any of the ports to the west of it, and other ports on Prince Edward Island and along the northern shores of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Many vessels were annually wrecked along this coast. Only last fall in one day 103 vessels had taken refuge in this harbor, and on the following morning 13 others were stranded on the shore. Not a single one of them belonged to the county of Inverness."

This shows that Port Hood harbor is not one of local importance, no vessel being owned in the neighborhood of that harbor, but that the work is one of general importance. After referring to the extent of the coast, Mr. Macdonnell concluded as follows:—

"He hoped the Government would turn attention to this work at once. It was one that could not be constructed piecemeal; but he thought a small grant of $20,000 or so would be sufficient this season in order that the work would be initiated before another year elapsed. Although the contract might not be entered into till late in the season, it was desirable to procure such material as was necessary."

In answer to these statements, the late Minister of Public Works (Mr. Mackenzie) said :

"The Government would have no hesitation at all about a grant such as the hon. gentleman had named; but he feared it would be utterly impossible to do anything with so small a sum. What he proposed was to have the plans, which were almost complete, and advertise to get tenders and see the minimum sum for which it could be built, then they would know exactly where they stood at the next Session of Parliament."

Since that time, I am given to understand, tenders were asked for, and I am desirous of obtaining the papers so that the House may know the exact figure which the work would cost. Therefore I desire to move my motion with a slight amendment which I hope will be adopted. I move for :

Copies of all correspondence relative to the closing of the northern entrance into Port Hood Harbor, with copies of all reports of Chief Engineers of the Public Works Department in reference to the matter; also copy of the plans, specifications and tenders asked for by the late Minister of Public Works in 1878.

Mr. PAINT. I am happy to be able to concur in all the remarks made by my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron). This is a most important harbor, for not only have there been 100 sailing vessels there at one time, but I have known of 300, and three English men-of-war at the same time. It is the only harbor along the western coast of Cape Breton; it is invaluable to the trade of the country and should be preserved at all costs.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness).

WHITEFISH FRY AT FISH HATCHERIES.

Mr. GORDON moved for :

Return giving the number of whitefish fry at the various fish hatcheries of the Dominion for distribution next spring; also the number of pickerel and black bass; also the instructions that have been given for their distribution.

He said : I will not detain the House very long, but will simply take advantage of this opportunity of earnestly requesting the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to direct that, as early a period as possible, a number of fish fry, of the species enumerated in the order, be sent forward to the lakes of Vancouver Island, in order to test the practicability of these lakes for the reproduction of such fish. There are many lakes on that island varying in length from half a mile to forty miles. The waters of these lakes seem to be well adapted to the production of whitefish, bass and pickerel. At the present time the only fish to be found in them is the species known as the mountain trout, and I am sure that while these hatcheries are going on silently doing their work in this country, the Department, the Government and this House, will feel the importance of extending the field of their labor. I need not make any further remarks, because I am sure the importance of the question will be acknowledged.

Motion agreed to.

DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST — POLICE SCOUTS.

Mr. SPROULE moved for :

Return showing the names and number of those who acted as police scouts during the North-West insurrection; also, the names of those who have since applied for a land grant bounty for said services, the same as that given to the volunteers.

He said : I may say that I make this motion with a view of finding out the names and the number of those who were engaged in the insurrection in this capacity. I believe there is a misunderstanding on the part of some of those parties, as they think that having done a duty somewhat similar to the military scouts they are therefore entitled to the same consideration. I am informed that quite a number were engaged in this capacity, and that many of them have since applied for land grant bounties similar to that given to the volunteers, but it has been refused—on what ground they cannot understand. So far as my knowledge gives me information on this subject, I believe they did the same kind of work. The work was dangerous; they were obliged to supply themselves with fire-arms and horses, the amount of wages they received was not sufficient to compensate them, any more than the wages of the volunteers was sufficient to compensate them for the labor they performed; and since the insurrection has been quelled they are now applying for land grant bounties. These bounties have been refused to them and they think that an injustice has been done them. I believe that when the matter is brought to the attention of the Government they will see the reasonableness of changing the resolutions which were passed last year by this House, so as to provide that land grant bounties should be given to these parties. In addition I understand that some of them have asked that, provided the land grant bounty is given, they may be able to turn it in on their pre-emptions. Many of them are settlers in the North-West who have taken homesteads and entered for pre-emptions, and I cannot see any reasonable objection to these bounties being so applied. I believe also that some of them have applied to have the time allowed during which they were engaged as part of the time they have to settle on their lands before getting their deeds. As I said before they did the same kind of work as the military scouts; it was as dangerous work; their pay was only 75 cents per day, after supplying themselves with the horses and I think they are entitled to the same consideration.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). With reference to the last remark of the hon. gentleman I may say that we have allowed the time both of the teamsters and of the scouts who were engaged in the North-West, to apply upon their homesteads, as part of the time of residence.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECHES IN PARLIAMENT.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the following Resolutions:—

1. That the growing practice in the Canadian House of Commons of delivering speeches of great length, having the character of carefully and elaborately prepared written essays, and indulging in voluminous and often irrelevant extracts, is destructive of legitimate and pertinent debate upon public questions, is a waste of valuable time, unreasonably lengthens the Sessions of Parliament, threatens by increased bulk and cost to lead to the abolition of the official Report of the Debates, encourages a discursive and diffuse, rather than an incisive and concise style of public speaking, is a marked contrast to the practice in regard to debate that prevails in the British House of Commons, and tends to repel the public from a careful and intelligent consideration of the proceedings of Parliament.

2. That it is expedient to adopt the following rules to apply in future to the mode of conducting debates in the House of Commons of Canada:

(1). The speech of the Finance Minister, the reply to the same, or the speech of a member moving a motion or resolution shall not exceed two hours each, except by consent of the House obtained at the opening of the debate.

(2). With the exception of the Budget Speech of the Finance Minister, the chief reply to the same, and the mover of a motion or resolution, no member shall in any debate speak at greater length than one hour and a half, except the acting leader of the Government, or of the Opposition, who shall not exceed two hours each, except by the unanimous consent of the House.

(3). After any question shall have been under the consideration of the House for three days, speeches upon the same shall be limited to one hour each, except in the case of the acting leader of the Government, or of the Opposition, who shall not exceed two hours each, except by the unanimous consent of the House.

(4). After any question shall have been under the consideration of the House for five days, the House may, upon the motion of any member, and by three-quarters vote of the members present, restrict the time to be occupied by any member, except the acting leader of the Government, or of the Opposition, to not less than fifteen minutes each.

(5). The above restrictions as to time shall apply to the proceedings of the House when in committee, as well as when Mr. Speaker is in the Chair, but shall not be held to abridge the privileges of a member, when the House is in Committee, except as to the length of time he may speak upon each occasion when he is entitled to address the Chairman.

(6). The foregoing rules as to restriction of time may be suspended for one speech in the case of any individual member, by the unanimous consent of the House.

(7). No member shall be allowed to read his speech from MSS., but this shall not be held to debar from the use of memorandum, and notes of the character of headlines and suggestions.

3. It shall be the duty of Mr. Speaker to enforce the foregoing rules.

He said: The necessity for action in the line of these resolutions will, I presume, be concurred in by nearly every member of this House. It is undisputed that for several years there has been a growing tendency here to make long speeches. I am quite willing to confess that I am a sinner in this regard myself; and for this reason a motion of this kind will come from me with probably as good grace as from almost any other member of the House. We have a large country, with growing wants, a growing population and a growing business; and if this business receives from the House of Commons proper attention, we must adopt some plan for economising our time, some rule for limiting debate, or there must be some general concurrence on the part of members that long speeches are unnecessary and improper. One circumstance that perhaps more than anything else leads to this evil, if we may call it such, is the fact that our Hansard affords all members of the House an opportunity to talk to their constituents. Their speeches are carefully reported in Hansard and an arrangement can easily be made by which a member may obtain and send to his constituents as many copies of his speech as he chooses to issue. For this reason many members make speeches, not to the House or to the country at large, but through Hansard to their constituents. This evil does not exist to the same extent in England. The English Hansard is not, as here, a verbatim report of Parliament; in fact, it is a brief epitome of the debates of Parliament, and if a member wishes his speech to reach his constituents he must arrange to send it by special wire to his local paper; and on account of the expense attending this plan the evil of long speeches is kept within moderate bounds. All who have noticed in this House the effect produced by long speeches must be aware that, except on very rare occasions, they do not receive that attention from the House that shorter speeches would receive. A speech of four or five hours' length, if compressed within a limit of an hour or an hour and a-half, would produce a better effect in this House. I am convinced that long speeches are not read by the country—that not one man in a thousand takes the pains to wade through them. In fact, I believe that a speech over an hour long is a waste of time, so far as the country is concerned.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). There are no speeches delivered, only read speeches.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg to differ from my hon. friend as to that. There are speeches delivered in this House that have not been read, speeches of great length and ability and speeches which could only be criticised on the ground that they were too long. It is related of Jeremy Black, a celebrated jurist in the United States, that he had a son who was completing his education at one of the universities. The son spoke to his father about his valedictory address. The old gentleman read it carefully, and advised his son to re-write it and compress it into one-fourth of the space. The boy re-wrote the address, and got it into one-half of the space, and then read it again to his father; the old gentleman said, "if you will re-write that again and compress it one-half, it will be all right." So with long speeches. They may be admirably adapted to bringing out every point in the matter under consideration, and presenting all the details; and they would be admirable in every respect if they could command the attention of the House and country—if the people would only read them; but most people will not follow all these details. I think we should consult every interest by shortening our speeches. We should secure the attention of the House to a greater extent, and produce a greater effect. Parliament is for debating rather than for delivering long essays. Our Hansard is a valuable record of our speeches; but it is evident that there is a feeling on the part of members that Hansard is overloaded, is too voluminous, costs the country too much, and contains so much matter that the ordinary reader will not go through it; and if we persist in the course we are following, and make the Hansard more voluminous every year, the result will be that we shall sacrifice it—some member will bring in a resolution that Hansard be discontinued, and the majority will agree with him. Of course this record will be valuable to the future historian and the future student of history. I can imagine that a Hansard, no matter how brief, containing an epitome of the proceedings of the Parliament of England in past ages would possess incalculable value at the present day; but if it embraced four ponderous volumes, as ours of last Session did, almost any student of history would shrink from the task of going over the proceedings from year to year. I believe that in the matter of speeches we have sinned perhaps to a greater extent than almost any deliberative body in the world. I notice, by the reports in the press of the proceedings in the British Parliament lately, that Mr. Gladstone introduced his Home Rule scheme in a speech of something over three hours in length, which was the longest speech he ever made in his life, but a considerable portion of it was occupied by the applause of his followers, so that his speech probably occupied less than three hours; his answers to the criticisms upon the Bill occupied less than an hour; and his speech in introducing the Land Bill occupied an hour and a half. I hold a volume here written by Mr. Lucy, entitled "A Diary of two Parliaments," which contains some interesting matter as to the length of speeches and the opinion of prominent men as to the true course to be adopted to produce effective speaking. Referring to Lord Hartington, he says:

"Without observing any slavish adherence to the hours during which the House has been in session, he generally happened to be present when it was necessary for him to say a desirable word, and he has always managed to say the right thing at the right time.

"He has, moreover, marvellously improved in ability as a speaker. His contribution to the debate on the introduction of the new disciplinary rules was, in point of style and effect, perhaps the best he ever delivered in the House. As a parliamentary speaker he is at least on a par with the leader of the House, and has shown a capacity which, if it proceeds at equal pace during the next two Sessions, will give him a decided advantage over Stafford Northcote. One obvious assistance in acquiring this all-important parliamentary success is his ultimate conversion to the great fact that, in all but very exceptional cases, every minute beyond twenty occupied in the delivery of a speech undermines its strength and tends to nullify its effect. In former times Hartington was accustomed to drone through three-quarters of an hour of ineffective wordiness, his strong common sense and clear views struggling to show their form under the wet blanket of speech cast over them. Now he never takes more than twenty minutes for his speech, and often says all he has to say within the limits of ten minutes or a quarter of an hour."

With regard to Gladstone's great speech on the eastern question Mr. Lucy said he occupied two hours and thirty-five minutes, of which about 20 minutes was taken up by his friends in applause which gave the old gentleman a chance to take refreshments—not ardent spirits,—and he adds that the speech was dangerously long. The evil of long speeches had been felt in the British House of Commons as early as 1849. Mr. Milner Gibson introduced a resolution, which was as follows:—

"To leave out from the word 'that' to the end of the question, in order to add the words 'the speeches of members be limited in duration to one hour; but that the introducers of original motions, and Ministers of the Crown speaking in reply, be exempted from this rule.'"

Mr. Cobden seconded this amendment. Lord John Russell in the course of the debate said:

"He (Lord John Russell) must confess that sometimes when the House had been teased by the garrulity of some members, he felt that a time might come when the House would adopt some rule with regard to the limitation of time."

Mr. Tynte said:

"He thought the love of speaking had increased very much with the perfection to which shorthand writing had attained, and that the House was greatly indebted to those gentlemen up at the back of the Chair for the length as well as the accuracy of the debate. It was an inducement to hon. members to speak when their speeches were sent through the country; and he hoped those gentlemen (the reporters) would use a little patriotic discretion in distinguishing that which was worthy of being reported.

Mr. Cobden said:

"It was when a member had nothing to say, or did not know what he was going to say, that he would have occasion to speak for more than an hour. The right hon. member for Tamworth had referred to the case of Mr. Burke. That was an unhappy instance, for it was well known that Burke generally emptied the House. He was called the 'dinner bell,' and it was said that 'He went on refining,

'And thought of convincing while they thought of dining.'

And he thought if his speeches were cut into four they would read much better than they did. He would limit the time of speaking, for the purpose of saving the time of the House, and the reputation of the House with the country, and therefore he would support the motion.

"The House divided on Mr. Gibson's motion: Yeas, 62; nays, 96; majority, 34."

Since then it has been found necessary in England to adopt a rule limiting the time called the cloture. I find in Bourinot's work the following regulation with regard to Parliamentary procedure:—

"Putting the question. A standing order of the 27th November, 1882, provides as follows for the prompt closing of a debate, when it is the sense of the House that a question has been sufficiently debated.

Mr. CHARLTON.

"That when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker or to the Chairman of Ways and Means in a Committee of the Whole House, during any debate, that the subject has been adequately discussed, and that it is the evident sense of the House, or of the committee, that the question be now put, he may so inform the House or the committee, and, if a motion be made 'that the question be now put,' Mr. Speaker, or the chairman, shall forthwith put such question; and, if the same be decided in the affirmative, the question under discussion shall be put forthwith: provided that the question 'that the question be now put,' shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a division be taken, unless it shall appear to have been supported by more than 200 members, or unless it shall appear to have been opposed by less than forty members, and supported by more than 100 members."

We have also had action taken in this respect, to my surprise, in Canada. In the year 1851, the following motion was moved:

"Mr. Armstrong moved, seconded by Mr. Morrison, and the question being put, that no member shall have leave to speak on any question before the House for more than half an hour; the House divided: and the names being called for they were taken down. Yeas, 33; Nays 22."

So we have had in Canada the half-hour limitation. In the United States I find the amount of business led to the adoption of rules for the limitation of debate as early as 1847.

"The House of Representatives has what is known as the one-hour rule, first adopted in 1847, which provides that no member can occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House. It would be a great mistake to infer that this secures any member who wishes to be heard the right to occupy an hour. The life of a Congress is short, and in practice a very few members only secure an hour, the rest being cut off by the previous question, usually asking and procuring 'leave to print,' or being allowed a few minutes of the time of the member who is entitled to an hour to close the debate. Another rule of the House is that no member shall speak more than once to the question, unless he be the mover, in which case he may speak in reply, but not until every member choosing shall have spoken. Both of these last named rules, however, may be and are often suspended by unanimous consent (unless the House is pressing toward a vote). Another rule provides that the Speaker is to name the member who is first to speak, as 'the gentleman from Maine,' etc., when two or more members claim the floor at once. No debate is allowed after the House has ordered the previous question, except one speech from the member reporting the measure; but, as he is entitled to an entire hour, he frequently yields a certain number of minutes of his time to several members for short speeches. No member may call another member by name in debate, or call attention to the views of the other House, but both of these rules are transgressed with great frequency, &c.

I have taken pains to look up the rules in different countries, and I find, in most of the colonies and in various European countries, rules have been adopted in their Parliaments for the purpose of saving time. In the Cape of Good Hope, any member can call for a division and take a vote on his call without a debate. In South Australia, the motion that the House do now divide takes precedence of any other business but it must not be made when a member is speaking. This is constantly done says Mr. Berresford, Clerk of the Assembly, under date 19th November, 1880. In Victoria, the motion that the question be now put is the only mode of checking debate, and it is often used. In Belgium, in the Senate, the close of the debate can be demanded by five members, and in the Chamber of Representatives by ten. If a member is too prolix, he may be called to the question, and if he persists in being prolix, he may have his right to speak stopped altogether for the session. In Austria and Hungary no member shall speak on the same question more than twice. In both Houses of the Reichsrath a motion may be put to close the debate at any time. When the motion is carried each party, for and against the proposition, shall choose one speaker on each side of the question, and then the motion is put. If, however, a member of the Government rises the debate is reopened. In Denmark the President may propose the close of the debate; fifteen members of the Lower House and twelve of the Upper House may demand the close of the debate peremptorily. In France, before declaring the cloture, the President of the Chamber consults the Chamber, and the right to speak against the cloture is only accorded to one speaker. In Germany, if a member wanders from the subject, he can be called to order by the President. If the member persists, he may be ordered by the House to be no longer allowed to speak. Thirty members may, by signed motion, close a debate. A motion to pass to the Orders of the Day may be made at any time, and only one speaker on each side can be heard. In Portugal only one hour is allowed before beginning the Orders of the Day. After two on each side have spoken, any peer may ask that the vote be taken, and no speaking is then allowed. There is no limitation as to speaking by either the peers or the deputies. In Spain, any deputy can move that the question be not discussed, and his motion has preference over any other. Only three on each side of a question are allowed to speak in each debate. Only in extraordinary cases can four be allowed. These speakers are chosen according to priority of the inscription of their names upon the president's list. No speech can be longer than one sitting without permission. It will be seen by these regulations of various countries that the necessity for rules limiting debate has been felt in other countries beside Canada, and that means have been taken in almost every country to save time by shortening speeches. Mr. Torrens, in his "Reform of Procedure in Parliament," says:

"There is hardly a speech recorded of Wyndham, Chesterfield, Pulteney, Walpole or Carteret, that could in delivery have occupied an hour. Mirabeau was never long; Vergniaud always terse; Berryer comprehensive but concise; Thiers as rapid and brilliant as a shower of sparks from the anvil. The best examples of Irish eloquence are distinguishable from the same characteristic from those of inferior merit; Grattan, Flood and Curran seldom exceed an hour, or Plunket when at his best."

Now, I do not think that it is necessary to enter more fully into the discussion of the question. I have taken the responsibility of introducing these rules, not, perhaps, because I expected that they would be adopted by the House, but to elicit an expression of opinion; and perhaps these rules may form the basis for some arrangement that will facilitate the dispatch of business in this House. I have but two more quotations to make. One is from a speech of Mr. Gladstone, on the 28th April, 1879, in which he says:

"Of the excellent speeches we all make in this House, and which go forth to the public, there is not one in a thousand of the readers who reads all the speech or who goes beyond the half-dozen lines of summary."

The Marquis of Hartington, speaking on the 2nd November, 1882, says:

"We mean by freedom of debate that every subject which is brought before the House shall receive full and adequate discussion, but no more than full and adequate discussion. There is no subject upon which there is more than a certain amount that can be said. When certain arguments have been urged, when certain points have been stated, no more in the way of discussion can usefully take place. Repetition of the same arguments, endless reiteration of the same points do not tend to strengthen the arguments or to make the points clearer. On the contrary, they rather tend to dilute and weaken the force of the arguments, and to obscure the clearness of the points which have been raised. That is the practical view taken by hon. members of the House."

It will be observed that the limit named in the rules proposed by me is a very liberal one, much more liberal than it is in the United States and many of the countries that I have mentioned. The provision in reference to a three-quarters vote to restrict the time of any member except the leaders of both sides, amply guards the rights of the Opposition or the minority. In submitting these resolutions, I hope that no member in the House will take offence who may have made long speeches. I am one in that category, and the evil is not confined to one side. It has been a general evil. The remarks I have made cannot be considered invidious; I do not intend anything of the kind; but I think it is time, for our credit, for the good of the country and for the facilitating of business, that we should adopt some rule for the shortening of the speeches. I think any member who exceeds two hours is wasting his breath and his time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman has shown a great deal of industry, he has shown that he has worked very hard to find all those extracts from newspapers and books in order to sustain the resolutions he has submitted to the House. I am surprised, however, that the hon. gentleman should have given himself so much trouble to curtail the liberty of speech in this House. I did not expect it from that quarter. I thought the hon. gentleman would have been of opinion that the people who send us here require that their sentiments, their wishes, their petitions be not only put before the House, but argued, and argued at such length as to lay before the House the reasons for and against the motions submitted. I do not think that resolutions of this kind are calculated to reduce the length of speeches. The hon. gentleman knows full well by his own experience, he has been long enough in Parliament to know, that, if a member chooses to make a long speech of three, four, five, six or seven hours, he will always find the ways and means to make that speech. He knows that, if a member makes a speech of two hours in length, he may afterwards have a friend to move a motion in amendment, and then he continues his speech. It is only by moral suasion, by the position taken by the House as a whole, that these long speeches will be abandoned, when it is clear that the House does not want to hear them, and therefore I do not think that we should adopt resolutions of this kind. For example the first rule is this:

"The speech of the Finance Minister, the reply to the same, or the speech of a member moving a motion or resolution, shall not exceed two hours each, except by consent of the House obtained at the opening of the debate."

Well, how will the House know at the opening of the debate that a speech requires more than two hours? It is a matter that the House cannot decide before the opening of the debate, and it is only as the member proceeds, and if the matter is a very important one, and one in which the House takes a great interest, and if they see that the member has strong arguments to lay before the House, though the speech may be three or four hours in length, I have no doubt the House will not look at the clock to see how long he has been speaking, but will allow him to proceed. I think that it is not by rules of this kind that we can curtail long speeches. I suppose the hon. gentleman does not think for a moment that his resolutions will be affirmed by the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not if the Government oppose them.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. For my part I do not believe these resolutions should be adopted, although we might affirm the first one. By the first resolution we say that very long speeches are not palatable to the House. That the House wishes to get on with the business before it, Nevertheless, there would be exceptions, and I have no doubt that long speeches will be sometimes indulged in. If at any time a rule of that kind should be adopted, I do not think it should be during the present Session, but it might have been properly adopted during a previous Session when we had very long speeches. Nevertheless hon. gentlemen will observe that even under this rule we could not stop these long speeches if hon. members desired to make them. Under these circumstances, if the hon. gentleman does not withdraw his resolutions, I will move that the second and third resolutions be struck out.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I believe this is a move in the right direction. I think three years ago when a motion was before the House to abolish the Hansard altogether, I was one of those who voted for it; and as a matter of expediting business, I could almost wish that it were abolished. However, I do not see that such a thing is practicable. I need not tell the House that the acoustic properties of this Chamber are such that there are not probably a dozen men in the House who have the physical strength necessary to make themselves intelligible to the general membership of the House, and any idea that a member can form of the debate he can only get by reading over the Hansard next day. There are other reasons why I do not think it is advisable to abolish the Hansard altogether. Still, I think something might be done in this way in order to restrict debate within proper bounds. There is no reasonable doubt, I think, in the mind of any member of this House that the privilege is very often and very much abused—the privilege of making speeches of unlimited length just for the sake of reading them afterwards in the Hansard. I intended before I got up to tell the House a secret, however, it has been confessed, and that is, that there has not been a more flagrant offender in this respect than the hon. gentleman who has moved the resolutions. I suppose we ought to hail this as a good sign. It is always encouraging to see signs of reformation, and we have very high authority for asserting that:

“While the lamp holds on to burn
The greatest sinner may return.”

However, Mr. Speaker, I cannot support the resolutions in the form in which they now stand. If you look at them closely you will find that there is a wheel within a wheel. There is an inner circle that sits somewhere down on the front benches, that will be permitted to have unlimited time. They are going to get it in some way or another. After the debate goes on for five days, and all the long speeches have been delivered, then, what comes next? Why, the case amounts just to this: that if we understrapers can muster up courage enough to face the House, after it has been wearied out of all patience and determined to listen to nobody, we can have fifteen minutes to speak. For this reason I cannot support the resolutions which are now before the House. However, as I said before, any fair and just scheme for shortening the debates I shall most heartily support.

Mr. SPROULE. I think there has never been a more important motion before this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPROULE. Some hon. gentlemen seem to be very sensitive on this point. I do not think I have ever reached an hour in this House, consequently I am not a sinner. I say there has been no question before this House for a long time that I believe is so important as this one. It is cheering to know that the hon. member who introduced it has gone so far as to make an open confession: Confession is said to be good for the soul, and it is to be hoped that he will benefit largely by it. However, I noticed that the hon. gentleman, in introducing this question, took twenty-eight minutes to lay it before the House. He may think, of course, that it is an important one, and so no doubt it is. However, I must say that the experience of the last two Sessions in this House has gone a long way to prove the necessity of adopting some rule for curtailing the debates. But it is not consistent, I think, with human nature, to be bound by cast iron rules. A man's judgment ought to be sufficient to enable him to control his conduct in this direction, and to stop when he thinks the subject is exhausted. I was much pleased awhile ago to see the press taking it up. I think this rule would scarcely be necessary if the representatives of the press, from time to time, would take up the subject, as they have done this Session, and criticise it pretty thoroughly. I do not think it would be in harmony with our feelings to be bound by such rules, although, I think, we might go as far as to adopt the first resolution, but to follow it up by adopting the others, I think, would be decidedly wrong. However, I must say, should such principle be carried out, that it would be a great improvement in the debates of Parliament, that it would be more just to those parties who do not occupy much time in the House, if there were some rules introduced, or some understanding come to, that the speeches should be much shorter than they have been heretofore. I think you might pick out a dozen members of this House, and if you could only control them, you might leave it to the judgment of the others as to how long they should speak in debate.

Mr. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Minister of Public Works has told us the people require that their petitions and interests shall be fully and amply debated in this House. I have no intention in these propositions to limit what is full and ample debate. It is stated that the debates shall be legitimate and pertinent. The hon. gentleman also said that moral suasion is the instrument to be used. I stated when I introduced these rules that they were submitted more as embodying a suggestion than from any expectation that the rules would be adopted. They were submitted for the purpose of eliciting discussion on the subject and ascertaining the sense of the House. I am perfectly willing to leave the subject in its present shape, having elicited an expression of opinion that the feeling of hon. members tends strongly in the direction of a desire to economise time and shorten speeches. I must say that my hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) was rather severe upon me in saying that I am a sinner above all others in this respect, for I scarcely think I have spoken over two hours, except on two occasions. However, that is a matter of no consequence. As to the criticism in regard to fifteen minutes, the hon. member was also hardly fair, because the House will observe that the rights of members are guarded by requiring that three-fourths of the members shall vote a restriction to fifteen minutes, and it is hardly to be supposed that the Opposition will ever number less than one-quarter of the whole House. I am willing to accept the amendment offered by the Minister of Public Works. I did not expect the resolution would be carried except in a modified form, and if the Government wish to affirm the principle contained in the first paragraph, I am willing to have it affirmed.

Amendment agreed to, and motion, as amended, agreed to.

TRAVELLING EXPENSES OF THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

Mr. McCRAVEY moved for:

Return giving a complete statement, in detail, of travelling expenses of the Governor General, under Return 150, 1885; an itemized statement of each and every amount paid and charged, under the heading of travelling expenses, since Confederation; to whom paid and for what service; when such expenses were incurred; the nature and extent of the trip, upon which each item of expenditure was incurred: the number of persons comprising the Vice-Regal party, their names, occupations and nationality.

He said: I shall not occupy much of the time of the House on this occasion, but I shall make it my business when the items come up on the estimates to refer to such matters as are covered by this motion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount that is granted to the Governor General for his travelling expenses is, as appears in the Public Accounts, $5,000. The Governor General spends that money, with any additional money he chooses, in travelling through the country, and he has no return to make to Parliament of the amount that he receives for that purpose. He goes where he chooses; he takes with him such retinue as is agreeable to him; that retinue is composed of such persons as form his suite; their names, occupations and nationalities we know nothing about. Under the circumstances I think the hon. gentleman cannot expect his motion to be adopted; I hope he will not insist upon passing it, but will withdraw it.

Mr. McCRAANEY. In the Session of 1883, I took it upon myself to examine the Public Accounts in regard to those expenditures, and after working for about two weeks, I found I could make neither head nor tail of the expenditures. In 1884 I moved for a return covering those expenditures. It did not come down that Session; it came down during the session of 1885. After being here three months I discovered the return had been brought down—it had not been printed, and I could not for some time find it. That was an incomplete return. I asked on several occasions last Session to have the return completed, but it was not completed; and I now ask for a detailed statement of those expenditures. I find the hon. Minister refers to a grant of $5,000 for travelling expenses, and I may say that for seven years this expenditure amounted all told to $72,441. There are nine years in which there is no expenditure given, and what I want is that a return should be completed giving a detailed statement of that expenditure. I find that instead of $5,000 for this service, there are, in some instances, $15,000.

Mr. BLAKE. With reference to the statement of the Minister of Public Works as to the allowance, so-called, of $5,000, and the fact that for some years past that sum has been voted in bulk in the estimates for travelling expenses, I do not think it would be reasonable to invite the House to call upon the public official to whom it is voted in that way to give us an account of it. Other considerations would apply, of course, to special sums for travelling expenses, and on that question, as some hon. gentlemen will remember, we had some discussion seven or eight years ago. I am more disposed to look to the future than to the past in this matter, with this exception, that we should look to the past so far as the time when we ultimately settled the salary of the Governor General. I remember a debate that we had in this House in the earlier period of the Confederation, as to the salary of the Governor General when the House decided that the salary as fixed in the Confederation Act was excessive and it carried, so far as it could by passing an Act of Parliament, a decision fixing another salary. Upon the occasion upon which we were asked ultimately to agree to the salary fixed by the Confederation Act, the First Minister at that time, who is the First Minister to-day, made a declaration which I regarded as of great importance that in prior times the salary had in effect been eked out by various allowances to the Governor General. That various things had been done for him which in fact made the salary larger than the nominal salary which the people of old Canada had paid, and he made the declaration that under the new arrangement in which he invited the House to concur by which the salary would be £10,000 sterling, that system should have an end. I have only this to say without imputing any particular blame to one party than to another, I am not careful to apportion the blame—that I think the people of this country during the last many years have been paying in respect to Rideau Hall and allowances of various kinds, a sum not far from double the salary of the Governor General. I think the question of keeping up the establishment and paying salaries which are nearer $100,000 than $50,000—

Mr. McCRAANEY. Some years $120,000.

Mr. BLAKE. I have not scrutinised the matter closely, but I say it is entirely in opposition to the understanding upon which we originally granted the salary, and that it is time the whole thing was revised, and if we cannot procure the distinguished personages who are to be the executive heads of Canada to accept that office at a smaller salary than the aggregate of these sums we pay, we had better enlarge the salary rather than carry on a system which is, I think, unworthy of the House itself and unworthy of the country. I think we should give the Governor General such a salary as is adequate to the discharge of the duties of his high office, but I think the sum we have been paying for a long time is in excess of any reasonable requirements of that office. We should pay a fixed sum and cover everything, but the expenses we are now paying are, I think, entirely in excess of what the country should be asked to pay, and in excess of what the dignity and proper conduct of the office demand. I make no reference to the scale of expenses of the present incumbent, as distinguished from others, but I did not think that I would be doing my duty to my country without giving the House this frank exposition of my views on the subject of these expenditures.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McCRAANEY. I think it is necessary that I should, to some extent, explain how I came to make this motion. In 1884 I moved for a detailed statement of these expenditures, and after waiting for nearly two years an incomplete statement was brought down giving the bulk sums. I asked last Session on several occasions to have that return completed, but so far that has not been done. I may say that I approached this subject with considerable timidity. I know that some people think that it is a great crime to enquire into the sanctity of our vice-regal establishment here, but I wish to say that I give way to no man in my loyalty to our noble Queen or her representatives in this country. I have nothing to say against our representative the Governor General; I believe he is held in the highest esteem by every person in this House. I believe that the Governor General knows nothing about, or very little about, this expenditure. The hon. gentleman said that the sum of $5,000 was appropriated for travelling expenses. I find that in 1875 the sum expended for travelling expenses was $13,187.40; in 1876 the full sum was not expended; in 1877 the sum was $17,554.28; in 1878, $9,778.45; in 1879, the amount was $8,943.38. The next two years there appears to be no return given and in this respect the return is not complete. In 1882 the amount was $11,135.82; in 1882-83 the amount was $10,841.39; in 1883, $7,280.19; 1884, $9,463.97, and last year $6,951.21. Now, Sir, I need not read the names of the persons on whose account these amounts were paid, as I think, perhaps, it would not be well for me to do so, especially as any person can find them by referring to the Auditor-General's report or the Public Accounts. I think this House is entitled to such a return as I have asked for. My only object is that the people of this country may know how their money is being expended. I find that Rideau Hall in 1869 cost us $82,000; the Government had previously rented it for two years at $4,000 per annum; and nearly $37,000 additional was spent upon it for repairs; making the cost of Rideau Hall at that time, including the two years' rent, some $127,000. Now, looking at Rideau Hall at the present time, it would not, in my estimation, bring half the money, even from a man worth as much as Rothschild or Vanderbilt. I believe half the money spent on Rideau Hall has been thrown away. I find that we have spent on Rideau Hall, up to 1882-83, for additions, alterations, repairs and maintenance, $394,458.53. I have asked that that return be completed in detail. This expenditure has now probably reached $450,000. Since 1869 to 1882-83 we have spent for furniture, two years not included, making fourteen years, the sum of $85,369.96; and by the Public Accounts I see that the sum will be increased to over $100,000. I do not know where the furniture is. My impression is that $10,000 would purchase all the furniture there is at Rideau Hall at the present time; and the whole property, including all the furniture, is not, to-day, in my opinion, worth more than $50,000.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is now speaking to another motion which we have not yet reached. The hon. gentleman had better confine himself to each question separately.

Mr. McCRANEY. I am quite willing, if the hon. Minister will permit this motion to pass, to wait until the other motion comes up.

Mr. SPEAKER. You will have another opportunity when the other motion is called.

Motion negatived.

Mr. McCRANEY moved for

A Return, in detail, under the head of contingencies for Rideau Hall, since Confederation, a full complete itemised statement of all sums, classed under the head of contingencies in the Governor General's office; showing to whom each amount was paid, for what service or articles, giving the exact amount for each expenditure.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This motion, as well as the succeeding ones, are for a number of statements which have been published in the Public Accounts. By referring to the Public Accounts since Confederation, the hon. gentleman would have got the information he requires. The accountant of my Department informs me that all these statements the hon. gentleman wants in detail, to be compiled from the books of the Department, would cost over $2,082. But every item the hon. gentleman requires is in the Public Accounts for the nineteen years since Confederation; the only difficulty is that the different items are not put together. If the hon. gentleman wants information on any special item, let him say so, and that I shall be glad to give him; but to give him the whole of the information he asks for in these motions, I must say I cannot agree to it unless the House insists, because the expenditure required to obtain it would be a large and useless expenditure. Besides, the information could not be compiled in less than four or five months, because there is one book, and one officer alone could work upon it; and the other officers would have to wait. The accountant of my Department states:

"A statement showing the expenditure to the 30th of June, 1883, under the different headings mentioned in Mr. McCraney's application, was furnished to the House of Commons on the 15th of April, 1883."

So that all this information up to that time is before the House and country. Under these circumstances, I hope the House will not agree to this motion.

Mr. McCRANEY. The information which I got was not such as satisfied me. I spent two weeks in the Session of 1884, with perhaps as good an accountant as there is in this House, going over the Public Accounts trying to get at all this expenditure in detail, and I found that it was utterly impossible to do so; and I defy any hon. gentleman to get at all these items since Confederation from the Public Accounts. Now, I find that for contingencies during these sixteen years the sum of $199,652.84 has been expended. The hon. gentleman speaks of $2,000 being expended for this return. That is certainly a large sum, but it is a small one compared with the $50,000 per annum, which, I believe, is expended on Rideau Hall beyond what is necessary. I find only last year, in the contingencies are the items of three rented pianos, and three new ones purchased at $2,900; that is supplying plenty of music certainly to Rideau Hall. I shall not occupy the time of the House more over this motion, but I think this House is entitled to know why it is necessary to spend so much money on Rideau Hall. I have no doubt the contingencies amount to $230,000 or $235,000.

Mr. PAINT. I hold that we cannot treat the Governor General and his retinue too well. The high position this country holds at present in the Mother Country is owing to the respect we show the representative of the Queen. The employment of instituting an enquiry as regards the expenditure of pin money is not an ennobling occupation.

Mr. McCRANEY.

This matter has already occupied the attention of the House several Sessions. No satisfactory progress has been made, and I think the more it is left alone, the better we will get on as regards our standing in the Old Country. We shall probably have to go to that market for fifty years to come for our loans, and we certainly should not belittle ourselves in the estimation of the finance world by carping at the expenses of the Governor General.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). After the explanation given by the hon. gentleman who leads the House, I must say, before a vote is taken, that I do not feel at liberty to vote against the Government on this occasion, but I do not wish my vote to be taken as expressing myself entirely satisfied with this large expenditure. I say this in justification of the vote which I will give, on account of the explanations made by the leader of the House as to the expense connected with bringing down the returns asked for, and also as to the fact that in the Public Accounts we will find the information sought for in this motion. But I do not want my vote to be understood as expressing my opinion, because I believe a too large expenditure has been made at Rideau Hall.

Mr. McCALLUM. No doubt the hon. gentleman had good grounds for bringing up this question, for the expenditure of Rideau Hall has increased largely since Confederation. I do not say it is the fault of one Government more than another, but I think it is about time we should call "halt" and if the motion which the hon. gentleman has put on the paper will have that effect he ought to be satisfied. As far as getting the returns are concerned, they say it will cost a great deal of money, and as I understand we have spent the money there is no use crying over it, but let us try and do better in the future.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I feel in the same position as does the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) who has just spoken. I do not wish my vote to be recorded as an expression of my opinion that the expenditures alluded to are justifiable. It is in the discretion of the Government to bring down these details, and I understood the leader of the Opposition expressed himself also as satisfied with the view that the items of travelling expenses should not be brought down, but no doubt a very large expenditure has been made in connection with Rideau Hall, about which the people of this country would be very glad to be informed. We are met continually with petitions for work from laboring men, sometimes for work on the canal or railway or other public works, and we have sometimes insufficient work to give them, and men, at times, who have been in Government employ for a long time, are perhaps discharged because the Government cannot find work for them. While this Government is not more blameable, perhaps, than others in this matter, yet the expenses have grown to grand proportions, and as the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. McCallum) has said, it is time we should cry "halt." These items of expense are beyond all conception of what should be required to keep up Government House. It is said $120,000 has been expended in a year, and that is, I believe, quite within bounds. We find "Rideau Hall, sundry accounts," at Bank of Montreal, charged with $18,000 to $20,000 a year, and in the years 1883, 1884, 1885, I find in the neighborhood of $60,000 charged to this account. I find one item of crockery amounting to $4,000, for which there was no tender, and I find that the same man, a Mr. C. S. Shaw, of Ottawa, who sold it claims nearly as much again for crockery alone. Fuel and light cost $8,000 each year for the years 1883, 1884, 1885, making $24,000. Everybody knows that the fuel and light for Rideau Hall never cost $24,000 in three years; the amount is simply preposterous. Shovelling snow last year cost $495. A couple of men would not shovel snow to that amount in six months, I am sure, and I believe that a couple of men would shovel all the snow wanted to be shovelled at Rideau Hall. While we do not wish to be mean and little in this matter, yet the expenditure has grown in undue proportions, and when we cannot keep our own men at public works it is about time we should see how Government House is being run. The Governor General is not to blame, but half-a-dozen dudes residing at present in the city of Ottawa who run the whole thing, are the parties principally responsible. I think the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McCraney) should not be only satisfied, but should receive the thanks of the whole House for bringing up this matter.

Mr. LISTER. Although this matter has been discussed at some length, I do not think it has been longer than its importance warrants. I agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Woodworth) that the Governor General is not blameable for this enormous expenditure, nor do I charge the Government with being directly blameable for it, but I agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Woodworth) also, in saying that there are a number of men about Rideau Hall who are perpetrating an enormous job, and the Governor General and the Government have to bear all the odium. The Government should take some steps by which this enormous expenditure should be brought under control. It is absurd that whatever money they think fit to expend, whatever liabilities they think proper to incur, their demands should be honored without question. It is different in the United States. At Washington, I believe these matters are under control. At all events, the hon. gentleman who brought forward the motion is entitled to the thanks of the country. It has been talked of in the country; it has been written about in the papers, and it is time that we, as the representatives of the people, should take some action in the matter. I think the time has come when it becomes the imperative duty of the Government to take such measures as to bring this matter under control. It seems anomalous that a small country like ours, with a population under five millions of people, should be spending nearly $130,000 a year to keep up the Government House, while in the adjoining republic, with a population of nearly 60,000,000, the chief magistrate receives a salary of only $50,000. If the expenditure is compared, I think it will be found that it is costing us more for our Governor General than the United States pay for their president. This is a matter which exists not only as far as the Dominion is concerned, but in all the Provinces down to the very smallest, where the Lieutenant-Governors are receiving salaries ten times greater than are paid to the Governors of States which have populations ranging up to 5,000,000. This expenditure has become almost, I might say, a scandal in this country, and I believe the time has come when it is the imperative duty of the Government to take some step to curtail this enormous expenditure.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am very glad to find the feeling on both sides of the House is in favor of curtailing the expenses at Rideau Hall. I was rather surprised to find the Minister of Public Works replying to my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. McCraney) that it would take the time of two clerks four months to bring down this return, and that it would cost $2,000. I cannot understand how it is necessary to pay two clerks to do this work $2,000 or $3,000 a year each. Further, the Minister said that, if the hon. gentleman would refer to the Public Accounts, since Confederation, he would be able to pick out the items himself. I do not think it is very courteous of the hon. gentleman to make any member of Parliament a reply of that kind. The hon. member for Halton has a perfect right to bring the motion before the House, and has a right to have the return brought down, and I do not think it is courteous to tell the hon. gentleman to hunt up the Public Accounts since Confederation. I think he ought to be able to give some other excuse than a reply of that kind. This question is one which requires attention from members of this House, and, if it does not receive that attention from them, I am sure the people of the country will give it their attention, and, when they understand that a very large amount of the people's money is being expended in connection with this Rideau Hall business, they will demand from whoever is on the Treasury benches a curtailment of the expenses. This thing has gone on too far. I do not know to what extent the expenses ran up during the reign of the Reform party; I have no means of knowing; but, if it was bad then, that is no excuse for its being bad now; and in any case it is time to put a stop to it, and I hope hon. gentlemen will take this matter into their serious consideration. I find that, in the contingent expenses of Government throughout we are expending an enormous amount. Last year we expended $22,159.86 over the appropriation for contingencies in connection with the different departments and Government House. It is time this thing was put a stop to, and I hope the people will insist upon their representatives, no matter who is in power, urging that this shall be put a stop to, and that the people's money shall not be frittered away in the manner it is.

Motion negatived.

Mr. McCRANEY moved for:

Detailed statement, since Confederation, of the Governor General's salary and staff; to whom were salaries paid in Governor General's office, in each year, with names; the amounts paid to each; the occupation of such persons before entering said office, nationality and age.

He said: I find that, in sixteen years, the expenditure on this head has been $945,340.10, averaging about $60,000 per annum.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is one of the motions I spoke about just now, and I am very sorry that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) was offended at my referring the hon. gentleman who moved it to the Public Accounts. Really, I do not see to what book I should refer him if not to the Public Accounts, and it is the first time that I have found an hon. gentleman offended at a Minister referring a member to the Public Accounts. I did not intend to offend the hon. gentleman, and the mover did not seem to be offended. However, I am obliged again to refer him to the Public Accounts for this. He will find there, and we will all find there—so it refers to nobody in particular, because we are all in the same position—what are the salaries of the Governor General, of his aides-de-camp, and of the other members of his staff; he will find there the names of those to whom the salaries were paid, the amounts paid, and so on. The only information which, perhaps, he may not find there will be what was the occupation before entering office, the nationality and the age of those employed. If the hon. gentleman was making a special motion for this, no doubt it would be granted, but I think the motion as it is should not be granted. This seems to be the same debate, but I suppose the Speaker would consider it a separate debate for each resolution, so I will not allude to what has been said as to the amount for fuel and light or for the shovelling of snow, and so on. I will answer that when the motion comes up, but I hope the hon. gentleman will not insist on his motion; otherwise I shall have to vote against it.

Motion negatived.

Mr. McCRANEY. I do not desire to press these motions further, but I think that, as the matter has now come before the House, it is well that we should understand the question once for all, and therefore I think it my duty to go on. I move for:

Return since Confederation for fuel and light for Rideau Hall, the exact amount paid for in each year, to whom paid, the quantity and grade of fuel purchased, the price per cord of wood or ton of coal; and also the amounts paid for light in each year, to whom paid, the price per article, together with the quantities.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It would be impossible for the Government to give the information asked for by the hon. gentleman, for this reason: Parliament votes every year $8,000 for fuel and light for Rideau Hall, and the amount is paid quarterly to the Governor General, and with that he furnishes his fuel and light. Of course we know nothing about the quantity and quality of the fuel; that is his own business, therefore we cannot furnish the information asked for. I may say that this amount is voted every year, with the consent of the House, and it was stated some years ago that it was sufficient to cover all expenses for light and fuel.

Mr. McCRANEY. If this Parliament feels that it is bound to vote a sum for the fuel and light for Rideau Hall, I see no reason why we should not vote a sum for the maintenance, the food and drink as well, of the Governor General's staff. I find that in 1878, $10,211.10 was paid for fuel and light for Rideau Hall; in 1879, $7,723.06; in 1880, $9,014.44; in 1881, $9,312.10; 1882, $8,200; 1883, $3,200. Now, Sir, I have only this remark to make in addition to what I have already said. I know something about coal myself, and I have no hesitation in saying that there is enough expended for fuel and light for Rideau Hall to supply 1,000 inhabitants. There are plenty of towns with only 1,000 inhabitants that would not expend more than that sum annually.

Motion negatived.

Mr. McCRANEY moved for:

A detailed statement of gardening and grounds for Rideau Hall, since Confederation, to whom has money been paid for care of grounds or for gardening, rate per day and the class of work done for such wages; also what permanent improvements and value, if any, are included under the head of gardening and grounds.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I stated just now that these five motions would cost, to prepare the returns, over $2,000. So far as the Government is concerned we have no objections to give the statements required by these motions, and it is for the House to say whether we shall do so. These works are all under the control of the Government, and have been ordered by the Government, and not only by this Government but by the previous one; and although these statements are in the Public Accounts, if the House thinks that they must be brought together into a special statement, whether it takes five months to prepare the statement, or whether it costs $1,500 or $2,000, it is a question for the House to decide. So far as the Government is concerned, we do not object. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is left entirely to the House to say whether they want these statements or not.

Mr. McCRANEY. In reply to the hon. gentleman I wish to say that I find that since 1868 there has been $52,616.16 expended on the gardens and grounds of Rideau Hall. All I have to say is that I would like very much to know where that money has been expended.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman has got the figures so fully that I do not see why every other hon. gentleman cannot get them for himself as well. In the Auditor General's report you will find page after page of the details of these expenditures. It is for the House, I think, to say whether it is proper to continue this expenditure. The Minister has already said that the Government have no desire to cover up this expenditure in any way, and as it is going to involve an expenditure of $1,000 or $2,000 to get this information in one return, I think it would be much better for those gentlemen who are interested to do as my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. McCraney) has done, and get it for themselves. I think he has got that information very carefully, and has evidently given a good deal of attention to this matter. I have looked through the Auditor General's report, and I find there is a very full statement of all the expenditures in the Governor-General's house. I think we may carefully take into consideration the propriety of continuing to keep these expensive grounds, and whether it is a wise thing to do all this work, or whether it would not be wiser to have a larger and better and more respectable looking place for the Governor, whoever he may be, than to have such a rambling place at such an enormous cost to the country. That question might be fairly discussed by the House, but the fact is, we have made that investment, the place has got to be kept respectable, not only for the sake of the vice-regal party in that House, but for the sake of the country. As it is it is nothing very creditable for a great Dominion like this. I have no hesitation in saying that I think the place is unworthy of the occupants, and I think it is unworthy of the country. Our expenditure in that direction might be fairly considered on the whole with regard to having something respectable and substantial for the price. The hon. gentleman stated that the whole property would not sell for $50,000, including furniture. Well, I do not quite agree with him in that. Let the hon. gentleman compare that expenditure with the expenditure of other public institutions in the country, for instance, with the Agricultural College of Ontario, which costs about $334,000 carried to capital account. I presume that property would not sell for anything like the money invested in it by the Province of Ontario, but it has answered its purpose in the past. But it is a question whether it is wise to continue that expense for the future. It is a very expensive property, and we must either let it go to rack and ruin or incur some expense in order to make it respectable looking for the country. I do not wish to be one to oppose the granting of such motions as this. I think it is very proper to ask for returns; but where the Public Accounts are so full, fair and explicit in regard to expenditure connected with this matter, is it unnecessary to ask the Government to expend $1,000 or $1,500 in order to submit detailed information which hon. members have under their hands? As hon. members are aware, they can obtain from the Public Accounts all the information required.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I really think the House should obtain this return. The Minister does not appear to refuse it, and there was no necessity for the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) to come to the relief of the Government. No one charged the Government with keeping anything back. A large sum is expended annually on the garden and grounds at Rideau Hall. One has some curiosity to know exactly what the correct amount expended is. When you find that $4,000, $5,000 or $6,000 are spent in a single year for gardening one is startled at the amount. The hon. gentleman says, you will find it all in the Public Accounts. You can do so if you spend a year in searching them, but I think it would take very nearly that time to find the particulars. They are not in one part but scattered all through, and it is almost impossible to find them. It is strikingly like the task of looking for a needle in a haystack to find anything in the Public Accounts. It would be desirable, and I should like to obtain it, to have this information in a concise form, so that we can understand what the cost of Rideau Hall each year has been. I am amazed at the amount. I have been unable to ascertain what has been spent on that old barrack building, but we know that year after year for repairs and maintenance a sum has been expended that is certainly amazing. I think the Government, in their own interest, should have the accounts brought down setting forth what the grounds and gardens cost and so forth, so that the public may be able to learn what sum is annually expended. The Government, in their own interest, I repeat, should have this statement brought down.

Mr. BOWELL. It is quite clear that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McCraney), asks a great deal more than what has been referred to by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron). Under this order, if it were adopted, the Government would have to bring down the name of every laborer who has been employed for a single day each year since Confederation. I understand that the Minister of Public Works has no possible objection to giving, if members of the House could not obtain it from the Public Accounts, the amount paid as a whole for gardening and for the other purposes indicated. The Government would also have to enquire into the cost of sewerage, lighting, cutting wood, hauling coal, digging drains, cleaning certain places that are necessary to be cleaned; raking and cutting grass, and so on. The motion also refers to permanent improvements. I suppose, under its head, will be included all improvements made; the walks that have been built, whatever little fencing may have been done, and so on. The hon. gentleman will thus observe that he proposes to impose on the Department an immense amount of details. Probably he does not desire that a large sum should be expended in obtaining such minute details, and the Minister of Public Works has stated that he will not object to a statement such as I have indicated.

Mr. McCRANEY. I am willing to amend the motion so as to limit it to the last five years.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). If the Minister will consent, the Government might furnish us with information for each year, not in detail, for I quite agree that it would be absurd to bring down statements of laborers' wages for every day, but so as to give the heads of each year's expenditure.

Mr. BOWELL. I think the proposition of the hon. member for Halton is not a fair one, as I hold in my hand a statement showing that the expenditure of the late Government in one year was over $82,000 over and above the Governor General's salary.

Motion negatived.

Mr. McCRANEY moved for;

Statement, in detail, of additions, alterations, repairs and maintenance of Rideau Hall; showing by whom were additions, alterations and repairs ordered, by whom done, and at what cost for each item, since Confederation.

He said: This is a department where I feel that the expense has been enormous, and, in fact, I do not see where the amount of money has been spent. I find that up to 1882-83 there had been expended for additions, repairs and maintenance on Rideau Hall $394,458.53. I should like to ask the member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) how that compares with the Agricultural College of our Province. For the last three years there have been additional repairs to the value of in 1883, $31,222.86; 1884, $31,296.45; 1885, $35,507.94, making altogether for additions, repairs and maintenance at Rideau Hall very nearly half a million. I think that is outrageous.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman asks my opinion as to the Agricultural College. I did not make a comparison with a view of saying that that was not justified in the interest of the Province. I quite approve of the expenditure there; but I mentioned it as a contrast and showing that neither of those amounts properly represented the expenditures, yet the country might have had advantage. It is desirable to ascertain the cost to the Government of the present grounds and buildings. It is worth considering the propriety of continuing a building like the present Government House that is so expensive to maintain and is not up to the character of a property that should be provided for the Governor General. We can point to our Parliamentary buildings and public buildings with pride; in fact we can point in every other direction except to the building at Rideau Hall. I think that is one of the most costly expenditures we have, and I say it is well worth considering whether the Government should go further in the way of expending large amounts of public money on that property.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have the same objections to this motion that I had to the others; and, indeed, the hon. gentleman goes further than he did in the others, for he asks to have the names of those by whom each piece of work was done; we are to give the name of every man who worked there—every laborer, every mechanic, every clerk of works. He asks also the cost of each item, and it is simply impossible to give that. We do not keep an account of each item of the repairs, additions, alterations and maintenance of Rideau Hall. The hon. gentleman must see that the cost of obtaining such a return—even if it were possible to give all the names of the men who have been employed since 1867—would be very great. I really think that this motion should follow the others.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Surely it is not intended that the name of every laborer is to be given. If I understand it aright, it is the name of the contractors—

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The motion says: "by whom done."

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I suppose the repairs were done by contract or tender in a great many cases, and if so, there can be very little difficulty or expense in providing the information called for. May I ask the Minister if a return of this kind was not brought down in 1883. If my recollection serves me aright, such a return was brought down, in that year, and if so, all that will be required will be to add the expenses for 1883-84-85, and that cannot entail much expense. It is simply evading the point to suppose that it is intended to ask the name of every laborer in the case of work that is done by contract. In such cases what is required is the name of the contractors, the amount of work done, the amount to be expended, and the amount actually paid. It is a matter of some consequence that we should get this information, so that we may have some idea of what the hall costs. At present we have a very vague idea of it, and I venture to say that we have expended enough on repairs for the last four or five years to have built a palace for our Governor General, though what amount has been actually expended in these repairs of one kind or another the Lord only knows, for nobody can tell by the accounts or by the blue-books. That considerably over half a million has been expended in that way, I think is quite manifest. I believe this House and the country desire to have this information, and the expenditure of even a few hundred dollars would be a mere bagatelle in order to obtain it. I do not attach blame to the Government, but at the same time these expenses have assumed gigantic proportions and I think it is desirable that we should know how much has been spent and in what way it has been spent on these old barracks, which have cost the country over a million dollars.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand that we have spent over $1,250,000 on the maintenance and repairs to Rideau Hall since Confederation, and yet we are told that the people of this country who supplied the money are not to be allowed to know how it has been expended. This Government have become so economical that they will not allow the cost of the clerks' getting this information ready; this Government which in 1884 voted away $80,000,000 of public money, which voted $1,000,000 for every day the House sat; a Government which last year inaugurated a system of expenditure wholly unnecessary, at an enormous cost to the country, has suddenly become so economical that it will not supply the information which will show how the people's money has been expended. I think the return asked for is in substance a perfectly proper one. It is quite in the power of the Minister to amend it, if he desires, so as to eliminate its objectionable features and especially such portions as could not be complied with. I think, however, the Minister travelled unnecessarily wide of the motion when he endeavored to point out what the cost of getting the information in his opinion would amount to, though it will not I believe amount to that sum in fact. I entirely agree with my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron) that it is not necessary, if this motion is complied with, that the name of every workman should be given in many cases. Are we to understand that $1,250,000 have been expended on Rideau Hall in this way, and not a dollar of that sum was expended under contract? Is that the way the public money has been spent since Confederation? I remember, a few years ago, in the Public Accounts Committee, it was brought to the knowledge of the Committee that there were employed by the Government here in connection with the public buildings, in Ottawa, nearly 150 men all the year round, and I believe that the wages they were paid amounted to over $60,000 for the year 1882 or 1883. Has this work been done, and this money expended in that way? I may also remind the Minister of Public Works that the Public Accounts Committee, established in 1881, that this Government paid on the average $1.87½ a day for every unskilled laborer employed by them around Ottawa in 1882, and probably this is the explanation to some extent of the reluctance of the Minister in supplying information to which I think the country is entitled.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman was probably not in his place when I explained, whilst the other motion was under consideration, that we have no objection personally as a Government to lay all these details before the House, were it at all possible to do so. We stated it was our duty to see what these motions, if carried, would cost, and how long it would take to obtain the information. The hon. gentleman says that in this case we would not require to give the names of the workmen, but if hon. gentlemen opposite want simply a statement of the cost of additions, alterations, repairs and maintenance of Rideau Hall since Confederation, then the motion should appear in that form, and then the information can be supplied and in much shorter time. If hon. gentlemen will be satisfied with that, then, of course, the motion may be amended accordingly.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). You could give us the names of the contractors when the work was done by contract.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We may give the names of contractors when there are contractors, but of course a portion of the work must be done by the workmen of the Department.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman wish to amend this motion?

Mr. McCRAVEY. No.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose there can be no objection that there should be a division stating whether the expenses was on plumbing, alteration or extension of the building, and so on. The hon. gentleman, I understand, wants something more than the mere gross amount; he wants to have some idea of the class of work—not the name of every laborer, but such a statement as would give the public a general understanding of the details of the expenses and the class of work.

Mr. BOWELL. I notice that a motion of a similar character to this House was made during the time the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was leading the

Mr. MULOCK.

Government. I will read to the House the remarks made by the Premier of that day on this question. Mr. Mitchell moved for a return in detail of the expense incurred in reference to the trip of the Governor General to British Columbia, and also to Manitoba and the North-West.

Mr. DAVIES. That is a very different thing altogether.

Mr. BOWELL. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will let me get through. I know he is a little impetuous when his record is being exposed; but the remarks made by the then Premier, I have no doubt the hon. gentleman, who is a little fidgety now, will admit, meet the case very well:

"I must object to the motion. I think there are sufficient details given in the Public Accounts, unless, indeed, the hon. member takes upon himself to assume that, as a matter of course, these accounts have been made out unfaithfully, and that His Excellency and those immediately attending him here have deliberately falsified the Public Accounts. I think it is disrespectful to His Excellency to make it. It is the first time I have ever known such a motion to be made, and I think it is an ill-return for the services of His Excellency during the period he has represented this country. The motion appears as though the hon. member would imply something wrong on the part of the Governor General, and is, in its very essence, almost an insult to the very person to whom we are so greatly indebted. If the hon. member for Northumberland does not withdraw his motion I must ask hon. gentlemen to vote it down."

After a debate had taken place, the late member for Chateaugay, the Hon. Mr. Holton, moved the following amendment:

"That an Order of the House do issue showing the expenses of the trip of His Excellency the Governor General to Manitoba, similar to that contained in the Public Accounts with respect to His Excellency's trip to British Columbia."

The House agreed to that. Now, that is precisely the proposition made by the present leader of the House when he spoke to the first motion, that a return embodying the information in the Public Accounts could be laid before the House were it considered necessary to give it. I think the remarks of the then leader of the Government apply with equal force to the motions made to-night, though perhaps not to the motion immediately under consideration. The motion at that time referred to one particular item of expenditure, and that item included not only the one now under discussion, but also items similar to these. That motion was objected to by the late Government, and I think a large proportion of those gentlemen who have taken part in this debate supported the Government in the position they took. I am quite aware the hon. gentleman about to reply was not here, and therefore he does not consider himself responsible, and can assume another rôle.

Mr. DAVIES. I cannot think the hon. Minister of Customs does not appreciate the distinction between the motion made in 1878 and the motion now before the House. The motion in 1878 called for details of certain personal expenditures of the Governor General on a trip, which I may say was an official trip in the interest of the country at large; and I think the answer of the leader of the Government was a very appropriate answer under the circumstances. But here we have the leader of the House declaring that the expenditure of which the items are asked is an expenditure directly under the control of the Government of the day, for which the Government are directly responsible; and I think, after the discussion which has taken place to-night, and the statements which have been made on both sides of the House, that the Government are very ill-advised in refusing to bring that information down. There are many in the country who will imagine, if this is refused, that there is something wrong in the Public Accounts. I do not think anyone in this House, and I hope no one outside of the House will think that His Excellency is responsible in any way for that expenditure. It is not an expenditure which His Excellency is responsible for. It is one in regard to which it is charged with some degree of fairness that there are understrappers who take advantage of the expenditure on Rideau Hall itself and its surroundings, that the Government submit to be muled, and that great extravagance takes place, for which the Governor General and his immediate officials are not directly responsible, but for which the Government is responsible. I think, therefore, that the motion the hon. gentleman has made cannot be answered fairly by saying that it will involve some little time and expense to get it up. It is absurd to say that the name of every workman who has been paid anything is to be brought down. That is not the spirit of the motion; the spirit of the motion has been correctly stated by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) and the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), as calling for substantially the names of those to whom the money has been paid. We hear it stated inside and outside of the House that men are unnecessarily employed, particularly at election times, not only in connection with Rideau Hall grounds, but in connection with the grounds surrounding this building. I presume the Minister of Customs remembers that the subject of the expenditure about these grounds came up before the Public Accounts Committee; and while it was generally acknowledged that unbounded extravagance prevailed, the answer was that equal extravagance had prevailed in previous years. That is no answer; and the country will not accept it as an answer. The hon. gentleman has stated that it would not be necessary to bring down some of these returns asked for, and the motions for them were not carried; but here is an item asked for, and the next succeeding item which I think the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McCraney) might be advised to press for, and I hope he will press for them, and that the House will grant them. I think the country will not be satisfied if we vote this motion down.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. Will the hon. gentleman say what amount was expended on the grounds in Ottawa?

Mr. DAVLES. I am not prepared at present to state it, but I remember distinctly that it was an enormous sum of money, and the members on both sides stood aghast at it.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I am aware that the subject came before the Public Accounts Committee. It was stated in the newspapers of the opposite party that some $67,000 was expended on repairs to the grounds, and reiterated in that committee; and when the investigation took place, it was established that that amount covered the whole expenditure for looking after these buildings, Rideau Hall, and various other interests the Government had to look after.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I was there and heard that. My hon. friend appears also to be laboring under the idea that Rideau Hall is in the city of Ottawa. I can inform him that his geography is gone astray, for it is in the constituency of the hon. member for Russell, and, therefore, if my hon. friend thinks that, in order to secure my seat, I have to rely on those little political exigencies which were practised in the time the Reform party upheld the standard of purity, he is mistaken. That expenditure takes place altogether in the county of Russell, and has nothing to do with Ottawa.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I move:

That all the words after "ordered" be struck out, and the following inserted instead: With the names of the contractors when the work was done by contract.

The only object I have is to avoid the mass of details which is asked for in the motion as it stands. There is no possible objection to giving the return, except that I think the House may well consider whether it is desirable to move for papers dating back to Confederation. We have every year brought down the Public Accounts and the Auditor-General's report, giving greater details than the Public Accounts. We have a Public Accounts Committee appointed by this House, and which sits periodically during the Session; this committee is charged with the investigation of all these items, and where there is not sufficiency of detail, it has power to summon the officers and get the information necessary, on which to form a judgment and report, if required. Under that system, these accounts are, year by year, investigated, and it seems to me that the proposal, at a time like this, to go back nineteen years, and obtain details in relation to which, presumably at least, an investigation has taken place, or, if not, should have taken place, if there was anything in the accounts which indicated improper expenditure or misappropriation of public money, cannot lead to any useful result. In the early part of the Session, a question came up as to the expenditure in connection with long returns such as those now called for, and the principle was laid down by the leader of the Opposition that the Government were responsible for the expenditure in connection with the returns if the Government consented to the motions, and we could not throw the exclusive responsibility upon the members of the Opposition generally. But here is a proposal that we shall have brought down for nineteen years back, details—some of which may be exceedingly elaborate—which could not, in the very nature of things, come down this Session, as they involve a labor too great to be finished in time. I think no good purpose that any one can possibly see, can be served by bringing down these papers, for this reason, that we have already in the aggregate the expenditure for each year, and they form the basis for any reasonable discussion as to the policy pursued with reference to Rideau Hall. It ought in fairness to be stated, with regard to this large expenditure in excess of the salary of the Governor General, that a good portion of it has relation to the Governor General's Office, the expenditure of which, like that of any other Department, is open to investigation by the Public Accounts Committee, and a good portion of it is in relation to travelling expenses. These expenses may be high in the estimation of some hon. gentlemen, but I am quite certain they will admit that the Governor General, the representative of Her Majesty, travelling, not altogether for his own pleasure, but in the performance of a public duty, making himself familiar in all parts of the country, coming in contact with the people in all parts of the country, and in that way performing a very important public duty, the advantage of which is found in the fact that we have in the former Governors General very warm friends of Canada, who are familiar with every part of it, and are able, in the Old World, to discuss Canadian questions and represent Canadian interests in a manner which shows the great advantage to Canada resulting from their enquiries—I say hon. gentlemen will admit that the travelling expenses must not be on a parsimonious scale. We do not desire that the Governor should travel singly; he must travel in some degree of state. He cannot help it, and it is simply unfair to His Excellency and to ourselves, as gentlemen, to say nothing of our characters as public men, that we should endeavor to excite public feeling outside with reference to the manner and state in which the Governor General travels. Then there is the maintenance of Rideau Hall. I have no hesitation in expressing my conviction, that at the outset, the purchase of Rideau Hall was a mistake. We purchased it at a time when our expenses made it desirable that it should cost as little as possible. The building was too remote from the centre of business, from the public offices here, and in the next place it was too small altogether for the residence of the Governor General. Therefore, additions had to be made, and the result followed, which every gentleman knows would follow in his own case, if he undertook to add to his house year after year; he would get a miserable rattletrap requiring in the end an expenditure far greater than what would be required if he had pulled down the building and put up a new one in its place. The policy of additions was adopted, however, and followed by both parties. Hon. gentlemen opposite found it necessary to make great additions, and I have not a word to say against their policy, but the additions have been going on requiring heavy outlay. Then there are the grounds around Rideau Hall which must be also kept in proper order. An hon. gentleman referred to what happened already in the Public Accounts Committee. I believe, Mr. Speaker, it is not in order to refer to what goes on in any Committee, because we have no record here to apply to, to sustain any recollections we may have in regard to the past. But there is no doubt whatever that when the particular item of $68,000 which appeared in the Auditor's General's report for labor connected with the grounds of Parliament, was referred to, and the Auditor General and other officers were examined before the Committee, it was found that $6,000 or $7,000 of the expense was in connection with the grounds, and over $60,000 in connection with repairs of the Parliament and departmental buildings, and the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), who was a member of the Public Accounts Committee, and, as we all know, thoroughly familiar with our public works, declared his conviction, after having heard the evidence of the officers brought before the Committee, that the expenditure was not too high, and he used the very strong expression that the system of architecture adopted here was an invention of the devil to give work to mechanics and laboring people in keeping the buildings in order. That was the expression my hon. friend used, and, with the frankness which always characterised him in the Committee of Public Accounts, he would not say the expenses were too high. But all these expenses have been going on, and it does seem exceedingly unreasonable and not likely to result in any practical advantage, to order these returns. However, if the hon. gentleman still desires them, he has the word of the Minister of Public Works, who is chiefly responsible for this expenditure, that there is no objection to bringing down the returns for which the Government especially may be held to be responsible. I think, however, after the statement of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), in which I think he concurred that all these expense of details asked for are unnecessary, and, with the amendment I have suggested, the motion might fairly pass without division at all.

Mr. GILLMOR. I do not think it is the desire of any hon. gentleman on this side of the House to criticise the Governor General. I do not believe that is the object or intention of this discussion. But I am impressed with the idea that we are not going to get the information we want. There is an impression that the gentlemen on the Treasury benches have an opportunity of making themselves very popular with the workingmen in this locality by means of this large expenditure. There is no doubt about that. Last summer, during the long Session, I saw an old gentleman of about seventy or eighty years old in the summer house, who was appointed to look after that building, of course at a salary. I talked with him, and I found that he was a voter here. This is the sort of information we wish to get at. I know that these hon. gentlemen are very popular with the workingmen. There was a meeting here the other night, and they seem to have the faculty of getting the goodwill of the workingmen. I remember a few years ago that the workingmen in Ottawa were in great distress, and we found them in the Parliament Buildings trying to get employment. I am satisfied that a great number of workingmen are being employed here extravagantly at the public expense, and I am satisfied that these large sums of money have not been expended in the interest of the public. I do not wish to be niggardly, and I do not wish anything that is necessary to be done to be neglected, but, when so much of the people's money is expended in this way, the Government ought to be anxious to show the people that the money is fairly and not extravagantly expended. I know this is a delicate matter here, but it is not so delicate when we get home to talk to the people. I believe that this information should be furnished. I do not think the Government can be expected to go into some of the details which are asked, but they should give sufficient information to show that this money is not extravagantly used. It is surprising, it is monstrous, to think that $300,000 or $400,000 or $500,000 has been expended upon Rideau Hall and the grounds surrounding it. I cannot see anything like it there. I cannot conceive where it can have been expended. I hope, if the information cannot be furnished, this discussion will at least caution the gentlemen who are the guardians of the public purse to withhold this expenditure to a certain extent. We cannot compare the expenditure on these grounds when they were being taken out of their natural state with the expenditure after they were complete; and when are the grounds about Rideau Hall to be complete? They have been nineteen years approaching completion, and when is it to end? It occurs to me, and it is not a very extravagant idea, that the Government are employing rather too many workingmen around the grounds of the public buildings and the grounds around Rideau Hall.

Mr. McCRANEY. Before the motion is put, I wish to say that, sooner than accept the amendment, I would prefer to withdraw the motion if the House will permit me.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I do not see what object the hon. gentleman has in moving this amendment, or what information is to be given to the House by it.

Mr. WHITE (Caldwell). We give the hon. gentlemen all the information asked for.

Mr. MILLS. That is beside the question.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). We give the hon. gentleman this information:

"A statement in detail of additions, alterations, repairs and maintenance of Rideau Hall; showing by whom were additions, alterations and repairs ordered, with the names of the contractors where the work was done by contract."

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to enquire of the Minister of Public Works what was the original cost of Rideau Hall?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have a good memory, but I cannot give that to the hon. gentleman. If the hon. gentleman had asked me at the beginning of the sitting, I would have had the information by this time.

Mr. McCRANEY. I can supply the hon. gentleman with the information. Rideau Hall cost $82,000 in the first place.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I find in the report of the Minister of Public Works for last year an amount of $31,193.76 for repairs, and I find the total expenditure given by the Minister of Public Works as being $236,785.48 for construction, and $512,041.96 for repairs. The repairs have exceeded the construction by about 250 per cent. It would have been much cheaper had the Government purchased a site and constructed a building originally, and then these extravagant repairs would have been saved.

Mr. MILLS. I called the hon. gentleman's attention to the proposed amendment rather with the view of eliciting what it meant. I do not see by this amendment as it stands that we will get any other information except as to the work done.

Mr. BLAKE. Nor is there any distinction made between the work done by contract and the work not done by contract, so that it is worthless.

Mr. MILLS. If the hon. gentleman will give us a statement as to the value of the work done otherwise than by contract each year, and the aggregate value of the work done by contract, we will get some information.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There is no objection to that.

Mr. BLAKE. The additions and alterations to the motion are as bad as the additions and alterations to the hall.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). You should construct a proper motion to begin with.

Mr. BLAKE. The same with the hall.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I understood that the Ministry were willing to give us the aggregate cost each year, and, in addition to that, the amount where it was let by contract. It appears now that this is not given by the amendment, and, if not, it is utterly useless.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It appears that some very ingenious statements will be required to induce the people of this country to believe that they have got value for their money in the expenditure of more than half a million of dollars for repairs to this building. The whole thing, it appears to me, would be dear at $80,000.

The motion, finally amended as follows, was agreed to:—

A statement in detail of the cost of the additions, alterations, repairs and maintenance of Rideau Hall, stating by whom ordered, and distinguishing between the work done by contract and otherwise, with the names of the contractors when the work was done by contract.

Mr. McCRANEY moved for:

A detailed statement of cost of Rideau Hall, purchase, rent and furniture, since Confederation; by whom and from whom were the articles under this head of furniture purchased; also a list of said articles and the prices, and if any of such articles were disposed of, the names of the persons who obtained each article and the price paid, if any.

He said: I find, Sir, that since 1868 there have been expended $85,369.96 on furniture for Rideau Hall, which, added to the cost of the purchase of the domain, $82,000, makes a total of $167,369. Now, Sir, as I remarked at the outset, I had no other object in moving these motions than to call the attention of this House and the people of the country to the way that money has been expended around this place called Rideau Hall. I do not at all blame the Governor General, because I am perfectly satisfied that he is not responsible for this large expenditure. I may say that I have frequently looked at Rideau Hall, and I have been ashamed that we had not a more respectable place for our Governors General. As has been already remarked, I think enough money has been expended on Rideau Hall to have built half a dozen very respectable residences, and I am sure there are dozens of gentlemen living in this country who occupy far finer residences which cost less than $50,000. I think it is about time we stopped spending money on Rideau Hall, and either apply ourselves to making the place more respectable, or else dispose of the property and make the most we can out of it. I am in favor of spending money when it is judiciously done; and when money in this country is expended properly I like to see it done. I like to see public works going on, and surely we have enough of railways and useful public works to carry on without wasting money on these old barracks that have been referred to. Although I felt considerable timidity at first in referring to these matters I do not think we should be, mealy-mouthed when we see such a large sum of money has been wasted in the manner I have pointed out.

Motion agreed to.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for:

Return showing: 1. The number of homesteads—where entries were regularly made—in the North-West Territories, cancelled or abandoned in the years 1882, 1883, 1884 and 1885; 2. The section or part of section—the township and range where such homestead is situated; 3. The name of the person whose entry was cancelled, or who abandoned his homestead; 4. The reasons for such cancellation or abandonment.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I may tell the hon. gentleman that if the House grants this motion, there is not the slightest chance of his getting it this year. The granting of it will involve a great deal of labor, and unless the hon. gentleman can give some reason other than appears on the surface, to my mind it will be utterly useless. The number of homesteads where entries were regularly made in the North-West and cancelled and abandoned, in the several years, can be given; there is no difficulty about that. But I cannot see that the public interest is to be served by giving all the details which follow, that is, the range, the township and the section in which these are to be found, the names of persons, and the reasons for the cancellations. There is, in fact, practically, but one reason for cancellation of homesteads, and that is the non-fulfilment of homestead duties. Any other reason is, so far as I am able to find out, unknown. If a man leaves his homestead and it is found vacant, under the old plan, there were a great many homesteads cancelled, and I think, perhaps, too quickly, without sufficient consideration; that is to say, a claim jumper, as he was called in the North-West, going there and seeing the homestead without a settler upon it, simply made representation to the agent, and in too many cases the agent cancelled the homestead. As it is now, when a representation is made, the homestead inspector is sent to examine the place, notice is given to the party, and the greatest possible care is exercised that no cancellation may take place without cause; at any rate, every effort is made to give due notice to the party. I ought, perhaps, to say that this change has not been made since I came into the Department, but before; and so far, therefore, as it is meritorious, I have no credit for it. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, the attempt to give this information, which is not to be found in the Department here, but which will have to be obtained in its details from the agencies all over the North-West, will involve a very long time, a great deal of labor, and will, after it is obtained, be practically of no use. I do not say it is the case in the present instance, but unfortunately it is sometimes the case that an immense amount of information is asked for simply that some particular fact may be obtained. If the hon. gentleman is anxious to obtain any particulars as to any particular homestead that has been cancelled, improperly or otherwise it may be, I shall be very glad, indeed, to do everything I can to secure any information, but to go beyond the general statement of the number of homesteads cancelled, I must ask the House to reject the other parts of this motion.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I may explain that the reason I put that notice on the paper was that a strong political friend of hon. gentlemen opposite has communicated with me several times during the present Session of Parliament, and pointed out several cases where, he alleges, great hardship has been suffered. He alleges some cases where entries have been cancelled without any reason or justification. Whether that is true or not, I do not know, and I venture no opinion on the subject. I can only discover that when the papers come down. I think the object of the motion will be served by limiting the return to perhaps half a dozen cases. I will, in the meantime, communicate with the hon. Minister and inform him as to the particular information I desire. I have no wish to have a sort of roving commission issued to travel all over the North-West, or to have a large amount of the time of the Department occupied in preparing returns, a large majority of which would be useless.

Mr. BLAKE. I hope the hon. gentleman will not propose any alteration in the motion in that respect to which the Minister has acceded because I conceive the matter of great public interest apart altogether from the question to which the hon. gentleman has now referred. It is of great consequence how many of the homesteads each year were cancelled or abandoned. As to the statement of ranges, lots, and so forth, of course, if, as the hon. gentleman has intimated, an enormous amount of investigation is required, there are a good many homesteads cancelled and abandoned. If there are only a few the hon. gentleman would not have made so long a speech about the time it would take to obtain particulars. If a large number of homesteads are cancelled and abandoned, some general description, which the hon. gentleman might cause to be prepared without giving minute details, might be given so that hon. members might have some idea of the number of cancellations in certain portions of the country, or blocks or areas, such, for instance, as a certain distance from the Canadian Pacific Railway belts and certain provisional districts or land districts. We would then be able to see whether or not settlement had taken place, because I believe many of the homesteads were speculatively taken up, we would see to what extent there had been bond fide settlement, and what homesteads had been cancelled or given up for one reason or another. As to the reason why the hon. gentleman objects to giving information I am afraid his statement will, while it answers itself in so far as it would be objectionable to give details, it would leave the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) very little information, because the hon. gentleman objected strenuously to the motion on the ground of the immense trouble it would cause, and he yet told us that there was but one reason for the cancellation, and that was non-compliance with the conditions. If so, this could be stated at the head of the return. What I would suggest is that the return the hon. gentleman should give is, as far as possible, particulars of the localities in which homesteads were cancelled or abandoned in each year in as much detail as possible, without resorting to an extraordinary effort; and that as regards the half dozen cases which the hon. member for Huron has mentioned an Order of the House might be allowed to pass unopposed for detailed information in regard to those cases.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If the hon. gentleman will send a memorandum of any particular case, I will have the information furnished. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) is not quite correct in saying that the length of time implies that there must have been a great number of cases. I am afraid there were a great number of cases for one cause or another. But whether there were many or few the task involves going over the whole books in the agency, and that will take up a great deal of time. I think we might furnish the information if it were confined to agency districts, which in Manitoba are pretty close together. With that understanding, and striking out the latter part of the motion, I will supply the information by agency districts; and then if the hon. gentleman will give me any case he wants to get particulars about, I will give him the information he desires.

Motion amended so as to read:

Return showing the number of homesteads where entries were regularly made in each agency district in Manitoba and the North-West Territories cancelled or abandoned in the years 1882, 1883, 1884 and 1885.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.
Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Moved the adjournment of the House.

THE LATE MR. THOMPSON, M.P.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to give expression to the deep regret—a feeling in which I think I shall be joined by every member of the House—with which we learned to-day of the decease of our late friend, Mr. Thompson. Mr. Thompson represented the same constituency in Parliament, ever since Confederation, that he represented for several years before Confederation, in the Parliament of the Province of Canada. Although a young man he was therefore a very old man of Parliament. He sat for twenty-three years consecutively in the Legislature of this country and although a man of pronounced political opinions, and frank and free in the expression of them, I believe he was able to secure not merely the respect and attachment of those whom he was politically associated, but was respected and regarded amongst us all on both sides of the House while he lived, and I am sure we all deeply mourn his death.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I certainly concur in the remarks made by the leader of the Opposition on the death of our friend Mr. Thompson. I must say when we heard of his death this morning we heard the news with deep regret, especially those of us who had the pleasure of sitting in Parliament with him. I have been twenty-three years sitting with him in Parliament, and I do not think that during those twenty-three years he ever had an enemy in Parliament, and therefore I certainly express the sentiments of my friends when I join with the leader of the Opposition in saying that we all deplore his loss.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 10.20 p. m.
