SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform this House, that when the House attended His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a Speech to both Houses of Parliament, and, to prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy of the Speech, which is as follows:—

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

On meeting you again I have the pleasing duty to perform of congratulating you on the sufficient harvest of last year and on the prosperity and substantial progress of the country.

Since the suppression of the insurrection in the North-West Territories peace and order have been restored and now prevail. After so serious an outbreak some disquiet and apprehension of the recurrence of those disorders may naturally be expected to linger, and it will be the duty of my Government to make such precautionary arrangements as will assure the present inhabitants, as well as intending settlers of efficient protection against all disturbance.

I warmly congratulate you on the practical completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and on the announcement that it will be open for the daily carriage of passengers and freight from Ocean to Ocean, in the month of June next. This great work, so important alike to the Empire and the Dominion, cannot fail to increase the trade between British Columbia and the other Provinces, to ensure the early development and settlement of Manitoba and the North-West, and greatly to add to the commercial prosperity of the whole country.

Should the negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States for the appointment of a Joint Commission to adjust what is known as "The Fishery Question" and to consider the best means of developing our International Commerce, fail to secure any satisfactory result, you will be asked to make provision for the protection of our Inshore Fisheries by the extension of our present system of Marine Police.

The measure submitted to you last Session for the consolidation of the Statutes and for the introduction into the North-West Territories of a more simple and economical system for the transfer of land will be again laid before you for consideration and legislative action. The Acts of last Session will be found to be included in the first of those measures.

You will also be asked to consider the expediency of improving the judiciary system which obtains in those Territories.

Your attention will be invited to the propriety of amending the law relating to the business of the office of Queen's Printer and of providing for the more satisfactory working of the present system of Government and Parliamentary printing.

A numerical census of the North-West Territories has been taken and a measure based thereon for the representation of the people in Parliament will be laid before you.

Other measures will be laid before you, and among them will be found Bills for providing for better mode of trial of claims against the Crown, for regulating Post Office Savings Banks in British Columbia and the North-West Territories, for expediting the issue of patents for Indian Lands, for the administration of the rights of the Crown in the foreshores of the Dominion, for the establishment of an Experimental Farm, and for the amendment of the Chinese Immigration Act.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The accounts for the past year will be laid before you. You will find that the estimate of receipts has been fully realized ; but I regret to say that the outbreak in the North-West has added largely to the expenditure of the country.

The Estimates for the ensuing year will be submitted to you. They have been prepared with due regard to economy and the requirements of the public service.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate,

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I commend these several subjects and the others which may engage your attention to your best consideration, and I earnestly trust that the result of your deliberations may, under the Divine Blessing, conduce to the advancement and prosperity of Canada.

On motion of Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, His Excellency's Speech was ordered to be taken into consideration to-morrow.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved :

That Select Standing Committees of this House, for the present Session, be appointed for the following purposes:—1. On Privileges and Elections. 2. On Expiring Laws. 3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. 4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills. 5. On Standing Orders. 6. On Printing. 7. On Public Accounts. 8. On Banking and Commerce. 9. On Immigration and Colonization; which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Mr. SPEAKER laid on the Table of the House the Report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 4.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 26th February, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Speaker: I have had the honor of being selected from among the new members of this House, to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Before entering upon such remarks as I may be enabled to make briefly upon some of the points referred to in the Speech, I desire to crave from Your House the indulgence which has usually been granted to those gentlemen who, in years past, have occupied the position which I am called upon to occupy to-day. The first paragraph of His Excellency's Speech, refers to the excellent harvest of last year, and to the substantial progress and prosperity of the country. While I heartily agree with the language expressed by His Excellency, I do not for a moment deny that all over the country, all over the civilised world to-day, all over the civilised world for a number of years past, commercial depression has to a greater or less extent existed. In the Mother Country, Great Britain, with its vast resources, with its great wealth, with the large amount of capital it has invested in various manufactories, we find, to-day, Sir, that there is great distress existing among its people and among the laboring class particularly. That is the condition of things which exists and has continued to exist in that great country, although it has to-day the same trade policy which it has had for years past, that which is known as a free trade policy. In the United States of America, which borders on the Dominion—in that great republic, with a policy somewhat similar to our own, the same state of affairs has existed and continues to exist to-day, to a greater or less extent, in the same way as it has existed in other civilised countries of the world. It would be strange indeed, Sir, if we in this new country should be free from all these great commercial depressions. They have existed among us to some extent; and yet, Sir, I feel that it is true, as stated in the first paragraph of the Speech, that we are to-day having prosperity and substantial progress in this country. I know, Sir, that those who take exception to the National Policy, which is the policy of the Dominion to-day, point with their fingers to the closed factories which are to be found in various portions of the Dominion, and claim that those factories are closed in consequence of the trade policy which prevails in this country. I contend, Sir, that while the general commercial depression may, to a certain extent, account for the closing of those factories, yet that, as a rule, they have been closed because those who entered into those various enterprises entered into them without sufficient capital to carry on their work successfully. In the city of St. John, a portion of the constituency which has sent me to represent them in this Parliament, we have a large establishment for the manufacture of cotton goods. It was built some two, three or four years ago, and we looked for great things from its erection. It, Sir, has been closed, and the silence within its walls and the absence of the men who were employed in it are pointed to as evidences that the policy which has been adopted by the Dominion has failed entirely. The truth, Sir, is that the proprietors of that factory commenced business on entirely too small capital. All the money which was raised for the purpose of constructing that building and carrying on operations was insufficient for the purpose, and a large amount of debt was contracted to enable them to pay for the machinery, and for the building itself, leaving them nothing with which to carry on their operations. That is the cause of the failure of that institution; and whenever the time comes when that mill will fall into the hands of other people—when the time comes, as I trust it may before long, when men of capital will take hold of it, then we shall find a different state of affairs, a state of affairs I trust similiar to that which existed in the town of St. Mary's, opposite to Fredericton, another portion of New Brunswick, where a gentleman who has been well-known as a manufacturer, and who has accumulated a large amount of means, has invested a portion of his means in the manufacture of cotton goods, has erected a splendid establishment in that quarter, and is carrying on his operations successfully. I believe the goods manufactured in St. Mary's are being distributed over the length and breadth of the Dominion, and that in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and in the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario as well, this gentleman finds a remunerative market for the goods he is turning out in that manufactory. The same thing may be said with reference to all the establishments going on in New Brunswick; and I take it that what is true with reference to that province, is true with reference to the other provinces in the Dominion. In the city of Moncton, in the county of Westmoreland, a number of establishments have been placed in operation, and among them some few have failed to carry on their business successfully. It has been my fortune, or my misfortune, if you choose to call it so, to assist in the winding-up of some of those establishments, and I found invariably that it was the want of capital which caused their lack of success. There was not a single instance in which they could not have carried on their business successfully had they been provided with sufficient capital to do their work. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but I ask them to point to any manufactory in the Dominion of Canada, in which the capital invested has been sufficient to enable it to carry on its operations, which has not been successful. It is true, circumstances have arisen, as they will arise at all times, in which the products of certain establishments have not realised a profit; this has been the case in reference to sugar, I believe, and in reference to some other articles; but wherever capital has been properly invested in the Dominion of Canada, as in other countries, it has produced results beneficial to those who have invested in these enterprises. In former years, Sir, before the introduction of the National Policy into the Dominion of Canada, very many of our workmen left their homes and sought labor in the United States, which they failed to obtain in their own country; but under the operation of the National Policy, workshops of all descriptions have been erected throughout the country; and what is true of the Lower Provinces is equally true, I suppose, of the Upper Provinces, that those factories have given employment to thousands of our workmen, who, instead of leaving the country, have been retained to engage in various works of production. If it had not been for the establishment of these very manufactories and the employment they have given to our workmen, Canada would to-day be in the same position as the Mother Country, where the workmen, in the city of London, are clamoring for work or for food. It is only to a very limited extent the fact, that severe suffering has taken place in the Dominion of Canada, in consequence of depression in trade. It is true, in one section of the Province of New Brunswick, last year, owing to the failure of a certain kind of labor on which the population of that section depended, there were a few people who asked to be supplied with the necessaries of life; it is true, also, that in the Province of Quebec, owing to the failure of some fishery firms, some little difficulties have occurred; but taking the whole length and breadth of this country, the fact remains that our people have been fairly employed and have received fair remuneration for their labor, and have been able to save something out of their earnings. Those who choose to examine the books of the savings banks of the Dominion, will find that on the 1st of January, 1886, there was deposited in those banks a sum of money exceeding by $2,000,000 the amount that was deposited in them on the 1st of January, 1885. These deposits I claim to be the savings of the people. I know that in the city in which I live, the depositors in the Post Office Savings Bank are the people who are engaged in daily labor. I have watched from month to month and from year to year the operation of those banks, and I know that the money deposited in them is not the money of the rich man or the capitalist, but the money of the poor laborer who lays aside from his earnings something for a rainy day, for a day of sickness or distress, or for his old age, and who has placed it in the savings banks under the protection of the Government that he may be sure to find it when the day comes when he shall require it for the use of himself or his family. There are some classes of business in our country, as there are in other countries, which have met with some depression. In the Maritime Provinces our people are largely engaged in shipping. The oceans to-day are covered with the ships of the world, and among them are to be found in great abundance the property of residents of the Maritime Provinces. I regret to say that the carrying business of the world during the last year or two has not been remunerative; but our people are in the same boat as all others engaged in the same business, no matter under what nationality or government they live. A large amount of the capital of the people of Great Britain has been invested in shipping—too great an amount—and the result is that it is not returning to the owners the profits which they might naturally expect. But there is this fact, that to-day we are rapidly moving away from these bad times. If you step into the workshops in any part of the country you will find renewed activity; if you enquire of the men engaged in trade and commerce, they will tell you that last year's operations have been more profitable than the previous year's; therefore I believe that we have passed the line, that we are on the up-grade, and that the time is not far distant when our people will experience another wave of prosperity. The next subject to which His Excellency has referred in the Speech, has reference to the North-West and to the insurrection which unfortunately broke out in that section of the country during the last Session of this Parliament. It was much to be regretted; it fell like a clap of thunder upon all our people. Knowing the condition of that country, knowing what a small number of people were scattered over a large area, and that the number of troops in the Mounted Police was not very large, we felt a great deal of apprehension as to the results of that insurrection. We knew that the Indians who occupied that territory were not so civilised as the Indians to be found in the eastern section of the Dominion; and we knew that the white subjects of the Queen throughout that territory were very much scattered and in very limited numbers, and therefore, we feared that circumstances might arise which would endanger their lives and perhaps sweep them out of existence. But if there was ever a time when I felt proud of the Government of the country, it was then. When I found them putting forward their utmost energy and moving straight to the front, when I found them declaring that such a state of affairs should exist no longer than was possible, when I found them placing in the hands of the Minister of Militia and those under him the power to move with speed, I felt that we had a Government which was able to put down the insurrection at the shortest possible moment; and, Sir, the result proved that I was correct. I feel that, if I had the right to do so, I should thank the Minister of Militia and those engaged under him in various capacities for the manner in which they conducted that campaign. I feel that the shortness of time which intervened between the breaking out of the insurrection and its being quelled, I feel that the readiness and swiftness with which the emergency was met and mastered, entitle those men to a vote of thanks for the course they pursued and their conduct in bringing this war so readily and successfully to a close. There is something else I feel proud of in this connection. A few years ago the Provinces which form this great Dominion were isolated politically from each other; each had its own Provincial Legislature, each Province adopted its own tariff and carried on its own business, without consideration for the other Provinces. Indeed, I think I am nearly correct when I say that the people of the different Provinces had very slight intercourse with each other, and consequently knew very little of each other. But the Act of Confederation changed all that; it brought together in one Parliament men whose energies had been hitherto confined to their separate Provinces, and enabled them by their united wisdom to adopt measures for the benefit of the whole Dominion. They swept away the hostile tariffs which prevented our people trading one with the other, and enabled them, in whatever grade or occupation they were engaged, to transact business freely with each other; and, instead of being a separate people with but one tie in common, that which bound us to the Crown, we became one people united by innumerable ties. We felt that we had one common country, and that instead of belonging to some almost unknown Provinces, we composed a nationality of which we are proud. I may say that, unknown as we were before Confederation, there is scarcely a civilised nation in the world to-day which does not know that to be a Canadian is to belong to a nation of which any one may be proud. When this war broke out in the North-West, we had but a limited number of soldiers; we were not in the position of a country which keeps up a standing army; we were dependent upon the citizen soldiery of the various portions of the Dominion. Our volunteers down by the sea were as prepared to enter into the field as were those who lived in Ontario and along the borders of Manitoba; our volunteers down by the sea felt this was their country; they felt that they were united with the people in the North-West and that it was necessary for them to join hands with their fellow-citizens to protect us against a common foe. They sprang to arms at once and proffered their services. It is true that our soldiers from the city of St. John had no opportunity to go to the front; that New Brunswickers were not required in the field, because the Government had all the men they wanted, but they felt that they would like to be in the field so that they might earn some of the honors won by their fellow-citizens; and I trust, if the time ever comes—and I hope it will never come—when we will be called upon again to defend any portion of this Dominion against the attack of an enemy, either from without or within, the soldiers of New Brunswick will be called early to the front and given an opportunity to show their patriotism. I said, a few moments ago, that the Minister of Militia and the officials under him deserve our thanks for the rapidity with which they succeeded in transporting ammunition and supplies to the front, and for the activity they displayed in bringing about the suppression of the rebellion. But I have a word more to say. I think we should thank the gentlemen who held positions of trust in the Government, and those who brought into existence the Canadian Pacific Railway, because it was mainly through this agency that we were enabled to forward our troops and supplies so rapidly to the seat of war. I think, if there be anything which particularly justifies the building of that road more than another, it is the fact that over it we were enabled to convey our troops and facilitate all the measures necessary to suppress the rebellion. I agree, therefore, with His Excellency that it will be the duty of His Excellency's Government to make such precautionary arrangements as will assure the present inhabitants, as well as intending settlers, of efficient protection against all disturbance. It is necessary, if we are going to have a large population in the North-West, that we should assure them of the fullest protection the law of the country can provide. We have there an enormous quantity of land fit for cultivation, on which we desire to see settled a large portion of our own people—people from our fatherland; we hope to see those people grow up in wealth and prosperity; we expect from them valuable assistance in paying the taxation of the country; we look forward to receiving great benefits from the opening up of the North-West, and we must, in order to reap these hopes, show the people who are going to reside there that we are prepared to protect them against any evil that might arise either in consequence of rebellion or any other discord. The next paragraph in His Excellency's Speech refers to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and congratulates Parliament on its successful completion. When I was a boy going to school I was in the habit of attending lectures, and amongst those to which I listened with a great deal of pleasure were lectures on the subject of building a railway from Halifax to the Pacific Ocean. That was one of the dreams of enthusiasts thirty or forty years ago, and it then seemed nothing more than a dream. Still all over the country there were far-seeing, intelligent men who believed the time would come when the railway connecting the east with the west would be fully built. For myself I did not expect to live long enough to see that day. I was desirous to see the work done, but could not see clearly how it was to be accomplished. The first step taken in the construction of this great Canadian Pacific Railway was the formation of the Confederacy under which we live. Under the separate provincial system there did not seem to be any possibility that the project would be carried out. But the united people in their wisdom, and by the advice and with the assistance of the Imperial Government, formed a Confederation. That, Sir, was the first step towards the building of this great Canadian Pacific Railway. There are men in this country who, within a few years, have felt that the building of this railway could not be accomplished, not merely because of the financial difficulties, but also of the physical difficulties which lay in the way. It was thought to be impossible to cross the Rocky Mountains—impossible to build a railway which would connect the eastern with the western coast of America. We are pleased to read in the Speech of His Excellency that the time has come when the railway is accomplished; we feel glad to know that it has been accomplished in a much less time than was set down in the contract which was entered into with the company who have done this work. Five years of time have been spared to us. We are now enabled to enjoy all the privileges of that railway. In June next we may be able to take the cars at Halifax, pass over the Intercolonial Railway, take the Canadian Pacific Railway at Quebec, and pass along that whole line to the western country five years before it was thought possible for any one to do so. We have to thank the company for the enterprise they have shown and for the manner in which they have done their work. I believe there is no railway on this continent of America that has been more thoroughly built than the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is creditable to the men who have built it, and all honor is due to those who have not only built it, but have built it so much in advance of the time set down in the terms of the contract. Perhaps nothing has occurred in this Dominion of Canada, which has called the attention of the world more directly to it than the building of this Canadian Pacific Railway. The people of the Mother Country have watched the operation with a great deal of interest, and, as from time to time facilities have been afforded, we have had delegations from the other side of the water coming across the Atlantic, passing over our lines of railway—though the Canadian Pacific Railway was not quite finished—going up to Winnipeg, and so west, in order to see what our prairies were like, and what the prospects were for the people of Great Britain who might seek homes in that distant country. We have had their reports spread abroad through the world, published in the newspapers of England and on the platform, and in a thousand ways, showing that by the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway the prairies of the west have become known to those people, and from that we have already received a large increase of population, as in the future we shall receive a much larger one when it is fully established that that country is under the protection of a Government which is able to save the people from danger should trouble or warfare arise. This railway has made it possible for the prairies to be occupied by our people; it has made it possible for them to raise their grain, to raise that which the soil will produce, and to find an easy mode of conveying it to the markets of the world. Large quantities of grain have already, I believe, been brought to this section of Canada from the North-West. I am not quite sure, but I think that cargoes of grain have been shipped to the other side of the Atlantic—grain which has been grown upon the soil of our country. The construction of this railway and the peopling of this country will enable immense quantities of grain to be raised there, and the time is not far distant when we will be known on the other side of the Atlantic as the granary, or at least as one of the granaries of the world. That which is true in reference to Confederation having accomplished a union of the people of the different old Provinces, will be equally true in reference to the western country. The manufacturers of the upper Provinces have been enabled to find customers for their products in the lower Provinces, and the people in the lower Provinces have been enabled to find customers for the product of their mines, their fisheries and their other establishments in the western country. There has been an interchange of commodities between the two sections of the country, and I believe, that when we have this line fully established, when we have the people out there increasing in numbers and in wealth, we shall have a country where the products of our eastern districts may find a market, and thus give employment and add to the wealth of those who are engaged in industries in the eastern section of our country. This line of railway which has been constructed in the interests of the people of this Dominion seems to be more important than merely a local railway, that is, local as far as the Dominion itself is concerned. I believe I am correct when I say that the late Government of Great Britain recognised its importance by making a public declaration of its determination to make this railway an Imperial route to the East. This, Sir, is more important than may appear upon the reading of a paragraph of that kind. It is important because, if the Imperial authorities are going to use that route, the people in Great Britain will learn to use it also, and I believe that the time is not distant when we will find the products of Asia moving across the Pacific Ocean to British Columbia, thence over our great Canadian railway, finding vessels on the Atlantic coast to carry the products of the far East to its final destination in the Mother Country. The Queen herself has seen the importance of this railway. She has sent us her congratulations on its completion. Her Majesty has seen the importance of the railway, and to such an extent that she has done honor to the president of the railway company by conferring upon him an honor which is only conferred upon gentlemen for great services. The original charter for the building of the great Canadian Pacific Railway, if I am correctly informed, contemplated that the road should be built from Callander to British Columbia—that was the whole extent of it. It has, however, been constructed much further, and to-day, on the same line of railway, controlled by the same people, freight may be carried from British Columbia down to the ports of Montreal and Quebec, where it can find shipment for distant countries. This is something beyond what was originally intended; but this Parliament has even gone farther than that; this Parliament, by vote in the last two Sessions, has made a grant which will enable a short line of railway to be constructed to take up the freight where it is left at Montreal and carry it down to the ports of St. Andrews, St. John, and Halifax, from which, in the winter time, these articles of produce of the west can be shipped to their destination. I feel particularly interested in this movement, Sir. The city of St. John is a portion of the constituency that I represent, and I am desirous that the time shall not be long postponed when we shall be able, in that city, so distant from the west, to have erected the wharves and the elevators which will enable us to take at that port the produce of the west and ship it in the winter time to the Mother Country and to other lands. I trust, Sir, that this will be accomplished before many years go over our heads. There is one other subject to which I wish to direct attention for a moment, and that is the paragraph with reference to the fisheries. Those of us who live down by the sea, feel, perhaps, more interested in the question of the fisheries than those gentlemen who live in the western portion of this Dominion. It is one of the great means of livelihood of our people. The wealth of the fisheries is not so well understood in the west as it is in the east, and we from the east hope that this matter will receive the utmost consideration of this Parliament. Under a treaty effected with the people of the United States, our fishermen have been able to carry on their business by trading with ports in the United States, and without taking the fish from their vessels, in many cases they would find sale for it in some of the ports in Massachusetts or Maine, where they could dispose of it to their advantage. They were satisfied with that mode of doing business. The treaty, however, which was abrogated last July by the United States Government, has placed us in a very difficult and very awkward position. It is the desire of our fishermen and the desire of our people that a new Fishery Treaty should be made which will enable them to find a free and easy market for their fish in the United States. We are willing to enter into some reasonable and proper arrangement which will enable the fishermen of the United States to fish on our coast alongside our fishermen, and we are willing to do it for several reasons. We are willing to do this because we want to sell our fish to them, and because we want to avoid the difficulty which must arise if American fishermen come unauthorized along our coast and attempt to catch our fish without the right which we think they ought to have. But, Sir, since the closing of their ports against us, our fishermen have commenced to learn that they have a market in the west; they have commenced to learn that the people of Ontario and Manitoba, and other western portions of the Dominion, are a fish-eating people, and as the people of the United States have shut their doors against us, by that same act they have shut the doors of this Dominion against the importation of fish from the United States, and the people of western Canada can now buy fish caught in the Bay of Fundy and along the shore of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. We have an open market for our fish in the Dominion, and our people are taking advantage of it. Along the line of the Intercolonial Railway there are to be found, every day in the week, from one to half a dozen car loads of fish leaving the ports of Halifax, St. John and others, for the markets of Toronto and other cities west. Our people are beginning to learn that there is somebody in their own country to use their fish, while the people of the west are beginning to learn that it is to their advantage to buy their fish from the people who live by the sea. Should the United States refuse to make a treaty under which their people could fish on our shores and ours have free access to their markets, I believe that the time is not far distant when our fishermen, having found a home market for their products, will be unwilling to return to the state of affairs which had previously existed. The same principle of national policy which governs other matters would then come in play. We should then have a protection for our fishermen, whose fish will be consumed in large quantities by our people, while foreign markets of equal value to those of the United States might be found in other portions of the world. Mr. Speaker, I trust that every effort will be made to settle this matter in the way indicated in the Speech from the Throne, and if the people of the United States are not willing to make a treaty with us, that every effort will be made to protect our fisheries, so that we may have the advantages which nature has given us, and which the laws of the country should entitle us to enjoy. I wish it were in my power to take up some of the facts and figures which I have had in my possession in connection with the fishery matter, but I have not got them with me, as I did not expect to be called upon to use them. But when this fishery question comes up I have no doubt that some gentlemen who may be entrusted with the matter will be able to show to this House some facts and figures that will astonish it. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the fishing industry of this country is an important industry, more important, perhaps, than some hon. members may think. If the people of the United States are debarred from fishing along our coast, they will have to pay the duty which will be imposed on that fish, because I do not believe that they have got fish enough in their own waters to supply their own demands. In another paragraph His Excellency has promised that some measure will be submitted this Session for simplifying transfers of land in the North-West, and some other Acts are promised in relation to matters with which I am not very well acquainted, and, therefore, I will not attempt to discuss them. I would, however, refer to the proposal to give the North-West a representation in this Parliament. I am pleased to find that a census has been taken in those territories, and that it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure to enable the people of the North-West to be represented on the floors of Parliament. I am glad of that, because I think it highly proper that our fellow-citizens, no matter where they are living, should be able to select some one to speak for them in this House, and to deal with the various measures in which they are interested, so that they may stand on common ground with the other Provinces of the Dominion. I regret, Sir, that although the estimates of last year have been fully met by the receipts, the expenditures of last year have been so much greater than was anticipated. I have no doubt this extra expense has been largely incurred by the war in the North-West, and although I do not profess to know very much upon the subject, I can see no reason why this war debt should not be met in some other manner than by taking it out of the Consolidated Fund. It seems to me that it might properly form a portion of the debt of the country instead of being taken from that fund. Now, Sir, I fear that I have, perhaps, unduly trespassed upon the time of the House by speaking so long. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, most heartily for the privilege you have accorded me; I thank the House for the attention which hon. members have given me, and I now move the adoption of the following Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne:—

That a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to thank His Excellency for his gracious Speech at the opening of the present Session, and further to assure His Excellency:—

Mr. EVERETT.

That we receive with much pleasure His Excellency's congratulations on the sufficient harvest of last year and on the prosperity and substantial progress of the country.

That we feel great satisfaction in knowing that since the suppression of the insurrection in the North-West Territories peace and order have been restored and now prevail; and that we are aware that after so serious an outbreak some disquiet and apprehension of the recurrence of those disorders may naturally be expected to linger, and that it will be the duty of His Excellency's Government to make such precautionary arrangements as will assure the present inhabitants, as well as intending settlers of efficient protection against all disturbance.

That we are glad that His Excellency has occasion to warmly congratulate us on the practical completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and on the announcement that it will be open for the daily carriage of passengers and freight from Ocean to Ocean, in the month of June next. That we feel with His Excellency that this great work, so important alike to the Empire and the Dominion, cannot fail to increase the trade between British Columbia and the other Provinces, to ensure the early development and settlement of Manitoba and the North-West, and greatly to add to the commercial prosperity of the whole country.

That should the negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States for the appointment of a Joint Commission to adjust what is known as "The Fishery Question" and to consider the best means of developing our International Commerce, fail to secure any satisfactory result, we shall be ready to make such provision for the protection of our Inshore Fisheries by the extension of our present system of Marine Police as may be necessary for that purpose.

That the measures submitted to us last Session for the consolidation of the Statutes and for the introduction into the North-West Territories of a more simple and economical system for the transfer of land, which His Excellency informs us will be again laid before us for consideration and legislative action, will receive our best attention; and that we learn with satisfaction that the Acts of last Session will be found to be included in the first of those measures.

That we shall willingly consider the expediency of improving the judiciary system which obtains in the North-West Territories.

That we shall carefully consider the propriety of amending the law relating to the business of the Queen's Printer and of providing for the more satisfactory working of the present system of Government and Parliamentary printing.

That we are pleased to learn that a numerical census of the North-West Territories has been taken and that a measure based thereon for the representation of the people in Parliament will be laid before us.

That any other measures which may be laid before us, for providing for a better mode of trial of claims against the Crown, for regulating Post Office Savings Banks in British Columbia and the North-West Territories, for expediting the issue of patents for Indian Lands, for the administration of the rights of the Crown in the foreshores of the Dominion, for the establishment of an Experimental Farm, and for the amendment of the Chinese Immigration Act, shall receive our earnest attention and consideration.

That we thank His Excellency for informing us that the accounts for the past year will be laid before us. That we learn with pleasure that the estimate of receipts has been fully realised, though we regret that the outbreak in the North-West has added largely to the expenditure of the country.

That we shall respectfully consider the Estimates for the ensuing year to be submitted to us, and that we thank His Excellency for assuring us they have been prepared with due regard to economy and the requirements of the Public Service.

That His Excellency may rest assured that the several subjects he has mentioned, and any others which may engage our attention, shall receive our best consideration, and that we earnestly trust, with His Excellency, that the result of our deliberations may, under the Divine Blessing, conduce to the advancement and prosperity of Canada.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker: I have listened attentively and with much pleasure to the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member representing the city and county of St. John (Mr. Everett). The hon. gentleman has dealt in a very exhaustive manner with the matters referred to in the Speech from the Throne, and I feel I need not detain the House at any great length in further discussing them; but I would ask hon. gentlemen to extend to me that courteous forbearance which is usually extended to those who occupy my position. The first, and I think the most important thing to notice in the Speech from the Throne, is its reference to the agricultural prosperity of the Dominion. Agriculture is altogether the most useful of all the arts, and upon the culture of the soil the well-being of the country, to a larger extent than upon any other single industry, depends. Although the price of agricultural products which are, in the main, governed by the English markets, has not lately, either in the United States or in Canada, been very high, yet the purchasing power of the produce of the farm is as great now as at any other period in our history. The farmer, by taking his cereals into the market, can procure in exchange therefor as many of the necessaries of life as at any other time owing to the corresponding lowness of the price of those necessaries. These considerations are the more important to Canada because she is destined to become one of the great grain-producing areas of the world. It is desirable to note these facts, that it may be seen that the relation between the products of the farm and the necessaries which must be obtained in exchange for them is now and is likely to continue to be very favorable to the agricultural interest. In referring, as we may, with great satisfaction to the restoration of peace and order in the North-West Territories, I am sure the House will pardon me if I make a passing allusion to the mournful event through which I have been called upon to occupy a seat in this Chamber. The town in which I live, the riding I have the honor to represent, and the Dominion at large, have not ceased to mourn many noble lives which have been offered up on the altar of patriotism; but that loss has fallen with peculiar severity upon East Durham, and it would perhaps be improper for me, as the successor of the lamented Colonel Williams, to speak further of one who held, and very deservedly held, the respect, esteem and affection of hon. members on both sides of this House. The Government, by prompt and effectual measures succeeded in suppressing a rebellion which might have resulted in most disastrous consequences to that part of the country in which the Indians live, and they should receive, and doubtless will receive, the practical endorsement of all those who desire to see the settler protected and our country prosperous and respected. We have, I think, every reason to feel proud of the achievements of our militia force—the volunteers—in the suppression of that rebellion, and I am sure the manner in which they encountered the hardships they were called upon to endure and the bravery they displayed in the field will meet with the hearty gratitude of the country. The prompt and energetic measures foreshadowed in the Speech, which are designed to maintain the supremacy of law in those distant regions, the settlers in which have a special claim upon the Parliament of Canada, will, I am sure, meet with the approval of the House. In this, as in all similar cases, the Government is called upon to assume certain responsibilities, and I am confident the people will sanction any steps that are taken to vindicate the majesty of the law and preserve the integrity of the Dominion. The energy now manifested by the Government is quite in keeping with the line adopted by them in suppressing the disturbance of last year, and this course, I may say, was urged and insisted upon by hon. members on both sides of the House and fully supported by them. By that action the Government showed the country, and proved to the world at large, that the resources of Canada, without being seriously strained, were quite adequate to meet the necessities of the occasion, and we may safely infer that neither men nor money would be wanting if new exigencies in the future should arise, and it should become necessary to call upon Parliament and the people for their assistance. The Government may point with great pride and satisfaction to the completion of our great national highway, the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is essential to the preservation of Confederation of the Provinces as a Dominion, and is also necessary for the development of the great resources of the North-West. Its position in relation to the other trans-continental lines gives it pre-eminence and an amount of power which it is impossible to overestimate. It must be borne in mind, that it is the only railway that connects absolutely by one line under one management and control the two great oceans that form the eastern and western boundaries of North America. This position, I think, fully justifies the remark made by the right hon. the Premier, that Liverpool and Hong Kong were really the termini of this road. Although not yet open for through traffic, the business which the railway has so far developed has exceeded the most sanguine expectations, and it is a vindication of the far-seeing policy of the Government in supporting this road and in sustaining those engaged in its construction against very heavy obstacles, the magnitude of which it would be impossible to overstate. It is now demonstrated beyond doubt that the assistance given by the Government to the road at a critical moment of its history, prevented a great national disaster; and I think we may safely assume that the repayment of every dollar advanced by the Government to that railway, is now secured beyond peradventure. From a colonisation point of view it must not be forgotten that it will be necessary for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to adopt an extensive system of branch lines, to connect with roads already projected and in course of construction; and that the road will thus become a most important factor in the development and settlement of the North-West. It will be remembered that in former debates in this House, some hon. gentlemen have expressed opinions—which, no doubt, arose from honest conviction—that the railway was being proceeded with too rapidly, that the bargain was an improvident one on the part of the Government, and, as they said, likely to be all on one side, so far as the advantages to be derived therefrom were concerned. I think we may safely assume that the early completion of the road is desirable in every way. It enables us to keep faith—nay, I think more than keep faith—with the Province of British Columbia, and the consequent development of the vast mineral resources of that Province must be of the greatest possible importance to the Dominion at large. Further, I think we will also have cause for congratulation if the contract should turn out a lucrative one for the gentlemen engaged in the work, for their success must mean a consequent advantage to the country; and every true Canadian will be rejoiced to know that the bargain is a satisfactory one to them, and that it will have the effect of quieting the forebodings of those who predicted that the country would have to assume the possession of the road and work it at a loss. It is also satisfactory to know that the burden which the country is called upon to assume for the completion of that work, is not likely to be a very heavy one. I notice by the Budget Speech of Sir Leonard Tilley, delivered in this House last Session, that he did not calculate that more than an addition of one and three quarters cents per head of taxation, for interest on the public debt, would be caused by the completion of that railway, and I think, under the circumstances, the people of the country need not have any cause to feel uneasy. Altogether, I think we may congratulate ourselves upon an enterprise which has been grandly conceived, fearlessly and courageously undertaken and gloriously accomplished. The House will be glad to notice that the Government have taken a firm attitude on the fisheries question, and it is well known also that they are quite ready to adopt conciliatory measures in dealing with that question, as is evidenced by the standing resolution of the House, passed at the time the present tariff was brought in, empowering the Governor in Council to modify the tariff relating to important items of international commerce so as to adjust our trade relations in conformity with the action of Congress. The time having arrived when the Government evidently feels justified in considering the representation of the North-West Territories in Parliament, it will be learned with great satisfaction that a census having been completed, measures will be adopted to provide for such representation. It will be conceded that the condition of that country, its sparse and scattered settlements, the lack of perfect municipal organisation, and the impossibility, under such circumstances, of providing adequate machinery for ascertaining the wishes of the people, have prevented an earlier movement in this direction, and that the Government are in no way to blame for a delay which could not well be avoided. Another matter which I notice in the Speech, with reference to the North-West, is the establishment of an experimental farm. In a country where so many go without the necessary skill in husbandry, this must be a most important means of enabling them to perfect themselves in that industry. While the system for issuing the patents for lands in the North-West has been sufficiently thorough for the ordinary demands upon the department, up to the present time, the expected immigration and settlement in that country renders it necessary that increased facilities should be granted. We are not probably in as bad a position as the United States, so far as that matter is concerned, for I saw by a late report of the commissioner of public lands of that country, that notwithstanding the large staff of his department, and notwithstanding his efforts to keep pace with his work, he is now seven years in arrear, and has been compelled to come down to Congress and ask for authority to employ 100 additional clerks in order to wipe off those arrears. No doubt the proposed measure will obviate any further ground for complaint concerning the management of our land department. The other important measures referred to in the Address, namely, those for a better mode of trial for complaints against the Crown, for the regulating of Post Office Savings Banks in British Columbia and the North-West Territories, and for amending the Act respecting Chinese Immigration, show that the Government are not unmindful of the requirements of a progressing and progressive country, and are abreast of the times in maturing these important acts of legislation. The trade policy of the Government is one closely identified with the well-being of all classes of people. I venture, however, to express the hope that the efforts of Ministers will be directed towards expanding the commercial relations of Canada with foreign countries and with British colonies. One thing must be apparent to every unbiassed mind, and that is, that the Government in encouraging home industries has averted a great financial crisis. The truth of this statement, I submit, is established by the virtual absence of the industrial prostration which exists in the old country, and the consequent troubles which we know have taken place there quite recently. I would point to the results of the bye-elections as a sure indication that the policy of the Government on the general questions affecting the welfare of the country is satisfactory to the people at large; and I feel confident that when it becomes necessary for the electors to pronounce a verdict, their decision will be in favor of the Administration. Sir, I believe firmly in the future of the Dominion, and that if we are true to ourselves and to our national instincts the continued progress of the country is quite assured. A brilliant French writer has said: "Would you realise what is progress? Call it to-morrow. To-morrow performs its work irresistibly and performs it from to-day."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WARD. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House had been reading Victor Hugo when they applied a certain name to the right hon. the leader of the Government, but I think the inference is natural, as he has been intimately associated with the progress of the country for the past 40 years. So too with Canada. Her progress towards a glorious future is, I believe, irresistible. No matter what difference of opinion may exist between the two great political parties as to the manner in which that future is to be worked out, no matter which party may, for the time being, control her destiny, that progress, subject, it is true, to temporary checks, will go on until Canada rises to a proud position among the countries of the earth. The great Liberal party will, no doubt, at some time, though perhaps not in the immediate future, be called on to assume the reins of power; but that day would not be more distant if they would give a fair and liberal support to the Government in working out the great problem of the management of our North-West Territories. At this period of our history, I think a few words uttered by Mr. Gladstone at the recent opening of the Imperial Parliament are very apt indeed. He said:

"Let us not deviate from the path of good temper and self command, but, forgetful of every prejudice, let us strive to do justice to the great, the gigantic interests committed to our charge."

Canada has great and gigantic interests, and the people have committed them to our charge as their representatives—a sacred trust. May that trust be faithfully performed. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express to you, and through you to the House, the gratitude I feel for the kind and courteous attention with which you have listened to my few and imperfect remarks. I beg to second the resolution now before us.

On paragraph 1,

Mr. BLAKE. I beg, Sir, on behalf of those with whom I have the honor to act, to extend the customary congratulations to the gentlemen who have just discharged, in so able a manner, the duty of proposing and seconding the Address, and to assure them that, however much we may differ from them in their political opinions, and however deeply we may regret the loss of those whom they are called on to replace, we heartily wish for them a long and honorable career in the councils of the country. The first observation I have to make is one I made a Session or two ago, on the same occasion; that is, to express a regret at the late period of the year at which we are discharging this, our initial duty. I express that regret with the stronger feeling, because it was announced to us by the First Minister, last Session, or the Session before, that we were to meet earlier in the future, because we have for some years been meeting much earlier than we are now met, and because there was a general understanding and pledge to a January meeting; I do not mean to say a pledge that was not to be broken if a great public emergency should call for delay, but certainly a pledge that ought rigidly to be observed, unless there was some great emergency of which we have not heard as yet. It is to the public interest that we should meet earlier, because this is the period of the year which will best enable the legislators of the country to discharge their duty, and best enable the people of the country to discharge their not unimportant part in connection with the business of legislation. As soon as the spring opens, both we and they are distracted with other things, and therefore it is a material thing for us, circumstanced as this business country is, that we should have a more distinct understanding, if such be possible, that our Session should not commence at what I regard as an unreasonable time. The question to which the hon. gentlemen have alluded, but particularly the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Everett), of the fishery and trade negotiations, is one with regard to which we certainly receive the expression of the Speech with feelings different from those which hon. gentlemen who confide in the First Minister may be apt to entertain on this occasion. We remember the dramatic air with which the hon. First Minister, towards the close of last Session, stated, that whatever opposition he might have expected from us on this side, there was one thing he did expect—that was, great praise for the consummate diplomatic tact and power which he had displayed in the management of the fishery question. He said that, whatever other fault we might find with him, his armor was impregnable there, and that in that aspect he should be received with pæans of applause from his opponents. The hon. gentleman who seconded the Address is apparently not aware that it was the Indians of the North-West who gave the title of "Old To-morrow" to their chief superintendent, their guardian, their protector, their angelic visitant. We thought he had acted in this respect so as to deserve that title, and felt justified in applying to him the title which they had given him. We believed there was good result to be achieved by pursuing the plain, practical, business-like course which was, as soon as the United States had given notice of the discontinuance of the treaty upon the avowed ground that its continuance after the expiration of the time might be considered a practical recognition of the justice of the whole terms, including the compensation, to approach the Government of that country with reference to the question whether an understanding could be reached; by which means results would have been achieved one way or the other, and we would have been a year ago where we are to-day, unless some more favorable results would have been realised; and if it be the case, as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Everett) says, that in a very little while grand markets for the fish products of the country are going to be found elsewhere, and after a little while the people of the country will refuse to return to freer intercourse with the United States, being in a much better condition under the arrangements which are going to follow from the failure of the hon. gentleman's negotiations, — I say we have postponed for a year that happy result. I regard, I confess, with some degree of apprehension, the situation. I agree that some steps have to be taken, and I do not condemn what is announced rather guardedly in the Speech; but what our relations with our neighbors are to be in the new situation in which we are placed, what is to be the solution of the headland question, which was unhappily left unadjusted in the former negotiations, and what complications may occur from the projected policy, are questions which must press themselves on our minds, but which I do not now refer to further, not knowing the precise state of the case, and in the absence of papers, which I hope are to be brought down, showing more fully what is the position of the Imperial authorities and what is that of the United States. The Speech says that the country is prosperous, and His Excellency has been advised to extend to us his congratulations upon that prosperity. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Everett) a little mitigated the rigor of this prosperous phrase, when, in his account of the condition of the country as one of the countries of the civilised world, and also in the particulars with which he was good enough to favor us as evidencing what the condition of things was in his own Province, he told us, it is true, there is commercial depression all over the world. I read in the newspapers, which are sometimes accurate, a statement made by the hon. gentleman a little time ago, amongst his own people when soliciting their suffrages, to this effect: "We are now passing through some of the worst times we have had for years." I do not know whether he was having a bad time just then himself, or whether he thought that was the sort of thing most suited for the atmosphere of St. John, and that the reverse was the sort of thing most suited to Ottawa; but such is the important statement of the hon. gentleman when speaking to his own people. The hon. gentleman gave us a very lucid explanation of the cause of the difficulties among the manufacturers. They had not, he said, enough money; they had used up their funds, they had got to the bottom of the stocking and they failed; but if they had had only more money they would have lasted longer. Why did the man starve? Because he had not enough to eat. He told us indeed of the St. John cotton factory. I wonder has he ever heard of Parks & Son's factory of St. John, with a capital of over $300,000, and which was sold within a few months for the mortgage on it of $55,000, the second mortgagee being the Bank of Nova Scotia on $66,000, which wealthy corporation would bid no more. I do not want to enter into these details, but as the hon. gentleman talked of one factory which failed for want of capital, I give him another, and I could give him the Halifax sugar refinery and others which had to shut down because they had spent their capital unprofitably, and no more was to be found. The hon. gentleman had better apply to hon. gentlemen opposite who have control of the purse, for succor. They might provide a little out of the deficit or add to the war debt to supply a larger capital to the factories. The hon. gentleman says he has had personal experience in the matter. Yes; he assisted in the winding up of some of the institutions, and in every case, singular to say, his experience was the same; they all broke down because their money came to an end. The hon. gentleman says there is one thing that is very satisfactory, and that is, if the people of the United States will not make arrangements with us they cannot do without our fish; they will have to get the fish from us, and they will pay the duty. I am glad to hear this announcement, rarely made, but which sometimes appears, about the consumer sometimes paying the duty. Of course, the hon. gentleman says, if the consumer is going to pay the duty on this occasion, we will be nearly as well off as if there was free admission. I am not going to enter into the subtleties of the question, but when I heard the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution, announcing that the consumer paid the duties, and the hon. gentleman who seconded the resolution, telling us the value of farm products was settled in England, I was gratified to hear statements which I have heard contradicted frequently in form and substance by hon. gentlemen opposite. The fact of the matter is, that instead of this condition of prosperity which the Speech congratulates us on, we are still laboring under very considerable depression. I recollect that in yesterday's issue, or that of the day before, of the chief organ of hon. gentlemen in Ontario, it was announced that the depression which had existed for three years continues unabated. I do not know whether that was the official foreshadowing of the Speech which we have just heard, but that was the statement made. I say the depression still lasts; there are in some respects, I am glad to say, signs of amendment, but it is not correct to say that the country is in a prosperous condition. We must apply ourselves to the consideration of the cause of that severe and continued depression and ascertain whether it is to be accounted for, as the hon. member for St. John says it is, altogether by circumstances beyond our power, or whether it be not the case that the enormously heavy and rising taxation, the restricted trade, the increase of our debt and of our expenses, and the course which has been pursued by many manufacturers under the hot-bed policy of the Government, are not the immediate and direct factors which have tended very largely to produce that heavy depression under which for three years we have been laboring, and from which there is so little prospect of the complete recovery we all desire, unless a change be made in the policy of the Government, unless the people be no longer oppressed with the burdens they have to bear, unless the expenses of the government of the country be reduced instead of being increased in the way in which they have been increased, unless some return be made to more economical principles of government. On this occasion hon. gentlemen have said a good deal in reference to one of the great railways which the country has constructed, but we hear little of the other one. I do not know whether it be a sign of prosperity in the east that the Intercolonial Railway, notwithstanding the enormous expenses on capital account which we have been asked to make for several years past, notwithstanding the additions made to capital account and the rolling stock to such a great degree; notwithstanding the numerous and valuable feeders which hon. gentlemen opposite have been acquiring and subsidizing for that road; notwithstanding the large trade which has been developed on the Dalhousie Branch, for example, and by the Inch Arran Hotel; notwithstanding the large and valuable trade from the Nova Scotia refineries—I do not know whether it be a sign of prosperity, that notwithstanding all these, the returns all along the line are such as to exhibit the condition, not merely of not making any profits, but of not paying running expenses. The hon. gentleman denies that, but if that be not shown, it will be because the hocus-pocus system of accounts still holds out. The hon. gentleman will see that he is face to face with this fact: that his railway is certainly not doing very much in the way of paying dividends, and he is turning out the employees by way of retrenchment. I heard, the other day, of one being turned away who had spent twenty-nine years in the service, because the road could not afford to keep him longer. Yet the people of the country are complaining of the rates charged by the railway. The hon. members for Halifax were here, the other day, on a delegation complaining that the tolls were too high, and that, in consequence, the trade of the country is being interfered with, and there has been a large meeting held in Montreal on that subject—but we do not hear much on that question now. Nor have we heard anything as to the arrangements which have been made already, or are to be made in consequence of some other points, which, just at this period of our financial history, are rather serious financial ones for us. The Speech to which the hon. gentlemen have asked us to direct our attention, is not, indeed, a very lengthy document, or a document pregnant with very much information or very important announcements. I must say I think the deficit has rather extended to the Speech. As the hon. Minister of Railways would say, “There ain’t nothin’ to it”——

Mr. POPE. Which speech is that in?

Mr. BLAKE. I refer to the speech which the hon. gentleman is responsible for putting in His Excellency’s mouth, but I do not observe that phrase in it. You find under these circumstances an omission at which I am somewhat surprised. We found, a year or two ago, that the hon. gentleman thought it fit to tell us about a decision of the Privy Council which had, as he conceived, made it necessary for us to legislate. I am not going through the recital just now, of the grievous history of the consequences of the hon. gentleman’s notice in the Speech from the Throne, and the different steps which he took to achieve a success over the Provincial Governments. But we have seen it stated in the papers that there has been a decision of the Privy Council upon that very matter, in consequence of a reference which it was understood, last Session, should be made to that tribunal, and yet to that subject the Speech, certainly not because there was so much to say that there was no room for it, has in the most extraordinary fashion omitted all reference. If it was important enough to be referred to before, why not now? We are to hear of it; we are to hear of it very soon, as my hon. friend from East York, says, “to-morrow.” At all events, we are to hear of it very soon, when the hon. gentleman brings down the bill—not all the bill, because all the bill will never come before us, but when he brings us down the bill for what his steps have cost the country, the account of what is required for reimbursement. I wonder whether my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Everett) would suggest that that should be added to the war debt which he proposes to fund. There is not any more to show for it than there is for the war debt, and I do not see really why we should not pay it out of the Consolidated Fund any more than the debt incurred in the North-West. And so with regard to the Exchange Bank loss, which the hon. gentleman has not succeeded in foisting upon the shoulders of the general depositors in that institution. I suppose we had better fund that, or is it still to appear as an “investment,” as

Mr. BLAKE.

I believe it does now, or is it to be liquidated and added to the debt and put in the bill also, so that we may call it fourscore and settle it in that way. Then the hon. gentleman, being somewhat lacking in material for a Speech from the Throne, might have said something to us as to his intentions in regard to parliamentary action touching the question of the disputed boundary. That is a subject, which, as the House knows, has been pressed on its attention for a good while,—a subject on which the hon. gentleman promised action last Session, and on which the House might have expected to hear something. It is a much more important and interesting question than some of these little things which adorn one of the paragraphs at the end of the Speech. We are to have measures for the establishment, forsooth, of an experimental farm, for expediting the issue of patents—would not the best way be to change the Minister?—and for the amendment of the Chinese Immigration Act; but this grave and serious question of the boundary is not thought worth an allusion. Now, with respect to the North-West, I am very glad, indeed, to observe that some real progress has been made during the year in the building of some branch or colonisation railways. The hon. gentleman who seconded the resolution pointed out to us what we heard a good deal of some years ago, that it would be necessary for the Canadian Pacific Railway to build very largely in branch lines; but most of us who have sat in this House since that time have come to the conclusion that, although there are certain lines which the Canadian Pacific Railway has built itself in the North-West, and although there is one enterprise, at all events, which, with very large aids from us and from the Manitoba Government, it is progressing with, one very important enterprise which it acquired, yet that the general establishment of branch or colonisation lines in that country must depend upon the application of other capital and upon other arrangements. It is, no doubt, deeply the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as it is the interest of the country at large, that this development should take place, but upon that point I wish to make just this one observation, repeating a thing which I have said at least once before, that we should direct our serious attention to the system under which we have been acting with reference to the creation, in almost every case, of an enormous capital account far in excess of the cost of construction, and upon which we shall have to pay, the people of that country will have to pay for all time to come, so far as the railways are non-competitive, a toll. I have always endeavored to press upon your attention, Mr. Speaker, the great importance of keeping down the capital account, above all of the North-West Railways, and the painful experience through which other countries have gone by which we ought to profit. I think we ought still to consider, in reference to the roads to which we have yet to grant charters, some plan by which this may be, if not avoided, at all events minimised. I am pleased to learn that at length it is proposed to grant representation in Parliament to the people of the North-West. That is a subject which has been pressed upon the attention of this House from this side for some time past, and it is fortunate that something should be done in regard to it, although too late. I am glad also to hear a statement that proposals are to be made for providing more satisfactory arrangements in regard to the judiciary in the North-West. These two subjects are of very great consequence with reference to the primary duties, as I conceive, of a free and representative Government towards that country. With regard to the recent outbreak there, of course it is quite plain what the language in the resolution means. It means that we are to do what we have seen in the organs of general information is determined upon, to send out a considerable force to that country. Upon that proposition I shall, at this moment, express no opinion. It is for the Government, who have the responsibility and the means of information as to the actual condition of the country, to present at the proper time such information as the public interest permits, as justifying the proposal. I quite agree in the view, that what is necessary to produce a feeling of security, and the elements of security and a lack of apprehension on the part of those who are there and of those who are to go there, must be done by us at all cost; but it is an unhappy sequel to the doubling of our permanent force there last year, by the increase of the Mounted Police, that we should be told that several hundreds of military personages are also to be placed there for some time to come. It is quite true that, if these are drawn, as we are told by the papers they are to be drawn, from the schools and batteries and so forth, there will be in one way a less expense than if the volunteers were employed; nor would it be possible, except by frequent changes, to establish a permanent garrison of our citizen soldiers in that country. I will repeat, however, this statement, that I retain the opinion that we ought to push the organisation of the militia forces of the North-West; I retain the opinion that the peace of that country ought to be very largely committed to the hands of the settlers of that country themselves, facilitated by proper and liberal arrangements such as are required in a new and sparsely settled country, arrangements even more liberal than are needed to organise an effective regiment of militia in our own country. Now, the circumstances which the Speech alludes to, the statement that the outbreak was so serious and that these are the expected results, are but another proof of the guilt of those who are responsible, as I believe, for that condition of things. I am sorry that such a statement should have to be made, but I am not surprised that that neglect, that delay, that mismanagement with which we charged the Government last year, which we believed and which we still believe to be gross and inexcusable, has produced its natural proof.

"The children born of thee"—

We may say of an hon. gentleman opposite:

"The children born of thee are sword and fire,
Red ruin and the breaking up of laws,
The craft of kindred, and the godless hosts
Of heathen swarming o'er the northern land."

We charged hon. gentlemen opposite last year with high crimes and misdemeanor in this regard. I believe we then proved our charge. I believe that their conduct in the years that followed their late accession to power, was rightly described in a spirit of prophecy by their former colleague, the Hon. Mr. Macdougall, when he truly wrote to one of them, to the Secretary of the Interior in the old Government, with reference to their conduct, prior to the outbreak of 1870, saying this:

"The authority for the Dominion has at length been established over that vast region, and can only be endangered by treason or incapacity at Ottawa. The latter, we know, reigns supreme in every department; the former is more than suspected in your own. When I use the word 'treason,' I desire that you should understand it in its widest sense treason, not to the lawful sovereign of the Dominion, alone, but treason to the people of Canada; treason to the interests, civil and religious, of the people of the North-West; treason to human progress, freedom, and civilisation in every Province of the Dominion."

Those words, I believe, are as applicable to the latter as to the former conduct of the hon. gentlemen. However, I recognise the inconvenience of dealing with this subject at any length at this time and under these circumstances. You know that I pointed out last Session, repeatedly, the absence of various important papers. Although hon. gentlemen brought down what they said was adequate material for the formation of a judgment, they acknowledged that there were many most important papers not yet brought down. I expect the production of those papers at an early date; I expect them, though, with some apprehension and with some misgiving, because I recur once again to that record of a former colleague of those hon. gentlemen, to the letters of Mr. Macdougall, addressed to the then Secretary of the Interior, where he said:

"Before leaving Ottawa"—

He, too, was going to the North-West—

"I took the precaution to obtain copies of all the dispatches, draft agreements, and documents relating to the North-West, which I have since found was a wise precaution. I knew by experience that it would be unsafe to rely upon official promptitude or perspicacity at Ottawa, or to assume that the proper Ministers, or a quorum of Ministers, would be found at the Capital in any emergency that might arise. And I knew, what this case has conclusively established, that you and the majority of your colleagues would not hesitate to garble or suppress important State papers, even when demanded by Parliament, if their production was likely to expose or embarrass the Government."

But it seems that what happened before has, in the case of a much larger insurrection, happened again; and what happened before may, in regard to the important documents, also happen again. As to the condition of the Indians, we must, of course, all be extremely anxious. The accounts we have received from year to year in the reports of the Indian agents, and particularly of the Mounted Police, the accounts in the public papers, the recent statements of priests and missionaries, and, amongst others, the statement of Mr. Jackson, one of the members of the North-West Council, are certainly of a character to attract attention. And I will add to that the statement that I have observed made in a number of ministerial papers as to the course which had been pursued by the Department, of set purpose, with reference to those bands which had been more or less engaged in the recent outbreak, last winter, namely, of administering to them but half rations, and those two or three times a week, which strike me as a most unwise as well as a most inhuman policy. I do not think that any milder words than those can be properly applied to that course of policy—if unfortunately it was pursued—and I draw my information from editorials in the Mail newspaper, which declares that it was the policy which the Administration had pursued. I did not know before that torture by starvation was considered as a proper punishment for Indians. Now, Sir, there is another subject which was but remotely alluded to by one of the hon. gentlemen, and to which I desire to make a very brief allusion—to those steps which it was thought necessary to take for the restoration of authority, and in the execution of law in the North-West. I trust that in respect to the judicial proceedings and the execution of sentences which has been carried out, the Government will, at a very early day, lay before the House full information. I believe that Parliament is entitled, in the exceptional circumstances of the case, to receive that information, and to engage in a discussion of the questions which grow out of that execution and those sentences. I believe that those circumstances justify, if they do not demand that course; but I believe, also, that a fair opportunity ought to be given to the Administration to produce those papers and to give that information. And it has been rumored that some gentlemen, supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, who differ from them on a single question arising out of that execution, propose to introduce that subject to our consideration at this time by challenging the judgment of the House upon it, by an amendment to the Address. Upon this question, as hon. gentlemen may perhaps know, I do not, even amongst my own friends, assume to speak with the authority of a party leader, and certainly, I have no right to offer advice to supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite; but as an humble member of this House, interested in the regular course of the proceedings and in the proper methods of conducting its business, I take leave to deprecate, for my own part, any such proceeding. I believe that the proper course will be, to give the Administration an opportunity of producing the papers, and then to let that subject be fully, fairly, and thoroughly discussed at the earliest date, after the conclusion of this debate, at which those papers can be brought down. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman who is principally responsible, I presume, for the language which has been placed in His Excellency's mouth, paid a recent visit to England, with a view of giving, no doubt, a wholly unnecessary proof of the futility of the arrangements under which he succeeded in having a High Commissioner appointed in order that the Minister might not be obliged to visit England. I say, with that view, because I cannot conceive any other purpose which the hon. gentleman could possibly have had in going to England at the time, and under the circumstances in which he did go. He went there in the middle of a general election, which was quite certain to be followed by a ministerial crisis—at a time when it was perfectly impossible to do business with Ministers, and as I apprehend, and as his courteous answers to those who have discussed the subject with him would indicate, he did not in fact do any business. He might have talked to an under-secretary a little bit, but as to doing business with Ministers it is quite clear that he did not do much. I am glad, however, that he went over, under the circumstances. But it is true that he could not do anything further; it is true that, although public business was not accomplished, although he went where he was not wanted, and left the place where he was wanted, yet fresh honors were heaped upon his blushing brow—he joined the Turners—like another statesman on this side of the continent who also joined the Turners—our well known friend, Hans Breitmann. Well, in the course of these proceedings he made some speeches. In one of those interesting speeches delivered by the Premier when he was on the other side of the water, speeches which we always read with interest, he said that, whatever other people did, he would not make the mistake of praising his country to Englishmen, and he proceeded, having thus vouched for the absolute sobriety of the phrase that he was about to indulge in, to state: first, that we were five millions now and soon would be ten millions; next, that every acre of the Dominion was in a beautiful clime, without any impediment whatever to cultivation—that every acre of this immense area, I cannot remember, I do not know that I could repeat the number of acres, is in a beautiful climate without any impediment to cultivation. That goes even up to the North Pole. He said also in communicating to us information which we are always glad to receive, that we are forming a navy—that we are forming a navy and will assist the mother country in enforcing the peace of the world. If we are forming a navy we should like to know it. We do not want to hear that announcement made in the St. George's Club or in the Turner's Hall, but to hear it in the halls of Parliament, and therefore, if we are forming a navy intended to assist the Mother Country in keeping the peace of the world, the people of Canada ought to have heard the announcement first from the First Minister in his place here. Then, speaking of Canada, he declared that we are ready to join the Mother Country in an offensive and defensive league; to sacrifice ourselves, to risk our last man and last shilling in defence of the Empire and the flag.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. That depends on how many shillings you have got. The hon. gentleman said that Canada was prepared to join the Mother Country in an offensive and defensive league. For my part, I will say frankly, I have hitherto declared it, and I now declare it, that I decline to accept active responsibility for the execution of a policy which I had no share in moulding. I admit that, perhaps, we do not want a share in moulding that policy, and perhaps we could not get a voice if we did want it; but if we have not got a voice and will not take a voice in moulding the foreign policy of the Empire, I think we should not come under liabilities beyond what our own immediate and direct interests and the peace and protection of our own country demand, and that we should not be called upon to expend our blood and treasure in carrying out Jingo schemes whether of Tory or Liberal politicians on the other side of the water. Take almost the last occasion—not indeed the last one, because they come so quickly these English wars—in which we would have been called upon to take an active share—the Soudan war. We sympathised, of course, with the Mother Country in her struggle and trial, we sympathised with the brave soldiers who fought the battles, and we read with deep interest the incidents of the war; but I doubt very much that the great majority of the Canadians agreed in the Soudan policy, agreed in the Egyptian policy of the English Government, or, in fact, agreed that England ought to have interfered there. If we had had a voice in the Imperial foreign policy, that voice would, I believe, have been raised in favor of an entirely different policy; and I give you that as one instance, though a small one. Something was said about Canadian assistance, but the Ministry did not propose—and wisely, as it seems to me—did not propose to come forward and assist the Mother Country, and I presume, on the ground that so long as we had not a share in moulding that policy, we ought not to be called on actively to execute it. The defence of Canada is an entirely different matter. The hon. gentleman said in his speech that we are in no danger whatever from the United States, and, of course, it is very gratifying to learn from the hon. gentleman that such is the case, and I am glad to share his belief. But he entered into la haute politique. He was called upon to declare what our warlike relations with France were likely to be, and he calmed the apprehensions of certain intelligent and well-informed Englishmen who had discussed the matter with him, by telling them that there really was no danger to Canada from France. Why? Not because there was no danger of France seeking to get Canada from us; but because, if there was trouble from active spirits in France, the United States would protect us. We were safe in the hands of the United States, which would not tolerate France on this continent, through it was willing to let things go on as they are. I think myself, and this House will think, that when our First Minister and Plenipotentiary and acting High Commissioner and Chief Superintendent of Indian Affairs and of the Mounted Police and President of the Council enters into the region of la haute politique and gives an account of our foreign relations and of the results of his diplomacy, I really think we should have the declaration here. We should not be called on to learn it from reports in the London newspapers. Until I read the hon. gentleman's speech, I had not the remotest idea that this country was under any danger from France whatever, still less that it was a danger which could only be averted by the friendly and determined action of the United States towards us and against France, because they were determined to allow no nation but England to have any footing on the North American Continent. The hon. gentleman has engaged in England in some very great oratorical tours de force in those various speeches to which I have alluded; and in that respect also, although Hans Breitmann's performances were physical and not mental, he imitated his prototype, for you recollect when the poet relates the history of the great event, which also was celebrated by a banquet, he says:

"Hans Breitmann choined de Turneers,
Nofember in de fall,
And dey dif't a boost in bender,
All in de Turner hall.

"Hans Breitmann choined de Turneers,
Dey make shinnastic dricks;
He stood on de middle of de floor,
And put oop a fifty-six;

"Und den he drows it to de roof,
Und schwig off a treadful trink--
De veight coorn toomple back on his headt,
Und by shinks, he didn't vink."

Such was the performance of the hon. gentleman. He too put up a fifty-six. He took the French invasion of Canada, he threw it to the roof, back it came upon his head, but with the protecting buffer of the United States alliance. He did not wink, not he! There was another interesting element in these utterances of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman, the High Commissioner, and a late member of this House—Mr. Donald A. Smith—appeared together at those social gatherings—tres juncti in uno. They indulged in mutual compliment and congratulation. It was a little surprising to one who remembered their last public appearance in this chamber. At that time they also were together and engaged in a conversation, through the medium of the Speaker, in somewhat slight contrast to the language of the late conversation. Happy change; wonderful recantation. I wonder how, and I wonder why and where. How great the recantation was we can only judge by contrasting the two conversations. As a great many hon. members may not have had the extreme happiness, which some of us enjoyed, of listening to the former conversation, perhaps the House will allow me to read it. On the 9th May, 1878, the hon. gentleman, the First Minister, on the proposed lease of the Pembina Branch, made this statement in the House:

"It was because of the inconvenience to the Government of the constitutional action of the Senate which put a stop to their bargain with the hon. member for Selkirk to make him a rich man, and to pay him for his servile support, that an unconstitutional course was pursued."

Mr. Smith was naturally annoyed at this statement of the hon. gentleman, and on the following day, on the 10th of May, he spoke on the subject as a matter of privilege and denied the charge. Then, referring to the attack made on him by Dr. Tupper, he read an extract, part of which was as follows, from a speech which had been delivered by Dr. Tupper at Orangeville:

"Mr. Smith gave unqualified evidence that the Canadian Pacific scandal had nothing to do with his changed attitude towards Sir John Macdonald. Mr. Smith was a representative of the Hudson Bay Company, and he had been pressing a claim on his right hon. friend for public money. Sir John had been holding back"—

So you will observe that the name of "Old To-morrow" dates from a considerable time back:

"Sir John had been holding back, and Mr Smith came to the conclusion that it would be just as well to jump the fence if there was to be a change of Government. But Mr. Smith was a canny man; he held back, and sat on the fence and watched the course, certainly not in the interest of his country, because he did not want to jump too soon and find he had jumped into a ditch; but when he came to the conclusion that the Government was going out he made the bolt, and he (Dr. Tupper) had no doubt that he had had a great deal of reason since for congratulating himself on having jumped as he did."

"That, said Mr. Smith, is the insinuation and I give it the most positive denial.

Presently says Dr. Tupper:

"Does the hon. gentleman deny that he telegraphed down here that he would be here and support the Government, after he knew everything about the Canadian Pacific Railway affair?"

"Mr. SMITH. I do deny it. I never telegraphed I would be here and support the Government. Never, never. I offered and proposed that there should be another amendment, and a very different one, that is, the Government should frankly confess their fault to the House, and then, if the country condoned it, and Parliament condoned it, it would be a very different thing.

"Mr. TUPPER. That is not what you telegraphed.

"Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

"Mr. TUPPER. That is not what you telegraphed.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

"Mr. SMITH. The hon. gentleman is altogether in the wrong. I telegraphed simply, in courtesy, in reply to a letter, that I would be in Ottawa by the 23rd October. I saw the right hon. gentleman himself in one of the rooms. He sent for me. Mr. Mitchell came and informed me that the hon. member for Kingston desired to see me; and let me say to Mr. Mitchell's credit, that he has got up in many an assembly where I have been and said I was perfectly justified in doing as I did, as Mr. Mitchell knew all the circumstances.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sure he did not.

"Mr. TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman name one single meeting where Mr. Mitchell ever made such a statement anywhere, and where the record of it is to be found, except out of the hon. gentleman's own mouth. . . . And that goes for a very little in this House or out of it.

"Mr. SMITH. On the occasion spoken of I did see the hon. gentleman in the room. I think it was No. 6 or 5, and the hon. gentleman then did try to persuade me to vote for him, but the hon. gentleman will not dare to state I said I could support him. . . . He said: 'If I am not supported now I will appeal to the country.' . . . He must have counted on the whole of Ontario being one great rotten borough—a veritable Old Sarum, as he said that if he appealed to it he would have Ontario to a man with him.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is not one single word of truth in that statement—not one single word of truth. The hon. gentleman is now stating what is a falsehood.

"Mr. SMITH. The hon. gentleman says he did not say so: certainly the spirit within him said it; for the words came out of the hon. gentleman's mouth. (Order). If he did not say so, the spirits within him did. Those words were uttered by the hon. gentleman.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They were not uttered by me.

"Mr. SMITH. They were as assuredly and certainly as the hon. gentleman and I are here. The hon. gentleman from Cumberland the same evening told me that the right hon. gentleman was not capable of knowing what he said.

"Mr. TUPPER. Is it competent for a man to detail private conversations while falsifying them?"

"Mr. SMITH. I do not look upon these as private conversations, and give the exact truth. . . . Will he (Mr. Tupper) deny that he said to me, as soon as it was possible to make the right hon. gentleman understand right from wrong—or to that effect?"

"Mr. TUPPER. If he will allow me five minutes I will show that the very first statement he commenced with to-day, the statement that he never sought a favor from the late Government, is as false a statement as ever issued from the mouth of any man, and he has continued with a tissue of as false statements as were ever uttered by any man.

"Mr. SMITH. I never asked, prayed for, desired, or got a favor from the late Government.

"Mr. TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to tell a favor he asked for? The hon. gentleman begged of me to implore the leader of the Government to make him a member of the Privy Council of Canada. That is what he asked for, and he was refused; and it was the want of that position, and that refusal, which, to a large extent, has placed him where he is to-day.

"Mr. SMITH. The hon. gentleman knows that he states what is wholly untrue, and, driven to his wits' end, is now going back to a journey he and I made to the North-West in 1869, and I give the most positive denial to any assertion made by him, or any other person, that I asked for or desired any favor from the Government.

"Mr. SMITH. He knows—

"Mr. TUPPER. Coward, coward! Sit down.

"Mr. SMITH. He knows—

"Mr. TUPPER. Coward! Coward! Coward!

"Mr. SMITH. You are the coward. . . . Nay, further, there were two gentlemen, members of this House, the day after that 4th November—

"Mr. TUPPER. Coward, coward.

"Mr. SMITH—who came to me with a proposition to throw over the right hon. gentleman and the present member for Charlevoix, if I would consent to give up the position I had deemed it my duty to take in the House the evening before, and would support the Government by voting against the amendment of the hon. member for Lambton.

"Mr. TUPPER. Mean, treacherous coward.

"Mr. SMITH. Who is the coward, the House will decide—it is yourself.

"Mr. TUPPER. Coward, treacherous—

"Mr. SMITH. I could not support them—

"Mr. SPEAKER. Admit the messenger.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That fellow Smith is the biggest liar I ever met."

The messenger was admitted, the record states, and so the conversation ended, and it was resumed the other day in London. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman remains at his post, in charge of the discontented Indians, over whom he acts as a guardian, and those police who, the newspapers tell us, are getting demoralised themselves, as I am sorry to notice. His colleagues from the Province of Quebec remain in their places, but almost all the others of the Ministers have been changed. There is in fact a reconstruction of the Administration—an almost entire reconstruction, a much greater reconstruction than that which took place in the case of a former Administration in the year 1869, I think. That reconstruction was discussed in the debate on the Address, and I propose to have a few words to say with reference to the reconstructed Administration; but before dealing with those who are out and those who are in, I wish, in this connection, to refer to a gentleman who cannot be said to be quite in or quite out. It has been very circumstantially stated that the gentleman to whom I refer, occupies a position something of that kind; that he was offered, of course unsolicited, for I am sure he would never ask the hon. gentleman to make him a Cabinet Minister. But it is stated that the hon. gentleman offered him a seat in the Cabinet—that it was understood, and arranged, in fact, that he should receive a seat in the Cabinet, that he received assurances to that effect, that communications were made to divers persons that Mr. O'Donohoe was practically of the Cabinet, though, for prudential reasons, it was thought better not to announce it publicly. Well, we all know that he has never been gazetted, and that so far as we can learn, has never been permitted to be of the Privy Council. If it be the case that negotiations were entered into with Senator O'Donohoe, even if they did not result in so complete an arrangement as has been mentioned, it is the right of hon. members to enquire for and to obtain information as to the relations of a public man with the Administration of the day, with reference to propositions to join the Cabinet. These enquiries are legitimate, and, as an eminent statesman has said, it is important that such arrangements should be so regarded, that they should not be secret, as such explanations tend to clear the conduct and character of public men, and therefore it is that I enquire what has happened to Mr. O'Donohoe? As to the office of Minister of Railways, we know it was practically vacant from the time Sir Charles Tupper first accepted the High Commissionership. It is true he returned to Ottawa for one Session of Parliament. But for all practical purposes the office has been vacant since that time. At last it is now filled, and I congratulate the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McLelan) on the fact. I congratulate him on that place being now occupied legally, formally, and fully, and there being no longer the same apprehension of the return of the High Commissioner to his former post which the hon. gentleman must have entertained while the place was yet vacant. I congratulate him on the distinction of becoming by succession the leader of his party in his Province. I congratulate him still more on losing his colleague. None of us can adequately appreciate the annoyance the hon. member for Colchester must have felt while he sat beside the High Commissioner, and none of us can adequately appreciate the relief he must now feel at the final severance of his connection with him by the filling of his late post; but some of us know, perhaps, more of his feelings than those who came later into the House. When we remember what the hon. gentleman, in the Legislature of his own Province, said of the High Commissioner, we can judge of the relief he must now feel at his absence. We remember that he described him then, thus:

"But the picture, dark as it is, has something blacker still. I see there, standing in the background, the Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia privately handing over to this same engineer a contract for the whole work. I see him shroud it in darkness, and bury it for three months in the grave of secrecy. And now the Provincial Secretary comes forward and tells us it was so hidden to serve the public interest; to enable Sandford Fleming, after he had taken the contract, to make better terms with the old contractors, to grind a few more dollars out of them! Public interest indeed! Mr. Sandford Fleming's interest alone! Sir, I know not what terms apply to such conduct in a Government—I know not what to call it. I shall not venture an opinion. But in private life it is called extorting money under false pretences; and our laws make it indictable knavery. * * * They have heard of men riding in public conveyances with a loose mantle about them, and a pair of false hands folded in front to lull suspicion, while the real hands were finding their way into their fellow travellers' pockets; and they now think that when the hon. gentleman put on the mantle of Herbert Huntington and the old reformers, the hands he put to the plough were not real—that the real hands were hidden that they might the better get deep to the armpits in the public chest; and they wait, they long for the opportunity to sweep him from his position. Therefore, Sir, there was no necessity to bring this case here to excite public opinion. But, Mr. Speaker, if after having brought it here for investigation in the discharge of a public duty, what if the people should, on examination of it, decide that the public interests have been bartered away and betrayed—that the man whom they once believed in as the apostle of retrenchment has become the great high priest of jobbery and corruption? Who shall then restrain limits to their first indignation as they take him, loaded down though he may be with the share of the offerings which fall to the priest, and impale him upon the horns of the altar at which he ministers?"

Such was the glowing language which inadequately I have endeavored to repeat, which he addressed to his late colleague, the Minister of Railways, when sitting opposite to him in the Legislature of Nova Scotia; and those who did not know it can now, perhaps, better appreciate the sense of relief which the hon. gentleman must feel. I congratulate the Government on their having appointed, after all, a Minister of Railways. As to the Minister of Railways, however, they had some doubts, because, in 1884, they brought Sir Charles Tupper over to conduct the Parliamentary business, and last Session we had a novelty in Parliamentary proceeding—we had a twin speech. It could not be done by the one Minister, but there was a Pope-Chapleau oration which initiated the proceedings. I hope that now, fortified by the actual possession of the office, in which it is said he has been acting for some time, the hon. gentleman will be able, by himself, to attend to those minor matters which remain connected with the office. The Canadian Pacific Railway, we are told, is finished—not quite, since the ships have yet to be got to connect Hong Kong and Liverpool; but it is finished on the land, and paid for, I hope. The hon. gentleman then can, no doubt, discharge the duties which remain. He has his qualifications for the post; he has been a long time in administration. I remember when I first entered Parliament, or shortly afterwards, he was in administration. He was in administration, though in a humbler than his present place, in 1872, when Sir Hugh Allan wrote thus:

"Mr. McMullen was desirous of securing the inferior members of the Government, and entered into engagements of which I did not approve, as I thought it was only a waste of powder and shot."

I have often asked hon. gentlemen opposite who those inferior members were, but they will not tell me; but it appears there were some inferior members with whom engagements were made. No doubt the hon. gentleman is no longer an inferior Minister, and I trust, if there is a recurrence of the same circumstances, there will be no such dispute arising as to his being worthy of powder and shot. At that time his railway enterprise was just about beginning; I think the Megantic line was just about being floated, and there was some question as to how some of the early bonds should be negotiated. It has gone on since by various assistance, by the aid of the country, and, no doubt, of the Minister of Railways. My opinion, in fact, is that he has got into the office of Minister of Railways by the short line route, and is thus best qualified to judge between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the public. We were told last Session that the First Minister had undertaken the task of dealing with the Short Line routes, because of the incompatible position of the acting Minister, but all that time that Minister was dealing with the other party to the bargain—with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—in most important concerns, and private negotiations were going on behind the scenes with those who were to be interested in the Short Line Railway. I hope, under these circumstances, the hon. gentleman has seen to it, whatever else he has seen to, that justice has been done to the proprietary of the Short Line. We have also got a new Minister of Agriculture. My hon. friend the member for London (Mr. Carling) was well qualified for that office. His well-known interest in one of the great cereals of the country was a strong reason why he should be Minister of Agriculture. I have heard him called the King of the Barley Market, and he is also a large farmer; but I regret to see that what sometimes happens to us politicians, that just as soon as we reach a position we abandon the training, which was supposed to be our qualification, has happened in his case. The hon. gentleman has actually, in the interest of London and the Militia Department, sacrificed a large portion of his farm just as he has become Minister of Agriculture. I regret it, because I think the country has felt that the hon. gentleman should rather engage further in agricultural pursuits, instead of selling at an alarming sacrifice a large portion of his farm. If he were still engaged in cultivating it, I feel that the honest tiller of the soil would have greater confidence in him as Minister of Agriculture. That is not all. I am told the hon. gentleman, still in the interest of London and the public, is proposing to sell a large portion of his farm to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and presently the hon. gentleman—who was a large farmer, and so, I felt, had a very proper claim to be Minister of Agriculture—will be a farmer without a farm. I regret this, because I would like the hon. gentleman to retain as many titles to public confidence in his capacity of Minister of Agriculture as possible, but he seems to me to dispose of his titles in a very lavish way. In a few weeks he makes great sacrifices in the interest of his constituency and the public in these transactions, and no one can be surprised, under those circumstances, that he is so popular and strong in his constituency of London. The hon. gentleman has since dabbled in statistics, and we have had a number of statements as to the prospects and operations of the country in the various Departments administered by him. I am glad to see he is so diligent in that portion of the Department to which he belongs. I do not think his predecessor, in all the long years he was Minister, ever gave to the public such an amount of statistics as the hon. gentleman has in a few weeks. This is encouraging, because we have often wanted statistics from the hon. gentleman's predecessor on this floor, and now we are going to get them from the hon. gentleman. We have restored to us the Department of Justice, of which we were for some time deprived. That is a very important department. I always regretted the fact that it left this House, not so much with reference to its strictly ministerial and departmental work, as with reference to the legislative work. There is no doubt whatever that the Minister of Justice ought fittingly to occupy a place in that body in which circumstances seem to demand the vast mass of the legislation of the country should be initiated and receive its principal sifting, and that, as a parliamentary officer, we want him here. The Government felt that, I presume, and they decided they would no longer deprive us of the benefit of that officer, and determining to supply us with that officer, they made the choice they did, I congratulate the hon. incumbent of the office. He enters federal politics, as the French would say, by the great gate; for him there is no apprenticeship in our Parliament. There is certainly a period during which he filled a provincial office creditably, and received certain other training to which I shall presently allude; but, as far as federal politics are concerned, he comes into Parliament as the incumbent of the important office of Minister of Justice, without passing through any apprenticeship in this House. No greater compliment could be paid to a public man. The Government felt the office was important; they felt that no one was available in Parliament and that they had to look outside. We have looked upon gentlemen opposite belonging to the profession which the hon. gentleman adorns, and who,

I supposed, were fitted for the place, as men among whom the choice, if any, would be made; we have not concealed our appreciation of their qualities and abilities to fill that office, but the Ministry scrupulously determining to give us the very best available talent, felt it was necessary to look outside for the bright light which could not be found in the phalanx from Nova Scotia of patient supporters of the Government who have patiently endured many things for a long time to reap this reward. As a lawyer the hon. gentleman has come to the front with a bound over many heads; as a legislator he begins his federal career at once as Minister. It was a bold step, justified, no doubt, by that superior talent which is so soon to be exhibited by the hon. gentleman, and I have very little doubt, from all I have heard, that he will fill the office extremely creditably. But whence comes he? Whence, I say, does he come? He comes from the bench of justice. Who would have thought it? What did hon. gentleman opposite say of a then unhappy gentleman, who thought it his duty to submit the name of a judge for the office of Attorney-General for Ontario. They slanged me—not here, of course, because we do not use slang here—but outside I was slanged in the country in good set terms for many long years for that. I was told that I had degraded the bench, that I had soiled the hitherto unspotted ermine, that I had created a feeling of want of confidence on the part of the people in the judges of the land, that I had rendered it impossible for the judges to conduct impartially the trials of election cases. I had been guilty of unconstitutional and republican practice; I had degraded public morality; I had done a thing which no honest man could do otherwise than condemn. This was the language which was used toward me because I gave that advice which was followed by the elevation of Mr. Mowat to the Attorney-Generalship of Ontario, and it was used towards me by the supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite and by their organs. I remember, in this chamber, the present Chief Justice of Nova Scotia—I remember the Hon. James Macdonald, then filling the office the hon. gentleman now fills, with all the weight and dignity which is due to that position, denouncing me for this act. I remember hearing Sir Charles Tupper, very shortly after it was consummated—for I believe that is the proper word to apply to such an unhallowed deed—using this language towards me on the public hustings:

“He trusted that when a judge came to decide as to which party had a majority, it would not be under a conviction that high political honors awaited him on one side or the other to reward him for his subserviency. (Loud cheers). If ever there was a law which struck a dangerous blow at the independence and purity of the bench, it would be that which would allow the ermine to be sullied by a partisan decision. The moment a precedent was established, and the moment a great Province like Ontario sanctioned the precedent, the dangerous precedent, that a judge might forsake the bench and enter into the troubled and muddy waters of political strife, that moment a blow was struck at the character of the judiciary, and that confidence was shaken which every one ought to repose in those who were called on to perform those high duties.”

Then as to the organs. The Mail on 25th October, 1872, said:

“But, from a higher than a personal standpoint, thinking men in Canada will condemn the new appointment. When once a barrister succeeding to the post as his right [shall I read Thompson or Mowat] when once a barrister succeeding to a post as his right from among the law officers of the Crown, or selected for especial fitness, displayed in the conduct of non-political business, has been promoted to the bench, we in Canada have thought that he put off all political bias, that he flung away with his barrister's gown even the recollection of party struggles, and relegated political preferences to a limbo, whence only history would unearth them. We have thought it the salient feature in that bright record of unspotted ermine which has distinguished the administration of justice in Canada from that of the United States. The action of Mr. _____ will be a rude shock to this faith which has been so blindly and so universally entertained. Latent in his judicial composition under cynical garb or impartiality must have lurked all the old preferences and animosities, and all his warmest sympathies and antipathies.”

“Mr. _____ will have only himself to thank if any of the decisions he has recently given are viewed with suspicion or are actually called in question.”

Again :

"Scratch the judge and the politician will appear? is not a maxim that should gain currency among the practitioners in election cases."

Again :

"The American practice, in short, of making the bench a stepping-stone to a lucrative practice at the bar is one that will find no favor in Canada, and must, as we say, challenge the condemnation of every thinking man. We deal [the organ goes on to say] in another article with the degradation of the Act itself, as well as of the several steps by which it has been reached. It seems to be the peculiar privilege of the faction to outrage all precedent, to shock public morality in every possible way. They have added one more outrage upon decency to the black list, apart from its unbritish and most reprehensible character from a constitutional point of view."

Again :

"Our opinion upon the ruinous tendencies of Mr. So-and-so's return from the bench to the bar has found a ready echo among all classes."

Again :

"The poor defence set up against our charge that Mr. So-and-so was lending himself to the degradation of the Canadian bench when he consented to degrade himself is so weak as to call for no reply. It is republicanism pure and simple."

Again :

"Since the recent abuse of the law's silence on this point, we have no hesitation in saying that the public service requires the passing of an act disqualifying any person now or hereafter elevated to the bench from afterwards practising."

Again :

"The audacity of the move has hidden its worst deformities, the public mind is not yet awake to the enormity of the offence committed from a high moral and social point of view."

Again :

"Who can deny that Mr. _____ has sat on the bench for weeks, while in secret treaty with the representatives of a political party? Did the Governor dare to send for a judge on the bench while any uncertainty existed as to the answer he would give?"

Again :

"The tempter"—

Who was the tempter?

"The tempter may have enlarged on the brilliant prospects of the _____ at Ottawa, and the judge, with ready acumen, may have seen a chance in the possible establishment of a Supreme Court to supplant the chief, of whose pre-eminence he has been so notoriously intolerant."

Again :

"It is a case where breach of custom is breach of all, and that So-and-so had not the strength to say to the tempter 'get thee behind me' will one day come to be a bitter reflection to the opponents of republicanism in Canada."

The day is come, Sir. Again :

"Our experience of the American system has shown us the wisdom and the necessity of guarding against any political interference with a judge. A judge feels that he has entered on a career from which he may not falter while capable of discharging its onerous duties. Ambition often assumes a dangerous form, but never did it establish a more injurious precedent. Now this party is ready to carry the same principles of action into the Government of the Dominion. Happily, however, there is little probability of seeing the judiciary further degraded by the interference of these indiscreet politicians. Public opinion throughout the Dominion unmistakably condemns their introduction of the American system of political government into this country. Hitherto we have been able to point with pride to the incorruptibility and self-denial of our statesmen and the independence and dignity of our judiciary, but we are afraid, with 'so-and-so and so-and-so' in power, at Ottawa and Toronto for a few short years, the public writer would soon have a painful political record to hold up to the censure of the people."

And the Montreal Gazette points out:

"It is clear that, if the action is to be drawn into a precedent, the state of public confidence arising out of the supposed withdrawal of the judge from all interference in politics must be seriously shaken."

Again :

"In this way we have all our preconceived notions of the neutrality of the bench rudely dispelled."

"All the circumstances," says the Mail, "afford conclusive evidence that for several weeks, while still in the discharge of his judicial duties, he was in collusion with prominent politicians to degrade his position and smirch the ermine."

Mr. BLAKE.

Again :

"There is hardly a member, either of the bench or bar, who does not feel that the transaction is an outrage upon the whole profession."

Such was the language, as I have said, of prominent politicians and members of the party opposite, and of their leading organs, applied to the summoning of a judge from the bench to take an important political office; and I ask, were you sincere then? If so, defend yourselves now. Were you shamming then? If so, I will leave you to the contempt of honest men. But here the case is a little more complicated, because political patronage was practically exercised by a judge while still on the bench. The county judgeship of the district was in fact disposed of with a view to obtaining a seat for the Minister of Justice. There has been altogether too much of this of late years. Mr. McDougall got a judgeship for having vacated his seat for Three Rivers on behalf of the Minister of Public Works. Mr Killam got a seat on the bench in Manitoba, in order to provide a vacancy for the Attorney-General of Mr. Norquay, the Prime Minister of the Local Government, and it was announced publicly, in the papers, that he had arranged the business for that purpose. Mr. Baby, an old colleague of ours, was made a judge in order to provide a position for another old colleague of ours in this House, Mr. Mousseau. When Mr. Mousseau had served his day, and the new luminary was to emerge above the horizon, Mr. Mousseau was transferred—I think it was my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Ouimet) who said he was sent down from here to Quebec as first Minister of the Province—so that there might be a vacancy created here for the Secretary of State; and, when he had served his time in that Government, and his usefulness was gone there—to use a phrase which was rendered historical by an event with which he had close connection—he went on the bench in order to provide a political office for Mr. Ross. And so the late member for Antigonish was made a judge to create a vacancy in Antigonish and to give a seat to the Minister of Justice. Mr. McIsaac is an able man, and I have no doubt he will make a good judge, but the practice is a bad one, and, I have no doubt, will, in the language of the organ, be condemned by all thinking men.

After Recess.

Mr BLAKE. When the House rose I was about to allude to the late Finance Minister who has left us in order to assume, for the second time, the Lieutenant-Governorship of his native Province. We all hope, I am sure, that the sinecure to which he has been appointed, will restore him to his former health and vigor. Doubtless the cares and worries of the very important office which he has for some time filled, would have been too much for him in the state of health to which we were aware he was reduced, and it was a reasonable thing that he should be relieved from the cares of office. His disappointment at the failure of his predictions, his regret for the condition to which he had reduced his country, could not but affect him. To him has succeeded an hon. gentleman, the late Minister of Marine, the member for Colchester (Mr. McLelan). Well, Sir, of him we have had experience, as a Minister, for a considerable time, and he has also occasionally filled the position of Minister of the Interior, and that of Inland Revenue. Having had, therefore, an opportunity of judging of his powers as a Minister in more than one capacity, we await explanations of his elevation to the post of Minister of Finance. He will have, however, the great good fortune in that position of being able to attempt to realise some of his former views, and that is always satisfactory to a public man. I recollect very well when I first met the hon. gentleman in this chamber, and when I heard him say some things with reference to the hon. gentlemen who were then opposite to him, and alongside of him, and with reference to the Confederation which they had achieved, and the difficulties his Province would have to surmount in consequence of it; and as he is now in charge of an office, which is specially concerned in the removal, or alleviation of some of those difficulties, we will expect results. I recollect upon the first occasion he addressed the House, I think he pointed out to us what had been said by an hon. member with reference to Confederation. He said :

"The member for Lennox spoke of the great sacrifices which he said the public men of the Provinces made for union. Looking along the Treasury benches at the smiling faces of the occupants, one feels that it must be a pleasant sacrifice, a happy and profitable kind of martyrdom for which, I have no doubt, there was a considerable rivalry. There are two of the offices now vacant; two altars without an offering; but we must not suppose that it is because statesmen cannot be found for the sacrifice, when it is the country only that bleeds, and let us see to what extent. I take a number of the heads of the Departments coming first on the list, and we find the average cost to be $40,000. This multiplied by 13 will show that in the sacrifice spoken of by the hon. member, the country will be bled to the extent of half a million."

I await the hon. gentleman's estimates for the current year, in order to compare his figures with those mentioned on that occasion. Then departing from these minor and departmental details of expenditure, he said :

"But the people of Nova Scotia believed that while an increased expenditure will be made in the general administration, it will bear especially hard on them under the lowest tariff of the confederated Provinces. We raised a larger revenue per head than any of the others; and we see that when our tariff is made equal to the others, we shall be taxed out of all proportion for the maintenance of the General Government."

Again :

"You have included an extent of country that cannot be moved by any one interest or influence, any more than the agitation of one pool can be made to move the waters of separate and distinct pools."

Again :

"When the proposition was made to place our commercial interests under your control for the purpose of developing them, an idea of the ridiculous presents itself, such as one feels when seeing a hen appointed to a flock of ducks, the natural instincts of the one are inland, those of the others on the waters."

But the hon. gentleman has forgot his natural instincts, and has, for some time, been able to drag himself as far inland as Ottawa. He says further :

"The people felt that the proposers of this scheme had become so excited over this idea of a new nationality, a new Dominion, that they would incur expenditures which would largely increase the burdens of the people."

Well, now, the hon. gentleman has seen what has gone on for some years. He has helped or hindered, as the case may be. He is now in a position to control the finances of the country, and we shall expect his Budget Speech garnished, of course, with cradles and orange blossoms, to contain some practical propositions of the retrenchment which he is now in a position to secure. To him, in his ministerial capacity, has succeeded the hon. member for King's, N. B. (Mr. Foster), who, as a principal organ of the Government declared, is to give the Government that peculiar strength—that cold water sort of strength—which Sir Leonard Tilley afforded to it while he was a member of the Government. Perhaps he will. He is a youthful parliamentarian, though, I believe, a veteran orator, and he has passed as a youthful parliamentarian to those benches, the longing for which the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McLelan) so vividly described in the extract I have read. The hon. gentleman helps to preserve that mixture in the Cabinet, which is completed by the conjunction of the hon. member for London (Mr. Carling) and the Hon. Mr. Smith, and which can be so admirably appreciated by the great mixer and compounder of all. We have lost the hon. the late Minister of the Interior, and that is a very serious loss to the First Minister. He took him in as an apprentice into his office; he educated him under his own eye for some time in the office of the Interior; he watched him in the discharge of his duties, as he learned by slow degrees to imitate the masterly inactivity and the wonderful and extreme procrastination of the right hon. gentleman; and as soon as he had thoroughly indoctrinated him in the art of how not to do it, so soon as he had thoroughly satisfied himself that he would be an admirable successor, and would perhaps even better the hon. gentleman's own performances, he appointed him formally to the office. We all remember, that as long as the First Minister himself filled it, we were told that everything was being done most diligently that ought to be done, that nothing was omitted, and that every wish, want and reasonable aspiration of the people was being responded to by that Department. We remember too, that when a change was made, and the hon. gentleman formally appointed his successor in office, it was said there was going to be an improvement on the condition of things which had been so excellent, that it was quite impossible, we supposed, that it could be improved upon. But still, there was going to be an improvement; new blood had got into the Department, new vigor had been infused into it, and there would be a more responsive action on the part of that Department. And we remember afterwards that the customary pæans of praise accompanied the Minister all through his career. We were told that everything was right, that when the lands were removed from the market, that was right; when they were offered for sale to the speculator, that was right; when they were restored again to homesteads and pre-emptions, that again was right. Whatever was done from day to day, was just exactly the right thing. Last Session, when the country turned out to be in a blaze, the hon. gentleman opposite declared that all was right still. He declared boldly that the Government had been guilty of no single act of neglect, of no single act of delay, but had in all things, acted promptly, and with admirable judgment, and upon these things he challenged enquiry, he challenged attack. Indeed, it would have been high ingratitude, if he had taken any other course, since I firmly believe that the late Minister of the Interior was but the echo of the First Minister in the administration of his Department. However, he has left office with, we are sorry to believe, his health impaired. I trust it will be restored by freedom from ministerial cares. I congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite that they still have left to them that most important and eminent proof—as the hon. gentleman declares him to be—of his capacity and judgment in the choice of men for important office—Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney. I share their regret that they have lost the services of Mr. Wilkinson, who has been appropriated by an experienced and extensive contractor whom he is now serving instead of serving the State in the office of registrar. I trust that the hon. gentleman may still be able to fulfil that pledge made in Mr. Wilkinson's behalf and give him the office which he wanted. Of course, it could not be expected that the Government could fill the vacant place of the Interior. They have, however, put in a stop-gap and used the best timber available for the purpose. I am willing to admit that the present Minister of the Interior has some, and some considerable claims upon the Tory party, and considerable qualifications for a Tory Minister. If there is one thing which should give a public man claims on the gratitude of his party it is taking pains to establish the accuracy of their views of public affairs and the correctness of their forecast of public events; and in a notable case the hon. gentleman has performed that valuable service to the party to which he belongs and of which he is so great an ornament. He has furnished proof—proof beyond contradiction and beyond cavil and controversy—of the correctness of their predictions when the Independence of Parliament Act of 1878 was going through Parliament. At that time, the House will remember, the state of the law was such that it had been adjudged that shareholders in incorporated companies were not obnoxious to the penalties prescribed in regard to members who should become contractors with the Government. A new Bill was proposed, which declared that proposition of the law, modifying it, however, with respect to contractors or shareholders in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and this, not an alteration, for the only alteration was an elimination of the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the general law as it had been adjudged: but this definite proposition was attacked in terms, I am quite free to admit, judging by the example of the hon. member for Cardwell, of deserved severity by hon. gentlemen opposite. The First Minister said, referring to the clauses of the Bill, and clause 7, as to shareholders in incorporated companies:

"Hon. members would observe how, under that clause, the whole Act might be evaded so that it would not be worth the paper upon which it was printed. Five men could form a company to construct a work, become incorporated under either the general or a Dominion Act, and might get a contract, they having previously gone to the Government, as individuals, and obtained an understanding that if they formed a company they might get a contract. Every man connected with the contract would thus be the slave of the Government, and, in spirit and in fact, dependent upon the Government as much as if they were not incorporated. There ought to be a provision in the Act in order to prevent contractors becoming the tools of any Government. That could easily be done. It could easily be provided that shareholders in specific classes of companies, such as banking and insurance, were exempted; but that shareholders in companies for purposes of construction, and for selling goods and doing work, with the exceptions indicated, should be excluded just as if the parties forming those companies were acting independently. That suggestion would commend itself to the common sense of the House."

The hon. member for North Simcoe said:

"The 7th section of the Act, he agreed with hon. gentlemen in thinking, was an attempt to destroy the object which it pretended to have in view. Now, was it right that a gentleman connected with a company incorporated for the construction of such undertakings as the Lachine Canal, the dredging of a harbor, the building of a post office or any other work, should be eligible for a seat? Such a principle was an exceedingly dangerous one, and would prove a fruitful source of mischief. It was an affirmation that every person who was connected with a company was entitled to be a member of that House unless he happened to have anything to do with the construction of the Pacific Railway. He did not think any shareholder in a public company, except a gentleman like the member from North York or the hon. the Minister of Militia, who were engaged in the diffusion of knowledge, should, as an interested party, have a seat in that House. There was no reason why advertisements requiring publicity should not be sent to the Globe newspaper, but it would not be right for any member to participate in profits derivable from departmental job printing. Neither was it right that shareholders in banks or insurance companies should sit in that House, though the Government dealings with such incorporated associations were very limited."

The Minister of Public Works (Sir Hector Langevin) said:

"If the hon. gentleman wished to attain the object this clause said he wished to attain, he must go the whole length. He must say 'or any other company in which a member of Parliament shall be a shareholder, and that shall be doing work for the Government, that member shall be excluded from Parliament.' * * * Take the Grand Trunk Railway, the Great Western line, the Canada Southern Railway, or the Northern Railway Company—the managers of these great undertakings might be elected to Parliament. Their officers might also be elected to Parliament, and then these companies could come every year to ask for Acts of Parliament. They were interested in Parliament, more than the Provincial Legislatures. The Local Legislatures did not come here, or very seldom. The hon. gentleman must see that these great companies had a large amount of influence in this House."

You, Mr. Speaker, being then on the floor of the House, said, with respect to the seventh clause:

"With regard to the seventh clause, relating to incorporated companies, it had been proved that this clause, if the Bill passed in its present shape, rendered the whole of the Act nugatory. Any five persons, members of Parliament, who desire to take a Government contract could form themselves into a joint stock company and take the contract without coming under the penalty of disqualification. It was reasonable that members of incorporated companies who numbered their shareholders by the hundred, such as banks, and railway and insurance companies, should not be disqualified on account of any contract entered into between such incorporated company and the Government, but the same principle should not apply to members of small companies, trading firms, limited liability companies, such as were incorporated every day; members of such companies should not be allowed to take contracts from the Government and occupy their seats in this House, while they derived just as much benefit from the contract as if they had taken it in their individual names. In England, and even in this country, a great number of trading firms and partnerships were transformed into companies. His hon. friend from Ottawa, who dealt in lumber, or his hon. friend from Montreal West, might form, with four of his clerks, a joint stock company, under the name and style of "Frothingham, Workman & Co. (Limited)," and supply all the goods this Government might want to an unlimited extent. The seventh clause would have to be entirely remodelled, and made to apply only to incorporated companies, such as railways, banks, and insurance companies, or, perhaps, for the sake of the hon. the Finance Minister, to express companies."

Mr. BLAKE.

Then an hon. gentleman, who has since been translated to the Senate (Mr. Plumb) said:

"The seventh section was the most objectionable that could possibly be conceived. If it was designed in serious earnest to have this Act an effective measure for the purpose for which it was apparently designed, there was nothing easier than the facility with which incorporated companies could be created, and mercantile, forwarding and other associations, even associations having the smallest possible dealings could be formed into companies holding corporate powers; and it was a perfect mockery to say that a man who had been unseated in Parliament because he had carried a vessel load of iron for the Government, could not take two or three friends with him, give them a few hundred dollars' worth of stock in a propeller or steamer, make a stock company, and then take a Government contract. But this was exactly what an hon. gentleman could do under this Bill. If a new title was to be given to it, it should be: "A Bill to facilitate members of Parliament in holding contracts under the Government"; this was the real effect of it."

Those were the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I have already declared that the hon. gentleman has done his party the service of establishing the accuracy of those predictions, and in his own person proving the necessity of the amendment to the law which they failed to pass through Parliament. In another respect, Sir, he has proved his qualifications for lead in the Tory party by showing, in the most formal manner, his assent to the doctrines of hon. gentlemen opposite as to the ethics of political controversy. The proof has been given in his capacity as a journalist, and it is amongst the things most creditable to the hon. gentleman that he has always held up in deserved esteem the honorable profession to which he belonged, and to which I suppose he still considers himself to belong—a profession of as great and probably of greater consequence and influence at this time than that of a legislator; and I suppose he would be the first to spurn for it any lower view, or any meaner or laxer ethics of political controversy, than that which would attach to the politician, the legislator, or the public man. The proofs he has given of his view, are public and well known. They were stated in a public journal thus:

"We have heard a story that before Sir John Macdonald fell in 1873, Mr. D. A. Smith confided his want of confidence to the editor of the Gazette, among other gentlemen; that after the fall, when Mr. Smith was assailed for reuence as to his intentions, the worthy editor was appealed to by Mr. Smith and acknowledged the conversation, and stated his expectation, from what he had said, that the latter gentleman would vote for Mr. Mackenzie's motion. Later on, when the Gazette became virulent against him, Mr. Smith upbraided the editor, and the latter admitted the facts, but stated that party exigencies urged him to the course he was pursuing, i. e., slandering Mr. Smith.

"In reply, Mr. White, in the Gazette, said: 'We have simply to say that there is not a word of truth in the statement—that it is manufactured out of whole cloth. The editor of the Gazette never had any conversation good, bad, or indifferent, with Mr. Smith in relation to his conduct in 1873. Mr. Smith never upbraided the editor of the Gazette, and that gentleman never made any such admissions as are referred to.'"

Upon that, a letter was written by Mr. Smith to the editor of the paper which made the charge, and that letter contains these passages:

"The facts of the case under dispute are, in the main, as stated in the Herald, though I can quite understand that in the multitude of his political affairs, Mr. White may have forgotten the conversations between us, and the visit of Mr. George Stephen and myself to his office, made in consequence of reflections on my political character, which appeared in the Gazette, and the admissions he then made. He declined to make a correction, and excused it on the ground that journalists were sometimes compelled, by political exigencies, to write in disregard of those considerations by which, under ordinary circumstances, they would be guided.

I entirely concur in the above.

DON. A. SMITH.

GEO. STEPHEN.

“ London, 16th December, 1880.”

I think, Sir, I have verified for the hon. gentleman the second claim which I freely accord to him his fitness for his trusted and elevated position in the party to which he belongs. I admit also that he has special qualifications for the particular office in the Ministry to which he has been elevated. We know that grievous complaint has been made for some time by the people of Manitoba and the North-West as to the effect of high duties upon that country, and the hon. gentleman has given us the advantage of his views as to the remedy for those grievances. We know that, in 1873, he formulated his views thus :

“ A 15 per cent. tariff means more than 15 per cent. protection to manufacturers. There is the cost of the transport of goods from the other side of the water, which amounts, on an average, to, at least, 5 per cent., so that there is now a protection equal to 20 per cent. That ought to be sufficient for any industry suited to the country; and, as to others, it would be unwise to attempt to sustain them by fiscal props.”

There is another special claim which the hon. gentleman has of fitness for his position. You know how the people of Manitoba complain, and have complained, of railway monopoly, and of the action of the Dominion Government in depriving them of freedom of railway communication; and you also remember—for it has been frequently quoted in this House—the statement the hon. gentleman made when the Canadian Pacific Railway contract was going through, as to its effect, or rather its want of effect, so far as Manitoba was concerned, as to the Province being perfectly free, and, therefore, he is just the man to vindicate the rights of Manitoba in that regard. There may be many other things as to which his views may not be so acceptable to the people of Manitoba. They think they have some hardships to complain of, while we all remember that he told us that they are rather more spoon-fed than otherwise. I am afraid I have not exhausted the list, but I hope that the hon. gentlemen I have overlooked, if I have overlooked any, will not suppose that I refuse to them the compliments I have paid their colleagues; but even as far as I have gone, I think it will be admitted that the changes in the Administration, whether by resignation or by removal, or by addition or by transfers of offices, are very large, very numerous and very important. In my opinion, the Ministry is less worthy, if possible, of confidence than it has been at any former period; but I have no doubt, Sir, that the majority will say that the Ministry as it was, was the best possible Ministry except the Ministry as it is. That, I have no doubt, is the opinion of the majority of this House. From that opinion there is but one appeal, and I hope we may soon have it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, with every regard for the hon. gentleman and for his statements, I venture to have a doubt as to the veracity of the last statement—that he is anxious to go back to the people. I am quite satisfied that in the inmost recesses of his heart it is the last thing he would like at this moment. I am satisfied that he knows—and he has so committed himself—that he has played so fast and loose between Upper and Lower Canada, between Quebec and Ontario, that in the case of an election taking place to-morrow, he would find that in Upper Canada his attempts to coquette with Quebec would lose him the confidence of his own section of the Dominion, without gaining him the confidence of any other part. Mr. Speaker, we were summoned here by the representative of our Sovereign for the transaction of business. We have come here to perform a solemn duty. It is the duty of a Government to introduce and to press such measures as they think it is for the benefit of the country to be introduced and to be pressed. It is the duty of those who agree with them to give them a cordial and united support, and it is equally the duty of those who are opposed to the Government conscientiously to raise such objections as they think just, to the course of any administration or legislation of the Government. But it is also the duty—the recognised duty of an Opposition, of every Opposition, to sink party and personal conflict, when they can do any good by co-operating with the Government, co-operating with the majority of the day, for the good of the country, and for that reason it is an understood principle in England, a principle which has obtained there since representative government in modern times has prevailed, that there ought to be something like good feeling between the majority and the minority, and that while conscientiously, openly and boldly, offering opposition to such measures as we disapprove of, we should endeavor to have something like gentlemanly intercourse and good feeling across the floor. I would ask you, Sir, and I would ask this House and through this House the country, if the speech of the hon. gentleman from that point of view will not carry with it its own condemnation. I suppose, Sir, he is a good Christian, an evangelical Christian, and, therefore, bound to have a Christian feeling towards all his fellow men. But, I would ask you, Sir, if the hon. gentleman has not, without purpose, without provocation, without benefit or advantage to any man or woman, without advantage to any interest, but to the great disadvantage of the progress of public business and of the public good, attempted, in a mere malignant desire, to wound people's feelings, in an unchristian, ungentlemanlike, and unparliamentary desire to set section against section, individual against individual, man against man, to rake up these old stories and these old quarrels. For what good could possibly be expected from the course the hon. gentleman has taken? Why, Sir, it is because he had not anything to say against the Speech from the Throne; he had not anything to say in answer to the very statesmanlike speeches of the mover and seconder of the Address, and so he had carefully to gather up this garbage and this record of old quarrels and old disputes long forgotten, in order to divert the attention of this House and this country from the feebleness of any attack that he could make against the Government, against its legislation or against its administration. The hon. gentleman has come back from England with renewed health and vigor; he has taken his position as leader of Her Majesty's Opposition, and he has shown that he has recovered that health which we were sorry to see, at the end of last Session, had somewhat failed; but while he has been restored to good health, the old temper and disposition have remained. The hon. gentleman went home to England; I went home to England. He finds it a great fault that I should go home to England, and that I should receive some little attention from some of my political friends in England. He brings it a charge against me that I dined with the members of a club of which I myself was a member, on which occasion I made a speech. The hon. gentleman went home to England and he made a speech—

Mr. LANDERKIN. We are proud of it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I dare say the hon. gentleman is proud of it. But the hon. gentleman thought my speech at the St. George's Club was worthy of some remark, and he spoke about my exaggeration, when I said that every acre in the Dominion of Canada was in a healthful climate; the hon. gentleman foisted in the word “ beautiful.” If the word beautiful is in my speech as reported, I never used that word. I spoke of the Dominion of Canada being a beautiful country, and so it is, notwithstanding the disparagement of the honorable gentleman. I spoke of the country as fit for the settlement of Englishmen, Irishmen and Scotchmen, and so it is, notwithstanding the speeches of the hon. gentleman, which sent so many to Kansas and other parts of the United States. I spoke of the climate of Canada; I said up to the North Pole—aye, Sir, from the boundary line to the North Pole, be the climate frosty or genial, or be the soil fertile or unfertile, there is no portion of the Dominion of Canada that is liable to the malignant fevers which exist in other countries. We have no Texas fever in Canada; we have no Kansas complaints; our very animals seem to be protected by Providence from the diseases that ravage the herds and flocks of other countries. It is the style of the hon. gentleman, as it is of those who support him, to take every opportunity to lessen the reputation and the position of Canada in the world. Sir, I spoke the simple truth when I said that every acre of the Dominion of Canada had a healthful climate, which man, woman and child could emigrate to and could prosper in. The hon. gentleman also alluded to my over-patriotic views. He intimated, in fact, that I was kotouing to the Mother Country—seeking favor there by saying that Canada would expend her last man in the defence of the Empire. I know that hon. gentleman would not be one of those who would spend his shilling or put his musket to his shoulder for that purpose, no more than the hon. member for Centre Quebec (Mr. Laurier) would do so; I know neither of them would do so; and they laugh, I dare say, in their sleeves at my quixotry in saying that England, in case of distress, in case of danger, in case of the perils of war, would find Canadians ready to do what they could to back the sovereignty of England. But, Sir, my speech was not simply an expression that we would spend our last shilling and our last man. My speech was in favor of having such an arrangement between the central United Kingdom and all the colonies—having an arrangement made by which the auxiliary kingdom of Canada and the auxiliary kingdom of Australasia should together form one great empire, and by uniting their forces, by uniting their men and their money, should together be so strong as an empire that they would control the world in arms. That was my statement; I have made it in this House; I have made it in former Houses. Wherever I have had an opportunity of speaking on that subject, I have stated that the future of the Empire of Great Britain depended upon a close and intimate alliance between the central power and the dependencies, the auxiliary kingdoms; and, Sir, I believe if it were put to the electors at the polls in the Dominion of Canada—if they were polled, men and women—and on that point the women ought to get the franchise, because they would be the most loyal of all—the hon. gentleman would find that he would be in a miserable minority if he proposed to draw back from any well organised scheme by which the Mother Country and the children kingdoms were united in one great force to maintain the civilisation of the world—to maintain the superior civilisation of those people who are contained within the bounds of the great Empire to which we are proud to belong. The hon. gentleman also tried to get a cheer by stating that I said the French would not come here because if they did we would appeal to the United States to protect us. I said no such thing; that was a garbling of what I stated. What I stated was this: that in consequence of sensational articles that were published in England, emanating from the press of the United States, apprehensions prevailed in England—that fostered by these articles distrust was raised in the minds of the English people, the English Government and the English Parliament. I found when I got to England that they had made some impression on the minds of the people there. They said: "Is it true what the New York Herald and other papers say, that the French Canadians are going to rise in arms, that they are watching an opportunity of severing their connection with Canada and that no dependence can be placed on their loyalty?" I took upon myself, from a knowledge of 40 years of the French Canadians, to deny that statement. I stated then that there was no portion of Her Majesty's subjects, no matter what their origin or their language might be, more loyal to this Empire, more loyal to the Crown of England, than the French Canadians; and I stated further, in answer to the apprehension that was entertained and expressed, again and again, in some of the English press, that even if the French Canadians were loyal, even if they did not desire to sever the connection between England and Canada, yet that at this moment the French republic were seeking colonies restlessly, opening, new and extensive, a restless and an aggressive colonial policy, there was no need to fear that France would attempt to intrigue with the French Canadians, because French statesmen know too well, from the experience they found in Mexico, when Maximilian came over, with a generous but mistaken ambition, to found a State in Mexico, what the consequence was. The United States said to the French Government: "You must retire; no European monarchy can get a new footing on this continent; no European Government can come in this North America. That was the Monroe doctrine, and the knowledge of that would prevent the possibility of the French Government or Frenchmen, instigated by the French Government, trying to intrigue and raise a spirit of disloyalty which is now un-existent among the descendants of Frenchmen happily living in Canada. That was the language I used, and I must ask my French Canadian friends, those opposed to the Government as well as those supporting it, if I do not express the sentiments of the French Canadians. Certainly, I may not express the sentiments of one of them, the hon. member for Quebec.

Mr. LAURIER. Order; the hon. gentleman has no reason to impute to me such imputations as he does.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I impute no imputations.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, you are charging me with disloyalty.

Mr. BOWELL. You said you would take up arms.

An hon. MEMBER. He stood his ground, he did not run away.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, he never went ahead or returned; that is all the difference. Now, I have defended, in my humble, feeble way, the remarks I made in England. I do not believe they are misapprehended by those who do not wish to misapprehend them; they are so plain they could not be misapprehended. There is one quotation the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) made, which is evidently a mistake, when he said I declared we were forming a navy. I said we were forming an army, but certainly not a navy. We have formed an army of citizen soldiery who have shown they are an army fit to rank and march side by side with the forces of England. But while the hon. gentleman insinuates that my speech was extra-loyal, extra-effusive, and far too patriotic, in the English sense, I cannot make the same charge with regard to his speech, near Edinburgh, when he was the guest of Lord Roseberry. No such charge can be brought against him. True, he told them that politically we were far in advance of them; that we had adopted a liberal, radical system in Canada, which they were fondly hoping to imitate bye-and-bye. But, in that long and eloquent speech, and I read it with much pleasure, because it accurately stated man instances in which Canada, in its legislation, free as it is or the trammels of an old conventionality and an old monarchy—

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—had made advances in many questions which still remain difficulties to solve in England. But not one word did the hon. gentleman use about the advantages of this country to the overburdened classes of England; not one word did he say holding up in any way the advantages which Englishmen, our fellow-subjects, could gain by coming here and settling in our vast North-West. Oh, no; that would have been rather in contradiction to the speeches which he made so eloquently the other way, and which were considered so valuable that they were published by the land speculators of the United States with a very handsome frontispiece of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman, as I have said, finding very little to remark upon in the Speech, said there was not much in it; but if you will look at the substance, you will see there is very little froth and a good deal of practical legislation in the Speech, if the hon. gentleman, or rather if the followers of the hon. gentleman can only persuade him to forget personalities and direct his great mind to legislation. He said we ought to have met earlier in the season. Well, we did put off meeting a little, there is no doubt, but then there are limits to human endurance. The persistence of hon. gentlemen opposite kept us here six months instead of three. Now, we are not all born with silver spoons in our mouths, some of us have business at home, and surely it was not too much, if we were kept six months from home, to get something like six months at home. But besides this, there was the hope of the expectation that the negotiations with the United States Government on the subject of a joint commission not only to look into the fishery matter, but to take up the larger question of reciprocal trade, might have made such progress between the 4th December and now as to enable us to enter into negotiations, to bring down early in the Session a measure based on those negotiations. Speaking of that commission, the hon. gentleman truly said I was never more surprised than last Session, when we were attacked for making that arrangement with the United States, and told there was no use in it. I think the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) was particularly eloquent on that point.

Mr. CASEY. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says now that the moment the notice was given that the treaty was to be ended in two years, negotiations should have been commenced again. Sir, there is a degradation involved in that proposition, which will meet with the indignant objection and refusal of the people of Canada. Had not the Government before 1873, and had not the Government of 1874 gone to Washington, and almost on their knees asked for a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty? Had we not perhaps compromised our dignity as a free people in doing what we did for the sake of commercial advantage? But the more we did, the more humbly we bent our heads, the more that with subdued eye and bated breath we prayed them to open their markets to us, the more contumeliously we were treated, and at last we were almost forced to the conviction that there was no use by degrading our manhood to try to get the United States to do what they were resolved not to do. And only fancy, there was the Congress of the United States; there was the Senate, a branch of the executive as well as of the legislative power, joined with the popular branch in giving notice to England that they must end that treaty. The notice was given and they must have meant something by it; and the moment they had solemnly stated that they would not have a treaty at any price, the moment that they had authorised the President to give notice to the sovereignty of England that they would not have it, fancy that, at that moment, we should have gone, without any hope or expectation of being able to succeed, to say to them: "You have given this notice; you do not mean it; take it back; agree to a treaty, and pay us five millions more." That was the suggestion made from the other side.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, it was the suggestion made just now by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; he said we should have attempted to renew the treaty the moment the notice was given. That is what he stated this very day, an hour ago, in the presence of the House; and only fancy our going to the Government that had accepted the denunciation of the treaty. The President, if he had chosen, might have refused to give effect to the resolution, but he did not do so; the executive and the legislative power combined in ending that treaty, and the folly and the meanness of our going to ask for what we could not reasonably expect to get was too obvious for a Tory Government, at all events, to countenance. And besides, do we not know that the whole hope of Mr. Blaine, the Secretary of State for the United States, to get elected lay in getting up a war feeling against England; do we not know how his own State of Maine was opposed to a renewal of the fishery treaty; how he had pinned his faith and his hopes of success in the presidential election upon the purely American, that is the anti-British feeling, that he was trying to pump up. And I can tell the hon. gentleman—it is no secret—that Her Majesty's Government as well as the Canadian Government thought it was the most inopportune time in the world to go to the United States to try, to make the futile attempt, to renew the treaty just before the presidential election, when each party was frightened of the other, when the Democratic party dared not declare that they were in favor of free trade or in favor of reciprocity. Why, both parties were so bound up in trying to prevent any expression or any resolution that would offend any great interest during the election that we were told, and we knew, we did not require to be told, that it would be worse than folly, it would be courting defeat to attempt to make any arrangement until after the election was over, and that then we could appeal with some hope to the powers that be, the powers that would be after the election. And so, Sir, the moment the new Government was formed we opened communications with the Government of the United States, and we did so in a manner which I think was in a great degree successful, for the early and favorable consideration, by the President and his advisers, of the proposition; and that was that we stated to them we wanted to be good neighbors; that the American fishermen were aware that the treaty was to end on a particular day, that they would be fitting out their vessels for the season's fishing in March or April, and they would find on the 2nd July that their vessels would be liable to be seized and their year's catch to be lost, and that would create such an irritation as to greatly endanger the pleasant relation which had existed for many years between the United States and Canada. The offer was a neighborly one; it was felt to be a neighborly one, and was warmly reciprocated by President Cleveland and the Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard; and the Government of the United States, the President and Secretary, have faithfully carried out their pledge to lay before Congress a pressing message, asking for the appointment of a joint commission, not only to settle the question of the fisheries, but to consider the much larger question of the development and increase of the international trade between Canada and the United States. It is no fault of the President; it is no fault of ours, that Congress or the Senate has apparently made up its mind that no commission shall be issued. It is no fault of ours, and I dare say it is a matter of regret to the President that his strong and urgent representation has met with the fate that it has. But the fact that it did so, the fact that, even under these favorable circumstances, we have been told that we shall have no joint commission to consider a reciprocal treaty of any kind, fisheries or any other subject whatever, shows how futile and foolish it would have been to have humiliated ourselves in the last three, four or five years, when under even these favorable circumstances we are told we are to have no commission. But, unless by the unwise and factious speeches of hon. gentleman opposite during the present Session, unless from something proceeding from here, we have still hopes. We have yet no right officially to declare that there will be no commission, because so far it is only a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate. No action has been taken by the Senate itself or by the House of Representatives. We may have an opinion on the subject, and I have no hesitation in stating my opinion that that action of the committee is decisive, but, as it is a matter of international concern, we have no right to say so until it is communicated to us in some official manner by the Government of the United States. But I say that, unless by some unwise or factious language in this House, or out of this House, by a factious and unwise press, the Americans are told it is of so much consequence to us that, if these advantages are refused to us, if reciprocity is refused to us, we will eventually fall into their arms, I have very considerable hopes that the Morrison Bill, if not in its entirety, in many of the most important articles mentioned in it, will be carried by the independent legislation of the United States. I believe there is a great pressure from the central portion of the United States to have free trade, or rather to take off the duties on very many articles which Canada can supply. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman took occasion, and it was not very courteous in the leader of a party to a new member, to sneer and to elaborate his sneers, at the speech made by the mover of the resolution. He stated what everybody knows, that a good many firms in the country, a good many industries, have failed for want of sufficient capital, and he made merry about that. The Globe and the Opposition press, whenever a blacksmith shop is closed, because the man has not capital enough to make a sufficient number of horse shoes, point to the fact as a proof of the failure of the National Policy. They gloat over it; they rejoice over it. Whenever an industry in any place, be it a village or be it a town, has failed to produce the result expected by its promoters, you find it flourished in the newspapers as a proof of the failure of the National Policy. Why don't the hon. gentleman come out then, and move in favor of free trade? Why don't they come out like men? Let them bring down a resolution to this House; let them have the courage of their conviction, and state that the National Policy has been a curse, that it has been a delusion and a snare, that the prosperity of Canada will never be ensured unless we return to the old ways of free trade and a simple revenue tariff. We will have some respect for the sincerity of the hon. gentlemen who take that course. But I defy them to do it; I dare them to do it. They will sneer and rejoice at the failure of the National Policy, but they will not venture to state by a solemn resolution that free trade is the panacea for all the evils from which Canada is suffering. Mr. Speaker, in the very discursive and desultory speech made by the hon. gentleman, I cannot well follow him. The most of it was irrelevant, the most of it was out of place, and much of it did not tend to promote harmony in this House, or the good feeling between parties which ought to exist. Why! the hon. gentleman has raked up everything. He has gone back to the speeches of the Hon. Wm. Macdougall. It is a new thing to see that hon. gentleman quoting him. Why! I thought he was the abandoned man, but any stick is good enough to beat a dog with, and so he must quote Mr. Macdougall, a man who has been denounced as altogether abandoned, and if abandoned altogether, as unworthy of credence—unworthy of quotation. He takes that up, and he quotes

a pamphlet written, under feelings of great personal annoyance, by Mr. Macdougall. Then the hon. gentleman goes on to quote mere rumors—anything in a newspaper is good enough. He says that the Indians, he understands—he sees in the papers—are fed on half rations and are starving, and that he never understood before that the proper punishment was torture by starvation. Now, that kind of language will get into some of the papers, it will be read by some of the literate whites to the Indians; and the hon. gentleman can quite understand how language of that kind may be used to create a disturbance of the public peace. But I remember when, year after year, it was our duty to come down to Parliament with votes asking for money to feed the starving Indians, after the buffalo was swept away from the plains, and ceased to be the food of the Indians. How we were attacked for our extravagance; how we were told that a number of idle agents were appointed simply for the purpose of providing for political hacks, that we were wasting and plundering and throwing away the money of the country. I stated then, as I state now, that we could not, as Christians, allow these poor Indians to starve, but that we were not to pamper them, nor render them still more idle and unwilling to work than all Indians are; that when we found Indians loafing about the different stations, we could not allow them to starve. Sometimes the Indians will surround a police station, or an Indian station, or a land office, and they will deliberately say: "We will die, we wont go"; and such is the endurance of the Indians that they will hang about, and from mere humanity the officers of the Government are obliged to open their stores and feed these men to keep life in them. That, Sir, we did; and that policy we will continue until it is reversed by the order of Parliament. To the Indians who go upon their reserves we give food until they are able to support themselves, but we reduce them to half rations when they are simply wandering and demoralised Indians, who come not only to be fed themselves, but who bring their women to be a means of profit by prostitution. When these people are hanging about the Government stores and offices, we reduce them to as low a ration as is sufficient to keep life in their bodies; but we tell them: "Go to your stations and we will give you food to take you there, and you will get full rations until you are able to support yourselves." And they have the means, under their treaty obligations, if they are on the reserves, to raise roots for their sustenance, by a little exertion amongst themselves. When they are on the reserves they are fully fed, and better fed than they ever were, even when the buffalo ran across the plains. At that time it was either a feast or a famine. The buffalo food was good a portion of the year, but for another large portion of the year the Indians were starving and had to be fed by the Hudson Bay Company and traders who were competing with that company. So, Sir, this charge, this insinuation, was unjust, like most of the statements made by the hon. gentleman, gathered, as they have been, from a press sometimes unfriendly, especially known to be in the interest of white men, who are anxious for their own individual and sordid advantage to continue that state of disorder, or rather the state of unrest and disquiet that exists in the North-West. We have said in the first paragraph of the Speech, that it would be our duty to see that sufficient protection is given to the settler. We will do so, and, perhaps, to a greater extent than real necessity warrants. But, Sir, when we hear rumors started of risings, rumors of plots in the United States, rumors of arms coming across the lines, rumors started for, as I said, unworthy purposes, and promoted in order to excite the fears of the people—when we find that, we must be overcautious, for, although we may disbelieve many of these reports, we would be blood-guilty in fact if, from a mere haughty confidence in our own opinion, we should utterly disregard the threats, and the rumors, and the warnings we have got from various sources. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman went on at some length to discuss the reconstruction of the Government, and the hon. gentleman talks about Mr. O'Donohoe. Well Mr. O'Donohoe is a very good man and is now a Senator. He was very near being in the Government. But I will say this for Mr. O'Donohoe, that he did not desire to be a weakness to the Government, and at the time he might have claimed a seat in the Cabinet he found that such was the hostile feeling towards him that instead of being a strength to the Government he would be a weakness; he admitted the fact, and he took a seat in the Senate where he now is. But the hon. gentleman says he does not know whether Mr. O'Donohoe is in the Government or not, that perhaps he is in and perhaps he is out, that he may be hanging between the two. Why, we have seen the hon. gentleman himself in that position. He was a dissolving view, sometimes we did not know when he was a Minister and when he was a consulting ex-Minister. We did not know, for the hon. gentleman would retire to the back seats, look very solemn and sulky, and he would suddenly, by some magic touch of the present member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), pop up like a jack-in-the-box as a new and freshly blown Minister. The hon. gentleman has alluded to Sir David Macpherson. He is away, sick. The hon. gentleman did not always find it so safe to abuse him when Sir David was able to reply. I dare say, thanks to the rest he has got, he will be able to publish other pamphlets. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) in that kind of controversy has, not in the past, gained much by his attacks, and I can assure him that if the hon. gentleman comes back with the same strength, he will not find much advantage accruing from his last ungenerous attack. The hon. gentleman sneers at the present Minister of Agriculture because he is a brewer and a dealer in cereals and because he sold his farm. He has sold his farm, and I hope he has done well with it. There can be no doubt that any sale made has been honestly made, and I am quite sure that everyone who knows honest John Carling will not believe that he has ever been guilty of any dishonest or di-honorable practice. The hon. gentleman could not even allow the present Minister of Justice to pass unnoticed. The hon. gentleman said he is a new-comer, one who has vaulted into the citadel at once; that the bright light which surrounds him was such that he was selected beyond all other men in Nova Scotia, although he was without any previous experience or a seat in Parliament. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was in the Government at that time or not—he was in and out so often—but when Mr. Mackenzie was head of the Government there was another bright light brought in—Mr. Vail. And that gentleman was brought in over the heads of all older Nova Scotians to take the office in which he so distinguished himself—the office of the Minister of Militia. So that really, I think, having had such a precedent set us and having such an example of the success of the precedent, I may, perhaps, be pardoned if I have taken a lesson and leaf out of my enemy's book and played the same game and brought a bright light from the Province of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman has read the attacks made upon the appointment of Mr. Mowat. The hon. gentleman admits that he made the appointment, and that he was greatly attacked for it. True, he was attacked for it. It was a new thing at that time; but we have seen it followed up since. We have seen, for instance, a relative of the hon. gentleman leave the bench and come down to practice and become a stump orator and get in a fair way for coming to Parliament and, by the same token, use rather unparliamentary language with respect to myself. But then he is an evangelical Christian; his heart is full of everyting like Christian charity, and, therefore, it must be considered in the exercise of that same charity to attack such a great sinner as myself. Then, again, the hon. gentleman talks of using the judicial offices for Government exigencies. Look back and see the venerable figure of Hon. E. P. Wood, and think for a moment of that gentleman. He was first induced basely and treacherously to desert his leader and colleagues in the Government; then, as he stated himself to 100 men, who will swear to it, he was promised a seat in the Administration; and then because that promise could not be fulfilled, because the Liberal party rose as one man against his being appointed, he was made Chief Justice to administer justice impartially in the Province of Manitoba,—a man whom the hon. gentleman knows had been bribed to turn his coat against his leader and colleagues and whom he knew was unworthy from that very fact of being a judge. He was sent up there. With all these examples before us, I think we can scarcely allow only Grit judges to be appointed to good positions. Fontenelle, a French writer and philosopher, was attacked once by a friend for being so foud of good living. "Why," said Fontenelle, "you think Providence made all the good things of the world for fools." Does the hon. gentleman think that all these good offices are made for fools? that all these good offices are only to be given to Grit judges? No. There was a vacancy caused by the retirement of Sir Charles Tupper. The hon. gentleman states truly that it is of great advantage to public business that the Minister of Justice should be in the House of Commons. I looked out in Nova Scotia, where the vacancy existed, for a lawyer who could fill that position creditably, and I found him in my hon. friend; and if he were not here at this moment I might enter more fully into the fact of his fitness, but I believe that even the hon. gentleman and hon. gentlemen opposite will admit before the session closes the correctness of my selection and choice. But the hon. gentleman, following up his usual desire, as exhibited in this speech, to set man against man and neighbor against neighbor, has tried to raise the jealous feelings of other legal men in this House, and has said: "This is a new light brought in and other gentlemen are passed over." I can fancy the scorn that exists in the breasts of those gentlemen with respect to this unparliamentary conduct, which is a gross attempt to arouse the jealousies of other men. And so it was said with respect to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He said he, too, was a young man, and he had been put over the head of others. So far as the country is concerned, all that the House and the country want, is that fit men should be appointed to office. I believe that in selecting those two gentlemen we have selected fit men; and as regards the others what the hon. gentleman said was mere persiflage; and should this discussion be renewed in proper form and on the proper occasion, I shall be glad, and I am sure I shall be able to defend the present construction and the re-construction of the Government, and to account for that reconstruction. I regret deeply the tone in which the hon. gentleman has spoken. I regret that owing to his natural acerbity, owing to his temper, or rather to his want of temper—the want of the milk of human kindness in his breast—he has taken the course that he has taken. It is a course which I am sure will not redound to his credit in the country, but will mark, as many of his other acts have marked, his utter want of a knowledge of human nature, of a knowledge of how mankind, as a whole, will receive any attempts of that kind, to set up neighbor against neighbor, and friend against friend, and to stir up division and strife among them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have to call attention on this occasion, not by any means for the first time, to the remarkable histrionic powers the First Minister has exhibited. It is said by the admirers of Mr. Gladstone, that they are willing to back Mr. Gladstone against any man of his years in England to cut down trees, but I think the admirers of the present venerable father of the House—because I believe the hon. gentleman has attained that distinction—I think they could fairly back him against any man, not only of his years, but any man in Canada, either for turning a summersault or executing a double-shuffle, or capacity for devouring his own words, or ability to turn his back upon himself in any conceivable fashion or way. Now, Sir, I can recollect exceedingly well a good many illustrations of this remarkable faculty, this mental agility which the hon. gentleman possesses. I recollect at an early time in the formation of this Confederation we were told that we were now preparing to tread in the footsteps of English statesmen and economists, whom the hon. gentleman always desired then, as he says he desires now, to imitate. I can recollect very well in the earlier period of this Confederation the hon. gentleman issuing some most admirable state papers, in which he defined, with great clearness and precision, the duties of the Central Government and the Local Governments; and most of us have since had frequent opportunities of seeing how completely the hon. gentleman can violate all those admirable precepts which he then so lucidly laid down. I desire to call attention to a speech which he made very recently in England, and as he accused my hon. friend beside me of misquoting him, I will take the trouble to read exactly what the hon. gentleman said, as reported by an organ which certainly does not design to misrepresent any of his utterances. The hon. gentleman said:

“With regard to the question of Imperial federation, he fully agreed that there must be Imperial federation. He believed that as the auxiliary nations of Australia and Canada and South Africa increased, the present relations, comfortable and pleasant as they were, could not remain permanently fixed. As those auxiliary nations must increase in wealth and in population, so they must in responsibilities, and speaking for the Dominion of Canada, he might say they were ready to increase the responsibilities, they were ready to join the Mother Country in her offensive and defensive league, to sacrifice their last man, and their last shilling in defence of the Empire and the flag of England.”

That, Sir, was on the 4th of January, 1886, and I suppose it is a correct report.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And I find, eighteen months before this, as reported in the same newspaper, that the hon. gentleman speaking, not to an English, but to a Canadian audience in Toronto, declared that Imperial federation was utterly impracticable.

“Imperial federation is utterly impracticable. We could never agree to send a number of men over to England to sit in Parliament there and vote away our rights and privileges.”

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear. That is the federation I did not agree with.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT:

“I am, as far as this question goes, up to the handle a Home Ruler. We will govern our own country. We will put on the taxes ourselves. If we choose to misgovern ourselves we will do so, and we do not desire England, Ireland or Scotland to tell us we are fools. We will say, ‘If we are fools we will keep our folly to ourselves. You will not be the worse for it, and we will not be the worse for any folly of yours.’”

Now, it does appear to me that there is, to say the least of it, a trifling inconsistency between those two utterances by the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman, speaking in his position as Premier of Canada, undertakes to pledge the Dominion to some scheme which no doubt was clearly defined in his own mind, else a man of his station and prudence would never have given his assent to it; and I think we have a right to know what that scheme of federation is which the hon. gentleman advocates, and for the carrying out of which he is willing to pledge the last man and the last dollar which his Government have left in our treasury. The hon. gentleman who sits beside him will have an opportunity of explaining to us how much money we have left; and I do not wish to anticipate the roseate and glowing terms in which, as we know by experience, he will acquit himself of his task. But I desire to say that this question is too important a question to be treated as a means of catching, by clap-trap, the cheers of an English audience on one occasion, and of a Canadian audience on another. If the hon. gentleman has convictions on this subject, if he thinks that such a project is practicable, then I call upon the hon. gentleman to explain his scheme, and I say it is his duty, after pledging himself in this way, after pledging the Dominion of Canada, speaking for it in his official capacity, it is his duty to tell us precisely what he proposes to do—what it is that he proposes to pledge us to, what this project is which so greatly commands itself to his mind, although apparently it did not so greatly commend itself to him, as short a period ago as 18 months. Sir, if the hon. gentleman means anything by the remarks he made, he means a very considerable deal. If, on the other hand, as I very much fear, the hon. gentleman means nothing; if his remarks amount to a mere rhetorical flourish, then I have to tell him that such words used by him, who was practically, to all intents and purposes, our ambassador in England at the time, do great harm, and are calculated to bring the honor of Canada into very serious discredit. The hon. gentleman, in his anxiety, I suppose, to throw oil on the troubled waters, denounced my hon. friend beside me as most malignant and unchristian, and went on to say that my hon. friend had raked together all this garbage. Now, Sir, I listened carefully to the statements my hon. friend read; they were one and all of them utterances either of the hon. gentleman himself or of some of the hon. gentleman's colleagues; and if those statements be correctly described as garbage, what possible opinion can hon. gentlemen opposite have of their own utterances? The hon. gentleman went on to use very strong language, indeed, as to the advice which he stated to have been tendered from this side of the House, that he should have endeavored, two years ago, while there was yet time, when due notice had been given of the probable abrogation of the Fishery Treaty—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, of the certain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What other form of words would the hon. gentleman have? The thing cannot be certain until it has happened, the hon. gentleman must admit. But the hon. gentleman's contention was this, that he and his friends behind him would rather endure any loss, would rather run any risk to this country, than humiliate themselves by proposing, a couple of years ago, to the American Government what they actually proposed the other day; and he went on to say, possibly with some reason, that there were circumstances known to him and to the Imperial Government which rendered it unlikely at that moment that such an application would meet with a fit response. Well, Sir, what was our charge? Our charge was that the hon. gentleman would not take any steps to renew the treaty, and would not take any steps to protect our fish and fishermén; that was our charge. The hon. gentleman had a right, if he chose, to refuse to take steps to renew the treaty, but it was his bounden duty, the moment he made up his mind to that course, to protect our people in the exercise of their just rights. It is not by any means alone that he refused to attempt to renew that treaty, but that, knowing as he says that it was certain to be abrogated, the hon. gentleman would not lift his little finger to enable our people to enjoy their just rights; that is his offence, and a very serious offence it is against the people of this country; and I do not hesitate to tell him that he has seriously prejudiced the future conduct of these negotiations by allowing American fishermen to enjoy, for several months, at their own sweet will, the right to fish in our waters. Now, I suppose it would be impossible for us to ascertain, unless indeed a committee of enquiry were permitted to sit, and we had the Hon. Mr. O'Donohoe before us, what the hon. gentleman's notion of being very nearly in his Cabinet may be, but if we are to believe the newspaper reports—though I am aware that what appears in newspapers is not always correct—is sometimes subordinated to political exigencies—the Hon. Mr. O'Donohoe was at one time in possession of a despatch from no one less than the then Governor General, stating that he was then in the Cabinet. We would like more light on this question, and, possibly, before the Session closes, more light may be vouchsafed to us, if not by the hon. gentleman, at any rate by some of the parties to that very remarkable treaty or negotiation which terminated, not in bringing Mr. O'Donohoe into the Cabinet, but according to the hon. gentleman, very nearly into the Cabinet. Now, as to certain other observations made by the hon. gentleman, and in particular as to the recent changes among the members of this Cabinet, I am bound to admit that in one sense possibly it may not be a matter of very great importance to us on this side, although in another sense it has always been considered a matter of very considerable moment to the public of this country what were the antecedents and the characters of the gentlemen entrusted with important posts; but I want to say one or two words with respect to some remarks of the hon. gentleman, having reference to my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Vait). My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was not in the Government at that time, but I was, and I have a very keen recollection of the delicate fashion in which the hon. gentleman opposite endeavored to reconcile the supporters of my hon. friend Mr. Mackenzie to the fact that we, like themselves, had been obliged to import an hon. colleague, not from the bench, but from a distinguished position in the Government of Nova Scotia. It may interest the House to know what the leader of the Government, being then in Opposition, thought as to that transaction. He said:

"It certainly was a great compliment to the gentleman from Digby that he should be selected to enter the Administration. He (Sir John Macdonald) did think that here would have been found among the hon. members from Nova Scotia one who would be fitted to fill the office of Minister, but the hon. leader of the Government did not appear to think so. He evidently was of the impression that he had selected all the standards and left all the culls when he formed his Cabinet, and that he must go to fresh fields and pastures new for another Minister."

I hope my hon. friends on the other side, from Nova Scotia, will fully understand that the hon. gentleman thinks he has selected all the standards from Nova Scotia, and only left the culls, when he saw fit to go outside their ranks to select a representative. I have no desire in the world to reflect on the hon. Minister of Justice; but I will say this, that so far as my poor experience enables me to judge, looking at my hon. friends on the other side, if not in reference to the office of Minister of Justice, perhaps in reference to some of the other appointments, it might be fairer and juster to say that the hon. First Minister had selected the culls and left the standards. Now, with respect to the hon. Minister of Justice, I am fully prepared to admit that his position is peculiar. He has made considerable sacrifices; he may have run considerable risks in joining the present Government; but the precedent which the hon. gentleman has chosen to set is one of a very dubious character. I do not mean to say, and I never averred, that in a country like ours, where legal attainments are necessarily somewhat scarce and of high value, it may not sometimes be necessary, as I believe it was in the case of my hon. friend, Mr. Mowat, that a man should be taken from the bench and brought back to the political arena; but I say that it is an extreme step, and one that requires justification. I say that in Mr. Mowat's case, most ample justification has been given of the excellence of the choice, and that no man from Ontario who has witnessed the gallant and successful struggle which Mr. Mowat has made so long for the rights of his Province and of other Provinces, which were involved in the rights of Ontario, can fail to see that the choice then made was most amply justified. But I say this also, there is a difference, it appears to me, between removing an hon. gentleman from the bench and placing him in a Local Parliament, where he will have nothing to do with the appointment or dismissal of judges, and where he will have very little power in any way of controlling them, and taking a gentleman, however distinguished, whatever his talents may be, from the bench and placing him, as Minister of Justice, in a place where he will have control of his former brethren, where he will, according to our usage, under certain circumstances have the power of promoting himself, if occasion serves, to the highest judicial post in the country. Still, that is not the only ground on which I think that the method in which the Minister of Justice was brought into this House is one which deserves some serious censure. It is perfectly well known to this House that the Minister was only enabled to take his seat here, as a member from Nova Scotia, by the expedient of purchasing a former supporter of my hon. friend beside me by an offer of a judgeship. I say that that act was, according to the First Minister's own judgment, according to his own recorded and emphatic declaration, one of the gravest acts of corruption which any Government ever committed. There are few members in this House to-day who recollect certain events which transpired in the old Parliament of Canada in 1863, but those who do, will recollect the mode in which the First Minister and his colleague now sitting beside him and my hon. friend from London (Mr. Carling), and the hon. the Minister of Railways (Mr. Pope), dealt with the appointment of Judge Sicotte in 1863—those hon. gentlemen will know I am justified in saying that, in the case of his opponents, no man could more violently and decidedly condemn the action which he has now taken. So strongly did the right hon. the First Minister feel on that subject, that he caused to be moved by one of his supporters a motion which he had prepared himself on that question. That motion reads as follows:—

"That this House feel it their duty at once to express their deep regret that His Excellency should have been advised to make the judicial appointment by which a vacancy has recently been created in the representation of the county—[shall I say of Antigonish? No.]—of St. Hyacinthe, under circumstances calculated to prejudice, if not to destroy, the independence of this House, and to corrupt, at its source, our system of parliamentary government."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was the language used by the hon. gentleman's supporter, that was the motion voted for by the First Minister and his colleagues whom I have enumerated, and although, unfortunately, we do not possess a Hansard with an accurate record of the eloquent speeches of the hon. gentleman and his friends on that occasion, I recollect perfectly well how the hon. gentleman and his supporters made the whole country ring with their denunciations of the gross and flagrant prostitution of the judicial bench—for those were the words they used—by which a member of the Opposition had been seduced into resigning his seat by the offer of a judgeship in Lower Canada. I defy the hon. gentleman, I defy his supporters, I defy his friends in this House or out of it, to point out in what possible way or shape the appointment of Mr. McIsaac to the judgeship of Antigonish differs from or can be more easily justified than the appointment of Judge Sicotte to a seat on the bench in Lower Canada, thereby vacating the representation of the county of St. Hyacinthe. What did the hon. gentleman say just now, speaking of the appointment of Mr. Wood in Manitoba? Mr. Wood, he said, had been bribed to desert his party, and was therefore unworthy of being made a judge; and if Mr. Wood had been bribed to desert his party and was therefore unworthy of being made a judge, what are we to say of the conduct of the hon. gentleman who bribed Mr. McIsaac to desert his party and, therefore appointed a man who, on his own showing, was unworthy to be made a judge. If the hon. gentleman is able to point out any difference, I shall be happy to give him the floor.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will attend to that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I shall be very glad, indeed, to hear the hon. gentleman's explanations, and I only regret that there are so few present who, like myself, remember the hon. gentleman's fiery denunciations of the same act when committed by the late Mr. John Sandfield Macdonald in 1863.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman voted for that motion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did, and I shall be very happy to vote for a precisely similar motion, and I hope we will have the opportunity before very long. Now, looking at this Speech which has been put into our hands, I say that the hon. the First Minister, in his remarks, wholly ignored the cause for alarm which my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Blake) declared existed in the present condition of the country. I do not know that the hon. gentleman cares very much what may be the result after. I am very much afraid that he is not only resigned to seeing the deluge come after him, but that in some respect he would like—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—to be able to believe—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—that when—I will not say when the hon. gentleman ceases to have any use for us—but when he ceases to be Prime Minister, the whole fabric, which he boasts to have erected with such skill and care, shall fall to pieces. But I will say this: Looking at the facts which are declared in the official returns that have been for months before the country, I cannot understand how any hon. gentleman who has paid the smallest attention to the financial affairs of the country can fail to perceive that our present position is already perilous in the extreme. What do we find in the Gazette's statement brought down by the hon. gentleman himself. Last year we had a deficit of 2½ millions, the largest deficit which has existed since Confederation; we find that in the seven months which have elapsed since the commencement of the current year, the deficit was run up to $5,100,000 in round numbers; we find that the volume of trade has materially shrunk within the space of the last twelve months; we find that neither have we been exporting or importing as largely as previously; we find—and this is a point to which hon. gentlemen profess to pay great attention—that the balance of trade has gone, during the last four or five years very heavily indeed against this country. I recollect quite distinctly, in 1880, when a very considerable deficit was ascertained to exist, the then Finance Minister took upon him to inform us it was a matter of no consequence, because our exports balanced our imports. Since that period, five years have elapsed; and we find that, whereas we imported for consumption in those five years an amount of $538,278,000, our total exports of our own produce, bullion included, amounted to barely $429,975,000, so that, on these gentlemen's own showing, although they came into power pledged to redress the balance of trade which they alleged was so much against us in the previous years, they have accumulated an adverse balance against us in the last five years of $108,500,000. I do not, as I have repeatedly declared, attach anything like the importance to that which hon. gentlemen opposite profess to do, but they stand convicted on their own statement, out of their own mouths, of being wholly and entirely unable to redress that very thing which they have repeatedly declared it was the express aim of their policy to redress. Neither is it necessary for me, at present, to do more than allude briefly to the huge mass of indebtedness which has been accumulating within the last half dozen years. It is well known to all the members of this House that we have added about one hundred millions to our debt within the last few years, and have, besides, incurred a vast number of undefined liabilities, which are all the more mischievous, because they afford the precedents for every kind and description of claim that can be preferred against a Government, while at the same time it is perfectly well known that the population of our more important Provinces has become all but perfectly stationary, that we are not only unable to retain here the immigrants whom we bring to the country, but that we are unable to keep within our bounds even the natural growth of our population, and I am afraid that, if the census which has just been taken of the North-West Territories be truly and fairly taken, it will show a very unfavorable condition of things in that great country. We find, in addition to that, that under the hon. gentleman's Administration, so enormously have the fixed charges on the revenue increased that, at the present moment, those fixed charges are within a mere fraction of 70 per cent. of the whole revenue this country receives. Unfortunately, when we recollect that in addition to charges for interest, subsidies, and expenses of Customs and Excise, we must regard to a great extent the Indian expenditure as a fixed thing, over which we have very little control, the hon. gentleman will find that a much larger proportion of our total expenditure must be placed under the head of fixed charges, than I believe can be found in that shape in any known country—at any rate in any known civilised country to-day. Let us put this briefly. The hon. gentlemen have had their six or seven years of office; in that interval they have contrived to double, to more than double in its actual incidence on the population, the taxation of this country. They have not quite but very nearly doubled our total debt, while our population remains stationary. We find that our trade, and particularly our export trade, has gone on decreasing, at any rate within the last two or three years. We find that the fixed charges on the revenue amount to very nearly two-thirds of the whole, and that our expenditure has been increased by some $13,000,000 a year; and more than that, we are met by a deficit of five millions in seven months, which will be in all probability increased to eight millions before the year closes; and yet they tell us in that Speech that the country is to be congratulated on its financial condition and its general progress and prosperity. I say that these things speak of tension, that they speak of stagnation, that they show a thoroughly unwholesome state of things to exist, that they mean great loss to employers of labor, and, what is still worse, great privation to many of the unfortunate employed. Now, Sir, politically the state of things is worse still. Were we alone on this continent, had we this continent practically to ourselves as the people of the United States had it practically in the early period of their existence, or had we the whole continent left to ourselves as the people of Australia have, the mistakes of the Government would be of much less consequence and we might expect to be able to repair them at our leisure; but everyone who hears me knows that our position is very different, that we are face to face with fierce competition, that we have a great and wealthy neighbor, which is able to offer a great many inducements to immigrants which we cannot offer, and that we have wantonly and wilfully destroyed the advantages which we possessed and which might have enabled us to a great extent to have counteracted many of the superior advantages which the United States possess. Under the hon. gentleman's régime, the lesson taught to Provinces and to constituencies has been worse. The hon. gentleman knows right well that, in entering into a Confederation like ours, it was the duty of the statesmen to whom it was confided to mould and shape our young Confederation, to imprint upon the minds of the people, and upon the Provinces forming that Confederation, the duty of relying to the utmost extent upon themselves. How has that duty been discharged? We know at the present moment that there is not a Province and that there is hardly a constituency that has not been taught the evil lesson of looking to Ottawa for assistance; taught to believe that the Dominion Government possesses a boundless treasury, out of which all manner of grants and aids can be given to Province or constituency in return for its political support, and the result is shown in the addition of thirteen millions to our expenditure, and in a deficit which is known already to amount to five millions, and is likely to amount to eight before the year is closed. I say to the First Minister, as I have said before to the House, that, when that state of things has arrived, the first duty of the Opposition is to proclaim the facts to the country, and by every means in its power to endeavor to arouse the people to a proper sense of the manner in which their resources are being squandered. I say here, as I have said elsewhere, and as I shall repeat, that the corruption which now prevails in this country is a disgrace to any civilised community, that our condition is far worse than any that has been known in the course of English history, at least from the days of Walpole to the present time, and that, unless a speedy check is put to it, we shall find the edifice of Confederation, which we all desire to see firmly established, which we all desire to see prosper—quite as much on this side as on the other side—we shall find that it has been reared on a false basis, and that the evil lesson which the hon. gentleman has, at any rate during the latter part of his career, been teaching to all portions of this Confederation, will surely lead to its dissolution.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not desire to prolong this debate, or to follow the hon. gentleman in the speech he has just delivered. The subjects to which he has incidentally referred, will, no doubt, be the theme of discussion at different periods during this Session, and we will have abundant opportunity to show to the House and to the country how little basis there is for the concluding portion of the hon. gentleman's speech. I simply rise to point out how unfairly the hon. gentleman has quoted from a speech delivered by the hon. the First Minister in Toronto some time ago, on the subject of Imperial federation. The hon. gentleman was good enough to cite words of the right hon. gentleman in a speech which he delivered in England at a banquet given to him at the St. George's Club, and to put in contrast with them words which he alleged, and no doubt thought, were uttered by him in Toronto. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, because we have had the words read to us twice to-night, exactly what the right hon. gentleman is reported to have said in England. The general drift of his statement was that the people of Canada would be quite prepared to enter into an alliance which would be practically an alliance offensive and defensive with the Empire, and that, when the Empire was in difficulties, when the Mother Country found itself face to face with an enemy, the people of Canada will be willing, if necessary, to spend their last shilling and give their last man in defence of the Empire.

The hon. gentleman is kind enough to say that this is in entire opposition to the views expressed by the First Minister at Toronto. I desire, Sir, at this stage, that it may go upon record with the statements which have just been made, simply to cite the words uttered in the city of Toronto, so that the hon. gentleman may see how almost identical in words was the speech at Toronto compared with the speech in London:

"It has been represented that I was in favor of federation with the Imperial Parliament. I never made any such statement; I never had any such opinion, and believe that Canada should still preserve our Canadian Parliament. Canada is the best judge of the best means of governing herself. I believe that Canadian statesmen only can be confided with the trust of putting burdens upon the shoulders of our people, and that no Parliament sitting in England, however great and able it may be, and although Canada may be represented upon it, can faithfully, fully and satisfactorily administer our affairs. The word 'confederation' means a union by treaty, and I believe that a treaty can be made between England and Canada by which we can have mutual commercial advantages, and a common system of offence and defence. The Australian colonies will soon be united in a bond similar to, though, perhaps, not identical with, the Canadian Confederation. Then what will we see? We will see England, with her thirty-five millions, united to Canada with her five millions, soon to become twice that number, and to Australia with a similar population; and the world will know that if the Old Mother Country is attacked, she has two auxiliary nations standing at her back, and bound to make a common cause with her. We know that the nation that commands the sea, commands the world. England is now the chief maritime power in the world. Canada is already, in her commercial marine, the fourth power in the world, and Australia, that vast continent, surrounded by colonies resting on the sea, must have a navy too. The combined naval forces of those three powers will form the great police of the world. They will control the seas of the world, and if they control the seas of the world, they will keep the peace of the world. It has been said that we are running great risks in venturing to make common cause with England. Gentlemen, if I know the people of Canada aright, they are willing to run those risks. But there really is no risk. When any foreign nation knows that the thirty-five millions of people in England, and the twenty millions in the different colonies, forming one great nation, will exert all their military and naval power in one common cause, that fact will prevent possible war with England, and England will be in an as complete moral domination of the world, as was the Roman Empire in the days of old."

Mr. Speaker, I think, in the face of that, it may fairly be left to the judgment of this House and the country, to say whether the statement of the right hon. the First Minister made in England was not in precise accord with the statement made by him in Toronto, and, some ten years ago, in the City of Montreal, when he first, if I remember rightly, on a public occasion, elaborated the scheme which he has since, on two or three occasions, referred to with marvellous consistency as to the nature of his proposal, and in substantially the same words.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not desire to refer to many subjects which have been discussed this evening, but I rise only for the purpose of saying a word or two upon the important subject referred to by the right hon. leader of the Government, and the policy which the Government thought fit to pursue with reference to the very important subject of the fisheries and reciprocity. Before I refer to the policy of the Government, I wish to make one remark with reference to a statement made by the hon. gentleman who moved the Address this evening, the member for the City and County of St. John (Mr. Everett). I refer to it, because he is a Maritime Province man, and will be supposed by those who live in the Upper Provinces, to be acquainted with the matter. The hon. gentleman said that so far as the Maritime Provinces were concerned, since the Intercolonial Railway was built, there had been an exchange of product between the east and the west. So far as one part of his statement is concerned, I believe he is correct, for the people of the east have been compelled to purchase largely from the manufacturers of the west, and to pay through the nose pretty dearly for it. But, Sir, I deny there has been any exchange of products, any interchange of trade. I say no man who is acquainted with the fish trade of the Maritime Provinces, can truly assert that any reasonable proportion of the catch of those Provinces, is consumed or bought by the Province of Quebec, Ontario or Manitoba. Our natural markets and our only markets, are those of the United States and of foreign countries, and it is delusive in the extreme, and calculated to mislead the House, to make statements of that kind, which are not based upon facts. Now, I wish for a moment to refer to a remark which fell from the leader of the Government. He referred to the several occasions upon which the members on this side of the House have deemed it their duty to bring to the notice of the House, and of the country, the grave and serious importance of re-opening negotiations with the United States upon the question of reciprocity. He stated that there was a depth of degradation involved in our proposal to negotiate with the United States to which he, for one, would never consent to be a party, and which he believed the people, if appealed to, would condemn. Sir, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he has not already found a depth of degradation greater than the one he suggests. I would like to ask him whether it was a greater depth of degradation to open negotiations with a friendly Government to see whether we could not settle upon a friendly basis the international relations between the two Governments relating to trade, and whether that was more degrading than the course he thought fit to pursue since this House met last year. Sir, when the House met last year, the first proposal which emanated from the Government was one to vote fifty thousand dollars of the people's money to protect our fisheries. The grounds upon which that proposal was made were these: That the treaty was about to expire, and that the vast fishing ground surrounding our coast would be thrown open to the enterprise of American fishermen, who, fishing side by side with our fishermen, would catch fish and take them to the only market open to them; and while our men would be handicapped with the enormous duty of two dollars per barrel, their fish would go in duty free, and that, as a consequence our fisheries would be destroyed. The hon. gentleman said, and his proposal met with no small degree of approval on both sides, that in view of these circumstances, and not having obtained a renewal of the fishery treaty, it was desirable and necessary that we should protect our fisheries. He talked in grandiloquent terms of the manner in which we were going to drive out the Yankees and keep our preserves for our own men. But no sooner had the House adjourned, than the hopes held out to the fishermen that their rights would be protected, were speedily dissipated. The hon. gentleman had hied off to Washington and proposed, not that there should be any fair exchange of our fisheries for some trade concessions they would give us, but that they should come into our waters and fish for nothing. And what has been the consequences of his policy? The hon. gentleman knows well that last year he voluntarily proposed that the whole of the waters surrounding these coasts should be given up to the American fishermen, whenever and wherever they liked, without restriction and without license, without anybody to interfere with them. And he knows well that he did that in face of the fact that, our fishermen, taking the same fish, in the same waters, when they took them to the only market open to them in the world, would be met with that two dollars a barrel duty. The hon. gentleman may know, and if he does not, some of his followers behind him may tell him, that he has succeeded in ruining a large number of men and nearly succeeded in destroying the enormous money interest invested in that fishery. If he goes down to the Maritime Provinces and converses with the people there, he will find whether they think it will be an act of degradation on the part of the Government to endeavor to negotiate reasonable, fair and legitimate terms upon which he would admit American fishermen into our waters, instead of surrendering every right and every privilege we possess to these people, for nothing.

Mr. DAVIES,

It has a double effect. It has a damaging effect, which goes further than the temporary loss of the money; and that effect is this: We have led the Americans to believe that we place no value on those rights, and it is now sounded throughout the length and breadth of the United States that the Canadian Government do not value those fisheries, and will not spend a dollar on their protection; and the men who went there last summer, who took their boats and schooners into our waters, and fished without restraint, and without having anything more than temporary permission, have learnt "the trick" with respect to the fishing, and much greater difficulty will be experienced next year than would have been experienced if the Government had instituted at once proper restraints, and adopted forcible means to keep them out. The hon. gentleman has said that our proposal involves degradation on the part of Canada. I have never been able to see what degradation there was in a free and independent people applying through their Government to an adjoining people, and asking them whether certain differences existing could not be settled by mutual agreement, whether the trade relations between the two countries could not be improved by mutual concessions. Did Lord Derby, when he penned his despatch inviting the attention of this Government to the state of facts which would follow the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, think it would be derogatory to our interests, or that it was derogatory to the Ministry of which he was one of the most prominent members, to take the step suggested? No. Look at the despatch which Lord Granville, sent in March, 1883, and you will find that the Imperial Government recognised and realised the importance of the question to be such, that no sooner had they received notice from the United States Government of their intention to abrogate that treaty than they at once called the attention of the Canadian Government to it, and invited their serious consideration to the important state of facts that would arise when the treaty expired. Lord Granville invited their immediate attention to the matter, and asked them further to give expression to their views, so that the Home Government might take action. Lord Granville waited for three months, and not having received any intimation from the hon. gentleman, he followed it up with a second despatch. It was dated in May. In that despatch he urgently requested that the Canadian Government would begin to appreciate the importance of those questions, important not only from a Canadian standpoint, but when the headlands question came into consideration, also from an Imperial standpoint, and he urged the hon. gentleman again and again to take the matter up, and put the Home Government in possession of their views, if they had any. But the hon. gentleman and his Government have been content to sail along without doing anything or having any policy, and I charge him with having sacrificed the interests of the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces by his negligence and supineness in this matter. What did Lord Granville say when he enclosed the notice received from the United States Government? He said:

"I am to request that in laying this paper before the Earl of Derby, you will state that although, after notice is given, two years must still elapse before these articles cease to have effect it appears to Lord Granville expedient to take into consideration, without delay, what course it will be best to adopt with the view, if possible, to avoid a recurrence of irritating disputes in connection with the fishery question, and I am to suggest that in the first place it might be well to communicate a copy of Mr. Lowell's note to the Canadian Government, and to ascertain what views they entertain upon the subject."

He got no answer to that. No course had been decided by the Cabinet then, and at the end of a year we find the Imperial Government sending another despatch to the Canadian Government asking them to do something. It was dated January, 1884, and it says:

"My Lord,—With respect to my despatches of the 3rd May, and 28th December, last, I have the honor to request that you will move your Government to take an early opportunity of placing me in possession of their views as to the course to be pursued in consequence of the approaching termination of the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington."

The hon. gentleman thought it derogatory to the dignity of the Government, of which he is the principal member, to do anything to approach the American Government on this matter. Lords Derby and Granville did not hold that view, and they were, no doubt, as desirous of protecting the dignity and self-respect of the Empire as is the hon. gentleman opposite of saving the dignity and self-respect of Canada. What reason does the hon. gentleman give to the House for surrendering the valuable fishing privileges? One is that, so soon as the elections were over, we opened negotiations with our American friends, and on two grounds we gave up our fisheries. One was in order to be good neighbors. If that is a reason, it will apply to next year as well as this: the same motive will exist to prompt us to do it again, and that extends not for the year past, but for the years to come. The second reason was a still more flimsy one, namely, that the American fishermen did not know that the treaty was then about to expire. The hon. gentleman cannot but be aware that it was thoroughly made known by the newspaper press of both countries, when the American Government determined to put an end to that treaty, and a circular was sent by the American Government to each of the firms in the fishing business, telling them that the treaty would expire on a certain date, and that for the future they would have no rights in regard to Canadian fisheries. They were aware of the fact. The reason given by hon. gentlemen opposite for surrendering our rights and fisheries and half ruining the fishing industry are of the most flimsy character. How can the hon. gentleman reconcile his concluding remarks with the opening portion of his speech? The hon. gentleman wound up by expressing the sanguine hope that the Morrison Bill would yet become law. If the temper of the Senate and Congress is such that they are willing, without solicitation, to pass a measure that will give us free trade with them, what could we not have done with them if they had been approached? Does the hon. gentleman maintain that they would do it much more willingly without solicitation or compensation than with solicitation and concession by us? The idea is preposterous. If the hon. gentleman's belief that the Morrison Bill will pass is a well-founded belief, then the temper of Congress is such as to condemn the Canadian Government for not having opened negotiations before and obtaining the advantages desired, I would not have ventured to address the House on this subject, except from the immense importance attached to the subject by the people I represent and by all the people of the Maritime Provinces, and I venture the assertion that the action of the Government will not be approved, but will be censured when their conduct is properly brought before the people.

Mr. MITCHELL. I shall not occupy the attention of the House more than two or three minutes; but as the two great leaders have addressed the House, I feel it my duty as representing the Independent centre to give expression to my views on two or three points referred to in the Speech from the Throne. I shall first touch on the question of Imperial federation. I have listened to the debates on the subject, and I know I have read various speeches made, and upon which comments have been made, emanating from the right hon. Premier of Canada; and I want to say right here, that I think it is a matter of very great regret that a gentleman occupying the position of Premier of this country should have given countenance to the utterances of opinions, in England, calculated to raise expectations both abroad and at home, which, in my humble opinion, never can be realised. I may be mistaken. It may be that the right hon. gentleman and those who sympathise with the view of Imperial federation may be able to propound a scheme which may be acceptable to the people of this country. But I for one cannot give my assent to any scheme which would take away from the people of Canada any portion of the right of self-government; and without danger of doing so I cannot see that they can propound any scheme which will be acceptable to the people of England or that English statesmen will give us additional protection or additional rights and privileges unless we give up a certain portion of our rights and privileges. That I presume would involve among other things the renunciation of the right of taxation—a thing which this country never would submit to. Speaking as one who is independent of both parties in this House, I for one never will consent to any such scheme as would lessen in the slightest degree our rights and privileges, our self-government, or the control over our policy and revenues which we now possess. Another question which has been mentioned is one of a domestic nature, and one which concerns the people I have the honor to represent. A good deal has been said about the National Policy. I have been an advocate of the National Policy; I am an advocate of it, and I believe in it. I believe it has built up manufactures, that it has given employment to people in this country, and has retained, within our boundaries, those who without it would have been driven to seek homes and employment abroad. But there are features of the National Policy that are being run into the ground. There are certain manufactures which have received and are receiving protection far beyond what they ought to have. Take for example the case of cottons with 35 per cent.; everybody knows that is far beyond what they should receive, and that the money is taken out of the pockets of the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear," and they have the right to say "hear, hear," to the extent of about 10 per cent. I would protect the cotton factories just sufficient to enable them to compete with the productions of other countries, but I think the excessive protection which, under the general system of the National Policy, they are enabled to enjoy with regard to the cotton of this country, is unnecessary, and that it certainly bears hardly upon the poor people of Canada. The article of sugar is much in the same position, but without dwelling upon it I will come down to what is of more importance than either of them, and that is the breadstuffs of the country. I think the time has arrived when the duty should be taken off flour and cornmeal—the food of the poor. This duty was looked upon as a necessity, to hold the Ontario farmers as an offset to Nova Scotia coal. I am in favor of taking the duty off coal and off flour and cornmeal as well. I will not now enter into discussion of the subject, but I wish to say a few words in relation to the fisheries. It has been stated by the Premier that the Government have pursued the course which was just and right in relation to that question. I beg with all due respect to differ from my right hon. friend on that point. Many gentlemen will recollect that when the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, now the Finance Minister, brought in a Bill, I think the Session before last, for the division of the Department, when the matter was discussed a whole night, I stated my views as to what was the duty of the Government in such a crisis as then existed. We received notice that the fishery clauses were to be terminated. The Government were not taken by surprise. The subject was one with which this Government had a right to deal. And upon that occasion it will be recollected by some hon. gentlemen that I now have in my eye, that after dealing with the question of the division of the Department, it being late at night, I suggested it was too late to go on with the discussion, though I should have liked to say something about the right and proper course to be pursued in reference to the fishery question. I was asked by the House to go on, and I stated that it was the duty of the Minister of Marine to come to the House and ask for an appropriation of $100,000 to put on the necessary protection for our fisheries, in justice to our own fishermen, as well as for the purpose of letting our American friends see that we are determined and prepared to protect them. It was stated that such was the policy of the Government, but I am bound to say that that policy has not been carried out. Another year came round, and a sum of $50,000 was granted for the purpose of putting on the necessary protection. No protection has been put on, and the right hon. gentleman gives us his reasons that friendly negotiations were going on which he hoped would result in a different way. That may be a sufficient explanation, but it strikes me, as I stated at the time, that the way to have effective negotiations was to show the people with whom we negotiate that we were in earnest in our determination to give that protection to our fishermen which they had the right to expect. The people of the eastern section of the country had a right to that protection and it was not extended. I regret that it was not done, especially while a Minister from the eastern portion of the Dominion was at the head of the Department. He should have realised what was his duty on that occasion, and what were the rights and privileges of the people of the section from which he comes. I feel now that, whatever our chances might have been, if we had taken the proper steps to show that Parliament meant business, and meant to protect our interests, those chances are infinitely less now than they would have been. But it is better late than never; and I trust this Session will not be allowed to pass, and that a day, or at least a week, will not be allowed to pass, without the Government taking steps to utilise the money voted last year for the purpose of placing on our coasts, as soon as the season opens, a sufficient number of vessels to protect our fisheries, and that an additional vote will be taken this Session for the purpose of making that system complete. We have heard through the Government press of the protection given to the fisheries; that as soon as our Government found out that the Americans did not intend renewing the treaty—at all events as soon as the report of the committee was made against granting a renewal of the Fishery Treaty with the Canadian authorities they had taken steps to afford our fisheries the necessary protection. There has been no protection granted; our fisheries have been neglected. The fishing for bait—as my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) knows very well—has been going on to an enormous extent and no protection has been granted so far as I have seen, except what has been stated by some of the Government organs, and those statements have been made without any date or details. From every source of information I could find it appears that no decided action has been taken, no practical steps taken, to protect our fisheries, even since the committee reported to the United States Senate against a renewal of the treaty. I shall not take up any further time now, as it is probable the matter will be fully discussed on another occasion; but I trust the new Minister of Fisheries, young, energetic, and I hope desirous of earning a reputation for himself, will not let any further delay take place, and that he will not neglect giving that protection to the fisheries which the people of the Maritime Provinces have a right to expect. Before I sit down, I might as well say one word upon another subject. While references have been made to the prosperity that exists in the eastern Provinces of this Dominion, and to the fact that the people there have large deposits in the savings banks, and have as much comfort and happiness and employment as they ever had, I may say that I have seen it recently stated, and have received communications from some of my own constituents stating that a large number of men have been dismissed from the Intercolonial Railway—that people who have been years in the service have been dismissed, and at a season of the year when they can get no employment elsewhere. I want to appeal to hon. gentlemen that this is no time to dismiss men from the service. They had better keep them on until the spring, when they could get employment elsewhere, because some of them are most destitute and have written piteous letters pointing out the great hardships they have suffered from dismissal at this season when they could get no employment from any other source.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise to correct an error, no doubt unintentional, in the statement of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). He stated that as soon as Parliament was prorogued last Session the Government gave up the right to the fisheries after the 1st of July last—that they hurried off to Washington. The hon. gentleman will find that the whole of that correspondence was brought down by a special Message of the Governor General on the 9th of July, 1885. The hon. gentleman may also recollect that there was a debate on the subject afterwards, in which the hon. gentleman who has just spoken said he approved of the course of the Government under the circumstances in allowing American fishermen to fish in our waters.

Mr. MITCHELL. I said that while I approved of that while negotiations were going on, I thought steps should be taken to put on a force, or at all events to get ready for it.

Paragraphs 1 to 12, inclusive and Resolution agreed to:

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the said Resolution be referred to a Select Committee composed of Sir Hector Langevin, Messrs. Bowell, Everett, Ward and the mover, to prepare and report a draft of an Address in answer to the Speech of His Excellency to both Houses of Parliament, in conformity with the said Resolution.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, from the committee, reported the draft of an Address, which was read the first and the second time and ordered to be engrossed and to be presented to His Excellency by such members of this House as are members of the Privy Council.

HOLES IN ICE ON FREQUENTED WATERS.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 2) to amend the Criminal Law, and to declare it a misdemeanor to leave unguarded and exposed, holes cut in the ice on any navigable or frequented waters.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I have very great pleasure in explaining the provisions of the Bill, which has been already introduced to the notice of this honorable House on several occasions before. It now comes in a shape in which I hope it will meet with the approbation of every member of the House. Last Session it passed through its second reading, and the rather extraordinary course was taken of objecting to it on the third reading. It was then referred to a special committee, and was reported to the House, and in the shape in which it was reported I now introduce it. I hope there will be no objection to the Bill, which has met with great approbation in all parts of the Dominion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LAW OF EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 3) to further amend the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases. He said: This is to allow parties who have an objection to taking an oath to give their evidence by affirmation.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONSOLIDATED RAILWAY ACT, 1879.

Mr. MULOCK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 4) to further amend the Consolidated Railway Act of 1879. He said: This is the Bill which I had the honor to introduce last Session, and which I then explained at some length. I have added two clauses, the first of which is to provide a remedy for the Act passed in 1872, requiring the railway companies to redeem unused railway tickets. That Act, however, provided no adequate remedy, and when this Bill comes up for discussion I think I will be able to show that some railway companies, at least, have taken advantage of the defect in the Act to avoid complying with its provisions. The next clause, about which there may be some difference of opinion, is to repeal section 6 of the Act of 1883, by which the Dominion Parliament took over the Provincial railways.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DIGBY PIER.

Mr. VAIL asked, Is it the intention of the Government to rebuild the Digby Pier on the present site? If so, when will the work be commenced?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter is now under the consideration of the Government.

GROSS DEBT OF THE DOMINION.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What was the gross debt of the Dominion on the 1st day of March, 1886?

Mr. McLELAN. The gross debt on the first March, 1886, without deducting the assets of $72,791,837, was $281,314,532.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What portion of the gross debt of the Dominion was represented by temporary loans from banks or other parties, in Canada or elsewhere?

Mr. McLELAN. $14,362,309.67.

LOBSTER FISHING, P. E. I.

Mr. HACKETT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to impose such regulations as will entirely prohibit the fishing of Lobsters for canning purposes around the Coasts of Prince Edward Island, for the term of three years, as rumored in the newspapers of the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not.

LOUIS RIEL MEDICAL COMMISSION.

Mr. COURSOL asked, Whether the Government, after the conviction of Louis Riel, appointed a Medical Commission to enquire into the mental condition of the prisoner; if so, did the said commission forward a report to the Government, and is it the intention of the Government to lay the said report before the House, and when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In consequence of certain representations, the Government caused an enquiry to be made by two medical practitioners as to the mental accountability of Louis Riel since his conviction, and also procured a report from the visiting surgeon-physician on that subject. These reports will be laid before the House at once if moved for, and the hon. gentleman may, with the consent of the House, move for them now.

Mr. COURSOL moved for a return of the reports made by the medical commission into the mental condition of Louis Riel after his conviction.

Motion agreed to.

THE NORTH-WEST—GRANTS OF LAND TO MR. VALIN, M.P.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation) moved for a return showing all grants of land made to Mr. Valin, M. P., in the North-West Territories, with the date of the Letters Patent therefor, the quantity, location, price and payments; also, all grants so made either to Mr. Valin alone, or to others jointly with him. He said: Mr. Speaker, I believe it is important that we should know which are those of the hon. members of this House who have received grants from the Government in the shape of lands in the North-West Territories. My object in making this motion concerning members of this House, is to know whether any of them have received direct ministerial favors, and furthermore, whether some of these grants of land may not conflict with the rights either with the half-breeds, or the Indians or of certain occupiers of land. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Valin), from the information I have received, is one of those who have received some of these grants. During the month of December last a meeting was to take place in the county of Montmorency. The hon. member was invited to attend, and certain questions were to be then and there put to him, and he was to be requested to make certain declarations with regard to the events which took place in the North-West. It was intended to enquire of him if, perchance, he had not received some grants of land from the Government, and if, perchance, also such grants of land was not comprised within the limits of the large grant of land given to a certain company in the township of Langevin, which said grant of land took up, in globo so to speak, the whole of the parish of Langevin, including the church and presbytery. The member for Montmorency, my hon. colleague, did not deem it proper to go to that meeting; he declined the invitation, but he was present through his employce, whom I might call his factotum, Mr. Vallerant, accompanied by other persons commonly called bullies in English, whose object it was to use violence in order to prevent the meeting from being held. The consequence was that the electors of that place were unable to obtain the required information, and that information which might have been useful to all the electors of the county was not given to the public. I believe the only way to get it is to invoke the authority of this House in order to discover the truth, to know just the number of acres of land which the hon. member for Montmorency has obtained from the Government, where such land is located, and to what extent these grants may affect the rights of those parties. I must say, by the way, that the founders of these troubles at Château-Richer have been brought before the police court and have been variously punished, both by fine and imprisonment. But the object of the meeting was not attained, and as I have had the honor to state, we have not obtained the information which I believe the hon. member is bound to give his constituents and to the electors of the county at large. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I make the present motion.

Mr. VALIN. I have but a few words to say in reply to the hon. gentleman. I know that a certain army went down to the county of Montmorency to hold a meeting there, and that they called themselves the National Party. I received an invitation to attend under the name of that National Party, by a kind of secretary named by them, but as I knew there was nothing like a National Party at present existing except the Conservative party in this country, I did not attend to this invitation. I was informed that there were lots of these bullies, as the hon. gentleman has just mentioned, organised by the so-called National Party, to come down to the county at that meeting, and the people of my county, knowing well that this was being done, advised me not to go to such a meeting. I therefore did not go, nor had I any intention of going. I understand that the army did go down, but had the satisfaction of being turned out of the place of meeting. Who turned them out, I do not know; but I know well that one of these bullies who went down there was armed with a hammer, which some of my friends at the meeting took away from him. This caused a row, and a few days after, as the hon. gentleman says, six people were arrested on our side unjustly and unfairly. We did not cause any on the other side to be arrested, because we did not think it worth while. But the hon. gentleman, not having been able to make his great speech, it remained in his belly and swelled up, and he had no other way to relieve himself but by rushing into a newspaper. In that newspaper, which, we all know, is not in the habit of telling the truth, he represented that I held land grants in the St. Louis de Langevin township, and that I had them in partnership with Sir Hector Langevin, Sir Adolphe Caron and the Hon. Mr. McGreevy. It would have been a great honor for me to have been a partner with these gentlemen, but I must say we were not partners, and I deny that I had anything to do with such lands. I deny, and I defy anyone to prove the contrary, that I had any lands in that township. If I have land, it is not there. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken; and I do believe if I have lands in the North-West, they are lands I have the right to hold. But, in the meantime, I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman should take the way of a newspaper and drag about respectable people just for the sake of the reference. He knew well that he could get the reference here by applying as he did to-day. I have no objection that the whole of my transactions should be laid before the House. I have had no gift from the Government. If I support them it is by my own will; if I support them, it is my politics and it is my view to do so, and I think I support an honorable Government, and I have no shame in doing so. Therefore my transactions can be sent down by the Minister of the Interior, if he wishes, for I have no objection as far as I am concerned. But I will not join this National Party, and I will not acknowledge them. I might do so now if the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) will repeat what he said at that fine meeting in Château Richer, but I know that the people of that parish were noble and would not listen to nonsense, and so they would not listen to that.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There is no objection to bring down the papers, but I might state the information I have is—and probably, when the hon. gentleman gets that information he may not consider it necessary to press for the return—that the records of the Department show that no lands have been granted to Mr. Valin, and the officer of the Department who gives me this information says:

"It is assumed that the motion alluded to lands allotted to Mr. P. V. Valin for colonization purposes."

These lands are three townships west of Long Lake, about 200 miles away from the scene of the recent troubles. They did not interfere in any way with the troubles; they did not interfere with the lands of the half-breeds, and upon those lands Mr. Valin has already made a payment of over $13,000. The even numbered sections, of course, are open to homestead entry in the same way as other lands throughout the North-West.

Mr. CASGRAIN. As my hon. friend, the member for Montmorency (Mr. Valin), admits that he has received these lands, I would like to know their extent, the price paid upon them, and what is due. I think that information should be granted.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Certainly.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would say to my hon. friend that his memory may be short, but he should be more accurate in representing what I stated. I never said he was associated, in obtaining these lands, with the hon. the Minister of Public Works. I never asserted that at all. I will give him the precise accusation I made against him. It is in French, and I will read it in English :

"I accuse Mr. Valin, my colleague, of not having the courage of coming before his electors, and of having prevented their meeting."

That was my accusation, and I accused him also of being one of those partners who have tried by speculations in the North-West to deprive the Metis of the Parish of St. Louis de Langevin of their church and their property, jointly with Messrs. John White and Jamieson. These are the accusations I then thought to be true, and the hon. gentleman might have explained them before the meeting if that meeting had been held. Now, as to the result of the meeting, as what my hon. friend said in English went to the House, and I desire to put the facts correctly before the House, I say there were no bullies there at all from Quebec, on the part of the parties who went down with me there, and I say, moreover, that after that meeting had taken place, we caused the principal rioters to be brought to the police court and they were condemned—some went to gaol and others paid a fine. If any on our side had been guilty of any act of violence, they would also have been brought before the police court, but none of our friends were brought before the police court. When the trial took place I asked my hon. friend to come to the court and exculpate himself from any participation in this affair; but as he did not come, the public drew their inferences. This is all I have to say upon this matter. Do I understand that the hon. Minister will grant this motion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Motion agreed to.

OBSTRUCTIONS IN THE RICHELIEU RIVER.

Mr. BÉCHARD moved for copies of all petitions or memorials received by the Government, since the 1st January, 1882, from riparian owners on the Richelieu River, complaining that the piers constructed in the said river, near the towns of St. John's and Iberville, by the Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly Railway Company, raise the waters of the said river, and that their lands are consequently flooded, and praying for relief. He said: I wish to say a few words in explanation of this motion, and in order to make myself understood by the hon. Minister of Railways, I will do so in English. Some thirty years ago, the Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly Railway Company obtained from the Government of old Canada powers to construct a railway bridge across the Richelieu River, in the immediate vicinity of the towns of St. John's and Iberville. It seems that they constructed the bridge upon piers which were sunk into the river; and from the information I have received, it appears that they sank a good many more piles than were necessary for the bridge. Alongside that bridge, about the middle of the river, they constructed a wharf upon these additional piles upon which to place freight, consisting for the most part of lumber, which is loaded on board of vessels navigating that river and Lake Champlain. Now, the owners of land on the banks of the river complain that these piers constitute an obstruction by interfering with the natural flow of water, and during the spring, when the waters of the river are very high, a considerable portion of their lands become flooded and remain flooded until so late a period in the season that the only grain they can sow is buckwheat, which, as the Minister knows very well, can be sown until the beginning of July. Hence, the farmers receive little or no profit from that portion of their land, although it is the richest soil and the most valuable part of their farms. It is well known that on both sides of the river the land is flat and very low, and hence, one can understand the large quantity of land that is flooded. I am informed also that the difference between the level of the river at St. John's and at Isle aux Noix, a distance of twelve miles, is but a trifle over one inch, which fact shows that the flow of water is very slow, and proves how easily it can be obstructed and the extent of the obstruction. The farmers have been complaining for many years. Some years ago they sent a petition to the Governor General in Council, setting forth their grievances and asking for relief. I believe they also stated in their petition that the eel-weirs which exist in the river also constitute an obstruction to the flow of water, and helps to keep their farms flooded for a long period. It is to my personal knowledge that, some fifteen years ago, these eel-weirs were standing at the head of the rapids, but they have been removed, by order of the Marine Department, to the lower part of the rapids. Of course, I am unable to judge as to the extent to which these obstructions raise the water in the river, but I know that the farmers have complained for years of these additional piles along the railway bridge, as causing the water to overflow their lands for a longer period than would be the case if no such obstruction existed. They hope and believe that the hon. Minister of Railways, to whose Department this matter belongs, will give it his attention and procure them relief if it is in his power. They expect that he will cause an investigation to be made in order to see if any relief can be afforded them.

Mr. POPE. I am aware that there has been a considerable correspondence in relation to this matter, but it occurs to me that it was correspondence with respect to the sale of this property that the hon. gentleman speaks of. However, the returns will be brought down, and the action of the Department will be guided by the opinion of the Minister of Justice as to the legal position of the matter. Everything will be done that can be done.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved :

That a Special Committee of seven members be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House on Thursday, 25th ult., and that Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Hector Langevin, Sir Richard Cartwright and Messrs. McLellan, Bowell, Blake and Vail do compose the said Committee.

Motion agreed to.

IMPERIAL FEDERATION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before that motion is put, Mr. Speaker, I have a word or two to say. A question was raised the other night as to the veracity, or, at all events, as to the accuracy of a statement made by me with respect to certain words alleged to have been used by the right hon. the First Minister. The Minister of the Interior appeared to suppose that I had misquoted the First Minister, or omitted a material portion of his speech, or had in some shape or way dealt unfairly with his speech. All those words, I think, were used by that hon. gentleman. Now, I have obtained since then an accurate copy in the Mail newspaper of the whole speech made by the First Minister on 23rd November, 1881, a printed slip of which I held in my hand at the time I spoke, although I find the date was printed 1883 instead of 1881, as it should have been. In order to show the House that I have in no way misrepresented or misinterpreted the hon. gentleman, I beg to read exactly what he did say, and I suppose the report published in the Mail may be relied upon. The hon. gentleman spoke as follows:—

"Well, then, gentlemen, we are told that we want an Imperial federation. I will not trouble you with a disquisition on the subject just now, but I tell you Imperial federation is utterly impracticable. We could never agree to send a number of men over to England to sit in Parliament there and vote away our rights and privileges. I am, as far as this question goes, up to the handle, a Home Ruler. We will govern our own country. We will put on the taxes ourselves. If we choose to misgovern ourselves, we will do so, and we do not desire England, Ireland or Scotland to tell us we are fools. We will say, if we are fools we will keep our folly to ourselves."

The House will observe that those are the ipsissima verba as I gave them the other night. I am bound, in justice to the First Minister, to say that he did not contradict my statement. In the rest of the speech, which I have examined carefully, I find no reference whatever, except a very short line, to the subject of Imperial federation. The hon. gentleman simply goes on to give his reasons for preferring annexation to independence. From the beginning to the end I cannot find one single word of the quotation which the Minister of the Interior read, and which he thought I had confounded with the speech of the First Minister, so that, I think, I am justified in saying that I neither made any important omission nor in any degree misrepresented the First Minister's statement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What is the date?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Twenty-third November, 1881. It was made before the convention in Toronto. That was the speech from which I quoted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman, I think, said 1883—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—instead of 1881. And the Minister of the Interior referred to my speech in 1884. In the autumn of 1884 I made a speech in Toronto, and my hon. friend quoted from that speech, in which I elaborated the subject. My hon. friend quoted from my speech at that meeting in Toronto and thought the hon. gentleman had alluded to that speech, as in fact I thought. I forgot that I had spoken at all in 1881.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Hon. gentlemen opposite think there is something inconsistent in the statement made by the hon. gentleman in the speech from which I quoted and the remarks quoted by the member from Centre Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). As a matter of fact, if the hon. gentleman will read carefully the speech I read he will find that the passages are in exactly the same sense as the speech from which he has just quoted: that is to say, that the First Minister was opposed to a form of Imperial federation such as was described by the leader of the Opposition in a very famous deliverance at Aurora some years ago, in which he urged representation in the Imperial Parliament, which would involve, in the very nature of things, the cession of some of the privileges which we now enjoy as an independent Parliament of this Dominion. But he went on further, and elaborated in exactly the same terms that he used on several occasions—in Montreal and other places—a scheme of Imperial consolidation, which would be practically an alliance of semi-independent kingdoms for the maintenance of the peace of the world; and there is no possible inconsistency between the quotations which the hon. gentleman has read, as he will see upon looking at the earlier passages of the quotations which I read to the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to say—I did not observe it at the time, else I would have taken the opportunity of correcting him then—that the hon. gentleman used words with reference to myself, which I think were hardly parliamentary. He said, speaking of my reference to his speech at the St. George's Club, that I had "foisted in the word 'beautiful.'" As the hon. gentleman has made that statement, I may be permitted to quote the language of his speech from the Canadian Gazette of January 7th, 1886:

"Let us take the case of the Dominion of Canada, every acre of which is a beautiful climate"

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no; the hon. gentleman said I spoke of the beautiful soil.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all; I think I can settle that question. The hon. gentleman is probably excusable for forgetting what he spoke in 1881, but I think he should be able to remember what he said so short a time ago as last Friday. Here is what the hon. gentleman said:

"He spoke about exaggeration, when I said that every acre in the Dominion of Canada was in a healthful climate; the hon. gentleman foisted in the word 'beautiful.'"

That is, that I foisted in the word "beautiful," instead of the word "healthful." Then he says that the words he used were, "a healthful climate" instead of "a beautiful climate." I simply object to being accused of foisting in the word "beautiful," when I referred to the hon. gentleman's speech as applied to the climate of Canada—that is all.

RETURNS RE DISTURBANCE IN THE N. W.

Mr. BLAKE. The House will recollect that, at various periods of last Session, demands were made for large numbers of papers, some described particularly and some by reference to classes, with reference to the communications which had passed between the Government and officials and other individuals in the North-West Territories, prior to and during the early period of the rebellion. The House will also recollect that promises were made that these papers would be produced, if not last Session, this Session. I wish to enquire whether it is the purpose of the Government to bring down those papers at an early day?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I shall revive my recollection of the numerous, or rather the numberless, demands which were made for these papers, and we shall see what papers it is proper to bring down, and shall bring them down.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I would ask if it is proposed to lay on the Table of the House the report of the trial of Louis Riel, in a complete form. The hon. gentleman will find that very important passages are omitted from the report of that trial—for instance the discussions which took place between the counsel for the Crown and counsel for the prisoner on motion to adjourn the trial, the charge of the judge, a large portion of the evidence of Charles Nolin, and especially that portion of the cross-examination which has relation to the insanity of the prisoner, and the arguments of counsel as to the charge of the judge. All these are omitted, and I would ask if it is intended to bring the report down in a complete form?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I would say to the hon. gentleman that what has been published is the whole evidence taken at the trial. The speeches have not been published, as they are found in the records which were transmitted to the Department of Justice.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). There is a great deal more than the speeches omitted.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The speeches were not published and for a very good reason, because they did not form a part of the evidence in the case. The only portion of the speeches which might be taken as part of the evidence, is the speech of the prisoner, which was published. I understand, however, that the House will order the re-printing of copies of these documents, and if it is desired, the speeches will also be included.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The charge of the judge was omitted, and that certainly is a very important portion of the trial, and it certainly ought to be before the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman will see that in this case as in all other criminal cases, the judge makes a report of the evidence, and that is what has been published, according to what my hon. friend the Secretary of State has stated. I understand that my hon. friend ordered to be published the whole of the evidence as transmitted by the judge.

Mr. BLAKE. It is quite plain from the contemporary reports of the trial published in the newspapers, that there were certain discussions which, to my mind, are extremely important, but which have not been published, including those portions referred to by my hon. friend from Huron, and one which took place at a certain period of the trial between the prisoner, his counsel, and the court. There was also a discussion with reference to the proposal for an adjournment. None of those discussions appear, nor is there any report of the charge of the judge.

Mr. LAURIER. I would also ask the Government whether they intend to lay on the Table of the House copies of the petitions asking for the commutation of the sentence of Louis Riel?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman can move for that.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return of the Receipts and Expenditure, in detail, chargeable to the Consolidated Fund, from the 1st day of July, 1884, to the 1st day of March, 1885, and from the 1st day of July, 1885, to the 1st day of March, 1886.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Return in the form used in the Statement usually published in the Gazette, of the Exports and Imports from the 1st day of July, 1884, to the 1st day of February, 1885, and from the 1st day of July, 1885, to the 1st day of February, 1886, distinguishing the products of Canada and those of other countries.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Return showing the names of all persons who tendered for the contract of carrying the Mail from Calgary to Fort Macleod, the amount of each tender, to whom the contract was let; together with all papers and correspondence relating to said contract.—(Mr. Landerkin.)

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 4:20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 3rd March, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved :

That the report of the Select Committee appointed to prepare and report lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House, in so far as it relates to the Committees on Privileges, Elections, Expiring Laws, Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, Miscellaneous Private Bills, Printing, Public Accounts, Banking and Commerce, and Immigration and Colonisation, be concurred in.

Mr. COURSOL. I have not got the names of the different committees. Are the names to be submitted to the House ?

Mr. SPEAKER. They are in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. COURSOL. Then I beg to move in amendment, seconded by Mr. Gigault, that the following words be added to the motion :—

And that Mr. Desjardins be added to the Select Standing Committees on Privileges and Elections, on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, on Printing, and on Banking and Commerce; that Mr. Amyot be added to the Select Standing Committees on Privileges and Elections, on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, and on Miscellaneous Private Bills; and that Mr. Bergeron be added to the Select Standing Committees on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, on Standing Orders, and on Public Accounts."

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have no objection to the motion of the hon. gentleman, provided that other names are added on the different committees mentioned by the hon.

member for Montreal East, Mr. Coursol. The hon. gentleman proposes to add the names of Mr. Desjardins and Mr. Amyot to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; I suggest that two other names be added to that committee. The hon. gentleman moves that Messrs. Desjardins, Amyot and Bergeron be added to the Railway Committee; I would suggest three names in addition. Then the hon. gentleman moves to add one name each to the Private Bills Committee, to the Banking Committee, and to the Public Accounts Committee; I shall move that one more be added to each of those committees. The hon. gentleman has also moved to add the name of Mr. Desjardins to the Printing Committee. If I understand the matter rightly, we have already one too many on that committee. Mr. Foster's name was left there by mistake, and should be withdrawn; so that, perhaps, the hon. gentleman would leave out that portion of his motion, to be dealt with afterwards, so as not to cause complication; because the hon. gentleman knows that the Printing Committee is a joint Committee, with a fixed number, and that the two Houses must have the same number.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is not limited in number. The Senate can appoint another one also.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; no doubt.

Mr. COURSOL. I understand Mr. Desjardins was on the committee last year, and I think he was a very useful member on that committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the House will allow me to write my amendment.

Mr. BLAKE. While the hon. gentleman is engaged in writing his amendment, I would say that I think a mistake was made in the course of the proceedings in committee for which I hold myself responsible. I had supposed that the name of my hon. friend from Lévis (Dr. Guay) would be placed on some of the Standing Committees in the course of last Session, but it turned out that the election for Lévis came so late in the Session that there was no opportunity to do so. As sometimes happens when a vacancy is filled late, no change is thought worth while, so that no suggestion was made for the addition of his name. It is customary, of course, for every hon. member to be upon some committee, unless in exceptional circumstances, and I therefore suppose that there will be no objection to Dr. Guay being added to the committees on which his predecessor was placed, namely: the Committees on Banking and Commerce, and Immigration and Colonisation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly. Last year the Printing Committee numbered fifteen, and I have no doubt that the Senate appointed a committee of fifteen. Mr. Foster, who was on it last year, we have struck out and replaced by another; but as the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) says, we may increase the number and ask the Senate to increase their contingent to the same number, so that we will leave Mr. Foster in, and by leaving him in, you can add Mr. Desjardins—that will make seventeen.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved in amendment to the amendment:

That the following Members be also added to the following Committees:—Sir Adolphe P. Oaron and Sir Hector Langevin to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections; Messrs. Bourbeau, Shakespeare and Hesson to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines; Mr. Bain (Soulanges) to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills; Mr. Tassé to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts; Mr. Burns to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce; and Mr. Guay to the Select Standing Committees on Banking and Commerce and on Immigration and Colonisation.

Amendment to the amendment agreed to, and motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That a Message be sent to the Senate, requesting that their Honors will unite with this House in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the Members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, viz.: Messrs. Allison, Baker (Missisquoi), Bergin, Blondeau, Bourassa, Bowell, Charlton, Desjardins, Foster, Innes, Landry (Montmagny), Somerville (Brant), Tassé, Taylor, Trow, Vanasse, and White (Cardwell) will act as Members on the part of this House of the said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Annual Report of the Department of Indian Affairs.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 5) to extend the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of Ontario.—(Mr. Allen.)

PROPOSED COURT OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 6) for constituting a Court of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and to amend the Consolidated Railway Act of 1879. He said: In introducing this Bill, I may say, Mr. Speaker, that it is the same Bill I had the honor of introducing last Session, and, practically, it is the same measure which was introduced in a former Session, which was read the second time and referred to the Railway Committee, by whom it was rejected by a very large majority. The Bill, upon being brought back to the House, was not voted upon, and I now re-introduce it for the purpose of carrying it through the second reading, with the hope that it may receive on this occasion a more favorable support than it did the Session to which I have referred. The provisions of the Act are, of course, well known to all hon. members, and I need not offer any further explanation at present. Substantially it is the same measure, founded on the lines of the English Railway Commission and purporting to constitute a court for the purpose of giving effect to the laws of the land with respect to railway companies. This House is aware that this is a very difficult problem to deal with; that in the adjoining country, most of the States, a very large number of them, at all events, have adopted in one shape or other some form of Railway Commission; that for the last seven or eight years the United States Congress has been endeavoring to agree upon a measure to regulate the railway commerce of the whole of the country. But, as I understand, while the House of Representatives has been able to agree to a Bill, and the Senate has also been able to agree upon a measure, both Houses have not been able to agree upon one particular measure, so up to this time no law has been passed constituting a court of Railway Commissioners or dealing with this great question by Congress for the United States as a whole. No measure, so far as I know, seems to have given more effect to the law or to be better adapted for the purpose for which it was intended than the Railway Commission established in England in 1872. So much is this the case that since then that court of commission, which was of a temporary character, has been from time to time extended, and certain of the powers of the commission have been enlarged; and both parties there have agreed apparently that the commissioners' powers ought to be extended; and I notice in the Speech from the Throne, on the opening of the new Parliament, that the late Government of Lord Salisbury brought it forward prominently as a measure to be dealt with during the present Session.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CARRIERS BY LAND.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) respecting Carriers by Land. He said: The Bill which I have the honor to introduce is not exactly the same as the Bill on the same subject which I had the honor of introducing last Session, and which received upon a vote the assent of the majority of the House. This Bill is, however, substantially in the same direction, and it is founded upon the two statutes regulating the Carriers law of England: one passed in 1830 and known as the Carriers Act, and the other passed in 1854, and having special relation to railway companies. The great features of this Bill are: First, to declare that no carriers by notice shall limit his liability as a carrier in any way or form. But he might, by a contract signed by the person sending the goods, limit his liability, provided that that contract having been so signed, is afterwards, in case of difficulty arising, found to be just and reasonable by any court or judge before whom the question may come, so far as to the liabilities of carriers. Then, in the other direction, it limits the responsibility of carriers to certain definite amounts for the animals or goods they may carry, unless a value greater than these amounts be stated at the time the goods are forwarded, and some additional compensation be paid to the carrier for transporting the goods—in point of fact, insuring the goods while they are in transit. These are the main features, and I trust the Bill may become law, as at present there appears to be no limitation on the powers of carriers—and, of course, the great railway companies are the chief carriers of the country—whereby they can be prevented putting before persons compelled to send goods over their lines such conditions as render the company wholly irresponsible, no matter whether the damage may happen by their default or neglect or not.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONSOLIDATED RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) to amend the Consolidated Railway Act of 1879. He said: This is a short Bill, but I believe and hope that it is one which will receive the unanimous consent of this House. Since 1868, strange to say, in our railway legislation we have made no provision at all for the protection of people whose property is injuriously affected by the works of a railway company. There is provision made, though not in very express language, for compensation for lands taken, but there is no provision in the case of lands injuriously affected. How that omission occurred in 1868, I do not know. The provision was in the Consolidated Statutes of Old Canada; it is now the law of the land in the Province of Ontario, but it has been omitted, not only in 1868 but again in 1879, when the law here was re-consolidated. I propose just to add two clauses which are to be found in the Consolidated Act of Canada, Chapter 66, Sections 4 and 5, by which companies are made responsible and bound to pay fit compensation, not merely for lands taken but for those which are injuriously affected by the construction of their works.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MEMBERS' INDEMNITY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. FARROW moved for leave to introduce to Bill to amend the Members' Indemnity Act. He said: I think most hon. members are acquainted with this short
Mr. McCARTHY.

Bill. It was introduced last Session, but though the Session lasted a long time we had not time to get this Bill through. I hope this Session will not be so long, and yet that we may have time to pass this measure. It is a very plain and short Bill. It provides that when a member is sick, outside of Ottawa, he shall receive his pay as if he were in Ottawa. It appears to me that the old law favors some members more than others. It favors the member living in Ottawa, abiding at home, where he may be nursed and attended to, and it favors the Cabinet Ministers, who receive large salaries and who ought to be here. But I think from what I have heard and from what I know of the opinion of members on both sides of this House, that they agree that if a member is taken sick here, and desires to return to his home to be doctored and nursed, and where he would have a better chance of recovering, he shall receive the same pay as if he remained in Ottawa.

Mr. BLAKE. I would point out that as this Bill proposes to increase the public charge, it is not in order to introduce it in this way.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is a Bill which, from the reading of it, shows that its purpose is to increase the charges upon the public treasury, and it must therefore originate by committee, with the consent of the Crown. I hope the hon. gentleman will withdraw the Bill and have it introduced by resolution, as that is the better way.

Motion withdrawn.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 9) in reference to the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: This Bill has for its object the bringing into effect of the Revised Statutes of Canada, which I laid upon the Table this afternoon. After the attention which the subject has received in both Houses last Session, I take it that the present Bill will be, in its progress through its chief stages, regarded as of a merely formal character; but at the same time it may be convenient for the House that I should make briefly such explanations as seem to be in point at this stage, rather than at the second reading of the Bill, in view of its probable formal disposition at that stage. The House is probably aware that in 1831, the Hon. Mr. Cockburn was appointed a commissioner for the purpose of initiating this work, and that under the commission he proceeded with the preliminary work of the revision, assisted by Mr. Ferguson, who is one of the present commissioners. In the Session of 1883, the preliminary work of the commission having advanced a considerable stage, a new commission was organized, consisting of Sir Alexander Campbell, Hon. Mr. Cockburn, Mr. Ouimet, Mr. Graham, Mr. Ferguson, and Dr. Wilson. Mr. Cockburn was afterwards succeeded by Mr. O'Connor, who served on the commission until his elevation to the bench of the High Court of Justice of Ontario. These gentlemen have proceeded with their work with the utmost diligence since that time, and the result of their labors was the volumes which were laid on the Table of Parliament last Session, and which received the careful scrutiny of a large committee of both Houses of Parliament. I think that the opinion of that committee, in so far as I have been able to ascertain it, was that the work was not only carefully done, but performed in such a way as to speak very highly for the patience and the ability which the revisers had displayed in preparing their consolidation. Since the prorogation of Parliament, however, additional instructions were given to some of the gentlemen who were on the former Commission. One or two names were substituted for those of gentlemen who were at a distance and could not perform the new duties at the city of Ottawa, and instructions were given to those gentlemen to further revise the consolidation which had been laid on the Table last Session, for the purpose of carrying out the suggestions made by the joint committee, and to include in the revision the statutes of last Session. The volumes which I laid on the Table half an hour ago include the results of the labors of those gentlemen, and supplement the labors of the chief commissioners. Those volumes will be found to carry out the suggestions of the committee of both Houses of last Session. The Acts of last Session are included, and a few further amendments which seemed to be necessary in order to give effect and completeness to the whole work. It is proposed that, after the revision has been adopted by Parliament at this Session, if it should be, the work should be finally issued, with the statutes of the present Session included, and that it should be supplemented then by a third volume, embracing the Statutes of the United Kingdom having reference to Canada and in force in Canada, Orders in Council which have the force of law in the Dominion of Canada, and other statutes which hon. members will find in schedule B of the volumes now on the Table, and which contain provisions which the commissioners did not deem it desirable to consolidate, partly because some of them relate to portions of Canada less than a whole Province, partly because some of them have a temporary character, and partly because some of them are of doubtful jurisdiction as between this Parliament and the Provincial Parliaments. When this is done the consolidation will be complete. In stating to the House that the recommendations made by the committee of last Session have been adopted, I should add one qualification. The report of the committee set forth a schedule of amendments which they desired to be made in the revision, and they closed with this general suggestion :

That each chapter be numbered and given a short title, thus :—“Chapter 1—Of Interpretation of Statutes,” in lieu of the long title in the draft, and that all preambles be left out.

The reference to preambles is to the usual expression preceding every Act of Parliament, but not always preceding each chapter of Revised or Consolidated Statutes—“be it enacted by the Governor General,” etc. This suggestion has not been adopted, and it is not proposed to act on it. I understand it not to have been as formal a recommendation as the other recommendations of the committee, and there seemed to be reasons commending themselves to the judgment of the revisers why that suggestion should not be carried out. One is that the practice of having each chapter of the revision appear as a separate Act, is a practice which has been adopted in Ontario, and, I think, in all the other Provinces of the Dominion except New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; and it was the opinion of at least some of the gentlemen connected with the revision in those two Provinces that it would be more convenient, for uniformity and other reasons, such as convenience of quotation and convenience of reference in amending Acts, to adopt the practice pursued in Ontario. With this single exception the Statutes laid on the Table today embody the suggestions which were made by the committee of both Houses last Session.

Mr. BLAKE. The business which the hon. gentleman proposes to engage in is certainly one of some seriousness, and, I think, should demand a little more than that formal attention which he seemed to suppose the House should be called on to give it. If we give it no more than formal attention on this occasion, we shall on no occasion have given it more. The committee only considered it during the last Session of Parliament, and the time and circumstances under which the consolidation was brought down were such as to render it impossible for the mass of members to deal with it. I am glad to find it brought down at so early a period this Session, and I hope it will receive something more from the House than the formal attention which the hon. gentleman bespoke. I think it ought to, because it involves certain questions which do not arise in ordinary consolidations, one of the most important of which the hon. gentleman incidentally touched upon. I refer to the grave and serious question which arises in our legislative transactions of the power of Parliament to pass certain laws which we assume occasionally to pass. The hon. gentleman has told us, what we were not informed of in the Speech from the Throne, that since last Session arrangements were made whereby the volume now submitted is made to contain the Acts of last Session, a perfectly proper proceeding; and he has informed us in general terms of the character of other changes which have been made. I took the liberty, in the short debate which took place last Session, of suggesting that we might find not merely additions, but perhaps also subtractions in the process of judicious delay, and I did not hear the hon. gentleman gratify our curiosity as to whether those expectations have been realised. Although he alluded to the Acts of doubtful jurisdiction, there is one rather large Act that was in the consolidation of which the jurisdiction is no longer in doubt; I refer to the License Act, commonly called the McCarthy Act. We know not if that will appear; if not, I suppose the hon. gentleman will inform us of the economy of space which has been gained by the subsequent labors of his commissioners. I do not propose to say anything with reference to the principle on which the consolidation has been effected just now. My hon. friend behind me pointed out last Session some circumstances, which I thought very well worthy of attention, with reference to the character of the consolidation. It is of great consequence that it should be framed upon just principles, and it seemed to me the suggestions of my hon. friend were such as might well have been attended to on the occasion of the further consideration which the hon. Minister of Justice tells us has been given to the statutes since that time. But these suggestions may perhaps be more fitly made at a later stage, when we understand exactly what alterations have been made in the volume.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I may, in reply to the observations of the hon. gentleman, say that I did not, I think, express myself as desiring that the measure should receive only a formal consideration. I referred to the different stages as being matters of formal proceeding, and it may be that I expressed myself in a way to be misunderstood. I made that remark as a reason why I should enter into an explanation of the Bill at this early stage, and why I supposed it would be more suitable that I should explain now than at the second reading, when I did think the Bill would be passing through a formal stage. But I shall personally, and I am sure my colleagues will also, be greatly gratified if this Bill receive from the members of the House a great deal more than merely formal consideration. With regard to the observations which the hon. gentleman has made as to the statutes of doubtful jurisdiction, I perceive the hon. gentleman has misunderstood me again. The commissioners have not taken the liberty of putting statutes which have passed this Parliament into the schedule of Acts of doubtful jurisdiction. In referring to the subject of doubtful jurisdiction, I referred to Acts in schedule B as Acts which were in force prior to the union of the Provinces, which remain in force in the different Provinces in which they have been passed, and in relation to which, or to some of which, it may be doubtful whether this Parliament has authority to repeal or amend. The particular statute referred to did not, therefore, come within the category at all. The License Act was embraced among the Acts in force, before the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which was arrived at a month or two ago, but the hon. gentlemen will find, before the Bill passes another stage, that the License Act will be placed in a table of errata at the end.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

TRANSFER OF LAND IN THE N. W. T.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 10) respecting the transfer of real property in the North-West Territories. He said: The Bill is one which I shall have to call the attention of the House to at considerable length, perhaps, when I come to move its second reading, because it involves not only a great many details but a great many principles in relation to the transfer of lands in the North-West Territories, which it will then be necessary for me to invite the House to consider most carefully. I may state now, as intimating the general outline of the Bill, what the measure proposes. I will begin by stating that it is substantially the Bill that was introduced in the Senate at an early period last Session and which passed that House with a number of amendments. I take the liberty, however, of inviting the attention of Parliament to certain features of the Bill which were eliminated in the Senate. It proposes, in the first place, that there shall be four registries for land in the North-West Territories: one in the Assiniboine district, one in the Alberta district, and two in the district of Saskatchewan. We propose in respect of titles already existing in the North-West Territories certain provisions which will have the effect of bringing all of them on the register. As regards future operations in land, that is to say in regard to all titles emanating from the Crown hereafter, it is proposed that the operation of the Bill shall be compulsory in the Territories. Land patents henceforth will be forwarded to the proper registry office and there take their place on the register; this is with a view of beginning a thorough system of registration of titles in respect to all future operations in land. In respect to lands to be brought on the register, of which the titles now exist, it is proposed that these registrars shall exercise a scrutiny for the purpose of ascertaining correctly the validity of each title and to identify the properties to which the titles appear to refer. The registrar shall then—and this applies both to existing titles and those to emanate from the Crown hereafter—issue a certificate of title, and this certificate shall, while outstanding, operate and give to the person named in it an indefeasible title, such certificate to be conclusive evidence as to the title, so that even the rightful owner, in point of morals and equity, shall have no right to recover the property against the registered holder. It will enable the transfer of land to be accomplished by entering into a memorandum of sale, the form of which is given in the Act. It will make the transfer exceedingly simple in form, available to every land owner, without necessity for professional assistance, and that memorandum is to be consummated and the transfer of the title to be effected by presentation to the registrar, the holder of the property being identified and surrendering his outstanding certificate. This will enable land to be transferred as chattels are, as bank stock is, and as shipping is under Acts relating to these properties. Another important provision of the Bill, and one that did not meet with favor last Session in the Senate, is that which aims at the abolition of the distinction between real and personal property. It is proposed that land shall be in the position of chattels real in the North-West Territories hereafter, thereby at once sweeping away the doctrines relating to real property, which encumber its progress and transfer, and have created a good deal of difficulty in the acquisition and transfer of property in the older Provinces, to say nothing of the accumulation of difficulties with which they have surrounded the acquisition and transfer of lands in older countries still. It is proposed, that on the transmission of land by operation of law, such as by bankruptcy or otherwise, the transfer shall be verified by the registrar and completed in much the same way as is done now in respect of shipping; but in relation to transmission by will or intestacy, instead of its being necessary that the registrar should ascertain the persons on whom the property devolves, there shall be a realty representative, who shall produce to the registrar the will of the deceased or the letters of administration, and that representative shall be regarded as the absolute owner of the property, to deal with it according to the will or according to the law of intestacy, it being the policy to take no notice of trusts and to provide that trusts shall not bind the land, although they may be enforced by the courts against the trustee, and, in some instances, against the land itself by decree. This is to accomplish the object of having every holder take his position on the register as being, to all intents and purposes, the absolute owner of the property. There is one additional provision that I should mention, and that is a provision for compensation for mistakes that may be made by the registrar in the discharge of his duties. It is obvious that, when we undertake to give an indefeasible title by the act of the registrar, we must provide against the contingency of a bond fide owner of property being divested of it by the error or mistake of the registrar; and this Act provides that compensation shall be made to any such owner who is so divested of his property. I am not prepared just now to say that the details of the Bill, in that particular, as now prepared, will be entirely satisfactory. It may be that, at a subsequent stage of the Bill, it may be found necessary to provide for an augmentation of the fund created by the present Bill, but I think that the explanations which will be made of the operation of the Act in countries where it has been adopted will be such as to allay the feeling of alarm which would naturally be excited by the idea of compensation being provided for the land owners dispossessed by the act of the registrar. I need not go into the details now, but I may say, in a general way, that the experience in the countries where this system has been adopted has been that an exceedingly light tax, based upon the value of the property brought before the registrar, has been found far more than ample to provide for the mistakes which have to be corrected. In South Australia—I think in most of the Australian colonies—one halfpenny in the pound on the property brought before the registrar has been found so far from being insufficient to meet the expense that it has accumulated, until it now reaches something like £38,000 or £40,000 sterling in one colony. The objects of the measure, and the features which I have stated are, then, in the first place, in relation to land in the North-West Territory, to give security of title equal at least to that provided in the other Provinces, and to some extent there, by the registration of deeds; in the second place, to provide for cheapness and ease of transfer far greater than can be provided under any system of registration of deeds whatever, and to provide, once for all, and at this early stage in the history of the North-West Territory, a system of land laws which will obviate for all time to come, in relation to those territories, the inconvenience, the expense and the difficulties in relation to the holding and transfer of land which have reached a serious magnitude in some older countries. I will be able, at a subsequent stage of the Bill, to lay before the House some details of the operation of Acts of this character in the countries in which this system has been adopted, but I think I am justified in saying now, in a general way, that the experience of every country in which it has been adopted, including all the colonies of Australia, New Zealand, in British Columbia, and in some parts of the Indian Possessions, it has been most satisfactory in its working, and has met to the fullest extent the objections of those who were opposed to its introduction, and that it is a measure which can be safely adopted in any Province, Colony or Territory in the position of the North-West Territory. Very recently a publication has been made in the United Kingdom by the incorporated Law Society, which, as we all know, is composed of gentlemen who are qualified in the highest degree to give an independent and wise opinion upon the value of a measure of this kind. I have had the opportunity of giving some attention to their publication, and I have been struck by nothing in it more than by this fact that every objection which they make to the introduction of such a scheme as this into the United Kingdom, is one which, I am happy to say, we are free from in legislating in regard to the North-West Territory. In the first place, there are the great disadvantages which any change in the Land Laws involves in the Mother Country, in the disturbance of the habits, the prejudices and the customs of the country, in relation to the holding, transfer and settlement of land; and there is also the difficulty of bringing before the registrar titles of great age, involving great difficulties, causing a great deal of delay and expense in their investigation, and, more especially, the difficulty which exists there in connection with the identification of persons and in relation to the changing of boundaries from time to time. In the North-West Territory we have a system of survey which is peculiarly advantageous in regard to the application of a system like this, and, what is of more consequence, we have proximity to the root of the title itself. The titles now in existence there are of modern date in comparison with those which exist in other countries, and we have yet to issue very many of the titles to those lands which will no doubt be called for in the course of a few years. These circumstances make it desirable, I think, that a Bill like this should be adopted in relation to the North-West Territory, and I therefore move its first reading.

Mr. MILLS. This is, no doubt, a very important subject, and one which, I believe, the Government or one of their supporters has introduced to the attention of the House on some previous occasions. As early as 1873 I had the honor, as a member of the Government of my hon. friend from East York, to introduce a measure on the same subject, or one of a cognate character, and that has been upon the statute book from that day to this, but the portion of the measure which provided for the registration of titles has never been dealt with up to the present moment. I know that, on that occasion, the organs of the hon. gentleman who leads the Government took very strong ground against the proposed change in the registration of titles for real property. I suppose, now that the measure emanates from that side of the House and has the support of the Minister of Justice it will receive different treatment from what it did some years ago. Of course I do not know what the provisions of the Bill, as introduced by the Minister of Justice, are, but I think there were some serious defects in the measures which the hon. gentleman on that side of the House submitted to the consideration of Parliament on this subject. I may mention one or two of those defects. The Bill provided that property, on the death of an intestate, should vest in the real or personal representative, but it made no provision whatever for the partition of the estate. Now, unless that is done, there will be really no provision for the registration of the estate in the interest of the various owners to whom it would devolve by succession. Of course, I will not say anything with respect to the provisions of the hon. gentleman's Bill, because I have not got it before me, and cannot discuss it in this respect, but I have no doubt that it will be a very great improvement upon the law as it now stands—that it will greatly facilitate the searches made in respect to titles, and will cheapen the transfer of real property. Unless, however, the hon. gentleman's Bill does provide for the registration or partition of estates, it will certainly be defective.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). If I understand the hon. gentleman's objection, the Bill provides for it, but I will carefully consider his suggestion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 11) for the more effectual prevention of Cruelty to Animals. He said: This Bill was introduced last Session, but at too late a date to receive the consideration of the House. It imposes penalties for maliciously killing animals, for unlawfully and maliciously attempting to kill, for acts of wanton cruelty, for injury done to animals in driving, for using live animals as targets, and for neglecting impounded animals. It also makes provisions with regard to the transportation of live stock on railways, the feeding of such animals, periods of rest, care of cars, etc. The Bill, when printed and distributed, will, I trust, in its humane and merciful provisions, receive the approbation of the members of this House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MORTGAGES ON REAL ESTATE.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 12) to amend the Act relating to interest on moneys secured by mortgage on real estate. He said: In 1880 an Act was passed providing that moneys secured by real estate mortgage, if paid after the lapse of a certain period, could be paid off on certain conditions. One condition was that the mortgager should pay three months' interest in advance. I propose to alter that clause, providing that three months' notice may be given. I also propose to shorten the period from five years to three years, as mortgages are now usually drawn upon real estate for a period of five years. I also propose to put in another clause that will permit the mortgagee or any other person entitled to pay the encumbrance on any property to pay it off at a shorter date than three years under certain conditions.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPREME COURT.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 13) to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as respects matters of a purely local nature in the Province of Quebec.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. LANDRY. The title explains for those who want to understand.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

TIMBER LICENSES IN THE DISPUTED TERRITORY.

Mr. WALLACE (York) enquired, How many applications have been made for licenses to cut timber within what is known as the "Disputed Territory" since 1872, giving the number in each year? How many Orders in Council were passed authorising the issue of such licenses, giving the number in each year? How many licenses were actually issued, stating the number in each year and the period for which they were issued respectively? The amount paid for ground rent of timber limits, stating the number of payments made on passage of the Orders in Council before the issue of the license and the number who paid after the issue of license? What amount has been received by the Department of the Interior for dues on timber cut under license, and how many licensees have made payments on account of dues? How many persons have at this moment authority by license to cut timber in the "Disputed Territory," and for what periods respectively do their licenses extend? How many permits have been issued, in each year since 1872, to cut timber in the "Disputed Territory?" What amount has been received by the Government as dues on timber cut under such permits? How many persons are at the present time authorised to cut timber under permit in the "Disputed Territory?" Has any sum, and, if so, how much, been refunded to persons who have paid money to the Department for timber licenses or permits but who have cut no timber under such licenses or permits?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). In answer to the first question, there were 308 applications made, as follows: in 1872, 11; 1873, 2; 1874, 2; 1875, 5; 1876, 1; 1877, 2; 1878, 1; 1879, 6; 1880, 4; 1881, 11; 1882, 26; 1883, 108; 1884, 126; 1885, 3. On the second point: There were 115 Orders in Council, made up as follows: 1873, 4; 1874, none; 1875, none; 1876, none; 1877, none; 1878, 1; 1879, none; 1880, 2; 1881, none; 1882, 1; 1883, 48; 1884, 60. On the third point: There were 4 leases for the term of twenty-one years, and 23 yearly licenses expiring on the 31st December of the year in which they were issued. Of these, 1 was granted in 1875, 1 in 1876, 1 in 1878, 1 in 1880, each of these being leases for twenty-one years; 18 were granted in 1884; 7 in 1885. Of these yearly licenses, I may say 23 in all have lapsed, and have not since been renewed. No licenses have been issued for 1886. On the fourth point: The amount paid for ground rent is $18,263.35 altogether. Twenty-three persons paid $7,578.28, prior to the issue to them of their respective licenses, as ground rent for 1884; twenty-four persons paid various sums, amounting in all to $5,624.81, prior to receiving the instructions for the survey of their respective berths, but have not yet received their respective licenses. All the leaseholders (three) and four of the licensees have paid ground rent since the issue of their respective leases or licenses. The licensees who thus paid did so for the year 1885, and the amounts paid by them was $1,005.03. On the fifth point: The lessees of twenty-one years, or their assignees, have paid to this Department the sum of $27,520.86. The holders of yearly licenses cut no timber, so far as we know, under their licenses, and paid no dues. On the sixth point: The following three firms only:—The "Rainy Lake Lumber Company," "The Keewatin Lumbering and Manufacturing Company," and "Messrs. Dick and Banning." All those are cutting under twenty-one year leases, the first named expiring in the year 1896; the second in the year 1896; and the third, who are the assignees of W. J. Macaulay, hold two such leases, covering in all a tract of 100 square miles. One of these leases expires in 1899, and the other 1901. On the seventh point: No permits were issued to cut timber in this Territory prior to the year 1881; since that time 63 permits have been issued as follows: 1881, 5; 1882, 14; 1883, 28; 1884, 16. We have collected the sum of $27,416.32 as dues on timber cut under permits in the disputed Territory. All those permits have expired. Under the regulations all permits expire on the 1st of May next succeeding the issue thereof; consequently as no permits have been issued since 1884, there have been none such in force since May 1st, 1885. There has been no refund made to any of the parties who have paid money to the Department, but have cut no timber under such license or permits.

Mr. WALLACE (York).

DISTURBANCE IN THE N. W.—CLAIMS PAID.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What amount has been paid from the 1st July, 1885, to the 1st March, 1886, on account of the recent rebellion in the North-West, or of claims arising therefrom?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The expenditure by the Militia Department from 1st July, 1885, to 1st March, 1886, on account of the recent rebellion in the North-West, or for claims arising therefrom, has been $2,286,960.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My question covers all the expenditure—not that of the Militia alone. Perhaps the Minister of Finance can inform me whether the only expenditure made has been through the Militia Department?

Mr. McLELAN. The statement in the Finance Department of the amount paid from 1st July, 1885, to 1st March, 1886, on account of the recent rebellion in the North-West, or of claims arising therefrom, is as follows: Miscellaneous Justice, including North-West Territories, $35,577.83; expenses and losses arising out of troubles, including expenditure by the Department of Militia for transport of troops, etc., $2,128,310.01; sundry claims for losses paid, $65,790; expenses of North-West rebellion losses commission, $2,017.65; or a total of $2,231,695.49.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that in addition to the other amount?

Mr. McLELAN. No. This is the whole amount we have entered in the Finance Department as having been paid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So that $2,300,000 in round numbers covers the whole amount up to date?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What was the amount of the net public debt on 1st March, 1886?

Mr. McLELAN. $208,522,695.15.

DIGBY PIER.

Mr. VAIL asked, Is it the intention of the Government to make such temporary repairs to the Digby Pier, as will admit of steamers landing passengers and freight on said Pier till the permanent work is completed; if so, when will the work be commenced?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the intention to immediately proceed with the work.

DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST—CLAIMS COMMISSION.

Mr. CASEY asked, Whether the Commission appointed to settle claims arising out of the North-West rebellion (connected with the Department of Militia and Defence) has yet reported, and if so, when its report will be laid before the House?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. A preliminary report of the commission referred to will be laid on the Table of the House in a few days.

SETTLERS IN MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What is the number of settlers supposed to have settled in Manitoba and the North-West Territories in the calendar year 1885?

Mr. CARLING. The number of settlers supposed to have settled in Manitoba and the North-West Territories for the year 1885 was 7,240.

CENSUS OF MANITOBA, NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES AND KEEWATIN

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) asked, Has the census of Manitoba, the North-West Territories and the District of Keewatin, or either of them, been taken under the Act 48 and 49 Victoria, Chapter 3? If so, what, by said census, is the white population of Manitoba, the District of Keewatin and of the North-West Territories separately, and what is the Indian and half-breed population in each?

Mr. CARLING. The census of Manitoba and the North-West Territories and the District of Keewatin has not been taken under the Act referred to. A census of the three districts of the North-West Territories, Assiniboia, Saskatchewan and Alberta, was taken in August, 1885. The population of the three districts was as follows: Whites, 23,344; Indians, 20,170; Half-breeds, 4,848; total population, 48,363.

FLOUR SUPPLIED TO NORTH-WEST INDIANS.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant) asked, Were any samples of the flour supplied to Indians in the North-West submitted, on behalf of the Government in the years 1884 or 1885, to any persons not in the service of the Government, to inspect and report thereon?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; on several occasions. Thomas McKay & Co., millers, of Ottawa, have examined the flour sent from Ottawa to the North-West. Lieut-Governor Dewdney has frequently had the flour examined in the North-West by parties not in the service of the Government.

TRIAL OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

Copies of all documents forming the record in the case of Her Majesty against Louis Riel tried at Regina, including the jury list, the names of the jurors challenged, and by whom they were challenged, the list of the jurors empanelled, the motions and affidavits filed, the evidence, the incidents of the trial, the addresses of counsel and of the prisoner, the charge of the Judge, the names of the Judges or Assistant Judges who tried the case, the names of the counsel for the prosecution and for the defence; and in short, of every document whatsoever relating to the trial, and also of the verdict and of the recommendation to the mercy of the Court.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). All the papers embraced in this motion which are accessible, will be brought down in compliance with it.

Mr. BLAKE. I suggest to the hon. gentleman whether it would not be fitting to lay on the Table of the House formally, those documents which, during the recess, were circulated among members. Those documents emanated from the Administration; I refer to the memorandum from Sir Alexander Campbell.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. BLAKE. I believe that document was very extensively distributed throughout Canada, and it appeared with the imprimatur of the Queen's Printer. I also refer to the report, or the so-called report of the trial. The Administration having taken the course of issuing the document during the recess, should have submitted it all spontaneously.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). This is embraced in the report of the trial.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not observe that the motion is wide enough to embrace the report of the evidence, but I made an observation relative to the hon. gentleman's motion, but entirely independent of it. I am making the suggestion that it is incumbent on the Administration, in taking the course of issuing these documents, themselves to lay them on the Table.

Motion agreed to.

RESPITES GRANTED TO LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council respecting the several respites granted to Louis Riel before his execution.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). There are no such Orders in Council.

Motion withdrawn.

POST OFFICES IN NORTHERN DISTRICTS.

Mr. COOK moved for:

Return of the number of Post Offices established in the Muskoka, Parry Sound, and Nipissing Districts, with the cost and revenue of each office for each year respectively, since 1879.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We will give all the information we can, but the cost for each year would be very difficult to obtain. We will, however, give the information as near as possible.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT—INSTRUCTIONS TO REVISING OFFICERS.

Mr. CASEY moved for:

Copies of instructions or circulars issued to Revising Officers in regard to the performance of their duties under the Electoral Franchise Act of 1885.

He said: My object in making this motion is partly to call attention to what seem to me certain peculiarities in the conduct of some revising officers in the preliminary steps they have already taken towards forming a list of electors; and in the second place, to ask the Government whether instructions have been issued, or will be issued, to these revising officers, such as will secure greater uniformity in, and conformity with, the law, in the subsequent proceedings of the officials in question. The Act of last Session is presumably intended not only to secure the uniformity of the franchise throughout the Dominion, but to afford facilities to those entitled under the Act to obtain registration on the list of voters. But, Sir, unfortunately the revising officers are left by the Act in such a position of absolute unaccountability, irresponsibility, and plenary power, that the degree of uniformity of power obtained and the facilities afforded for registration in the different electoral divisions throughout the Dominion, depend entirely upon the will, the pleasure, or the whim of the revising officers for those divisions. The Act, as we pointed out from this side of the House very frequently last Session, if it does not directly encourage the putting of obstacles in the way of the elector who claims the franchise, affords tremendous opportunities for the putting of such obstacles in his way by these officers having the power, if they have the will, to place such obstacles. Now, the action of the revising officer who was appointed for the riding I represent, as well as for the other riding of Elgin, will illustrate perhaps better than any mere hypothetical statement of possibilities—the degree of irritation, the trouble and expense, that may be imposed on the elector who seeks to have his right to vote authenticated by registration on the list. If I refer to his actions in some detail, it is not for the sake of making an attack on that revising officer in particular, so much as for the sake of pointing out to the House and the country the dangers to which this Act subjects those who now claim the vote for the first time, to warn the electors of other parts of the Dominion of the troubles to which they may be subjected, and to notify them of the course they ought to pursue in order, with certainty, to obtain registration. My object is also to draw the attention of this House to such conduct as I am about to describe, in the hope that its opinion may be of such a nature as to have a wholesome effect on other revising officers, and perhaps upon this same revising officer himself, in the performance of their subsequent duties in connection with the lists. The revising officer is called upon to perform, as has been frequently pointed out, a double function. He is not merely a revising officer—he is also a compiling officer; and the name he bears is derived only from the second part of his duties, that of revising and criticising the work he has already done as a compiler. It will be remembered, no doubt by everybody, but I must state it again in order to avoid obscurity in my remarks, that the first duty of the revising officer is to obtain copies of existing voters' lists, poll books and other documents of that kind, showing who are entitled to vote during the year before the Act was put in force. The Act goes on to state that with the assistance of those assessment rolls which he is to take as primâ facie evidence of the qualification of the persons named thereon, and "such other information as he can obtain," he is to go on and make his primary list of voters. The Act made no provision as to what he should consider sufficient or proper information to justify him in putting the name of any elector upon the first list. During the debate on that point the right hon. Premier expressed his view that it was the duty of the revising officer, in making the first list, to obtain what was to his mind satisfactory primâ facie evidence of the right of each applicant to have his name placed on the list. If he was satisfied, on the face of the application, and without any evidence being adduced, either pro or con, that the person who claimed to be registered had a primâ facie right to be registered, he was to insert that name in the list, and leave those who objected to it to move afterwards for its removal at one of the two courts of revisor. The revising officers of Ontario met in convention before their duties began, and if I remember correctly, adopted a formal agreement that they would accept no other information besides the assessment rolls and the voters' lists, except in the form of applications either from individual voters or from one person, putting in a list of voters in both cases authenticated by a statutory declaration. I am not aware how far this rule has been adopted by revising officers in other Provinces, or whether it was adopted at the suggestion of the Government, or at the instance of the revising officers themselves. Even under that rule, which has been adopted in Ontario, there has been great lack of uniformity. Some revising officers have accepted applications for the insertion of a long list of names, authenticated by one declaration, made by the person who compiled the list. Other revising officers, among whom I must number the one for the east and west ridings of Elgin, required individual declarations made by each person who claimed the right to have his name placed on the list. Some revising officers, I am informed, in other Provinces than Ontario, perhaps in Ontario as well, have refused to accept any applications or to pay any attention to any declaration of qualification until after the publication of the first list, saying that the proper time to make these declarations is at the preliminary revision, in which decision I think they are contravening the very words of the Act. Others have received such applications, and have taken what seems the obviously proper course of giving notice of a day on which the list should be completed and sent to the printer, so that the electors in the division who have not been registered might know the time within which to put in their applications. Others do not give this notice, among whom again I must number the revising officer for the Elgins. Of those who have accepted and dealt with those applications, some have simply given no notice whatever to the applicant, whether his application has been successful or not. Others have returned the rejected applications, with reasons endorsed, directly to the applicants. Others, as again the revising officer for the two Elgins, have returned the rejected applications in batches to the persons through whom they were sent in. That is the course he has pursued in the east riding. In the west riding, so far as I am aware, he has returned no rejected applications to anybody except the revising officer's clerk, and they have lain in the clerk's office until the president of the Reform Association applied for them and got them; so that the persons whose applications were rejected did not know it in time to make a second application in a more acceptable form and thereby get their names on the list. Unfortunately, these acts of the revising officer, who happens also to be a judge, cannot be questioned; his rule is absolute; no appeal can be had from it; and it is all the more necessary that his action should be criticised in this House, which I consider is the proper place in which to criticise it, and that the attention of the House should be given to it. I said that the revising officer of Elgin, insisted on individual applications being made by parties claiming registration. The result was that both parties circulated large numbers of printed forms of applications and declarations amongst their friends, asking them to fill them up and send them in to the revising officer's clerk. This was done. Now, to carry out the spirit of the Act, to carry out the policy announced by the Premier himself last Session, the course of the revising officer, when these applications were sent in to him, I conceive should have been this. He should have simply required an intelligible statement from each individual elector as to the qualifications he claimed, and a sufficient identification of his property, where the qualification was a property qualification, and an intelligible declaration as to the other points required from resident income voters and others. Instead of doing that, he has assumed to treat these applications as he would a technical pleading in court; he has assumed to require an absolute adherence to the wording of the Statutes; he has assumed to require that no contraction of words shall be used, and that ordinary business language shall not be sufficient, thereby making it absolutely impossible for any ordinary farmer, farmer's son, tenant, mechanic, laboring man, or other person unlearned in the law, without having a copy of the Act before him at the time of his application, to put in an application satisfactory to this lynx-eyed official. By such conduct he has gone far towards practically disfranchising all those classes of voters. Of course their chance is not entirely gone yet. They have still the opportunity of going to the first or second Court of Revision and having the error of the revising officer rectified; but this is subjecting them to great cost and great trouble; so that, if he is not disfranchising these parties, he is imposing upon them a tax which the law did not contemplate, as the sole condition on which their names should be registered on the voters' list. It may be said, why did they not consult a lawyer and get their names registered? Everybody does not wish to go to the expense and trouble of consulting lawyers with regard to this matter, and the necessity of consulting a lawyer before we can claim our undoubted legal rights to exercise the franchise. We have been accustomed to see our names put on the voters' list by the sole action of the local municipal authorities, and that is the rule in every Province as regards the Provincial franchise. It is only in regard to the Dominion franchise that a man must be taxed to secure the franchise. Even a reference to a lawyer would not, in every case, secure this right to the voter, for a great many of the applications I intend referring to were drawn up by lawyers, and the applications were rejected by the revising officer as incorrect in a technical sense. When I say these applications were rejected on mere legal quibbles, I am prepared to back up my assertion by reading a few of the objections raised, and giving the House the substance of the applications themselves, so that the House may judge whether the objections were quibbles or not. The first case I meet is rejected as being illegible. The revising officer endorses these words: "Many of the words are to me perfectly illegible." I submitted the application to several gentlemen, who had never seen the applicant's handwriting before, and they all declared that every word of the application was legible; while, on the other hand, some of us had considerable difficulty in making out the endorsement of the officer. I submitted the application to the editor of a newspaper, a gentleman who understands manuscript pretty well, and he said it was good copy, such as compositors would declare excellent. If applications are to be rejected on the ground of their being illegible to the revising officer, though perfectly legible to other people, we can only come to the conclusion that the officer is not fit for the place. On another application the officer endorsed that he is the judge of the facts and that no conclusion should be stated in the declaration. Then we have another one rejected on the ground that "the declaration must show that the applicant is a tenant on lease." The applicant simply states the nature of the property on which he claims to be qualified, and that he holds it as tenant and has held it as such for the required period, but he omits to say "under lease." I think there is a fair presumption when a tenant has held property for some time, he is holding it under lease. If I am not wrongly advised by legal gentlemen, a lease, under the wording of the law, need not necessarily be a written document, a verbal agreement being sufficient. Another application in which the applicant states: "I am a wage earner of at least three hundred annually, and have derived such wages and have been such resident for one year before the first of January, 1886," is objected to because the word "dollars" is omitted, as if the applicant could have meant cents; and again on the ground that "wage-earner" is not sufficient, that the applicant "must derive an income from his earnings." I take that to be a technical quibble. We know that a wage earner means a laborer in some calling, and not a salaried official, or he would call himself so. I do not think it is the officer's business what the man's calling is, so long as he is shown to derive an income, wage or salary, of $300 from whatever he does. His legal description is not entered on the voters' list; he is merely put down as an income voter, and it does not matter in the least from what source he derived an income, so long as it is not from an investment out of Canada. Here is a very remarkable case: A man applies to be registered, saying he is owner of a lot on such a concession in such a township, and is assessed on the same for the sum of $150. The officer endorses: "if it is not too late and his name appears on the assessment roll at a valuation of $150, it may be entered; otherwise not." He objects to a reference to the new assessment roll as a proof of value, but if the name is on the old assessment roll he is willing to keep it. What right has he to object to the new roll? He is obliged by section 16 to take the assessment roll as prima facie evidence of the value. It will be rather startling to hon. gentlemen concerned in the passing of the Act last Session to be told that wages earned will not qualify. "It is not sufficient to earn wages," says the revising officer—you must "derive an income." But how can a man earn wages and still be said not to derive an income from his work in money or money's worth. That is a peculiar state of things that no one can understand. I think it is only the mind of a revising officer that could conceive such a state of things. Here is another one rejected because the legal description of the applicant is not inserted. I argued before, that there is no necessity to insert the legal description. It is nobody's business what the man is as long as he has the required income. Again, another point is made that the declaration says: "I am a British subject by birth or naturalisation," and our intelligent revising officer says he must state whether he is one or the other, and will reject the statement that he is a British subject by either the one or the other.

An hon. MEMBER. He is a painstaking officer.

Mr. CASEY. Yes; he has taken all pains to find excuses to reject these declarations. Another application states:

"I derive an income from my trade of not less than $300 annually, and have so derived such income and been such resident for a number of years, and now reside at the village of Morpeth."

The intelligent officer says he "must have been in receipt of such income for twelve months next before the first day of January, 1886." He cannot understand that, having been there for a number of years, he must have been there for twelve months.

Mr. VAIL. What is the officer's name?

Mr. CASEY. His name is Hughes. Here is another one rejected. The applicant states that his name is John Praschau; that, by a mistake on the voters' list, his name and that of his father had been exchanged; that he has been put down as the farmer and his father as the farmer's son, and that he desires to be put down as the son of the man who owns the north half of lot 3, in the 11th concession of Aldborough. This is refused on the ground that he must state the value of the real estate. It happens that both the farmer and the son are on the voters' list which the judge is to take as the prima facie evidence, and yet he rejects this application and throws them both off. This man's father is shown by the declaration to own 100 acres in a prosperous part of the country, which the judge must have known to be worth much more than $300, and if that is not prima facie evidence I do not know what is. Here is another case in which the judge objects to a man stating he is a British subject by birth or naturalisation, and he goes further. The man states:

"I am the son of Donald Campbell, of the Township of Howard, in the County of Kent, who is the occupant and owner of the south half," &c.

The judge endorses this:

"Is he a British subject by birth or by naturalisation? Which is it? In what municipality is the land situated?"

The man swears he is the son of Donald Campbell of such a lot in such a township, and has been a resident thereon with his father for one year before the 1st January, and this intelligent official wants to know the municipality in which it is situated after being told the lot, the township and the county, and that the man has resided upon it continuously for a certain time. The applicant in this case is not a Conservative. Here are several others endorsed "too late, list printed." This recalls the remark I made before that notice should have been given of the time when the list would be printed so that applications might be put in before that date. Here is one who swears he is the son of Donald Shaw, who owns certain land which is worth $6,000, and that he has been a resident on the said land at least one year prior to 1st January, 1886. The judge says he must have been a resident "continuously" on the farm. Well, if he were dealing with a pleading in court upon which a large sum of money depended, perhaps such quibbling might be defended, but to require from a farmer's son who fills up his own declaration such an amount of legal acumen as to insert every particular word would be to require impossibilities, and to make it impossible for these persons to be registered. Another person swears he has been occupant of a lot for a certain time, describing it definitely, and the revising officer cannot make out in what municipality that is situated. This again is the type of a considerable number on which I ask the judgment of the House and of the lawyers in the House. The applicant declares that he derives "an income as a railway employee sufficient to qualify as a voter under this Act." The judge states that he "should state facts and not conclusions. The returning officer and not the declarant is to judge of the right to be placed on the voters' list," meaning that he should state the amount of his earnings. I think, as the revising officer is only to require prima facie evidence, the solemn declaration should be sufficient, but I admit that that is not such a glaring case as some of the others I have quoted. Here is another person who claims to be registered as a fisherman, because he has boats and nets to the value of $200, and continues:

"I am a tenant of property for which I have paid rent of $40 per annum for the last two years."

He is rejected because he cannot be registered as a fisherman unless he owns real estate besides his nets, &c., and unless he is a tenant under lease. He is disqualified because he has omitted the words "under lease." I have seen, though I have not in my hands, any number of other rejected applications from the other riding of Elgin, rejected for even more frivolous reasons than these. In one case it was because the applicant stated that he has been the occupant for one year "preceding" the 1st January, 1886, instead of one year "next before" the 1st January. This keen-sighted judge saw such a distinction between "preceding" and "before" as to invalidate the application on that account. In another case a young friend of mine put in an application for a second person, which was rejected on the grounds that it was not in due form. To make that right he put in a second application in the words of the Act, "in money or money's worth," and that was rejected because it did not say whether it was in money or in money's worth. Probably some of my friends in the neighboring riding have such instances to bring up, and I will not go into any more of them. I wish to say, in a general way, of this line of conduct, that it is simply an act of oppression and taxation to the persons who are duly qualified to vote, but who cannot obtain the legal recognition or right without being put to the trouble and expense which this proceeding will cost them. Undoubtedly these persons will apply to the preliminary or final court of revision to get these quibbles set aside and have their rights recognized; but that will involve a large expense to these parties, and probably it will also involve a considerable expense to the country. I do not yet know upon what scale the revising officers are to be paid for the work, but it is reasonable to suppose that the pay will have some relation to the extent of their work; and if they can show that they have a large amount of work to do on this primary revision, in all probability they will claim larger salaries on account of it, even if they are not paid by the day while they are doing this work. We know it is to the interest of the revising officer to make as much work for himself as he can by forcing people to go to the primary or final court of revision instead of putting the names on the first list. I do not say this gentleman is doing it for that purpose, because I do not pretend to see into his motives; but it is a temptation to any irresponsible official in that position, to make work in the hope of making pay for himself, and that temptation ought to be removed. I say it will be a source of cost to the individual and to the community to deal with the primary applications in the way in which these have been dealt with. I hope the House will express such an opinion on the matter as will prevent other revising officers from acting in a similar way, and perhaps prevent this one from acting in a similar way in the future. But there are other matters besides applications on which I want to be informed, and which I intend to cover by my motion. If the motion is not sufficiently explicit to call for them, I hope I shall be allowed to amend the wording of it in such a sense as to obtain the information I want. I am informed that instructions, and letters, have been sent to revising officers in regard to the cost of printing voters' lists, which I take to be a part of their duty, as expressed in my motion; and I intended to obtain those instructions along with the other papers by the motion I proposed. If the Minister will state to me whether he considers this motion sufficient, and will consent to its amendment if not sufficient, I shall be obliged to him. The Act calls undoubtedly for a considerable amount of printing, and we want to know whether we are getting it in the cheapest way possible, if any competition is allowed for it, or whether the printing of the lists is given entirely at the will and pleasure of the revising officer; also what the probable amount of it is likely to be in each constituency. With these remarks, I simply ask the Minister in charge of this subject, for any explanations he may give as to what instructions are issued, or will be issued, and when they will be brought down.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There is no objection to laying before the House copies of the Orders in Council, circulars and instructions, or rather suggestions, that have been sent to the revising officers by the Department which has undertaken the administration of the Act. My hon. friend, I suppose, does not expect me to answer here the brief that he has laid before the House against the actions of the revising officer in the division which is represented by the hon. gentleman. According to the Act, one of the functions of the revising officers is to make a compilation of the voters to be put upon the list. He is to obtain his information from the lists of voters already existing, from the assessment rolls already existing, of which he is to get copies and that information is to be prima facie evidence that the voter's name should be put on the list; while it is also the duty of the revising officer to get any other information that he may procure to assist him in preparing these lists. It may be, as the hon. member has said, that some of the revising officers have understood that, either by necessity, or by the interpretation they gave to the Act, they have not to go beyond the voter's list and the assessment rolls already existing, in preparing their first list. Others, however, interpret the Act as allowing them to take other information to aid in the compilation of the list which they have to publish before the first of March. Of course, the revising officers have a certain amount of discretion in the exercise of their duty. The hon. gentleman has pointed out some of the inconveniences under which they labor. These might be remedied at the first revision; certainly at the last revision. With regard to the applications which appear to have been rejected, and which the hon. gentleman has partly read to the House, if there is any inconvenience it is that which necessarily arises from the working of a new Act which extends the franchise in this Dominion. Nobody will deny that in the first application of the law there will necessarily be a certain amount of difficulty, trouble and inconvenience; but I think, also, every one will admit that after the Act gets thoroughly into operation there will be much less difficulty and friction, and that system will be found to be easier than the present system of registering votes, and will be found to work more satisfactorily, more impartially, and less subject to partisanship in preparing the lists. I hope, and I am sure the country hopes with me, that after a little while there will be far less litigation before the courts than we have seen heretofore in the contestation of the lists. The lists, as prepared according to this Act, will be more complete, better made and more satisfactory in every respect; and if, after experience, it is found that any amendments are required, they can be adopted, so as to make the law more intelligible and give less trouble in its administration.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think the House was fairly entitled, at the hands of the Minister who has undertaken to reply to my hon. friend, to some explanation as to the conduct of the revising officers whose actions are called in question by this motion. It is not simply the statement of the hon. member from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) we have to deal with, but the hon. gentleman has fortified his position by sworn declarations made by nearly a score of persons who applied to be put upon the voters' list in the riding of West Elgin. And so far as one can judge from the declarations, they appear to be a full compliance with the letter as well as with the spirit of the law. Yet we have this revising officer promptly rejecting those applications and refusing to put those names on the voters' lists, and the hon. gentleman does not think it necessary to give any explanation or say a word in regard to that grave charge. The hon. gentleman states that they expected to have a little difficulty, a little rasping in the working of the statute at the beginning. We so stated last Session; but the hon. gentleman and other hon. gentlemen declared that it would work with perfect ease, that there would be no difficulty in working the statute, and that justice would be done to both sides of politics. Well the explanation which the hon. member has given shows very clearly that justice is not being done to somebody. The Secretary of State says: "Well, it is true that those men may have failed in their applications, but, if they failed to get upon the preliminary list, they may be admitted at the final revision." But the hon. gentleman forgets the expense, and trouble, and worry, and annoyance endured by those men, who by the letter and spirit of the law are entitled to vote and are yet called upon to make an application before the revising officer to be put upon the voters' list in that way. I would ask the hon. gentleman what guarantee there is, if the revising officer has rejected an application, backed up by the sworn declaration as to qualification, in making the preliminary list, that the same officer will not, upon some pure technicality, reject the application on the final revision. Then the applicant is helpless; he has no remedy, he has no appeal. For hours, nay, for days, we urged on the floor of Parliament last Session that the Government should give the voter some protection against the partisanship or misconduct of revising officers, by allowing an appeal to the Superior Court, but we were told that there would be no remedy and no appeal. Hon. gentlemen declared they were appointing a class of men who would be above partisanship, who would deal out fair play to both sides of politics, who would do justice as between man and man; and yet we see the kind of justice that is being meted out in the riding of West Elgin. West Elgin is not an isolated case. There are many instances and cases where returning officers have pursued precisely the same course. To some extent, I think, the responsibility rests on the shoulders of the Government. They did not prepare rules or give sufficient instructions to the revising officers to secure a uniform practice, or if the Government did issue such instructions, the officers paid no respect to them. In one county you will find the revising officer positively refusing to give to those on one side of politics the slightest indication as to the mode of procedure or as to the time when he would make up the preliminary list. In another county we find the officer, alive to the necessity of doing justice between man and man, giving proper notice. I know an instance in which the revising officer told those on one side of politics that, if the list was placed in his hands on a certain day, that would be sufficient; but when the list was placed in his hands two weeks before the day named, he rejected it on the ground that it was too late. Yet we are told there is no friction and no injustice done. There is injustice done all round from the beginning to the end of the matter, and we have the proof in the statement made by the hon. member for West Elgin. I know a case in which the revising officer, when the list was put into his hand—and the same form of application and schedule was used as the Conservatives used—exercised judicial functions and scrutinised and canvassed the list and decided as to whether the names should be on or not, in the absence of the parties interested in the matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Do not be alarmed; you will get the name in abundance of time to suit your purposes as well as mine. I know another case in which, when the Liberal list was placed in the hands of the revising officer, he called into his office the leading Conservatives of the locality and consulted with them on the subject. Such difficulties have crept in at every stage of the proceedings. There has been placed in my hands, within a short time, a long list of names of men who applied to be put on the voters' list in a certain riding, who made what I believe to be the proper declaration, but were rejected, some without reason and some with reason, by the revising officer. Let me give you, Mr. Speaker, a few samples to supplement the statement made by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). I understand that the revising officers before entering on the discharge of their duties held a meeting in Toronto and laid down certain rules for their guidance. One was that if an applicant desired to get on the preliminary list, and made declaration of his qualification, the revising officer should put that name on the list. Well, I hold in my hand a declaration made by an individual, and it reads as follows:

"I am a resident of the said electoral district and am in receipt of an income amounting in money or money's worth to not less than $300 annually, and have received such income for one year before January, 1886, and reside (at so and so) in the said electoral district."

If hon. members will turn to sub-section 4 of section 6 they will observe that the applicant complied with the strict letter of the law in every respect.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him. It will be 6 o'clock in five minutes. There cannot be any business done afterwards, because from 7 o'clock we take up Private Bills, then Public Bills and Orders, Government Notices of Motion and Government Orders. There will, therefore, be no necessity for our coming back again.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman is quite right. Under the Orders of the House there is no business we can do to-night.

RETURN ORDERED.

Return showing the number of convicts in the Dominion Penitentiaries for the years 1884-85, who were employed at work that competes with free labor; the kind of work employed at; the number employed at each kind of work; the number employed outside by contractors; and the amount received per day by the Government for each convict so employed; and where the goods so manufactured were disposed of.—(Mr. Wilson.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 4th March, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS PETITIONS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. BEATY moved that the time for the reception of Petitions for Private Bills be extended to Thursday, the 25th day of March inst., in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 14) to reduce the capital stock of the Bank of New Brunswick.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Bill (No. 16) to incorporate the Medicine Hat, Dunmore and Benton Railway Company.—(Mr. McCallum.)

INSOLVENT BANKS AND FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS.

Mr. EDGAR, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 1a) further to amend an Act respecting insolvent banks, insurance companies, loan companies, building societies, and trade corporations, said: The object of this Bill is to confer upon employees of insolvent companies the same privileges as to preferential claims for wages, that were given to employees of traders under former Insolvent Acts, especially the Act of 1875. That is the sole object of the Bill, and I think it is one that will commend itself to the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT—INSTRUCTIONS TO REVISING OFFICERS.

The House resumed the consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Casey for copies of instructions or circulars issued to revising officers in regard to the performance of their duties under the Electoral Franchise Act of 1885.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I pointed out yesterday, Mr. Speaker, some of the difficulties that applicants desirous of having their names placed on the voters' lists had to encounter, by the strict mode in which the revising officers interpreted the law, and in some cases owing to the difficulties they had to encounter because the revising officers acted in defiance of the law. I pointed out that some of the revising officers in the various municipalities had rejected names that were sent in duly fortified by a sworn declaration. I say this is all wrong and it ought to be checked by the Administration. These facts must have come to the notice of the Government of the day, and the Government ought to have taken proper precautions and steps to see that the parties who were entitled to be placed upon the voters' list should have a fair opportunity of being placed there. I complained, and I still complain, that so far as we know the Government did not issue to the revising officers proper instructions—instructions that would, at all events, procure a uniform practice and uniform procedure among all the revising officers. It will be recollected that when we were discussing the Franchise Bill in the last Session of Parliament, we pointed out the various difficulties that the Liberal party would have to encounter in perfecting the voters' lists in so far as they were concerned. We pointed out that those officials, being appointed by the Government, would be in almost every case the friends of the Government, and that the chances were that one side of politics, the Liberal party, would not get the justice that they were entitled to have at the hands of the revising officers. These men, of course, receive their appointments from the Government; their emoluments entirely depend upon the Government; and I notice that the First Minister, with his usual craft in political matters, did not fix the emoluments last Session; that important item was kept over until the revising officers had performed the most important of their functions, which is the preparation of the preliminary voters' lists. We have in many instances serious reason to complain of the way the law is being administered. I do not mean to say—far from it—that all the revising officers are partisans. There are many who are fully alive to the propriety of dealing fairly with both parties, and who discharge their duties fairly and honestly, and cannot be led, even a hair's breadth from the path of duty by the leader of the Government. But on the other hand, we know there are revising officers who do not adhere either to the letter or the spirit of the law in any sense, and whether they are revising officers or judges who are revising officers, the same statement applies; and be they judges or not I am prepared to assume the responsibility of stating that in many cases they are not acting fairly with the electors of this country. I noticed in the Conservative press that after the appointments of the revising officers were made, the Government got credit for appointing the judges. They said the Government had appointed in nearly every case the county court judges. I say the First Minister is entitled to no credit for appointing the county judges. We fought the question on the floor of Parliament day in and day out and night in and night out, and it was only by the persevering and firm and determined attitude of the Liberal party that we compelled the First Minister to promise that as far as practicable he would appoint judges revising officers. But the right hon. gentleman was equal to the emergency. He appointed in several counties junior judges; in counties where junior judges were no more required than is a third wheel to a cart. They were appointed revising officers—they, fresh from the political struggles in which they had been engaged; and the right hon. gentleman made them in every single instance revising officers. I am bound to say, with respect to some of them, that they have so far discharged effectually and well the duties they were expected to discharge by the Government when they were appointed. I say every obstacle is thrown in the way of voters getting upon the lists by some of the revising officers. I do not charge all with it, as I have already said, but by some of them every technicality that will assist them in rejecting a voter is employed, and the applications are rejected accordingly. The Secretary of State told us that we might naturally expect to have these difficulties in the initiatory steps for the enforcing of the Act. That was not the language made use of by hon. gentlemen opposite when the Bill was up last Session; but we find the difficulties are here and meet us at every step, and the Secretary of State gives us consolation by saying that we may expect them. If we have them in the preliminary steps, and when a man makes an honest application fortified by an honest declaration under oath, what may we expect from some officers when they prepare the final voters' lists and when there is no appeal whatever from their decisions? I say an electoral body can be placed in no more unfortunate position. A political party can be placed in no more unfortunate position than we are placed in by the effects of this Bill. There are some cases, many cases, the cases cited by the hon. gentleman for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) in which even the Secretary of State would not undertake to justify the action of the returning officer. The hon. gentleman said nothing in justification of the course pursued by the revising officer in those cases cited. The hon. member had clear and positive testimony under oath from those men that they sent in their applications to the returning officer and that the revising officer refused to put their names on the list. So gross an outrage was committed and so scandalous was the conduct of the revising officer that even the Secretary of State would not undertake to justify it. I propose to fortify the statement made by my hon. friend from West Elgin by referring to two or three more cases, because it is well that the revising officers should understand that Parliament is bound to discuss and should discuss their conduct where clear cases are made out. I should be very sorry to call in question the action of the judges and revising officers, unless fortified with the necessary documents placing the charge beyond the region of possibility or doubt. I hold in my hand two applications made to be placed on the voters' lists by two gentlemen in a certain constituency in western Ontario.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Name the county.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). You are very anxious to get information.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I want to get the truth.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). You always want to get information on everything.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I hold in my hands two declarations made by two individuals who desired to be placed on the voters' list, in a constituency in western Ontario. They were sworn to before a commissioner in proper form, yet these two applications were rejected, and why? The reason given by the revising officer is, that there was writing on the margin of the papers. Now, Sir, you will see—anybody can see at a glance, that the space left for filling in the qualification of the voter, was not large enough to enable the applicants to fill it in, and they had to extend three lines on the margin of the declaration. Why, Sir, this thing is done every day in the courts of justice; if you have not space enough to fill in a form, it is carried out on the margin; but this wise revising officer rejected two of the declarations because a portion of three of the lines written in them were written on the margin. I say that is as scandalous a thing as can well be imagined, and one cannot understand that a revising officer could be acting honestly and fairly, in rejecting an application upon such flimsy grounds as that. I hold in my hands another application made by another applicant for a place on the voters' list, and his qualification is stated as follows:—

"That I am a resident within the said electoral district, and derive an income from my earnings, in money or money's worth, of not less than $300 annually, and have so derived such income and been such a resident for one year next before the 1st day of January, 1886, and now reside in the said township."

I say, Sir, that that is a compliance with the law, and I think I can challenge even the Minister of Justice upon that point. Sub-section 6, section 4, provides:

"Is a resident within such electoral district, and derives an income from his earnings, in money or money's worth, or from some trade, office, calling, or profession, or from some investment in Canada, of not less than $300 annually, and has so derived such income and been such resident for one year next before the said 1st day of January, &c."

I say that this declaration is a declaration within the spirit and letter of the law, and yet this revising officer rejected that declaration, and sent it back to the man who made it, and he had not an opportunity of correcting the mistake, if there was any. I think I can also, in this case, challenge the Minister of Justice to make any correction upon this declaration; and yet the revising officer, for reasons best known to himself, rejected it. It may be said: What wrong is done to the man, since he has the right to appeal to the court of final revision to have his name placed on the roll? Sir, if this man is to be at the mercy of the revising officer, who rejected his application in the first instance for no legal reason known to anybody, and that does not appear upon a careful reading of the Statute—if he is rejected upon such grounds as I have mentioned, what reason has the applicant to suppose that greater justice will be meted out to him in the final court of revision? I say that under these circumstances a man has little chance of getting on the voters' list. I will give you another case. Here is an applicant who wishes to be placed on the list in a constituency in western Ontario, and his declaration under oath is as follows:—

"I derive an income from my earnings in money, of not less than $300 annually, and have so derived such income and been such resident for 12 months prior to January 1st, 1886."

Well, Sir, upon reading the Statute one would naturally suppose that that was a sufficient declaration to justify a man being placed on the list, but in this case the application was rejected, and why? The revising officer says, first, he should show that he derives an income from his earnings. Well, I say that the man does swear to that. Another reason assigned by the revising officer is:

"That he should state 'that he has so derived each income and has been such resident for one year next before the first day of January, A.D. 1886.'"

The man uses, instead of the words "next before," the word "prior," but surely the revising officer, in the preliminary preparation of the list, is not justified in rejecting an application for such a reason as that. Anybody can understand what is meant unless he is wilfully blind, or unless he does not wish to do what is just and right. But that man's application was rejected, and he is driven, if he wants to be placed on the list, to all the trouble, expense, worry and annoyance of making another application to the court of final revision. I hold in my hands two applications made by two respectable men, one a Presbyterian clergyman, in a western constituency. Both applied on the ground of income, and both applications were rejected, and upon what grounds do you suppose? Can you imagine the reason? The note on the back of them, is, "written very bad;" and because the revising officer says the writing is very bad, both these applications are rejected. Well, Sir, I throw out a challenge to hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, and I venture to say there is not a man among them, even including my smiling friend, the Minister of Agriculture, who can write as good a hand as the worst of these declarations. Yet both are rejected because the revising officer is old, and I believe, short sighted, and he says the writing is not very good. What is the revising clerk for? Why, if the revising officer could not read it he should have obtained the assistance of his clerk before rejecting it, and the declaration could have been easily deciphered. I hold in my hand another application in which the person applies to be placed on the list as an income voter. He swears:

"That he is in receipt of an income from his occupation and calling as carpenter of $300 and over, annually, and was so in receipt of said income as aforesaid and resided as aforesaid for one year next prior to, etc."

Observe, this applicant says "next prior" to the 1st of January, 1886, and this revising officer to whom the application is made, rejects it because he did not use the words, "next before," instead of "next prior to." Well, I had supposed that in these modern times common sense would prevail in such matters as these. I recollect, and the Minister of Justice recollects the time when, if a man did not cross his "t's" and dot his "i's," he was subject to a demurrer and the proceedings might be set aside. I thought that we had got beyond that stage, but these wise revising officers are introducing the old system and if an "i" is not dotted or a "t" crossed, the man who is applying for those rights which every freeman loves, is deprived of them, because the revising officer stupidly says the man has used the words "next prior to" instead of "next before." Here is another case in which the qualifications are stated in the following words:—

"I have been for twelve months prior to the 1st of January, 1886, and am now, a resident of St. Thomas, and my wages are $300 or more yearly, and were such for one year prior to the 1st of January, 1886."

The revising officer said that the applicant should show that he derives an income from his earnings. Well, I take it that he did show that, but the revising officer ignores the solemn statement made by this applicant. The revising officer further says the applicant should show that he so derives such income, and has been a resident for one year next before the 1st of January. The same objection the revising officer took to one or two of the cases I have referred to is made applicable to this case, and the evidence rejected on that ground. In another case, the applicant swears:

"I am a resident of St. Thomas, in the county of Elgin; I am in receipt of wages amounting to $300 a year, and was in receipt of the same for twelve months prior to January 1st, 1886."

The revising officer rejects this application because he says the applicant should swear that he is a resident "within" the city, whereas the man swears, "I live in the city." The revising officer finds a distinction between in the city and within the city. Perhaps the Secretary of State will be able to point out where he has erred in that respect. He makes this further objection: that the applicant should state that he derives an income from his earnings, while the man swears that he is in receipt of an income of $300 from his wages. What are his wages but his earnings? and yet this revising officer, appointed by this Government to do justice between man and man, sees fit to reject this man's application on that ground.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). He is a county judge, is he not?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not care whether he is a judge or not. The matter has been published for weeks, not only in the Opposition press, but in the Mail newspaper, and it was the duty of the Government to draw this officer's attention to the misinterpretation of the law he was laying down, and compel him, on pain of losing his place, to deal fairly between man and man. It is said that this man has rejected Conservative votes on the same grounds. I do not care for that; it only shows how unfit he is to be placed in a position so sacred and important as that of revising officer. Here is another application, in which the applicant's lawyer, instead of writing January in full, contracted it to Jany., and the revising officer imagined that there was some other month in the year that commenced in the same way, and rejected the application because January was not spelt in full. In no court are such technicalities as these allowed to prevail; and here the law ought to be interpreted in a liberal and generous spirit, and if there is a doubt of a man's right to vote, that doubt ought to be decided in favor of the voter until there is an opportunity of finally testing it at the court of revision. But in cases where there has been no doubt whatever this and other revising officers have rejected the names of applicants. Not so has the law been administered in other cases. We have given some instances in which the applications, verified by the proper evidence, have been rejected. The revising officers had a formal meeting in Toronto, and decided that the names of applicants who made proper application, accompanied by a sworn declaration, should be placed on the list, and that no other names should be placed thereon except those on the assessment roll and the voters' list. But some of these revising officers, in clear defiance of the law and of the statements of the First Minister last Session, have placed hundreds of names on the lists without any declaration having been made. We know that in more than one county, where there are Indians, the revising officer has placed the names of from 56 to 448 Indians on the list without any application having been made by them. Some prominent Conservative has been sent to the Indian agent, and has got the names from him.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I rise to a point of order. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to name the constituency where that has been done, and the revising officer who has done it?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to enquire in the different constituencies where there is an Indian population, he will find the truth of my statement. I am told on credible authority that the names of Indians have been placed on the list without any application having been made by them, and I say that is not in accordance with the statement made last Session by the First Minister, who assured us that Indians should be treated like white men—that if they made application to the revising officer and showed their right to vote, that their names would be placed on the voters' list. I am told further that in some cases where the Indians did not want their names to be put on the voters' list at all, their names appear on the list, and they are entitled to vote at the next parliamentary election. Now, Sir, these are some, but by no means all, of the objections we have to the conduct of these revising officers. The fact is, some of them do not obey the law; they do not care for the law; they are a law to themselves; they do as they please. If the Government has given them instructions, and they do not obey the Government and the law, they have no right to be there, and the sooner they are made aware of that the better. I complained last night, and I complain again, that there is a want of uniformity in the practice. In some constituencies the revising officers give notice of every step taken. That is proper. Some do not give any notice, and they decline to give any information to one side of politics. By referring to the Statute of last year, you will find that by sections 19 and 20 the revising officer is bound to hold a court for the preliminary revising of the voters' list, and section 20 provides that any person who desires to be placed on the voters' list—

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). Before the hon. gentleman enters on that branch of his subject, I wish to ask him if he will have the goodness to place the papers he has read from, on the Table, so that other members may see them, or whether he does not intend to do so.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). If my hon. friend or any other member desires to see these affidavits, they are quite open to their inspection. But I am not going to place them on the Table of the House, as I do not know what is to become of them. They were placed in my hands for a purpose, and I have used them for that purpose; and if the hon. gentleman is so curious and anxious to get at the truth, I am perfectly willing to show them to him. I hope my hon. friend is satisfied. I was pointing out, when interrupted, that, as I understand it, the judge is bound to hold a preliminary court and to give a month's notice of its holding. In sections 19 and 20, any person has the right to make application to be placed on the list of that preliminary court, the duty of the judge being simply to add names and make amendments and corrections, not to strike out names. Any person who desires to be placed on the list has the right, by giving eight days' notice, to appear before the revising officer at the preliminary court. In the city of Toronto, notice has been given that this preliminary court will be held at various days in the different wards, between the 5th and 13th April, and yet the Toronto Mail publishes the following:—

"The list of voters under the Dominion Electoral Franchise Act have been completed, and no more names will be added, until the final revision in July."

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is in the local column, not over the signature of the judge.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). It is in the Mail, the organ of the Opposition, and the paper they swear by. It has gone abroad to the electors of Toronto that nobody can apply to be put on the voters' list at this preliminary court. Whether the paper be wrong or right, this misleading paragraph has gone abroad to the public. I am told, however, that the Mail is not wrong and that the revising officer has so decided. If that be so, he has gone in the teeth of the Statute, and I hope the Government has not given instructions to revising officers to so decide. It is said the Government have found that the costs of printing the lists will reach so enormous a sum that they have decided on putting a veto on adding names at the preliminary court, as in that case the lists will have to be printed twice after the preliminary revision. That somebody is at fault is perfectly clear. In the working out of the Statute we meet with every kind of difficulty, not only difficulty raised by the revising officer, but an amount of labor, worry and expense that no man except hon. members on this side contemplated when we were discussing the Bill last Session. The worst wish I have for hon. gentlemen opposite is that they may have the same labor, worry and trouble, and the same annoyance and expense, as we on this side, in looking after the lists. In the first place, before the preliminaries are prepared we have to attend every polling division to see who ought to be put on the list, and after the list is published the work has to be done over again to see how many Tories have been put on and Liberals struck off who ought not, and we have to go to the expense of subpoenaing voters who have been left off, in order that they may establish their right to vote. There is only one way of rectifying the wrong and undoing the mischief and relieving candidates from all this worry, and annoyance, and trouble, and expense, and I trust that way will be adopted before long; that is, to repeal the Act from beginning to end.

Mr. COOK. I congratulate the hon. member from Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), on taking the lead of the House to-day.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). Will you bet anything on it?

Mr. COOK. When a very tough case comes up the Government require a good digestive organ to swallow it, and in this case they have selected the proper person. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) has said that we want justice. It was stated last Session by the Government that justice would be meted out all round. That reminds me of the story of the Irishman who went to a lawyer. The lawyer said: You want justice; he said: No, I want law. That is what the Government want to-day. They do not want justice, but they want to carry the election by means of the revising barristers, and therefore last year they insisted on forcing upon the country this iniquitous measure—a measure more iniquitous than any known. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White), I am told, has boasted he was one of the men who strongly urged the Government to pass this measure, and because the chances for his re-election would be nowhere without it. He stated, I am told, that he had worked among his Indian friends and had converted them all to Orangeism, so that he was sure of their support. I can refer to other places where there are Indians; I can refer to an island in a certain lake where there is an Indian settlement, who, I know, refused to allow a Conservative to go in there and form a Conservative association, and, in consequence, the revising barrister refused to put them on the list, giving as a reason that he did not believe they were in the constituency over which he had jurisdiction. I should say, from the attitude taken by the hon. member from Hamilton to-day, it was fortunate he had not been appointed to the position of junior judge of his constituency, therefore entitling him to the position of revising barrister from the course taken in this matter by the Government, as it is quite plain what course he would pursue in making up the electoral list. I could point to a revising barrister in one constituency who entirely rejected declarations, although the junior judge in the adjoining constituency accepted exactly similar declarations. I would like to know what my hon. friend from Hamilton thinks of that. Yes; and there was an expense beyond that of the Government, which is going to be enormous—an expense to the Liberal party. Names were selected, and the revising barrister in that constituency refused, and still refuses, to give any information, and, when the solicitors or the officials of the Reform Association call upon him, he distinctly states to them: There is the law; go by that. That same senior judge at another time, under the old system, when an appeal was made to him from the court of revision to put a man on the voters' list whose name should have been there, and who was as much entitled to vote as the Premier of this Dominion, and who had a farm and had been left off inadvertently, instructed his lawyer to attend the court of revision, to get his name restored to the list. When all the facts were elicited and the judge saw he was entitled to vote, said: "Where is the man?" The solicitor said: "I am acting as his solicitor; he is not here in person; I am acting for him." The judge said: "If he is not here, I will not allow him to go on the list." Do you say that such a man should be trusted with revising the lists in any respectable community? I say not. I do not know what course a man can take in matters of this kind; but I tell that revising officer that in the constituency that he is adjudicating upon in reference to the voters' list, he will fail in his attempt to put more Conservatives on than Reformers. I tell him he will fail in his attempt, because there is an indignation in that constituency to-day that cannot be easily quelled, and I advise him to do what is fair and just in the matter. I do it here upon the floor of Parliament, knowing every word I state, and I will endeavor to assist the people in that constituency, or in any other constituency, to do what is right and proper to put every person on the list who should be there, so that, when we make an appeal to the people, it will not be a one-sided appeal as these gentlemen would like to have it. I do not know what these gentlemen have to say now, after passing a law, putting it on the Statute-book, making it law, when they discover that such practices have been indulged in by the revising barristers. I suppose it is the duty of the First Minister or the Secretary of State, when they discover a matter of that sort, to at once advise that officer that he has not performed his duties aright, and that he should be dismissed. I go further than that. If that revising officer happens to be a judge, and he acts in a partisan manner in connection with his position, who will have any confidence in his judicial position as a judge of the county; and it would be the duty of the Government not only to dismiss him from the position of revising officer, but for this House to remove him from the judgeship, and give it to honorable and honest men who will have the confidence of the country, or, at all events, of the Conservative community in which he lives. It is not only the Liberals who complain, but the whole community, the honest Conservatives—and I am glad to say there are some. I have found some even in my county during the recess. I visited my constituency; I held meetings; and I tell the Government that the strongest men, the most intelligent and intellectual men of their party have turned their backs upon the right hon. gentleman, and notwithstanding his revising barrister at his right hand, and advised, as my hon. friend says—and I have no doubt they have had his advice—to make all the Tory votes they could and defeat all the Liberals they could at the next election, he will find himself mistaken. That is my opinion. I am not afraid to state it in my place here, and face to face with the men I expect to defeat at the next election. As far as the revising barrister is concerned, sometimes he may not do the bidding of the hon. gentleman opposite, for there are some honest, true Conservatives who will change their views when they make their cross on the other side of the ballot. I am not in the fortunate position of my hon. friends about me. I have nothing to present, because the revising officer refuses to give back the declarations he rejected. There we are. What is to be done in that case? I do not know; but I assure him that at the time the preliminary trial comes on, I will demand of him to act honestly, and, if the Government do not and if he does not act honestly, I will see that he does. I will see that he will not use illegal means against me. I am making reference now to my own constituency. I have referred before to other constituencies, and I could refer to constituency after constituency as to the meanness, the lowness resorted to by hon. gentlemen opposite through their revising barristers for political purposes.

Mr. DUNDAS. I think the hon. gentleman should have placed a little more charitable construction upon the actions of those who differed from him, perhaps honestly. In the constituency I have the honor to represent, the Conservatives feel that they have suffered very harshly from the action of the revising officer. There, 314 votes offered to the revising officer—all Conservative—have been rejected, while but 23 of the Reformers met the same fate. The affidavits accompanying the 314 applications were in the same form as that generally used throughout the Province, and I believe accepted by most of the revising officers in other constituencies. I do not for a moment accuse our revising officer of partiality in this respect. The officer is the county judge, and every person who knows him knows that he would be above acting in a partial manner. What he has done I believe he has done honestly, but it has borne very harshly upon our party, and I believe he has taken a narrow view of the law. I will only add that I had no intention of bringing this matter before the House had it not been that so much has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite as to the way in which they were treated. We find that it will be necessary to have these 314 persons come personally before the revising officer in order to have their names placed upon the list, but, notwithstanding this, and that the revising officer has for his clerk his own son, and that the lists are prepared in his son's office, and that his son is a member of the Reform party, and, I think, an officer of the Reform Association of the county, still we do not accuse him of any partiality. I simply rise to point out these facts, and to say that these decisions or constructions that have been placed upon the law, by the revising officers, have not in all cases been in favor of the Conservative party.

Mr. LISTER. I rise simply to make a few remarks in relation to the motion now before the House, and not for the purpose of finding any fault with the revising officer in the county which I have the honor to represent, a gentleman who has been lately appointed and who, thus far, has shown every disposition to do what is right to both parties. I think, Sir, that this discussion, so far, has shown that there are difficulties about the working of this Act which must be regretted by every person who has anything to do with it. It is unfortunate that the revising officers throughout the country have taken different views of the law; and I think it is to be wished that they should take a broad, generous and liberal view of the law, as we were promised by the First Minister when this Bill was first introduced. But, unfortunately, many of them have taken a contracted view of it, and while some of them accept evidence which, in my opinion, is quite sufficient to justify the placing of a name on the first list, many others reject that evidence, thus causing great inconvenience, in money and time, to the people who take an interest in this matter. Now, Sir, from the statements made by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) and other gentlemen who have spoken here to-day, it appears to be a very difficult matter for a white man to get upon the voters' lists. The men who pay the taxes of this country, who defend it from outside aggression and internal rebellion—these men, it appears, have very great difficulty, at all events, in some constituencies, in getting on the lists. I would say to the hon. gentlemen who spoke about the Indians, that in many of the reserves throughout this country, the Indians have been placed on these lists without their knowledge, and in some instances against the consent of the Indian bands themselves. I know, as a fact, that the Indian agent has brought in names of Indians to be placed upon the lists, unverified by affidavits, or any other evidence which would show that these men were entitled to be placed upon that list, and their names have been placed upon it, and they are voters to-day. I know, Sir, that in a county very close to my own, there is a band of Indians living, and 26 of them have been placed upon the voters' lists as being entitled to vote, while some 20, I believe, of those Indians have stated that they did not want to be placed upon the lists, and if compelled to vote they would vote against the Government. Now, Sir, in another county I believe the county of Brant—the Indian agent has made a list of names of the Indians and given them to the revising officer; their names have been placed upon the voters' list, and these men will vote at the next election—perhaps for the Government candidate. I merely point this out to the House to show that the white men are not being treated properly. Surely, if the Indians of the country are to be placed upon the lists at the mere request of the Indian agent, it is but fair that the revising officers throughout the country should take a liberal view in favor of white men in construing the Act which they are working. No man knows, except those who are somewhat intimately engaged in election matters, the trouble and expense that people who desire to vote will have to take to get their names upon the lists. I think, Sir, that the Government are not discharging that duty which we have a right to expect from them unless it advises, as it appears to have done in other matters, the revising officers throughout the country to take a liberal view of this Act. Now, we do know that the revising officers have received declarations before the first lists were sent to the printers, and all declarations received by them before that time will secure the names being placed upon the list. We know that after those lists are printed a preliminary revision is to be held. Now, that revision is only to be held in one place in each constituency, and it was never intended by the Act that people should go to the expense and trouble of attending that court of revision. All that the Act contemplated was that declarations should be furnished to the officer at that first court of revision, and he should accept those declarations as prima facie evidence of the right of the person to vote. I know that in my constituency the revising officer has so construed the law, and I think that it is the correct construction, in the interest of all parties concerned, because Conservatives have to go to the trouble as well as Reformers. It is impossible that the revising officer should know the names of all persons in the constituency who are entitled to vote, and in order to have those names upon the list it is necessary that both parties should be vigilant, and that those names should be presented, and all that he should require is that prima facie evidence of the right to vote should be presented to him, and on that the vote should be placed upon the list. There is, then, a final revision, at which the names who are wrongfully put on the lists can be appealed against, and if the appeal is sustained the names are to be struck off, so that no wrong may be done to one party or the other. Sir, this discussion shows how unworkable this Act is. This discussion verifies and justifies the opposition made to it during last Session of Parliament. Sir, if I am correctly informed of the cost of administering this Act, it will take, at least, half a million dollars to put it into operation. In the county of Lambton, from which I come, the printing alone will cost upwards of $1,500, and when we remember the fact that this work is to be repeated from year to year for five years—the usual duration of a Parliament—it means that the voters' lists upon which every election in this country is to be held, will cost the people upwards of two million dollars—double, I believe, the expense of an election. Now, Sir, the Government itself has found this Act unworkable. The motion asks that the instructions given by the Government to the revising officers should be laid before the House. I would like to ask what right this Government has to give instructions to the revising officers. The Statute clearly enough points out the duties of these gentlemen, and if the Government thought proper to take upon themselves the responsibility of advising the men whom they appoint, surely they ought to give them such instructions as would make the practice uniform in placing voters upon the lists. There is another thing that I will say. It is charged that these judges act in a partial or partisan manner, and it is a matter to be sincerely regretted that any gentleman occupying a position on the bench in this country should act in such a way. And, Sir, if it is found that they are acting as partisans—acting in the interest of the gentlemen who appointed them for the purpose of defeating the popular will, then I say that if it should happen—and I believe it will happen in the very near future—that a change of Government will take place, I believe, Sir, that it will be the duty of the new Government to dismiss them, not only from their positions of revising officers, but from the judicial position which they have disgraced—if these statements are true.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I desire to say a few words on this motion. I hope the Government will consent to bring down all the papers asked for by my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Casey). I would like to ascertain what advice has been given by the Government to their revising officer who has been appointed by the Government to preside over the riding that I have the honor to represent. I have not one word to say against that officer, I know of nothing of which to complain personally; but I understand that the printing, which was given to the local newspapers in the riding I represent—that is, the printing of the lists, has been taken away from them by the revising officer. I do not know whether the revising officer, Judge Lane, has been the means of doing this or not, or whether he has acted under instructions from the Dominion Government; but the fact remains, so I am informed, that this patronage, which should belong to the local newspapers, has been taken from them and given to an outside office. Every hon. member knows the importance of the local newspaper. They have special functions to perform and receive but very few perquisites from the Government, and I consider it is a great hardship on those papers to have that patronage taken from them and given to outside papers. In South Grey, last year, the list for the township of Artemesia was printed by the Flesherton Advance, the list for the township of Bentinck by the Hanover Post; that for Durham by the Grey Review, that for the township of Egremont by the Confederate, that for Glenelg by the Markdale Standard, and for Normandy by the Durham Chronicle. Thus the local papers had the advantage of printing the lists, which were well done. Now, I understand this Government has taken away the printing from those papers and given it to an outside office. If this has been done by the revising officer, I do not support his action. I hold that the patronage relating to the necessary printing belongs to the papers in that county. Outside papers receive in many cases very large sums from the public treasury, and I consider that everything in the way of local printing should be given to the local papers. When the Bill was before the House last year I opposed it, and I estimated at that time that the cost of printing would exceed $600 in each riding. I remember that hon. gentlemen opposite laughed at the statement and thought the estimate much too high. I was told by a revising officer, the other day, that a contract had been let for printing the preliminary list, and in each riding the cost would amount to nearly $900. What it will amount to in my riding I do not know. The outlay of public money in connection with the introduction of this measure will be enormous. Hon. members at the time it was introduced had not the slightest idea of the enormous tax they were thus placing upon the people of the country. If the Government had been aware that, at a time of great depression, they would by adopting this measure, have placed such enormous burdens upon the people, I think—provided they had been alive to the country's interest—they would not have forced the adoption of that measure at that particular time. I am amazed at the statements made by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) in regard to the conduct and decisions of some of the revising officers on applications made to be placed on the voters' list. The country will likewise be amazed, and the people will learn that the object of the Government was, as I stated last Session, to perpetuate power for the party now in power. I believe, as the Act comes to be fully understood, not only by the Reform party but by the Conservative party, it will not be approved. Honest men, to whatever party they belong, will not approve a measure which places such enormous burdens upon the people, and at the same time leaves open the door to offences against the liberties of the people. I notice that in one of the ridings—I think it is in the riding of North Wellington—they have several local newspapers, which in the past have printed the voters' list, and have done the printing as well as printing is done by the Government themselves. Yet the printing of the preliminary list was awarded to the Mail newspaper, a newspaper that last year received, in the Immigration Department alone, from the Dominion Government for printing, $7,200. The Mail could well have afforded to have been magnanimous with the country newspapers and allowed them to receive the printing to which they are justly entitled, and which I demand they shall have. We find that the papers in the large centres frequently obtain large sums from the Government for printing. I am not going to complain particularly of that; but I do complain that when the Government has an opportunity of benefiting the country press they cripple it to build up their subsidised organs for the purpose of perpetuating their reign of power in the country. The London Free Press last year received $10,793 from the Government for printing immigration pamphlets. The Hamilton Spectator received $1,500; the Montreal Gazette, a paper which I think the Minister of the Interior has heard of before, $7,299.66, obtained when that gentleman was a member of the Government for a great part of the year. In order to show the country newspapers how ill-used they have been by the Government, I will read over a list of some amounts which have been paid to some of the leading organs. In three years the Mail received for printing, for one department, $22,777.21; Montreal Gazette, $20,342.80; Hamilton Spectator, $8,369.28; London Free Press, $22,589.50; Prescott Messenger, $10,454.16. There is not a paper in the riding I represent but is equal in intelligence and circulation to the Prescott Messenger, and I cannot understand why such a large sum should have been given to that organ. I notice that the paper having the largest circulation in the Dominion, one which stands head and shoulders above all those in point of ability, a paper having double the circulation of those papers I have mentioned—I refer to the Toronto Globe—all it received last year for printing was $7. If the Government had desired to let these advertisements be known to the country they would have been printed in the Globe, which is read not only in every quarter of this Dominion, but in the Old Country, the United States, and in every other civilised country. Yet we find that the Toronto Globe is only down for $7, and the Toronto Week, edited by that distinguished political economist and scholar, Goldwin Smith, only receives from this Government $3. I say plainly and fearlessly that if the Government acted in this way to the local press it was unworthy of them; and if it was due to the revising barrister, then he has my condemnation. But I would say, at the same time, that if he did not do so I will not condemn him, or condemn him for any act, so long as it is right and just, for he will have my support as far as I can give it to him. The gentleman who is now revising barrister is deputy judge of the county from which I come. Last Parliament he occupied a seat in this House, but he has been appointed deputy judge by the Government, and also revising barrister, and it will be my duty to strengthen his hands in every way I can, so long as he deals justly, fairly and honestly between the parties. That is the position I take with regard to him. I do not assail him, but whoever took away the printing which legitimately belongs to the local press of the country shall have my condemnation; I shall not sit silent, without uttering my protest against what I consider a wrong done towards that portion of the press on account of the work it is doing. The local press are doing a great work in educating the people in many things, and supplying them with information upon matters which are of vast importance to them, and I would not sit silent and see the rights taken away from the local press and given to the hirelings I have mentioned.

Mr. ORTON. As the hon. gentleman has referred to the revising officer for North Wellington, I may state that I had it from his own lips that the reason he was compelled to have the printing done in Toronto was, simply, that there was no office in the county that was capable of getting out the list in time.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would ask the hon. gentleman if there were no papers in the riding he represents which were competent to print in time the lists for elections to the Provincial Legislature.

Mr. ORTON. I do not know anything about that, but the fact as to the Dominion franchise lists is as I have stated.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have only to say that if there are not printers in the hon. gentleman's county capable of doing the work, there are in mine.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I did not intend to say anything on this question, but a remark made, no doubt inadvertently, by the hon. member for Lambton, necessitates my saying a word or two. That hon. gentleman stated that in the county of Brant the Indian agent had handed in the names of the Indians to the revising officers, and that he had enrolled them in that way. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman, having heard that the Indians were enrolled, supposed that it was done in that way, but I think it is only just to the Indian agent to state that he had nothing whatever to do with it. As I understand it, the Indian agent has no power under the Act to hand in the names of Indian voters. I think it is contrary to the Act—at least it was intended to be, and I think we accomplished that intention. I should think that, if any Indian agent in other ridings—as I have heard it stated is the case—has handed in the names of Indians on his reserve and these names have been received by the revising officer, that agent, and the revising officer as well, have transcended their duties. The hon. member for Bothwell thinks not, and he is a legal gentleman, more capable of judging than I am; but I think it was the intention to prevent the Indian agent from interfering in that matter, either in the preparation of the lists or otherwise. The Indians on the Brant reservation have been enrolled, I believe, to the number of a great many hundreds, but I think it was done by the revising officer appointing a bailiff, who went down to the reserve and made a kind of assessment, thereupon placing them upon the list. If I were to judge of what was right and proper, my judgment being guided by the opinion of the First Minister himself in his declarations in Parliament last year, I would say that the revising officer had made a mistake. I do not wish, however, to impugn his motives, because I believe he desires to carry out what he believes to be the meaning of the Act, but it is one of the unfortunate things with regard to this Act that it has been so loosely framed that it is susceptible of many interpretations. While the case of the Indians in the county of Brant is, I believe, as I have stated, we see it reported by the newspapers from other places that the revising officer has gone to the municipality, has told the residents of the reserves that under certain conditions they can have their names enrolled if they desire, thus giving the Indians the option of having their names enrolled or not; and I believe that in every case in which that course has been pursued, the Indians have largely refused to avail themselves of the provisions of the Act, thus justifying the argument we used, last year, that the Indians were not themselves parties to the part which was being taken in regard to them. I should say, however, that those agents who had simply given the Indians permission to enroll themselves if they desired were correct. It will be remembered that I offered a motion during the debate, that no Indian should be enrolled except on his own application, and subsequently that he should not be enrolled without his consent, and that the First Minister having spoken adversely to my motion, I urged on him to give some attention to the question of how the Indians should be enrolled. I pointed out that on the reserve they had no assessment rolls, the rolls being the basis of the list in other cases. The First Minister, as I remember his reply, stated that the revising officer would proceed to the reserve and hold his little court—the fact of a man being an Indian making no difference in that respect—and that any Indian could apply personally or by agent and have his name placed on the list. Some of the revising officers have acted in that way, but as it was not incorporated in the law, the revising officer in the county of Brant did not so interpret his duty, and did not consult with the Indians or obtain their consent in any way, but he has simply made an assessment and placed them on the list. Without finding fault with him I would point out, as has already been pointed out, that if uniformity of franchise is the object—and we know how that was dwelt on by hon. gentlemen opposite—what a lack of uniformity there is in its provisions. Here we have had instances cited of parties, of whose right to vote there could be no question, who made application, who made the declarations and took all the steps required by the law, yet failed to have their names entered on the preliminary list; while in other cases parties who have not sought and do not desire to be placed on the voters' list, are placed on it without their consent. We are receiving evidences very early, as I was sure we should, of our unwisdom in dealing with this question. I am prepared to move, as soon as I can, for a resolution which I believe was unanimously adopted by the chiefs of the Six Nation Indians in council about two months ago, in which they declared that they did not want to have this Act applied to them at all. We have not yet been able to get a copy of that resolution. Upon application by a newspaper to the local superintendent of the band for a copy of the minute, he said he did not feel at liberty to give it without permission of the Department at Ottawa, but that he would write for that permission. Up to the present I am not aware that he has received it. I have, therefore, placed a motion on the Order paper with the view of obtaining it. Now, here is the application of the Act to parties who do not desire to be enrolled, who have actually protested against being placed on the list, and who, if my information be correct, are placed on it against their consent, while others who have enjoyed the rights of citizenship hitherto and are fully entitled to be enrolled, by some little quibble or objection of the revising officer are excluded from the preliminary list entirely. In the discussion which has taken place to-day, and in the numerous discussions which in this Session and in future

Sessions will undoubtedly take place, occupying the time and attention of the House and lengthening the Sessions by days, if not by weeks, as well as in the fact that the conduct of the judges is brought into review, and that charges of partisanship are likely to be directed against the judiciary, we have other evidences of the unwisdom of the Act, apart from the question of expense. The expense, as I estimate it now, will be quite equal to the enormous figure suggested by the Opposition last year. My own opinion, from what information I can get, is that not less than $200,000 will be spent for printing alone, to say nothing of the salaries of the officials. But over and above all that, the right of a British citizen to exercise the franchise being placed in the power of any one individual, without any appeal from his decision, is something which I feel this Session to be as objectionable as I did last Session. Under the system of preparing the list which prevailed before, the individual could maintain his right before the assessor when going his rounds, if the assessor chose to act in a partisan spirit, which I believe was not the case, or to question a man's right to the franchise, he had an appeal to the court of revision, composed of men elected by the ratepayers themselves, upon whose conduct they could pronounce judgment every twelve months, and who, if their decisions were not correct, or if they manifested partisanship, could be removed from office. If even then a man felt that partisanship was being displayed, he had a right to appeal to the county judge. But under this Act, we have the case of a judge who is a revising officer, brought prominently before the House. On the merest technicalities and quibbles, he has tried to prevent men getting their names on the list, and if he should persist in his refusal, there is no appeal from his decision at all; it is wholly in his power to dispossess these persons of the right to exercise the franchise. These are some of the many objections which were urged against the measure last Session, and which have gathered force during the time that has intervened, and it seems to me that they will make themselves still more apparent as discussions will arise in the future upon the operation of this Act.

Mr. MILLS. My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) did not correctly apprehend my dissent from the observations he was making. I did not understand the hon. member for Lambton as he did. I understood the hon. member for Lambton to speak from his own personal knowledge of what came under his observation, when he said that the Indian agent in his constituency had actually given the revising officer a list of the names of Indians who in his estimation were entitled to be placed on the voters' list. That is clearly contrary to law, which provides that if an Indian agent causes the name of an Indian to be registered as a voter, or to vote or refrain from voting, he shall be held to be guilty of a misdemeanor. It is clear that if he causes the name of an Indian to be registered, whether he gives the revising officer a list or gives information which enables him to make a list, he violates not only the spirit but the letter of the Act. Wherever an agent interferes with the view of assisting in the preparation of a voters' list, he is violating this provision of the law.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to offer a word of explanation with regard to the remark that dropped from the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton). I wish to state that I have good reason to believe that the revising officer of North Wellington was willing to offer the printing to the local press, but owing to the short time in which the work had to be performed he was obliged to send it outside of the riding.

Mr. WELDON. I desire to call attention to the difficulty that has arisen in the construction of the Act in regard to tenants. It was intended that persons should have the opportunity of getting their names placed on the preliminary list with very little or no expense. In the Province and constituency which I represent, all tenancies expire on the 1st of May as a general rule, and as tenants have to show that they have paid their rent up to the 1st of January, 1886, they cannot be enrolled until they show that rent has been paid for the last month prior to the revision. It has been decided by some of the revising officers that they cannot put the names of tenants on the list at all until the final revision. The effect of that is that persons who have made applications to be placed on the preliminary list are obliged to notice in advance of the final revision, to attend the barrister's court, and to incur considerable expense before they can get their names on the list. In the cities of St. John and Portland, where the tenancies all expire on first May, the result is that the revising barrister does not put their names on the list, and the parties are obliged to make two applications, the expense falling on the final revision. If a party swears he is a bonâ fide tenant and has really paid rent prior to January, 1886, that would be quite sufficient, without compelling him to produce a certificate to show he had paid rent on the first May or June prior to the date of the certificate.

Mr. MULOCK. I am glad to be able to offer my testimony with regard to the efficiency of the revising officer who has to do with my riding. When this Bill was before the House last Session, the question arose as to who should have the final revision, in the case where the revising officer was not a judge. I then advocated the course that has been adopted, namely, leaving the final adjudication in the hands of the county judge, in case he were not the revising officer. I did not approve of the Bill, but when the Government had decided on forcing it through, I endeavored to have it made as perfect as I could. I can well understand that decisions of the judges should not be fraudulent, but yet strike the lay mind as fraudulent. Still I believe that the county judges, as a class, speaking, at least, for those of Ontario, have endeavored to establish uniformity of practice, have honestly set to work to try and put the Act in force according to its practical meaning. It is, therefore, specially to be regretted if any of them should so far misunderstand the object of the Act as to defeat its end by any technical means. I acquit them all of any intention to do wrong, for it would be most lamentable if the public were obliged to withdraw to-day any confidence in the judiciary, because they may fail in some particular duties that may attach to their office. Should a judge, holding the office of revising barrister, prove himself unfaithful in that capacity, there is no position of public trust which he should be permitted to enjoy for a moment, and I trust the House will always be sufficiently independent to remove from office any judge who, in the discharge of his duties as revising officer, has clearly been proved unfaithful to his trust. When the House loses its sense of equity to the extent that it will not administer such punishment, no matter to what party the officer may belong, there will cease to be any safeguard to the rights of the people. It is of the utmost importance to the country and to the Government itself that this Act, as put into operation by the revising officer, shall give entire satisfaction. In view of what has occurred, it is manifestly clear that some of the revising officers are misapprehending their duties and defeating the object of the Act, by attaching undue importance to technical objections, and such a course is, in effect, as injurious as if it were the result of malice or design. As the Government has sent certain instructions to revising barristers, it would be productive of great good if they would follow up the course they have adopted by intimating to the officers that in future they should endeavor to carry out substantially the object of the Act, which is that every man who possesses the necessary qualification be placed on the voters' list, if he makes any reasonable attempt to be placed there. Such a course on the part of the Government would redound to their credit and to the good of the country.

Mr. CASEY. I agree with what the hon. the Secretary of State said yesterday in one respect, namely, that I could not expect him to answer in detail on the spur of the moment the charges I brought, but I feel deeply disappointed that he did not express his condemnation of the transactions which I laid before the House. Even if he did not believe that I had established my case against this particular revising officer, he should have denounced proceedings, which, if established, are, on the face of them, unfair, unjust, and without precedent. If the Government have been already lacking in their duty in not sending instructions to the revising officers which would have prevented transactions of the sort, I have still further ground for regretting the course they have taken. Leaving aside these particular cases I have brought before the House, the point I wish to emphasise is this: when the officer is compiling his first list, he is not sitting in his judicial capacity, as he will be on the final revision; he is merely acting as the municipal clerk used to act and not as a judge, and should therefore require no greater acquaintance with the law on the part of those applying to be registered than a municipal clerk required on the part of those who applied to be put on the old voters' list. In this case, excessive technicality has been insisted on in my county; I do not know to what extent in other counties. Possibly, in many of them, the same technicality has been insisted on, but the revising officers have been more secretive than in Elgin, and have not given reasons for rejection or probably not notified the applicants at all of their rejection. For this reason more particularly, I brought on the debate, so that voters all over the country should be warned in time to enquire into the fate of their applications. As I stated last year, the officers require watching, and the facts prove the truth of that assertion. I agree with the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that it is quite possible the revising officers, without the intention of doing wrong, may do injustice, as they are men unused to this procedure and accustomed to purely legal proceedings. They have attempted to apply this in many cases where it did not apply, where it should not apply, and in these cases they will do serious injustice, even where they do not mean to do wrong. Of course, I do not deny that there are places where the revising officer may have been appointed, and probably has been appointed, with the intention, on the part of the Government at least, of getting the most favorable consideration for one side of the case. In such cases as these, he will specially pay for watching. All I ask now is simply publicity. We want to know what the Government has told these officers to do. As to this question of printing, it seems to be no secret. We are told on every hand—it seems to have leaked out from the returning officers themselves—that the printing is to cost so much per name—12c. or 12½c. per name—and this is, of course, a pretty large figure. I am informed by practical printers that 6c. per name would be ample and would give a good profit. I do not know of my own knowledge whether that is correct or not, but I know that, unless you have competition, unless you do what the townships do, ask the printing offices in the various towns to compete, you will never have the list printed at the lowest rate. No matter how low you fix your arbitrary rate, it will always be higher than that which you would get as the result of competition; and, further, it will always be in the hands of the papers on one side. If that amount of 12c. per name is correct, it will amount to from $450 to $500 for every constituency in Canada. That is over $100,000 which is to go into the pockets of Conservative newspapers, for it will all go to Conservative newspapers.

Mr. BOWELL. That is not so.

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. CASEY. Unless some very Conservative independent organ can be found in some town which will get a slice of it. As to the form, we are told that the instructions to the revising officer were that he must not print the list three times, as the Act says; that he must contravene the Act, and print it only once; that he may print all the copies from the assessment roll, say 600 numbers per constituency, that he can use 200 copies for the preliminary revision, and then, by adding names at the foot of the pages in blank spaces, can prepare the list for the final revision, and so, in the same manner, can complete the list by striking out with his pen or by adding names as the case may be. In this way we will have a very peculiar, scrappy looking list, a list full of erasures, and subject to manipulation by the revising officer after the final court has been held, because there is nothing to prevent his running his pen through any name he likes, and the result will be that that person will be disfranchised, and we will have no security as to the composition of the list. Of course, this is an attempt to avoid the expenditure for printing which would be necessary if the Act were carried out. The Government see that the Act involves more expenditure than the country will stand, and they have contrived a plan to avoid some of this expense, but the result will be very inconvenient lists. As to the Indian question, I have been informed, since this debate began, from my constituency that the statement made as to other counties is true there also, and that the course pursued by the revising officer in my own county was that which has been alleged. I am told that the judge interviewed Mr. Beatty, the Indian agent at Highbgate, and got a list of the Indians on the Moravian reserve who ought to go on the primary list. I mention this only to urge that such procedure is dangerous and improper, and I doubt if it is not illegal, and it certainly should be put a stop to.

Motion agreed to.

TEMPORARY GOVERNMENT LOANS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved for:

Return showing in detail sums borrowed by way of temporary loan by Government on 1st March, 1886, from banks or other parties, in Canada or elsewhere.

He said: I do not want to enter into a lengthy discussion on this matter, but in making the motion I would be glad to know from the Minister of Finance whether the $14,300,000 which he stated to be now borrowed by way of temporary loans from parties, either in Canada or England, are new loans, or whether they were loans of last Session carried over. Last Session there was an amount, either equal to or somewhat larger than this, which had been borrowed temporarily, and I had understood that the loan was in part for the purpose of paying those off. However, as I had observed that the Minister of Finance did not contract as large a loan as had been expected, I suppose in point of fact this had been renewed from time to time. I would like to know, if the hon. gentleman's memory permits him to state it, how that was.

Mr. McLELAN. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say that part of that sum is made up by the old loans and are still standing, and some by new loans contracted since. The parties loaning object to our giving their names. We can give the dates at which certain amounts were loaned, and when they will be payable, but the names of the banks and the names of the institutions loaning we object to give, as they decline to have their names published, but we will give the rates of interest and the dates at which they were contracted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Last year the hon. gentleman's predecessor, I think, objected to giving the rates of interest, but did give the names. Now, although I do not want to embarrass the Minister of Finance, who has a great deal on his hands, I do not myself see why there should be any objections to the names of parties who loan money being made known to this House. I do not recollect on any previous occasion, that particular information having been refused, and I fail myself to see that there can be any sufficient reason for not doing it. Of course, it is a matter which, to a certain extent, we must acknowledge rests in the discretion of the Government; but it is a new precedent, as far as my memory serves me, and I do not remember the information being refused before.

Mr. BOWELL. During the last Session of Parliament the late Finance Minister did, as the hon. gentleman states, give the names of the banks and the parties from whom the money was borrowed, but the hon. gentleman has forgotten that when a second motion came before the House—and I think if he refers to the Hansard he will find it there recorded—the Finance Minister then refused to give the names of the parties from whom the money was borrowed, stating at the time—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman himself was then acting Finance Minister I think.

Mr. BOWELL. I was coming to that presently. The statement was made in the House by myself, by the direction of the late Finance Minister, that the parties, from whom the money was borrowed, objected to their names being made public, and considered it a private transaction; but the amounts which were being borrowed were given to the House. The statement made last Session was precisely the same as the one which has been made by the present Finance Minister.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose it is intended to communicate the rate of interest in each case, and not the average rate?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes, for each loan.

Mr. BLAKE. For my part, I do not wish to give my assent to the doctrine that borrowing transactions can take place between the Government of this country and individuals, without this House being made cognisant of the persons. I think it is an utterly unsound notion. I think that the sooner the corporations, who have transactions of this kind with the Government, know that they will be held liable to have these transactions stated in Parliament, the better; and if public corporations decline to loan to the Government and the people of this country, and have their names made known, we had better not borrow of them; we had better borrow only of those who can afford to have the transactions stated, with the names of the persons with whom the country is contracting.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—PRIVATE CARS.

Mr. WELDON moved for:

Return of the number of private or official cars built or purchased for the Intercolonial Railway since the year 1878, and the cost of each car.

Mr. POPE. There has been no private cars of that kind purchased for the Intercolonial. There has been one car held for the general inspection of the railway, but it is as much for the Canadian Pacific Railway as the Intercolonial. However, I will give the hon. gentleman the information with respect to that car.

Motion agreed to.

THE NORTH-WEST DISTURBANCE—TRIAL OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) I am not quite sure whether the Order of the House on the motion of the hon. member for Bellechase (Mr. Amyot) covers what I require by the motion I have on the paper. The hon. gentleman moved for a return, and obtained an Order of the House, for copies of all documents forming the record in the case of Her Majesty against Louis Riel tried at Regina, &c. What I desire to obtain is a copy of the shorthand notes of what took place on the application to postpone the trial of Louis Riel; the argument of prisoner's counsel in favor of and the arguments of the Crown counsel against such postponement, and the observations and decisions or rulings of the judge thereon; the shorthand notes of Charles Nolin's cross-examination and the arguments of counsel and decision of the judge thereon. In order to be sure that this ground is covered, I move for:

1. A copy of the shorthand notes of the application to postpone the trial of Louis Riel for one month from the 21st July, 1885; the arguments of prisoner's counsel in favor of and the arguments of the Crown counsel against such postponement, and the observations and decisions or rulings of the judge thereon.

2. The shorthand notes of that portion of Charles Nolin's cross-examination wherein Riel's counsel endeavored to establish Riel's insanity; Riel's protests against that line of defence, and his desire to dispense with the services of his counsel, and the arguments of counsel and the observations and decisions or rulings of the judge thereon.

3. The judge's charge to the jury at the trial of Louis Riel.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 17) to amend the Act respecting the North-West Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Beaty.)

Bill (No. 18) to incorporate the Midland Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Ward.)

ANIMALS CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT AMDMT.

Mr. MULOCK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 19) to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. He said: The object of the Bill is to provide a more equitable system of compensation to owners of cattle that may be slaughtered under the provisions of the Act of last Session. No new principle is introduced by this Bill. It is framed substantially on the lines of the English Statute 41 and 42 Victoria, with one exception, namely, that in the Imperial Act no provision is made for extra compensation in the case of thoroughbred animals. In the Bill which I have the honor to introduce such a provision is introduced.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE NORTH-WEST DISTURBANCE—TRIAL OF HALF-BREEDS.

Mr. BLAKE asked, How many half-breeds were committed for trial in connection with the North-West rebellion; how many were tried; how many were convicted; how many Indians were committed for trial in the same connection; how many were tried; how many were convicted; how many whites were committed for trial in the same connection; how many were tried; how many were convicted; and what are their names?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The information which the hon. gentleman asks is prepared, but has not been verified in such a way that I would like to give it to-day. It will be ready, however, on Monday. I hope the hon. gentleman will find it more convenient to move for it.

Mr. BLAKE. After what was said the other day by the Minister of Interior, in answering a question put by the hon. member for York, I supposed that objection would not lie on that side of the House.

HON. SENATOR O'DONOHUE.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Was it arranged between Mr. O'Donohue and the First Minister or any member of the Government that the former should become a Privy Councillor or Cabinet Minister? If so, when? (2.) Was the office to be filled by Mr. O'Donohue agreed on? If so, what was the office? (3.) Was any communication addressed by the First Minister to any ecclesiastical dignitaries intimating Mr. O'Donohue's approaching accession to the Government? If so, when and to whom? (4.) Was any communication by His Excellency the then Governor General relating to Mr.

O'Donohoe's appointment conveyed to that gentleman; and, if so, when? (5.) For how long a time did the understanding continue that Mr. O'Donohoe should be a Privy Councillor and Minister, and when was it broken off?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman will renew that question next week, I will be able to revive my recollection of the circumstances.

INCREASE OF NET PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What is the increase of the net Public Debt from March 1st, 1885, to March 1st, 1886?

Mr. McLELAN. The increase from the 1st March, 1885, to the 1st March, 1886, was $15,856,422.

THE CASE OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. AMYOT asked, On what authority did Mr. Justice Richardson state, in pronouncing sentence upon Louis Riel, that he could not give him hope that Her Majesty would exercise mercy in his behalf? Was he authorised by the Executive to make that declaration?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I have to say that the Government had no communication with Mr. Richardson on that subject. It is presumed that the intimation which Mr. Justice Richardson made, was made by him, as it occasionally is by other judges in similar cases, as indicating his own view of the case being one in which Executive clemency should not be exercised.

THE GROSS PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What is the increase of the gross Public Debt from March 1st, 1885, to March 1st, 1886?

Mr. McLELAN. The amount is $24,983,770.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY LEGISLATION.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Is it the intention of the Government to introduce any general Bankruptcy Law this Session? If such be not their intention, will any special committee be proposed by them, as was done last Session, to consider the subject of insolvency legislation?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill on that subject, and it is not deemed necessary to invite the House to appoint a committee on the subject, inasmuch as the committee seemed to have terminated their labors last Session, and their deliberations resulted in the bringing in of a Bill which any member can bring forward, without any further deliberations on the part of the committee.

THE CASE OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. AMYOT asked, What is the date of the Order in Council ordering the execution of Louis Riel?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The date of the Order in Council to which the hon. member probably has reference, being the Order in Council directing that the law should take its course, was the 12th November, 1885.

Mr. AMYOT asked, What was the motive of the third respite granted to Louis Riel?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). In order to give time for the arrival at Ottawa of the report on the medical condition of Louis Riel.

BOUNDARIES OF ONTARIO.

Mr. MILLS asked, Whether the Government propose to invite any action by Parliament in reference to the boundaries of Ontario? If so, what action is Parliament to be invited to take, and when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That subject is now under the consideration of the Government.

THE CASE OF LOUIS RIEL.

On the Order,

Resolution, That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny). With the permission of this House I will postpone the consideration of this motion until next week. Some members are leaving to-night, and they have asked me to postpone the discussion of this question until next week; and if the House will permit me, I will allow it to stand.

Motion allowed to stand.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

Copies of all commissions, letters, telegrams or instructions whatsoever, given, furnished or sent by the Government, by any Minister or Ministers, or any officer of the Department of Justice, to His Honor Mr. Justice Hugh Richardson, in relation to the trial of Riel at Regina, or to the counsel representing the Government at the trial; also copies of any instructions given to any person whomsoever on the staff of the court presided over by the said Judge, and to the counsel representing the Government at the said trial.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I am not aware that there are any such documents as are enquired for in the first part of this Address, but if there are, they will be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF THE POSTMASTER OF STRATHLORNE, N. S.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). As it has been reported in the public press in Nova Scotia that the Postmaster of Strathlorne was removed from office for efficiently discharging his duty, and as I doubt that the Postmaster-General would remove him for that reason, I beg to move for:

Copies of all correspondence relative to the dismissal of Isaac McLeod, Esq., Strathlorne, Inverness, from the position of Postmaster at that place, including the Post Office Inspector's report.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Every paper relating to the matter will be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

THE CASE OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

Copies of all letters, reports, telegrams and documents whatsoever relating to the several respites granted, on or without his application, to the late Louis Riel; also copies of the Order in Council directing the execution of Louis Riel; also, of any letters or telegrams transmitted by one of the physicians to enquire into the mental condition of Louis Riel, or by all of them collectively.

He said: As I understand that the question raised by my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Landry) will come up next Thursday, I hope the Government will not delay bringing down the papers which are asked for, and which are anxiously waited for by the House. I need not say that we want to see all the papers concerning this important question.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). There is no objection to the motion, and the documents will be prepared as soon as possible, considering the large number that have been called for.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE OF PICKERING, ONT.

Mr. EDGAR moved for :

Copies of all reports made by Inspector Sweetnam concerning alleged irregularities in connection with the management of Pickering post office, in the county of Ontario, and in particular of his report upon the investigation held by him at the village of Pickering in December, 1883; and copies of all correspondence between Inspector Sweetnam and the Post Office Department relating in any way to charges made against the management of said post office, and a copy of instructions to the Inspector given upon such report.

He said: In December, 1883, one John Logan was the deputy postmaster at Pickering post office. An investigation seems to have been held into the management of that post office in December, 1883, while he was deputy postmaster. I have here a copy of what purports to be the evidence taken at the time by a shorthand reporter for a local newspaper. According to the evidence, it seems that there were charges made and evidence given against the deputy postmaster of overcharges for postal material, of money letters going permanently astray from his office, of opening letters in that office, and of gross delays and mistakes of all sorts, and it is stated in the report that on the conclusion of the evidence the inspector told all those in the room who had complete confidence in Mr. Logan to stand up; 8 stood up and 42 remained seated. Then the inspector said he would report the matter to the Postmaster-General at once and take whatever action was necessary. It is very important that the report which Mr. Sweetnam made after this investigation should be made known, because since then the Government has actually appointed Mr. Logan to the position of postmaster in that place.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. All the documents that the Government can control shall be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY AND NORTH SHORE RAILWAY COMPANY—CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. LAURIER moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the Government or any member of the Government with the Canadian Pacific Railway and the North Shore Railway Company, and between the two companies concerning the prolongation of the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Harbor of Quebec; of all contracts between the said two railway companies in reference to the same; of all Orders in Council passed in reference to the same, together with a statement of all moneys paid by the Government, and of the names of the persons to whom such payments were made, also in reference to the same, and in conformity with the Acts 47 Victoria, Chapter 8, and 48-49 Victoria, Chapter 58.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. All correspondence on this subject which is under the control of the Government shall be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish).

Capital cases in which the Crown did exercise the prerogative of pardon. 3. Capital cases in which the Crown refused to respite executions where applications had been made for that purpose, with a view towards appealing to the Lords of the Privy Council. 4. Sir JOHN MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 4:5 p.m.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORTS PRESENTED.

Report of the Minister of the Interior for the year 1885.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Report of the Minister of Agriculture for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1885.—(Mr. Pope.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 20) to provide for the Punishment of Seduction, and to afford Protection to Women and Girls.—(Mr. Charlton.)

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURT.

Mr. EDGAR moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 21) to further amend the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act. He said: While the Supreme Court Act seems to make full provision for deciding controversies between the Dominion and any Province, or between one Province and another, it is more than doubtful whether a Province has the power to apply of its own motion to ascertain the opinion of the Supreme Court as to the validity of any of its own statutes; and it does seem to me to be not unreasonable that the Provinces should have the power. It looks hard that private parties should have to bear the expense, and very often losses of other kind, in testing the validity of Provincial Statutes in the courts, whereas we might, I think, by a very simple provision enable the Provincial Governments themselves to obtain the opinion of the highest tribunal in the land as to the validity of their own statutes. There seemed to be two ways in which this might be done. One would be to enable the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to refer the question directly to the Supreme Court; but as that court is under Dominion jurisdiction, that might be objectionable. Another way would be to enable the Lieutenant-Governors in Council to do so by the intervention of the Governor in Council, and that is the plan adopted in the short Bill which I have laid before the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RATE OF INTEREST IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria, B.C.) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 22) respecting the rate of interest in British Columbia. He said: At present no rate of interest is specified by law in British Columbia as collectable on accounts recovered under judgments, and great trouble very frequently arises in arriving at the amount of interest which has been allowed with the principal which has been recovered. This Bill is simply to provide what shall be the legal rate of interest recoverable in British Columbia in that way, and also to specify the maximum rate which can be recovered, even where there is an expressed agreement.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE NORTH-WEST DISTURBANCE.

Mr. BLAKE asked, How many half-breeds were committed for trial in connection with the North-West rebellion; how many were tried; how many were convicted; how many Indians were committed for trial in the same connection; how many were tried; how many were convicted; how many whites were committed for trial in the same connection; how many were tried; how many were convicted; and what are their names?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Most of the prisoners taken in connection with the rebellion were not regularly committed for trial, but were taken for overt acts of rebellion and held for trial or discharged. There were, in all, 46 half-breed prisoners, 81 Indians and 2 whites; 18 half-breeds were tried for treason-felony, one for high treason, and one for murder; 11 were discharged on their own recognisance of $400 each, to appear and receive sentence when called upon; 8 were discharged upon their own recognisance, to appear and take their trial when called upon; one, Adolphe Nolin, charged with treason-felony, was discharged by order of General Middleton. Two others who were held for trial and would have been tried in the course of the present month, were discharged on the proceedings being discontinued by my own direction. The 4 others were discharged, one having been acquitted. Of the Indians 44 were convicted of various offences, nearly all treason-felony; 1, however, was for manslaughter, 2 for arson, 5 for horse stealing, 1 for cow stealing, 1 for breaking gaol, and the others were convicted of treason-felony; 10 were discharged on promising to come up for trial when required. In the case of one Indian charged with treason-felony, there was no evidence against him at the time of the trial, but he was detained at Regina for further enquiry by the Indian Department, and has since probably been discharged. Three were acquitted. The remainder of the Indians, charged with various offences, were discharged. The two charged with stealing appear to have been discharged, but I am not in a position to say by whose order or on whose authority. Of the whites two charged with treason-felony were held for trial. One of them, William H. Jackson, was acquitted on the ground of insanity; the other, Thomas Scott, was acquitted.

HON. SENATOR O'DONOHUE.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Was it arranged between Mr. O'Donohue and the First Minister or any member of the Government that the former should become a Privy Councillor or Cabinet Minister? If so, when? (2.) Was the office to be filled by Mr. O'Donohue agreed on? If so, what was the office? (3.) Was any communication addressed by the First Minister to any ecclesiastical dignitaries intimating Mr. O'Donohue's approaching accession to the Government? If so, when and to whom? (4.) Was any communication by His Excellency the then Governor General relating to Mr. O'Donohue's appointment conveyed to that gentleman; and if so, when? (5.) For how long a time did the understanding continue that Mr. O'Donohue should be a Privy Councillor and Minister, and when was it broken off?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will answer this question, in so far as I think the public interests are concerned. In 1882, negotiations were opened with Mr. O'Donohue with the view of his entering the Ministry, and the assent of the Governor General was obtained to his being asked to enter the Government. It was, however, found that Mr. O'Donohue could not, at that time, from various causes, bring the expected strength to the Administration, either generally or from his co-religionists; and, after consultation between Mr. O'Donohue and the Hon. Frank Smith, Senator, the former was appointed Senator, and Mr. Smith was appointed to the Privy Council, without, according to my recollection, any office being assigned to him.

IMMIGRANTS SETTLED IN CANADA.

Mr. MILLS asked, What is the total number of immigrants reported to have settled in Canada during the calendar year 1885?

Mr. CARLING. 79,169.

FRANCHISE BILL.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any amendments to the Franchise Bill during the present Session?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is under consideration.

AMNESTY IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to advise an amnesty in favor of persons against whom the Government has not instituted proceedings in respect of acts committed in the late rebellion in the North-West?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a matter of considerable delicacy, and is now under the consideration of the Government.

THE NORTH-WEST DISTURBANCE—TRANSPORT SERVICE, Etc.

Mr. CASEY asked, What are the total amounts paid to date, or now payable, on any claim recognised by the Government in connection with the suppression of the North-West rebellion, under the following heads, viz.:—Transport service; pay of officers and men; subsistence; equipment; arms and ammunition; medical and hospital supplies; horses; forage; commissions, if any, for payment of money or purchase of supplies; distinguishing payments made under any of these heads to the Canadian Pacific or Hudson's Bay Companies?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I must ask the hon. gentleman to move for the returns. It is quite impossible to give the information sought for except by bringing down the papers connected with the different services.

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether any communication has been received from the Government of the United Kingdom relating to the recent or proposed legislation of the Parliament of Canada on the subject of Chinese, and whether any such communication will be laid at an early day on the Table?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No official communication has been received.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say "official."

Mr. CHAPLEAU. But I say "official."

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK, MANITOBA.

Mr. ORTON asked, When is it the intention of the Government to establish branches of the Post Office Savings Bank at important points in Manitoba, and at what points?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They will be established as necessity requires.

BRITISH AMERICAN BANK NOTE PRINTING COMPANY.

Mr. LISTER asked: 1. Whether charges have been made against the British American Bank Note Printing Company for smuggling into Canada engravings, vignettes and other works of art from the United States without paying duty? 2. Whether charges have been made against the same company for having entered importations of a like kind under the proper value? 3. If such charges have been made, whether they have been investigated by officials of the Government, and whether these officials have submitted to the Government a report of the result of their investigation? 4. If such practices have been carried on by the company, over what period of time do they extend? 5. What is the value of such importations for the last three years, as well as the total value? 6. Whether any sum was found due by the company for unpaid duties, and if so, what was the total amount so found to be due? 7. Whether a less sum than the amount found to be due was accepted by the Government in settlement, and if so, what was the amount so accepted?

Mr. BOWELL. In answer to No. 1: Yes. 2. Yes. 3. Yes; the charges have been investigated by the Commissioner of Customs in the same manner as all other seizures, and the result reported. 4. The report is divided into two periods, the first prior to 1875, at which time the concessions which the Bank Note Company enjoyed were withdrawn, and the second subsequent to that date and up to January, 1886. 5. The value reported as illegally imported or undervalued for the last three years is $599. The total value reported is $15,517. 6. The sum found due by the company for unpaid duties is $588.20. 7. A sum less than the amount found to be due was not accepted by the Government. The amount accepted by the Government was $588.20, the full amount of unpaid duties; $294.10 being 50 per cent. penalty as per section 102 of the Customs Act, and $308 to cover costs. Total $1,190.30.

INTERCOLONIAL RY—WORKING EXPENSES.

Mr. WELDON asked, What are the earnings and working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for each month from July 1st, 1885, to February 1st, 1886?

Mr. POPE. If the hon. gentleman will put that in the shape of a notice of motion, I will bring down the papers without delay.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

THE CASE OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. DESAULNIERS (Maskinongé) asked, Whether the Government made enquiry with a view to ascertaining the intention of the jury in the case of Louis Riel, in recommending the prisoner to the mercy of the court?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). There was no means of making such an enquiry except by enquiring from the individual jurors who composed the jury, and that has not been deemed a constitutional mode of seeking the information.

Mr. DESAULNIERS (Maskinongé) asked, Whether the Government received any communication, letter or other document from one or more of the jurors in the case of Louis Riel, informing them that the intention of the jury in recommending the said Louis Riel to the mercy of the court was to exempt the prisoner from the death penalty; and if any such information reached the Government, what juror or jurors furnished the same?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). No such communication, letter or other document has been sent to the Government, so far as I am aware. If the papers contain any such, they will be brought down.

On the Order for the Resolution of Mr. Landry (Montmagny):

That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask my hon. friend to allow this motion to stand until Thursday. Wednesday is a holiday, and, as this may produce considerable discussion, we may as well set it down, with the consent of the House, as the first Order of the Day for Thursday, and I hope the discussion will be continued de die in diem until it is disposed of. In connection with this motion, I may say that it is considered by the Government of such importance that they will not go on with the Estimates or enter upon the Budget until they know how they stand on this motion.

Motion allowed to stand.

INDIANS UNDER THE ROBINSON TREATY.

Mr. DAWSON moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of Ontario, in reference to the amount due to Indians under the Treaty of 1850, commonly known as the Robinson Treaty.

He said: In making this motion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw the attention of the House, once more, to the case of the Indians affected by the Robinson Treaty. I have frequently taken occasion to refer to this matter, but I am sorry to say without any very encouraging result, further than to obtain from the Government a full acknowledgment of the justice of the claims made by the Indians. It is acknowledged on all hands that there is a very large sum due to them, and it is always given as a reason why they have not been paid, that there is a difference existing between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of Ontario, as to which of the two Governments should furnish the means wherewith to pay them. The Dominion Government claims that, by the wording of the treaty, the payments to the Indians were made a lien on the land, and that, as the Government of Ontario now possesses the land and derives the revenues therefrom, it is bound to meet these payments. On the other hand, the Government of Ontario holds that, by the British North America Act, the charge of the Indians and all matters relating to them, including the payment of their annuities, devolved on the Dominion Government. The Government of Ontario, however, while maintaining that it should not be called on either to pay annuities or arrears, suggested—very properly, as I think—that the Dominion Government should in the meantime pay the Indians the arrears due them, leaving the adjustment of the matter, as between the two Governments, to future consideration. On the occasion of the visit of His Excellency the Governor General to Algoma in 1831, the Indians of Lakes Huron and Superior presented addresses to him, in all of which they drew his attention to the injustice under which they were suffering from the withholding of the arrears due to them, and His Excellency asked me to make out a memorandum showing how the matter stood. This I did, and as the memorandum I then made states the matter more concisely than I could give it in a speech, I shall, with the leave of the House, read a few extracts from it. The address of the Thunder Bay Bands—and all the addresses are much alike—ran as follows:—

To His Excellency the Governor General:—

"We, the Indians of the land of many waters, welcome Your Excellency to our country. Our loyalty to our Great Mother the Queen is steadfast and unalterable, and we beseech Your Excellency to convey to Her Majesty our respectful love.

"This great country through which Your Excellency is now passing, belonged, not long ago, to us. We inherited it from our ancestors; but the white man came, and all we now possess is confined to a few small patches in this vast territory.

"We should not trouble Your Excellency with our grievances on an auspicious occasion like the present, when Your Excellency has come, as the representative of our Great Mother, to visit our country, but we may, nevertheless, mention that, on our ceding this territory, certain promises were made to us which have never been fulfilled, and even a written agreement entered into, which has not been carried out; even the trees on our small reserves are being cut off without our consent.

"All this is known to the Government, for we have, year after year, sent in documents explaining our position and demanding simple justice, but so far without avail, and we pray Your Excellency to order that justice may be done to the Indians without further delay.

"Your Excellency, we are sure, will pardon the poor Indians for mentioning these matters, for we have done so with the greatest reluctance. We are but a remnant, and a feeble one, of the once powerful tribes who inhabited these shores. Our race is passing away, and the day is not distant when the land of our fathers will know us no more. In the meantime, the white man might afford to deal at least justly, if not generously, with a people who will soon cease to trouble him. He has our silver mines and our forests, and is extracting vast treasures from these. Yet the miserable pittance due to the Indians is withheld.

"But we have done with our grievances, and shall conclude by wishing Your Excellency a safe and agreeable journey to the lands of the setting sun.

"May God bless and preserve Your Excellency.

"JOHN BAPTISTE BINESI,

"LOUIS CAPTAIN,

"ALEXI DABAGAR,

"Chiefs of the Fort William Band of Indians."

On this I made a memorandum for His Excellency, from which I shall now make a few quotations:

"As the case of the Indians at Fort William is identical with that of all the bands on Lakes Huron and Superior, I shall endeavor to explain how they all stand in reference to the arrears of Indian annuities which have accrued under the Treaty of 1850, commonly known as the Robinson Treaty. By this treaty, it was stipulated as follows:—

"The said William Benjamin Robinson, on behalf of Her Majesty, who desires to deal liberally and justly with all her subjects, further promises and agrees that should the territory hereby ceded by the parties of the second part at any future period produce such an amount as will enable the Government of this Province, without incurring loss, to increase the annuity hereby secured to them, then and in that case the same shall be augmented from time to time, provided that the amount paid to each individual shall not exceed the sum of one pound Provincial currency in any one year, or such farther sum as Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to order."

"This language is clear enough, and on reference to the official correspondence it will be seen that it is nowhere denied, but on the contrary admitted on all hands, that from the time the payment of $4 per head annually could have been made from the revenue of the ceded territory, without loss to the Government, the Indians were clearly entitled to have their annuities augmented to that amount; but for a very long period the matter seems to have received no attention, payments of $1.49½ per head to the Lake Superior Indians, and $1 per head to the Lake Huron Indians, being made annually.

"This state of matters continued until the fall of 1875, when, after a lengthened correspondence with the Ontario Government as to which Government should supply the funds, a payment of $1 per head was first made to the Indians by the Dominion Government, but of the arrears, extending back over a very long period, they have not, up to the present time, been paid anything whatever.

"As to the amount of these arrears, it should, in order to conform to the treaty, be computed from the date at which the revenue from the ceded territories became such as to admit of the stipulated payment of $4 per head being made to the Indians, without loss to the Government, and it cannot be very difficult to find that date, with an earnest desire to discover it. A proper search in the records of the Crown Lands Department of Ontario will show the yearly territorial revenue derived from the ceded territories and the cost of its collection, both before and since Confederation; but in the unfortunate dispute—still pending—between the two Governments, as to which should supply the funds to meet that portion of the arrears which has accrued since Confederation, and indeed the whole of the annuities since the ceded territories fell to Ontario, information has been but very sparingly supplied. From such as can be had, however, a statement, at least approximately correct, can be made, and in endeavoring to show how the matter stands I shall be careful, in estimating the arrears, to keep within the amount to which the Indians are justly entitled.

"In the first place, I would draw attention to the fact that soon after the treaty was entered into the territories ceded became productive. In 1854 and 1855 mining licenses were issued and lands sold on Lake Superior, the sales and license fees amounting in these and succeeding years, up to the date of the confederation of the Provinces, to $110,000—a sum more than sufficient, after deducting all charges connected with its collection, to have met the payments to the Lake Superior Indians in full. (See memo. of Commissioner of Crown Lands of Ontario, page 32 of Return.) The amount realised during the same period from land sales, license fees and timber dues on Lake Huron was doubtless much larger, but the Commissioner of Crown Lands, in the communication above referred to, gives no statement, alleging as a reason for withholding it that the eastern boundary of the tract ceded had not been defined. He might, however, have given a closely approximate estimate, seeing that the lands from which any considerable revenue, if not the whole of the territorial revenue, had been derived were far within the ceded tract, and in localities where there could be no question as to the boundaries. From the date of Confederation up to the 1st October, 1874, the revenue arising from lands on Lake Superior (see memo. referred to) amounted to $272,000, while on Lake Huron, within the same period, although no statement is given, I am in a position to say that the territorial revenue paid into the Treasury of Ontario could not have fallen short of three-quarters of a million of dollars—the sales of timber berths in one year alone exceeding $600,000.

"Taking the whole period of twenty years intervening between 1855, when the ceded lands had become sufficiently productive to admit of the Indians being paid from the proceeds thereof the full amount stipulated in the treaty, without loss to the Government, and 1875, when they for the first time received $4 per head, I believe I am within the mark in stating the total territorial revenue derived from the ceded tracts at $1,300,000. It is therefore evident that the condition in the treaty making the annuity of $4 per head contingent on the Government being able to pay it, without loss, from the revenues of the ceded tracts had been fully met, and the Indians were, consequently, entitled to the full benefit of the stipulation throughout the whole period named, that is, from 1855 to 1875.

"It remains to be seen how much of the stipulated amount has been paid to them and how much remains due. On reference to the accompanying return, it will be seen that the amount paid to the Lake Superior Indians was, as I have already said, $1.49½ per head annually, while the Lake Huron Indians received at first $1.10 per head, and latterly only 95 cents per head. The calculation made by the Minister of the Interior as to the difference between the sum actually paid annually and that which should have been paid will, I suppose, be accepted without cavil, and on reference to his report of 12th July, 1875, and the Order in Council of the 22nd of the same month based thereon (pages 24 and 25 of Parliamentary Return) it will be seen that the difference between $4 per head, to which the Indians were entitled by treaty, and the sum they actually received is computed at the annual amount of $10,484 and that to meet any probable deficiency in this estimate the sum of $11,000 is allowed by the Order in Council for the payment to be made in that year (1875). Taking, however, the lesser sum as the correct amount, and applying this calculation to the period of twenty years intervening between 1855, when, as already stated, the full amount of $4 per head should have been paid, and 1875, when it was for the first time actually paid, it appears that annual payments aggregating $209,680, without reckoning interest, have been withheld from the Indians, but in any fair calculation the interest should be added, and at the moderate rate of 5 per cent, simple interest, it would amount to $110,082 making, with the above stated aggregate of the sums yearly withheld from the annuities, $319,762.

"The poor Indians are too often accused of being in a chronic state of grumbling, because in addresses and petitions, which are sometimes but little heeded, they tell of their grievances, but let an equal number of poor white men have a wrong like this to complain of, and it is needless to say that they would grumble in a much more audible manner than the Indians have done.

"The amount due to these poor people, if funded and the proceeds judiciously applied, as they doubtless would be under the careful management of the Indian Branch of the Department of the Interior, to the establishment and maintenance of schools, such as the Shingwauk Home at Sault Ste. Marie, the Orphan's Home at Fort William Mission and the Industrial Schools on the Manitoulin, would have an excellent effect in bringing the Indians to adopt the habits of civilised life.

"But the sum stated, although considerable, is not all that the Indians may claim or are fairly entitled to. A large number of the Lake Huron Indians do not participate in the annuities at all, although the ceded lands belonged as much to them as to their more favored brethren officially known as Treaty Indians. The lands on Lake Huron were in fact ceded by a part and not the whole of the Lake Huron bands, although the territorial rights of all were equal, and there are now considerable numbers of Indians on Lake Huron who are treated as aliens and non-treaty Indians, and all this on grounds so flimsy that they would not bear a moment's investigation. The annual payment of $4 per head should apply equally to all the Indian population. But the treaty stipulated not alone for $4 per head, but for 'such further sum as Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to order' (see page 1 of Return). Now the Indians of the interior all get $5 per head, besides carpenters' tools, twine for nets, farming implements and cattle. In view of all this, it seems singular that the bands on the Great Lakes have not been better treated, more especially as the Treaty, even if its provisions had been fairly carried out, was in itself, to say the least of it, illiberal and unjust, so much so as to have elicited from the Imperial Commissioners who in 1856 investigated the condition of these Indians, the following very pointed remarks: 'If we considered that it came properly within our province we would not hesitate to express our decided regret that a treaty shackled by such stipulations, whereby a vast extent of country has been wrong from the Indians for a comparatively nominal sum, should have received the sanction of the Government.' What would these Commissioners say now if they could rise and see that, for a period of twenty years, less than even a third part of this 'nominal sum,' as they justly call it, was paid to the Indians.

"On further reference to the Return, it will be seen that in a memo. dated 14th Jan., 1874 (page 15 of Return) the Attorney General of Ontario remarks as follows:—

"The Dominion Government should settle with the Indians without question as to what Government ought ultimately to pay."

"No one will be disposed to question the propriety of this common-sense suggestion, and it is much to be regretted that it has not long ere this been acted on.

"It is the Dominion Government alone, as representing the old Provinces, that is liable for that part of the balance of the annuities remaining unpaid at the date of Confederation, and it forms a good deal more than half of the entire sum due.

"I see it is stated in an official memorandum dated 13th April, 1873 (see Return, page 11) that 'the amounts received in payment of portions of the lands surrendered in September, 1850, were realised chiefly from mining locations, up to the period of Confederation, and that an important part of the money paid in was absorbed in defraying the costs of surveys, and as the locations formed for the most part separate blocks of land the expense of survey was greater proportionately than under ordinary circumstances in township surveys.'

"This is very plausible as an excuse for the neglect of the Indian claims, but, unfortunately for any weight it was intended to have, it is incorrect. As regards the cost of surveys, the then existing rules of the Crown Lands Department rendered it necessary for parties leasing or purchasing mining tracts to have all surveys made at their own expense, so that those surveys were effected without any cost to the Government. It is also stated in the same memorandum that 'it was contended up to a comparatively recent period that the profits realised from those resources were so immaterial as to be inadequate to supply any appreciable increase in the annuities payable under the Robinson Treaties.' The territorial revenue at Lake Superior amounted to $110,000 at the date of Confederation, and probably to about double that amount on Lake Huron, forming together quite an appreciable sum, sufficient at least to have enabled the Government to meet the stipulated payment without loss. As to the statement contained in the memorandum from which I have just quoted, that 'it was contended,' etc., I am afraid there was little or no contention in the case. The matter had, in fact, dropped out of sight, and the Indians, after 'grumbling' in vain for twenty years, had quietly, although reluctantly, accepted a situation for which, in their distant homes on the shores of the Great Lakes, they saw no remedy."

I have been particular, Mr. Speaker, in drawing attention to this most important matter, so that hon. members who have not had an opportunity of studying it, may be able, on reference to the Hansard, to see how it stands. I have said that the matter is an important one, and it really is so. It is of importance to the Indians, because many of them are in want and need the relief that would be afforded them by an adjustment of their claims; and it is of very great importance to us Canadians that the fair fame of the country, in dealing with the native races, shall not be darkened by our remaining passive while they are suffering from the non-fulfilment of a treaty solemnly entered into with them in Her Majesty's name. These Indians have a way of communicating intelligence among themselves, which but few white men are aware of, and during the troubles of last spring the Indians of the Saskatchewan found means of exciting the Indians in the western sections of Algoma. So much was this the case, that the people of Rat Portage became apprehensive of a rising among the Indians of Rainy River and the Lake of the Woods, and applied for arms and troops. These Indians, however, kept quiet, but they were well informed as to the rising on the Saskatchewan. Last fall I was met by a deputation of Indians at Lake Superior, and they, after stating their long-standing grievance about the non-fulfilment of the Robinson Treaty, said: "Why does the Government always fail in attending to our petitions. We have been quiet and loyal, and yet our claims, presented as they have been every year for a very long period, are met with silence? Can it be possible that the Indian need not look for justice from the white man until he assumes a threatening attitude? Is it because we are weak and the Indians of the Saskatchewan strong, that we meet with neglect, while their demands, although not so well founded as ours, are promptly attended to? You say they are fed because the herds of buffalo on which they relied are destroyed, but has not the white man destroyed our fisheries and frightened away the game on which we relied for subsistence? We cannot see why we should be deprived of our just dues while they get more than theirs." I have sent many petitions from these people to the Government, and I really think that their claims should meet with some attention. Surely the Government of Ontario can have nothing to do with that portion of the arrears which accrued previous to Confederation; and I see nothing in the way of its being at once adjusted. The Treasurer of Ontario stated last year that the consideration of the claims of the Indians, under the Robinson Treaty, had been by mutual consent postponed. I would like to know under what authority the Deputy Minister of Finance, who was conducting the negotiations regarding accounts for the Dominion Government, consented to such an arrangement.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON moved for:

Return of all statements and estimates made by the Department of Indian Affairs, of moneys due to Indians under the Robinson Treaty; also of all correspondence and documents whatever in relation to the same subject.

Mr. Speaker, I have said all I intend to say with respect to the Robinson Treaty; but there was another treaty made in the district of Algoma, and that was a treaty with the Manitoulin Indians. In 1836 Sir Edmund Bond Head entered into a treaty with them, by which the Manitoulin Islands should remain their property forever. Of course, it subsequently became very desirable that the islands should be thrown open for settlement, and in 1862 the then Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs went up there and made a treaty with the Manitoulin Indians. Of all the treaties which white men have made with Indians, I believe that was the very worst treaty as regards the Indians. It was a treaty most unjust in its provisions, and it has resulted in the downright robbery of those poor people. Why, Sir, after this treaty has been in operation for twenty-four years, what is the result? How much have the Indians got? The sum of $1.79 per head per annum is all these poor people who were obliged to relinquish their land under this Manitoulin Treaty, which was carried out in the year 1862, now receive. I have had petitions from the Indians of Manitoulin which I have laid before the Government lately, and I have replies from the Government stating that their case would be very carefully considered, as I have no doubt it will be. I think that these Indians, now that they have ceded their territory, should be placed in the same position as the Indians under the Robinson Treaty, and be treated in the same manner as other Indians. This treaty was very hard and onerous in its provisions; it compelled them to make the surveys; and why these people should have been done out of the territory which was granted to them on such harsh, onerous, and I may say, heartless conditions, is more than I can conceive. The Indians themselves objected, and a portion of the bands stood out; they retained their own territory; they would not yield to the seductions of the then Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs, but they held out for their lands. What is the consequence? They are flourishing and getting rich, while the others are in poverty and want. Their petitions are now before the Government seeking aid, and I hope the matter will receive the careful attention of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

COLONISATION COMPANIES.

Mr. EDGAR moved for:

Copies of: 1. Letters patent incorporating the Prince Albert Colonisation Company. 2. Agreement executed between the Prince Albert Colonisation Company and the Crown for the colonisation of Dominion Lands. 3. Letters or applications by John White or others, on behalf of the Trenton Colonisation Company to the Minister of the Interior, requesting that its name be changed to the Prince Albert Colonisation Company and all correspondence on the subject. 4. Correspondence between John White and the Department of the Interior respecting applications for lands either on behalf of the Trenton Colonisation Company or the Prince Albert Colonisation Company, and in particular all letters from Mr. Burgess to Mr. White in the year 1882. 5. Letters or applications by the Prince Albert Colonisation Company, or anyone on their behalf, for lands, timber limits, coal claims, or any other privileges in the North-West. 6. Correspondence between the Department of the Interior or any of its officers and J. C. Jamieson, relating in any way to the affairs of the Prince Albert Colonisation Company, especially copies of all such letters to J. C. Jamieson in 1883. 7. Statement of accounts to date between the Government and the Prince Albert Colonisation Company. 8. List of shareholders of the Prince Albert Colonisation Company showing names and numbers of shares, and whether held in trust or otherwise, according to allotment made by the Board in May, 1883.

He said: A motion was carried the other day asking for papers in connection with this same company, and I hope the Government will see their way to bring down those papers at an early day, as well as the papers which this motion asks for, if it is carried. I was told by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White), who is not in his place in the House at this moment, that he would like to be present if any discussion took place on this motion, and I informed him that if I brought it on in his absence I would raise no discussion on the motion. For that reason I simply move it.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOR OF REFUGE AT PORT ROWAN OR PORT ROYAL.

Mr. JACKSON moved for:

Return of the report of E. W. Soare, Government engineer, in reference to the practicability of constructing a harbor of refuge at Port Rowan or Port Royal, in the County of Norfolk, Province of Ontario, the survey having been made during the season of 1885, giving his opinion in reference to the construction of said harbor, and giving the probable cost of the same.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no report as to the practicability of constructing a harbor of refuge at Port Rowan or Port Royal, nor has Mr. Soare given his opinion in reference to the construction of such a harbor. The only thing the engineer was entrusted with was to take certain soundings, in order that the Chief Engineer of the Department might ascertain from the data so obtained whether it would be practicable to have a harbor of refuge there. I would, therefore, advise the hon. gentleman not to insist on his motion.

Motion withdrawn.

LICENSES TO CUT TIMBER.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for:

1. The total number of Orders in Council or Departmental Orders, since 1870, recommending the granting of licenses or permits to cut timber in the Dominion of Canada, with the total area (actual or approximate) covered by such orders; 2. For each separate year since 1870, the name and address of each applicant in whose favor such order was made; the date of each order; the area covered by each order; the location of the land covered by each such order; the bonus, if any, in addition to cost of surveys, ground rent and Crown dues, in each case required, and the total area covered by such orders in each year.

He said: I presume, from the promptitude with which the questions asked by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) were answered by the hon. Minister of the Interior, that we may reasonably expect the House to be placed in possession of the information asked for in this order at an early day.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I can assure the hon. gentleman that I am quite as anxious to have this information brought down as he can possibly be to see it; but, in order that it may be complete, I think it is necessary to amend his motion in one or two slight particulars—not to take anything from it, but to add something to it, to enable the public to see exactly what has been done in reference to timber licenses. I move that the motion be amended by omitting the words after "order" in the third line, second paragraph, and inserting instead: "Ground rent and Crown dues respectively paid in each case, and the bonus, if any, in addition to the cost of surveys in each case required; also the whole area covered by such orders in each year." And that the following paragraph be added:—

3. The total number of licenses issued under the authority of the several Orders in Council; the total area covered by each license, whether the area consisted of detached pieces of land or of compact blocks, and the period of time in each case during which the license was operative; and in the case of permits, the purpose for which the timber was required.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have no objection to the fullest information.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS.

Mr. BLAKE. When can the hon. gentleman make any statement as to the papers he will bring down relating to the North-West Territories?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Looking at the various motions made by the hon. gentleman, they involve so great a mass of papers that I fear I do not know where to commence or to end. If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to review his motions, and inform me more specifically what he wants, I will endeavor, as far as I can, to bring down all the papers that can be brought down without involving private affairs or affecting public interests.

Mr. BLAKE. Then the hon. gentleman does not propose to bring down any spontaneously.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not say that.

Mr. BLAKE. Does he?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, I do.

Mr. BLAKE. When?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are in course of preparation.

Mr. DAVIES. Last Session I asked for returns of a report made by the commissioners appointed to investigate certain fishery claims of Prince Edward Island. It was promised, and, I believe, is ready, but has not been brought down.

Mr. McLELAN. I will make enquiries about it. I was under the impression it had been laid on the Table.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all Orders in Council passed for the granting of the subsidy authorised by the Acts 47 Victoria, chapter 8, and 48-49 Victoria, chapter 58, "for a line of railway connecting Montreal with the harbors of St. John and Halifax by the shortest and best practicable route;" of all reports of engineers upon which said Orders in Council may be based, together with a statement of all moneys paid in connection with the same, and of all persons to whom such payments may have been made.—(Mr. Laurier.)

Reports made by persons not in the service of the Government to whom samples of flour for the Indians in the North-West were submitted for inspection during the years 1883, 1884 and 1885.—(Mr. Paterson, Brant.)

Statement of the names and post office addresses of all persons employed in taking the census of the North-West Territories; the amounts paid to each as salary and expenses, distinguishing between those who were already in the employment of the Government and those who were not.—(Mr. Landerkin.)

Return of the expenditure made by the St. John Bridge and Railway Extension Company on their railway and bridge connecting the Inter-colonial and New Brunswick Railway; together with a statement of the amounts advanced by the Government to the said Company and the dates of such advances.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Government of Ontario in reference to proposed Imperial Legislation to confirm the decision of the Queen in Council upon the west and north-west boundaries of Ontario.—(Mr. Mills.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 4:45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ASH WEDNESDAY—ADJOURNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That when this House adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

TIME FOR PRESENTING PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. IVES moved:

That the time for presenting Private Bills be extended to Wednesday, 31st March, instant.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved:

That the First Report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates be now concurred in.

He said: The House will remember that last year the Committee reported in favor of changing the form of the report of the Debates from royal quarto to octavo, and changing the type from long primer to brevier for the main report and from minion to nonpareil for the quotations. It was expected then that some change would be adopted in the system of printing the departmental and parliamentary documents, so that the Committee thought it would be easy to make the change suggested, which was considered likely to reduce the expense of the publication of the Debates and to render the volume more convenient for handling. But no measure having been adopted by the Government, we had to try and make some arrangement with the printers who had the contract hitherto. Whilst they were ready to continue for one year the publication on the conditions of the former contract, they objected to the change proposed in the report, on account of the heavy outlay it would involve for one year only, while they had no guarantee that they would obtain another contract. The Committee felt that, under the circumstances, they should recommend the extension of the contract for a further year as the only practical way out of the difficulty.

Motion agreed to.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 23) further to amend the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases. He said: The Bill is the same Bill I introduced last Session, and which received the assent of this House by a majority of 47, but failed to pass because the other branch did not see fit to acquiesce in the passing of the measure. I hope it will meet with better success this year.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MEMORANDUM OF SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL—
COST OF PUBLISHING.

Mr. LAURIER asked, What amount was paid to various newspapers for distributing to their readers the memorandum of Sir Alexander Campbell on the Riel matter, the names of the newspapers, and the sum paid to each?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The accounts will be put before the House. I would have brought them down to-day, but one was missing between the printing department and the correspondence department of my office.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 14) to reduce the Capital Stock of the Bank of New Brunswick.—(Mr. Weldon.)

RETURNS.

Mr. BLAKE. I beg to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that, although the Government have fixed Thursday for the discussion of the motion of my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Landry), they have not yet brought down the papers, the propriety of bringing down which they admitted by consenting to the various motions for their production, nor have they yet fulfilled their obligations of bringing down further papers promised in connection with the North-West troubles, although those papers are intimately connected with the question we are called on to debate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think as yet any detailed return of the expenditure of $2,300,000 voted last year for the North-West troubles has been laid upon the Table. It was to have been laid upon the Table within 15 days, which will expire next Thursday.

Mr. McLELAN. I will make enquiries into the matter.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 3:40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 11th March, 1886.

Bill (No. 25) respecting the Northern and Pacific Junction Railway Co.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 26) to incorporate the Tecumseh Insurance Co. of Canada.—(Mr. Macmillan, Middlesex.)

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hastings) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 28) to amend the Criminal Law of Canada. He said: This is a Bill similar to one which I introduced last Session. Owing to the multiplicity of legislation, and the very many able, elaborate and interesting addresses which we had on the Franchise Bill, we did not succeed in reaching it. It is intended to amend the criminal law so far as it relates to a notorious class of offenders known as burglars. From what comes under our immediate notice and observation, I am satisfied that the crime of burglary is rather increasing than diminishing. Besides appropriating our valuables and our goods and ourselves, it has led to incalculable injury to our property; besides almost frightening out of their lives our wives and children. If burglars are frustrated in their design in any way, they do not hesitate to commit murder. Our merchants and bankers have been put to a great deal of expense in placing coverings over their safes with a net wire and a telegraphic attachment, in order that, when an attempt at burglary is made, an alarm may reach the police station; but even this is not always found successful, and the criminals manage to evade the vigilance of the police. Another reason for amending this law is, that many of these men who are incarcerated are only sent to prison for a very short time, and, as soon as they are released, they proceed to ply their avocation as assiduously as ever. In fact, it is no punishment or warning to them whatever to receive those short terms of punishment. I might give an instance of this. In the city in which I live, a couple of burglars were in the act of breaking open the safe in the office of the Burrell axe factory. The men who work in that factory go there early in the morning, and they discovered these men in the act. Finding they were caught, they ran off and they ran a distance of half a mile, pursued by the factory hands, and then managed to get through a broken window in the basement of a church—no doubt, a very painful operation—and then climbed up a stairway and secreted themselves in the steeple. The men who were following them despatched a messenger to the police station while they kept watch; the chief of police came, and, when the men were commanded to come down, they did so reluctantly. I suppose they did not aspire any higher. They were taken to the police station, and their names were placed upon the list; not the list which has given so much anxiety to the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). I was going to say—but I do not see him in his place—that I do not know what sort of constituency sent him to the House, but as these were young men and of a style unknown to us from their peculiar shaped visages I would not be surprised if they came from the riding of that hon. gentleman, they certainly did not come from the 50 square miles of timber limits which he has falsely and maliciously referred to in his flaming and lying declamations in the west as received by me from the Government to support Sir John A. Macdonald. These men were tried by the judge who was holding the court of assize, the Hon. Mr. Justice Armour, were found guilty and were sentenced to the penitentiary for a period of seven years. They were found to be old gaol birds. One of them had already served five years. I mention this to prove the fact that the punishment they had received was no warning whatever to them, and that as soon as they got out of prison, they resumed their old calling as vigorously as before. I propose to amend this law in this way: The Act, chap. 21, sec. 50, states what shall constitute the crime of burglary.

The next section, sec. 51 of chap. 21, 32 and 33 Vic., makes it discretionary with the judge to send these men to prison for any term he may choose. Now, I do not intend to ask the House to take away that discretion, because I think that it would scarcely be fair that a woman who may break into a laundry and steal a few articles of clothing, or a man who may break into a grocery and steal candy, should be sent to the penitentiary for life, but I propose adding a clause which shall read as follows:—

But when it shall be found that such person, at the time of committing such offence, had in his possession any implement known as a burglar's tool, or any murderous weapon of any kind whatsoever, he shall, when convicted, be sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life.

Then I would add another clause to it to this effect:

Where any person is convicted of the crime of burglary who has already or previously been found guilty, or convicted of, or served a term of imprisonment for a similar offence, he or she, upon such conviction thereof, shall be sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life.

Then there is another clause in the Act which I propose to amend—that is, section 59, which provides that in the case of parties being armed or disguised, etc., who intend to break in or enter any house, at any time he may please, I intend to ask the House to amend that clause, by adding after the word "penitentiary" the words "for a period of seven years." In clause 60 of that Act, instead of leaving it discretionary with the judge, I would substitute after the word "imprisonment" the words "for a period of ten years." Then there is another clause which I think it advisable to add, allowing to the senior, junior or deputy judge to try these cases summarily, in any county or united county where the offence has been committed, or the arrest has been made, and the powers of the judge shall be the same as those given to other judges under the Act. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Act will commend itself to the House, and will receive the support of hon. members and the countenance of the Minister of Justice.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McCARTHY, in moving for leave to introduce Bill (No. 29) to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1874 said: The object of the Bill is to extend the hours of polling in cities. At present the hours of polling are from 9 o'clock in the morning till 5 in the afternoon; I propose to amend it as far as cities are concerned by making the hours from 9 in the morning until 8 in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MEMORANDUM OF SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL— COST OF PUBLISHING.

Mr. LAURIER, in the absence of Mr. LANGELIER, asked, What amount was paid to various newspapers for distributing to their readers the memorandum of Sir Alexander Campbell on the Riel matter; the names of the newspapers, and the sum paid to each?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The memorandum of Sir Alex. Campbell was first published in English on a large fly-sheet, copies of which were sent to most of the papers in the Province of Quebec. We have received, I think, but one account from those newspapers who published it, which was from a paper in the Eastern Townships, of $510. The two newspapers who published the memorandum in French, were the Monde and the Minerve, of Montréal. Each of them have accounts varying between $300 and $400; neither of them has been audited or verified, but $125 have been paid upon them; no other payments have been made.

MAJOR-GENERAL LAURIE AND GENERAL STRANGE.

Mr. CASEY asked, Was Major-General Laurie on the list of the Active Militia when he went to the North-West, and was he ordered to proceed there on duty? Was he gazetted as an officer of the Active Militia during the campaign? If so, when, and to what rank? In what capacity did he serve, and at what rate of pay? Was Major-General Strange on the Active Militia list on March 27th, 1885? If not, when was he gazetted, and to what rank? What command did he hold during the campaign? By whom appointed, when, and at what rate of pay?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow the question to stand, as I have not yet got the answer in writing.

MR. HUGH McDONALD.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether Mr. Hugh McDonald was in the Pilotage Commission for North Sydney, and between what dates? Whether he is still in the Pilotage Commission, and if not, what are the reasons for the change?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. McDonald was in the Pilotage Commission for Sydney—not North Sydney—between March 3, 1879, and June 19, 1885. At the latter date it was thought better, in the public interest, to abolish the Commission for Sydney, and erect in its place two Pilotage Authorities, on neither of which Mr. McDonald's name appears.

ROBERT STATHER.

Mr. WELDON asked, Has any order been made for the removal of Robert Stather from the penitentiary at Dorchester to the penitentiary at Kingston, and of what date? Has the said Robert Stather been removed from the Dorchester Penitentiary, and when?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish.) A warrant was made for the removal of that prisoner from the penitentiary at Dorchester to the penitentiary at Kingston; it bears date 19th February last. Robert Stather has been removed from the Dorchester penitentiary, about the 24th or 25th of that month.

SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, 1. The total amount of money paid by virtue of requirements, of 47 Victoria, chapter 8, intituled: "An Act to authorise certain subsidies and grants for aid in respect of the construction of the lines of railway therein mentioned," and the separate amounts paid up to 1st March, 1886, by virtue of the requirements of the said Act, to each Province, railway company, corporation, &c., mentioned in the same; 2. The total amount of money remaining to be paid by virtue of the requirements of the said Act, and the separate amounts payable to each Province, railway company, corporation, &c., mentioned in the same.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of my colleague, the hon. Minister of Railways, I must ask the hon. gentleman to make this a notice of motion, because it is too complicated to be answered in the way he wishes it. If he makes a motion we will bring down the papers.

JOSEPH A. WOODRUFF.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant) asked, What amount was paid to Joseph A. Woodruff, returning officer for the county of Lincoln for the Scott Act election, held last June?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Four hundred and fourteen dollars and ninety cents.

Mr. CHAPLEAU.

THE RIEL MEDICAL COMMISSION.

Mr. AMYOT. Though I gave no notice, I would like to enquire into a few facts regarding the medical commission: 1st. When were the reports of Drs. Valade and Lavell received by the Government? 2nd. Were the medical reports of Drs. Valade and Lavell which were brought down, made by telegraph or by letter? 3rd. Were there any reports, telegrams or letters as to the mental condition of Louis Riel sent to the Government by either Drs. Valade or Lavelle, other than those already brought down, and if so, when will they be laid before this House? I make this enquiry before the discussion begins, because I think the points are essential.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I am not in a position to answer from memory the questions of the hon. member.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny)—(Translation)—moved that it be resolved:

That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution.

Mr. Speaker, on the 16th of November last, a man, convicted of high treason before the courts of the country, ascended the steps of a scaffold at Regina, and paid by his life the part he had taken in the rebellious uprising in the North-West. On the 16th of November last, the hand of the executioner tightened the fatal knot around the neck of a political convict, and Louis Riel was launched into eternity. What is called human justice was satisfied. The announcement of this great event was flashed out throughout the country with all the speed of the electricity which carried it. It was received with various feelings. And let it be recorded as a disgrace to mankind, there were men who organised public demonstrations to celebrate, in the face of a sorrowing public, this dismal end of the drama of Regina. On the other hand, a portion of the population stood up in its indignation and solemnly protested against an execution which circumstances seemed to condemn, and against the Government who had ordered it. Since this ill-fated date the social body, as a whole, has undergone violent and painful convulsions and a whole class of our people is kept in an agitation, which, although perfectly constitutional, weakens our strength and has, for a moment, threatened to bring us a war of races. And, wherefore, this uneasiness? Wherefore, on the one hand, this manifestation of a delirious joy? Wherefore, on the other hand, this explosion of deep sorrow, of a real disappointment, of a disapproval which has loudly and solemnly asserted itself in the face of a whole country? More than once, heretofore, men who had been condemned by the laws of the country and the verdict of their fellow creatures have left the prison cells for the scaffold. More than once heretofore the sentence of death has received its terrific though just sanction without causing, in the community, that strange commotion which has been caused by the announcement of the execution of the chief of the half-breeds. But the death of Riel has been surrounded by circumstances of such a nature that it is looked upon by some as the gratification of a long-sought vengeance, by others as a provocation flung at the face of a whole nationality; by several as a breach of the laws of justice itself; by several, also, as a weakness on the part of the Government, as the wanton sacrifice of the life of a man who has been immolated to sectarian hatred and prejudice. This execution has caused a great commotion, and owing to the circumstances under which it has taken place, this simple question of justice has at once become a political and a national question. As such it has forced itself upon the attention of the people of our Province, as such it has also been looked upon by the people of other Provinces, and if Ontario wishes to upbraid Quebec for its popular agitation, for its indignation meetings, Quebec, on the other hand, can point out the incendiary articles published by the great Ontario newspaper, and ask the country at large and the members of the Government in particular, what is to be thought of the acrimonious criticisms of the Mail, of its inflammatory appeals, of its insulting articles, where the deepest ignorance goes hand in hand with the most blind fanaticisms. Since an opportunity is offered, it is my most imperative duty to protest, as a member for the Province of Quebec and as a Conservative, against these unfair attacks, these insulting threats; and I do it without any reserve, convinced as I am that this protestation on my part will find a faithful echo in the hearts of all those—to whatever nationality or Province they may belong—who sincerely wish that their country may grow prosperous in peace and harmony. It is very unfortunate that the contest between those who condemn the execution of Riel and those who defend the action of the Government should have been placed in Ontario as well as in Quebec on this dangerous national ground. Consequences much more serious than the hanging of a man or the overthrow of a Government might be the result of the strange position taken by the combatants. Let us thank God who has saved them, and let us bear in mind that great and noble causes have no need of either the vain calculations of politics or the passionate appeals to sentimentalism to prevail and to escape triumphantly from the claws of computing selfishness or blind hatred. Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because I wish to avoid this double danger, it is because I am deeply convinced of the rightfulness of the cause now submitted to the free deliberations of the representatives of the people, that I am determined to present my motion under the humble garb with which I have clothed it, convinced as I am that nothing in its form will clog its movements or impede its progress. It is not a national question, a question of pure sentiment, which I am about to discuss in this House; it is not a political question as regards party interests; no, it is a question of simple justice, a question of public right. Placed on this ground, the only true ground in my humble opinion, my motion will, I hope, receive the greatest possible number of votes. What does it ask? The pure and simple expression, unexplained as to the motives, of the condemnation of an act of the Government—the execution of Louis Riel. By not giving in my motion any motives for the regret which I ask this House to express, I leave to each one full liberty to support this motion for whatever motive he may deem sufficient, and by this means I ensure for its adoption every chance of success. Is that working in favor of the Government, is that serving their cause as has been asserted in certain quarters? No, indeed, since my motion is so worded as to unite against the Government the strongest possible vote. It would be otherwise, and I would then understand the charge brought against me, had I followed the policy suggested by one of the large newspapers of Montreal and had I coupled with my motion a declaration approving the general policy of the Government in their administration of the affairs of the North-West. In that event, all the Opposition would have refused as one man to vote for my motion, and the country would see to-day the sad spectacle of a handful of members being crushed in a ridiculous contest. I did not want such a result. For the same reason, and in order to be consistent with myself, I did not deem it necessary to wait until the Opposition would be ready or to agree with them on the policy to be followed. And I believe I am perfectly right. Indeed, what good could have been reasonably expected from such an agreement? One of two things: either the Opposition would have introduced a motion similar to mine, asking the pure and simple condemnation of the execution of Riel, or the Opposition would have introduced a complex motion wherein, besides the condemnation of the Riel execution, would have been found a condemnation of the general policy of the Government in the administration of the affairs of the North-West. In the first case, the motion of the Opposition being similar to mine, who could have pretended that their vote would have given a different result? No one, assuredly. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, that being the case, who could blame me for my action to-day? But let me suppose the case of a complex motion in which the Opposition would have asked for both the condemnation of the Riel execution and also of the administration of the Government in the North-West. What would be the result of the vote asked for? There is no need of being a prophet to foresee it; and I may affirm, without fear of being mistaken, that such a motion would not certainly have had the support of all those who are ready to vote against the Government on the simple question of the execution of Riel. Such a motion would then gather against the Government a less number of hon. members than those who will support the motion now laid before the House. At all events it is my firm conviction that from all points of view my action of to-day bears the stamp of the strongest logic, and as my motion is worded in its present form it is worthy of the most serious attention of this House, and it is the only one which can unite against the Government all the available forces of the Opposition and the Conservative faction which opposes the Government at the present time. Such is my justification. I owed it to the House and the country, and I give it stripped from all artifice. I give it entire, without any mental reservation, with the strongest conviction that it will dispel the doubts which may exist and will convince my friends of the excellence of my intentions and of the righteousness of my actions. Men who have never been my friends, men who have always worked against me ever since I entered politics, journalists—I mean such writers as those of the Free Press and the Globe—who do not know me at all, and who are completely ignorant of the manner in which I have acted recently, have manufactured quite a fanciful story in order to create for themselves the easy task of uttering their high sounding tirades. I have too much contempt for such nonsense and such malevolent insinuations to meet them with anything but a general denial. But if any hon. member will take upon himself the task of repeating these absurdities in this House, I am ready to overthrow this frail scaffolding and to prove once more the notorious bad faith of these ignorant scribes. The House will allow me not to insist any further and to come back without any transition to the motion I now make. I have said that this motion was made without stating the motive, that it does not involve in its wording the enumeration of the motives for which I invite the representatives of the nation to express by their votes the condemnation of the execution of Riel. I have explained this prudent reserve on my part, which leaves to each and every one the most complete facility to condemn the Riel execution for whatever motives they may deem sufficient. These motives are not wanting, and, for my part, I have no hesitation in stating mine. In my opinion they are more than sufficient to justify my having introduced my motion. Some few weeks ago the Government has caused to be distributed a pamphlet which contains the report of the case of the Queen vs. Riel charged and convicted of the crime of high treason. The House will allow me to read a short extract from that pamphlet. Here is what I find at page 154:

“Sitting held on Saturday, 6th August, 1885.

“The court assembled at 10 o'clock a.m.

“On the jury returning, after having retired to consider their verdict, the clerk of the court asked: Gentlemen, are you agreed upon your verdict? How say you?

“Is the prisoner guilty or not guilty?

"The jury find the prisoner guilty.

"Clerk.—Gentlemen of the jury, harken to your verdict as the court records it. You find the prisoner, Louis Riel, guilty, so say you all.

"The jury answered: Guilty.

"A juror.—Your Honor, I have been asked by my brother jurors to recommend the prisoner to the mercy of the Crown.

"Mr. Justice Richardson.—I may say in answer to you that the recommendation which you have given will be forwarded in proper manner to the proper authorities."

That verdict returned by a jury whom no man in this country suspects of having sympathised with the unfortunate half-breed; this recommendation to the mercy of the Crown, which the judge promised to forward to the proper authorities, have, in fact, been forwarded here at Ottawa, and left in the hands of the Minister of Justice. The Executive met. On the table of the Council, in that room where the fate of a poor convict was to be decided, were, together with the verdict of the court, a bundle of petitions from all parts of the country, not only from the Province of Quebec, but from Ontario, from Manitoba; not only from Canada, but from the United States and from the old countries in Europe. All of them prayed for a commutation of the sentence of death; all of them asked, in the name of justice itself, that the recommendation of the jury should be hearkened to. And long before the popular agitation had commenced, fourteen days before that which was to be Riel's last day, the man who has now the honor of addressing this House, joined his feeble voice to that of all the friends of clemency and justice, to pray with them that the verdict of the jury might be respected in all its integrity. Here is the letter which I wrote on the subject:

"VILLA MASTAI, 2nd November, 1885.

"Hon. Sir HECTOR L. LANGEVIN, K.O.M.G., O.B., M.P.C., Minister of Public Works, Ottawa.

"HONORABLE SIR,—As a representative of the people, speaking in the name of my county and I might add as expressing the general feeling in the Province of Quebec, I now fulfil the most imperative of duties while praying the Executive, through your mediation, the commutation of the sentence of death pronounced against Riel.

"In all unprejudiced and serious minds there exists a real doubt as to the mental condition of the poor convict. His actions are really those of an insane man and nobody can be unaware of the fact that this man has on two different occasions been locked up in a lunatic asylum. The jury has invoked the clemency of the Crown in his favor.

"It is this clemency which I crave and which in my opinion the Government ought to grant under the present circumstances. The execution of Riel would certainly be considered as an act of Draconian severity not to say a barbarous act; the people will hold the Government responsible for it and will call them to account for it.

"If the Government have nothing at all to reproach themselves as regards the half-breeds and the administration of the North-West; if all their employés have scrupulously done their duty and have in no way whatever contributed to the uprising of those who, however, have suffered, then, let them tie the rope around the neck of this unfortunate man.

"But I do not wish to discuss the question. In the name of my constituents, I ask the exercise of the royal prerogative, an act of high and beneficent policy.

"Believe me, honorable Sir,

"Your very devoted,

"PH. LANDRY."

How did the Government answer these numerous requests, these appeals to mercy? The hon. Minister of Justice in answer to a question put last Friday by the hon. member from Bellechasse has told us. On the 12th of November, 1885, an Order in Council was passed directing that "the law should take its course." Such is the official information which we have received. That is to say the Government have laid aside the recommendation of the jury, and refused to consider the numerous petitions to which that recommendation had given rise and which came to them from all parts. In other words, Mr. Speaker, and this is my firm conviction, the Government have ignored the verdict returned, and, by ordering that the law should take its course, they have made a most positive act and they have assumed a responsibility which the jury themselves had not dared to assume. And, nevertheless, that jury, if we consider its composition, if we bear in mind the circumstances of time and place in which they had to move and give their opinion, less than any one the jury could have been supposed to lean towards clemency. Their position was one of the most peculiar which could be. Before them appeared the man who, in their opinion at least, had raised the standard of rebellion. For these men of the North-West, Riel was the source, the principle, the fomenter of the insurrection, and he must have appeared to them as carrying the incendiary torch everywhere, stirring up the Indians, sowing devastation and death under his footsteps, the footsteps of an agitator and a false prophet. They had to decide his fate. They had to declare by their verdict, whether the chief of the half-breeds was or was not guilty of the crime of high treason of which he was accused. To declare that Louis Riel was not guilty, was to bring about an acquittal, the consequences of which these men had reason to fear; it was to set the chief of the half-breeds at full liberty; it was to prepare for themselves—such at least must have been their opinion—all the inconveniences, all the disappointments, all the miseries from which they had just issued; it was to leave the country in a continuous agitation and perhaps the prey of a new insurrection. Of course they could not desire all these consequences, and nothing short of the death of Riel could avert them. On the other hand they had before them a man who sought to justify the uprising of which he had been the heart and soul, who held the various Government, who have held power for the last fifteen years, responsible for a disastrous administration of the affairs of the North-West. They had before them a man whose ways were peculiar, who had already been twice locked up in lunatic asylums, a man who pretended to be in direct and constant communication with the Spirit, who dreamed of a new division of the North-West into seven distinct parts, which parts his own fertile and generous fancy gave to I forget which nations of old Europe. He was a monomaniac. His antecedents gave an undeniable proof of it, and this proof was corroborated by his actions and pretensions at the time. The jury were convinced of this, and if they could not find him "not guilty" they felt that, before God and man, they could neither find him simply "guilty" without invoking at the same time in his favor the benefit of extenuating circumstances. This is what they did, and while returning against Louis Riel a verdict of "guilty" the jury have added to it this recommendation to the mercy of the Crown, which is no less, under the present circumstances, than the supreme declaration that in their opinion Louis Riel ought not to be executed. This was overridden by the Government for reasons unknown to me. They have offended all the notions of a wholesome administration of justice, they have taken the law into their own hands, they have overlooked all precedents, and, let it be said without hesitation, they have deserved the blame and condemnation which my motion asks this House to inflict upon them. The motive which I invoke is sufficient in itself to justify the conduct which I have always followed until this day from the date of the 16th of November last, notwithstanding the statements to the contrary which have been put forward by certain newspapers which speak without any knowledge of the facts. If the motives which I invoke are sufficient in themselves to obtain the condemnation of the Government, do not think, Mr. Speaker, that there are no others. It will be sufficient to point out some of them, and I will leave to other hon. gentlemen who will speak after me the duty of developing them with a great deal more science and ability than I could do it myself. There is a very certain fact, which nobody has ever denied and which the Government themselves have acknowledged, and it is that there has always existed a very serious doubt as to the question whether he had the full and entire enjoyment of his intellectual faculties. This doubt, which, according to all probability, existed in the minds of the jury at Regina, and which was the motive of their recommentation to mercy, this doubt has been shared by all the classes in the community, and it exists in a still higher degree in the minds of those who, from near or far, have had occasion to follow the various stages of Louis Riel's agitated career. Those who do not share this doubt are precisely those who are convinced of the insanity and of the irresponsibility of the half-breed chieftain. It was the duty of the Government to fully dispel the darkness which had surrounded this question; they owed it to themselves, and they owed it to the country, to throw the brightest light on this question of the most vital importance, and to prove, beyond cavil, that the man they were sending to the scaffold was not a madman. What did the Government do in such an emergency? They appointed a medical commission, composed of three physicians, Drs. Jukes, Valade and Lavell. I regret that at a time when such great excitement prevailed, when the whole country was ablaze, that the Government did not deem it proper to choose outside of the Mounted Police, which had taken such an active part in the suppression of the rebellion, and even outside of the country which, as a whole, waged war against Louis Riel. I regret, I say, that the Government did not deem it proper to choose elsewhere, in England, in France, or in the United States, for instance, men who are considered as authorities on such matters; real specialists, men who devote their lives to the study and treatment of these diseases of the human mind which are so delicate. In the face of such a decision, in the face of such a choice, the critics would have laid down their powerless shafts, and all through the country unanimous applause would have greeted the action of the Government. I have nothing to say against the doctors I have just named. I am personally acquainted with Dr. Valade, and I hope and trust that his two colleagues are like himself, perfect gentlemen, honest men and good doctors. And yet—who would dare to deny it?—there is one weak point, one extremely weak point in the composition of that commission from the standpoint of public opinion. It was said at the time—at least it was said by those who did not know any of these doctors—it was said: The Government have appointed an English doctor from Ontario, and a French Canadian doctor from Ottawa, that is to say, two men, one of whom will decide in favor of Riel, and the other against him. I know, Mr. Speaker, that this preconceived opinion does not give justice to the perfect impartiality of those who were chosen, but at all events this was an opinion which, if it was not entirely reasonable, was nevertheless public opinion, and it is for that reason that I regret that the Government should have run counter to it. And they have run counter to it, it cannot be denied, they have shocked it violently by choosing as a third commissioner one of their own employés, a surgeon from the Mounted Police, from this armed corps which has been through the campaign of the North-West and which has left several of its members on the prairie where they had fallen under the bullets fired by the half-breeds under the command of Riel. As regards its composition, the medical commission appointed by the Government cannot therefore offer to the public that guarantee of impartiality which would have been offered by a commission composed of strangers and of specialists. But there is still more than that, and I maintain, with all the authorities, with all those who have made of mental diseases their special study, that the medical commission has not had time enough to study the Riel case, and that therefore it has been impossible for it to have given a satisfactory judgment on the question submitted to their investigation. To declare that a man is insane is not quite the same thing as to declare that he is not insane. The reason of this is obvious. As a general thing, when a doctor is called upon to give his opinion on a case of insanity, the case is well characterised, because, as a rule, the disciple of Esculapius is only called when the patient is undergoing a crisis, so that the doctor may at once give a certificate according to the facts. Or else the case submitted will present no doubt: as those of acute mania, of madness, of general palsy, of idiocy, or imbecility. In all these cases any doctor may in a few minutes certify the insanity and give the motives of his judgment. Quite different is the question when one has to certify that a man is perfectly sound in mind, that he is responsible for all his actions. Take a monomaniac, for instance, or a maniac having lucid intervals. It will require a deep study, a constant observation, sometime of long duration, to discover a disease which often only manifests itself by intermissions, at periods more or less remote, or which only discovers itself when you have succeeded in touching the sensible part of this wandering intellect. And yet, in the present case, the Government have accepted the declaration of a medical commission which certainly has not had the time which was necessary to be able to certify in all certainty that Riel was not insane. The Government have acted with undue haste, and they have opened the door to the just recriminations which are made to-day. The doubt which existed on the question whether Louis Riel was in the full possession of his mental faculties has not therefore been cleared. Nay, it exists stronger than ever, and even the report of the medical commission, which report was brought down by the Government, establishes beyond contradiction that Louis Riel was suffering from "partial delirium." What does Dr. Jukes say? I quote his own words:

"I cannot escape the conviction that except on purely religious questions relating to what may be called divine mysteries, he was, when entrusted to my care, and still continues to be, sane and accountable for his actions. * * * I therefore record my opinion that, with the reservation above made, Riel is a sane, clear-headed and accountable being before God and man."

Drs. Valade and Lavell even go further. Here is the opinion of Dr. Valade:

"I am of opinion that while Riel suffered under hallucinations on political and religious questions, on other points he was quite sensible and could distinguish right from wrong."

Dr. Lavell thus expresses himself:

"I am of the opinion that although Riel held and expressed peculiar views as to religion and general government, he was an accountable being and capable of distinguishing right from wrong."

Riel, says Dr. Jukes, is sound in mind, except on religious questions. He suffers from hallucinations, adds Dr. Valade, on political and religious questions; he entertains and professes peculiar ideas, peculiar views as to religion and general government, adds in his turn Dr. Lavell. We have therefore a triple deposition stating that, on religious questions, Riel is unbound in mind, and out of three doctors two of them declare besides that the half-breed chieftain is not sound in mind as regards political questions. In one case the unanimous statement of the medical commission, in the other the majority of the commission declaring really that Louis Riel suffers from partial delirium. Such is the question of facts elucidated by the report of the commission. What does science say? I will quote an authority, Lelorrain, doctor in law and doctor in medicine. Here is what he writes in his work entitled: L'aliéné au point de vue de la responsabilité pénale, page 20.

"The monomaniac, he says, is the madman who, in a certain order of ideas, if we are to judge from appearances, speaks and acts like a man whose mind is sound, but whose reason is haunted by special delirious ideas, always the same as a rule, and frequent hallucinations, which, in most cases, may be considered as having created them. * * * The partial delirium is, as Falret expresses it, expansive or expressive. In the first case we will retain for it the name of monomania; in the second, we will give it that of lypemania, which was given to it by Esquirol."

"In the case of the monomaniac, the fixed ideas bear the stamp of boldness and pride. The individual is over-excited beyond all expression, he believes he has been charged with a high mission, called upon to dictate laws, or command an army; he has both power and fortune. It is the megalomania which sometimes takes a religious character, and then constitutes theomania; the madman is prophet, Messiah, God Himself."

Is not that, Mr. Speaker, the most minute and the most faithful description of that partial delirium from which the unfortunate chief of the half-breeds was suffering? Now, the question is, to what extent Riel was responsible for his acts. What is the jurisprudence established on such matters, and what light does science throw on this subject? I am quoting Lelorrain, page 57:

"In the case of partial delusion the following is the system adopted by the English law: When, while considering as in accordance with reality the delirious ideas of a madman, he has done a lawful act; when believing he was attacked for instance, he has killed to defend himself, the law declares him irresponsible. But if he has committed a murder outside of the case of self defence, to avenge himself for simple defamation or an insult, then he has been guilty of murder." (Maudsley, page 93.)

That is to say, for those who believe in partial responsibility, there is in the monomaniac two entirely distinct men: one who is insane, and the other who is perfectly sound in mind; the first alone is irresponsible for his crimes or misdemeanors. He is impelled to commit them by an hallucination, a delirious idea, a delusion. If the fact with which the accused is charged is foreign to his delirium, the insane man then becomes responsible. But in truth, on what ground says with reason Judge Ledd, quoted by Maudsley, one of the most remarkable authorities as regards mental diseases, on what ground can it be held that an act inspired by a delirious idea has at the same time taken its motive in a determination of that part of the intellect which remains sound. And the celebrated English specialist adds:

"In fact, it is mere chance which always decides whether an insane man will be punished or relaxed." (Maudsley, p. 93.)

Well-meaning men have at all times protested against this doctrine of partial responsibility, which was accepted reluctantly, as will be seen by English jurisprudence.

"In vain," says Broussais, in his work intitled: De l'Irritation et de la Folie, volume 2, page 378, "In vain are we told that a few monomaniacs are perfectly reasonable on all subjects which are foreign to their prevalent ideas, still they may reason correctly on simple questions as regards their physical wants and all ordinary topics. But to the best observers, none of them are able to hold a serious conversation requiring attention to deal with a question of morals or philosophy without falling more or less into inconsistencies; no Don Quixotte is perfect."

Brierre de Boismont, is still more explicit. Here is what he says in the Annales Medico Psychologiques, volume 5, page 368:

"Is it possible to limit the field of action into which a prevalent idea may exert its influence? What physiologist would assert that such an idea is foreign to such another, and could not in any case be associated with it in the mind of a sound man, much less in the brain of an insane man?"

Falret states:

"That he has never met with a case of real monomania." (Des maladies mentales, page 436.)

Tardieu thus expresses himself on the subject of the so-called monomaniac. See Etudes Medico-légales sur la Folie, page 200:

"The prevalent idea stands out in relief on a ground generally and originally altered and the partial delirium is only the highest note of the greater clash which exists between the various intellectual and moral functions."

I know, Mr. Speaker, that to these authorities quoted by me other authorities may be opposed. Let them be quoted and the only conclusion to be drawn will be that on so serious a question the learned men do not agree. Therefore, a doubt exists. Who is to benefit from it? The accused, answers all the established jurisprudence. There is one last author whom I would like to quote, because he perfectly summarises all the question and solves it in a very clear and satisfactory manner. I allude to Dr. Lelorrain in his L'aliéné au point de vue de la responsabilité pénale. He thus expresses himself on page 24:

"The insane man, whose delirium is partial, may reason sensibly outside of his fixed ideas, and to a certain extent, even on these subjects. He may, believing his ideas to be true, draw from them logical conclusions."

sequences, except in cases to be hereinafter mentioned. Far from us the idea of denying the existence of this dualism which is to be met not only in monomania but in all forms of insanity—one must, however, know how to interpret it. In fact, madness in every form is a dédoublement of the individuality, and this word which has been applied to a special condition is one of the characteristics of madness.

"But the understanding of the monomaniac is not composed, as the theory which we are attacking would have us believe, of two distinct parts: one diseased and the other sound.

"However limited the delirium may be, it is impossible to determine, no matter how shrewd the examination may be, in what proportion it has altered the mental faculties; even when apparently it is limited to one false idea, it could not be inferred from that, that all the other ideas are sound. In fact, however elementary a thought may be, it is, to a certain extent, the synthesis and the resultant of several others; its formation as such must have required the concurrence of factors, sensations, remembrances, partial judgments, association of primary ideas, and all a series of more or less conscious operations.

"Thus when we are in presence of delirious conception, however limited it may be, we must forcibly infer from it that many springs have been warped, and even that the whole organism is defective; otherwise the good working of one of them would be sufficient to correct the error. In order that a delirious idea may take hold of the mind, there must be a participation of all the faculties."

And the author ends a whole dissertation on this interesting subject by the following conclusion, to which I call the special attention of all my hon. colleagues:

"Justice, reason and science agree to condemn that theory of the responsibility of the insane man called monomaniac, when he is supposed to act outside of his delirious ideas. In truth, monomania does not exist, or at least, the partial delirium is nothing but a momentary systematisation of the general delirium and must involve the irresponsibility on the same grounds as mania."

As it will be now readily seen, this grave doubt which has entered the mind of a whole people, when the question was raised whether Riel had or had not the full enjoyment of his intellectual faculties, has not been dispelled. The composition of the medical commission was not of such a nature as to tend to dispel it, and its report put into our hands confirms our idea that Riel was suffering from partial delirium, and consequently raises the controverted question of the responsibility of the convict, increases the doubt in his favor and justifies us in saying with Shakespeare, in scene ii of Act V of Hamlet:

"If Hamlet from himself be ta'en away,
And, when he's not himself does wrong Laertes,
Then Hamlet does it not, Hamlet denies it.
Who does it then? His madness."

I have just given you, Mr. Speaker, the second motive which I invoke to ask from this House an expression of regret that the sentence of death pronounced against Louis Riel should have been carried out. Taking into consideration the antecedents of Riel, knowing that this man has been twice locked up in a lunatic asylum, the Government, after having received the medical report of a commission appointed under rather suspicious circumstances, had only one duty to fulfil, and that was to commute the sentence of the doomed man. Not having done that, having ordered the execution of a monomaniac, they have deserved the condemnation involved in my motion. And should it be necessary to give an additional motive in support of that motion it is to be found in the fact that Gen. Middleton, the representative of Federal authority in the North-West during the last rebellion, has treated with Louis Riel by asking him and accepting his surrender. On the next day after the capture of Batoche, when the half-breeds, beaten and dispersed, laid down their arms and surrendered to the victorious General, the latter, seeing that he had been unable to take Riel, fearing undoubtedly a continuation of the hostilities, the uprising of the Indians, whom Riel, being at liberty, could at any time muster up on the war-path, took a sheet of paper and wrote the following letter to the chief of the half-breeds:

"BATOCHÉ, 13th May, 1885.

"MR. RIEL,—I am ready to receive you and your council and to protect you until the Government shall have decided as regards your respective cases.

"FRED. MIDDLETON,
Major-General, Commanding Troops in N. W. T."

This letter bears date the 13th of May, but it was sent on the 14th, as stated in a telegram sent to the hon. Minister of Militia by General Middleton himself. I will now quote the words of the commander himself. Here is what he tells us in his official report, page 15 :

" May 15th. I sent detachment of mounted men under command of Major Boulton to patrol the woods. In the afternoon, two scouts, Armstrong and Hourie, who had been sent with Boulton and who had strayed themselves from the troops, met Riel, who surrendered—

And the General adds the following significant words :—

"and produced the letter which I had sent him and in which I summoned him to surrender and promised to protect him until the Dominion Government had decided on his case. The scouts brought him to my camp, and, as you are aware, I made him a prisoner."

It is therefore proved by the avowal of the General himself, that he had treated with Louis Riel by asking of him and accepting his surrender. Now, this action was never disavowed by the Executive. Hence the Executive share the responsibility of it, and instead of ordering the execution of the half-breed chief, after having treated him as a belligerent, they should at least have spared his life, which he had confided to the manliness of a soldier and to the generosity of his country. For this third motive, I ask this House to condemn the execution of Riel. This execution is, moreover, condemnable because it shocks all the notions which have been accepted and put into practice for a great number of years, whenever a sentence of death is to be applied to an offence of a purely political character. The crime of high treason, of which Louis Riel has been accused, necessarily belongs to this class. Were there any precedents which the Government might have invoked to justify this clemency which the jury asked in favor of the chief of the half-breeds? they could be found by merely crossing the frontier and asking the Americans how they have treated Jefferson Davis and all those gallant Southern generals who fought against the eagle of Washington, how they have treated Sitting Bull and his savage hordes? If we enquire of the Mother Country to know how were treated those who have raised the standard of rebellion against her, our attention will be drawn to Catewayo escaping from the scaffold, and Arabi Pasha leading a peaceful life in that terrestrial paradise known as the Island of Ceylon. And how did France act towards Abdel-el-Kader who killed her sons in the burning deserts of Algeria in the deep passes of Kabylia. Abdel-el-Kader, the rebel, being a prisoner became an honest citizen, and like the ambassador of a great country he had his residence in Paris, his box at the opera and his drives at the Bois de Boulogne. Capital executions for political offences are no more in the habits of our times, and in the present case neither the safety of the state nor the maintenance of order in the North-West required this excessive severity shown by the Government when they ordered the execution of a man convicted of a political offence. And for this fourth reason I ask this House to simply express regret for the condemnation and execution of Riel. There are still other motives which will undoubtedly be developed during the present debate. For my part I think that those I have given are sufficient to justify my vote. I regret to be in the painful obligation to part with those with whom I have always agreed. I do it nevertheless, without any hesitation, as on the day after the execution of Riel, I took, without any hesitation, towards my country and the country at large, a position exactly similar to that which I now occupy. I have been charged with motives which I repudiate. It has been loudly stated in some parts that there was an agreement between myself and the Government with regard to this motion. I deny the assertion.

Some hon. MEMBER. Well done!

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny). The assertion came from men who have corrupted their ways and who, to-day, in order to serve mean party interests, do not know whether they ought or they ought not to regret the execution of the chief of the half-breeds. What do I care for these hesitations, these calculations of the last hour? What do I care for the insults which an ignorant and intoxicated pen pours out in the columns of a certain press which belies its title and styles itself free. Those only are truly free, who know how to place their duty above all, and who, obeying the dictates of their conscience, work sincerely for the glory and honor of their country, and ask the people in an undesigning and disinterested manner to repudiate the bloody act which threatens to soil the pages of our history.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I must say that during the last four months it has sometimes been very hard for me, as a Minister of the Crown representing, with my two French colleagues in the Cabinet, specially the French population of the Province of Quebec, to remain silent. I thought, however, that it was not before the crowd, it was not at the church door, it was not in public meetings I should meet the accusers of the Government, and especially the accusers of the Ministers of the Province of Quebec—I thought the proper place to meet our accusers was on the floor of Parliament, in the House of Commons, where we could meet face to face our accusers, where our trial was to take place, where we were to be arraigned, and where our peers were to be found. Mr. Speaker, I say that at times it was hard for us to remain silent, when we saw in so many places in the Province of Quebec especially—I should say entirely in the Province of Quebec—some of our friends, with our opponents, denouncing us as traitors to our race, as traitors to our nationality, and as traitors to our country. I thought that after having been twenty-nine years in public life, having had the confidence of my countrymen of all origins, not only in my own Province, but also in other Provinces, I might have been spared the title of traitor. But, Mr. Speaker, thank God that word traitor has not been pronounced even by the majority of my Province, and I know it has not been pronounced by the country at large. No; we are not traitors to our country, or to our blood, or to our nationality. We have done our duty to our Queen and to our country. We were not, as were our accusers, without any oath of office. We had responsibility as Ministers of the Crown, we had responsibility as a Cabinet, we had responsibility as the advisers of the Queen's representative, and we had a duty to perform to ourselves, to our Queen and to our country, and that duty we believe we have performed properly, and we believe that this House, when we have been heard and have explained, and that history as well, will say that we acted rightly and did only our duty. These attacks, these insults that have been heaped upon our heads have passed away. Now the sober thought, the sober reflection of the people has come back and we can be heard, whilst three or four months ago only passion, sentiment, hatred, would be heard; but to-day here before the representatives of the people, before our peers and judges that are to give their verdict either for or against us, we can be heard, and we intend to be heard, and we intend to explain the position of the Government, and show what we have done, why we did it, and also why we should be sustained by this House. First, what we have done. Last Session, when Parliament was sitting, we heard from day to day the report of the events that were passing in the North-West. We heard that some of our best men in the North-West, settlers and others, had been made prisoners by the chief of the Metis, Louis Riel; that he was there with bands of armed men and was defying the authorities, and intended to have his authority established there against that of the Queen. We heard that, not content with having the half-breeds in arms, he had also called to his help the Indians, the savages of the North-West in order to secure for himself a footing in the country, and that then, as we saw afterwards by the trial that took place at Regina, he sought to go through the country destroying it and establishing the rule of the half-breed and the Indian. That was one of the crimes which were committed at that epoch. Those things were known to us, and to our consternation we heard that, not only had peaceful settlers been made prisoners, not only had peaceful settlers been murdered, not only had a number of our North-West Mounted Police been killed, but that two peaceful missionaries, who had never done anything to those savages but good and good works, had also been murdered after Louis Riel had called upon the Indians to rise and come to his help. This news coming from the far west to this part of Canada, coming to the authorities here, had this effect, that of course we at once ordered the militia of the country to come to the relief of the settlers of the North-West and put down the rebellion. What was the result of the appeal made by the Government to the militia of the country? Did they hesitate? No. Mr. Speaker, we could have had three times, five times as many volunteers and militia as we had. The difficulty was to choose amongst them, and to injure as little as possible this portion of the country by taking from their ordinary avocations men who were enrolled and wished to go to the front. Well, Mr. Speaker, amongst the men who volunteered or were called upon to volunteer and come to the help of the Government and the help of the authorities of the country, and put down the rebellion, were two French Canadian battalions from the Province of Quebec, one from Montreal and one from Quebec, both of them commanded by members of this House, one sitting on this side and the other sitting on the other side of the House. And why were those battalions sent to the west? Were they sent only for the purpose of showing we had a militia in this country? Did these battalions go simply to make a promenade? They knew perfectly well, and it was according to their wish, that they were called upon to maintain order, to meet the rebels, to fight them and to kill them if necessary. That is the unfortunate state of things in war, but it is a necessary state of things. Those men knew it; they had patriotism enough to go, and I never doubted, and there is no one in this House who would doubt for a minute, that the militiamen, whether English, French, Scotch or Irish—no matter to what nationality they belong—that even one of them would hesitate in assisting to put down rebellion. These men went to the west; these battalions went there; the cavalry, artillery and infantry, with the worthy, courageous and brave General Middleton at their head. That fight was the first in this country where a force of militiamen, entirely composed of Canadians, had to be put in the field to put down a rebellion without the help of British troops, and the operation was complete. The rebellion was ended. These men found the half-breeds and Indians entrenched; they fought them and carried their entrenchments. At Batoché Riel was present with his half-breeds and Indians, and for four days they fought the Queen's troops, the militiamen of Canada, and the result was that the rebels were defeated and the authority of the law was made supreme. After that, Riel was arrested. He had not the glory of falling on the battle-field as a soldier, but he was made prisoner three days after the battle and brought to General Middleton. We are told by the hon. gentleman who made this motion, and whom I must congratulate on the quiet and moderate tone of his speech—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; I always recognise in an opponent a good or a proper act, and I must say—

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Hon. gentlemen seem to think that my using the word "opponent" is a laughable expression. The hon. gentleman has put himself in the position of an opponent to-day, and for that reason I have no doubt he will not object to my calling him so. The hon. gentleman says that General Middleton wrote to Riel and told him that he was ready to receive him and his council and keep them safe, or words to that effect, until the Government of Canada had disposed of them or decided upon their fate. Mr. Speaker, the General never told him that he and his council, by giving themselves up, were not to be tried or that by that act their crime of treason was to be condoned. He told them—and he kept his promise—that they were safe, and he delivered Riel into the hands of the authorities at Regina, where he was perfectly safe—as safe as he was in the camp of General Middleton. But, Mr. Speaker, the military operations were complete; they were over, and in so far as our militia was concerned, we must be proud of the way that the militia of Canada behaved under these trying circumstances. We must deplore the loss of life that occurred at that period; we must regret exceedingly the death of these good men and brave that were sent to the front to defend their country. But these losses were inevitable under the circumstances, and I know that the country will always take care of the widows and children of these men who fell on the battle field. Their names will go down to posterity, and our children and great-grand-children will say that so-and-so was at that battle, that he fought the battles of his country and died the death of a soldier. The trial of Riel took place at Regina. We have been told that that trial was not a proper, legal, or constitutional one. I might avoid going into that portion of the subject when I remember the decision of the full court at Winnipeg, and afterwards Her Majesty's Privy Council in England with regard to that tribunal. But it is as well to remind hon. gentlemen that the trial of Louis Riel took place under a law which was then the law of the land—a law which had been passed at the time hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. They thought then, and the Parliament of Canada thought with them, that a jury of six men and a stipendiary magistrate and another magistrate were a proper tribunal before which to try all crimes in that country. That tribunal had already tried several parties, and some of them had been sentenced to death and hanged accordingly under that tribunal. In this case, we did not create a new tribunal to try Louis Riel; he was not tried by a court-martial, but he was tried by a court established by the law of the land as any other man would have been tried, whether he was called Riel or called by another name, whether he had French blood in his veins or English or Scotch or Irish blood. It was not a question of nationality—it was a question of an accused prisoner put upon his trial for the crime of high treason. He was tried before that tribunal; every opportunity was given him to defend himself; his own counsel admit that these opportunities were as great as could be expected. The delays required in order to bring his witnesses before the court were granted, and even the expenses of his own witnesses were paid by the Crown; and after a just and impartial trial the jury found the prisoner guilty of high treason. The stipendiary magistrate, Mr. Richardson, who was presiding in that court, had then a duty—a most painful duty, I am sure—to perform; but it was a duty of his office, it was a duty that the law imposed upon him, that is to say, to pass sentence upon the prisoner. That sentence was the sentence provided for by the Act of 1868, passed in this House with the consent of both sides, passed unanimously; and the punishment for high treason under that Act of Parliament, is death, and therefore Mr. Richardson had nothing else to do than to pass the sentence of death upon the prisoner. Knowing him as I do, I am sure he must have felt very much grieved to be obliged to pass that sentence, because it is always a most painful duty for any man to have to condemn one of his fellow creatures to the punishment of death. He was so condemned; and I am told by the hon. gentleman who made this motion that the jury recommended the prisoner to the mercy of the Crown or the mercy of the court. It is true that the jury coupled their verdict with a recommendation to the mercy of the court. But the jury—an intelligent jury—knew perfectly well that the verdict of guilty of high treason conveyed with it, and was to be followed immediately by the sentence of death. Therefore when they recommended the prisoner to the mercy of the court, they knew perfectly well that that was not a recommendation that could change the sentence.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The sentence of death was the sentence of the law, and if hon. gentlemen will allow me to proceed, they will see that if the jury had any doubt about the sanity of the prisoner or about the evidence that had been given at the trial, they could not bring in a verdict of guilty, but could only bring in a verdict of not guilty. If they had any doubt, the benefit of that doubt should be given to the prisoner, and no matter what might be their convictions, their verdict should be not guilty. But that was not their verdict; their verdict was guilty, and we have to take their verdict as it was. This is not the first time that a verdict which carries with it the sentence of death is accompanied by the jury's recommendation to mercy. We know perfectly well the feeling of juries. Like all of us, they feel grieved to see a fellow creature hanged and paying with his life the penalty of the crime he may have committed; and we very frequently find them coming down with a recommendation to mercy. It seems to be a solace to their feelings. But in this case we had to take the verdict as it was; we had to take the evidence as it was. But before the matter came before us, the counsel of the prisoner took further proceedings. According to the law that was passed by hon. gentlemen opposite, they very properly appealed to the full Court of Queen's Bench at Winnipeg to have the verdict set aside; they wished to have a new trial; they wished to show that the prisoner was insane; they wished, in fact, to save their client, and no one can blame them for that—it was their duty to save him if they could. But, Sir, what happened before that court? The judges were unanimous in declaring that the trial had been a just and legal trial, and that the court was legally constituted, and therefore they refused to change the sentence of the court below, but confirmed it. One of the judges, Mr. Justice Killam, speaking of the sanity of the prisoner, said:

"Mr. Lemieux laid great stress upon the fact that the jury accompanied their verdict with a recommendation to mercy, as showing that they thought the prisoner insane. I cannot see that any importance can be attached to this. I have read very carefully the report of the charge of the magistrate, and it appears to have been so clearly put that the jury could have no doubt of their duty in case they thought the prisoner insane when he committed the acts in question. They could not have listened to that charge without understanding fully that to bring in a verdict of guilty was to declare emphatically their disbelief in the insanity of the prisoner. The recommendation may be accounted for in many ways not connected at all with the question of the sanity of the prisoner."

This was not the first time these judges had capital cases before them; they knew perfectly well that it was not an unusual thing with juries to couple their verdict with a recommendation to mercy, and they knew that in this case, if the jury thought the prisoner was insane, they should not have brought in the verdict of guilty, but a verdict of not guilty. Now, the case stood thus: the prisoner had been condemned by the court at Regina; the full court of Queen's Bench at Winnipeg had declared unanimously that the trial had been a fair and constitutional one; and then the counsel for the prisoner thought that they should try en dernier ressort to obtain an appeal to the Queen's Privy Council. They petitioned the Queen's Privy Council:

"That Your Majesty will be graciously pleased to order that your petitioner may have special leave to appeal, and be at liberty to enter and prosecute his appeal from the aforesaid sentence and judgment respectively, and that the said stipendiary magistrate and justice may be ordered to transmit forthwith the transcript of the proceedings and evidence in the matter to the Privy Council Office, or that Your Majesty may be graciously pleased to make such further or other order as to Your Majesty in Council may appear just and proper."

Well, this matter went to the Queen's Privy Council. The Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council met, and after hearing the counsel for the prisoner, and without hearing, if I am not wrong, the counsel for the Crown, rendered this judgment, which I think the House should be put in possession of, as it is the finale of the legal proceedings in this case:

"This is a petition of Louis Riel, tried in July last at Regina, in the North-West Territories of Canada, and convicted of high treason, and sentenced to death, for leave to appeal against an order of the Queen's Bench of Manitoba, confirming that conviction.

"It is the usual rule of this committee not to grant leave to appeal in criminal cases, except where some clear departure from the requirements of justice is alleged to have taken place. Whether in this case the prerogative to grant an appeal still exists, as their Lordships have not heard that question argued, they desire neither to affirm nor to deny, but they are clearly of opinion that in this case leave should not be given.

"The petitioner was tried under the provisions of an Act passed by the Canadian Legislature, providing for the administration of criminal justice for those portions of the North-West Territories of Canada in which the offence charged against the petitioner is alleged to have been committed. No question has been raised that the facts as alleged were not proved to have taken place, nor was it denied before the original tribunal, or before the Court of Appeal in Manitoba, that the acts attributed to the petitioner amounted to the crime of high treason.

"The defence upon the facts sought to be established before the jury was, that the petitioner was not responsible for his acts by reason of mental infirmity.

"The jury before whom the petitioner was tried negatived that defence, and no argument has been presented to their Lordships directed to show that that finding was otherwise than correct. Of the objections raised on the face of the petition two points only seem to be capable of plausible or, indeed, intelligible expression, and they have been urged before their Lordships with as much force as was possible, and as fully and completely in their Lordships' opinion as it would have been if leave to appeal had been granted, and they have been dealt with by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Manitoba with a patience, learning and ability that leaves very little to be said upon them.

"The first point is that the Act itself under which the petitioner was tried was ultra vires the Dominion Parliament to enact. That Parliament derived its authority for the passing of that statute from the Imperial Statute, 34 and 35 Vic., chap. 28, which enacted that the Parliament of Canada may from time to time make provision for the administration, peace, order, and good government of any territory not for the time being included in any Province.

"It is not denied that the place in question was one in respect of which the Parliament of Canada was authorised to make such provision, but it appears to be suggested that any provision differing from the provisions which in this country have been made for administration, peace, order and good government cannot, as matters of law, be provisions for peace, order, and good government in the territories to which the statute relates, and further that, if a court of law should come to the conclusion that a particular enactment was not calculated as matter of fact and policy to secure peace, order, and good government, that they would be entitled to regard any statute directed to those objects, but which a court should think likely to fail of that effect, as ultra vires and beyond the competency of the Dominion Parliament to enact.

"Their Lordships are of opinion that there is not the least color for such a contention. The words of the statute are apt to authorise the utmost discretion of enactment for the attainment of the objects pointed to. They are words under which the widest departure from criminal procedure as it is known and practised in this country have been authorised in Her Majesty's Indian Empire.

"Forms of procedure unknown to the English common laws have there been established and acted upon, and to throw the least doubt upon the validity of powers conveyed by those words would be of widely mischievous consequence.

"There was indeed a contention upon the construction of the Canadian statute, 43 Vic., chap. 25, that high treason was not included in the words: "any other crimes," but it is too clear for argument, even without the assistance afforded by the 10th sub-section, that the Dominion Legislature contemplated high treason as comprehended within the language employed.

"The second point suggested assumes the validity of the Act, but is founded upon the assumption that the Act has not been complied with. By the 7th sub-section of the 76th section it is provided that the magistrate shall take or cause to be taken in writing full notes of evidence and other proceedings thereat, and it is suggested that this provision has not been complied with, because, though no complaint is made of inaccuracy or mistake, it is said that the notes were taken by a shorthand writer under the authority of the magistrate, and by a subsequent process extended into ordinary writing intelligible to all. Their Lordships desire to express no opinion what would have been the effect if the provision of the statute had not been complied with, because it is unnecessary to consider whether the provision is directory only, or whether the failure to comply with it would be ground for error, inasmuch as they are of opinion that the taking full notes of the evidence in shorthand was a causing to be taken in writing full notes of the evidence, and a literal compliance therewith with the statute.

"Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that leave should not be granted to prosecute this appeal."

Therefore, the trial, which had begun at Regina, was continued by the appeal at Winnipeg, and finally was brought on a petition before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. These tribunals declared that the sentence passed on the prisoner at Regina was the sentence of the law. The case then had to come, as do all other capital cases, before the Governor General in Council. Every such case is examined into attentively by the Council, every member of the Council reads the evidence, the reports, the charges and judgments, and the petitions for or against the evidence; the Council weigh the whole and have to decide whether in all these documents there is anything to warrant the interference of the Governor in Council. We have not, as has the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to try the case again; the prisoner has been tried before the regular tribunals of the country, and we have only to see whether anything has occurred since which would warrant our intervention. For example, should a material witness, who was away and could not be had during the trial, come forward, whose evidence, had it been given before the court, would have perhaps secured the acquittal of the prisoner, the Governor in Council would have to consider seriously that fact and decide whether it was of sufficient importance to justify interference. But in this case no such allegation was made. The sole allegation of the counsel for the prisoner, contained in the petition, was with reference to the sanity or insanity of the prisoner. That petition, among other things, said:

"That this insanity has been so much proved that the jury had been impressed by the proof made of it, to such an extent that they recommended Riel to the clemency of the court. That your petitioner has been informed in a credible manner that since the verdict was given, the insanity and mania of Riel have considerably increased, and that he is actually insane and uncontrollable. Your petitioner therefore humbly prays that Your Excellency be pleased to appoint a medical commission composed of specialists and alienists whose duty it will be to examine the said Louis Riel, actually detained at Regina, in the Mounted Police military camp, and to ascertain the state of mind and mental condition of the said Louis Riel, and to report to the authorities accordingly."

That was the petition of the counsel in this case. They did not say that the trial had been unfair, that the prisoner had not had all the delays necessary, that he had not brought his witnesses, and had not been condemned legally. No; the only thing they alleged was that he was insane. The Government, in considering this matter, could not go back to a period anterior to the verdict and the sentence of the court. If insanity existed previous to that, if it existed at the time Louis Riel came back to the country, at the request of some of the half-breeds; if it had existed whilst he was at the head of the half-breeds and the Indians and was fighting the Queen's troops in the North-West—if insanity had existed at these times, the jury before whom he was tried were bound to decide whether he was insane or not, whether he could know right from wrong or not; and if they thought not, they had but one duty to perform, namely, to declare he was not guilty of high treason, but was simply insane. They did not do that, and, therefore, so far as we were concerned as Ministers of the Crown, as men who had to decide and to examine the case, we had only to see whether, from that period down to the time the medical men were sent up, the man Riel was really insane, was an unaccountable being, was a man who did not distinguish right from wrong. We had had already before us a number of documents; we had seen them; hon. gentlemen had seen them all through the press, had seen them published and read everywhere. There was the letter of Louis Riel to his mother, there was the letter of Louis Riel to his sister, there was Louis Riel's last will and testament, there was Louis Riel's history of the half-breeds, and there were other documents of that kind. We knew how the prisoner was behaving in his cell, we knew how he was receiving visitors who were there either to comfort him or for pure curiosity, we knew how the prisoner had received the authorities when they announced to him the position of his trial and the position of the appeals; and then, nevertheless, on this petition and other petitions that had been sent to the Government, we thought it was a proper thing to send medical men to examine the prisoner, so that there might be no doubt in the minds of the Government and of the country about his sanity. Therefore we sent Dr. Lavell and Dr. Valade, and we called upon Dr. Jukes, the senior surgeon, the medical man who had attended on Riel all the time for five months he had been in gaol at Regina, to go and examine the prisoner and tell us whether they found him sane or insane. These medical men reported. The reports have been laid before the House; but, as they have not been read in full, I think it is only a proper thing that I should read them now for the benefit of hon. gentlemen, and in order that they may take their place where they should before the public. Dr. Jukes' report is dated Regina, 6th November, 1885. This is addressed to the Hon. Edgar Dewdney, Lieut. Governor of the North-West Territories. Dr. Jukes says:

"SIR,—In compliance with the request contained in the communication received by you from the Right. Hon. Sir John Macdonald, that I should report without delay upon the mental condition of the prisoner Louis Riel, now under my medical care, and how far I consider him accountable and responsible for his acts, I have the honor to report as follows:—Louis Riel has been under my special care, medically, as surgeon of this force, for upwards of five months, since his arrival here as prisoner. During that time I have visited him, with few exceptions, every day, have studied him closely, and conversed with him long and frequently. I have personally a strong aversion to punishment by death. I believe that, failing to establish his insanity, his death is near at hand; but, after careful and continuous examination of him, under varying circumstances, from day to day, I cannot escape the conviction, that except from purely religious questions, having relation to what may be called the Divine mysteries, he was, when first entrusted to my care and still continues to be, perfectly sane and accountable for his actions. Under these circumstances my duty, though a painful one, is clear, and my opinion, not hastily formed, equally so, namely, that Riel's peculiar views upon religious subjects, which so strongly impress the ignorant and unreflecting with an idea of his madness, cannot rightly be regarded as interfering with, or obscuring in the slightest degree, his clear perception of duty or as rendering his judgment less sound in the affairs of every-day life. I therefore record my opinion, that with the reservation above made, Riel is a sane, clear-headed and accountable being, and responsible for his actions before God and man.

"Senior Surgeon."

Then comes Dr. Valade's report, dated Regina, 8th November, 1885:

"SIR,—After having examined carefully Riel in private conversation with him, and by testimony of persons who took care of him, I have come to the conclusion that he suffers under a hallucination on political and religious subjects, but on other points I believe him to be quite sensible and able to distinguish right from wrong.

"F. X. VALADE, M.D."

Then follows Dr. Lavell's report, dated the 8th November:

"SIR,—I have the honor to report that, having given conscientious consideration to the case of Louis Riel, now confined here under sentence of death, and fully appreciating the trust committed to me and the consequences involved, I am of the opinion that the said Louis Riel, although holding and expressing foolish and peculiar views as to religion and general government, is an accountable being and capable of distinguishing right from wrong.

"I have, &c.,

"M. LAVELL, M.D."

Mr. Speaker, these reports were laid before the Privy Council; and, after weighing all the circumstances, looking into the case fully, considering our duty towards the prisoner, our duty towards society, our duty towards our Queen and country, we came to the conclusion, though reluctantly, though with great pain—because it is always a painful duty to allow a fellow creature to go to the scaffold,—to allow the law to take its course; but we could not close our eyes to the fact that our duty called upon us to allow the law to take its course. The result of this decision has been the agitation that followed in November and the following months, and we have been, for our action in this case, insulted and blackened as no men in the world have been. Our say has come. We are now to see whether our action is to be found wrong or whether it is to be found right. The reason why we allowed the law to take its course has been given already, but there is this to be added, that in this matter we had to deal with a case which affected a large portion of the country, which affected a wild portion of the country; and, if the same action had taken place, if the same crime had been committed in the other parts of the country, we would have acted as we did; and therefore we put to ourselves this question: Is it a reason, because this is in a wild part of the country, far from the strong arm of the law, that this prisoner should escape the punishment which is fixed by law? We thought not; we had to direct us in that fact—and there I know that some of my friends may not agree with me, but, if they allow me to continue my remarks, they will see the reason why I allude to it—we had this before us, we had the fact that Louis Riel had, 15 years before this, committed an act which was considered at the time one that should have been punished in the most severe way. The prisoner, Louis Riel, at that time was not condemned to a severe punishment; he was allowed to remain out of the country for five years, and he was not brought before a tribunal to be tried, and punished or absolved, for the death of Thomas Scott. I know I shall be told that at that time Louis Riel was at the head of a de facto Government, that it was the Government for the time being, and that, therefore, the Dominion Government had no right to put him to death for the execution of Scott. I leave that question for the hon. gentlemen to discuss; but if we are not to say a word about the death of Thomas Scott, and if we are met by the reasoning that Louis Riel had a right to put him to death, under circumstances no matter how cruel, then, I ask why should the established Government of this country, the Government that exists here by the Queen's will and by the Constitution of the country—why should we be called to account for having done—what? Not for having condemned Riel to death, but simply for having allowed the tribunals of this country to execute the law of this country. I do not know how hon. gentlemen can get out of this dilemma. Even though Riel may have been justified in putting Scott to death when he was at the head of that de facto Government, even with all the cruelty that attended the execution, even though he may have been justified in doing that, we cannot be condemned here for allowing the law to take its course in November last. We are the Government of the country; we had no revenge against this man; he had done us nothing personally; but he had attacked the authority of the Queen; he had revolutionised that country; he had called the half-breeds to his aid and had deceived them in a most shameful way, as the missionaries of that country have all testified; he had destroyed their faith; he had destroyed their religion to establish one of his own, and my friends from the Province of Quebec call that man a compatriot, a man of their race! No, Mr. Speaker; the sober, second thought of the people will not be so. They will say that whether that man had French blood in his veins, or whether he had English or Irish or Scotch blood, the Government had only to consider whether he was guilty or not. For my part, I am not only a representative of the French Canadians, in the Government, but I, along with my colleagues, am a representative of the whole people of Canada, of all origins; and, therefore, when a case of this kind comes before us, though it may be especially painful for me to see one suffer death who speaks my own language, and who also may have French blood in his veins, nevertheless, I have only one duty to perform, and that is to give even justice to all. Mr. Speaker, I might go further and continue to answer some other remarks made by the hon. gentleman, and other attacks against the Government made during the last four months; but I think that I have shown you and this House that the prisoner had a fair trial; I have shown that the courts of the country so declared; I have shown that the Privy Council in England had confirmed that decision; and I have shown that we, as a Government, have taken all the pains and trouble necessary to find out whether the Government of Canada could interfere and should interfere in this case. We found, to our regret, I must say—because it is always a regret for us to see one of our fellow creatures going to his last account—we found, to our great regret, that we could not interfere. We have been blamed for that, and the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) has thought proper, under the circumstances, to put in your hands a motion censuring the Government, declaring the regret of this House that the sentence of death against Louis Riel was carried into effect. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the large majority of this House will not agree with that motion. I hope this House will remember that we did only our duty in the matter, and, though we did it reluctantly, we did it. We do not deny that we did it; we say boldly that we did it; and in order that there may be no misunderstanding about this matter; in order that there may be no false issues or side issues about this motion, and that we may have a direct vote upon it, I move, seconded by Sir Adolphe Caron, the previous question.

Mr. AMYOT. I am sorry to be forced to undertake this important debate without having before me the necessary documents. When, on the 6th of November last, there was an immense agitation all over the Dominion, we heard many voices coming directly from the Ministry and saying: Wait till we meet in the House of Commons, with all the papers before you, and then you will pronounce upon the question; wait till then. But to-day do we know any more about the papers than we knew then? We had then seen in the newspapers a short account of the proceedings before the jury; we had seen some altercations between the prisoner and his lawyers; we had seen the names of a few jurors; but about the charge of the judge to the jury, which is a most important fact, about the petitions for and against commutation, about all the important documents which have been asked for by this House, about the telegrams, about the reports of the medical commission—we have nothing. In fact, Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago I asked one of the Ministers at least to tell us if the report of the medical commission was made by telegram or by letter. Why did I ask? Because I wanted to know when the Minister was informed. For we do not know it. The Ministers, however, say they do not remember; they cannot tell, although the life of a man is in question; they cannot remember whether they were informed by letter or telegram. They do not remember the dates; they do not know whether there was more than one letter or telegram; they do not know if letters or telegrams have been offered subsequently to them! We are to be kept perfectly in the dark, although this is a question involving the whole rebellion—a question affecting the life of a man and the life of an Administration; the country though wants the North-West to be properly administered, and justice to be properly administered, and desires its representatives to be in possession of all the papers on which the Government arrive at their opinion when they decide to hang a man. It is rather humiliating to find that the Government persistently refuse those papers. What is the reply offered? Why does the Government not put before the House and the country all the papers after so many months of promising? Why have they not even answered the question I put to them a moment ago? Perhaps it is like the medical commission. They prefer darkness; they desire that the papers may not be laid before the House—may not be known. It has been argued that all the Government had to do was to determine as to whether the verdict of the jury had to be carried out or not. I beg to differ from that opinion. When in the ordinary courts, based upon common law, a jury of twelve men under the direction of an ordinary judge of the land has rendered a decision, and when the judge has pronounced the death sentence, then the only question for the Executive is as to whether it will interfere or not, interfere to grant a pardon or commutation of sentence. But in the North-West such is not the case. It is provided under the laws applicable to the territory that, as there were so few people resident there, six jurors should be sufficient; and as there were few judges, one ordinary magistrate should be sufficient with the help of a justice of the peace. But the law provided that the whole of the record should be sent to the Administration, for the Administration to decide yes or no on the question as to whether the verdict should be carried out. So the Government had this obligation imposed on them, and they cannot deny that they were bound to go over the whole of the record, to consider the whole of the circumstances of the case, the whole of what occurred before arriving at a decision. They have not done that. They say that all they had to do was to decide either to interfere or not interfere. They shirked their responsibility. But the country—I do not care to what creed, or religion, or race, the people belong—will ask justice and fair play for every British subject of Her Majesty. It has been said that the trial was a fair one. I beg to deny that; and if we had here the papers of the trial we could prove that it was not a fair one, although the Government have been declaring through its officious press, which is disinterested according to some and not disinterested according to others, that the trial was a fair one, and that the costs of the defence were paid by the Administration. There must be an end made to that statement. I hold in my hand a document which, by the kind permission of the House, I will read. It is the answers given by one of the lawyers for the defence to questions put to him concerning the trial; and, if this be not looked upon as sufficient proof, I will take the testimony of a paper which is the organ of one of the Ministers of the Crown. The first question put to Mr. Lemieux, one of the generous lawyers for Riel, was this:

"Q. The ministers and their defenders make it appear that you are of opinion that Riel's was a fair trial. Will you kindly say if this is correct, and what we ought to think about it? A. I formally deny having said such a thing. The most correct answer to give is what is written on the subject by the reporter of Le Monde of Montreal, written from Regina itself, and published in the editions of August and September last."

It would be too long, perhaps, to read that paper.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

Mr. AMYOT. I speak of the statements made by the reporter of the paper itself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read, read.

Mr. AMYOT. I will read those statements after six o'clock, as I have not the papers now at hand.

"Q. When you asked for a delay, in order that the necessary witnesses might be forthcoming, was this delay granted you?"

The House will remember, we have been told constantly that all possible delay was given to Riel. I know the North-

Mr. AMYOT.

West a little—I happened to go there—and I know what delay there means:

"A. No; we asked for a month and obtained but ten days."

Can the Minister of Public Works deny that, if hon. members would look at the records, they will find that a motion was made by the lawyers for the defence for a month's delay. They were many hundred miles from the requisite witnesses; Riel was far from the place where the offence was committed, far from friends and family, and therefore Riel, or rather his lawyers—because Riel pretended all the time that he wanted no witnesses and denied his insanity—declared that they could not procure the witnesses and doctors and papers needed within ten days. They wanted thirty days, as the shortest possible time. No, said the Crown, we will give you ten days; and yet the Minister speaks of the fairness of the trial!

"Q. Were you able to have the witnesses whom you wished to be heard?"

"A. No; the Crown refused to furnish the necessary funds for bringing Doctor Howard, a specialist, who had attended Riel at the Longue Pointe Asylum; Major Mallette, who was acquainted with all the circumstances of Riel's confinement and madness at Washington."—

He had known Riel for a long time; he knew his character, and he knew what Riel would do or should do if he was still insane. They refused also the funds to bring Major Mallette. I hope that the Minister of Public Works will not use his great talents, great experience and great eloquence to throw discredit upon Major Mallette, as he seems determined to do now on his own Province. I hope at least those who have left the Province of Quebec will be respected by the hon. gentleman, and that his political needs will not force him to throw dirt on them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. AMYOT. Some hon. members may laugh, but the time will come when the applause will be on our side. When Major Mallette's good name is wanted to carry a political election he is thought much of and respected.

"Major Mallette, who was acquainted with all the circumstances of Riel's confinement and madness at Washington; the Rev. Monsignor La'iberte, his spiritual director during his confinement at Beauport; Dr. Grey, of Utica, United States, one of the greatest specialists of mental alienation in America, the same who had given his testimony in Guiteau's case; and the employees of the different Departments to show what were the causes of the insurrection; and for the production of a number of documents, such as requests and petitions of the half-breeds, letters from the Bishops and missionaries."

All those documents have been refused. Delay in order to get the witnesses needed has been refused; the money to procure their attendance has been refused. The Crown selected two witnesses from the list furnished by the lawyers for the defence, and they said; Those two we will have; one of whom was sick and perhaps the Crown hoped he would not go, and I do not know about the other going. But they excluded all the others; they gave no time to get them, and yet they come here to-day and say: We were right in hanging Riel, because we gave him a fair trial. I say, no, it is not correct; and you did not give him a fair trial, under the circumstances. There was this poor man, many hundreds of miles from his friends and his family, without money. He was not able to guide his defence, and you refused his lawyers the few hours or days which were absolutely necessary in order to procure witnesses and papers.

"Q. Had you all the documents you asked for?"

I suppose they had the documents there as we have the documents now.

"A. The documents containing the grievances of the half-breeds, which we had asked for, were refused us. They are mentioned in Riel's affidavit of 21st July published in the Blue Book.

"Q. Had you a competent translator of English into French? A. No; so much the contrary, that the court had to change translators three or four times; that the evidence given in French is mutilated, incorrectly reported, given in the lump, specially that of Dr. Roy and that of the Rev. Fathers Fourmond, André, and the others. Finally, no one would act as interpreter, and there being no interpreter the advocates began to translate, till, at length, the examination of a witness had to be suspended whilst another translator was being sent for, who, on his arrival, proved to be as incompetent as his predecessors."

This shows the great desire of the Government to give Riel a fair trial—their great desire that no reproach should fall upon them. They did not even take the trouble of procuring a competent translator. I suppose it would have cost too much; there would not have been left enough money in the public purse to pay for those sheets and papers containing the abbreviated and incomplete defence of the Government. When it was a question of spending hundreds or even thousands of dollars for the purpose of making their own actions appear favorable, they did not hesitate; but when it was a question of supplying translators, a question of life and death for the unfortunate man who was on his trial, something told the Ministers that it would cost too much, and they did not do it. It is my duty, a painful duty, as one of the representatives of the people, to protest against such conduct and to tell the Government that they did not give Riel, the madman, half of the justice and fairness in his trial to which he was entitled.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Mr. AMYOT. The next question that was put to one of the lawyers is this one:

"Q. Was this court conducted with decorum? A. With none at all. There was no room for it; we were one at top of another; the auditory applauded Astley's replies, and murmured audibly during Riel's discourse. There was no appearance of its being court at all, neither a picture of the Queen, nor the Royal Arms.

"Q. Were there any half-breeds or Catholics on the list of the jury given by the judge, and were they selected? A. There was one Irish Catholic whom the four Crown advocates challenged simultaneously and with such eagerness that one of us could not keep from saying: "No Irish need apply!" There was also a French Canadian named Limoges, who was present at the opening of the trial, but who had a fall from his horse and could not be present when the names of the jury were called over. The jury was entirely composed of English Protestants.

"That there may be no mistake about this list of jurymen, let it be well understood that there was no list, as is the case here. In an urn there were pieces of folded paper, each bearing a name. The judge took one out at hazard and the name inscribed was the one called.

"Q. Would it have been possible to have had French-speaking jurymen? A. Certainly, there were several French Canadians at Regina and many surrounding places; half-breeds also could have been had.

"Q. Does the Blue Book which has been published contain all the documents and important incidents of the trial? A. No. It does not contain the jury list, the motion for adjournment, Riel's interference in the conduct of the case, against the will of his advocates, our pleadings on the question of law right, and various incidents.

"Q. Is Jackson, Riel's secretary, a French Canadian (because that has been asserted)? A. No.

"Q. Was his trial carried on with the same rigor as Riel's? A. No; it lasted but a few minutes; it was a mere matter of form. It was the Crown that undertook to prove his being mad.

"Q. Were your expenses paid by the Government? A. No. The only Minister who rendered us any assistance was Sir Hector, and he only obtained for us, from the C. P. R. Company, free tickets for our first journey to Regina.

"Q. After the sentence had been confirmed in England, what steps did you take with the Government? A. What appears on the Blue Book. A petition, asking for a medical commission, was presented to the Executive, and no reply was given."

It seems pretty hard to get answers when the half-breeds are interested. Riel should at least have received through his attorneys the same delicacy that is generally shown for the greatest scoundrels.

"The Crown never informed us that Riel was to be executed. November 13th, 1885, the following telegram was addressed to the Hon. J. A. Chapleau, Secretary of State:

"The Government must now have arrived at some decision as to the fate of my client, Louis Riel. Have the kindness to inform me what this decision is, for in case of his being executed Monday, I would wish, as his advocate, to know about it at once, for most important reasons."

"No reply to this telegram ever reached me."

"Q. Why did you not summon Bishop Taché as a witness? A. Monseigneur Taché was begged of by us all conjointly to appear as witness to prove Riel's madness, but through the grave reasons explained at length in a letter replying to our request, we thought it right not to insist on his appearance."

Later on the real reason why Monseigneur Taché did not think it fit or opportune to appear will be told. I do not think we should tell those reasons now, because I am afraid of injuring the case of the half-breeds. Now, Sir, we do not contend that the trial was not a legal one, and there is no use in reciting here the decisions of the court at Winnipeg or of the Privy Council. We admit there has been a legal trial, but we say the trial has not been a fair one—has not been one in which, considering the peculiar circumstances in which the prisoner stood, he was treated fairly as he ought to have been treated. We say that the law provides that the Government shall look over the case, as a jury in the box, and shall then pronounce the verdict, and decide whether the execution shall take place or not. The question is now before this honorable House as upon an appeal, and we have to decide whether in the record of Riel's case there is enough to convict him, whether his madness is proved, and whether there was any provocation, which is not denied. But to come before this honorable House, when we are sitting as a court upon the case, and to say: You shall have such part of the record, but you shall not have the rest, and to move the previous question so as to prevent the production of all the circumstances of the case—that is not asking our fair and impartial decision and judgment on the case, but it is making an appeal to partisanship. It is saying to the members of this House: You belong to our party, you have supported us up to the present; now we will shut off the evidence, we will put aside all the material points of the case, we will give you what we think is not injurious to us, and you will vote as partisans. That is an insult to this House and to this country, and it is a declaration on behalf of the Ministry that they believe they have before them a House so corrupt and so subject to intimidation that by the mere spirit of partisanship they can control it. This is the position before the country; we have to judge the trial; we have to look over the evidence as every one of the Ministers had to look over it in their Council room; we have to look at what the witnesses said, and what the judge said when he charged the jury; we have to look at all the petitions for and against the execution, and upon that examination we have to decide. But all that is taken away, and only an appeal to party interest is made. I say it is not fair or loyal to the House, and it will not be satisfactory to the public. If we refer to 40 Victoria, chapter 7, we find that it provides:

"4. The procedure of trials under sub-sections 2 and 3 of this section shall be as far as possible similar to the procedure upon summary trials: but the Stipendiary Magistrate shall, upon every such trial, take, or cause to be taken, in writing, full notes of the evidence and other proceedings thereat."

Where are they? The court at Winnipeg had not them; it had not the charge of the judge; and yet it pronounced upon the sanity of the man, and to-night we have to pronounce upon the case, without the charge of the judge and without the other proceedings.

"And all persons tried under the said sub-sections shall be admitted, after the close of the case for the prosecution, to make full answer and defence by counsel learned in the law.

"5. When any person is convicted of a capital offence, and is sentenced to death, the stipendiary magistrate shall forward to the Minister of Justice full notes of the evidence with his report upon the case, and the execution shall be stayed until such report is received and the pleasure of the Governor thereon is communicated to the Lieutenant-Governor."

I make these quotations to show that the execution is not left by the Government to take its course, as in ordinary cases, but must be ordered by them; and to order the execution they must be fully satisfied that the prisoner found guilty deserves the utmost penalty of the law. So, they are responsible to us for the verdict they gave in this case, as we are to the country for the decision we shall give upon it. The hon. Minister of Public Works—who, I suppose, will not compliment me as he did the mover of the resolution—says that after so many years of service it is impossible to believe that they have betrayed their duty, and he complains of the word treachery. I can say that neither myself nor any of my friends in this honorable House have used that word. We complain of this: We say that after the examination of the record in Riel's case, the Ministry ordered the hanging, in spite of the record, in spite of the recommendation to mercy by the jury, in spite of the madness of Riel, which was admitted and proved, in spite of the petitions which they received; and we go further—we say that they did it after mature deliberation, in order to please a certain section of the country, not caring about offending the other. We are sorry to have to leave old friends, who generally led us in the past, but we must be guided by the facts as we find them. My learned friend from Montmagny (Mr. Landry), in support of his motion, brought up four points. I am happy to be able to join him in regard to those four points, and to say that in my opinion he is perfectly correct. He has discussed the question of Riel's madness from a legal point of view, and has quoted authorities and brought forward very satisfactory arguments on that point. I will try to establish from the record that Riel was insane; but before entering into that question I must say this: The hon. Minister of Public Works made allusion to the fact that two of the members of this House went to the North-West, and he says we were ready to kill Riel if we had met him. He seems to be possessed of the idea that on that account we have no possible right to discuss the verdict of the Ministry in Riel's case; but I think he is greatly mistaken. For my part, when I was called on as a soldier to lead the 9th Battalion to the North-West to help to suppress the insurrection, though exposed to shedding the blood of French half-breeds, I did not hesitate; I obeyed the voice of duty and honor which called on me. As a citizen of Canada and a soldier of Her Majesty, I gave my humble aid in the maintenance of the law and in the protection and safety of the citizens. During the whole time of my service I did my best, in conjunction with my trustworthy officers and men, to execute the few orders, sometimes very extraordinary ones, which I received, and, in the absence of such orders, to judge by myself what line of conduct to adopt. If that conduct has not been deemed worthy of official recognition, it has at least gained for us considerable complimentary notice from the public, not only in the various places in which we were scattered in the North-West, not only in the Province and city of Quebec, but also—and I am proud and happy to acknowledge it—in the great Province of Ontario, in the cities of Owen Sound and Toronto, where we were received like brothers, wherein we felt that we were all citizens of a large and intelligent country, forming one people under one flag, and capable of living amicably together, though of different races and creeds. Let the people of Ontario, who showed us so much sympathy during the whole of our passage through their Province, accept our most sincere thanks for their courtesy and brotherly behaviour. If ever their worthy battalions visit their sister Province of Quebec, I trust that the hearty reception that will be offered them will prove to them that we reciprocate fully their kindness and friendship, that between the two Provinces there exist ties of sincere friendship, that the fanaticism of a few sectarians is not able of breaking asunder. But when I was in the North-West as a soldier, had we met Riel and had we to fire on him, of course we would have done so. We went there as soldiers, and as such had to obey orders. What is there so extraordinary in that? It is true that, after having served in the North-West, I came to the conclusion that the hanging of Riel was illegal and most unjust and barbarous, and that since then the admiration of some of my friends on the other side has suddenly become changed, and I now meet with all sorts of accusations. It is true that one of the Ministers of the Crown thinks proper and fit to take up part of his most valuable time in seeking, from Quebec and Montreal, by means of spies, all sorts of information. It is true he is engaged in hunting up records and records, and amongst about a quarter of a million of dollars I have signed for in the North-West, is trying his best to find something against me. All that is true, and he is at liberty to do what he can. Let him try and form a court, with his dude officers, somewhere that will condemn me, if he wants to do so; but I warn him I know all about it, and will be able to defend myself before this honorable House. The fact of my being a soldier did not take away my quality of member of Parliament or of the most humble citizen, and when my military duties are over, as a citizen and a member, I have the right to judge the acts of the Administration, and will do so fearlessly, without being at all moved by all the low means to which the Ministry resort. As a soldier I was not afraid in the dark, we were not afraid when surrounded by the most dangerous Indians in the North-West, and as a political man I am not afraid of the men who take such means to try and dishonor one of the two battalions of French Canadians who served in the North-West. The whole time I was there, I never heard a word of blame uttered against me or my battalion, nor when I came back did I hear any blame. Now, however, hon. gentlemen resort to all sorts of means to destroy me, and they go so far even as to try and destroy the honor of the 9th Battalion—in order to prove that they were right in hanging Riel. I do not want to diverge from a question personal to myself or that of the honor of the 9th Battalion. I have put in the minutes of our proceedings a motion with reference to the latter, and I will do my best, so long as I will be at the head of that battalion, to protect its honor, dignity and usefulness. To-day, however, another duty devolves upon me, which, disagreeable though it be, I shall not flinch from performing, any more than I flinched from offering my life for my country's sake in the North-West. I have to judge to-day the acts of political friends and leaders for whom I have fought for many years; I feel all the gravity of the circumstances; I foresee the consequences that will follow; I foresee the bitterness of the attacks I will be subjected to; even more than that, the friendship I have felt for many years to my leader of the past makes my position a difficult one. But before what I consider a duty to the public, I cannot hesitate. The events of 1869-70 have been spoken of. I do not intend to bring back the question now under discussion to that first phase, which it underwent before this honorable House as far back as 1875, nor to the insurrection of 1869-70. An hon. Minister of the Crown has just thought fit to couple the hanging of Riel with the events of 1869-70 by calling Riel a backslider. He said: If you find—and that with a most eloquent movement, I thought,—if you find that Riel was right in killing Scott, are we not right in killing Riel? I felt rather humiliated when I saw a Member of the Government, headed by an old gentleman who for such a long time has led the country, comparing that Government to a man they refused to pardon after they had solemnly promised to pardon him. They compare themselves to Riel when he killed Scott; how can they now hold up their honor as Ministers of the Crown after that comparison? You remember, Sir, when the question of amnesty came up, the Grit party proposed a partial amnesty. They were not bound to propose it at all; they were not bound to grant an amnesty at all; there was no promise on their part binding them. But the other party had promised the amnesty. They had obtained the North-West through that promise; they had brought Monsigneur Taché from Rome, through that promise; and when they got possession of the country, they put aside their promise of amnesty. They were not brave enough to grant it. Why? For the same reason that they hanged Riel. The Grit party came into power, and proposed an amnesty. What then did they, who compared themselves to Riel the murderer do? They voted against the motion of amnesty, because they pretended that Riel was a murderer—and now they say: If Riel was right in killing Scott, we were right in killing Riel. Their record must be very bad, when they have to resort to such arguments and comparisons. Riel a backslider! That is not the proper name to give him. In 1869-70, we sent troops to the North-West, and we issued a proclamation, though we were not yet legal possessors of the territory. We were attacking that people without right, against the right of nations. It is true we had sent out surveyors, with instructions to survey the land of the half-breeds, the lands of that little people against which it will be soon demonstrated, there was a premeditated design of chasing them from this continent. It is true these land surveyors went there with military clothes in their trunks, and told the English half-breeds that very soon they would put on the uniform of soldiers and chase the French half-breeds out of the country. But that did not give us the right to attack them. If Riel with the half-breeds rebelled against those acts, they were right and we were wrong. As to the killing of Scott, that was one of those unfortunate incidents due probably to his madness. But there is one thing to be remembered: there has never been a trial of that case, there has never been a jury who declared Riel was guilty of that murder; and by the laws of this country, which must apply to half-breeds as well as to others, Riel must be presumed innocent until proved guilty. Those events of 1869-70 are now of the past. History cannot now judge them safely. How could I convince the hon. the Premier and some of his colleagues that their employees had committed blunders and had been guilty of illegal aggression against Manitoba by over-hasty and offensive proclamations; that their officers had threatened the half-breeds who were in peaceful possession of their homes; that the restoration of peace and order in that country was due to the exertions of that most distinguished prelate whom they afterwards treated as an unauthorised agent; that they sacrificed him and their formal promises of amnesty to party necessities; that they had not the courage even to join the Grit party in redeeming their promises; that they would not acknowledge the fact that to Riel was mainly due, as was admitted in the official proclamations of the Queen, the maintenance of the North-West under the British flag? But it would be useless for me to attempt any such task. When the present generation shall have passed away, with all its living interests and its present wants, history will judge righteously. To its future unbiassed judgment let us leave the verdict. But there is a point which it is important to settle before entering into the events that now occupy us. No witnesses were ever heard against Riel on the fact of the murder of Scott; no jury pronounced him guilty. As I said a moment ago, by the laws he is presumed to be innocent, because by the laws, which are the digest of the wisdom of many centuries through which they have been transmitted to us, and which are eminently conformable to Christian charity, he is to be presumed innocent until he is found guilty. And more than that, if the first promise of amnesty was anterior, and did not cover the shedding of blood in the North-West, at least the granting of the conditional amnesty did, and if Riel was guilty of crime, he has been punished, and it would be illegal, unjust and criminal to seek a second punishment for the same offence; it would be unworthy of the great people of Canada to punish twice for the same offence; not that I desire to excuse or palliate the killing of Scott any more than those of Goulet, Pariseau and Sutherland; nor do I intend discussing the rights of the people of Manitoba, when organised as a Government to protect themselves against the aggression of illegal forces, but simply to state that, as far as law and justice are concerned, we cannot call Riel an old offender; that subsequent to the rebellion he saved his country from being alienated from the British flag, and he underwent a punishment and received a partial amnesty or pardon for any possible offence committed in 1869-70. If I may be allowed here to quote a classical author on the point raised, I will quote Blackstone, vol. 4, p. 494. Speaking of the pardon, he says:

“To him (the King) therefore the people look up as the fountain of nothing but bounty and grace; and these repeated acts of goodness, coming immediately from his own hand, endear the Sovereign to his subjects, and contribute more than anything to root in their hearts that filial affection, and personal loyalty, which are the sure establishment of a Prince.”

Then, page 449:

“We may observe that a pardon by Act of Parliament is more beneficial than by the King's Charter.”

And lastly, page 500:

“The effect of such a pardon by the King, is to make the offender a new man; to acquit him of all corporal penalties, and forfeitures annexed to that offence for which he obtains his pardon.”

So was Riel a new man, in the eyes of the law, when this second insurrection came. It is most important that we, ourselves, should understand each other on that point. I have very often heard those words “an old offender.” Well, it has never been proved, first, by trial that he was an offender; it has been proved that he saved the North-West from being alienated from the Crown—that is admitted by the Lieut.-Governor of the North-West in public documents—and I do not see why we should go back and call him a second offender. I understand that, before that amnesty, the question was altogether different. Those who pretended, who had reason to believe that Riel was a murderer, I could understand that they should have done their best to catch him and to bring him to punishment; and I understand that, taking that point of view, taking that stand, the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) could, for the sake of bringing a man whom he thought to be a criminal to justice, offer a sum of money to arrest him. There were two parties in the Dominion; some contended that Riel acted in legitimate defence and that he was not a guilty party and could not be brought to conviction on that question, and, besides, that the amnesty provided covered the case, and those always sought the amnesty. There was another party who thought Riel was guilty, that the murder of Scott was an atrocious one, and that the flight of Riel was to be stopped in some way, and they offered a sum for his arrest. I understand that, but afterwards the partial amnesty was granted by the House of Commons, and to come after this partial amnesty, this exclusion from the country for five years, and say, about the second insurrection: We will punish you for the first offence, I say is cowardly, is an abuse of power, is unfair, and is not worthy of a country that respects itself. Well, this time I contend that we have to deal with an entirely new case. After a regular trial in this new case, Riel has been found guilty of high treason and he has suffered capital punishment for that offence. The question now before the country is: Have the Executive acted wisely, justly, in ordering the sentence of death passed upon Riel to be executed? In my humble opinion, such is now the question before this House. It is not a question of legality or technicality, it is a question of justice and of wisdom. It is not a question of creed or race, it is a question of the just application of the laws of this country. It has been contended by a press from which the Ministers derive much of the public support, that the acts of the Executive in deciding about the prerogative of pardon should not be discussed, that a blind acceptance of their views is forced by the constitution, that the criticising of their views or their motives would endanger the majesty of the law. I beg to protest most energetically against such a denial of the people's rights. The Executive is nothing but a committee of Parliament, and Parliament is responsible to the country. Any one of the acts of the Executive is amenable to examination, approval or disapproval by the country. That in a matter of capital punishment, the Minister of Justice may be presumed to act without fear or prejudice in such delicate matters as the taking away the life of a human being, I admit, but those who have interfered to ask for blood, can hardly blame an interference in favor of commutation, clearly recommended by the jury. Besides, Riel's case is an extraordinary one; it relates to matters of public interest, it directly concerns the Government of the country, the administration of public affairs, and all the circumstances that surround it make it imperative upon us to enquire into all its details and to ascertain if justice, fairness and humanity reigned, or if a man has not been sacrificed to partiality, prejudice and party interest; if a grave has not been intentionally dug between the faults of an Administration and the people. It is not only our right, it is our duty to enquire minutely into the details of the whole affair, and this without fear or prejudice, without reference to party ties, and without the threats of sectarians. I do not believe in peace and harmony that are based upon the renouncement of sacred rights; that which is founded upon injustice and cowardice, cannot long resist the storm of public and general reprobation and contempt. Let us enquire, first, what were the causes of that rebellion, and let us see if Riel was the author and cause of it. Riel was quietly and inoffensively occupied teaching in Montana when he was sent for—not by the clergy, as one of the Ministers of the Crown insinuated in one of the Quebec papers, which paper has suddenly changed its opinion of that Minister into great admiration. Riel was sent for, not by the clergy, but by his own fellow countrymen, assisted and encouraged by the whites of Prince Albert. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, if everybody has forgotten that; I have not. Let us see what was asserted here by the hon. Premier last Session. Here are his own words:

"Sir, an agitation arose, and the hon. gentleman has rung the changes on Riel being brought into that country. Who brought him into the country? Not the Indians; not the half-breeds. The half-breeds did not pay the money. The white speculators in Prince Albert gave their money to Gabriel Dumont, and gave it to Lepine, and gave it to others. They had all got their assignments from the half-breeds; they had all got in their pockets the script of the assignment, and they sent down to bring Riel in as an agent to be the means of attaining their unhallowed ends. It is to the white men, it is to the men of our own race and lineage, and not to the half-breeds, nor yet to the Indians that we are to attribute the war, the loss of life, the loss of money and the discredit this country would have suffered had it not been for the gallant conduct of our volunteers. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am able to prove that there has been a deep-laid conspiracy. I am able to establish that the cry of the half-breed grievances was merely a pretext. I am able to show that white man after white man has entered into it."

That, Mr. Speaker, is a statement by the leader of this House as to the cause of the rebellion. It does not explain why white men have not been hanged and why Riel has been. Had it not been for that delegation to him, Riel would still be exercising the modest life of teacher in the States, where he had been driven by the conditions imposed upon him by the terms of his pardon. He did not, then, of his own accord, meditate and prepare the rebellion. The terms of his answer to the delegation proved that beyond doubt. I am obliged, Mr. Speaker, to take them from the press, as we have not the advantage of seeing those documents officially. They should be here, officially certified, and forming part of the records of the country, but they are somewhere else, withdrawn from the discussion. All that we asked and that would have formed part of a legitimate defence, has been refused.

Mr. AMYOT.

But it does not amount to much, it is only the half-breeds that are in question! Why give up the papers, why give up documents that might destroy Ministers? To produce letters of priests and to try to bring against the clergy the charge that they incited the rebellion, well and good! But to furnish documents in favor of Riel, who was an old offender, oh, no! Well, here is Riel's answer:

"GENTLEMEN,—You have travelled more than 700 miles from the Saskatchewan country, across the international line to make me a visit. The communities in the midst of which you live have sent you as their delegates to ask my advice on various difficulties which have rendered the British North-West unhappy under the administration of the Ottawa Government. Moreover, you invite me to go and stay amongst you, your hope being that I, for one, could help to better in some respect your condition. Cordial and pressing is your invitation, you want me and my family to accompany you; I am at liberty to excuse myself and should say, no; yet you are waiting for me; so that I have only to get ready, and your letters of delegation assure me that a friendly welcome awaits me in the midst of those who sent you.

"Gents, your personal visit does me honor and causes me great pleasure; but on account of its representative character, your coming to me has the appearance of a remarkable circumstance, which I record as one of the gratifications of my life—an event which my family will remember, and I pray to God that my assistance will prove so successful to you as to render this event a blessing amongst the many blessings of this, my 40th year. To be frank is the shortest way. I doubt whether my advice given to you on this soil concerning affairs in Canadian territories, could cross the border and retain any influence. But here is another view of the matter: I am entitled, according to the 31st and 32nd clauses of the Manitoba treaty, to land, of which the Canadian Government have directly or indirectly deprived me, and my claim to which is valid notwithstanding the fact that I have become an American citizen. Considering, then, that my interests are identical with yours, I accept your very kind invitation, and will go and spend some months amongst you, in the hope that by petitioning the Government we will obtain the redress of our grievances.

"Manitoba has a population of which the native half-breed element constitutes a considerable portion, and if we include those white men who, though being connected by marriage, or in other ways, have a personal interest in their welfare, I believe that this element is a pretty strong one. I am just getting acquainted with them, and I am one of those who would like to unite and direct its vote for the furtherance of their best interests; moreover, I have made friends and acquaintances amongst whom I like to live. I will go with you, but I will come back in September.

"I have the honor to be, gentlemen delegates,

Your humble servant,

"LOUIS RIEL."

Mr. Speaker, did Riel come into the country with the intention of raising a rebellion? I will not take up too much of the time of this House in discussing that point, but I cannot refrain from quoting from some of the witnesses in the abbreviated record which we have. At page 11, Dr. John H. Willoughby was asked:

"What did Riel say? A. Well, he told me the time had come for the half-breeds to assert their rights."

And at page 12 he says:

"He said: I and my people have time and again petitioned the Government to redress our grievances, and he said the only answer we received each time has been an increase of police."

Then, on page 19, Thomas MacKay says:

"They wanted to redress their grievances in a constitutional way."

"Q. Did he have any conversation with you as to the object of the rebellion?—A. He said they wanted their rights."

"Q. What were you speaking about?—A. He was talking of trying to assist the people in their grievances—to have their grievances righted.

"Q. Speaking of getting up an agitation?—A. Yes; an agitation or a Bill of rights."

The witness Kerr, at page 68:

"Q. Were any speeches made at the table?—A. Yes; Riel proposed the health of our Sovereign, Queen Victoria

"Q. Riel did that?—A. Yes."

At page 76:

"Q. Give us the material part of it?—A. He spoke of having taken up arms; that he had done it in self-defence; and in talking about the Duck Lake fight he said he had gone there in person; that after Major Crozier had fired the first volley he replied, and he urged his men to fire, first in the name of God the Father, secondly in the name of God the Son, and thirdly in the name of God the Holy Ghost, and repeated his commands in that manner throughout the battle."

At page 82 :

"Q. He stated he wished the movement to be entirely a constitutional movement?—A. Purely a constitutional movement. He said if they could not get what they agitated for in five years, for to agitate for five years more, that constitutional agitation would get what they wanted."

At page 109, Father André ;

"Q. What were the claims of the half-breeds?—A. Since when : you must distinguish ?

"Q. From 1884 till the time of the rebellion? | A. Since the arrival of the prisoner in the country?

"Q. Yes?—A. It would be difficult to tell that ; they changed from time to time since the arrival of the prisoner.

"Q. Before his arrival?—A. They demanded patents for their land, demanded frontage on the river and the abolition of the taxes on wood, and the rights for those who did not have scrip in Manitoba.

"Q. In what way did the half-breeds put forth their rights before the arrival of the prisoner?—A. By public meetings at which I assisted to several times myself.

"Q. Did you take part yourself?—A. Yes, at all those meetings.

"Q. Were communications made with the Dominion Government, resolutions and petitions?—A. I remember three or four times that there was.

"Q. Did you get any answer to your communications?—A. I think we received an answer once ; perhaps we received an answer once.

"Q. Was the answer favorable?—A. No, it was an evasive answer, saying they would take the question into consideration.

"Q. That was the only answer to a number of communications?—A. Yes ; I know of another communication made by Mousigneur Grandin to the same effect.

"Q. Did he get a favourable response?—A. No ; I don't know of any.

"Q. Do you know if there was any answer sent to Charles Nolin, in regard to a petition sent to the Government?—A. It was in regard to those meetings, I was making reference ; I only know as to one answer.

Q. "Finally after these petitions and resolutions had been adopted at the public meetings and sent to the Government, was there a change in the state of things that existed then?—A. The silence of the Government produced great dissatisfaction in the minds of the people.

"Q. To-day are the people in a better position than they were before in regard to the rights they claim?—A. They have not yet received the patents for their lands on the South Saskatchewan.

"Mr. Osler. I must object to this class of questions being introduced."

We are now discussing what took place during the trial. We find that when the lawyers for the defence endeavored to bring in the causes of the insurrection one of the advocates for the Crown rose and said : "I must object to this class of questions being introduced." "My learned friends have opened a case of treason justified only by the insanity of the prisoner, etc." And the discussion going on the Justice said : "It would be trying the Government!" I now quote from page 145. The witness is Pitblado :

"Q. Did he give you his plans, his schemes, what he hoped to get by the rebellion.—A. Yes, his general scheme was this : He hoped to induce the Government to make a treaty with him or with the half-breeds of the North-West, similar to the treaty they had made with the half-breeds in Manitoba. That was what he stated to be his chief object."

We see by these quotations that up to the time the first shot was fired, Riel's agitation was a constitutional agitation. This is proved even by witnesses for the Crown—that up to that time nothing was done by Riel except in a constitutional manner, that he thought the half-breeds had much ground for complaint against the Government, and he wanted in a constitutional way to obtain their redress. In August following the arrival of Riel in the country there was a great meeting held at Rivière du Loup in honor of the Premier. I was not present and was not invited, but generally the Conservative members were invited. The press told us what was said by the Minister of Militia in the presence of his chief and of the Conservative members. Here are his words, and they prove that Riel's intention in coming into the country was not to bring insurrection, but was to agitate constitutionally. I quote the words of the Minister of Militia :

"The presence of Riel in the North-West does not make us uneasy. On the contrary, it favors our views. The half-breed chief is endeavoring to conciliate the interests of the population with those of the Crown. He deserves gratitude rather than blame."

That is what the hon. gentleman stated. Those were his ideas at that time, and though he was in possession of a letter which I shall quote as to the probable insurrection or agitation, and was in possession of many letters, petitions and documents from the North-West, yet the matter did not give him the least anxiety ; indeed he thought that Riel was doing their business and promoting the interests of the country. Let me now consider the reason which induced the whites and half-breeds to send for Riel. I have quoted the words used by the Premier last year. Let it be remembered that none of the guilty whites have been prosecuted. I understand well that last year when it was said—the papers asked for not being then nor now produced, and which we have not now—that the rebellion was due to bad administration, it was necessary for the Ministers to deny the alleged bad administration, and they wanted to find some excuse for or explanation of the insurrection. They turned towards the whites of Prince Albert, and without there being anyone here to defend them, the Government accused those whites of being the authors of the rebellion. It was their plain duty, after making that assertion and affirming that the whites of Prince Albert were the guilty parties, to have taken action and prosecuted them as being guilty of high treason, too. I say now that by not prosecuting the whites of Prince Albert the Ministers have admitted that they have grossly insulted and maligned them ; and the proofs of this we easily obtained now that communication with the North-West is more easy. Abundant proofs have been received that the insurrection was due less to the whites of Prince Albert than to the bad administration of the affairs of the North-West, to the most unfair and unjust treatment by the Government of the half-breeds and their preconcerted plans of driving away the half-breeds from the North-West and giving their lands to strangers. The half-breeds had grievances. I am sure that other speakers will take charge of that part of the case and enumerate the divers grounds of accusation against the Government on that point. I believe, Sir, from what I know and have read, that the half-breeds were honestly seeking for a redress of their grievances, and that they had grievances has been repeatedly admitted by the Ministerial organs. The list of their grievances is very long. We find some of them in the Mail, some in the Globe. I hold here in my hand a book, in which about one-fourth part of their grievances are enumerated, and these number seventy-six ; but I will leave that part of the question to some speakers who are more experienced than myself. The point I wish to make is that the half-breeds had grievances and that they were entitled to seek redress for them. I want to establish that the Government knew it ; that they were cognizant of the fact that public employees in the North-West were treating the half-breeds harshly as if Sir Garnet Wolseley had been right when he said that they were cowards ; that the Government knew that a rising of the half-breeds would bring about a similar rising of the Indians, with all the atrocities accompanying an Indian war, and that their negligence in taking preventive measures was thoroughly inexcusable, and amounted to criminal neglect in the administration of public affairs. A great point is made of the assertion that Riel tried to incite the Indians to a general insurrection. I do not think the record proved that any of his stupid writings on that point ever reached Poundmaker or any of the other Indians. Riel himself was one of the half-breeds ; he was only a poor fool and a madman, but the Ministers here are sane men, experienced men, men of talent, and was it not their duty to foresee that the insurrection in the North-West would bring about an insurrection of the Indians with all the atrocities of Indian war, when they neglected the case of the half-breeds, when they provoked the half-breeds into a rising ; and for that reason I say they are the first parties responsible for the blood of all the priests and other white people murdered by the Indians in the North-West. There is no way of escape from that conclusion. The civilised and the ruling part of the country is here ; the Government is the ruling part of the country; they knew that there were half-breeds and Indians there; they knew what was going on; they knew all about these depredations, these speculations in the lands of the half-breeds, the orders that were given; they knew that these half-breeds were being deprived of their lands, and that these lands were surveyed otherwise than they had taken them, and the fact that having this knowledge they neglected these matters makes them the first parties responsible to the country for all the atrocities of Indian war, and not a poor fool and madman like Riel. That is the way I think history will judge their conduct. It is all very well to come and say that the Grits have done the same. It is not proved that the Grits have done the same, and besides, that is not the question. Let us leave alone the past issues. When the country put these gentlemen in power it was in effect equivalent to saying that the people were not pleased with the Administration which then expired, and in taking power the new Administration undertook to do better. To-day having done worse, they say, oh, well, the others were not good. I say that is no excuse. For seven long years they have been letting the poor half-breeds suffer, they have been depriving them of their property and interfering with the peace of that country, they have been doing injustice to the half-breeds, and to-day they are amenable and responsible to the country for their conduct. For that conduct they cannot escape by saying, our adversaries have done the same as we have. They will not, as we say in French, "catch the fly in that way." That the Government knew of those claims, that it slept and snored over them, appears by letters received by them. I suppose that this snoring will be understood, and I hope those who have told the country at large that that snoring was so long and deep, will stand by their sayings of the past; that they will come with us, will come to the help of the minority with every right-thinking man of the country. I will quote a letter sent to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works on June 4th, 1884. It was, therefore, received early enough to enable any Administration anxious to do justice and to bring about peace in that country, to foresee and prevent the danger, expense and sacrifice of life which are necessarily attendant on war. That letter was sent by an eminent prelate, Mgr. Grandin, whose whole life has been devoted to works of charity and promoting Christian civilisation amongst the Indian tribes, as well as to the happiness of the whites living in the wide prairie. How it failed to move the heart of the Ministers, I cannot conceive; unless it was a fixed policy on their part to let the wrong continue; to allow the complaints and bad feelings to accumulate; to expose the country to a costly war; to imperil the interest of emigration; to diminish the value of the lands; to delay the settlement of the West; to endanger even the progress of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to finally grant, under cover of redress to strangers, the lands belonging to the half-breeds. I translate the letter in toto, trusting that this honorable House will, considering the importance of it, forgive me the time I take:

June 13th, 1884.

"The Honorable, Sir Hector Langevin, Minister of Public Works,

"Sir,—I take the liberty of addressing to your Honor the accompanying letter to the Hon. Premier containing the cause of complaint communicated to me by the half-breeds of the district of Lorne on the occasion of my journey to Prince Albert. I cannot express to you the pain I felt on learning that they had sent a message to Louis Riel, and that they had given so unbecoming a reception to the Hon. Governor of the North-West. On seeing their state of excitement and discontent, amounting almost to revolt, I perceived them to be under some baneful hostile influence. I was even convinced of this by communications made to me by certain most respectable persons of Prince Albert. I blamed them soundly, and from some of the principal leaders I obtained a sort of act of contrition for what they had done. They then detailed their sources of discontent and grievances to me. Whilst not approving some, I must acknowledge that there are many with which I heartily sympathise. I deeply deplore the scornful way in which the Government has a fashion of treating the native half-breeds. The gentlemen of the Government cannot be ignorant of the fact that the half-breeds, as well as the Indians, have their national pride; they like to meet with attention, and are greatly irritated by the contempt with which they, rightly or wrongly, believe themselves to be treated. Once irritated and driven to extremity, neither priest or bishop can easily make them listen to reason, and they may run into great extremes. I therefore earnestly beg of you to use all your influence, that whatever is just and right in their demands may be accorded to them.

Mr. AMYOT.

"Before going on board the steamboat I would have liked to have learned the result of Father Lacombe's visit to Ottawa. I hope the promises made to me a year ago have been at length fulfilled. I cannot forget your good offices and good will in my behalf."

In dealing with a Government, and especially a Government of the kind indicated by the acts of the Minister of Militia, we have to be polite, we have to pay compliments, we have to be submissive, and we have to be careful what we say. So the honored Bishop says he does not forget their good offices and the promises they made a year ago. Then, Monseigneur Grandin writes to Sir John A. Macdonald as follows:—

"To Sir J. MACDONALD,
On board of the steamboat for Cumberland and

"PRINCE ALBERT, June 13th, 1884.

"Sir,—Your Honor must have heard of the discontent felt by the half-breeds of the district of Lorne, of the message sent by them to M. L. Riel, and of the inhospitable reception made by them to Honorable E. Dewdney, Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West. I arrived in the district after all these events had taken place, and could not help regretting them.

"I have seen the principal half-breeds of the place, those who may be called the leaders, and I have become quite convinced of their state of discontent with everything. They are altogether embittered, and this may lead them to any extremities. I was deeply grieved to find that it is not they who are the guiltiest. They are excited and urged on, not only by the English half-breeds, but also by residents of Prince Albert—people of consideration, it is said—who are opposed to the Government and who doubtless hope to profit by the regrettable steps taken by the poor half-breeds. They must have been much worked upon for them to have acted thus, unknown to their priests, who have been represented to them as sold to the Canadian Government. Surely it would be easy for your Government to bring to naught this species of revolt, which may, however, have certain painful results, for the half-breeds can do what they like with the Indians. These things are already to be regretted, and should the consequence of them be but one gun fired at the humblest of Her Majesty's subjects, you can but acknowledge that even that would be too much.

"I blame the half-breeds and have not spared them reproaches, but I must be allowed respectfully to inform your Honor that the Canadian Government is not blameless either, and had I the same influence over its members as I have over the half-breeds, I would tell them so perhaps more respectfully, but certainly as frankly. How many petitions and complaints have not these half-breeds addressed to the Government without having been even vouchsafed a reply. How many times, both by word and writing have I myself addressed your Honor, without obtaining anything but kind words in reply. I beseech you not to take amiss what I am so frankly saying. I have only the good of the country and of our citizens in view. From their dictation I have written down the grievances of the malcontents and the steps they have taken. I enclose them to you. I entreat your Honor not to remain indifferent, and to take such action as will prevent the evil from becoming aggravated.

"I remain, very respectfully, &c., &c."

These are the reasons given me by Messrs. Charles Nolin and Maxime Lépine, as to the causes of the excitement and discontent of nearly all the half-breeds:

"1. We consider the transactions of the Hudson Bay Company with the Government as unjust, and we protest with our whole souls against the immense reserve of lands granted to that Company.

"2. In the second place, we protest against the manner in which the Government took possession of the North-West, without its inhabitants being informed or consulted."

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, if there had been there some personal friends of some of the Ministers, if there had been there a population for whom they would have had some respect, they would have taken the trouble to have sent at least one delegate to tell them: Gentlemen, you are going to have a change of Government; you are going to be hereafter under the control of the Dominion Government, and not under the control of the Hudson Bay Company. But they did not take that trouble. We are too great, I suppose, in this country to show anything like politeness and justice towards half-breeds.

"3. We protest against the manner in which the Council of the North-West was constituted, especially at the beginning; all its members being strangers to the country, with the sole exception of one who would have been put aside if they could have done so.

"4. We protest against the tax on wood, and this without our rights being recognised. A treaty was made with the Indians, but we were less considered than they.

"5. We complain that no employment or office of trust is confided to any one of our nation. There is none, not even that of first instructor, which the half-breeds, generally speaking, could fill better than any foreigner, since they know the Indians and speak their language; yet they are kept away from them."

Common sense tells us that those half-breeds should have been employed to instruct the Indians and to act as their guardians. Is there any good reason why none of them were selected for such offices? We have been living in prosperity for 20 years, but if we have been treating the half-breeds harshly and unjustly our prosperity is very little to boast of.

"6. We claim the same advantages as have been granted to our fellow-countrymen of Manitoba, we consider we have the better right to this, since the North-West Territory is of greater extent and fertility.

"7. We protest with all our strength against the Government's obstinate refusal to do justice to our demands; all our petitions are looked on as if they had never been sent."

Could anything be more shocking than for a poor little people like the half-breeds to be met with the constant refusal of the Government to answer their letters? Here we feel strong with the influence the people give us, though we feel in our hearts the injustice the Government are showing us in refusing us the papers to which we are entitled. But these poor fellows who have no one to protect them, write to the Government and are refused an answer. They are spoiled of their lands and their timber, and when they send their priests, their bishops and their delegations to the Government to protest, they receive no answer; the Government in its dignity remains silent. Is there not enough in that circumstance to account for the insurrection? If a Government of a civilised country has a right to do that, we are not better than if we lived in Russia.

"8. We do not desire that L. Riel should come among us as a rebel or to lead a rebellion, but we wish to have him at our head, looking on him as one capable of rendering valuable services to his country and his fellow-countrymen, and for this reason we would like to see him with some office in the Government, either as a member of the North-West Council, or as a member of the Senate.

"There followed an article from the more moderate party, but it has gone astray, and I cannot, therefore, give it here. I myself add to this list of demands. Evidently among all these complaints and protestations, several are exaggerated and unreasonable, but it cannot be denied those of the moderate party, more particularly, i. e., Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7 and 9 are anything but just and reasonable. As for the others, they are, at any rate, a powerful weapon in the hands of an opponent to the Government to excite the half-breeds and lead them on to foolish acts."

But this was not an isolated warning, though of itself it should have been sufficient to awake the soundest sleeper. I might quote similar advices given in 1878 by Col. Dennis; in 1879 by Archbishop Taché and Bishop McLean; in 1880 by Col. Richardson; in 1881 by Col. Richardson; and in every year since 1878 by Mr. Lawrence Clarke, Father André, Father Leduc, Mr. McDonald, Mr. Maloney, Le Manitoba, the Saskatchewan Herald, the International Emerald, Major Crozier, the Winnipeg Sun, and many other newspapers, besides the many petitions numerously signed and various delegations sent here. But all was useless, and the insurrection came. How it was led by Riel, again become insane, I shall explain in a moment. The half-breeds organised a provisional Government. In that I see the intention of a rebellion. It is a question to know if it was justifiable or not. Some have quoted authorities, as St. Thomas d'Aquin, in favor of the half-breeds. I do not intend nor do I want to go into the merits of that part of the case now, to say whether the rebellion was justifiable or not. There are occasions in which an insurrection or rebellion are justifiable. Whether this one was justifiable or not I do not want to discuss at present. The beginning of an insurrection having been provoked by the negligence of the Government and the injustice of its employees, what was the duty of the authority? I affirm that its duty was to take all possible means to satisfy the half-breeds, to avoid the shedding of blood, to heal the wound, to prevent and avoid having it to cure. Instead of that, what has been done? We are told by the Mail, which has challenged me to discuss that fact before this honorable House, that:

"Riel grossly deceived the Metis in concealing from them the fact, known to him on 8th February, nearly seven weeks before the collision with the police at Duck Lake, that a commission to enquire into their grievances had been appointed."

The facts are not correctly given by the Mail on that point. If we take Sessional Paper 116 of last year we find that, on the 26th January, an Order in Council was passed stating:

"The undersigned submits that in his opinion it is desirable, with a view of settling equitably the claims of the half-breeds of Manitoba and the North-West Territories who would have been entitled to land had they resided in Manitoba at the time of the transfer, and filed their claims in due course under the Manitoba Act, and also of those who, though residing in Manitoba and equitably entitled to participate in the grant did not do so, to ascertain the number of half-breeds, and he recommends that he be authorised to obtain an enumeration of them, and to employ three persons to make such enumerations."

Was this Order in Council conceived for the settlement of the half-breed claims? Was it conceived for the redress of their grievances? No; it was to make a census to prepare a settlement. Well, for over five years the half-breeds had been receiving such promises and had been favored with such dilatory means of settlement, and that Riel did not feel justified in allowing himself to be deceived this time, I can very easily understand. It was not an Order in Council to settle their claims, it was an Order in Council to appoint a commission to make a census. What time it would have taken to prepare a census, we do not know. It would have taken months, perhaps years, and the settlement of the claims could not have advanced one step more. Besides, where was the necessity for making a census of the North-West, for the settlement of those claims? Did not the Government know exactly where those half-breeds were? The North-West is not a region in the clouds. These half-breeds had houses and churches, and it would have been very easy to enquire from house to house what their claims were. In a week or two the commissioners could have gone through the whole district, sent in their report, and a settlement could have been made shortly after. What was the use of spending thousands of dollars in getting a census of the whole North-West, when all that was wanted was a settlement of claims in a certain district? The Government should have some respect for the common sense of the people at large. I am sure that on this point the country will see that the Government was wrong and Riel was right. Having waited for months and years for an answer to their applications, the half-breeds were told that bayonets were coming for them. They thought, from what Sir Garnet had said, that they were to be looked upon as outlaws and cowards, and they met the police. I do not want to justify their course, but if they had been met by somebody who understood them and had a particle of sympathy for their sufferings, am I not right in presuming that there would have been no bloodshed and that satisfactory arrangements would have been come to? The Crown did not think fit to ask Major Crozier, when examined as a witness, who fired the first shot at Duck Lake? He was only asked if his force had been fired at? Strange to say, neither did the defence put the question to him as to who fired the first. But it results from the whole enquiry that our forces fired first, without the reading of the Riot Act, thereby accepting the adverse troops as a regular fighting army. The result was a defeat for our police, and an opportunity to the half-breeds of showing their humanity in inviting Major Crozier to come and bury his dead. I do not now want to blame or criticise the conduct of Major Crozier, but I state that if the Government had done something towards satisfying the half-breeds, if they had appointed some friends of the half-breeds, if they had behaved justly towards them, rebellion and its horrors and expenses would have been avoided. The very moment that the first shot had been fired by Crozier, and that blood had been spilt, the harm was done. The danger became immense. The Canadian Pacific Railway not being completed, the North-West was isolated, and we were exposed to a general Indian rising in the North-West, a rising which has been stopped and prevented by the exertions of the clergy more than by the fear of the army. Troops had to be sent to relieve the North West, the time has not come yet to speak of their glorious journey through ice, snow, and water, and across mountains, with bacon and beans as food, with all the discomfort and suffering inherent to a long journey through a savage country at the worst season of the year; nor is it time to discuss the merits of the divers battalions, nor to whom is due the honor of the victory of Batoche. Sufficient to say that Batoche was taken after a few days' fighting by our army against a few half-breeds in their rifle pits; and that Riel, after having escaped, surrendered to the General on the faith of a letter saying that if he, Riel, surrendered himself, he would be protected "till his case was decided by the Canadian Government." Has the case been decided by the Canadian Government? Not yet. Is the promise redeemed? It has been if we consider that Magistrate Richardson was an officer of the Government; but such construction cannot fairly be put upon the meaning of the letter. The case has been decided by a court, and not by the Government. The Ministers have confirmed a decision, but have not decided themselves. At least such is the construction to be put on the speech delivered to-night by the hon. the Minister of Public Works. This is an important feature of the case in the eyes of many. The General talked pretty freely with Riel: a man who was going to be hanged! Then Riel was sent to goal. Irons and chains became the first fruits of the promised protection. A jury of six was empanelled, from whom a Catholic juror was excluded. We do not find that fact in the printed record, but I think the proof found in the organs of the Minister of Public Works is sufficient. The composition of the tribunal, the place of the trial, the number of jurors, are all of an exceptional nature which is far from giving complete satisfaction to the public who only look for British fair play and justice. But I take the law as it stands, and, for the sake of discussion, I take it for granted that the trial has been legal. We cannot say, though, that it was fair, or possessing the conditions it should have possessed. Riel was found guilty with a recommendation to the mercy of the Crown. What was the charge of the court? We do not know. We are also ignorant of the reasons of that recommendation to mercy. Appeals went on, two respites were granted. The courts pronounced against Riel, specially on the question of jurisdiction. But, after all that, a third respite was given without being asked for. A great banquet was given at Winnipeg on the day first fixed for the hanging; great rejoicings took place when the hon. the Minister of Militia announced that he had no sympathy for the traitors. His words, if they were correctly reported were: "I hate the traitors," and the "traitors" were the half-breeds, and he was a member of that Government which surely hated the half-breeds, because they had proved it long enough; and he announced that justice would be done, and the applause lasted for over five minutes. Oh, it was a grand sight; it was a great moment; when, after having sent his troops up there, and exhausted, annihilated nearly, that little people, a man covered with honors and medals by Her Majesty, with the same blood in his veins as the half-breeds, should go there and rejoice at the hanging, and, with a glass of champagne in his hand, should say: "I hate the rebels," and then the sectarians around him raised big hurrahs. That is the way to bring harmony and peace into this Confederation. I heard the Premier on the first day of this Session accusing the hon. the leader of the Opposition of destroying the harmony of the Confederation; but, when we push the hatred of rebels so far as to drink to the health of these poor fellows who were to be hanged and who were then in gaol, insulting their mothers and their wives and their children and the pains of their hearts, and when we see that this Minister has the same blood, and that he knows that the applause that he will receive is given to him because those who are to suffer are of his race, and because he is the instrument of the humiliation of his own race, he may boast of it if he likes, but the people of the country at large, of any creed or nationality, have not taken that view. Remarks have been passed by people of all nationalities and of all creeds deploring the fact that human vanity and blindness should go so far as to lead a man to deny his own blood, and to court insult to his own blood because it is his own blood. He knew that the result would be that. We do not know what he wrote or what he telegraphed from up there. There is something at the bottom of all this which is wrong, which the Government do not dare to bring before the country, but enough is seen to show by what spirit they were acting and by what motives they were moved. When the hon. gentleman was made a great baronet or something like that, he may have received piles of telegrams and congratulations on his appointment, but let him find some congratulations since he was drinking to the health of the poor man who was going to be hanged, and chose for the theatre of his eloquence on that subject the very place where he was sure to meet the mortal enemies of that man who was going to be hanged. It must have been so agreeable to him to see his fellow-countrymen snubbed for the sake of Orangeism; and he has since confessed that he then knew that Riel was to be hanged, that his case had been decided before he left Ottawa. He procured even a certificate to that effect from his chief, evidently wanting the insult to us to be complete, and desiring not to have a leg left to stand upon. Finally Riel was hanged, and an immense agitation followed, and it has not yet subsided. Why? Sir, I contend that the agitation is entirely due to the Ministers themselves, and that in hanging Riel they have hanged deliberately a madman, in spite of the recommendation to mercy and after cruel delays, and that they have done so because some Orangemen made it a condition of their political support—the said Orangemen being moved by their hatred to Riel's race and creed. Such is the true position. We never said—or we would be as mad as Riel—that Riel should not have been hanged because he was a Frenchman. No; we never talked such nonsense. But we complained of his having been hanged because he was a Frenchman, and in spite of his madness, of the respites, of recommendation to mercy, of the fact that the Government had been the direct and immediate cause of the rebellion. The Government have but themselves to blame for the intense agitation that took place in many parts of the Dominion. It is proper that my hon. colleagues, who do not read or understand French, be informed of what took place in our Province, and how the question presented itself there. The discussion in the press made it known that the half-breeds had numerous complaints, and a natural sympathy for them was felt. Then, as his madness became more and more conclusive, one of the Ministers promised that a medical commission would be appointed. Every day some of the organs of the Ministry published violent articles in favor of pardon. The Liberal and Conservative press joined in their efforts to save Riel's life. Public opinion was soon formed and grew very excited. Public meetings took place, petitions were signed, and a universal voice was raised in favor of pardon. I will quote from the organ which is looked upon as the direct mouthpiece of the Minister of Public Works. Doubtless the responsibility of the Government will be denied; but I speak of the opinion of the public; since the same paper has returned to its blind allegiance. I will quote from that paper, as it is important in the grave crisis through which we are passing that the country should know exactly what we are doing and why we do it. It is a known fact that this paper I speak of cannot live by its own revenues, and that it lives from the revenues which come from parties not far from this room. It is that very paper which is the cause of any difficulty there may have been at Ottawa between the Orangemen and the Catholics. If there have been petitions in favor of mercy, if there has been agitation in the Province of Quebec, it is due to that paper. When these petitions came in, then the Orangemen presented their petition, and there was a fight between the Orangemen and the Catholics before the Ministers, and if the Catholics were snubbed it was due to the organs of the Ministers, and I will prove it. If to-day you see many of the Quebec members breaking party ties, and if there is a national movement among French Canadians, it is due to that press again. And how can the Ministers dare, after that, say to us: You are wrong—in the face of the indignation which they have aroused? But, Sir, are we obliged to change like weathercocks whenever they wish? When we form an opinion are we not, as men, to stand by it, or are we to deceive our people, are we to lose their confidence by saying one thing to-day and the opposite to-morrow? Are we going to be as low and as cowardly as the ministerial press, which says one day a thing is white, and the next day say it is black? No, Sir; there is a certain sentiment of dignity, I hope, in those who have supported the Ministry so long. I will quote from Le Monde. I am sorry I shall have to translate it into English, but I had not time to prepare a translation beforehand. On the 3rd of August, 1885, this paper said:

"As the jury has recommended Riel to the clemency of the court, it is the desire of everyone that he should not be hanged. There is only one cry of protestation against the magistrate who, against all rules and even all decency, has taken upon himself, to announce in the name of the Government, that there would be no respite nor clemency."

On the 25th of August:

"English and French, Catholics and Protestants, are all agreed. It is a question of justice and humanity; this is the real ground upon which the question should be put. The declarations which the Hon. Sir Hector Langevin has just made concerning the Riel affair, authorise us to believe that the Government has already taken into consideration this question and that it has come to the conclusion to appoint a commission with the object of ascertaining the mental condition of Riel. There is no question now about discussing the remote or immediate causes of the late rebellion, nor the share of the responsibility of whites, half-breeds or Indians. There is a time for that. Our representatives will have ample time from now to next Session to study that question thoroughly and to put themselves in a position to judge correctly and throw the responsibility on the proper shoulders. The duty of the moment is more pressing. The question is to find out if the accused, if a man already condemned to death, is mad or not, or is responsible or not for the crime of which he has been found guilty. Our duty is to obtain that proof as soon as possible. We ask it in the name of society, in the name of humanity, in the name of justice. Let us put aside the passion of politics, always interested; let the jealousy of party spirit stand aside. Political parties are too narrow-minded and too tyrannical to be trusted with the honor and life of a citizen. We hope that the Government will appoint without delay a medical commission, and that it will be composed of expert doctors, of a reputation for science and skill, which will inspire confidence in the public."

On the 10th September:

"However, the Government will yield to the desire of the Province of Quebec in granting the nomination of a medical commission, which will enquire into the mental condition of the prisoner. The decision of that commission will be worth more than the judgment of the tribunal at Regina. The sentence of death will not be executed. The Government will grant a respite which will allow an appeal to the Privy Council."

I will quote from an article of the 27th of October, and the articles will grow stronger and stronger as I proceed:

"But happily all is not done. The Liberals have not succeeded in destroying irrevocably the cause of the prisoner of Regina."

"We began by saying that the work of the committee of David Phaneuf is over, but our own work continues. Those who calumniated us and insulted us for months back, will, we hope, have the good sense now to keep quiet. They may not do it, but if they do not, we will go on with our work, we will do our duty, and the people will know before long on which side are the real friends of Riel. At this late hour we still ask what we asked in the beginning, a commission of alienist doctors who shall pronounce upon the mental state of Riel. This commission, we believe, will be granted, and if this decision confirms our expectations and our hopes, Riel will not be hanged. We do not hang madmen on the free soil of Canada."

On the 24th October:

"The opinion given by the Monde, day before yesterday, concerning the good dispositions of the Ministers towards Riel, is based on the fact that the Government has always been determined to give full and entire justice to the accused."

"The Crown has furnished the greater part of the costs of the defence and has done its best to facilitate the different appeals made in the interest of Riel. So far as our opinion of the nomination of the medical commission of enquiry into the state of the prisoner is concerned, it has for its basis, the innumerable petitions asking for a commission, which petitions were addressed to the Governor General in Council since July last. Long ago the papers of Quebec and Montreal have published the names of doctors who should compose that commission."

Le Monde of 13th November said:

"We have received the following despatch from Ottawa: 'Ottawa, 13. The execution takes place on the 16th. We venture to affirm that the sentence will not be carried out on Monday next.'"

What the object of making that statement was I do not know. On 14th November it said:

"Last night at 5 o'clock the following despatch, which we doubt not will receive to-day the attention of all our parliamentary representatives, was sent to Sir John A. Macdonald. It exactly reflects the public opinion of the French Canadians on this question: 'To Sir John A. Macdonald. Under the circumstances the execution of Louis Riel will be actually criminal and we reject responsibility for it. Signed, Coursol, Desjardins, Girouard, Vanasse, Massue, Dupont, A. L. Desaulniers, Daoust, Bergeron, Bain, Benoit, Guilbault, Sigault, Labrosse, L. L. L. Desaulniers, Dugas, Hurteau.' Besides that communication another despatch written in the same sense has been addressed to the Premier by Messrs. Quimet, Fortin, Macmillan, Taschereau, Landry (Montmagay), Lesage and Hurteau."

Then Le Monde said:

"There are only two days before the execution of the prisoner at Regina, and yet no official information has been received of the decisive action of the Government on this point. However, everything seems to indicate that Riel will be hanged on Monday. The Government will assume by that act its rightful responsibility. The people are not in possession of facts sufficient to approve such a decision. The general opinion in Lower Canada is, that Riel is not in possession of his mental faculties and that under the circumstances his execution would be an act of cruelty and would cast dishonor on society. It must be a contrary decision at which the Executive has arrived, and it must be upon clear reasons established that Riel is entirely in possession of his mental faculties. His execution will be an atrocious crime which we will never forgive on the part of those who will be responsible for it. In Canada we do not hang half madmen. Our opponents in Upper Canada have been surprised at the efforts we have made to save Riel from the scaffold. We make the question of Riel a national one. We acknowledge all the faults of Riel. No one believes that this man should not be punished and very few would be disposed to allow him his liberty; but it is in the name of humanity that the population of our Province have taken the position they have taken. If the man is guilty and society wants to punish him and it appears that he is incapable of understanding the reason, society does not accomplish any good object but it condemns itself. There is so much doubt as to the mental state of the prisoner as to cause very great anxiety; his condition is so much one of uncertainty as to justify us in asking the clemency which from one end of the Province to the other we are asking towards the unfortunate prisoner."

Numerous meetings were held in Montreal, and Le Monde on 17th November, contained very long articles bearing on them, and encouraging the people to sign petitions, to assemble in public meetings and to protest in every possible way. Of course, Le Monde was not alone in the position it assumed. There was another paper, which did not perhaps go so far, La Minerve, and there were Liberal papers, also L'Etendard and numerous papers, at Three Rivers, in the city of Quebec and all over the Province, all unanimously supporting the tone of the paper from which I am quoting and from which I will further quote. I will quote now from Le Monde of 17th November:

"The aldermen of Montreal have nobly done their duty this afternoon. Inspired by the prevailing national sentiment they have protested with dignity against the political murder [that is the expression used by the paper which was formulating public opinion in Quebec] which has spoiled the flag of the Canadian Confederation. The hanging of Riel is a bloody concession made to Orange hatred; it is the expression of feeling against the French Canadian nationality."

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Hear, hear.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. gentleman must remember that it is a paper representing the hon. Minister in front of him from which I am quoting. The hon. member may go and congratulate him, and he must remember that if the statement is made that Orange hatred has spoiled the flag of the Confederation it is the organ of that hon. Minister which said so. I am sorry to let him know that; but in dealing with these questions all the facts must come out.

"The Municipal Council of Montreal has been the faithful interpreter of the public opinion of this Province on the question."

That is not my statement; it is the statement of the organ of the hon. Minister. The hon. gentleman must understand that, though he may not like it.

"There are some English councillors who would not have resisted that action by the Government. There is Mr. Stephenson, who would hang Canadians every day, and who finds it strange that the people should rise and condemn those who want to drink the blood of French Canadians. The flag that was at half-mast upon the City Hall is the sign of national mourning to the majority of the people. We are gratified to be able to state that many of our compatriots of English origin share our regrets. French Canadians will know how to unite not to satisfy their thirst for the blood of a ferocious hatred, but to get their rights respected."

There are some sentences here, which, I am sorry to say, I have difficulty in translating, and I will, therefore, read them in French:

"Il nous fait plaisir de constater qu'il y a de nos compatriotes d'origine anglaise qui prennent part à notre douleur, mais ils sont rares. Qu'est devenu ce sentiment de loyauté dont s'honorait à si juste titre la race anglaise? Si les Anglais se liguent contre nous pour nous écraser, qu'ils sachent qu'on n'est pas un peuple d'esclaves, qui laissent monter sur l'échafaud ceux des siens qui luttent héroïquement pour le redressement de leurs griefs."

"Les Canadiens-Français sauront s'unir eux aussi, non pas pour assouvir dans le sang une haine féroce, mais pour faire respecter leurs droits."

"Sur le seuil de l'Hôtel-de-Ville, plusieurs orateurs ont prononcé des discours patriotiques qui ont donné la note juste. M. Mercier a dit que les partis devaient se confondre pour former un grand parti national."

"M. Préfontaine a déclaré que M. Mercier, son chef d'hier, n'était plus son chef d'aujourd'hui, mais qu'il espérait voir surgir un chef nouveau autour duquel se grouperait toute la nationalité Canadienne-Française."

"L'honorable M. Beaubien dit qu'on a bien su trouver le sang des Canadiens-Français pour rétablir l'ordre menacé, mais ce sang nous aurons le retrouver pour nous protéger et nous défendre."

"M. Bergeron a fait une éloquente et énergique protestation."

"La morgue anglaise ne nous écrasera pas. Les Canadiens-Français ont trop de cœur pour se laisser tyranniser."

"As an evidence of what fanaticism is coming to in Ontario, take the pictures in the Toronto News, and especially one insulting the 65th Battalion. This engraving represents a tree, from which serpents are issuing, representing the supremacy of French Canadians. Opposite the tree is a man with an axe, representing English fanaticism. He is preparing to cut down the tree; that is very clear. The question is to destroy French Canadian nationality, but French Canadian nationality is too strong a tree and too healthy for fanaticism to overthrow it."

It must be remembered that Le Monde is a paper which is looked upon in the whole Province of Quebec as the direct organ of the Ministry. If it is denied that it is I do not care; I say it is looked upon as being so, and I say it costs so much that it takes very powerful people to sustain it. On the 18th November Le Monde had the following:—

"We draw the attention of our French Canadian clients to the article in the Star, and to the attitude of that paper on the Riel question, and more particularly to the article of yesterday, which shows that the Star thinks that the moment has come to show its fanaticism against our Province. The Star generally masks or hides its natural instincts under the aspect of independence; but only give a good scratch and the back of the fanatic will appear. The Star rejoices in representing us as a strange race, in representing us as we are not, in speaking unjustly against us, and deliberately making calculations which are alike insulting to our self respect and to our patriotism. We hope the French Canadian readers of that paper will read it, and understand what they have to do under the circumstances."

Mr. AMYOT.

Then he speaks against the Star and in favor of the Post, as follows:—

"The Post, for example, has been sympathetic with our race and with the difficulties we have just passed through, and has contributed much to get for us the equally generous sympathies of many of its compatriots. It is for us to recognise those services and to place our confidence in those who have rendered them."

Now, I draw the special attention of the hon. interrupter to this part. Here is what the organ was saying two days after the execution:

"We will soon have to look out for allies to replace those who have made the fall and left us alone in those terrible moments."

Then it says:

"Some impose themselves as one of the Irish Catholics, that is because they are identical with ourselves and we rely upon a community of religious beliefs—the most solid basis of union in all associations. There is then all possible reason to encourage those who by past devotedness have deserved our confidence."

I need not tell the hon. gentleman that he need not be afraid that we will go as far as Le Monde. We will not introduce religious or race cries in politics. We leave that to those who, for what reason I do not know, want to form a religious party in this Dominion. I only quote these extracts to establish that the whole of the agitation came from the hon. gentleman's press, and that, if it had not been for their press, there never would have been any fight between Orangism and Catholicism in Ottawa, and then perhaps all the trouble that has occurred would have been avoided, and we would not have seen these miserable days when we were threatened and insulted by a certain portion of the press which sustains the Ministers in power. On the 19th November Mr. Vanasse, editor-in-chief of that paper and member for Yamaska, had the following remarks:—

"In my name and the name of my constituents I have protested in the most energetic terms against the execution of Riel. We took the opportunity of letting Sir John know that that execution was an act of cruelty, the responsibility of which we refused to share. My political career has not been very long, but in all my political life I have had great confidence in the future of Confederation, which is, in great part, the work of that great Canadian, the regretted Sir George Etienne Cartier, but to-day, painful though it is to admit it, I am bound to declare that the hanging of Riel has more than compromised that brilliant future which we hoped from Confederation. The Conservative members from the Province of Quebec had faith in the word and the promises of their chiefs, and had the moral certainty that Riel would not be hanged. They had been promised that a medical commission, composed of experts of authority, would be appointed, and that it would be charged to report upon the mental state of the prisoner. But we have been shamefully deceived. From that fatal day on which the Cabinet decided to put this unfortunate man to death, the Ministry compromised its dignity and the honor of the country, and lost the confidence of the French Canadian members. The hanging of Riel under the circumstances was nothing but an unworthy concession made to the sanguinary exactions of a faction of the population of Ontario. The Cabinet has withdrawn the confidence that it had in us, and it does not rely upon our loyalty. Sir John has got Riel hanged because he was told that if he was not hanged he would not obtain ten votes in Ontario. Thanks to that crime, Sir John may obtain sixty supporters or more in Ontario. But after a long career, so glorious and so useful for the country, he will descend to his grave with the stigma of dishonor resting upon him. Mr. Vanasse then made some explanations, and he ended by saying that he had confidence that his constituents would approve of his conduct, and that he would resign his seat rather than approve of an act which, if accepted, would prove a national shame."

This speech was uttered before the public, and printed and distributed in thousands. Then, Le Monde of the 20th of November, four days after the hanging, said:

"But fanaticism wanted a victim; Riel has been offered as a holocaust and Orangism has hanged him, for hate, and to satisfy an old thirst for revenge. Sir John thought at first that he could still, as in the past, control that dangerous element of our population. He has been powerless. No more French domination said Upper Canada; Riel's head or you s. No more French denomination said the Orangemen; Riel's head or yours. At last the old chief has yielded, and the scaffold, the hideous scaffold, has been elevated on the distant plains of the west. We know the rest. Let Sir John not be astonished if to-day Lower Canada withdraws from him the unlimited confidence which it has given him for 40 years. His career, so glorious for him and so profitable for the country, he owes to the Conservative party of Lower Canada, whom he has always found faithful. To recompense those 40 years' of service, he turns a deaf ear to the prayer of mercy and gives us a scaffold. The Orange rope which strangled Riel has been burned. It is a useless precaution. The wind has dispersed the ashes to the four corners of the country. The ingrates and the hangman will be poisoned by them. The Conservative party of our Province will not allow itself to be held responsible for the blood of that man. It would degrade itself in the eyes of humanity. The whole of Canada repudiates that act of cruelty, the consequences of which may be so dreadful."

Then Le Monde of the 23rd of November gives the following account of the meeting held on the previous day in the Champ de Mars, at which 40,000 or 50,000 people were present:

"The meeting which took place yesterday on the Champ de Mars was an eloquent protest against the bloody outrage inflicted upon our nationality. Our enemies will see that it is impossible to throw an insult into the face of a whole people without provoking a natural indignation. Over 50,000 people pressing about three platforms assembled upon the Champ de Mars to express their disapprobation of, and indignation at, the iniquitous act of Regina, in which one of us has been shamefully sacrificed. There has never been in Montreal a meeting so numerous, so unanimous, and so enthusiastic. Not less than 30 speakers spoke. They were speaking from three platforms at the same time. Enthusiastic applause greeted the speakers from all parties and all sections without distinction. The Conservatives applauded the Liberals, the Liberals congratulated the Conservatives. Political party lines disappeared in the protest against the execution of the unfortunate victim of the French name. We saw Mr. Mercier speaking beside Mr. Desjardins, struggling in the same cause; Mr. Tarte and Mr. Laurier maintaining the same principle; Mr. Beaubien and Mr. Robidoux joining in the same protest; Mr. Trudel and Mr. Turcotte uniting in the same sentiment of patriotism; Mr. Beausoleil and Mr. Coursol, inspired by the same natural sentiment, eloquently vindicating our rights trampled under foot; Mr. Bergeron and Mr. Poirier, animated with the same patriotism, raising the same cry of indignation. At last, all the speakers, forgetting all their divisions, united against the common enemy, Orangism, and those who have been its instruments. The meeting of yesterday enabled all the Canadians to show their patriotism. They know how to unite to vindicate their rights and to protest against injustice. Let us go forward unitedly, and let us make our nationality respected."

On the same day, there is an article in Le Monde on Irish sympathy; and on the 24th of November, eight days after the hanging, it says:

"The Conservative party of the Province has not hesitated to blame the Government, and has protested almost unanimously against that act and refused to be held responsible for it. The Conservatives have proved that with them principles are everything and men are nothing. The Conservative members had the confidence of the country and they have not lost in this circumstance. On the contrary, they appear before the electors as men upon whom the people may rely."

When you see expressions like these in an organ of one of the Ministers, you may understand that general agitation should start out in the Province of Quebec; and if that agitation is to be blamed, which I deny, if it was not proper, the people will look first to the Minister of Public Works and tell him it is your press that did it. To-day, it is not by saying that the hanging was right that the hon. Minister will succeed in justifying himself; he will not be able to hide the fact that all the deputies, journalists, professional men, all the influential people in Quebec, were united as one man in protesting against the hanging of a man hanged because he was of a certain creed. Those who joined the agitation and who respect themselves cannot change to-day and contradict themselves, more especially as when they want to go to the bottom of the case, the papers are refused them, and that the more they study what documents they can obtain, the more they see that the half-breeds were unfairly treated by the Government, the more they see that the Government was snoring and sleeping over injustice while fire was being prepared in the North-West to destroy the lives of our poor soldiers at the beginning of the troubles. Whilst this was going on, an agitation began in Ontario and some other parts of the Dominion where there are Orange societies. I have not a complete collection of the resolutions passed at the meetings of those societies. It was undoubtedly the duty of the Government to produce them, but they refused to do so. Perhaps some other hon. member of this House will put on record before the country some of the petitions that have been passed, and which, generally, were accompanied by base insults to us. I will quote some of them as I find them. One, which appears to have summarised the speeches of the others, is reported to have said that Thomas Scott was murdered 15 years ago, and that in the present year many Orangemen suffered death, and then to have exclaimed:

"And shall this arch rebel go free whilst loyal men have stained the ground with their blood to uphold the Queen's authority? Never (loud applause); and the sooner the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald understands the true feelings of Orangemen on this question the better. I was pleased to notice in the speeches of County Master Semers, District Master Wilson, and Bros. Graham & Son, the determination expressed that if the Government allows Rome to step in on this occasion and secure a reprieve for this arch-traitor, the Conservative party can no longer count upon their services, although they have worked and voted for them many years."

Such was the cry that came from Orange gatherings in many parts of Ontario. The Orange Sentinel, speaking for the association, said:

"Shall the atrocious injustice be committed of permitting this artful rebel to go free while his dupes and tools—the unfortunate, untutored and misled Indians—were hanged for participation in acts which they regard as praiseworthy and heroic instead of criminal? The people of Canada will require unequivocal answers to these straightforward questions, if Riel be reprieved; and the only answer we judge that can truthfully be given is that the Frenchmen of Quebec rule in the Dominion Parliament, and have vowed that not a hair of Riel's head shall be harmed. Was it to this end, then, that our gallant volunteers sprang to arms and laid down their lives at their country's call? Shall Frenchmen who sympathise with the rebels be permitted to undo their work? If so, let it be known throughout this land. Let it be proclaimed that the rights and liberties of Britons in an English colony hang only on the breath of an alien race. But English Canadians will not longer suffer the galling bondage; and the day may not be far distant when the call to arms will again resound throughout the Dominion. Then, indeed, our soldiers profiting by the lessons of the past must complete a work throughout the whole land only begun in the North-West."

All this, naturally, created in Quebec the impression that Riel was hanged because the Orangemen demanded his death to glut their vengeance. He was hanged, and, before three days had passed, those who clamored for his death, and those who ordered it, became frightened at their own work. The Bleu papers were forced to make a show of sympathising with the feeling which pervade all parties in the Province of Quebec. They dared not say that Riel was not hanged to please the Orangemen, or that his execution was an act of justice. The Orange Sentinel was employed to do that. I might quote, too, the resolutions passed by the Peterboro' Lodge, on the 11th of November. I might quote many other Orange decisions, but I think I had better leave that to be more completely done by some hon. members of this House. At all events, the question before the Executive was: Which shall be preferred—the Orangemen praying for blood or the rest of the Dominion asking for clemency in accordance with the wish expressed by the jury? The Orangemen won the game. Blood was shed, and some of the guards, it appears, burst out laughing when the trap fell. The ministerial press, as well as the opposition press, in the Province of Quebec felt indignant, and simultaneously and unanimously took the lead in public agitation. Public meetings, protestations by municipal councils and all kinds of organised associations took place everywhere. Many members of this House took a leading part in the demonstrations, petitions and resolutions. In these petitions, Riel's insanity is affirmed. It is a question which the Government had to examine, more especially in a case of that kind, and for the decision of which they are responsible to the country. We now have seen what occurred in Quebec, but we must enquire whether the Government was right or wrong in their decisions. The question is: Was Riel mad? Have the Ministers consented to hang a madman for a political offence? That is a most important point. Is it astonishing that we should look into that point, when the Ministers express doubt about it, and promise a medical commission, surrounding the whole with mystery? It is a known and admitted fact that Riel had been interned in three asylums. The doctors who could have testified to his kind of madness there were refused to the prisoner by the Crown, save one who amply and emphatically proved Riel's complete madness. Was he still mad when he began the insurrection? Sir, the insurrection itself was a piece of madness. Why! 100 men undertaking to fight against 1,000 policemen and all the forces of Confederation; 100 men with shot guns and melted spoons against thousands of soldiers with rifles, guns and perfect and abundant ammunition! But let us take the evidence at the trial, let us examine Riel's actions and words. I will quote from the incomplete book furnished to us. Take that book, page 13. What did Riel say to Dr. John H. Willoughby as to the Government of the country?

"They were to have a new Government in the North-West to be composed of God-fearing men, they would have no such Parliament as the House at Ottawa."

A man saying such nonsense must be a fool. This was not said to a half-breed, but to a doctor, to an educated man, and it is such a nonsense that it evidences something wrong in the brain of Riel whenever he talked about his mission or his religion:

"Q. Anything else?—A. Then he stated how he intended to divide the country into seven portions."

Well, Mr. Speaker, anyone who has gone through the North-West, and knows the extent of it from north to south and from east to west, and sees a few hundred half-breeds on the Saskatchewan, and this man saying that he will divide that country with them into seven portions, will say that he must be a fool.

"Q. You mean to say you cannot say how these seven were to be apportioned?—A. Yes; he mentioned Bavarians, Poles, Italians, Germans, Irish. There was to be a New Ireland in the North-West."

That was read by the Ministers before appointing a medical commission and before receiving the medical commission's report. Then, on page 15:

"Q. What did he say he was going to do with these people?—A. They were going to assist him in the rebellion, before this war was over, and that they would have their portion of the country."

"Q. By country what did he allude to?—A. The North-West Territories."

"Q. Exclusively?—A. As I understood it."

"Q. Would you now indicate to us the different people he expected to assist him?—A. The Irish of the United States."

I think the Irish of the United States are well enough where they are without thinking to come into those regions.

"The Germans, the Italians, the Bavarians and Poles, and Germany and Ireland."

Surely, Mr. Speaker, that man must have been a great fool.

"Q. The Bavarians also?—A. Yes."

"Q. The Hungarians?—A. I don't know. I don't believe he said anything as to the Hungarians."

"Q. The Poles, did he intend to give them a chance too?—A. He did."

I never knew that the Poles wanted to come into this country. Then on page 16:

"Q. What is that opinion, be good enough to let us know it?—A. My opinion at that time was that that was about the last that would be heard of it."

Of course, because such nonsense as that is not often repeated. These words were not said to a half-breed; they were said to a doctor, to an educated man. It is such nonsense that it evidences something wrong in the brain of Riel whenever he said anything about his religion. I will refer now to the evidence of John W. Astley, on page 32:

"Q. What did he say at Batoche about his church?—A. He said he wanted me to mention to the General that he was to be recognised as the founder of the new church, and that if the subject was mentioned to the General he could continue the subject when he met him."

I ask any unprejudiced man to read that and frankly declare if it does not bring to the mind the idea that the man who said that was a fool. There is no other possible explanation of it. Now let us look at page 38. The witness says:

"We could hear him walking along the floor, and he said: 'I forgot to tell you you had better call on God, for you are in his hands.'"
Mr. AMYOT.

And then look at page 59—this is George Ness:

"Q. Tell us about their taking you to the church?—A. When we got to the church they were in the front of the church. Mr. Riel commenced saying he was a prophet—that he could foresee events."

And further:

"Q. Did he say anything about taking possession of the church at the same time?—A. Yes, Riel said: 'I will take possession of the church.' Father Moulin said: 'I protest against you touching the church.' Riel said: 'Look at him; he is a Protestant.'"

And at page 63 the same witness says:

"Q. In March he said the priest was a Protestant, or something to that effect?—A. Yes."

"Q. Did you consider at that time he acted as he had acted when you first knew him, in July or August, with reference to the priests and religion?—A. No; he acted very much otherwise."

"Q. Now, can your memory enable you to say what he said at that time, on the 17th March, in his difficulty with Father Moulin?—A. It was on the 18th March."

"Q. State what took place, the words that were used and how he acted on that occasion?—A. He said the spirit of God was in him, and Father Moulin said he was making a schism against the church; and Riel said Rome had tumbled, Rome est tombée.

"Q. He said the Pope of Rome was not legally Pope?—A. Yes. He said the spirit of God was in him and that Rome had tumbled, and he could tell future events."

Well, anyone who speaks that way must, of necessity, have a brain which is not organised as that of other human beings. Now, if we take page 70, the witness being Henry Walters—I take several witnesses to prove that it is not an isolated fact:

"Q. What were they going to do?—A. If successful he told me they were going to divide the land."

"Q. How was he going to divide it?—A. One-seventh to the pioneer whites, one-seventh to the Indians, one-seventh to the French half-breeds, one-seventh to the church and schools, and the balance was Crown lands, I suppose Government lands."

You see that before it was to be divided among the Bavarians, the Poles, the Italians, the Americans, and the Irish. He has forgotten that now, and it is altogether another division. And further:

"Q. Did he say anything about the movement there?—A. No, he did not say anything very particular about it. He said they would have no opposition from Prince Albert. He said the people were friendly. He said if the whites struck a blow, a thunderbolt from heaven would strike them, that God was with their people."

Then, at page 82, Thomas E. Jackson gives this evidence:

"Q. He told you your brother had become insane?—A. He did."

"Q. He told you he had become insane because he had opposed Riel, and that he was punished by God for his opposition to Riel?—A. That is what he said."

"Q. Did he explain to you what his intentions were as to the division of the Territories, what he intended doing when he succeeded in chasing the Canadians out of the country?"

Now, the idea of chasing the Canadians out of the country is so ridiculous that it cannot be considered as emanating from a sane brain.

"A. Some time, probably when I was prisoner, I heard him talk of dividing the country in seven, or giving a seventh of the proceeds to assist the Poles, a seventh to the half-breeds and a seventh to the Indians."

"Q. You believed from him there was some person in this country who would probably take the position of Pope in this country?—A. I think very likely he intended himself to take the position, that the Pope was in his way."

I might go on and quote many of the witnesses that were heard. I have, up to this time quoted from witnesses for the Crown. I might also quote General Middleton and others, such as Young and Charles Nolin, though Charles Nolin was a personal enemy to Riel; but at the trial there were some witnesses who positively swore that Riel was mad. We have Dr. Roy, who had charge of Riel in the asylum and went to the North West and saw him again there, and he swears positively that Riel is mad. We have Dr. Clarke who gives in evidence, though not so conclusive as that of Dr. Roy, but which goes far to show that Riel was insane. We have Riel's diary. It is reproduced in the Globe of July 8, 10, 14, 15, but which is too long to read now. We see what he wrote in his prophecy. We have his will, his songs, his poetry. We have what he said on the eve of his hanging. He pretended to see spirits then. In a few moments he was to appear before his God. He believed in God, and he was insane enough to affirm that he then saw the Spirit, and that the Spirit inspired him. When we see in his diary, continued for weeks, daily proofs of madness, visions and prophecies; when we remember that he has been in three different asylums; when we see that the doctor who took care of him in one of the asylums, swears that he was still mad; when we see Dr. Clarke stating that he believes him to be mad; when we see the Crown refusing to bring any other witnesses to prove that he was mad; when we see that the jury in recommending Riel to mercy, had his madness in view, then I ask if it is not madness what is it? Has the Minister of Public Works, with all his talents and experience, been able to say why the jury recommended Riel to mercy? They are bound to give a reason why the jury recommended him to mercy. We say that the reason was that they believed him to be insane. And what was the charge of the judge? Did the judge tell the jury that if they found the prisoner mad, they should find him not guilty? Is the Government in a position to say that that was done? Are they in a position to tell us that the charge was legal and correct? Are they in a position to say that the stipendiary magistrate knows anything about criminal law? They are not in a position to do that. We have also the declaration of one of the jurymen who states, under his own signature, that their reason for recommending him to mercy was that he was insane. Now the Ministers of the Crown promised a medical commission, and what kind of a commission have they given us? I have a personal respect for these doctors; I know one of them—certainly an honorable and honest man, and the proof is that though he is their employee, though he earns his living from them, and is under their control, still he has been firm enough to say: Yes, on two questions Riel was mad; on the third point, I believe he may distinguish right from wrong, but on religious and political questions, he has hallucinations and cannot distinguish right from wrong. Dr. Lavell is another employee, and so is Dr. Jukes. Why select three employees? Why not take out some specialists? Why not take somebody who would not be under their control, and whom they could not dismiss to-morrow if their report did not suit them? And will you tell me, Mr. Speaker, what is at the bottom of all that? We ask: When was the Order in Council passed? They say on the 12th. Why was the third respite granted? To give time for the medical commission to report. Why was not the medical commission appointed sooner? If you have waited for the medical commission, how is it that you decided before the 3rd of November to hang Riel? Because there was a letter of Sir John A. Macdonald's to the Minister of Militia, published in the papers, saying that the hanging was decided before the Minister of Militia left. So it must have been decided before the 12th November, and if it was decided before the 12th November, the medical commission must have reported either by telegram or by letter on the 8th. You decided to hang Riel before the medical commission was appointed, and you executed it despite the medical commission's report. That is as clear as daylight. We think, judging from the date of the Order in Council, that there must have been some telegrams exchanged between Winnipeg and Ottawa as to what would be the effect of the hanging—what would be the political effect—how many votes would be gained, how many votes would be lost by the hanging—a cool calculation of the number of votes, not a decision upon the merits of the case, not a decision according to the evidence as to whether Riel deserved to be hanged, but simply a question of votes. That was the motive of the Ministers. So questions of human life are now no longer questions of eternal justice, but they are merely questions of political gain or loss. Sir, I cannot follow my chiefs in that; I think that their conduct deserves to be blamed, and I have decided to cease to be a supporter of the Government. Of course, when we cease to support a government upon a question of that sort, we feel at perfect liberty after that to express our opinion, and no more party ties will make me a slave of the hon. gentleman who coolly sacrificed one of my countrymen, because he was a Frenchman, to keep the votes of some Orangemen. When I say Orangemen, I do not mean all Orangemen. No, Sir, I know of some who blame the conduct of the Ministry in that matter; but I mean the fanatical part of them. Mr. Speaker, having so far, I think, established that we are right in condemning the Ministry on the point of insanity, I beg to add a testimony which I think will be admitted by all the members of this House as conclusive. I will give the evidence of one of the hon. members of this House, one of the oldest supporters of the Government, whose honor, respectability and science have never been questioned. It is a letter written by Mr. L. L. Desaulniers, member for St. Maurice, on 3rd November, and sent to Mr. Duhamel, of the Riel commission. He is a specialist, and he thus wrote:

"In my capacity of Inspector of Prisons and of Asylums for the Province of Quebec, I had an opportunity of frequently seeing Louis Riel. I conversed with him at each visit, and I have no hesitation in declaring that I always found him as much devoid of mind and intelligence as any amongst his demented companions. He was indeed a veritable maniac, and unceasingly denied his best friends, and became furious at the idea that certain among them represented him as being a lunatic. As similar causes produce similar effects, that which caused Riel's insanity after the troubles in Manitoba, manifested themselves anew after those of the North-West. Incarcerated in our asylum after the rebellion in Manitoba, the unfortunate chief of the Metis, after what has occurred, should be imprisoned for the same disease after the North-West insurrection. A great number of his actions demonstrated to the eyes of the unprejudiced that the unfortunate Riel is no longer in possession of his mental faculties. The cause which occasioned his first derangement presents itself anew, and it is quite natural to believe, or at least to suspect, that that which occurs to almost all those attacked by insanity for the first time, will occur with redoubled violence on the next occasion. He is now the victim of this recurrent attack, and his reason is now more clouded and compromised than ever. In consequence, I believe that it will not only be just, but prudent, to submit his mental condition to the opinion of medical experts."

All those opinions contributed largely to form public opinion in the Province of Quebec. I entirely concur in what my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Landry) has said with respect to the report of the medical commission, and I wonder how, upon a quiet perusal of the report of that commission, the Ministers could come to the conclusion to hang Riel, when they must have felt that they themselves were the cause of all the trouble; for they must have remembered the indifference, the criminal indifference, shown towards the half-breeds during many long years. When they considered the suffering brought upon Riel, and when they received the report of the medical commission, made by doctors employed by themselves, who were nevertheless forced to admit his insanity, I cannot understand how they could decide to hang Riel. They must have seen very deep political profit to be made out of it. There are many other points upon which I might touch, but I will not trespass further upon the indulgence of the House, leaving to some others to complete the case. The question is so important that I took the liberty of making many quotations and of reading some of my remarks, but I hope I shall be forgiven in view of the importance of the subject. We must not forget that Riel had given himself up voluntarily, inspired, as he said he was by the Spirit. He received a promise of protection from the General. We see what that protection amounted to. And now that we are to judge as to who were to blame, I am going to blame the Government; and I take this opportunity of saying that I would do it with more reluctance if the Government had assented to the unanimous petitions sent in praying for the liberation of the half-breeds who are in gaol. Ministers must have seen some people from the North-West—in fact, they have seen some influential people from the North-West—who have told them the position of matters. They have told the Government that by their action in retaining some of the half-breeds in prison they were making enemies of their relatives and friends. Why do not the Government come out boldly with a measure of clemency for the half-breeds? Why do they not put an end to the present situation? Is there no heart in any of the Ministers; have they no families; do they not sometimes enjoy the pleasure of seeing wife, mother, sister or daughter? Those poor fellows, who have been in gaol for such a long time, have wives and parents who are suffering, and after all these men are in gaol because they defended what they thought were their rights. They thought they were being deprived of their rights, because their lands and timber were being taken away. They may have been mistaken; and we will admit that they were mistaken, for the sake of argument. But why are they kept any longer in prison? Why is the increased expenditure incurred for keeping the gaols filled; and for the benefit of whom? I implore the Government again to release them, and I felt thankful to the Leader of the Opposition when he used his great and just voice in their favor, when addressing the Government, he assured them that the great Grit party of Ontario would not denounce them but would applaud them for a measure of clemency. And have we not in Quebec prayed long enough for such an act of clemency, and have not the people of the North-West and of Manitoba joined us in our request? Why are the Government afraid to grant this concession? Is it because people would say that they were the cause of the rebellion? It is too late to enter such a plea now. It is already done and the facts are known. Let them exercise clemency, and by thus using the few days of power remaining to them the people will be gratified. At least, let them no longer play the comedy of taking each case separately, and professing to decide on it separately. Our actions have not been worthy of a great nation flying the flag of the Confederation. We should put a stop to the cruelty. We have been cruel to Riel and to the half-breeds. That is done and cannot be undone; but when we can terminate the present situation, let us do it. I implore the Government to do it, and in that way redeem in some degree the faults they have committed. Considering all the facts of the case, I shall support the motion of my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Landry) for the following reasons: Because: 1st. the treatment of the half-breeds has been most unfair and unjust. The alleged settlement of the claims, in vain asked for many years, has been delayed for seven years, has resulted in a sham, or rather a spoliation by means of scrip, which have virtually gratuitously given to strangers over 2,000 farms belonging to the half-breeds. 2nd. The insurrection was provoked by the culpable neglect of the duty of the Ministers, is not due to the half-breeds, but also, if we take the words of the Prime Minister, to the white speculators in whose hands the half-breeds have been mere instruments. 3rd. The insurrection would have been avoided if our troops had not fired first, if the half-breeds had been approached by friendly messengers. 4th. Riel gave himself up under the promise that he would be protected till the Government would have decided his case, and not the courts. 5th. He was tried for high treason and punished for murder. 6th. He has been refused necessary delays, the means of procuring necessary witnesses. 7th. He was recommended by the jury to the clemency of the court. 8th. He was most cruelly respited. 9th. The Government withheld important documents concerning his case. 10th. The Government failed to procure competent translators. 11th. The trial took place far from the place of the offence, before a jury of six men of different creed and race, the Crown eliminating the only jurymen of his creed; such a law should have been changed at the past Session. 12th. Riel's madness, upon which the Minister's themselves appeared to be doubtful, seems abundantly proved and is evident from his doings and sayings, from his past admitted madness, from the absurdity of the rebellion itself and even from the report of the medical commission. 13th. Riel was recommended to mercy and it must have been on account of the doubts entertained on that very point of his mental sanity. 14th. The voice of the people praying for clemency should have been preferred to the one of those asking for blood. 15th. The order for hanging seems to be the result of a cool, calm calculation of the political influence and results it would have on the electoral strength of the country. 16th. Riel was tried for a political offence, and civilised nations no more hang for such offences. 17th. The Government seems decided to exterminate that little people. I thank the House for giving me so patient a hearing and again apologise for the imperfect English I have used.

Mr. ROYAL moved the adjournment of the debate.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Landry (Montmagny): "That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution," and the motion of Sir Hector Langevin: "That the question be now put."

Mr. ROYAL. When I moved the adjournment of the debate last night it was not my intention to answer the speech and the arguments of the hon. member for Bellechase (Mr. Amyot), nor is it my intention to answer them now. I propose to leave the hon. gentleman to the tender mercies of the Minister of Militia, his old friend, his admired friend, his quondam chief of the past. However, I cannot allow this occasion to pass without referring to certain facts the hon. gentleman who preceded me, stated yesterday, in the declaration read as made by Mr. Lemieux, to sustain certain accusations brought against the Government, of having refused to give him all the allowances he wished to have in the trial that took place at Regina, during last summer. That declaration was not taken before a commissioner for taking affidavits; it was devoid of all authenticity; and, moreover, it was signed by only one of the counsel who undertook the defence of the prisoner. In regard to that document, which has certainly not the same weight nor the same authenticity as a sworn declaration, I will read from the report which has been distributed, and which gives the proceedings that took place on the trial at Regina between the Queen and Riel. At page 9 there is an affidavit given by Mr. Lemieux in support of a motion asking for a certain delay in the proceedings:

"CANADA,
North-West Territories. } THE QUEEN vs. LOUIS RIEL.

"FRANCOIS XAVIER LEMIEUX, Barrister, one of the counsel of Louis Riel, the accused, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

"That in the course of June, towards the end of the month, he was retained by persons interested on behalf of the accused to undertake his defence.

"That persons were instructed to cause to be brought to Regina, essential and necessary witnesses in the defence of Louis Riel, and believed to be such by the deponent.

"That the witnesses above referred to are Doctor Francois Roy, of Quebec, Doctor Clark, of Toronto, and Doctor Vallée, of Quebec.

"That the deponent verily believes that the said witnesses would have reached Regina by this time, but by reason of misapprehension and circumstances beyond control, the said witnesses have failed or have not been able to be present in order to give their evidence.

"That, from his experience as a counsel and advocate, he swears that the said Drs. Roy, Vallée and Clark are necessary, material and indispensable witnesses for the defence of the accused, and, moreover, are the sole witnesses capable of proving certain important facts relating to the said defence.

"That the deponent verily believes that if a delay of one month is granted he can procure the said witnesses by going himself to Quebec and Toronto, and that, at the expiration of the said delay, the above named witnesses will be present at the Court to give evidence in favor of the accused.

"And the deponent has signed.

(Signed), "F. X. LEMIEUX.

"Sworn before me, at Regina, this } 21st day of July, 1885.

"(Signed), DIXIE WATSON, Clerk."

This affidavit is fortified by another one signed by Mr. C. Fitzpatrick, corroborating in the main the statements of his brother counsel. The only object I have in referring to this part of the speech made by the hon. member (Mr. Amyot) last night, is to show that, if the other statements and arguments adduced by him are as wanting in weight and authenticity, they all have little weight indeed, and I can only say that I feel sorry for him. When, during last Session, I had the honor to address you, Mr. Speaker, and this honorable House, on the subject of the administration of affairs in the North-West, I endeavored to give a brief history of the Metis population. I then attempted to show that a distinct nationality had been formed in the North-West Territories before Canada had ever thought of the existence of the population in that part of British North America. I showed also that those people had a title to the soil which had been granted and given to them by the Hudson Bay Company, their rulers, or by Lord Selkirk, who purchased the said territories from the Hudson Bay Company. Apart from the title they had to that soil, they, as descendants of the aborigines of that country, had as much right, or, at least, had a share in the right to the soil as the Indians of those territories. During the period that elapsed between the time when the existence of this distinct population was first noticed, and 1870, when Canada cut out of the North-West Territories the Province of Manitoba, I said—and I said it with a great deal of pleasure, because it was an unknown fact to most of my hearers—that this population was distinguished for its honesty, mild manners, patriotism, attachment to the soil, and a spirit of independence and proudness that were certainly to be envied by other people. No doubt, with those features they have retained some of the characteristics of their Indian relations. But I had only to recite facts to show that it was due to them that if Canada was able to-day to take possession of those vast tracts of country and open them to our civilisation as well as to the colonisation of Canadians and Europeans, it was owing to the bravery and courage of the Metis who kept the country from the Indians. When the formation of Manitoba took place those people had been accustomed, under a rude form of Government, it is true, but a paternal Government, to exercise political privileges, which, to our great surprise, contained the very elements of representative institutions. The council then existing was formed of representatives of the various portions of the population then existing on the shores of Red River and the Assiniboine. My object in referring to-day to what I stated last year is to show that those people had an undoubted right to be treated by the Canadian Government and by ourselves as a distinct nationality, in the same way as the Indian population had a right to expect to be thus treated by the Canadian Government. In 1870 those rights were acknowledged by the Canadian Government, and embraced in the Act known as the Manitoba Act. This Act was passed after a movement inaugurated by the population, headed by Louis Riel, and the acknowledgment of those rights excited the wonder of the people in this part of Canada. And if the unfortunate execution of Scott had not taken place, there was enough in the movement of the Metis, headed by Riel, in order to save their liberties and obtain their rights from the Canadian Government, to show that those people were worthy of the privileges and rights that the Canadian Parliament were granting them. I have named Louis Riel. I suppose it is not out of place for me to state that the Riel family is one of the most prominent among the half-breed population of the North-West. Riel himself has some Indian blood in his veins from his father, his mother being of French Canadian origin. Now, Sir, the high intellectual gifts, as well as a certain amount of exaltation, seem to be hereditary in the family; and, Sir, we have only to recall the writings and speeches made now and then, and certain of the acts of that unfortunate man, to know how gifted he was intellectually. My French-speaking colleagues in this House have wondered more than once who could be the writer of those letters which were sent to the newspapers in Canada, and which bore the name "Marguerite Riel." To us in the Province of Manitoba, it was no wonder this woman wrote those letters, and they were marked by elegance of language as well as purity of expression and sentiment. Now, Sir, in that family, devotion also seemed to be hereditary. In the winter of 1871, when the Canadian troops were in the barracks of Fort Garry, the hospital there contained some of the sick soldiers. The Sisters of Charity of St. Boniface had obtained from the military authorities the privilege of visiting these sick soldiers. One morning two nuns crossed to the hospital on the ice, and those two sisters were seen a few minutes afterwards going through the hospital from one bed to another, offering consolation to the soldiers, and otherwise kindly attending to them. One of them was the sister of Louis Riel. She was a Sister of Charity, and there was in her heart enough of devotion and Christianity—she herself being the sister of the doomed man—to go and offer her services to the sick soldiers who were sent to Fort Garry in 1870. Having said so much as to the population I have the honor of representing in this House, I will say that, most unfortunately, these people have been treated with a certain amount of neglect. In fact, Sir, if at this moment we remember how the Indians are treated, I believe I may say, with a certain amount of propriety, that the half-breeds have been treated worse than the Indians, although the Manitoba Act was, in the eyes of those people, a treaty to the same intent and purpose as the Indians look on their treaties with this Government. Now, Sir, when I state that they have been treated with neglect, I must add forsooth that they never were treated with more neglect than by the Administration which preceded this one. It is a fact in history that, to use the words uttered by the right hon. leader of the Government, there was a blank in the history of the Metis between 1873 and 1878. They were ignored; their nationality and their distinct rights were perfectly denied and set aside as having no right to exist. They were to be treated either as white men or as Indians. The object of what I have stated so far is to show that these men had certain rights by themselves, due to their origin and their condition of existence in those territories. The Manitoba Act only acknowledged the rights of the half-breeds who were living in the Province of Manitoba. I believe it was the duty of the Government as soon as this was shown to them, to acknowledge the same rights with respect to the half-breeds who were living in the North-West Territories, as with respect to those of Manitoba, because they were of the same family and nationality, they came from the same source, and they were entitled to the same rights. So, Sir, during the years of the Administration of the hon. gentleman opposite—

Mr. LANDERKIN. How many rebellions had you in that period?

Mr. ROYAL. I shall answer the hon. gentleman in a few moments; but I will state now that the rebellion was caused by white settlers who certainly were not friendly to this Government.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why didn't they hang them?

Mr. ROYAL. I can show the hon. gentleman that if the meaning of the word rebellion was taught among the Metis it was taught to them by the Globe, and I can show the hon. gentleman that if revolt against legitimate authority was ever inculcated in the North-West, it was through the Farmers' Union of Manitoba. In 1880 Sir John Macdonald took the first opportunity he had, in order to bring in a Bill in this House—he himself, the leader of the Conservative party, introduced a Bill in Parliament to extend the same privileges and rights to the half-breeds in the territories as those enjoyed under the Manitoba Act by the half-breeds in the Province of Manitoba. Now, Sir, by that we can ascertain in what party and on what side of the House there existed a feeling of friendship towards the half-breed population, and an acknowledgment of the justice of their cause. As I have stated, from many causes, some under the control of the Government and some beyond their control, the acknowledgment and settlement of the rights of the half-breeds were deferred for a certain number of years. However, I believe that the Government lost no time in extending the surveys as rapidly as they could. I think, also, that we can see whether there was any attempt made, on the part of the preceding Government, to make haste in order to do justice to that population. When the half-breed population, or a certain portion of them, saw that their rights were too tardily acknowledged they communicated with the Government, and at last they wanted to have from the United States a man whose name they thought would be a warning to the Government and would certainly hurry up the settlement of their claims. Riel went into the settlements, I think, in the month of July, 1884. The agitation then commenced; it was an agitation limited within constitutional bounds; but the fact was disclosed during the trial at Regina, as well as by correspondence, that the agitators were chiefly white settlers, influenced whether by certain personal objects or certain political objects, it is difficult for me to state. The half-breeds themselves, by their nature and their own happy simplicity, desired to confine the agitation within constitutional limits. They had everything to lose otherwise. Everybody knows what has been said and written about the Prince Albert settlements. Several flourishing parishes had sprung up there within a few years. The farmers were in a happy condition, and most of them having emigrated from the Province of Manitoba, had carried with them money which they had realised from the sale of their property. These people could understand perfectly well what was likely to take place if the standard of rebellion should be raised. But, unfortunately, some further delays took place which aggravated the public feeling in that quarter, and led to events the character of which is known by every hon. member in this House. Now, on the 4th of March, 1885, Father André received a telegram from the Government informing him that the question was settled, that the half-breeds were to receive their scrip, and that their patents should issue as soon as they should comply with certain regulations. Everybody feels that this should have been sufficient to stop all agitation, if it had not been that the white settlers poisoned the minds of the half-breeds by stating to them that there was no authority in a telegram—that a telegram could easily be fabricated—if an old chief factor of the Hudson Bay Company, a man of great reputation and standing in that part of the country, Lawrence Clark, had not very imprudently asserted to Father André and several others that he knew very well what would be the answer to the last petition that was sent to Ottawa, and that the Metis, instead of receiving scrip would receive bullets, and instead of receiving patents would receive 500 soldiers. Well, these things must not be attributed to half-breeds, but to white men whose mission seemed to excite rebellion, and who would gain by it, and who did their best to poison the minds of these people and to prevent them giving any credence to that telegram. The rebellion took place a few days afterwards.

It is not for me to refer to the fearful events that took place during the six weeks that elapsed between the 24th of March and the 13th of May. I can only say that nothing justified that rebellion, which was a crime against God and society. The chief of the rebellion, Louis Riel, gave himself up as a prisoner, and had to stand his trial at Regina. We know something of the trial that took place. Everybody will agree that it was conducted according to law; but owing to the prejudices of the Crown counsel or some of them, that amount of fairness that the Government, that the population in the territories, that we, had a right to expect from them, was not displayed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. ROYAL. I will only cite an instance, and I may remind the hon. gentlemen who say "hear, hear," that one of the counsel, Mr. Osler, was a friend of their own. There was a Catholic juror who presented himself. He was the only Catholic; and Mr. Osler challenged him. That want of fairness must not be attributed to the Government. Another incident which we must regret very much is the incident of Jackson, for which I throw the whole responsibility on the Crown prosecutors, who might have acted with more wisdom, more liberality and perhaps more justice and less discrimination. Now I come down to the 16th of November, the day on which the unfortunate man had to suffer the extreme penalty of the law. If I refer to it, it is to say that it was the signal of an agitation, of an outburst of sympathy that extended not only to all the Provinces of Canada, but also to the adjoining Republic and to Europe. Much has been said of the agitation which took place in the Province of Quebec, where I was born; and, Sir, I am not the one to fail to acknowledge very highly the proverbial generosity and chivalry with which the Province of Quebec, a minority herself, espouses the causes of suffering minorities in the other Provinces. French-speaking Canadians are a Latin race, and it is quite possible that to that ethnological feature may be attributed that exuberance of generosity for which we are distinguished, sometimes at our own expense. But I admire the spontaneous movement with which public opinion adopted the cause of a man who constituted himself the chief of a population, neglected perhaps, but certainly not tyrannised over, a population which has some of our blood and which has the same faith as we. I do not condemn the movement, because I believe it was only the exaggeration of a noble sentiment; and representing, as I have the honor to do, the French-speaking and Catholic population of the Province of Manitoba, I have often felt, and shall always recognise the great advantages I have derived from the generosity of my compatriots in this House. But I submit that the attempt which was made to make this movement serve political purposes, without considering the fearful consequences that would thereby result to the interests of the minority, is deserving of severe censure. If that movement, as directed by some of its chiefs, had succeeded, the French-speaking population of to-day would stand perfectly isolated from the rest of the population in Canada, would lose its privileges for ever, and thus lose the constitutional advantages given to it by 40 years at least of efforts and loyalty to its political friends. In this connection, I cannot express too highly the gratitude I feel at the conduct of the three French-speaking Ministers in the Cabinet who had patriotism, soul and heart enough to resist the onslaught of public opinion excited at the moment and calling on them to resign. When the ship is in danger, and the storm raging, it is not the time for the pilot to desert her. In connection with this movement, which was nothing else but an exaggeration of a noble and chivalric feeling, a sentiment of humanity, I must say the minority should acknowledge the fair treatment which has been and is being extended to us by the majority of the population of Canada. It is true that we, the minority, have not always been able to obtain all we wanted; and in matters of opinion, we have had in many instances to submit to the rule of the majority; but who can say that the majority has not loyally admitted the minority to share with them the sum of the advantages which result from our constitutional liberties? In what country in the world will you find a French minority, will you find a Catholic minority, as free, untrammelled, and as respected as we are in Canada, although the majority has not with us, in common, either language, aspirations or national genius; and I am sure that our friends of the majority will agree with us, that justice, tolerance and respect for vested rights are the only basis of the greatness of a nation. It becomes the majority to respect the sentiments of the minority, and if this minority is very sensitive, you must not forget that its sensitiveness is due to the fact that it feels that it is a minority. The agitation that took place last fall, the threats uttered every day in some of the leading Ontario newspapers, caused, to the population in Manitoba and the North-West Territories, the most grievous anxiety. You must remember, Sir, that this population are living 1,500 miles from here, and they were alarmed lest the policy of a national coalition would prevail, and the rights, privileges, and even the existence of the minorities in Manitoba and the North-West Territories be attacked; we saw, on the other hand, that the agitation in Quebec was being worked to the advantage of party, and threatened to cause essential interests to be lost sight of entirely. The object of this apparently harmless motion is nothing else: it is but a pretext to make the condition of affairs worse. Its object is to draw us away from our allegiance to a certain platform, to certain principles, and to throw us into the arms of another party with which we have nothing in common. Should the motion of the hon. member from Montmagny (Mr. Landry) be carried, the consequence would be a change of Government, a change of principle, and an entire change of programme. Well, if you compare the programme of the party in power with that of the party in opposition in the past, if you can foretell the future by the experience of the past, I ask what should any man do who has at heart the interests of his country? We know there is a lack of sincerity on the part of the hon. members of the Opposition, which is not very astonishing, for we have found the same thing in every grave question that has arisen in our political atmosphere. We know that before the 16th November the Globe was all for execution, and we know what a wonderful turnabout was made after that fatal day. The Globe had not epithets enough to heap upon the heads of Cabinet Ministers for the execution of Riel. Riel, who, according to the fiery language of that paper, before the 16th November, was a high handed and blood-thirsty rebel, had become nearly a lamb after the 16th November. It is a pity the same amount of sympathy exhibited after that date by hon. gentlemen opposite and their organs was not shown before that date. If it had, perhaps a different condition of affairs would exist. Now, however, as my words in that respect must be supported by some evidence, I will, with your permission, read a few extracts taken from the Globe before the 16th November and after the 16th November:

On July 6th the Globe said:

"Nothing can justify rebellion that does not become revolution."

On August 5th:

"There was certainly no legal justification—that there could not be. We have always contended that there was no moral justification, because the grievances must be very great indeed, nay, intolerable, that can morally justify the taking up of arms for their redress."

On the same day:

"No shadow of a doubt remained that he was guilty as charged in the indictment. The testimony that followed only deepened the certainty of his guilt."

On July 25th :

"It is now alleged on behalf of Riel that he never advised the half-breeds to resort to violence, that when he found the constitutional modes of seeking redress unavailing, he wished to leave the country and was prevented, and that at the last he did all in his power to dissuade the half-breeds from taking up arms. This is not believed; and indeed it seems inconsistent with much that has been stated upon authority apparently good."

On March 30th :

"While Superintendent Crozier and Riel were parleying, fire was opened with the rebels, and some of the civilians accompanying Crozier were actually shot in the waggons in which they travelled to the scene of the combat. Such an outrage as this will stir the blood of every man in the country."

On 15th July :

"Now his (Riel's) diary may suggest something like a cross ray from Bedlam in Riel's eye, such as genius or roguery may occasionally effect. But at the same time it must be added it gives not the slightest ground for suspecting absolute madness or for hinting that the writer's place is in a lunatic asylum. If there is madness going it is of a kind in which there is quite a large amount of method. If all who are mentally astray only as these jottings indicate that Riel is, were shut up in our asylums, we should have to increase the capacity of those establishments considerably."

On 22nd October :

"Nor as to his sanity has there been any doubt since the jury, having heard the experts' evidence, decided that Riel was responsible."

On 14th July :

"The public believe Riel and his associates guilty of the highest crime known to the law; and public indignation would be excited did any of them escape punishment."

On 3rd August :

"No shadow of a doubt remained that he was guilty, as charged in the indictment."

On 8th June :

"We want Riel and the other ringleaders brought to immediate justice."

On 25th May :

"They (the people) were never more in earnest, never more determined that justice shall be done, and that the doing of it shall not be unduly delayed. Calm, but stern and determined, they demand that justice be done."

Now, Sir, what are the utterances of the same paper immediately, that is to say, a little time after the execution that took place on the 16th November. Certainly if these articles were not headed by the same title "The Globe," you would think that they belonged to two different papers altogether. On the 5th February the Globe said :

"With those grievances in view; with that recommendation in view; with the fact in view that the agitation under Riel was perfectly constitutional for about eight months; in view of the almost accidental beginning of hostilities; in view of the doubts of Riel's sanity; in view of the rarity with which the death penalty is exacted by modern Governments from men technically guilty of treason; in view of the many humble petitions favoring commutation of his sentence to life imprisonment, there was a prima facie case of immense strength on behalf of clemency."

So much for the sincerity of the party, or at least of the paper which claims to be its organ, and which very recently my hon. friend across the floor has praised so highly as being the best, the leading, the most complete, the most intellectual newspaper on the continent of America. Now I have done. It remains for me to say that I shall vote for the amendment to have the previous question put, and that on the main motion I shall vote with the Government against the resolution which has been proposed.

Mr. GIGAULT. It is not necessary for me, I think, to say that I disapprove of the rebellion which occurred in the North-West. I am glad to see order and peace restored in that remote territory, and I hope that hereafter we will adopt and follow a policy which will never again disturb that peace. It is not necessary for me either, I think, to add that I do not wish to deal with this question from a national standpoint. To-day it is a half-breed who has been unjustly executed; to-morrow it may be an Irishman, an Englishman or a Scotchman. To-day it is the half-breeds who are ill-treated, and worse treated than the Indians, as the member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) has just stated, and to-morrow another group of our population may meet with the same fate of which the member for Provencher has just spoken. Are we going to suffer such a policy to continue through partisanship? No, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to suffer such a policy, which has given two rebellions to this country, to continue without being blamed by myself. I know that I expose myself to be insulted by some of the political friends with whom I have always worked until to-day; but, even if it is necessary to put an end to my political career, I will put an end to it rather than approve of a policy which has produced such bad results in this country. I say that I do not approve of this rebellion, because I think that the serious grievances of which the half-breeds had to complain, were not such as to justify a rebellion; but, if those grievances were not sufficient to justify a rebellion, they were certainly sufficient to justify the Government in using the prerogative of mercy towards the leader of these half-breeds, who were pushed to exasperation and dissatisfaction by the bad policy which has been followed for many years past. Mr. Speaker, perhaps somebody will tell me that last Session I voted for the motion of the leader of the Government. I may just as well tell the reasons now why I did so. We had not then the information which we have to-day; and, moreover, many friends of the Government, with myself, felt that if we were united in supporting the Government, we would have more influence with them in obtaining clemency for the half-breeds and their unfortunate leader. But that concession was useless; and the Ministers availed themselves of that concession to continue a much worse policy. If Riel had always been a sane man, if the Ministers had not to reproach themselves with some faults in the administration of the North-West, I would not raise my voice to-day to protest against the iniquity which was consummated. I condemn the execution of Riel chiefly for the three following reasons: Firstly, because the insurrection was provoked by the bad administration of affairs in the North-West; secondly, because I believe that Riel was irresponsible for the crime of which he was convicted; thirdly, because the jury recommended him to the clemency of the Crown, and because the Ministers did not take into account the recommendation and the other extenuating circumstances which existed. According to criminal law, provocation is always an extenuation, if not a justificative circumstance. Riel would never have committed, nor even conceived, the crime of which he was convicted, if the circumstances in the North-West had been different from what they were. Who brought about that state of things? Who caused the dissatisfaction which gave to Riel arms and soldiers? It was the policy, the mismanagement of the Government for many years. That the administration of the North-West has been bad, we have the most positive proof and evidence. If we consult the Mail, the chief organ of the Conservatives in Toronto, the organ of the First Minister, what do we see? On the 8th day of July last, that newspaper contained these words :

"It has never been denied by the Mail, that the Metis had good grounds for grievances. By the passage of the Manitoba Act of 1870, old Canada had formally and frankly recognised the rights of the half-breeds of that Province to share in the Indian title, and it follows as a matter of course if they had right in the soil of Manitoba, those of them in the regions beyond had rights in the soil there. This admitted of no dispute. It must have been quite well understood by Parliament in 1870. In spite of this recognition, however, and of the manifest and unanswerable logic of the half-breed case, that Department, for years and years, steadily refused to move in the matter. This was the way the officials treated the just demands of the Metis, and we agree with Mr. Blake that the negligence was gross and inexcusable, and contributed to bring about the insurrection."

In these words I find the justification of what I have just said. I say that the persons who are responsible for the late rebellion are the Ministers of to-day, on account of their bad management of affairs in the North-West; and their chief organ says here plainly that the refusal of the Government to concede the just demands of the Metis, has contributed to bring about this insurrection. We have also the evidence of men who are living on the spot, who know more about the affairs of the North-West than any one of us; and who are these men? They are the members of the North-West Council. On the 7th day of December last, an address was adopted by that council in answer to the speech of the Lieutenant-Governor, and I find in the address, which was adopted by a majority of the members of that council, the following words:—

"Knowing as we do the great influence always had by the Indians over the half-breeds, we have to regret that the repeated representations heretofore made to the Government by the North-West Council on behalf of the half-breeds and their claims, did not receive more immediate attention. We trust your Honor will join with this council in bringing the matter of the many existing unsettled half-breed claims to the notice of the Government, by memorial or resolution."

You see, by this resolution, that petitions and representations have not been wanting to teach the Government how to act. We know that this council had sent in 1878, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, and 1884, representations to the Government asking for the redress of the half-breed grievances. But nothing was done. In spite of those representations, in spite of the rebellion which took place last spring, we see by this resolution that there are yet a great many existing unsettled half-breed claims. Mr. Speaker, in 1869 we became the owners of the North-West Territory. On account of some faults and blunders committed by the Ministers, and which were acknowledged by some of them, some trouble took place at that time also. Riel appeared for the first time as the defender of the rights of his countrymen. Afterwards it was thought right to give a partial amnesty to Riel. The half-breeds, before the transfer of the North-West Territory to the Government, were living happy and contented on those immense prairies. They had abundant means of subsistence through fishing and hunting; but as the Government was pushing on the colonisation of those territories, the game and buffalo were constantly becoming more scarce. It was just to offer them a compensation in extinction of their right to the property of the soil. The rights of the half-breeds were acknowledged in 1870 by Sir George Etienne Cartier, who had a grant of 1,400,000 acres of land voted by this Parliament for those half-breeds. So that the policy of the Government was all determined. The Ministers of to-day had only to follow the footsteps of that distinguished statesman; they had only to give to the half-breeds of the North-West what was given by Sir George Etienne Cartier to the half-breeds of Manitoba. Nothing is clearer, and I think the duty of the Government was quite plain. The second reason why I condemn the execution of Riel is, because he was irresponsible for the crime he committed on account of his partial insanity. Everything concurs to prove that Riel had not a complete control over his mental faculties. We know that insanity three times led Riel to insane asylums, and we have also most abundant proof of the insanity of Riel during the last rebellion by the evidence which was given at his trial at Regina. Here are the answers given by Father André:

"Q. Did he speak in a sensible manner?—A. I wish to say why I did not like to speak to him on those subjects. Upon all other matters, literature and science, he was in his ordinary state of mind.

"Q. Upon political subjects and religion?—A. Upon politics and religion he was no longer the same man; it would seem as if there were two men in him, he lost all control of himself on those questions.

"Q. When he spoke of religion and politics?—A. Yes; on those two matters he lost all control of himself.

"Q. Do you consider, after the conversations you have had with him, that when he spoke on politics and religion he had his intelligence?—A. Many times, at least twenty times, I told him, I would not speak on those subjects because he was a fool, he did not have his intelligence of mind."

We have also the evidence of Rev. Vital Fourmond. Here are the words he uses in one of his answers to the lawyer—page 117:

"As soon as the rebellion commenced then he became excited, and he was carried away and he lost all control of himself and his temper."

Then comes the evidence of Dr. François Roy:

"Will you tell me what time he left the asylum?—A. He was discharged about the 21st January, after a residence in the house of about nineteen months.

"Q. Had you any occasion to study at that time the mental disease by which the prisoner was affected?—A. Yes.

"Q. Did you have relations with him during that time, and did you watch him carefully during that time?—A. Not every day, but very often.

"Q. Can you say now what mental disease the prisoner was suffering from?—A. He was suffering from what is known by authorities as magalomania.

"Q. Will you give the symptoms of this disease?—A. Many symptoms of the disease are found in the ordinary maniacs. The particular characteristic of the malady is that in all cases they show great judgment in all cases not immediately connected with the particular disease with which they suffer.

"Q. Will you speak from memory or by referring to the authors; what are the other symptoms of this disease?—A. They sometimes give you reasons which would be reasonable if they were not starting from a false idea. They are very clever on those discussions, and they have a tendency to irritability when you question or doubt their mental condition, because they are under a strong impression that they are right, and they consider it to be an insult when you try to bring them to reason again. On ordinary questions they may be reasonable and sometimes may be very clever. In fact, without careful watching they would lead one to think that they were well.

"Q. Was he there some weeks or months before you ascertained his mental condition?—A. Yes, I waited till then to classify him as to his mental condition. We wait a few weeks before classifying the patients.

"Q. Does a feeling of pride occupy a prominent position in that mental disease?—A. Yes, different forms, religion, and there are a great many with pride. We have kings with us.

"Q. From what you heard from those witnesses, and from the symptoms they prove to have been exhibited by the prisoner, are you now in a position to say whether or not at that time he was a man of sound mind?—A. I am perfectly certain that when the prisoner was under care, he was not of sound mind, but he became cured before he left, more or less; but from what I heard here to day I am ready to say that I believe on those occasions his mind was unsound, and that he was laboring under the disease so well described by Dugouet.

"Q. Do you believe that under the state of mind as described by the witnesses and to which you refer, that he was capable or incapable of knowing the nature of the acts which he did?—A. No, I do not believe that he was in a condition to be the master of his acts, and I positively swear it; and I have people of the same character under my supervision."

We have other evidence also of the insanity of Riel furnished in the testimony of Philippe Garnot, page 116:

"Q. Tell us what he said to you about that as far as you can remember?—A. He was talking about the country being divided into seven Provinces, one for the French, Germans, Irish, and I don't know what else; there were to be seven different nationalities.

"Q. Do you remember anything else besides those you have mentioned, what other foreigners?—A. Italians.

"Q. Hungarians?—A. I can't remember particularly very well; I know it was seven different Provinces, and seven different nationalities.

"Q. In his conversation with you, or with others in your presence on these subjects, did he at any time give you any intimation that he had any doubt of his success, that any obstacle could prevent him from succeeding?—A. No, he always mentioned that he was going to succeed, that it was a divine mission that he had, and that he was only an instrument in the hands of God.

"Q. What did you think of him?—A. I thought the man was crazy, because he acted very foolish."

It is not necessary for me to add that the revolt itself was a piece of madness. How could Riel hope, with a handful of half-breeds, to succeed in defeating all the troops of the Government? I come now to the medical commission appointed by the Government. By the petition presented by the lawyer of Louis Riel to the Government, it was asked that a commission of specialists or alienists should be appointed to ascertain the mental condition of Riel. Did the Government accede to the wish of the lawyer of Riel? Certainly not, Mr. Speaker; they did not appoint specialists, as that lawyer asked them; and even if that lawyer had not asked for such a commission, the Ministers should have thought it their duty to appoint such a commission composed of such physicians of experience. In the British House of Commons there was a long discussion, in 1881, on a motion for the abolition of capital punishment. The then Home Secretary, Sir William Harcourt, mentioned the principles which guided him every time that appeals for clemency were made and the plea of insanity invoked in favor of a prisoner. Did that Home Secretary say that the appointment of ordinary practitioners was sufficient? No; that man of experience, that distinguished statesman, said that every time the plea of insanity was invoked in favor of prisoners it was his duty to appoint medical men of great experience:

"There were cases in his experience," said Sir William Harcourt, "where the evidence of insanity was not brought before the judge and the jury, and that was frequently due to the poverty and want of resources among the class within which the murder was committed. If they had belonged to the wealthy class they would have had the history of themselves and predecessors examined and medical testimony adduced; but he need not say that in the Home Office enquiries in this connection were anxiously and carefully, and, on the whole, satisfactorily made. The Secretary of State had the power to send medical men of experience to examine into the condition of the prisoner; and when these medical men reported, as they had done occasionally, that they did not regard the prisoner as responsible for his actions either at the time of the commission of the offence or subsequently, the capital sentence was not carried out."

The Minister of Justice has chosen, as one of the members of the commission, Dr. Jukes, a gentleman who was prejudiced against Riel, and who stated at the trial when he was under oath, that he was under the impression that Riel was sane. Should that man have been chosen? Certainly not. Was that man a specialist—an alienist? No; he says so himself. In his examination at the trial, one of the lawyers asked him the following question:—

"Q. Have you devoted your attention to insanity at all specially or not?—A. Never specially; there are cases, of course, which occasionally will come under the notice of every general practitioner, but as a special study I have never done so."

Was that a man to be chosen as a man of experience? Was that physician a man who should have been chosen to deal with the life of a prisoner? No, Mr. Speaker. Here is another answer which is made by Dr. Jukes:

"Q. Then, as I understand, you believe him to be sane?—A. I believe him to be sane, so far as my knowledge of such matters goes."

And he had just said that he had no knowledge of mental diseases. The procedure adopted by the Ministers is condemned not only by the Home Secretary for England, but also by distinguished physicians who have made a special study of mental diseases. I hold here a book written by Dr. Pinel, who is a director of an insane asylum in France, and a most distinguished authority of mental diseases. Here is one of the conclusions of that author:

"In civil or criminal matters, specialists should always be consulted, whenever it is a question of appreciating the mental state of a man suffering from monomania."

He gives also his opinion as to the responsibility of offenders who have monomania, or only partial insanity:

"The irresponsibility is always acquired through want of moral liberty, whenever insanity exists. No matter under what form or to what extent it shows itself."

The member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) says that Riel has shown himself to be sane on a great many occasions; that the half-breeds sent for Riel at Montana, because they believed him to be an intelligent man who would obtain the redress of their grievances. Let me answer that, Mr. Speaker, by a historical fact. In 1780 a considerable and most important riot took place in London. More than 100,000 people participated in that riot. The rioters destroyed property, and fire was raging in seven quarters of the city of London. That city was under the control of the rioters for many days, and it was only when the troops were brought that the riot was quelled and the mob dispersed. More than 450 persons were either killed or wounded. What does history show with regard to the leader of that mob, Lord George Gordon. It says he was a madman—a maniac. If then, Mr. Speaker, in the centre of civilisation, a monomaniac had such influence over an intelligent people like the English, I ask what influence would a man like Louis Riel have over the half-breeds of the North-West, among whom civilisation was not so much advanced? The third reason why I condemn the execution of Riel is because the jury recommended that unfortunate man to clemency, and because the Government did not take into account that recommendation and the other extenuating circumstances of the case. The hon. Minister of Public Works said that they had to follow the verdict as it was, that they had to allow justice to take its course because the jury had rendered a verdict of guilty against the prisoner. Can such a proposition be sustained? I will cite again the opinion of Sir William Harcourt, to whom appeals for clemency were made, and who was entrusted with the duty of reporting upon those appeals. What does he say of recommendations to clemency by juries? Does he treat them as the Minister of Public Works treats them? Speaking of the recommendation to mercy in murder cases, he says:

"In the practice of the Home Office, where a jury recommended mercy, the capital sentence was never executed."

But there is the case in which the judge does not second the recommendation by the jury, and then, what is the duty of the Secretary of State, or rather of the Minister of Justice in Canada? Sir William Harcourt adds:

"There was the case of difficulty, however, where the jury recommended mercy, and the judge did not second the recommendation, and in that case it remained for the Secretary of State to form his own judgment on the subject."

Well, to form his own judgment, what had the Minister of Justice to do? Was he to call common practitioners to examine the mental condition of Riel? Certainly not. He should have done as the Home Secretary says in his speech. He should have called men of experience, alienists, who could make a report which would commend itself to public opinion and would leave no doubt as to the sanity or insanity of Riel, but the Minister of Justice did not see fit to act thus; and if the Minister of Public Works has expressed the sentiments of the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Justice was under the impression that he had only to ascertain if any new acts of insanity had been committed since the condemnation. Is that the way the Home Secretary acts in England? No; not only does he study the history of the prisoner, but he even studies the history of his ancestors; not only does he examine into the acts which were committed by the prisoner since his conviction, but, as Sir William Harcourt, says:

"We examine his mental condition either at the time of the offence or subsequently."

That is the rule laid down by Sir William Harcourt; that is the practice followed by English Ministers. The Minister of Public Works said that we had not to consider what blood was flowing in the veins of the prisoner. That is true; but he was bound to see that British fair play was given to him, and has done so. The jurors who were called to try Riel had a difficult task to fulfil. They had to choose between impunity and a severe judgment. Mindful of public order, but at the same time friends of justice, they thought they could render a verdict which would offer security to society, but would at the same time be just to the prisoner. They said to themselves, Riel, it is true, has been the cause of the rebellion which has just taken place, and we wish, by the infliction of the penalty, to overawe the Indian and half-breed population of the North-West, but at the same time we have grave doubts of the prisoner's sanity; and rather than grant complete immunity to Riel, they chose to render a judgment against him, with a recommendation to the mercy of the Crown. The judge promised that he would take measures to send that recommendation to the proper authorities. We must be convinced, therefore, that that recommendation was sent to the Ministry at the same time as the verdict and the other papers in the trial. The Ministers knew what had happened, and they knew that they had to reproach themselves with some faults and some blunders, and if ever a Government had reason to be lenient and mild towards a prisoner, it was certainly the present Ministry. But they refused to listen to that prudent verdict of the jury. It has been said, Sir, that we members from the Province of Quebec have dealt with this matter from a national standpoint, that we asked clemency for Riel because he belonged to the same creed and nationality as we do. But, Mr. Speaker, who first recommended Riel to the clemency of the Crown? The jurors who sentenced him, and they were English and Protestant? They were not actuated by sympathy for the prisoner, but only by a sentiment of humanity and a love of justice. It should not be necessary for me to add that, for a long time past, it has not been in harmony with our custom to inflict the penalty of death for political offences. I may cite from one of the best authorities which France has produced, M. Guizot, who wrote a book on the penalty of death for criminal offences. Before citing Guizot, I might refer to the rebellion which took place in Ireland in 1848. Two bright young men, Smith O'Brien and Meagher, participated in that rebellion. They were accused of high treason, condemned, and sentenced to be hanged, beheaded and quartered. As an author says, it was never believed that this sentence would be carried into effect under the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, and he was not deceived. He knew that for political crimes it was not in harmony with the manners of the English people to inflict such a penalty, and those bright young men, for whom the plea of insanity could not be invoked, were pardoned by Queen Victoria, and the Ministers who recommended mercy thought they had fulfilled their duty also to their country and their Queen. The hon. Minister of Public Works said yesterday that he and his colleagues had to fulfil their duty to their country and to their Queen. But I think that the Ministers could have fulfilled that duty without inflicting the penalty of death on Riel, and a lesser penalty would have had certainly a better effect than the capital punishment. And what was the admirable effect of that clemency exercised by Queen Victoria in the instance I have just mentioned. Gavon Duffy, one of the chiefs of that rebellion, went to Victoria, became the First Minister of that colony, was knighted, rendered great service to his country, and was considered as one of the most useful and loyal men the British Empire had. And, Sir, what was the effect of the commutation of the sentence against Riel after the trouble of 1870 in Manitoba. Had we to regret what took place then? No. Riel had received a partial amnesty, peace and order were restored in Manitoba; and was there any disturbance there when the half-breeds in the North-West resorted to arms against the Crown? No; the half-breeds of Manitoba remained faithful, quiet and loyal. That was the effect of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. Let me cite also some British authorities on the prerogative of mercy. Blackstone says:

"Law cannot be framed on the principle of compassion to guilt, yet justice, by the Constitution of England, is bound to be administered in mercy. This is promised by the King in his coronation oath, and it is that act of his Government which is the most personal, and most entirely his own."

Speaking of the exclusion of pardons, he adds:

"The exclusion of pardons would be most dangerous. If no pardon should be granted, it must be holden what no man will seriously avow that the situation and circumstances of the offender, though they alter not the essence of the crime, ought to make no distinction in the punishment."

So Blackstone says clearly that the Crown is obliged to take into account the situation and the circumstances of the offender; and in no case were there circumstances more fit to form the basis of a demand for clemency in favor of Riel, than the circumstances which accompanied the life of that man. Now I may cite Montesquieu in his work "The Spirit of Laws":

"Mankind must not be governed with too much severity; we ought to make a prudent use of the means which nature has given us to conduct them. If we enquire into the causes of all human corruptions, we shall find they proceed from the impunity of criminals and not from the moderation of punishment. Let us follow nature, who has given shame to man for his scourge, and let the heaviest part of the punishment be the infamy attending it."

Now, to conclude my remarks, I may cite what Guizot says on the punishment of criminal offences:

"When one looks back into history, when one asks an explanation for all the blood which has been shed on the political scaffold, it is very seldom that the society of by-gone days will stand up and say: That blood was spilled for my sake. Most always Governments alone will appear to answer for these executions; their passions, their faults, their interests only have guided them; and after the unfortunates who were executed society itself has suffered from them. I know that the prospect of this future responsibility does not much disturb the power, less because the power is wicked, but because it is as frivolous as men are; but we have at least acquired that science from it; that the necessities of the power which kills, often false as to that power, are most always false as regards society, and that if, to defend itself it has been obliged to kill, it is because it has been forced to defend itself because he has exacted that which was convenient to itself only."

Those words apply admirably to the event that is now engaging the attention of the House. If a political scaffold has been erected at Regina, it is because the Ministers adopted a policy which suited their purposes, and not those of society? History will say hereafter it was the mismanagement of affairs by the Government which caused Riel to ascend that scaffold; it will repeat that there were some jurors, known as not belonging to the same creed and nationality as the prisoner, who invoked clemency in his behalf, because they knew there were some circumstances which should have hindered the Ministers from inflicting the death penalty. History will tell also, Mr. Speaker, that the whole Province of Quebec was at the feet of the Ministers asking for mercy in favor of Riel, and that there were some men here in Canada who were asking for the head of that man for a fault which had been pardoned before. History will tell also, that the blood of Riel was shed to please a fraction of a political party, and because that man, in his insanity and madness, thought he could obtain the redress of grievances from which his countrymen suffered.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I desire to say a few words on this very important matter which is now engaging the attention of the House. I am sure that any man who possesses a heart must feel pity for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. They have suffered agony and suspense during the last 10 or 12 months. They have been estimating how they could climb into power on the calamities which have taken place; they have been trying to see what advantage could be taken of the unfortunate circumstances in the North-West in order to attain to power in this country; but they appear to be as far from success to-day as they were twelve months ago. We can imagine the mental anxiety of the leader of the Opposition; we can imagine how he has been badgered by his supporters and by the newspapers that support him, as to the position and the line they should take in this matter in regard to the fate of Riel. We can imagine the gladness with which he escaped to the Old Country in order to get away from the importunities of gas inspectors and other gentlemen here who are interested in this matter. We have also a feeling of sympathy, I think, for that hon. gentleman when he returned to this country and found his party disunited on this great question. When he made that great speech of his at London in the early part of this year, when he so adroitly stood upon the fence, giving first a crumb of comfort to one side and then to the other, we can imagine his feelings. It is on record that Brother John Gardner of the Lime Kiln Club, hearing that Brother Penstock Jones had gone on the fence, said it reminded him that there was once a turkey sitting on a fence; first he looked on one side and then on the other side; he scratched his ear with his toe, and then gave a look on this side and then gave a look on that, and he then dropped down on the side on which there was most corn. I think the leader of the Opposition, though he is now sitting on the fence, will drop down on the side on which he thinks there is most corn for his party. I hold in my hand some telegrams which are said to have passed between two gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, one being in London, England, and the other in Toronto:

"Edgar, Toronto:

"Explain secretly as possible that I was not in earnest—that I was only throwing out a bait to catch the Orange vote.

"BLAKE."

"Blake, London:

"I'll see how that explanation will work; but the circumstance, I fear, will prove a barrier to my conducting the negotiations successfully.

"EDGAR."

"Edgar, Toronto:

"Lose no time. You know as well as I do that unless we gain an advantage of this crisis we are done for, as I fear our prospects in the country are brightening. We must make a bold stroke now. Never mind the question of consistency. If we are ever going into office, it can only be by taking advantage of Tory troubles.

"BLAKE."

"Blake, London:

"All right. I'll leave at once. I have arranged to meet Mercier, Laurier and our leading men at Stephen's house to arrange preliminaries.

"EDGAR."

"Edgar, Toronto:

"So far, satisfactory. Cable results soon as possible.

"BLAKE."

"LONDON, November 21.

"Edgar, Montreal:

"Have they considered consequences of organising a purely National Party? Point out that it would never work, and that it would only result in strengthening Tories. Warn them of their folly, and urge an alliance with us at any cost. Although we have declared that Macdonald is under the heel of Quebec and the Frenchmen, let it be understood that, if we can only succeed in defeating the Government, we will go to any length to meet their demands. Make a bold stroke.

"BLAKE."

"MONTREAL, November 21.

"Blake, London:

"I have pointed out to Mercier and Laurier that the proposed exclusively French National Party is impracticable, and am now playing my cards in our interest. Mercier says he can pull the wool over the eyes of seceding Tories, and will soon get them into a trap. Big meeting on Sunday.

"EDGAR."

I think that pretty fairly defines the position of hon. gentlemen opposite. They were prepared to go to any lengths to attain to power. This is in marked contrast to the conduct of the leader of the Opposition in 1871, when the Scott murder question was up for consideration. Then the leader of the Opposition used his great eloquence and his great power of words to condemn that act, and he would give a reward of $5,000 and do everything that was necessary at that time, without any papers being brought down, without any further information, with the knowledge he had through the press; but to-day we have volumes of papers, stacks of evidence, everything that is required, and up to this time those hon. gentlemen have been dumb, they have not explained their position, they have not opened their mouths in this House of Commons to say what they are going to do about it. I have in my hand a little portion of an address delivered to the electors of Monck, on the 8th March, 1871, by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar):

"The absence of an enlarged patriotic feeling and the fear of a party defeat, led the Government to thwart the noble efforts of Mr. Blake to vindicate the honor of our country by bringing the rebellious murderers of Scott to justice."

That gentleman's mouth is dumb now. He has not anything to say about the rebellious murderers of Scott and of the hundreds of others who have since been murdered by the same persons. The Globe is as much at sea as those hon. gentlemen. On the 21st November, it said that Riel represented a cause. What was the cause he represented? Was it the cause of freedom, was it the cause of patriotism, or was it the cause of justice? No; it was the cause of treason, it was the cause of rebellion, and it was the cause of murder. These are the causes that Riel represented on both those occasions, and nothing else. What were the results flowing from it? Death to hundreds of our citizens, devastation throughout a large portion of the North-West, leading to an indignation and to what may be a war of races. But these gentlemen are willing that all these calamities should overtake this country if they can only attain to power. These gentlemen, who have been clamoring for the last 20 or 30 years about French domination, about Lower Canada domination, and saying that this Dominion is ruled by the French Canadians, what will they say now? Why, these gentlemen are willing and anxious now to make alliance with these very persons whom they claim were ruining this country. They are not only anxious to do so, but they are willing to condone the punishment of Louis Riel if they can thereby procure this alliance. At a meeting held in Montreal, the following resolutions were passed:—

"That the execution of Louis Riel is an outrage to justice and humanity, and an outrage to our nationality, and that the Ministers of Parliament and the French Canadian journalists who are responsible for this execution, are deserving of public reprobation.

"That the French Canadian Ministers and those who will endeavor to justify their conduct, be looked upon as traitors, and that to prevent the renewal of such a treachery, the nation never will forgive the crime they have rendered themselves guilty of.

"That Louis Riel be placed among the political martyrs of the French Canadian nationality."

What does the Globe say to that? It says:

"The people of Ontario should recognise this truth, that nothing but bare justice is demanded by the voice of their French Canadian countrymen."

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this sentiment will not meet with the approval of the majority of the people of this country. I would like to see these hon. gentlemen openly approving of this sentiment when they go back to their constituents in Ontario and other Provinces of this Dominion. The London Advertiser, not to be outdone by the Globe in approving this alliance, says:

"The first thing that the Reformers of Ontario will insist upon from 'their new allies,' is that they will join them in repealing the Franchise Act."

He is willing to get into power by their means if they will help him repeal the Franchise Act. I now come to another matter. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), in a very mild way—he did not give it as his own authority, though he spoke very vehemently and violently in the Province of Quebec, though he stated certain things in his newspaper, or the newspaper which he controls, which he disavows now, he comes to this House and throws the blame upon some other paper—spoke of the position of the Orange body in regard to the Orange question. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will say this, that the position of the Orangemen of Canada on the question of hanging Riel, has been a dignified and a patriotic one. They have done nothing which was not the bounden duty and the right of every Canadian citizen to do. I may say that in the Dominion of Canada, of the various kinds of Orange lodges, there are about 2,000, and perhaps six—I believe I am right in saying not more than six—have ever brought up the matter for consideration. The hon. member for Bellechasse stated last night that a petition was sent to the Government by the Orange lodges, demanding the head of Riel. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I am in a position to give that a flat denial, a square contradiction.

Mr. AMYOT. I quoted from the paper of the Minister of Public Works. I did not say it myself.

Mr. WALLACE (York). The hon. member for Bellechase stated, in my hearing, that petitions were sent in—in the hearing of members of this House.

Mr. COOK. The Mail said it.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I think I am correct in stating in this House that not a petition from an Orange body was sent to the Government asking that Riel should be hanged, or by any member that I am aware of. The position taken by the Orange body was that taken by the Grand Lodge of British North America, which is as much representative of Orange bodies as those gentlemen on the other side of the House are representatives of the Reformers of Canada. They are an elective council; they represent the feelings of the Orange body, and the resolution they passed was as follows:—

“Resolved, That this Grand Lodge, in annual session assembled, takes this, the earliest opportunity afforded, to express its admiration of the loyal, patriotic spirit displayed by the members of the volunteer force, shown as well by the alacrity with which they responded to the call to arms, as by the bravery displayed on the field of battle, and the hardships endured without a murmur; it expresses its deepest sympathy with the relatives of those who have fallen in the fight, or whose lives have been sacrificed by the insurrection in the North-West, as well as with those who are now suffering from wounds received in action; it expresses the hope that the arch-rebel Riel will be captured.”

This was in June; the rebellion was not then suppressed—

“That the rebellion will be speedily suppressed, and that such steps will be taken by the proper authority as will avenge the foul murders already committed and preclude the possibility of their recurrence.”

That is the official utterance of the Orange organisation. Those gentlemen have not quoted it, because it did not suit their purpose. I may state that the speech that the hon. gentlemen have repeated in this House, and which they published in their papers, and which was delivered in Toronto on the 7th November, showing that the Orangemen were clamoring before the Government for his blood, was not published, and was not in print in any newspaper, until the 19th November, three days after the execution of Riel. It was not published in the Sentinel until the week following so that it could have had no influence whatever upon the event as indicating any Orange pressure upon the Government in favor of the execution of Riel. I may say, further, that that speech was made by a gentleman who was then an active opponent of the present Government, and who went up to the county of Kent to oppose the member for Kent in the bye-election in 1884. I may state, Mr. Speaker, that the Sentinel, which has been frequently alluded to as the official organ of the Orange body, is a journal that, during the whole of the past year, in its editorial utterances, will bear criticism, and its articles will compare favorably with those of the Globe or any other newspaper on the Opposition side of the House, for the moderation of its tone, and for the fairness with which it has discussed the whole Riel question. The Sentinel is edited by Mr. Edward Clarke, who is a credit to this country, a gentleman of intelligence and ability, whose utterances are entitled to consideration, and do receive the commendation of a great portion of the people of this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, the burden of the efforts which have been made in this House, so far, have been to rest the case of Louis Riel on his supposed insanity. It is said that Riel was a monomaniac. Eminent medical authorities lay it down that a monomaniac commits his crimes alone; and if Riel had committed his crime without the assistance of any one, if he had done his work in secret, if he had not combined with many others, it might be argued that he was a monomaniac, and therefore worthy of clemency. It was laid down in Taylor's Medical Jurisprudence, which says:

“The sane murderer has generally accomplices in vice or crime—the homicidal monomaniac has not. . . . It is a fact so far in favor of homicidal insanity that the insane never have accomplices in the acts which they perpetrate. These criteria can hardly be described as medical; they are circumstances upon which a non-professional man may form just as safe a judgment as one who has made insanity a special study.”

This has been laid down by an eminent medical authority, and it applies very clearly to the case of Riel. We find that Riel did not do his work alone. He massed troops, used inducements to get the Indians to join the half-breeds, and did all the acts that a sane man would do. And if further evidence were needed, it is furnished by the three medical gentlemen who were sent to Regina to examine him, and who, after examining his case carefully, reported that he was responsible for his acts. I will read extracts from the opinions of those medical men. Dr. Jukes says:

“I therefore record my opinion that, with the reservation above made, Riel is a sane, clear-headed and accountable being, and responsible for his actions before God and man.”

Dr. Valade says:

“I have come to the conclusion that he suffers under hallucination on political and religious subjects, but on other points I believe him to be quite sensible and can distinguish right from wrong.”

We have still further the opinion of Dr. Lavell:

“I am of the opinion that the said Louis Riel, although holding and expressing foolish and peculiar views as to religion and general government, is an accountable being and capable of distinguishing right from wrong.”

So we have sufficient evidence. We have the evidence of the jury before whom the question of insanity came up, and they gave as their verdict that he was sane; they returned a verdict of guilty of the crime for which he was charged, adding a recommendation of mercy. But we know that the verdict of a jury in such a case is a verdict complete in itself, and a recommendation to mercy may either be acted upon or not. We will take into consideration what kind of a man it was for whom some hon. members clamored so loudly for mercy, and who are now raising such a row because mercy was not extended to him. If we look at that man's whole career from the time he first came into public notice, we shall not find a good trait in his character. His whole course, from his first public appearance down to his last days, was one which should not commend him as an object of mercy. What do we find? I hold in my hand a letter from the Rev. George Young, an eminent missionary of the Methodist Church of Canada, who was in Winnipeg during 1870, and was an eye-witness of the events that then took place. Mr. Young states, with respect to the conduct of Riel in connection with the murder of Scott:

“And here I must aver, and with special emphasis, that in each instance he (Scott) was most treacherously dealt with. He was not bearing arms in either instance. In the first he went from the village of Winnipeg to Fort Garry, bearing a flag of truce, to ask Riel to permit certain ladies (then residing in the building belonging to Dr. Schultz, parts of which were occupied by some forty or fifty Canadians and a few English half-breeds, completely surrounded by Riel's rebel soldiers) to retire to a place of safety. Mr. Scott was not in those buildings at the time of their being thus surrounded, but taking in the situation of the helpless and terror-stricken ones, he bravely went, I think with another, in their interests, to Riel and was cruelly thrust into close imprisonment. Such were the circumstances associated with and which connected Riel with his first arrest. Taking in the situation, Scott went to see Riel, and when he got there he was imprisoned. He hoped that Riel would fulfil his promises and liberate the prisoners.”

Did he do so? They were suffering greatly from the treatment they had received—

“But as no release took place, and they were suffering greatly from the treatment they had received, and the families of some of them were in want, a party of their neighbors and friends organised for the purpose of joining with other loyalists, at headingly and Kildonan, in order to persuade Riel to fulfil his oft-repeated promise of liberation. Scott was one of this party. As a result of various messages to and fro, Riel pledged himself that if they would disband and return quietly to their homes, the prisoners should be released forthwith.”

Did Riel do so? Finding they were disbanded and powerless, he cruelly deceived them. As soon as they entered the enclosure of the fort the gates were closed. They were sent to prison, and all their property confiscated—

“Thus treacherously was poor Scott arrested the second time, and a second term—his last—of imprisonment commenced.”

I will read another portion of Mr. Young's letter:

“He was brought before a council of war on Thursday evening, 3rd March, Riel acting as accuser and judge. The trial was conducted in a language unknown to him, and when Riel passed sentence upon him, to be shot at noon the next day, he demurred, on the ground that he had had no fair trial, and had done nothing to deserve death.”

Mr. Young in vain pleaded for the life of Scott, and asked at least for a few days' delay, in order that Scott might prepare himself for death. He asked him what crime he had committed to cause him to be put to death by Riel—because it was actually done by Riel, not by the others, who were willing to have mercy extended. The only reply he received was: “That he was a very bad man, and deserved to die, and must die.” The real reason Riel stated to Mr. Young when he said:

“I must make an example of one or more of these men in order to bring these Canadians to terms, and to impress Canada that we are in earnest, and that this is not, as the Globe has called it, a tempest in a teapot. I will take the worst first, and then the next, if the one is not enough, and one after another as long as necessary.”

We all know what was the result. Riel took Scott and put him to a cruel and ignoble death. Mr. Young says:

“While we were engaged in earnest prayer, in which he joined most fervently, the armed men sent by Riel came, and, interrupting us, proceeded to blindfold and pinion the arms of their victim. They granted my request for a few moments delay, during which Riel came in a seeming rage, vociferously scolding all concerned for the delay, and ordering us to move forward at once to the place appointed for the murder. On the way there I implored O'Donohue and Goulet, the captain of the firing party, to spare his life one day more, as it was a dreadful thing to send a soul so hurriedly into eternity; but all was in vain. At the word of command six men fired, and Thomas Scott fell forward, as he knelt in the snow, pierced by at least three bullets, and his life-blood poured out until the snow was saturated with it for many feet around the spot.”

Mr. Young states further on:

“Thomas Scott died as a penitent one, trusting in the one and only Saviour of mankind. After the cruel and bloody deed was perpetrated I asked Riel for his body, that I might give it a Christian burial, a request which he at first acceded to, but in a few minutes he changed his mind and refused it. I said that it would afford his aged mother a little comfort, could I write her that his body was properly buried in the Presbyterian cemetery; but what was that to him? He still refused. Parties who affirm that they were in a position to know declared soon after the murder that the poor man suffered for long hours in his box-like coffin, and that his voice was heard in prayer, and in calling on Riel to either take him out or kill him at once.”

This is the public record of the man whom we are asked to-day to call a martyr. What do we find further? During the time he was out of Canada his conduct was of the most disgraceful character. He went to Montana, became an outlaw there and then returned to Canada and stirred up this rebellion. I have still further evidence of the character of this man who will be hereafter called a martyr—the evidence of Rev. Father Fourmond, a Catholic missionary at Batoche, in a letter written, after Batoche was captured, to Rev. Father Grandin, of Laval, Quebec:

“I must protest against the report that I have been killed. I am still in the land of the living, though more than once of late the angel of death has brushed closely past me. We have had not only war and rebellion, but apostasy from the Christian faith, treason, murder, pillage, and fire—unchained by an Anti-Christ in the person of Riel, against whose influence over our unhappy people we have fought at the peril of our lives.”

This is the evidence of one who would be disposed to be the friend of Riel and look on his conduct in the most favorable light, if there was any favorable light to it:

“Great God! what a scheming and unprincipled fellow he is! He tells the Meus that God sent him to them, and that his angels visit him constantly. An angel of darkness, he has posed as an angel of light—a veritable wolf in sheep's clothing come to devour this little flock! He has committed to paper rules based on his diabolical imposture, writing them down in his own blood; and in accordance with these rules he refuses to eat beef, etc. He is a revolutionist of the worst class, wanting to destroy everything. It would take a book to tell you of all the wicked folly of this man. But, as the horrible results of his plan, the blood of whites and half-breeds has been spilled, whilst my dear and zealous brothers at Frog Lake have been massacred under his orders.”

An hon. MEMBER. That is the man they stand up for.

Mr. WALLACE (York):

“Rev. Father Moulin, the director of the mission here, has been seriously wounded, and Father Legoff owed his life only to the devotion of one of our people who seized the hands of a would-be assassin.”

I do not think there is any man in this country who desired the blood of Riel as an act of vengeance. We have to look at the consequences if Riel had been pardoned. What would have been the consequence in the North-West? After our brave volunteers had gone from every part of the Dominion of Canada to brave the storms and dangers and vicissitudes of a warlike campaign and put down rebellion in that great North-West, if the life of Riel had been spared it would have been impossible to have hanged or otherwise punished any of his dupes. It would have been impossible to punish those Indians who were incited to massacre white men. If Riel had been granted a complete amnesty—because I suppose that is what it means—it would have been impossible to punish any of those who were under him, and whom he incited to commit those crimes; and if that had been the case it would be impossible for any white man to live in the North-West. The people of Ontario and the other Provinces have their friends and relations living all through that great country. If the Government had interposed to save his life and prevent the punishment of those Indians who committed those awful crimes, it would be impossible for them to remain in that country. Law and order would be abolished, and it would be the inevitable, the necessary, and the natural result that those living in that country would have abandoned it, and the Indians and half-breeds would be the only people living there. Are the people of Canada prepared to do that, after all the sacrifices they have made to open up this magnificent country, after spending millions of money upon it?—a country the most fertile on the globe, to be peopled years hence by millions of enterprising settlers. I say Canada would not be true to itself, the Government of Canada would not be doing its duty if they had failed to preserve order in that country and establish the law in every part of it, thus giving it to be understood that the Government of Canada is going to maintain the supremacy of law and order in every portion of this Dominion.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. WALLACE (York). When you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was stating what I considered would be the disastrous consequences to this country if the law had not been permitted to take its course in the case of Louis Riel, in view of the events that occurred. Had he not been executed, it would be impossible to punish those who were guilty of similar crimes; impossible to punish the Indians of the North-West who had murdered priests and women, and laid the country waste in every direction. In saying this I take it for granted that if Riel had not been hanged he would have been pardoned outright, because I do not think the Government would have been wise to go through the farce of putting him in prison, and having the country kept in a continual state of turmoil for his release afterwards. I think the only course was either to hang him or to give him a full and free pardon. I am of opinion, and I think the great majority of the people of this country are of opinion, that the Government did a wise thing when they refused to pardon Riel for his many and heinous crimes. I am exceedingly sorry that many gentlemen who have been the opponents of the present Government on other occasions, but who agree with the Government on this question, have not had the manliness and straightforward honesty to come out and declare publicly what they know they feel, that the Government have done a righteous act in refusing to pardon Riel. With reference to what I said about Orangemen and the false charge that the hanging of Riel was in obedience to an Orange cry for vengeance, I may say what I know, and what every hon. gentleman in this House knows, that there is no class of men in this country more tolerant of the rights of others than the Orangemen of Canada. They demand rights and privileges themselves which every British subject should enjoy, but they have at all times and in all places been willing and anxious to concede those rights to others which they wish to enjoy themselves. In this case, as the records prove, I defy hon. gentlemen to point to one petition presented by an Orange lodge asking for the execution of Riel. Although there are 2,000 Orange lodges besides other Orange organisations in this country, there have not been more than six lodges who have passed any resolutions whatever, and the parliament of the Orange organisation of this country, the Grand Lodge of British America, passed a resolution which I think will commend itself to all reasonable men inside this House or out of it. It has been said in this House and through the country, and in the Province of Quebec particularly, that Riel had not a fair trial, but let us compare the fairness of his trial and the fact that every possible privilege was granted to him with the fact that he cruelly denied these privileges to poor Scott in 1870. Let us consider that poor Scott had no trial whatever, as the public records prove; that is, that he was not present at any trial. That he was condemned in his absence at 9 o'clock at night to be put to death at 8 o'clock in the morning; that it was only through the most strenuous exertions of the Rev. Mr. Young that his execution was postponed until 12 o'clock noon, and was then carried out. Let us also remember that Lepine, Nolin and other members of Riel's council wished to have him put fairly on his trial and given an opportunity of meeting his accusers and questioning those who gave evidence against him, but everything of that kind was denied him. And now we find that this man, who refused the smallest act of mercy to poor Scott, was given a fair trial by a jury of his fellow-countrymen, that he was allowed every consideration during that trial, that it was postponed for ten days to enable him to summon witnesses in his defence. After all that, the jury found him guilty and he was sentenced to death. We also find that the fullest and amplest liberty was given to his counsel to appeal his case to the court of Manitoba; that after that court had decided against him and his legal advisers wished to appeal the case still further, the sentence upon him was postponed in order to enable his case to be tried by the highest court in the British Empire; that it was so appealed, and that the validity of the trial and the constitutionality of the court were confirmed in every instance. I remember reading a very eloquent defence of the Government during the past summer by the hon. member for Jacques

Cartier (Mr. Girouard), in an address to his constituents. After giving an able review of the facts of the Riel affair, he stated that there were two matters that would come up, and that if these two matters were decided satisfactorily, he and his compatriots from the Province of Quebec would be compelled to acknowledge the reasonableness of the trial and to allow the judgment of the court to take its course. Those two matters were, first, as to Riel's sanity, and next, as to the constitutionality of the court and the trial. Now, all the evidence, without any exception, proves that Riel was sane,—that he was responsible before his trial, when inciting the Indians to rebellion and provoking the half-breed insurrection, as well as after his trial, to the time of his death. The evidence of every one of the doctors proves that, and if any further proof were necessary, it is found in the letters and papers written by Riel, giving a history of his life after he found that he was not to receive any clemency. Now, with regard to the motion before the Chair, the Government have wisely, I think, arranged it so that the motion shall come squarely before the House. That is the issue before the country—there is no use of burking it—whether Riel should or should not have been hanged. I myself feel a certain amount of sympathy for the leader of the Opposition. I think the Government might have gratified his inordinate vanity and have allowed him to put in an amendment of six or eight pages to obscure his ideas and the ideas of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House on this question. But he cannot obscure the opinion of the people of this country. No matter how you may attempt to obscure it by words, the issue is what is stated in a few words in that resolution, whether Riel should have been hanged or set at liberty. The Opposition will probably yet have an opportunity of declaring their opinions on this question. On every sectional question that has come before this Parliament, on every question on which there has been an opportunity of setting one portion of the people against another, we find the Reform party of Canada acting the part of organised hypocrisy. We find them willing to take advantage of everything that would lead to difficulty and confusion in the government of this country; we find them unscrupulous in regard to the means they employ; we find them regardless of their country's honor, regardless of the welfare of the people, and regardless of that brotherly love which should characterise the citizens of our common country; and we find them lacking in that patriotism which we all consider one of the highest virtues. I noticed the actions of hon. gentlemen opposite last evening when the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) sat down. They applauded the hon. gentleman because they were in sympathy with the sentiments he uttered; but I venture to predict that they will vote against him, because of their terror of the electorate of Ontario. I am glad this question has come before the House, and I hope it will be fully discussed, and that a verdict will be given upon it in accordance with the feelings and sentiments of the people of this country. I cannot close without referring to a book which I hold in my hand a book, "The Gibbet of Regina," which has not been got up with any patriotic intention, but with an infamous design, to stir up hostile feelings amongst the different races in Canada, and to set one portion of the people of Canada against the other—a book which I have no doubt the hon. gentlemen opposite are quite willing to take advantage of for their own benefit. On one page of it is a picture of "the martyr and his twelve assassins," as it calls them, and it speaks of "Louis Riel, the martyr, patriot and hero." I do not think that it is in accordance with the sentiments of the majority of the people of this country. The people of this country do not believe that he is a martyr, but that he suffered the just penalty of his crime; he never was a patriot; and he never had the material in him to make a hero. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and this House for the kind consideration with which you have listened to my remarks.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I did not propose to follow the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. The hon. gentleman states, that we on this side of the House, applauded lustily the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). I suppose there is no sin, although you may not agree with everything a man may say, in expressing your approval, when he has made an able and eloquent speech. The hon. gentleman ventures upon the prediction that those of us who applauded the powerful oration of the hon. member for Bellechasse will be found voting against him when the time comes to vote. I do not know what other hon. gentlemen may do. I am responsible, and alone responsible, for the course I intend to take in that respect; all I can say, as respects myself, that the hon. gentleman is a false prophet. Now, I imagined all along that the conduct of the Government would be justified, not by the crime that Riel was indicted for at Regina, but because Riel committed other crimes, and we have had it stated by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Wallace), that if Riel had not been punished for the many crimes he had committed we could not punish anybody else. I believed all along, and to-night I believe more thoroughly than ever, that Louis Riel was hanged, not so much for the part he took in the North-West insurrection, as to avenge the blood of Brother Thomas Scott—a thing that took place 15 years ago, and which was condoned by the First Minister himself when he transmitted a large sum of public money to be handed Riel, in order that this red-handed murderer, as hon. gentlemen see fit to call him, might escape the vengeance of the law, when the blood-hounds of the law were on his track. I imagined all along, and I was not mistaken, that the Government would be justified, not simply because Riel offended the law in the North-West, but because he had a part in what is called the murder of Thomas Scott; and the hon. Minister of Public Works referred to that yesterday evening. Does the hon. Minister not know that he, in his sworn testimony in 1874, before a committee of this House, he declared that the Government of which he was a member had promised an amnesty to Riel? Does he not know that his own political chief, by whom he has stood for many long years, pledged the faith of the Crown that this red-handed murderer would escape the punishment of his crimes, because the Conservative Government of Canada saw fit to agree to extend to him the royal clemency? This is a grave and serious question we are called on to discuss. It is not to be discussed by definitions of monomania; it is not to be discussed by the production of bogus telegrams prepared in the Mail office and read in the House as genuine documents; it is not to be discussed in any light or trivial manner. It is a grave and serious question, because it implies that in the exercise of the Executive power the Government ordered the execution of a man without sufficient justification. I may say that, at the very outset of this discussion, I, like others, was surrounded with and embarrassed by many difficulties. We are called on to pronounce upon the administration of criminal justice in this country by the constituted authorities—a thing that I admit ought not to be lightly done, and which cannot be justified except in cases of the first importance and where the peace and the well-being of the country demand it at the hands of Parliament. It cannot be denied that such a course has been on more than one occasion taken in the Imperial Parliament. The conduct of grand jurors, the conduct of petit jurors, the conduct of judges, and the conduct of criminal prosecutors, have all undergone discussion, and have been made the subject of enquiry in the Imperial Parliament. Here we are called upon to pronounce on the improper withholding by the responsible advisers of the Crown of the royal prerogative of mercy on an occasion in which it is contended the exercise of that prerogative ought not to have been withheld; and we are called upon to discuss this important question while a mass of papers necessary to the clear understanding of the case is withheld by this Government, who are by this very motion incriminated. The papers that were found at Batoche, the papers in the pigeon-holes of the Department of the Interior, the papers which Riel's counsel declared at the trial to be essential to the proper preparation of their defence, the reasons and the arguments why the judge, in the exercise of his power, declined to grant the application made to him by Louis Riel's counsel, asking a postponement of the trial for one month, the charge which the judge delivered to the jury—all these papers are withheld by the Government from the consideration of Parliament and of the people. Not only that, but Parliament is indecently forced into this discussion—a discussion which involves the question of the misconduct, the mal-administration, the criminal neglect of this Government in dealing with the grievances and complaints of the half-breeds in the North-West Territories; a discussion which involves the arraignment of this Government before their peers, before the people, for high crimes and high misdemeanors; a discussion which involves the existence of this Government even in this Parliament, and involves their ultimate defeat, so sure as to-morrow's sun will shine, when they appear before the people. This discussion involves the important question: Who is responsible for the rebellion in the North-West? Who caused that rebellion? Who provoked it? Who were the authors of it, and who are responsible for the blood that was shed, the lives that were lost, and the ruin and desolation scattered among the half-breed homes in the North-West? And yet these hon. gentlemen, who contend that this question should be discussed honestly and fairly, withhold from Parliament documents which, I contend, would bring home the guilt to their very doors. The hon. Minister of Public Works said last evening that the Government had nothing to conceal, that they wished every fact known to them should be known to Parliament and to the people, that they wished to meet their accusers face to face on the floor of Parliament, where their accusers could get their answer, that they had been traduced and abused and vilified and slandered, but that now, thank God, they had their accusers face to face, and were prepared to discuss the question and stand or fall by the result. But how does the hon. gentleman propose the discussion shall take place? It appears, when we come to discuss the question, that although he told us the Government had nothing to conceal, they have everything to conceal. They disclose nothing, they suppress the evidence of their own criminality, and keep it carefully concealed in the pigeon-holes of the Department. Meeting us face to face, meeting their accusers, their own former friends and colleagues in Parliament, face to face, why the Minister of Public Works knows, and nobody knows it better, that they have handicapped us in this contest, that they have handicapped us in the race from the beginning to the end, and that they are playing now, as they have always played, with loaded dice. The evidence of their misconduct and of their criminality they take care to keep in the pigeon-holes of the Department. And they do more than this. These gallant and chivalrous gentlemen, these gallant and chivalrous French gentlemen who did everything above board, who were willing that their accusers should meet them face to face and that there should be no inequality, that each party should be upon a footing of perfect equality—what do they do? Sir, the Minister who is responsible for this discussion, as the very first thing he does, moves the previous question to his own motion, a motion submitted to Parliament by an unswerving and devoted friend of the Government, a motion prepared in the interest of the Government, and a motion to which the hon. gentleman has seen fit to move the previous question to cut off all other amendments, to prevent us on this side of the House, in the face of Parliament and in the face of the people of this country, from arraigning, by a substantive resolution in amendment, the misconduct, the criminal neglect, the cruel neglect of this Administration in respect to the claims of the half-breeds in the North-West Territories. We heard something of that from the member for Provencher (Mr. Royal). He admitted that the Government were wrong, that they had not exactly done their duty, but if this Government were wrong their predecessors, he contended, were wrong also, and therefore this Government's offences should be condoned. Was any such extraordinary argument as that ever heard? Assuming, for the sake of argument, though I deny that it was the case, though I challenge the proof, though I defy hon. gentlemen to establish by the records, that my hon. friends who then wielded the destinies of the country did not pay that attention to the claims of the half-breeds at that time which those claims demanded,—still, assuming that to be true for the sake of argument, is that any justification for the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches having for seven long years resisted the earnest prayers and appeals and the earnest entreaties of the half-breeds of the North-West Territories? Is that any reason why they should resist the petitions, the remonstrances, the prayers and the appeals of the right reverend the dignitaries of the Roman Catholic and the Anglican churches in the North-West Territories? Is that any reason why they should resist the prayers and the supplications of the missionaries, who have devoted their earnest lives in self-sacrifice on the altar of their God and their country? Is that any reason why these gentlemen should escape the punishment which they deserve at the hands of an indignant people, because, forsooth, my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Mills) might not have dealt with the claims of the half-breeds with as much promptitude as he ought? As I have said, I challenge hon. gentlemen to point to the time or the place or the instance in which my hon. friend so neglected the discharge of his important duty; but, if he was wrong, are not hon. gentlemen opposite trebly wrong in neglecting these claims? Are they not wrong, further, not only for being the cause of this rebellion, but for not taking the proper steps at the proper time to suppress it? They had warning after warning, they had entreaty after entreaty from their own officials in the North-West Territories; they were told that Louis Riel was in the North-West; they were told by their own officials that the half-breeds were agitating, that there were serious complaints; they were warned that there were breakers ahead; but they slumbered until the thunders of the battle awoke them from their slumbers, and then they sent up their force.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh!

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I understand hon. gentlemen of the other side of the House as well as any other member of Parliament does. I know that, when you touch a raw point, they always yell, and I know that, when I touch the truth, I may expect to hear such observations from hon. gentlemen on the other side. I have said that we are encountering great difficulties in the discussion of this question, in the absence of the papers which the Government were bound to bring down, which it was their duty to bring down, and which they admitted their liability to Parliament to bring down by allowing the motions at the early part of the Session to pass; and yet there they are, indifferent, stolid, careless—as they were to the claims of the half-breeds—as to the result, so long as they can maintain themselves in place and power upon the Treasury benches. With these difficulties staring me in the face, I do not propose to discuss at any length the grievances and wrongs of the half-breeds, the misconduct of the Administration, the neglect of the Administration in that respect, the cause why Louis Riel appeared on the scene, or the causes of the rebellion, but I shall limit my observations to certain questions which are suggested by the report which has been brought down, imperfect, defective and all as that report is. I propose, by means of that report and by one or two other facts which I shall lay before the House, to justify the vote I am about to give. I propose to prove from this report that the evidence is strained and the law entirely misread in order to secure a conviction and in order to justify the execution of Louis Riel. I propose to prove, by the sworn testimony submitted at the trial and by the facts which I shall submit to Parliament, that Louis Riel was executed not to vindicate the law, not to maintain the majesty of the law, but I propose to prove that Louis Riel was executed contrary to law, contrary to the plainest principles of British law and British justice, and in obedience to a power that is not responsible to Parliament. Now, I am not going to argue, nor do I propose to discuss the constitutionality of the court which tried Louis Riel. That has passed beyond the region of discussion. Hon. gentlemen, and among others the Minister of Public Works, who ought to have known better, because he was at one time in the practice of the profession and a prominent lawyer, should know that the judgment of the Supreme Court of the realm, which he read to the House, had nothing to do with this discussion. There was no discussion before the Supreme Court of the realm as to the justice of this verdict or of this sentence. The only question which the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had to decide was the question whether or not the court was constitutional. As the Judicial Committee having so decided, I do not propose to discuss that question. I propose, however, to discuss the question of the fairness of Louis Riel's trial, and I say, at the outset, that in my humble judgment, after giving this matter the most careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the scantiest possible measure of justice was meted out to Louis Riel in the trial of that case. And I go beyond that—it was not the kind of justice which we are accustomed to in the administration of the criminal law in the Province of Ontario or in the British Empire. It is a principle well recognised in the administration of criminal justice, and especially in cases of capital felony, that a prisoner shall have fair play, that he shall have a fair trial, and that, if his counsel makes an application to postpone the trial, ample time shall be given to him to prepare for his trial, and that no obstacles shall be thrown in the way of a full and a free and a fair investigation of every fact that tends to build up the defence of the prisoner. Now, Sir, let us look at this case for a moment. I am appealing, I hope, to common-sense men, many of whom are laymen and some of whom are lawyers. The information in this case was laid in the city of Hamilton by an ex-chief of police, on the 6th of July, 1885. The trial commenced at Regina on the 20th day of the same month, and up to that moment Riel did not know the nature of the charge preferred against him, and his counsel were not made aware of the nature of the charge nor of the line of action that the Crown was supposed to take with reference to those charges. We must recollect, Sir, this fact, that in trials in the North-West Territories there are no grand juries. This trial took place without the safeguards and without the protection that surround a preliminary investigation before a justice of the peace. There was no investigation before a grand jury, and there was no bill of indictment. Upon the evidence and the sworn information of Mr. Stewart, Louis Riel was placed upon his trial. There was nothing to inform him, or to inform his counsel, of the nature of those charges until the information was laid. We know that in the public press it was discussed before the trial, what shape or form the indictment should assume—whether he should be tried for high treason, or whether he should be tried for murder. The 20th July was consumed in discussing preliminary questions—a demurrer to the indictment, and to the form of the information. The court adjourned until the 21st July, when Louis Riel's counsel—I have not the pleasure of their personal acquaintance, but I am told they are leading counsel in their own Provinces—made an application to the court to postpone the trial for one month. Now, bear in mind, that the 20th day of July was the first time that Riel was given intimation of the nature of the charges to be preferred against him—whether he should be tried for murder or for treason, or whether he should be indicted for some lesser offence; and not until that moment could he be in a position to prepare for trial. His counsel made the application based upon affidavits with which I will trouble the House. Louis Riel himself swore to the following statement of facts why the trial should be postponed:—

"I, Louis Riel, the said accused, being duly sworn, do depose and say: That Gabriel Dumont and Michael Dumas, now of Helena, in the United States of America, in the Territory of Montana, are essential and necessary witnesses to my defence.

"That Napoleon Nault, of Turtle Mountain, in the United States; the Rev. Father Touse, the Rev. Father André, of St. Antoine; the Rev. Father Fourmond, of St. Laurent; all in the North-West Territories of Canada; L. Vankoughnet and A. M. Burgess, of Ottawa, in the Province of Ontario, are also essential and material witnesses for my defence.

"That the said L. Vankoughnet is Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs, and the said Burgess is Deputy Minister of the Interior, both of whom are, in their official capacity, the custodians of various official documents, petitions and representations, made by the half-breeds of the North-West Territories to the Government of the Dominion of Canada, praying for the redress of their grievances, the refusal to grant which led to the legal agitation of the people to secure the redress of their wrongs. The said papers, petitions and documents, as nearly as I can now describe them, are as follows: The report of Mr. Pierce relating to the settlement of Prince Albert; a letter to the said Pierce, addressed to the Deputy Minister of the Interior, of date, the 17th of January, 1884. A letter from Mr. Deville, addressed to the Deputy Minister of the Interior, of date 7th February, 1884. A letter from Father Berginville, addressed to Capt. Deville, of date, 19th January, 1884. A petition by the inhabitants of St. Louis-de-Langevin, forwarded to Sir John A. Macdonald, about the 19th November, 1883. A letter from the Land Commissioner, Mr. Pierce, dated, 14th September, 1883. A letter from Fathers Leduc and Maloney, addressed to the Hon. D. L. McPherson, acting Minister of the Interior. A petition from the settlers of Prince Albert, in the North-West Territories, forwarded during the winter of 1882 and 1883, and signed by a large number of said settlers. A petition from St. Antoine-de-Padoue, addressed to Sir John A. Macdonald, as Minister of the Interior, of date the 14th September, 1882. A petition from Gabriel Dumont and others, of the 4th September, 1884, addressed to the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, as Minister of the Interior. A petition presented by the Rev. Father André to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, in the month of June, 1881. A petition presented by the inhabitants of Prince Albert to the Minister of the Interior. A letter from Land Agent Duck, dated the 13th of November, 1878, addressed to the Minister of the Interior. A petition by the French Canadians and half-breeds of Prince Albert, presented by Mr. Laird to the Government of the Dominion of Canada. A resolution passed by the settlers of St. Laurent, of the 1st of February, 1878, forwarded to the Government of the Dominion of Canada. A petition presented by the Qu'Appelle half-breeds in August or September, 1881, to Sir John A. Macdonald, as Minister of the Interior. A resolution of the Council of the North-West Territories of the date of 2nd August, 1878.

"That I have reason to believe, and do verily believe, and I am informed on reliable authority, that all of the aforementioned documents were duly forwarded to the Government of Canada, and are now in the possession of the various Departments, and can be procured by the above-named witnesses.

"That all the above-named witnesses are material and essential to me in my defence, and will prove that the agitation in the North-West Territories was constitutional and for the rights of the people in said North-West.

"That without the said witnesses being heard in court, I cannot make a proper defence to the present charge and will be deprived of justice."

Backing up that affidavit, there is an affidavit from one of his counsels, the 5th paragraph of which I will read:

"Some of the facts intended to be proved by such witnesses, are that the accused for several years was insane, and had to be confined in a lunatic asylum in the Province of Quebec, and would get deranged; and so, the circumstances under which the accused left his home in Montana, and came to this country, at the solicitation of his friends, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four: the nature of the agitation in the North-West, and the constant advice given by the accused to leave the country in the month of February last passed, and the objections of the people to his returning to Montana aforesaid: that the alleged rebellion was commenced and conducted under the direction of a council of fourteen persons, of which council the prisoner was not a member; and that he did not participate in any engagement or commit or countenance any overt act of treason.

"These facts can be proved by Gabriel Dumont, Michel Dumas, Napoleon Nault, Dr. Roy, of Quebec, Dr. Clark, of Toronto, and Dr. Vallée, of Quebec, whose attendance at the trial I verily believe can be secured, if sufficient time for that purpose is granted."

Now, Sir, there is an application made by counsel to postpone the trial upon grounds which seem to me irresistible; it is backed up by arguments of counsel which are powerful, and which appear to me to be wholly unanswerable. All these arguments, the decision of the judge, the reason why the trial was postponed, are eliminated from this report by this Government and kept from the knowledge of Parliament. Why were they kept from the knowledge of Parliament? Why, Sir, the Minister of Public Works told us last evening that Louis Riel had in every respect a fair trial, that he had all the time he wanted, he had all the money required to subpoena witnesses. Sir, his counsel declare that they could not prepare for their defence inside of a month. Did they get the month? That application was resisted. I know, Mr. Speaker, the counsel representing the Crown too well—two of the ablest counsel practicing at the Canadian bar, gentlemen distinguished for their honor and integrity—I know them too well to believe that they would have been parties to any proceedings of this kind. I charge that this Government instructed the judge and instructed the counsel to press on the trial of this case, to press it on at that sitting of the court, and not give the prisoner an opportunity that every prisoner is entitled to in order to prepare for his defence. The counsel opposed it. Mr. Christopher Robinson, the senior counsel for the Crown, made the following observations:—

"I will now say what I have to say in answer to the application made. As to the application for postponement which is asked for, those who represent the Crown think it their duty to oppose it altogether."

Does any man tell me that Christopher Robinson, a distinguished lawyer and an eminent Christian, would take such a cruel line of conduct as to declare, on behalf of the Crown, in the face of the affidavits I have read, that the Crown would not give this man an hour to prepare for his defence, unless he had been instructed so to do by the hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Robinson says:

"With regard to another application which my learned friends say they will think it right to make, or they do make now, an application for an order for the production of all correspondence which was found in possession of the prisoners at Batoche, all that I can say is that we regard those documents as State documents, that many of them necessarily implicate others, and that we, in the discharge of our duty, should feel it necessary to refuse to any person, acting for the prisoner, an inspection of anything which can be in the nature of treasonable correspondence, or which could implicate others in any manner which it is in the public interest, and in the interest of society, to see properly punished."

Those were papers that belonged to Louis Riel. They were in his possession; they were seized by the Government at Batoche. His counsel at his trial declared that the production of those documents was necessary for his defence, but the Government refused to produce them because they contained some treasonable correspondence. Treasonable correspondence with whom? Louis Riel did not object to produce them. He was anxious that they should be produced in order that the world might know the justification the half-breeds of the North-West had for resorting to physical force to secure what could not be secured by arguments, pressure, prayers or entreaties. Louis Riel did not object to the production of the treasonable correspondence. Is the story true now that was told by a former colleague of the hon. gentleman, that treason reigns rampant in many of the Departments of this Government? Are they afraid that some of their own friends will be implicated; that some of the Ministers of the Crown may be implicated? Why did the Government refuse to produce the documents at the instigation of the man who owned the papers, and of his counsel, who said they were necessary to the case; why did the Government step in and say the papers should not be produced because they contained correspondence of a treasonable character? Louis Riel was put on his trial on 21st July, and an application for a postponement was made backed up by affidavits unusually strong. These, it appears, were sustained by arguments of counsel, although I did not get them in the blue books of Parliament, but from the press, which is more enterprising than hon. gentlemen opposite. The arguments of counsel were unusually strong; and yet an adjournment was refused. The Crown was represented by two of our ablest lawyers, and after a keen forensic display the application was peremptorily refused and the counsel of the prisoner were compelled to go on with the trial. Yet the Minister of Public Works tells Parliament and the country that this man had fair play and all the time he wanted, and all the money he required to bring his witnesses. I say again that such a course of proceeding is, in my judgment, wholly unprecedented in criminal cases, and wholly unjustifiable from all the facts we know. What is the first question the judge, when presiding on the bench, asks the prisoner; it is "Are you ready for your trial?" Is it a delusion, a snare, a fraud? No; it means something. It means, if the man is not ready for trial, the humane criminal administration of justice in this country will give him the necessary time to make preparations for his defence. In the commonest cases of felony and misdemeanor, cases not involving the life of a man, upon application for the postponement of a trial being made, backed up by affidavits not half as strong as those affidavits, is granted as a matter of course, in order that the prisoner shall have fair play and that justice may be meted out to him. I say the action of the Crown in this case, the ruling of the Court in this case, both of which I charge to hon. gentlemen opposite, were wholly unjustified by the circumstances of the case, and wholly unwarranted upon the affidavits produced. The law is unmistakably clear. I want to make this point clear to the House, because I attach importance to it. The Government did not mete out justice and fair play to Riel, the criminal, if he was a criminal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I say there are greater criminals that remain untried to this hour. On the question of the postponement of the trial we are not left without authority in the records of the law courts. Chitty, in his work on Criminal Law, second edition, page 491 (and I want to give hon. gentlemen opposite all the information, as I usually do, giving the book and page where it can be found) lays it down that:

"And it has been laid down that no crime is so great and no proceedings so instantaneous, but the trial may be put off, if different reasons are adduced to support the application."

Mr. Archibald, in his work on Criminal Law, page 166, says:

"Where a material witness, upon being examined, appears to have no sense of the obligation of an oath or of a future state of retribution, so that he cannot legally be sworn, the court may put off the trial, even in a capital case, and order him to be in the meantime instructed by a clergyman, with principles of moral obligation, and a trial in a civil case may be put off for want of documentary evidence (Lord Mansfield lays it down in The King vs. D'Eon that in this respect there is no difference between an application in a civil and criminal case).

"But (the text writer says) the most moral ground for the delay is the absence of a material witness, which, if properly verified, will be sufficient, on an indictment for treason felony or misdemeanor at the instance of the defendant, though the prosecution is carried on at the public expense."

In this case a man is charged with the highest crime known to the law, and asks the production of certain douments necessary to his defence, but is refused and he is also refused a postponement for more than a week, and now the Government refuse to allow Parliament to see the documents in order that it may be able to form an opinion as to whether the Government acted rightly or wrongly. Such is the opinion of text writers. Let me refer the House to one or two cases that have occurred in the courts of the Mother Country. You will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that on 15th May 1811, Bellingham was indicted for the murder of Mr. Perceval. An application was made by Bellingham's counsel to postpone the trial to secure evidence to establish the prisoner's insanity. Sir Vicary Gibbs, the Attorney-General, resisted the application. Lord Mansfield, who was anything but a lenient Judge, who was in fact known as a hanging judge, overruled the application; yet the conduct of Attorney-General Gibbs in opposing, and of Lord Mansfield in refusing the application, was deemed, within twelve months after the execution of Bellingham, a disgrace to the administration of justice. Take another case which occurred many years later, when the administration of criminal law became more humane. The House will recollect that a generation later McNaughton was tried for the murder of Mr. Drummond, before the Lord Chief Baron. Prisoner's counsel applied to postpone the trial on account of the absence of a material witness. And the Chief Baron presiding at the court assented to the proposition, without an affidavit at all being made, but on the bare statement of counsel that the trial should be postponed until the next sitting of the court, and an opportunity given to the prisoner to defend himself, which he did successfully. You will recollect further, Sir, that in the case of The King against D'Eon, 1 Blackstone's Reports, page 510, the law is very fully discussed, and the grounds upon which an application to postpone a trial was usually granted. Those grounds have prevailed from that day to this, although, of course, in later times a more humane administration of the law has prevailed. The application was based upon the ground that two witnesses, subjects of the King of France, were absent in France and the application was that the trial should be postponed until they returned to the country. The application was refused, but on the sole ground that the two witnesses in question were subjects of a foreign power, living in a foreign country, and that there was no probability of their ever coming to England. The judge in delivering judgment used language which I shall quote, as I think it should go before the Parliament of Canada and the people of this country.

"Informations ex officio are personally the King's prosecutions. No man is there to be considered in the light of a promoter or private prosecutor. No crime is so great, no proceedings so instantaneous, but that upon sufficient grounds the trial may be put off. Mr. Radcliffe's case did not proceed upon the instantaneous nature of the trial. If the usual form of the affidavit is observed and there is no special ground of suspicion the rule goes of course."

Well, Sir, in this case the application did not succeed. The Court ruled, that this man should have one week—not ten days as stated by my hon. friend from Bellechasse; in one week, this man who was upon trial for his life, before a jury of six men—aliens to him in race and in religion, men who had no sympathy with the half-breeds of the North-West—this man on his trial before a court so constituted, a jury so chosen, asks for a little time to prepare for his defence, and the ruling of the Court was that the trial should peremptorily proceed within one week after the application was made. Why was that application refused? Why was not Riel given an opportunity of preparing for his defence? Why not give him a month for such a purpose, if a month was deemed necessary by himself and his counsel? Why not give him an opportunity to produce all those papers which he and his counsel declared were necessary for a full and fair investigation of the circumstances of the rebellion, and an explanation of the unfortunate position in which the prisoner and others had placed themselves? I say, Sir, that this trial was indecently—I use the word profoundly impressed with the gravity of the occasion—was indecently hurried on, and he was not given that opportunity. What was the Government afraid of? Were they afraid to produce the papers which were found at Batoche? Were they afraid to produce the documents which had been moulding for seven long years in the Department of the Interior? Were they afraid to produce the letter which the Secretary of State, who posed last year as the friend of the half-breeds, wrote to the Frenchmen of Fall River, Mass., declaring, in substance, that the half-breeds had no grievances, that they had made no complaints, or if they had, why had they not sent in petitions. Were the Government afraid to present these petitions, signed by laymen, by bishops, and by clergymen of both the Catholic and Anglican churches? Were they afraid that these documents should be brought into the broad light of the day? Were they afraid to produce those papers which the Secretary of State never heard of, and which the Minister of the Interior only lately heard of, though they were lying in the pigeon holes of his own Department? In so far as I am concerned, with every desire to consider this matter dispassionately, I have come to the conclusion reluctantly—I have come to the conclusion, that in this respect at all events fair play and justice was not meted out to Louis Riel. I am prepared to go further; I am prepared to support this motion on another ground. I say that not only did the Government improperly refuse to postpone the trial through their counsel, but that every obstruction that could be thrown in the way of the defence was thrown in the way of the defence at the trial at Regina. The Government refused to produce the papers found at Batoche; they refused to produce those papers lying in the pigeon holes of the Department, showing the grievances of the half-breeds. They refused to produce the material which Riel and his counsel declared to be absolutely necessary in order that they might be enabled to formulate their defence properly. The Government not only did that but they objected to the reception of any evidence at the trial to show that the half-breeds had grievances remaining unredressed for seven long years. You will find in the evidence of that venerable Missionary of the Cross, Father André, the following:—

“Q. Did you yourself communicate with the Dominion Government?
—A. At what time?”

“Q. I mean in regard to the rights and claims of the half-breeds?
—A. Yes, I communicated.”

“Q. At what time? A. I am not sure at what time. In 1882 I did communicate.”

“Q. Since that have you communicated?—A. Not directly.”

“Q. How did you communicate?—A. I communicated directly in regard to Riel.”

“Q. Can you tell me in what manner you communicated?—A. I communicated in December, when Riel said he wanted to go out of the country, because of the agitation that was existing in the country.”

“Q. Did you communicate after that?—A. No; I communicated after the rebellion.”

“Q. With whom? A. With the Minister of Public Works.”

“Q. Sir Hector Langevin?—A. Yes; asking help for those who were in distress.”

“Q. From 1884 to the time of the rebellion?—A. Since the arrival of the prisoner in the country?”

“Q. Yes—A. It would be difficult to tell that. They changed from time to time since the arrival of the prisoner.”

“Q. Finally after these petitions and resolutions had been adopted at the public meetings and sent to the Government, was there a change in the state of things that existed then?—A. The silence of the Government produced great dissatisfaction in the minds of the people.”

“Q. To-day are the people in a better position than they were before in regard to the rights they claim?—A. They have not yet received the patents for their lands on the South Saskatchewan.”

Then Mr. Osler, counsel for the Crown, instructed by the Government, said:

“I must object to this class of questions being introduced. My learned friends have opened a case of treason justified only by the insanity of the prisoner, and they are now seeking to justify armed rebellion for the redress of their grievances. These two defences are inconsistent, one is no justification at all. We are willing to allow all possible latitude but they have gone as far as I feel they should go. We have allowed them to describe documents which they have not produced, and answers in writing so that they might not be embarrassed and that the outline of the position might be fairly given to the jury, but it is not evidence, and if my learned friend is going into it in detail, I think it is objectionable.

“His Honor Mr. Justice Richardson.—Supposing they are going to produce these writings?”

“Mr. Osler.—They could not be evidence, they would not be evidence in justification. That is admitted. It cannot be possible for my learned friend to open the case on one defence and go to the jury indirectly upon another. Of course it is not really any defence in law and should not be gone into with any greater particularity. If this is given in evidence we will have to answer it in many particulars, and then there would be the question of justifying the policy of the Government.”

“Mr. Osler.—It is as it were a counter claim against the Government, and that is not open to any person on a trial for high treason. We have no desire to unduly limit my learned friend, but I cannot consent to try such an issue as that here.”

There you see that the very moment the counsel for the prisoner proceeded to examine the witnesses touching the justification, touching these grievances of the half-breeds, touching the provocation, touching the misconduct and the maladministration of the Government, they are stopped; they can go no further; and for that reason, I say the defence was obstructed. I do not argue—I do not need to argue—that the half-breeds were justified in the eye of the law, in the strict letter of the law, in resorting to arms. But I do mean to say this, that if the rebellion was provoked by the misconduct and maladministration of this Government, as I honestly believe it was, then every fact connected with that rebellion, every fact which would tend to show what the cause of that rebellion really was, ought to have been submitted to the jury and the court, not as a justification, perhaps, but in order, if possible to mitigate the severity of the punishment which invariably follows a conviction for armed insurrection, and in order to offer some reasonable basis on which the recommendation of the jury to mercy might have been justified. Not only had the counsel for the prisoner to encounter these difficulties, but they had others to encounter. It was stated at the trial, and it cannot be contradicted, that many of the witnesses subpoenaed by the prisoner were also subpoenaed by the Crown and those witnesses were warned to hold no communication with the counsel for the defence. Mr. Greenshields in open court—and this is not in the report of the trial—made this statement:

“The moment we approach them to speak to them they stand back as though we were tainted with the plague, and say: ‘We are instructed to have no conversation with the defence.’ Our endeavors to obtain information have been frustrated by the counsel for the prosecution or some one for the Government who have instructed every person not to recognise the counsel for the defence. The names of many of them were the names given by the prisoner as witnesses for the defence, but we were unable to see them, or to have any conversation with them, for what cause we do not know, but they said they were instructed not to have any conversation with us.”

That is not denied by the counsel for the Crown, who made use of the following language in answer to the complaint made by Mr. Greenshields:

“My learned friend made some very strong and very inflammatory remarks about the treatment which he received from certain witnesses, whom he alleged were witnesses for the Crown. All that I can say is that if the counsel desire to interview a witness subpoenaed on the other side, they must always take their chances as to the reception they meet from those witnesses. That is a matter in their own judgment and in their own discretion about which they have no right to complain.”

Now, after the statement we heard from the Minister of Public Works that the Government did everything they possibly could to make this a fair trial, it was a scandalous thing for the employés of the Government—not the counsel, for they would not be guilty of such a thing—to notify those witnesses subpoenaed by the prisoner and by the Crown to hold no communication whatever with the prisoner's counsel. Who gave the warning? Who is responsible for it? Will the Government tell? Whoever gave that warning, it was wholly unjustifiable, wholly improper, disgraceful in the extreme; and that, in itself, convinces me that this man had not a fair trial. There is another reason why I propose to vote for the motion of the Government on this occasion—I mean the motion to censure the Government for the execution of Louis Riel. The evidence given at the trial, and the documentary evidence produced there, lead my mind to but one conclusion—that Louis Riel surrendered upon the clear understanding that he was to receive protection, and that his life would be spared, that understanding being conveyed to him by those entrusted with the management of affairs in the North-West. If that was so, to execute a man after a surrender so made, is, in my humble judgment, nothing more and nothing less than a judicial murder. Let us see how this theory is borne out by the facts. The general in command swore to the following statement at the trial:—

“On the 15th Louis Riel was brought in by two scouts, Hourie and Armstrong, and brought to my tent, and when he entered the tent, he produced a paper which I had sent to him, saying if he surrendered I would protect him till his case was decided by the Canadian Government.”

Now, Sir, if General Middleton's story is correct, that he was to be protected till the Canadian Government decided his case, all I can say is that Louis Riel was laboring under delusions on more subjects than one. Why should Louis Riel have surrendered? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, or any man of common sense, if the General in command held out only an assurance that he would be protected until the Government decided his case? Why, Sir, we all know that the road to Dakota over the broad prairies of the west was as open to Louis Riel as it was to Gabriel Dumont and Michel Dumas, both of whom escaped the vengeance of the law; and why did Louis Riel remain in the country, and surrender? If he had seen fit not to remain, all the power and forces General Middleton had at his command could have no more arrested him than they did Gabriel Dumont and Michel Dumas. The fact that Louis Riel remained in the country and surrendered is consistent only with one of two theories—either that he believed that upon his surrender to the General in command he would not be executed, or that Louis Riel was as mad as a March hare; and on either theory I believe that Louis Riel should not have been executed. Now, let us see how the General's statement is borne out by the sworn testimony given at the trial. On the 12th of May—and I extract from the book submitted to Parliament—Louis Riel sent the following message to General Middleton at Batoche:—

“If you massacre our families, we are going to massacre the Indian agent and other prisoners.”

“LOUIS DAVID RIEL, per J. W. Astley, bearer.”

On the same day the General sent the following to Louis Riel:—

“I am anxious to avoid killing women and children, and have done my best to avoid doing so. Put your women and children in one place, and let us know where it is, and no shot shall be fired on them. I trust to your honor not to put men with them.”

“FRED. MIDDLETON, commander North-West Field Forces.”

On the same day Louis Riel sent, by the same messenger, the following communication to the General in command:

“Your prompt answer to my note shows that I was right in mentioning to you the cause of humanity. We will gather our families in one place, and as soon as it is done, we will let you know.”

“LOUIS DAVID RIEL.”

At this stage of the proceedings a person of the name of J. W. Astley appeared on the scene of action. He was called as a witness at the Regina trial. Let us see how his evidence supports the theory on which I have started, or how far it corroborates the statement of the General in command. J. W. Astley was examined as follows:—

“Are those words the words he wrote upon the envelope? A. Yes, he took the note out of my hands and wrote those words on the outside in my presence. He ordered the men who had left the rifle pits to go back again and they went back along with me; I continued on, went to the General and gave him the note. I did not call his attention to the memorandum on the outside of the note till night time. I asked him how the fire began and he said that the Sioux started it, but that if Riel would get his men to stop firing that he would order his men to remain where they were and they would not advance any further. There was not time to write a letter and I went back and it took a long time to find Riel.”

There is one point that cannot fail to strike the mind here. Why should this correspondence have been carried on at all if there was not some expectation on the part of General Middleton that Riel would surrender? It is only consistent with the theory that the General was seeking to bring about a cessation of hostilities, in which effort I think he was to be commended, and in order to do that the surrender of Riel was invited. Astley further says:

“I went among the women and the children and I found him. The firing was getting warm. I told him what the General had said, that if he would order his men to stop the firing he would do the same, and that he could come with me personally to the General. He hesitated for a time. At last I said: ‘There are not many minutes to waste if you want to call the council together; call them and let me address them.’ At last the prisoner said: ‘It is not necessary to call the council.’ He said he would do as I wished. I said you acknowledge you have the power to do as I wish without the council. He said, yes. I said for him to give the order to stop firing. He said: You know the men I have. I cannot go among these men and tell them to stop firing. He said: You know that. I told him I would go back and explain how everything stood, and see if it was possible for the General to stop his men at a certain position if he was willing to do as I wished he was.”

Q. That is, willing to surrender?—A. Yes. I went back and told the General what he said. He said that he could not accept it as a surrender unless Riel ceased firing. I knew he could not get his men to cease firing. I went back to try and keep the troops from getting at the women and children. I got the General to send a note to Riel offering the same terms as I had offered—that is, that he should be kept safe till he had a fair trial.”

It appears that on the 13th May, 1885, General Middleton wrote a letter to Louis Riel, a letter which does not appear among the papers. What became of it, I do not know; but, at all events, we have the evidence of J. W. Astley of what took place just before Riel surrendered, and of the assurance he gave Riel. Let us see what they were:

“Q. Did he speak to you of his personal safety?—A. He had a very little to say about the half-breeds, as far as regards himself seemed the principal object.”

“Q. What did he ask you in regard to himself?—A. If I would explain what risk he ran personally himself. He said to me that we knew that he never carried a rifle, of course at the same time we had seen him carry a rifle on one occasion. I told him he ran no danger as I could look at it. He suggested that I should broach the subject of the church to the General, and it would give him a chance to broach the subject when he came to be interviewed by the General. He would say that he was not to blame, that the council was to blame.”

Observe the evidence of J. W. Astley, a witness called by the Crown. He tells us that at the closing interview with Riel, before Riel surrendered, he told Riel that he ran no danger as far as he could see. Astley was the man who carried the messages from the General to Louis Riel and from Riel to the General; he was the go-between, and fresh from an interview with the General on the subject he assured Riel, a few minutes before the latter surrendered, that if he surrendered “there would be no risk as far as I could see it.” On the strength of that assurance, Louis Riel surrendered, and sent the following note to General Middleton:—

GENERAL.—I have received only to-day yours of the 13th instant. My council are dispersed, I wish you would let them quiet and free. I hear that presently you are absent. Would I go to Batoche, who is going to receive me? I will go to fulfil God's will.

LOUIS “DAVID” RIEL,
Ex ovedo.

15th May, 1885.

Therefore, I say, with every confidence in the soundness of my argument, that the documentary evidence produced and the evidence of J. W. Astley establish clearly the fact that Louis Riel surrendered to Gen. Middleton upon the assurance that he would be perfectly safe. To execute a man in the face of that solemn declaration of one of the Crown witnesses appears to my mind to be nothing else than a judicial murder. That is not all. This view of the matter is still further confirmed by an article which appeared in the Mail, the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, on the 14th April, 1885, a month before Riel surrendered,—and I have no doubt the paper must have reached him in the ordinary course of the mail shortly before he surrendered, and that he read the article. The article was a clear exposition of the policy of the Administration upon this question. It was a direct invitation to the half-breeds and to Louis Riel to surrender, and held out the promise that if they did, no more blood would be spilt upon the field of battle or the scaffold. The Mail said:

"The news from the West this morning is not sensational at all. Of course it must be obvious that men do not take up arms and fight and kill and risk being hanged and shot, like Riel and his followers, without at least a conviction that they have grievances."

I would advise the hon. the Minister of Public Works to re-construct the Mail newspaper. It gives the clearest possible evidence of the criminality and mismanagement of hon. gentlemen opposite:

"These grievances will have to be heard some day, and the sooner the public understands the better.

"An unreasoning cry for blood and revenge would be misfortune. Fighting for the mere sake of fighting, or for revenge, is a poor business, and our people will be best pleased with a bloodless, if successful, campaign.

"The idea that Riel will run away as on a former occasion, is one that is useful to keep the Indians quiet; but it is not one on which a military policy can be framed. If he is forced to fight he will do so. If he offers to submit no doubt wisdom will guide the deliberations of those who will have charge of the negotiations. General Middleton, no doubt, has large powers, and is continually in communication with the authorities at Ottawa."

True, and I have shown you that General Middleton had opened negotiations with Riel, through J. W. Astley, a friend of the Government in the North-West Territories. I have shown you that J. W. Astley informed Riel that he would be perfectly safe if he surrendered. In view of all these facts, the execution of Riel appears to me to have been wholly unjustified. I go a step further, and I ask the hon. Minister of Public Works, as the hon. the First Minister is not in his place, if he can point me to a single case in the history of England, within the last hundred years, where a political offender, who surrendered himself to the Government, was executed. I defy him to point me to a single case in the history of England, or any other civilised country, in which, within the last hundred years, a political offender, surrendering conditionally or unconditionally, was executed by the Government. The hon. gentleman can find no such case. It remained for this Government, which deceived, and misled and used harshly the half-breeds of the North-West, to set an example of bad faith and ministerial atrocity, that appears to me to be unparalleled in the history of civilisation. You may find a precedent in the case of Thebaw, the late King of Burmah, or His Majesty the King of Dahomey or some other foreign potentate of that description, but you will find no example of such conduct in the history of the British Empire. There is another ground upon which I propose to justify the vote I am about to give. The jury who tried Louis Riel and convicted him recommended him to the mercy of the Crown. That recommendation must have been based upon one of two grounds, or perhaps two. Either that the rebellion in the North-West was provoked, caused, and incited by the maladministration, misconduct and criminal neglect of this incompetent Administration, or that Riel was not responsible for his action. The Government disregarded that recommendation, they realised, as the counsel for the Crown and judge presiding at the trial realised, when the evidence was offered and rejected to show that the half-breeds of the North-West Territories were improperly used, that, if that evidence was received, the Government of this country would be arraigned for their misconduct and that the conviction of Louis Riel would be equivalent to an acquittal of this Government. The Government further fully realised, and nobody better than the Minister of Public Works, that the acquittal of Louis Riel would be tantamount, in the estimation of thinking and reasonable men, and of the great body of electors of this country to a condemnation of this Government; and so, to save their own necks, they executed Louis Riel. It was a harsh, an unheard of and an unjustifiable proceeding in modern days, particularly in a case of high treason, to execute a man who was recommended to the mercy of the Crown by the jury which tried him. It was a proceeding which was unwarranted by what was disclosed at the trial at Regina, and which was unwarranted by any subsequent proceedings that I am aware of. It was a thing unparalleled in the history of the United States of America or of the British Empire for the last 50 years. I shall refer to a few cases upon this subject. It is true that what were called the Cato street conspirators, Thistlewood, Inge, Brent, Davidson and Tidd were executed in 1820 for high treason, but neither of those were recommended to the mercy of the Crown, as you will find by a reference to the trial, and neither received mercy at the hands of the Crown. Of the Nottingham rioters, who were tried in 1817 for high treason, 20 were convicted; the sentence of death was passed upon them all, and three who were ringleaders were executed, but those ringleaders were convicted without the jury recommending them to the mercy of the Crown. The remaining 17 were recommended to the mercy of the Crown, and received that mercy at the hands of the Imperial Government. Of the Monmouth rebellion in 1839, the ringleaders were arrested and tried, John Frost was convicted, John Frost was sentenced to death, John Frost was recommended to mercy by the jury that tried him, and John Frost received at the hands of his sovereign the mercy and the clemency of the Crown. Zephaniah Williams and William Jones were tried in 1840 for high treason in the same outbreak; they were found guilty, sentenced to death, recommended to mercy by the same jury that found them guilty, and a humane Government, not actuated by pressure from without by an unseen and irresponsible power, carried out the recommendation of the jury and their sentences were commuted. Charles Walters, John Lovell, Richard Benfield, John Rees, and Jenkin Morgan were convicted in 1840, were sentenced to death and the sentences of all were commuted. In 1848, Meagher, the Irish rebel, was tried, convicted, sentenced to death, and his sentence commuted. In the same year Wm. Smith O'Brien was tried for high treason, convicted, sentenced to death, recommended to mercy, and the mercy of the Crown was extended to him. Unfortunately, in this case, the jury did not state the grounds upon which they recommended the prisoner to the clemency of the Crown, they were not asked to do so at the trial and they did not do so. But we have evidence from the organs of the Government of the reason why three of these jurors did recommend Louis Riel to the mercy of the Sovereign. The correspondent of the Mail newspaper, writing from Regina on the Monday after the trial, makes use of the following language:—

"I saw three of the jurors, who told me that in their opinion Riel should not be hanged, as they think that, while he is not absolutely insane in the ordinary accepted meaning of the word, he is a very decided crank."

And the Mail newspaper itself, commenting on that, says:

"They (the jury) themselves say that by their recommendation to mercy they meant that the Crown should spare the wretched man's life, as in their opinion he is not wholly sane. They are satisfied that he knows the difference between right and wrong, but believed him to be subject to delusions which warp his moral sense. This is their interpretation as given to our correspondent at Regina, and they must be supposed to know their own minds."

This is what the Mail itself says. Its special correspondent, interviewed three jurymen and declared that they did not think Riel was quite responsible. Another jurymen, I think, over his own signature, stated that he recommended Louis Riel to mercy because the half-breeds were provoked to rebellion by the maladministration and misconduct of the Government. If it were based upon the ground of insanity, then there was a double reason why the clemency of the Crown should have interfered. First, there was the ground of the misconduct of the Government which provoked the rebellion, and, secondly, there was the ground of the man's irresponsibility. Another jurymen, who was an Englishman and a Protestant, as they were all Protestants on the jury at the trial, made use of the following language:—

"The unanimous desire of the jury in recommending the accused to the clemency of the Crown, was that he be not put to death."

I ask again: Were the Government aware of these facts? I say they were. They take the Mail newspaper, they read it diligently, most of them swear by it, and, being aware of these facts, I say they ought not to have allowed the sentence to be carried into execution. I saw that a newspaper published in Montreal, which used to support the Government, but which I believe is not quite in harmony with them now, challenged the Government the other day to deny if they dared the following allegation:—

"But, it will be asked did Sir John and his Government know of this desire, this object of the jury in recommending Riel to mercy. We answer and say yes. Sir John and his Orange crew knew all about it, and their knowledge was obtained directly from the jury itself. We are in a position to prove that after the trial of Riel was concluded and the verdict rendered, the jury took special measures to carry to the Government at Ottawa the real and exact sense and meaning of their verdict, so that there could possibly be no error or deception about it. They gave the Government to understand that by their verdict they did not want Riel hanged, as, under the circumstances, they were unanimously of opinion that he did not deserve to incur the extreme penalty of the law. But Sir John ignored everything to yield to Orange clamor, and Riel was sacrificed to please the Orange Moloch. Is that charge plain enough? We think it is, and we defy Sir John and his Government to deny the facts as we have just set them forth."

Are these facts true? I believe they are. In that case the punishment which this Government deserves at the hands of the people of this country for having provoked and caused and incited this rebellion would be merely nominal in comparison with that which they should receive at the hands of an indignant people and an honest Parliament for having executed a man under such circumstances as these. There is still another reason why I propose to justify the vote I am about to give. Although I am not a medical man, I profess sometimes to practise law, and I propose to justify the vote I am about to give upon the ground that Louis Riel, at the time he committed the offences with which he was charged, was laboring under certain delusions. I know quite well that this question has challenged discussion during the last few years in the press and out of the press, among medical men and among laymen, and among public men on the platform, and we know that it has been challenged on the floors of Parliament. Impressed with the gravity of the questions involved in the trial of Louis Riel's insanity, I can honestly say that I endeavored to bring my own mind to the investigation of the facts and the examination of the law, free and unbiassed. I endeavored, Mr. Speaker, when I entered upon this investigation, to enter into a covenant with myself that my utter want of confidence in this Government, my entire sympathy with the half-breeds of the North-West Territories in their long, their earnest and their gallant struggle with the Government of this country to secure their rights, should not mislead my own mind nor warp my judgment. At all events, I honestly entered upon the investigation of the evidence and the consideration of the law, and I have honestly arrived at the conclusion which I am about to affirm by my vote. There is a popular misapprehension as to the rule that ought to prevail in criminal cases when insanity has been set up as a defence. The popular opinion is that if a man is able to distinguish right from wrong he is held responsible for violation of law. I say, Mr. Speaker, that that is an entire misapprehension of the law. A man may be able to distinguish right from wrong, a man may be perfectly rational upon every subject but one, and if he commits an offence within the scope and limit of that subject, then in the eye of the law he is not responsible. Now, I observe that the Minister of Public Works has fallen into this error in discussing this question. I say there is no excuse for him, and there is no excuse for the Minister of Justice if they have fallen into that error. It is an error into which it appears to me the medical commission sent up to investigate the mental condition of Louis Riel have also fallen; because I observe that after they pronounced that he was suffering under two delusions, they say he was perfectly responsible. I say it is not a proper rendering of the law, I say it is not the law of the land. If it can be shown that a man is suffering under a mental hallucination or delusion, and he commits an offence within the scope of that delusion, I say that the merciful provisions of the British and Canadian law exempt him from responsibility; and I am going to fortify that position with the authority of writers on the subject and with decisions in the courts of England. Wharton and Stille in their work upon Medical Jurisprudence, volume 1, page 122, lay down the following law:—

"That the 'right and the wrong' test does not cover all the cases of legitimate insane irresponsibility. Medical observation, based on an induction which each year makes at once more extended in its materials and more absolute in its results, tells us that there are persons unquestionably insane who are capable of being instructed in the law of the land, if knowing what this law is, both in its general character and in its results, and of being deterred by proper sanction from breaking such law."

The text-writer further says:

"The defence of insanity is also sustained when there is an insane delusion from which the crime emanates, and when being insane the defendant is forced to the act by an irresistible impulse, he, in each case, knowing the act is forbidden by the law of the land."

The text-writers further say that the test is:

"Did the defendant know enough to distinguish right from wrong as to the particular case, if he did not, he is to be acquitted."

The text-writers still further say:

"Any species of insane delusion exempts from punishment the perpetrator of an act committed under its influence."

At page 155 they further say—after speaking of the responsibility in some cases of those partially insane:

"But it is otherwise with insanity accompanied with delusions of such a character that the patient believes he is authorised by superior power to dispense with the law of the land, and with insanity one of whose elements is an impulse to commit crime which the reason is unable to resist. If there be such phases of insanity as these, it is clear that their objects are not responsible to the ordinary process of penal justice. Yet such patients the 'right and wrong' test might pronounce sane. In such cases this test cannot be exclusively applied."

Then the text-writer speaks of the nature of some of the delusions which exempts from punishment a crime committed under their influence. For instance:

"A man imagines himself to be the Grand Lama or Alexander the Great, and suppose that his neighbor is brought before him for an invasion of his sovereignty, and he cuts off his head or throttles him. He knows he is doing wrong, perhaps from a sense of guilt he conceals the body, he may have a clear perception of the legal consequences of his crime, and yet, according to Wigan on insanity, edition of 1874, page 65, the man would not be responsible."

I say that is a clear exposition of the law. A man may be responsible, may be clear-headed, may be rational upon every subject but one, and if he commit an offence within the scope of this one, he is not responsible. Woodman and Tidy, in their work upon Forensic Medicine, page 837, speaking of the different types of insanity, say :

"The principal forms of monomania are: 1. Monomania of ambition." Mark you—"ambition."

"2. Religious monomania. 3. The monomania of persecutions. 4. The monomania of wrongs or grievances suffered from private parties or from the Government."

Now let us see for a single moment how the evidence given at the trial fits into this general defence of insanity, to these delusions, the effect of which is to exempt from responsibility a man who commits crime under their power. I do not propose at this moment to discuss the medical evidence or the expert testimony, although I shall show shortly that it preponderates in favor of the theory of his insanity. It must be not forgotten, however, that the question we have to discuss is not what his condition was at the time of his execution, but whether he was laboring under these delusions at the time the offence was committed. If he was sane at the time these offences were committed but insane at the time he was executed, he ought not to have been executed; and if he was laboring under these delusions at the time these offences were committed, he ought not to be hanged. If in fact he were insane, either when the offences were committed or insane when he was executed, then the Government of this country did wrong in hanging him. Dr. Willoughby, who was called as a witness for the Crown, says:

"Q. What did he say as to the Government of the country?—A. They were to have a new Government in the North-West. It was to be composed of God-fearing men. They would have no such Parliament as the House at Ottawa."

I certainly think that on that point, at least, Louis Riel was not insane.

"Q. Anything else?—A. Then he stated how he intended to divide the country into seven portions.

"Q. In what manner?—A. It was to be divided into seven portions, but as to who were to have the seventh I cannot say.

"Q. You mean to say you cannot say how these seven were to be apportioned?—A. Yes. He mentioned Bavarians, Poles, Italians, Germans, Irish. There was to be a new Ireland in the North-West."

"Q. What was that?—A. As Riel was leaving he expressed an opinion. He stated they would have no Orangeism in the New-West. I said I hoped by Orangeism he did not mean Protestantism. He turned excitedly and said he was glad I mentioned it, that he certainly understood the difference between Protestantism and Orangeism, and he then spoke of the different religions and beliefs, and illustrated it by the example of a tree. The true church was the large branch of the tree, and the others as they departed from it, got weaker, up to the top of the tree."

"Q. Would you now indicate to us the different people he expected to assist him?—A. The Irish of the United States, the Germans, the Italians, Bavarians and Poles, and Germany and Ireland.

"Q. We have had Germany and Ireland twice?—A. Well he put it twice. He put the Irish and Germans of the United States; then Germany itself was to come into line."

This is the evidence as to the condition of Louis Riel long before the outbreak. Does any one mean to tell me that a man entertaining those delusions was perfectly rational and responsible. That is not all. Charles Nolin is called. Let us hear what he has to say—and remember he is one of the witnesses for the Crown:

"The witness is asked whether he ever heard the prisoner speak of his internal policy in the division of the country, if he should succeed in his enterprise, and he says yes. He says that after his arrival the prisoner showed him a book written with buffalo blood and the witness said that the prisoner in that plan said after taking England and Canada, he would divide Canada and give the Province of Quebec to the Prussians, Ontario to the Irish, and the North-West Territories be divided into different parts between the European nations. He says he does not remember them all, but the Jews were to have a part. The witness says that he thinks he also spoke of the Hungarians and Bavarians. He says that he thought the whole world should have a piece of the cake, that Prussia was to have Quebec.

"Q. Did the prisoner speak about his plans and if so, what did he say?—A. About a month after he arrived, he showed me a book that he had written in the States. What he showed me in that book was first to destroy England and Canada.

"Q. And?—A. And also to destroy Rome and the Pope.

"Q. Anything else?—A. He said that he had a mission to fulfil, a divine mission, and as a proof that he had a mission, he showed a letter from the Bishop of Montreal eleven years back."

Mr. CAMERON (HURON).

"Q. Did he say how he would carry out his plans?—A. He did not say how he would carry out his plans then."

Then we have the evidence of Thomas Sanderson, called for the Crown. Let us hear what he said about Riel:

"Q. Now, at the time you spoke to him regarding the formation of a Government, did he give you any idea of what kind of a Government he proposed forming?—A. Yes, he was going to divide the country into seven parts, one part was to be for the Canadians, or white settlers, one-seventh, another seventh for the Indians, another seventh for the half-breeds, and he named over what he was going to do with the rest, I don't recollect the names of the people."

Philip Garnot for the defence said:

"Q. Tell us what he said about that as far as you can remember?—A. He was talking about the country being divided into seven provinces, one for the French, Germans, Irish, and I don't know what else, there were to be seven different nationalities.

"Q. Do you remember anything else besides those you have mentioned, what other foreigners?—A. Italians.

"Q. Hungarians?—A. I can't remember particularly very well, I know it was seven different provinces, and seven different nationalities.

"Q. Did he say he expected any assistance from the people?—A. Yes, he mentioned he expected assistance from them, he mentioned he expected the assistance of an army of several nationalities, and I remember he mentioned the Jews. He expected their assistance and money, he was going to give them a province as a reward for their help. That is what I understood him to say.

"Q. In his conversation with you, or with others in your presence on these subjects, did he at any time give you any intimation that he had any doubt of his success, that any obstacle could prevent him from succeeding?—A. No, he always mentioned that he was going to succeed, that it was a divine mission that he had, and that he was only an instrument in the hands of God.

"Q. When he talked of other matters than religion and the success of his plans, how did he act and talk generally?—A. I never noticed any difference in his talk on other matters, because I never had much intercourse with him only during the time of the trouble, I met him once before that.

"Q. When he spoke of religion and about the country, and in the different interviews with you or others, did you understand that he had any idea of thinking of the welfare of anyone at all except himself, that he was the sole person to be considered?—A. It seemed as if he was working in the interest of the half-breed population and the settlers generally. He mentioned that.

"Q. Did you communicate to anyone your impression of this man—what you thought of him?—A. I did.

"What did you think of him?—A. I thought the man was crazy, because he acted very foolish."

Vital Fourmond for the defence said:

"Q. Will you please state upon what facts you based your opinion that the prisoner was not sane on religious or political matters?—A. Permit me to divide the answer into two, the facts before the rebellion, and the facts during the rebellion. Before the rebellion it appeared as if there were two men in the prisoner; in private conversation he was affable, polite, pleasant and a charitable man to me. I noticed that even when he was quietly talked to about the affairs of politics and government and he was not contradicted, he was quite rational, but as soon as he was contradicted on these subjects then he became a different man and he would be carried away with his feelings. He would go so far as to use violent expressions to those who were even his friends. As soon as the rebellion commenced then he became excited, and he was carried away and he lost all control of himself and of his temper. He went so far, that when a father contradicted him he became quite excited, and he had no respect for him and he often threatened to destroy all the churches. He says: There is danger for you, but thanks for the friendship I have for you, I will protect you from any harm. Once I went to St. Antoine and there I met a number of priests, and Riel says: I have been appointed by the council to be your spiritual adviser. I said our spiritual adviser was the Bishop, and Mr. Riel would not be him. There is only one way you can be our adviser, the only way you can become so is by shooting us, the only way you can direct us is by shooting us, and then you can direct our corpses in any way you like. That was my answer to him."

Such are the opinions of Louis Riel, as disclosed by the evidence at the trial, before and at the time of the rebellion. Let me summarise them: 1. His own mission was to redress the wrongs of the half-breeds. 2. The country was to be divided into seven portions and partitioned among the Bavarians, Poles, Italians, Germans, Irish, Hungarians and Jews. 3. He was to conquer England and Canada; Quebec to be given to the Prussians, Ontario to the Irish, and the North-West Territory divided among other nationalities. 4. He never appeared to question his success. 5. He was, in his own judgment, the potentate—the sovereign of the land, and could dispose of it at pleasure. Is it possible, can it fairly be argued, that a man of education, a man of training, laboring under such delusions, such mental hallucinations, could be held responsible for anything he did to carry out what he believed to be his manifest destiny? But Louis Riel's delusions were not limited to things material. He was, if possible, more irrational on religious questions. He imagined himself inspired. He was to be the head of a new church and the ruler of a new empire. On this subject George Ness, one of the Crown witnesses, says:

"Q. Tell us about their taking you to the church?—A. When we got to the church, they were in the front of the church, Mr. Riel commenced saying that he was a prophet, that he could foresee events."

Geo. Ness, further says:

"Q. What about the word, Protestant, you used in your examination in chief?—A. He said that on the 17th of March.

"Q. The difficulty with Father Moulin was in March?—A. Yes, and in February.

"Q. In March he said the priest was a Protestant or something to that effect?—A. Yes.

"Q. Did you consider at that time he acted as he had acted when you first knew him in July or August with reference to the priests and religion?—A. No, he acted very much otherwise.

"Q. Now, can your memory enable you to say what he said at that time on the 17th March, in his difficulty with Father Moulin?—A. It was on the 18th March.

"Q. State what took place, the words that were used and how he acted on that occasion?—A. He said the Spirit of God was in him and Father Moulin said he was making a schism against the church, and Riel said Rome had tumbled, Rome est tombée.

"Q. Proceed if you please, he said the Pope of Rome was not legally Pope?—A. Yes.

"Q. He said the episcopate spirit had left Rome and come into the North-West Territories?—A. No, he did not say that.

"Q. Did he say anything of that kind?—A. He said the Spirit of God was in him and that Rome had tumbled, and he could tell future events."

Charles Nolin said:

"The witness is asked if the prisoner ever told him that he considered himself a prophet, and he says yes.

"The witness is asked if after the meal something strange did not happen—if there was not a question of the Spirit of God between the witness and the prisoner? The witness says it was not after a dinner, but it was one evening they were spending the night together at his house, and there was a noise in his bowels and the prisoner asked him if he heard that, and the witness says yes, and then the prisoner told him that was his liver, and that he had inspirations which worked through every part of his body.

"The witness asked if at that moment the prisoner did not write in a book what he was inspired of, and the witness answers that he did not write in a book, but on a sheet of paper; he said he was inspired."

Then we have the evidence of the venerable priest who has devoted his life to the service of the Lord, Father André, who said:

"Q. You have had occasion to meet the prisoner between July, 1884, and the time of the rebellion?—A. Yes.

"Q. What is the name of your parish?—A. Prince Albert.

"Q. Have you had occasion to speak often to him on the political situation and on religion?—A. Frequently; it was the matter of our conversation.

"Q. Did you like to speak of religion and politics with him?—A. No, I did not like to."

"Q. Will you give me the reason why you did not like to speak of religion and politics to him?—A. Politics and religion was a subject he always spoke of in conversation, he loved those subjects.

"Q. Did he speak in a sensible manner?—A. I wish to say why I did not like to speak to him on those subjects. Upon all other matters, literature and science, he was in his ordinary state of mind.

"Q. Upon political subjects and religion?—A. Upon politics and religion he was no longer the same man; it would seem as if there were two men in him, he lost all control of himself on those questions.

"Q. When he spoke of religion and politics?—A. Yes, on those two matters he lost all control of himself.

"Q. Do you consider, after the conversations you have had with him, that when he spoke on politics and religion he had his intelligence?—A. Many times, at least twenty times, I told him, I would not speak on those subjects because he was a fool, he did not have his intelligence of mind.

"Q. Is that the practical result you have found in your conversation with Riel on political and religious questions?—A. It is my experience.

"Q. You have had a good deal of experience with people, and you have known persons who were afflicted with mania?—A. Before answering that, I want to state a fact to the court regarding the prisoner. You know the life of that man affected us during a certain time.

"Q. In what way?—A. He was a fervent Catholic, attending the church and attending to his religious duties frequently, and his state of mind was the cause of great anxiety. In conversation on politics, and on the rebellion and on religion, he stated things which frightened the priests. I am obliged to visit every month the Fathers (priests) of the district. Once all the priests met together and they put the question, is it possible to allow that man to continue in his religious duties, and they unanimously decided that on this question he was not responsible, on these questions; that he could not suffer any contradiction on the question of religion and politics, we considered that he was completely a fool in discussing these questions; it was like showing a red flag to a bull, to use a vulgar expression.

"Q. When he spoke of religion, the principal thing of which he spoke, was it not the supremacy of Pope Leo the 13th?—A. Before the rebellion he never spoke directly on that question as to the supremacy of the Pope.

"Q. On that question he was perfectly reasonable?—A. On religious questions before that time he blamed everything, he wanted to change Mass, and the liturgy, the ceremonies and the symbols.

"Q. Is it not true that the prisoner has fixed principles in his next religion?—A. He had the principle that he was an autocrat in religion and politics, and he changed his opinion as he wished.

One further extract from Father André's evidence:

"Q. When he spoke to you of religion do you remember what he said to you?—A. I know he was talking to me about changing the Pope or some thing of that kind, wanting to name Bishop Bourget, of Montreal, Pope of the New World as he named it; he spoke to me several things about religion that I cannot remember.

"Q. Did he say anything to you about the Holy Ghost or the Spirit of God?—A. Yes, he said in my presence, not to me exactly, that the spirit of Elias was with him.

"Q. Did he say he had any of the divine attributes that are generally attributed to Elias?—A. That is what I think he meant by that.

"Q. What did he say about it as far as you can recollect?—A. He wanted the people in the meeting to acknowledge him as a prophet and he gave them to understand that he had the spirit of Elias in him and that he was prophesying."

Now, Sir, it is perfectly manifest from these extracts that on the subjects of religion and politics and Government, Louis Riel entertained most extraordinary delusions—delusions which appear to me to be wholly inconsistent with the possession of a sound and rational mind. Let me here again, for the sake of brevity, summarise: He was not only a temporal prince, he was the sovereign pontiff of a new church; he was a prophet, a priest, a king. The mantle of Elias had fallen upon him. The power of the papacy that withstood the conflicts and turmoils of countless revolutions for 2,000 years, and that stands to day as fresh and vigorous as ever, was to fall before the unaided arm of Louis Riel. He was inspired of God. He could foretell future events and was in constant communication with spirits in the unseen world. He was to redress the wrongs of humanity and especially was he to right the grievances of the half-breeds, and, as he believed, aided by the Almighty there was no such thing as failure to his mission. And yet it is argued in the press, on the public platform in Parliament, that Louis Riel was a sane and responsible being. One or two things appear to my mind incontrovertible. Either Louis Riel was the greatest fraud and the most consummate actor that ever walked the human stage or else he was a madman insane on religion and politics, and, therefore, one who ought not to be executed. In my judgment he was not a fraud; he was not the most consummate actor that ever trod the political stage. I shall now endeavor to sustain the principles of law which I have laid down, by specific authorities bearing on this case, and if I can establish that then I think I can satisfactorily establish the proposition that Louis Riel, entertaining those insane delusions on religion and politics, was not a responsible being with regard to a crime within the scope of those delusions. Woodman and Tidy in their work of Forensic Medicine at page 857, say:

"One monomaniac will insist that he is possessed by a devil, whilst another believes that he is truly the Trinity."

And at page 824 the same authors say:

"Religion and politics are enumerated by all writers on insanity as a cause of insanity."

Wharton and Stille at page 122 say:

"A common instance is where a man fully believes that the act he is doing is done by the immediate command of God; and he acts under the delusive but sincere belief that what he is doing is by the command of a superior power, which supercedes all human laws and the laws of nature."

In such a case the man acting under delusion is not responsible. The same authors say, at page 829 :

"Remember that mental unsoundness on one point does not always mean insanity on all points. In other words, a man may be perfectly capable of managing business ; his brain may have all its intellectual vigor, and yet he may be morally unsound, and his moral unsoundness may lead him into crime."

The authorities show that men laboring under these limited delusions are quiet and inoffensive except when opposed or excited or when their delusions are touched upon. Upon that subject, the evidence is perfectly clear that except upon the questions of religion and politics, Riel was quiet, inoffensive and rational. He contended that he came to the North-West to fulfil a mission and he was invited to come there. A delegation of the employés of the Government went to Montana and brought him there. He was there for some time talking in the way I have pointed out by the evidence, and laboring under those manifest delusions. But we have this startling fact to show that Louis Riel was no traitor to his Sovereign ; that at a public meeting where 150 half-breeds were present, in the open light of day, he made a speech, and in concluding that speech he proposed the health of our Sovereign Lady the Queen. Can it be argued that a man, taking that line of conduct, was a traitor? Whatever he may have been, it is quite manifest that he was not a traitor to the Queen. No doubt he was a traitor to this Government. If that constitutes crime, which deserves the punishment of death, then all I can say is, that he sinned with a host of loyal Canadians. On the theory of insanity, the authority, to which I have just referred, states further :

"Partial insanity has been much disputed, but in reality is a well marked variety, although often difficult to recognise. In this the subjects of it are often sane upon all points but one. Religious mania may be considered a monomania. Such patients are seldom violent unless they meet with opposition."

Let me now give you a few instances in the history of medical jurisprudence, taken from the law reports, of men laboring under limited delusions, who have been declared not responsible for the crimes they committed. Woodman and Tidy refer to the case of a scientist who desired, for his own satisfaction to investigate the different forms of insanity, and with that object visited an insane asylum. He knocked at a door, and the door was opened by a gentleman who he supposed was one of the keepers. The visitor went around the institution accompanied by this guide, who referred to one patient after another, described their different delusions, and gave their histories in the clearest and most intelligent manner. At last they arrived at a man who was sitting in a thoughtful and silent mood in a corner, and the stranger said to his guide: "Under what form of madness does that man labor?" "Oh," said the guide, "that man is laboring under many forms of madness. Why, that man imagines that he is the Holy Spirit, and, would you believe it, I, who am standing before you, am the Holy Spirit in truth and reality." That was the man's sole delusion. Now, let me put this case: Suppose some other man had entertained the same delusion, and had said: "I am the Holy Spirit, and I challenge you to deny it;" and suppose he had killed the other, could it be argued for a single moment that the man who committed that crime would be responsible to the law of the land? I say no, it could not be so argued. Woodman and Tidy refer to another case which occurred in the life of Lord Erskine. While practising at the English bar, Lord Erskine was retained to defend a man who indicted his brother for false imprisonment in a mad house. Lord Erskine was not informed of the peculiar nature of this man's delusion, and with the view of exposing his hallucination he cross-examined him in the witness box for a whole day. His answers were clear and distinct, and Erskine could not budge him, until, at last, Dr. Sims, the physician of the institution, came into the court room, and said to Lord Erskine: "This man believes that he is the

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

Lord and Saviour of mankind." Erskine then addressed the witness who was prosecuting his brother, in that character, lamenting the indecency of his ignorant examination. At once the man forgot himself. In the face of the whole court he expressed his forgiveness to Lord Erskine for the mistake he had made, and said: "I, in truth, am the Christ," and that was the man's sole delusion. In everything else he was perfectly sane. Now, I say that Lord Erskine might have cross-examined that man for a week or month, and to every answer he would have received a sane and rational reply until he touched the man's peculiar delusion, and the moment he touched that his insanity appeared as clear as the noonday sun. Had that man been tried in a Canadian court for a political crime and been prosecuted by this Government, he would have been convicted, because, under the theory hon. gentlemen opposite are acting upon, if he could distinguish between right and wrong, he would be responsible to the laws of his country which he had violated. Another instance, given by Woodman and Tidy, is the case of a man who was tried before Lord Mansfield for a very serious crime. In order to test the man's mental condition Lord Mansfield examined him for a whole day, and he could not discover in him the slightest trace of insanity; his answers were clear and rational, until the prisoner's physician came into the court and asked him what had become of the princess with whom he had corresponded in cherry juice. Instantly, the prisoner forgot himself, and said: "It is true, I was confined in a castle, where, for the want of ink, I wrote letters in cherry juice to the princess, and threw them into the stream below where the princess received them in a boat." That was the man's sole delusion, and it settled his case at once. But if he had been tried in Canada under the direction of this Government, he would have been convicted because he could distinguish right from wrong. Let me refer to another case. Who, in reading works on medical jurisprudence and the law reports, has not come across the case of Edward Oxford, who was tried, in 1840, for high treason, in shooting at Her Majesty the Queen? Edward Oxford was a man who entertained peculiar dreams, he was a man of bad heart and ill-regulated understanding, so far as one can judge from the evidence. The delusions under which he labored bear in every feature a striking parallel to those of Louis Riel. According to the report of the trial, Oxford was a great man in his own estimation; he was to become a great hero; he was to become famous at a single bound; he was to become Admiral Sir Edward Oxford, although he had never been at sea and never had undergone any training whatever. Let us see what Riel was to be. He was to be the prince of a new nation, the arbiter of the destiny of England and Canada; he was to be the sovereign head of a new church; he was to establish a new nationality in the North-West, composed of and divided into several nationalities; he was the inspired of the Almighty; the mantle of Elias had fallen upon his shoulders; he was to conquer England and Canada; he was to be the supreme ruler over all. If anything, the delusions under which Louis Riel labored were more absurd and ridiculous than the delusions under which Edward Oxford labored. The one was tried for high treason and acquitted on the ground of insanity; the other was tried and convicted of high treason and was hanged by this Government. Every student of medical jurisprudence or who has seen the law reports knows of the case of Daniel McNaughton, who was tried, in 1843, before Chief Justice Tindal and Judges William and Coleridge, for the murder of William Drummond. The delusions of McNaughton bear the most remarkable resemblance to those under which Riel labored. McNaughton was a man of education, of some training, and of remarkable intelligence upon every question, except one. His business correspondence produced at the trial indicated great business prudence and intelligence and a thoroughly well balanced mind. But he labored under one delusion. He imagined that the Tories of his own country persecuted him and wronged him; he imagined, that no odds where he went, they followed him; he travelled abroad to escape them, but they dogged him everywhere, and he returned to England, went to a shop, deliberately purchased a pistol, and, waiting his opportunity, he fired at and killed Mr. Drummond, believing Mr. Drummond to be Sir Robert Peel, the then chief of the Tories in England. He was arrested, tried and acquitted on the ground of insanity. The law in its leniency, spared him the penalty of his crime. It was a blessing for him and his friends he was not tried in Canada. There are many points of similarity in this case and that of Louis Riel. Riel was a man of education, considerable training, and great shrewdness in most things. Some of his correspondence shows that; other correspondence of his, that on religious and political topics, indicate, beyond doubt, that he had an ill-balanced mind; he believed the mantle of Elias had fallen on him and that he was inspired by God. He violated the law of the land, was tried and convicted, and, notwithstanding his manifest delusions and the recommendation of the jury to mercy, he was hanged. The cases I have submitted to you, Sir, are cases on all fours with the case of Louis Riel. The English prisoners properly escaped on the ground of insanity. In England they do not hang lunatics; but the Canadian prisoner, although beyond doubt a lunatic, was executed by this humane Government, not in obedience to the law, not to vindicate the majesty of the law, but in obedience to an unseen and irresistible power behind the throne. Now, I shall discuss for a moment or two the evidence of the doctors, because hon. gentlemen opposite say their testimony establishes, beyond doubt, that Riel was insane. I do not propose to analyse the testimony of Dr. Roy or Dr. Clark called for the defence, further than to say that both these men are noted experts on insanity on which subject both have something more than a Canadian reputation. Both had opportunities to examine Riel; one had him under charge for nineteen months as a lunatic, and thus had opportunity to diagnose his case and speak with absolute confidence as to his sanity or insanity. Both were decidedly of opinion that Riel labored under delusions, and was not a responsible agent in matters of religion and politics. The Crown called Dr. Wallace, of Hamilton, to rebut the evidence of the experts I have mentioned. Dr. Wallace declared that he examined Riel for one-half hour, and I recommend the evidence of Dr. Wallace to the attention of those hon. gentlemen who propose to sustain the Government on the motion under discussion. Referring to the evidence called for by the Government themselves, I say no intelligent man whose mind is unbiassed can rise from its perusal without being thoroughly impressed with the fact, that as regards religion and politics, Louis Riel was as mad as a March hare. Dr. Wallace, on being cross-examined by Mr. Fitzpatrick, gave the following evidence:—

“Cross-examined by Mr. Fitzpatrick.

“You have no doubt whatever in your mind, from the examination you have made of this man during half an hour, and from the evidence which you heard here, that he is of perfectly sound mind? A. Well, I should qualify, that is, I should qualify my answer to that question. I have had only a limited examination of him, and in any case of obscure mental disease it sometimes takes a very long time before one can make up their mind, but from what I have seen of him I say that I have discovered no symptoms of insanity.”

Here is a doctor, called by the Crown to rebut the testimony produced by the prisoner, and he says: “It would be presumption on my part to say that Riel was not insane. I have had men in my asylum for months before I could discover traces of insanity”—and yet this witness is expected to convince an intelligent House of Commons that the evidence which is based on an examination of the prisoner, lasting during the long period of half an hour, of a man he never saw or knew anything of before, is wholly irresistible.

“Q. Therefore you are obliged to say that all that you have discovered in this case, or all that you are now in a position to say, is that you have not discovered any traces of insanity?—A. That is all my conscience will allow me to say.”

The doctor further says, speaking of megalomania:

“It is a condition in which the patient has delusions, grandiose delusions, delusions of greatness.”

And again, he says:

“Q. The delusions are that he is rich?—A. Yes.

“Q. And powerful?—A. Yes.

“Q. A great general?—A. Yes.

“Q. A great minister?—A. He may be a great anything and everything.

“Q. A great prophet?—A. Yes.

“Q. Or divinely inspired, or that he is a poet or a musician, in fact that he is an egotist and selfish man?—A. Yes.

Here is an expert, or a man who professes to be an expert, who tells us—what? That he examined the prisoner for half an hour, that his examination was a very limited one, that in obscure cases it takes a very long time to discover insanity, that it would be presumption in him to say that Riel was not insane, that his conscience would not allow him to say whether he was insane or not, that in his own experience it takes weeks to discover symptoms of insanity—a thing this doctor undertook to do in half an hour—but that Riel had all the symptoms of the disease known as magolomania. Yet, in the face of the bold and emphatic declaration of the two other medical men, a human life has been sacrificed. The only other medical man called by the Crown was Dr. Jukes, an employee of the Government, who has had the candor to tell us he knows nothing about insanity, and is therefore not an expert. He is asked the following questions, and gives the following answers:—

“Q. Have you devoted your attention to insanity at all specially, or not?—A. Never specially, there are cases of course which occasionally will come under the notice of every general practitioner, but as a special study I have never done so.

“Q. Every medical practitioner, I suppose, has his attention more or less directed to it?—A. Occasionally I have been called upon to certify in cases of insanity.

“Q. And you have never spoken to him on the particular subjects with reference to which he is supposed to have his delusions?—A. Name the subject.

“Q. On religion, and on his mission with reference to the North-West Territories?—A. I have never spoken to him on either.

“Q. You said, doctor, that you had not made any endeavor to ascertain, during the intercourse that you had with Mr. Riel, whether or not he suffered from any particular mental disease? Did you notice any form of insanity, or any mental disease, unsoundness of mind?—A. I never specially examined him as a lunatic, I never made a special examination of him as a lunatic.

“Q. You never made any special endeavor to discover whether or not he was suffering from any particular form of mental disease?—A. Never any special endeavor, anything beyond ordinary conversation of the day.

“Q. Is it not a fact there are different forms of insanity, which are not discoverable except after considerable endeavors has been made to discover them?—A. Yes; it is so, unquestionably, that you may converse with the man continually and not be aware of his insanity until you touch accidentally, or some other person touches accidentally upon the point upon which he is insane.

“Q. Had you been informed at any time of the particular mental disease from which Mr. Riel was supposed to have been suffering?—A. I don't think I ever knew as much of it as I have learned here.

“Q. So that you never made any endeavor to?—A. I never did, that is, I never spoke to him specially with regard to what he believed to be his mission, knowing that many very sane men might be so, and yet a man might be perfectly sane.

“Q. So that you have no doubt at all, doctor, from the evidence that you heard here given by the different witnesses who were examined, the conduct of Mr. Riel is perfectly compatible with a perfectly sound mind?

Now, mark this answer. The doctor says:

“Well, I regret to say that my hearing is rather imperfect in the court room and that I have not been able to hear as well as I could wish.”

He goes further than that. He says:

“If it can be proved that a man is acting under an insane delusion, then any act I should consider which he performed under the delusion, any act having special relation to his delusion, I should consider that he was not personally responsible for.”

Now, let me here again summarise the evidence of these medical men. Here is a witness called for the Crown, who honestly tells us he is not an expert, that he knows nothing about insanity, that the most he knows of insanity is that, as a medical man, he has occasionally signed the certificate to send a man to gaol who is notoriously a lunatic, that he never spoke to Louis Riel on the subject of his delusions, that he never examined him as a lunatic, that he never spoke to him on the subject or made any attempt to discover whether or not he was subject to delusions, he admitted that he was deaf and could not very well hear what was going on, and he admitted that, if a man is subject to delusions and commits a crime within the scope of those delusions, he is not responsible for it. We are asked on that evidence to justify the Government for hanging this man. I say it is not sufficient to justify them. I say it is not enough to justify the hanging of a dog, let alone the hanging of a man. There is another aspect of this case which I wish to discuss for a moment. From the 15th March, when the first indication of an uprising took place, down to the trial of Louis Riel, and down to the execution of Louis Riel, there were doubts in the minds of many thoughtful men as to Louis Riel's sanity. After the trial, there were grave doubts as to Louis Riel's sanity. There were grave doubts from the medical testimony, there were grave doubts from the facts elicited at the trial and from the acts and conduct of Louis Riel; and yet this Government never took the first step to settle these doubts until one week before Louis Riel was consigned to the gallows. One week before the day fixed for the execution, this Government authorised three medical men to examine Louis Riel, not one of whom was an expert in insanity cases, and all of whom were the paid employes of this Government. Is that the kind of commission that is reasonable, sensible, thoughtful men expected that this Government would issue to test the sanity of a man about to be executed for a crime he was alleged to have committed? When the petitioners asked the Government to appoint a commission to test this man's sanity they expected they would appoint a commission of experts, a commission of experienced men, who would be prepared to report irrespective of the views, the inclinations, the desires, or the sympathies of the Government. Instead of that they appointed three of their employes, three men who ought not to have been appointed, men who knew nothing about insanity. These men examined him, and they made their report a week before the Regina scaffold received its victim. The report of one of them is dated the 8th November. That report, in the ordinary course of mail, would reach Ottawa certainly not before the 13th November. On the 12th November, on Thanksgiving Day, this Government passed an Order in Council to execute Louis Riel, and the warrant to consign him to the scaffold was signed on the 12th November. Her Majesty's representative in this Dominion was aroused from his midnight slumbers on the 12th November to sign the warrant which consigned this man to the gallows before that report could, in the ordinary course of mail, have reached its destination at Ottawa. I charge that this Government, without waiting for the report of the medical commission, independently of the medical commission, passed the Order in Council, without knowing what the report of the medical commission was, to execute this man who was alleged to be a lunatic and whom I believe to have been laboring under these insane delusions. That fact is manifestly clear, and I challenge contradiction of it. Further, when the honorable and gallant knight who presides over the Militia Department of this country, found that he was getting into difficulties with some of his own countrymen, because it was said that he had fled to the North-West to avoid being present at the Council which decided the fate of Riel, his chief wrote him a letter on the 3rd November, stating that Sir Adolphe Caron was present at the Council Board when the Government decided to hang Louis Riel. I say the Government decided to hang him without waiting for the report of the medical commission, and the proof is under the hand of Sir John Macdonald himself. But does the report justify the action of the Government? No. On the contrary, I say this report in the clearest possible manner strengthens and confirms the evidence given at the trial by Dr. Clark and Dr. Roy. Dr. Valade, one of the commissioners, says:

"I have come to the conclusion that he suffers under hallucinations on religious and political subjects."

Why, that was the defence, that was the only defence, that was the real defence, that he suffered under hallucinations on these two subjects. That was proved, in my judgment, beyond all doubt. Dr. Valade, it is true, states further that Louis Riel could distinguish right from wrong, but I have shown very clearly that that "right and wrong" theory is no test of the insanity of a man who commits a crime, when insanity is set up as a defence. I say that, if you take the evidence of Dr. Valade, and leave out what he ought not to have put in his report, that "right and wrong" theory in regard to insanity, which was exploded before Dr. Valade was born, as he ought to have known, that evidence confirms in every respect the evidence of Dr. Roy and Dr. Clarke. So Dr. Lavell, who is another employe of the Government, says that Louis Riel suffered under delusions on political and religious subjects. That was a complete defence. I say this "right and wrong" theory is wholly inexcusable in medical men, I do not care who they are, and they cannot justify that theory by any modern work upon medical jurisprudence or upon insanity, and they cannot justify it by any case in the courts of any country that I know of, at all events. Now, Sir, if Dr. Valade and Dr. Lavell know no more about the other branches of their profession than they do about insanity, and the true test of insanity, all I can say is, that I would not like to be placed under their care. Then, we have the reports of Dr. Jukes. Why did the Government send Dr. Jukes? I ask the Minister of Public Works why? They knew from the report of the trial that he swore he was not an expert—that he knew nothing about insanity. The idea of sending a medical man, or any man, who knows nothing about insanity, or who is not an expert, to test a man's sanity, is a farce; in this case, unfortunately, it is too solemn a farce to be trifled with, but it is inexcusable in the Government of this country, and wholly unjustifiable at that. They were not limited in their choice. They had the United States and Canada to choose from, and they surely could have found some men known as experts to test this man's sanity. Now, Sir, let me read from the report of Dr. Jukes, of the 6th November:

"Louis Riel has been under my special care medically as surgeon of the force for upwards of five months. During that time I have visited him with few exceptions every day, have studied him closely and conversed with him long and frequently. After careful and continuous examination which under varying circumstances from day to day I cannot escape the conviction that except upon certain purely religious questions, he was when first entrusted to me and still continued to be perfectly sane and accountable for his actions."

Turn to the sworn testimony of Dr. Jukes and see how that confirms the statement he makes. He says:

"I never specially examined him as a lunatic, I never made a special examination of him as a lunatic * * * Never any special endeavor, anything beyond ordinary conversation of the day * * * It is unquestionably true that you may converse with the man continually and not be aware of his insanity until you touch accidentally, or some other person touches accidentally, upon the point on which he is insane."

Now Sir, there you have the answer of Dr. Jukes to Dr. Jukes, and he admits that Louis Riel was laboring under a delusion upon the subject of religion, and so stated at the trial. Now, Sir, we find this Government, careless and negligent as they are, must have had something more than doubts upon Riel's sanity, and to hang a man, with doubts of that kind hanging over the question of his sanity, is nothing more than judicial murder. Why, again, did the Government hang Louis Riel? Where was the justification in the medical testimony and in the evidence of medical men, and in the examination of witnesses at Regina? I say Mr. Speaker, that the Government of this country never intended to hang him, until the power and pressure of an unseen and irresponsible power became so strong, that they compelled the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald to hang Louis Riel. That power has kept this Government in power for many long years; that power was never reconciled to the expenditure of public money in order that Louis Riel might escape the vengeance of the law for the murder of brother Scott. That power demanded, at the hands of this Government, that the blood of Brother Scott should be avenged by the blood of Louis Riel. That power was too strong to resist, and brother Sir John A. Macdonald yielded to that power. Am I overstating the fact? I am not overstating the fact. Turn to the Orange Sentinel, the organ of the Orangemen. The hon. member who preceded me challenged contradiction upon this subject. He said the Orangemen did not thirst for the blood of Louis Riel to avenge the death of brother Thomas Scott. Sir, I say the expressions in the organ of the association and the resolutions in the lodges of the association which found their way to the Government, insisted upon the Government shedding upon the scaffold the blood of Louis Riel. The Orange Sentinel of 6th August, 1885, a few days after the trial, and before the question of the man's sanity or insanity was settled otherwise than by the evidence at the trial, says this:

"We hold that it is the duty of the Government to take no notice of this recommendation to mercy, but in the interests of the Dominion at large to let the law take its course."

The Sentinel proceeds to argue in favor of the execution of Louis Riel, because "He committed a most foul and atrocious murder upon a loyal Protestant subject."

If he had committed it upon a Papist it would have been all right, but he committed it upon a Protestant subject.

"The blood of his many victims cries aloud for vengeance."

On the 10th September, the Sentinel says:

"Riel has been fairly tried and convicted, and the sentence of the court must be carried out."

That is the mandate—the sentence must be carried out—no attention to the recommendation to mercy, no attention to a further investigation as to his responsibility—that sentence of the court must be carried out. A correspondent who signs himself a Deputy Master of Loyal Orange Lodge No. 1041, Chatham, on the 29th of Oct., 1885, says:

"As a representative of the Orange body, I wish to remind Sir John Macdonald, who belongs to the same organisation, that a very solemn responsibility devolves in him in connection with the fate of Riel. If Sir John should interfere to pardon a twice-convicted rebel and the murderer of Scott, he will make justice a mere mockery, &c."

On the 29th October, 1885, the editor says:

"In pressing on the Government the necessity of hanging Riel during the first outbreak under his personal direction, a man whose only offence was loyalty to the British Crown was ruthlessly butchered. The blood of Thomas Scott yet cries aloud for justice."

Upon the 6th November, brother Morton, in Toronto, in the meeting of Loyal Orange Lodge No. 821, said:

"And shall this arch-rebel go free while loyal Orangemen have stained the ground with their blood to uphold the Queen's authority? Never. (Loud applause). And the sooner the Government of Sir John Macdonald understands the true feeling of Orangemen on this question, the better. I was pleased to notice in the speeches of County Master Somers, District Master Wilson and Bros. Graham and Low the determination expressed that if the Government allows Rome to step in on this occasion and secure a reprieve for this arch-traitor, the Conservative party can no longer count upon their services, although they have worked and voted for them for many years."

Here, Sir, from the organ of the Orangemen are a pronouncement, a declaration, a command, a threat. You must hang Louis Riel to avenge the blood of Thomas Scott, or else we, Orangemen, who have stood by you in good report and in evil report, who never deserted brother Sir John A. Macdonald—we will vote against you at the next general elections. That is not all. I propose to read the expressions of opinion given by some of the Orange associations to show the real cause why this Government disregarded the recommendation to mercy, and the evidence of insanity given at the trial. On the 10th September, at a regular meeting of the Loyal Orange Lodge No. 884, at Merriton, the following resolution was unanimously adopted, not a dissenting voice:

"At the regular meeting of L.O.L. No. 844, Merriton, held in the hall 2nd Sept., the following resolution was unanimously adopted: 'Resolved, that we, the members of the above lodge, believe that Riel, the arch-treasurer of the North-West Territory, having been tried and convicted of high treason and sentence passed, that the sentence should be carried out and Riel executed, and we will, to the utmost of our power as electors, constitutionally oppose any Government that will commute the said sentence, or interfere to prevent being carried out.'"

"Signed on behalf of the lodge,

"Wm. SMITH, W.M.,
"T. W. WILSON, Sec."

Here is the command in its bald simplicity. The sentence passed on Louis Riel, right or wrong—let the man be sane or insane, it must be carried out—otherwise every Orangeman in the lodge will vote against the Government. This resolution was no doubt sent to Bro. Sir John Macdonald, who adds to his other dignities that of Knight of the Royal Scarlet. The command had to be obeyed, it was obeyed and Riel was hanged in obedience thereto. A member of L.O.L. No. 693 writes to the Sentinel, in September, 1885, and declares:

"That if Riel is not executed the Conservative candidates will lose almost every supporter in the peninsula."

At the regular meeting of L. O. L. No. 1457, Nelson, Man., it was resolved:

"That we will refuse to support any Government which will not see that justice is meted out to all those who have been engaged in the rebellion."

L. O. L. No. 1505, on 22nd September, adopted the following resolution:—

"That this L. O. Lodge strongly urges upon the Government the importance of carrying these decisions into execution without delay," &c.

At a meeting held on 22nd September, 1885, in the lodge room of Dominion City, L. O. L. No. 1499, the following resolution was passed:—

"That we, as members of L. O. L. No. 1499, view with distrust the action of the Government, through the Governor General, in granting the respite to that arch traitor, Louis David Riel, and, in effect an attempt to thwart the ends of justice. We, therefore, refuse to support any Government who so interfere and permit those implicated in the North-West rebellion to escape the penalty of a righteous sentence."

The following resolution was passed by L. O. L. No. 300:

"That we, as Orangemen, view with feelings of fear and regret the present position of the Louis Riel matter—although condemned to be hanged on the 10th of last month, but still lives. We strongly recommend that no subterfuges be allowed, nor any delay given through which this justly condemned rebel leader may escape. We also strongly wish our brethren throughout Canada to join hands in preventing any outrage in this matter to our Queen and country, whom we as Orangemen have united to cherish and protect."

At the regular meeting of L. O. L. No. 80, Peterborough, held the 30th November, 1885, the following resolution was passed:—

"That L. O. L. No. 80 sees with regret the obstacles that are being put forward to prevent the just penalty from being meted out on the scaffold to the rebel Riel for his many crimes; and that this lodge is of the opinion that no further respite should be granted him, but that he should suffer the extreme penalty of the law, and be hanged in fulfilment of the sentence passed upon him; and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald."

"Wm. JAMIESON, Secretary."

At a meeting of L. O. L. No. 425, held on the 5th November, 1885, it was resolved:

"That we, as loyal subjects of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen, deem it our duty to urge upon our representatives in Parliament the necessity of an honest, manly and fearless administration of justice in the execution of the fairly tried, twice condemned and sentenced arch rebel and murderer Louis Riel."

Time will not permit to read all the resolutions, even those under my control. Not only do I charge this Government with being influenced by the loyal Orange body, but to the everlasting disgrace of the members of that body, scarcely had the soul of Louis Riel appeared before his Maker than they gloated over the execution which had taken place on the Regina scaffold. At the regular meeting of L. O. L. No. 1528, held at Moosomin, four days after the execution, the following resolution was passed:—

"That we, the members of L.O.L. No. 1528, do hereby congratulate the Government in carrying out the death sentence passed on the arch rebel and traitor, Louis Riel, and that the blood of our murdered brother Scott is at last avenged after a period of fifteen years, and we pledge ourselves to support the Government which has shown that justice will be dealt out to all classes, no matter what their creed may be, and, furthermore, should any trouble arise through French or Roman Catholics interference with the administration of our laws or rights, we will support the Government and our constitution and laws, even to shedding our blood in defence of the same."

Not satisfied with having executed Riel they met in solemn conclave and passed a resolution congratulating the Government on the tragedy that had taken place. At the regular meeting of L. O. L. No. 1222, the following resolution was passed:—

"That we the members of Boyne L. O. L. No. 1222, here assembled, desire to express our satisfaction that the law has been permitted to take its course in the case of Louis Riel, the leader of the North-West rebellion, who, on Monday, the 16th November, paid the penalty of his many crimes, and who was responsible for the loss of many valuable lives, among whom were two members of our noble order."

A manifesto was issued by the Royal Grand Black Chapter of Western Ontario, and in that manifesto appears the following language:—

"We believe that in no time in our history as a Grand Black Chapter have our principles of loyalty, love, and truth been more confirmed than at present, when treasonable devices are so glaringly accomplished, and when Romanism is so energetically engraving itself into our civil institutions, and when even a late rebel and arrant traitor to our country is held up as a saint and martyr, beatified by large portions of the Liberal press, even the Globe itself, trying to turn the world upside down on the axis of the rotten Riel agitation."

"Never did we need to be more watchful than to-day in the view of the aggressive policy of our vigilant enemies, and, when not only men, but our very institutions are in danger. But we are persuaded that He who rideth on the Heavens will laugh, the Lord will have them in derision."

Sir, I charge further; I charge this Government and the First Minister of this Government, with having on the day of the execution, within a few hours of that event, received more than one telegram from members of Orange lodges declaring: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; we will all vote for thee for ever more!" Will they deny that? Will the First Minister or the Minister of Public Works deny it? We shall see. But that is not all. Not only did the Orange lodges and Orangemen clamor for the blood of Riel and gloat over his tragic fate, but they threatened those who believed that a lunatic was executed by this Government. Let us see what they said:

"Let it be proclaimed that the rights and liberties of Britons in an English colony, hang upon the breath of an alien race."

That is to say, Frenchmen!

"But English Canadians will not longer suffer the galling bondage; and the day may not be far distant when the call to arms will again resound throughout the Dominion."

Not satisfied with pressing on the execution, and gloating over the tragic fate of Louis Riel, they threatened those who honestly believed that the Government did wrong in executing a semi-lunatic. The Mail, the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, said on 3rd November, 1885:

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

"Let us solemnly assure them (the French Canadians) again that rather than submit to such a yoke, Ontario would smash Confederation into its original fragments, preferring that the dream of a united Canada should be shattered forever."

That is a warning to you, French Canadians, to take care of yourselves. If you vote against the Government, if you vote to turn them out of place and power for hanging a man whom you honestly believed insane, we will shatter Confederation into its original fragments. The Mail said further:

"As Britons we believe the conquest will have to be fought over again, and Lower Canada may depend upon it there will be no treaty of 1763. The victors will not capitulate next time. * * But the French Canadian people would lose everything. The wreck of their fortunes and their happiness would be swift, complete, and irremediable."

Beware, take care, French Canadians! British law does not protect you in the eyes of the Mail and the Orangemen of Ontario, if you vote against the Government. If you vote with them it is all right, but vote against the Government who hanged a man whom you believe to be a madman, and the conquest of Quebec will be fought over again, and there will this time be no treaty of 1763. This time the conquerors will not yield to those who were the vanquished. Was there ever anything in any country, in any party, in any organisation more scandalous, more disgraceful and outrageous than this? Thirsting with unquenchable thirst for the victim's blood, gloating with inhuman delight over the victim of the Regina scaffold, and then threatening with conquest a free Province and denouncing a great and chivalrous race because they saw fit to oppose a Government who they honestly believed executed a man who ought not to have been executed. Now, Sir, I say that in view of all these facts, in view of the refusal of this Government—a course, as I say, unknown in criminal practice—to give this man a reasonable time to prepare his defence; in view of the obstructions of every kind thrown in the way of the defence at the trial and before the trial; in view of the objections to the admission of evidence which would prove as clear as the noonday sun which shines above our heads at mid-day, that the Government of this country are alone responsible for all the misfortunes that followed the rebellion in the North-West; in view of the surrender of Louis Riel, as I honestly believe, under the impression that by so surrendering his life would be spared; in view of what I believe to be clearly established—the insanity of Louis Riel; or taking the lowest possible view of it, in view of the fact that his sanity was in doubt, and the disregard of this Government for the plainest principles of common justice, to give every person the benefit of the doubt; in view of the evidence in this case, the facts I have submitted to you, I say I am amply justified in the conclusion I have come to: that the Government of this country deserve condemnation at the hands of the people of this country. I say, moreover, that for four months—the period that elapsed between the conviction and the execution—this Government literally trafficked in the destiny of a fellow mortal. I say that during all the time from the conviction of Louis Riel to his execution this Government were balancing in the scales the problem of a human life. I say that during all that period this Government were throwing the political dice over the living body of Louis Riel—fixing his fate as Orange or Bleu might prevail. I say that Louis Riel was not executed to vindicate justice or maintain the majesty of the law. I say he was executed because of the pressure of this irresponsible power, and I say that the motives by which the present corrupt, incompetent, imbecile Administration, were actuated and moved, when a human life was concerned, deserve the condemnation of this House, and I believe they will receive that condemnation at the hands of the people of this country. I shall vote for the motion.

Mr. CURRAN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11:20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 15th March, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The First Minister stated, the other day, that it was desirable that we should go on from day to day with the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), and as I see that the motion stands at the foot of the list, I would move, seconded by Sir Adolphe Caron:

That immediately after questions put by members, this House resume the adjourned debate on Mr. Landry's proposed motion, being the 35th Order of the Day, and that the said Order shall continue to be the first Order of the Day until disposed of.

Mr. BLAKE. Is that motion in order?

Mr. SPEAKER. It requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman objects, of course I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BLAKE. I object because the Government has not fulfilled its duty in preparing the House for the motion which it seeks to press on.

Motion withdrawn.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 44) to incorporate the Bow River Coal Mine and Transportation Co.—(Mr. Robertson, Hastings.)

Bill (No. 45) respecting the Dominion Lands and Colonisation Companies, Limited.—(Mr. Beaty.)

RIVER ST. LAWRENCE NAVIGATION.

Mr. LANGELIER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 46) for facilitating the navigation of the River St. Lawrence in and near the harbor of Quebec.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Would the hon. member say if his Bill contains anything else than the repeal of the Act of last Session?

Mr. LANGELIER. The Bill repeals the Act of last Session, and puts into force the by-laws which were repealed by the Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY FROM ESQUIMALT TO NANAIMO, B.C.

Mr. POPE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 47) respecting the railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, B.C.

Mr. BLAKE. Explain.

Mr. POPE. There is not very much to explain. The curvature on the road was fixed by statute, and it has been found, in building the railway, that sharper curves are necessary and will not be detrimental. It is intended to change the curvature from 7 to 10.

Mr. BLAKE. Do you think it is necessary to have an Act of Parliament to take a sharp curve like that?

Mr. POPE. All I can say is, that I am being instructed very rapidly. I hope in another year or two to be able to take it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ENQUIRIES RESPECTING RETURNS.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders of the Day I desire to call attention to an Order of the House passed on 29th April last, for copies of correspondence between the Indians of the Fort William Reserve, or any one on their behalf, and the Indian Department, and between the Indian Department and Indian Agent, whether by telegraph or otherwise, on the subject of the action taken under the existing timber licenses. That Order has not been complied with as yet, and I am desirous of making a motion on the subject to which it refers.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Will the hon. gentleman send a memorandum across the House.

SECOND READINGS.

THE NORTH-WEST DISTURBANCE—MAJOR-GEN. LAURIE AND MAJOR-GEN. STRANGE.

Mr. CASEY asked, Was Major-General Laurie on the list of the active militia when he went to the North-West, and was he ordered to proceed there on duty? Was he gazetted as an officer of the active militia during the campaign? If so, when and to what rank? In what capacity did he serve, and at what rate of pay? Was Major-General Strange on the active militia list on March 27th, 85? If not, when was he gazetted, and to what rank? What command did he hold during the campaign? By whom appointed, when, and at what rate of pay?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Major-General Laurie, when he went to the North-West, was retired from active command in the militia. The date of his retirement was 30th June, 1882. He was sent out by the Minister with instructions to report himself to the Major-General in command, who gave him a command. He was not gazetted as an officer of the active militia during the campaign. He served as commander at the base of operations at Swift Current and Moose Jaw. His rate of pay was $8.76 per diem. Major-General Strange was not on the active militia list on March 25th, 1885. He was appointed to the temporary rank of Colonel in the militia during the period the militia was called out for active service in the North-West, by an Order in Council of 27th April, 1885. He was gazetted on 15th May, 1885, by general orders. He held the command of the Alberta field force. He was appointed by Order in Council as above stated. His rate of pay was $12.16 per diem.

NORTH-WEST LAND SALES.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, What number of sales of land was made by the Department of the Interior in the North-west Territory during the year 1884, also in 1885, and the gross amount received each year from such sales?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It would take considerable time to prepare the number of sales of land made, and I cannot therefore answer the question put by the hon. gentleman. Such an answer would involve an examination and calculation of all the fortnightly returns made by the agents, which would occupy time. The amount received by the Department in 1884 was $640,295; 1885, $240,059.

CASE OF LOUIS RIEL—PETITIONS, &c.

Mr. VANASSE asked, Whether the Government received, during the months of August, September, October and November last, petitions, letters, telegrams, or other communications, written or vis à voce, from Hon. François Langelier, M.P., Hon. W. Laurier, M.P., Hon. M. R. Laflamme, Hon. M. H. Mercier, M.P., Hon. F. X. A. Trudel, Senator, Hon. J. Bellerose, Senator, Hon. J. Bte. Guévremont, Senator, Mr. Ernest Pacaud, Editor of L'Electeur, Quebec, or from other persons, praying for a commutation or for the exercise of the Royal clemency as regards the sentence of death pronounced against Louis Riel, for the crime of high treason of which he was found guilty?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am not aware that the Department over which I preside has received any such communications. Of course, some of the names mentioned appear in some of the petitions, a list of which is at the end of the pamphlet which is now before the House. In connection with the matter I beg to say that if the mover for copies of the petitions wants the whole of the petitions re-copied, I am informed it will take a great deal more time than is necessary. I had intended, as many petitions appear under one heading, to arrange the headings and give the number of signatures under each, if that would be sufficient for the object of the hon. gentleman, and then we could have them soon. If not, it will take a great deal of time.

HOMESTEADS IN THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BELT.

Mr. BLAKE asked, How many homesteads have been entered within the Canadian Pacific Railway belt up to 31st December last, between: 1. The first and second principal meridians; 2. The second and third; 3. The third and fourth; 4. The fourth and fifth?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The answer to this question is being prepared, and as some of the enquiries involve a good deal of examination, if the hon. gentleman allows the Sir ADOLPHE CARON, question to stand as a motion, the papers will be brought down in a day or two.

NEGOTIATIONS ON THE FISHERY QUESTION

Mr. MITCHELL asked, Whether there are any further despatches, or other papers connected with negotiations on the fishery question, in addition to those laid before the House of Commons during the last Session of Parliament, and if there are, will they be brought down to date?

Mr. FOSTER. There are some further despatches, and they will be brought down as soon as, and as far as they can be, consistently with the public interest.

POINT PELEE (NAVAL RESERVE).

Mr. LISTER asked, 1. Whether the residents of Point Pelee (Naval Reserve) have petitioned the Government to make grants to them of the lands which they claim to be in occupation of at that place? 2. Whether the Government appointed a surveyor to make a survey of the said reserve? And if so, what is the name of the surveyor? When was he appointed? Was such survey made? And has a report been submitted to the Government? 3. Was, or is it, the intention of the Government to make grants to such occupants? 4. Whether the Government has leased the said reserve or any portion thereof? If a part only, what part? Who is the lessee? What is the date of the lease? What is the term created thereby? The rent reserved, and how is it payable?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The squatters on Point Pelee have petitioned the Government to give them grants of their holdings. Mr. Alexander Baird was authorised, 10th September, 1881, to make a survey. His plan and report are filed in the Department of the Interior. It is the intention of the Government to make grants to such occupants, if the Admiralty authorities make no objection. The portion of Point Pelee not held by squatters was leased to Albert Chatfield et al, for 21 years from 6th April, 1885, at an annual rental of $400, payable half yearly in advance.

CASE OF LOUIS RIEL—REPORTS OF DR. VALADE AND LAVELL.

Mr. AMYOT asked, 1. When were the reports of Drs. Valade and Lavell received by the Government? 2. Were the medical reports of Drs. Lavell and Valade, which are brought down, made by telegraph or by letter? 3. Were there any reports, telegrams or letters as to the mental condition of Louis Riel sent to the Government by either Dr. Valade or Dr. Lavell, other than those already brought down, and if so, will they be laid before the House?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The reports of Drs. Valade and Lavell were received by the Government shortly before the passing of the Order in Council of the 12th November, recommending that the law should take its course. The medical reports of Drs. Valade and Lavell which are brought down—that is, the documents submitted to the House, as the hon. gentleman is probably aware, are themselves in the form of letters. The substance of these reports—that is to the same effect and almost in the same words—were, however, communicated by telegraph in advance of the letters. The third question is therefore partially answered by what I have said, the same report having been made, as I have said, by telegraph. It is not intended that these telegrams shall be laid before the House; in fact, the telegrams, which were sent in cipher, and which were of the same nature as the reports laid on the Table, were returned to those who sent them, when the formal and official papers were sent.

QUEBEC AND LEVIS FERRY SERVICE.

Mr. LESAGE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take in hand forthwith the establishment of the ferry to connect the two shores between Quebec and Lévis and thus afford us direct communication with the railway systems of the other Provinces and of the United States?

Mr. POPE. Some time ago there was an amount put in the Estimates for this purpose, and I presume, when the Estimates come down, an amount will be included for that purpose.

HAY TAX IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, What tax per ton is charged the actual settler in the North-West, who cuts for his own use, over fifty tons of hay on Government land in that territory? When the quantity exceeds a hundred tons, what tax per ton is imposed?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Recently instructions have been sent to the Land Board at Winnipeg to alter the regulations with regard to hay, so that now settlers buying hay for themselves pay ten cents per ton for any quantity they may require. Persons like merchants who buy hay for trade, pay $1 per ton, as under the former regulations.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What were the former rates?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). From 1 to 20 tons, ten cents per ton; from 20 and up to 50, 25 cents per ton; over 50 and up to 100, 50 cents per ton, and over 100, $1 per ton.

EDWARD MIALL'S PAMPHLET AGAINST CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. McCRAVEY asked, By whose authority did Edward Miall, Commissioner of Inland Revenue, prepare, publish and circulate, during 1885, a pamphlet containing arguments against the Canada Temperance Act and the principle of prohibition? Did he do so under instructions from, or with the approval of the Government? By whom was the cost of printing and publication defrayed; if by the Government, what was the cost, and what remuneration did Mr. Miall receive?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not know that Edward Miall did publish and circulate, during 1885, a pamphlet containing arguments against the Canada Temperance Act and the principle of prohibition. If any such pamphlet was published, it was not by instructions from the Government, nor was the cost of publishing paid by the Government.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—B. C. SECTION.

Mr. EDGAR asked, 1. Was the Government section of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia completed and accepted by the Government when the Order in Council of 29th July, 1885, was passed, which recites that it was then completed, and authorises its transfer to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? 2. Has that section of the railway been yet completed to the satisfaction of the Government? 3. Has it yet been transferred to or accepted by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? 4. If not yet accepted by the Government, are the contractors still operating it for their own benefit? 5. Have the Government received a copy of the tariff put in force by the contractors on this section? 6. Has the Minister of Railways obtained any legal advice since 18th May, 1885, with respect to the right of the contractors to use the rails supplied by the Government for the transport of traffic for their own profit, and, if obtained, is it favorable to the contractors?

Mr. POPE. 1. It was practically completed, but not accepted by the Government; 2. The chief engineer has not reported, nor has his final certificate been issued; 3. It has not yet been transferred to or accepted by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; 4. Mr. Onderdonk is carrying the mails for the Government; 5. If Mr. Onderdonk is carrying freight and passengers, it must be at the request and for the accommodation of the people of the interior of that Province; 6. The Minister of Railways has obtained no legal advice.

Mr. EDGAR asked, 1. What is the total amount paid by the Government to the contractors for the Government section of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia? 2. Have any claims been made by the contractors for further payments on account of their work on this section; and, if so, to what amount and for what description of work?

Mr. POPE. The total amount paid for the five Government sections to which I suppose the hon. gentleman refers, is $10,220,357. No claim has been made to the Department, but Mr. Onderdonk has verbally intimated that he has some claim.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—STATEMENTS TO THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, 1. Have the Government any statements as to cost of operating the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal to the end of line; and of receipts from sales? 2. Have the Government requested any such statement from the Canadian Pacific Railway; and, if not, do they intend to do so? 3. Have the Government received or demanded from the Canadian Pacific Railway any statement of the amount of their receipts due to articles or persons conveyed on said road in connection with construction? 4. Does the Government intend to require separate statements from the Canadian Pacific Railway in reference to receipts and expenditures on—(a) The main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, (b) The several lines leased by the said company?

Mr. POPE. 1. Nothing further than appears in the papers laid on the Table, giving the operations of the railway since its completion; 2. All statements asked by the House have been applied for; 3. They have not; 4. This has been applied for, but the company state that they are unable to furnish it, as they have not kept their accounts separate.

COUNTERFEIT GOVERNMENT BONDS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Have any of the 5 per cent. bonds recently redeemed by the Government turned out to be counterfeit, and, if so, to what amount?

Mr. McLELAN. No.

INDEMNITY OF MEMBERS—CASE OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. FARROW moved:

That it is expedient to provide that members of the House of Commons of Canada and members of the Senate of Canada who may be absent from the House by sickness, in themselves or families, though not in Ottawa during such sickness, shall not be deprived of their indemnity by such absence.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I move in amendment that the 35th Order of the Day be now called.

Mr. BLAKE. I beg to enquire whether the motion of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Farrow) is in order. As

I understand, there are two objections to it—1st, that any procedure of this description must be initiated in committee; and, 2nd, that at the very commencement it must be recommended by the Crown. As the First Minister asked that it might stand, in order that he might bring down that recommendation, and he has not brought it down, I presume that the motion of the hon. member for Huron is not in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The resolution of the hon. member for Huron is not a motion to go into committee. It is only an abstract resolution barren of result. It is quite in the power of the House to adopt that resolution if it thinks fit, although a Bill could not be founded upon it. There would have to be some further proceedings taken, such as going into committee on a similar resolution, and such a resolution would have to be recommended by the Crown before being adopted. But I do not see anything objectionable in this abstract resolution. Resolutions in similar words have been adopted in the English House of Commons.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the motion in amendment of the hon. Minister of Public Works in order?

Mr. SPEAKER. Oh, yes. Last Session there was a similar motion made to supersede a motion before the House and to pass to another Order of the Day. A motion was made to supersede the consideration of the Canada Temperance Act.

Mr. BLAKE. My recollection is that your ruling was that one Order of the Day could be superseded by another Order of the Day. However, if it be your ruling that this amendment is in order, I wish very briefly to state my reasons for objecting to it, which I have already indicated in exercising my right of objecting to the procedure proposed by the hon. Minister of Public Works a little while ago. I object to it because the Administration are pressing on the consideration of this question, while, at the same time, they are failing to fulfil their obvious and imperative obligation to the House of providing it with the materials in their hands for the proper consideration of the question. I say they have no right to arrange this debate as they propose to arrange it, and it is nothing less than indecent for them to press on the decision of this question while they withhold the materials which are necessary to a right judgment upon it. Why, Sir, what did we hear a moment ago? Look at the answer which was given to the question of the hon. member for Bellechasse. Look at the fact that the materials on which the Administration acted with reference to the question whether this sentence should be commuted or not, have been suppressed, that the Government have handed them back to the men who sent them. They have been handed back—why? Because they were the same as those brought down? No, Sir. If so, they would never have been handed back, but because they differed from those brought down, because we have here cooked-up documents. The Government did not choose to bring down the documents we required; these documents are not accessible, they are not available, they are not to be had—and they ought to be had before we proceed to discuss this question. It was but a few weeks ago we saw in the public papers the statement that Dr. Lavell was up in Ottawa arranging about his report in the case of the Riel investigation. I suppose it was at this time these letters were prepared. I know not when they were prepared or received, but it is obvious from the dates they could not have been sent by mail in time to form the basis of action by the Administration. The Administration acted upon the cipher telegrams, and we find the Government has placed these telegrams out of their possession and put them in possession of the doctors who sent them. The Government ought to call on the doctors to bring them back, and the Government should bring them down to the House, so that the House may see exactly what was said, and the difference between what was said then and what is said now, which difference was so material that it was deemed expedient to hand back the telegrams to the gentlemen who sent them and have these letters prepared in their stead. There are other statements asked by this House, which I will not enumerate, because they are in the Orders which have not been brought down. The necessity for the production of these was unanimously agreed to by this House; the Administration did not decline to produce them, but they practically say: We will not let you have them although we agreed to your demand for their production, because we insist upon your coming to a decision before you get them. It was the duty of the Administration, knowing that these papers would be wanted, to have had them prepared and ready to bring them down, and to have brought down voluntarily all of them instead of some. Some they have brought down. They have brought down their own selection; the rest it was their duty to have prepared. Not having prepared them, it is not their duty to insist on departing from the customary Order of the House by pressing on the debate, saying, on the one hand, It is too soon to bring down the papers, and, on the other, We want you immediately to proceed to judgment.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). If it had not been for the warmth with which the hon. gentleman has just spoken, I should have been exceedingly surprised at the charge he made against the Department over which I unworthily preside, in reference to the question put by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), which I answered a few moments ago. I should have been surprised to hear it stated, in relation to so important a matter as this, by a gentleman occupying that hon. gentleman's position, that the material on which the Executive acted has been, in any sense of the word, suppressed, or that the telegrams, which I stated to the House were in effect the same as the documents laid on the Table, were not the same, or were suppressed, destroyed, or delivered back to those who sent them because they were not the same. I should have been surprised also at his statement that the documents laid on the Table were cooked documents. I beg to say, on the responsibility which rests upon me as a Minister of the Crown, and speaking for my colleagues as well, to give those three statements the most direct contradiction. The documents have not been suppressed. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) did not even ask that they should be produced, but asked whether it was the intention of the Government to bring them down; and my reply stated it was not proposed to bring them down, and I gave the reason. The documents are substantially the same, and therefore the statement that the telegrams have been suppressed because they are not the same as the documents on the Table is not correct, and the documents on the Table, so far from being cooked, represent to the House what those doctors represented in the cipher telegrams and contain the information upon which the Government acted. I regret that the hon. gentleman should have seen fit to make such grave charges of mal-administration, as he avows he did, upon the mere fact that he saw in some paper the statement that one of the physicians was manufacturing his report in Ottawa. I have only to say, with regard to the papers wanted from my Department, that papers have been asked for which require to be sent for as far as Regina. They have been telegraphed for, and are on their way, and other papers—a wheelbarrow of papers—the copying of which will take some time yet, will be brought down as soon as possible. I have laid on the Table, however, all the documents immediately connected with the trial, which are all it was possible to prepare at so short a notice.

Mr. MILLS. I do not see why the hon. Minister had any occasion for surprise, after the explanations he gave. If I rightly understood him he informed the House the telegrams were not exactly the same as the letters, though to the same purport, and he does not inform the House why the Government should have taken so extraordinary a course as to return those telegrams.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I did not say they were not the same.

Mr. MILLS. If the Government acted on those telegrams, they must have known that their production, and not the production of letters written or received subsequent to the action of the Government would be required by the House. It is not the opinion of those gentlemen after the determination of the Government was arrived at, that we want, but their opinion before, and on which the Government acted, and if the hon. gentleman had submitted those telegrams he would not have been called on to make any defence. We saw a letter published in the papers not long since of the First Minister defending his colleague, the Minister of Militia. That letter informed the country that the Minister of Militia was in his place in the Council Chamber at the time it was determined that Riel should be executed. He left for Winnipeg long before the 12th; and here we have information given to the House that this determination was arrived at and the Order in Council was passed on the 12th November, after the hon. gentleman had been at Winnipeg. We are anxious to know why Mr. Crawford, the leader of the Orangemen, waited on the hon. Minister, and what the information which he imparted to the Minister as to the state of public feeling in Winnipeg, and what were the communications which the Minister made to the leader of the Government as to that feeling before the execution of Riel. It will strike a great many as very extraordinary, if the Government had determined on the execution of Riel, that no communication should have been had before the Minister went to Winnipeg. Up to this moment the House is left largely in the dark on this question, and we find the Minister of Public Works seeking at this moment to force on this question, when the Minister of Justice tells him that the Government have not themselves in their possession the necessary papers to communicate to the House. Surely it is important that the House should have an opportunity of fully considering this question. Under our system certain judicial functions devolve upon the Government. The Government have in some measure to act as a court of review to consider criminal cases, and we want to know upon what grounds the Government proceeded, especially seeing that the Government carried out the extreme penalty in the case of a person who was recommended to mercy by the jury who found him guilty. The hon. gentleman proposes that the House shall go it blind, and that the Government shall be sustained before the House has an opportunity of considering all the papers relating to the subject.

Mr. CASEY. I think there is one sentence alone in the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Justice which is quite sufficient to defeat this amendment. I will not deal with the disappearance of the telegrams which he tells us have disappeared, but which he says were not suppressed, because that is too obvious a matter; but, in his explanation, he says he has to-day laid a mass of evidence upon the Table of the House, a lot of important papers which were vital to the case, yet, in ten minutes after he has laid those papers upon the Table of the House, he expects us to go on and consider the question to the consideration of which they are necessary. Can those papers be taken off the Table and handed around to everyone to read? How can we consider them until they are printed and distributed? The proposition is so absurd on the face of it that it shows that the Government do not wish us to see those papers before we discuss that question. If they did, they would not propose to go on with the discussion on the very day and at the very moment when those papers were laid upon the Table of the House. To suppose that they could be of any use to us in this discussion is quite absurd, and the Government do not suppose it. The hon. gentleman told us that for a number of the papers required he would have to send up to Regina. He does not say, but we can easily understand, what papers are there. We know they are some of the most important papers in the case. Is it not an extraordinary and outrageous thing that papers of this vital and important character, which it was known that Parliament would ask for, should have been left in Regina for all the months that have elapsed since the execution was carried out? Why are they in Regina, and not in the Department of Justice? Why are they not prepared and printed and ready to be laid on the Table? The answer is not far to seek. It is because the Government do not wish us to have this information. Their whole course since the beginning of the discussion shows that they do not wish us to have the information, if they did they would have had it ready before the House met. So far from that, it was the motion of the member for Montmagny which they had ready before the House met, while the necessary information was in Regina or in Winnipeg, or in the ends of the earth—everywhere, in fact, except where it ought to have been, in the Department of Justice, or in the printing office or ready to be laid on the Table of this House. Then, the day of the motion is arranged between the Government and the hon. gentleman who poses as the opponent of the Government, but who will be found not to be an opponent of the Government, who does not pretend to be their opponent except for the purpose of this motion. I say the day is arranged between him and those whom he appears to accuse. The Government are on their trial. They select their accuser; they select the form of the indictment; they arrange the day of the trial; they select the evidence to be laid before the jury which is to try them; and then, when the ordinary rules of the House stand in their way, when it appears that these rules are going to give the House some of that opportunity for obtaining information from the meagre and stunted evidence laid before it, the Government, by a side wind, by what I cannot call anything but a trick, avail themselves of a technical opportunity to bring on the question by an amendment to the first motion on the notice paper. It is a bad stroke of policy on the part of the Government. The Minister of Public Works may think it is a clever stroke to get on the debate, but he will find that before the country it is a bad stroke of policy. It is an evidence of cowardice. The Minister of Justice may make all the statements which he has about the contents of these papers being the same—and we have to take his statement as a Minister of the Crown and a member of this House, but can the House believe that all this mystery was got up for nothing, can we believe that there was any reason for this mystery unless it be that there was something to hide? The House will not believe it, and the country will not believe it, and the only effect of the course pursued by the Minister of Public Works—a course of which I should not have believed him capable until to-day—is to prove the cowardice and the abject fear of the Government lest we should get the facts in regard to this case. The Government are on their trial in regard to a matter which they say is such a grave question that they will not go on with any business until it has been tried. If so it is too grave to be tried on the pretence of evidence, the make-believe of evidence, which they have laid before us. That evidence is lacking in the documents which are necessary to a decision, and this House cannot protest too warmly or vote too strongly against the extraordinary proposition of the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Mr. LAURIER. Ever since the events of November last, the Government have professed that they were anxious to meet their adversaries face to face, and yet they thought it necessary to lay their defence before the public in the memorandum of Sir Alexander Campbell, in the first part of which he says :

"The opponents of the Government have asserted that the rebellion was provoked, if not justified, by their mal-administration of the affairs of the North-West Territories, and inattention to the just claims of the half-breeds. With this question, which has been made one of party politics, it is not thought becoming to deal here. Upon such a charge, when made in a constitutional manner, the Government will be responsible to the representatives of the people, and before them they will be prepared to meet and disprove it."

But when this question was brought before the House the other day, the Minister of Public Works professed his gladness that he was able to meet his adversaries face to face. Well, is the Minister anxious for a fair fight? Is this the way he wants this question to be settled before this Parliament? Why, he wants to fight the battle in darkness, not in the open light of day and, Sir, the more I look into this matter, the more it seems unwarrantable on the part of the Government; for, if I understand aright the explanations which have been given to-day by the Minister of Justice, this report, which was recently laid before this House, of the doctors who examined Riel, was actually written after Riel was in his grave. Therefore, I say the question now before the House is whether we are ready to discuss this question with all the facts before us, or to discuss it in darkness. I hope my hon. friend beside me will press this motion to a division, so that we may know whether the House is willing to approve or disapprove of the Government without any of the facts before us.

Mr. MITCHELL. This question is of so much importance that I think we ought carefully to consider what we are doing before we vote upon it. Now, Sir, I will not say whether the Government have challenged the sentiment of the House upon this question, by inducing the motion which is under consideration; but I say this, that they have fairly and broadly met the motion by accepting the gage which has been thrown down, and challenged public discussion in relation to it. Now, Sir, how have they done it? We find we are shut off by the previous question being moved, and are shut off from having that free discussion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I say yes. I say they have prevented that free discussion which every member in this House has a right to expect, because we can formulate no distinctive motion upon which to test the opinion of the House upon it, therefore I say they have not met this question as I would like to have seen it met by gentlemen with whom I have acted so long—met it in a manly, independent way. Again we find to-day another step taken in the way of avoiding free discussion and interfering, as they do interfere, with the right of private members to deal with the business which is before this House, a large amount of important business having to be postponed in order to discuss this question which may take up many days yet. Now, Sir, I am as ready for the discussion of the Riel question as any man in this House, and as ready to express my opinion in relation to it; but I am not prepared to say that all the business we private members have, much of which is upon the paper to-day, should be postponed, and perhaps delayed from week to week, and, finally, at the end of the Session, the Government doing as they always have done—as both Governments have done—come in and take up the whole week, and thus prevent the private members from conducting their legislation before this House. Now, Sir, I simply wish to express my opinion upon this matter, and I think the course pursued is unfair. If we are to have a discussion on the merits of the Riel question, we should have it with the papers before us. We should not leave it in the mouth of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who have been challenging the Government for not bringing down the papers which they have asked for, to say that anybody in this House voted to prevent the consideration and discussion of this question before we had the fullest information which is in possession of the Government, in order to enable gentlemen on both sides to arrive at a proper and just conclusion. Therefore, I feel compelled to say it is unfair for the Minister of Public Works to press his motion. I am not going to express an opinion favorably or adversely to the remarks made by the leader of the Opposition in relation to the statement made by the Minister of Justice; I am not going to offer an opinion whether the papers laid before this House are a correct transcription of the cipher telegrams or report of the medical experts appointed to examine the sanitary condition of the late Riel; but I will say this, that it does look very shady and looks very suspicious to find that this written report which is laid upon the Table of the House was received by the Government after Riel was executed, and that the cipher telegrams, which they state are substantially the same as the written report, have been returned to the persons who wrote them. What is the object of that return? Is it for concealment? or was it to promote the ends of public justice? or what end was to be served by it? I regret to say that the case presents such features as makes me, at least, very suspicious about the correctness of the returns sent in.

Amendment agreed to.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Landry (Montmagny): "That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution," and the motion of Sir Hector Langevin: "That this Question be now put."

Mr. CURRAN. Mr. Speaker, I deem it proper, in rising to address this House to-day on this most important question, to say one or two words with respect to the position I occupy in connection with this debate. It has been my duty upon former occasions to address this House upon questions involving very great feeling, and I may say here in presence of all my friends, that whatever I have said on former occasions upon any question affecting the interests of the country, or affecting the interests of any class in the country, I adhere to to-day. It is my painful duty on this occasion to differ with a large number of those with whom I have been in the habit of working in the past, and I regret to see them separating themselves from me and the friends that surround me; but whilst I do regret that, whilst I regret to be obliged to raise my voice in opposition to their views, I feel I should be unworthy of the position I occupy if I did not come out boldly and manfully, and state what I believe to be for the true interests of the country in this great agitation that has been brought about by men who, I think, have acted with precipitation and without duly considering the results of their action. Not only in one section of this country, where I have had an opportunity of denying the statements made, but even in my own division slanders have been circulated with regard to myself. All I have to say, and I take this opportunity of saying it, in the presence of this House and the country, is, that my ambition has been to represent my fellow citizens of Montreal Centre, that they have sent me here by an overwhelming majority, and having placed their confidence in me, I shall not desert them so long as they stand by me in this Parliament, and I trust, with their confidence and still greater assent, if possible, more emphatically given, to have the honor of representing them in the next Parliament. It becomes my duty to follow one of the speakers on the other side of the House who made a most violent address last Friday night. Some portions of that speech I will refer to very briefly indeed. The gist of nearly all the hon. gentleman said he chose to say on an exceedingly low level, and if I am obliged to follow him upon that ground, he cannot complain; if I am obliged to fight him on the ground he has chosen himself, he cannot complain; and he cannot complain if I am obliged to show that while in the political parties in this country, as in the political parties of every country, there is in both sides bigotry to be found, yet in the Conservative party the brains are ahead of the bigotry, whilst in the Reform party the bigotry is ahead of the brains. The hon. gentleman spoke in the first instance with respect to the legality of the trial. He agrees with the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) that the trial was a legal trial, that it had all the elements of legality about it, but he pretended to say that the trial was not a fair trial. I say on this occasion that I am surprised to find a gentleman calling himself a lawyer who pretends to say that a trial can be legal without being fair,

What is the test of fairness? The only test of fairness is that which is established by law; you cannot go beyond that; the judge cannot go beyond the law, and if a man has had his full benefit of the law—for the law as it stands on the Statute Book is the test of fairness—he has had a fair trial. But I find in this respect the hon. gentleman is absolutely and positively in contradiction with his own chief. The leader of the Opposition made a speech some time ago at the city of London, where a great banquet was given him on his return from England, and speaking on this very subject he said:

"I think it right to say that, in my opinion, the Government acted in a very proper spirit in providing for the attendance of the prisoner's witnesses, and, from what I know of the leading counsel, I should think it impossible that in their management of the case there was anything unfair to the prisoner or derogatory to the high character they deservedly enjoy in the responsible duties they undertook to perform."

The hon. gentleman, however, said that there was one great element of unfairness in the trial—that his trial had taken place before a jury composed exclusively of Protestants.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I did not say that.

Mr. CURRAN. Would the hon. gentleman have wished that Riel upon that occasion should have been tried by a jury composed exclusively of Catholics? What a howl would have gone throughout the length and breadth of the country if at that time Louis Riel, who was an apostate from his Church, was at variance with the authorities, who had committed many acts of cruelty, of sacrilege, and other acts which it will be my duty to mention in the course of this speech, had been put upon trial before men whose faith he had trampled on, whose Church he had desecrated, and whose most cherished convictions he had despised and spat upon. What was the statement of that unfortunate man in the course of the speech that he addressed to the jury upon that occasion? I hold in my hand the official report of that trial, and at page 150 I find the infamous language that that unfortunate man used to the venerable Archbishop who had brought him up, clothed him, fed him and educated him. He spoke of him, and in reference to one of the witnesses, a Mr. Ness, he said:

"One of the witnesses here, George Ness, I think, said that I spoke of Archbishop Taché and told him that he was a thief. If I had had the opportunity I proposed I would have questioned him as to what I said so that you would understand me. I have known Archbishop Taché as a great benefactor, I have seen him surrounded by his great property, the property of a widow whose road was passing near; he bought the land around and took that way to try and get her property at a cheap price. I read in the gospel: 'Ye Pharisees with your long prayers devour the widows.' And as Archbishop Taché is my great benefactor, and as he is my father I would say, because he has done me an immense deal of good, and because there was no one who had the courage to tell him, I did, because I love him, because I acknowledge all he has done for me. As to Bishop Grandin, it was on the same grounds. I have other instances of Bishop Taché, and the witness could have said as the Rev. Father Monlin: 'When you speak of such persons as Archbishop Taché you ought to say he made a mistake, not that he committed robbery.' I say that we have been patient a long time, and when we see that mild words only serve as covers for great ones to do wrong, it is time when we are justified in saying that robbery is robbery everywhere and the guilty ones are bound by the force of public opinion to take notice of it. The one who has the courage to speak out in that way instead of being an outrageous man becomes in fact a benefactor to those men themselves and to society."

Why did he make that speech? Because the jury were Protestants, and he thought he could raise in their minds prejudices and sentiments towards himself of a more friendly kind. Now, we have also heard from the last speaker that the recommendation to mercy had been entirely ignored. Before I get through with my observations I may refer to some other cases in which this recommendation has also been overlooked; and I can say, having had considerable experience myself in matters of that kind and from what I have read, that this recommendation to mercy is in a great measure just as the hon. Minister of Public Works has expressed it—a desire on the part of the jury to relieve themselves to some extent of the responsibility for the verdict which they gave, and throw that responsibility through that means on the shoulders of the Executive. But we have also heard from the hon. gentleman that this unfortunate man Riel had given himself up to General Middleton, and that therefore he should be free—that therefore he should never have experienced the sad fate which befel him. Why, Sir, do we not all know, have not we all lived through those troubles, have not we all seen what took place, and is it not in the memory of every man that Riel was not on that occasion afraid of the trial that was to come, on the part of the Dominion Government, but was afraid that he would be murdered on the spot by the indignant volunteers—was afraid not only of the whites who were there, but was afraid and perhaps still more afraid, of the dire vengeance of the half-breeds whom he had deceived? The last point to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and referred at very great length, was with reference to the insanity of the prisoner, and as that question has been raised by other speakers as well, I shall endeavor to deal with his arguments and those of the other speakers at the same time. However, he wound up his speech, Sir, by an appeal to the feelings of the Catholics of this country. He sought to arouse in their minds the idea that this man had been sacrificed to Orange fanaticism, and with that point I shall endeavor to deal in the course of my remarks. But before proceeding to do so, allow me not only on general grounds, but more particularly from the debate which has taken place this afternoon upon the question of proceeding with the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry)—let me refer to the astounding position of certain gentlemen in this House upon this question. Why, Sir, is it possible that these men think they can throw dust in the eyes of the whole people of Canada? Is it possible that these gentlemen imagine for one moment that the people of Canada do not know what has taken place, not only in the city of Montreal, but throughout the length and breadth of the Province of Quebec? These gentlemen get up and say: We want papers; we want documents; we cannot make up our minds; we are absolutely in the dark; we do not know how to vote; we cannot decide this question. I ask, what papers did these men ask on the Champ de Mars? What papers did they ask when they manufactured effigies of the right hon. leader of the Government and effigies of the gentlemen who represent the French Canadian nationality in this Cabinet? When they manufactured them and set fire to them, after hanging them up, what documents did they ask for? Had they any doubt upon their minds then? Did they ask for documents to show that these men had acted like honest and upright men and good citizens of this country? What documents were asked for by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), when he stood on the Champ de Mars that day? Did he stand up and say—

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to correct him? I did not stand on the Champ de Mars. I was not there.

Mr. CURRAN. The gas question was occupying that hon. gentleman's mind; he was there endeavoring to throw light upon the subject. But, Sir, a more important man than the hon. member for West Ontario was there—a man of greater importance on this question and in this Parliament, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) was there when the resolution was passed declaring these hon. gentlemen traitors to their country, their nationality and their creed. Did he hesitate? Did he want documents then, when he stood up and said that if he had been on the borders of the Saskatchewan he would have had his musket on his shoulder. Did he stop there? Why, no, Sir, he did not. He was on the point of carrying out a steady march away off to the city of Toronto, there to exhibit the Saskatchewan musket. True, he changed his mind; true, he did not go there with his musket. And later on, Queen's Hall in Montreal was engaged for the hon. gentleman and his friends to speak once more as he had spoken on the Champ de Mars. He was to go there with his musket and show them the drill, but the only drill he performed was, right about face and march home again. There is still more than that in the picture presented to us, when members' counties were invaded, and when as honest and upright men they said, Let us have time; we in the Province of Quebec have followed our leaders for years; we have had confidence in them; we have believed them to be honest and conscientious men; give us time to read the documents and we will then pronounce. No; they were denounced as traitors, and a whole army invaded every county; they were taken by the throat and forced to give expression to their opinions whether they liked it or not. We have had this magnificent spectacle to-day just as we had on the occasions I have referred to. On both those occasions we have had three different lines adopted with regard to this unfortunate man Riel. We had him paraded and gibbeted before the public as a hero, a martyr, and a fool; those were the three points upon which they spoke with such tremendous force. Now, Sir, why was this agitation confined to the Province of Quebec? Why was this hero, this martyr, this unfortunate and insane man merely made a martyr, a hero and a fool of in the Province of Quebec? We have been told here by the able and eloquent representative of the Metis in this House, and we have all read in the admirable speech of the hon. Senator Girard in the other House, that the Metis are a distinct people, that they have their own genius and their own customs, that they are no more French Canadians than they are Irish Canadians, that although they have some French blood in their veins, they are a distinct people by themselves. Louis Riel was at one time the leader of that people. Why have we not seen in the heart of the settlements of the Metis in Manitoba or in the North-West Territories a single meeting called by any of the Metis people whom he was supposed to represent, to protest against his execution, or to say that it was either an act of cruelty or one for which the Government should be condemned? More than that, we have had an appeal made to the Irish Catholics of the Dominion to join in this Quebec national movement. What would have been the result if a warning voice had not gone over the length and breadth of the land, if it had been possible for those who were stirring up this agitation to join together in one all the French Canadian and Irish Catholics of this Dominion? Why, Sir, we should not only have had the war of races these gentlemen threaten us with, but we should have had a war of religions as well; and looking at the state of the population, I ask my Irish Canadian friends and my French Canadian friends as well, what must have been the inevitable result of the contest these men were seeking to force upon us? Have we been told what these gentlemen protested? Have we been told that they took any action in regard to the matter with the Irish representatives of the House, of whom six are on this side of the House, and not one on the other side, which is in itself a pretty strong mark of where the bigotry lies? Neither myself nor any of the other five Irish Catholic representatives in this House was ever approached by any of the French Canadian members and asked to take part in any proceedings for a reprieve for Riel. But, living as I do in the city of Montreal—having been born and brought up there—amongst my French Canadian friends, and having among them as many sincere and warm-hearted friends as among any other section of the community, I took upon myself, when I heard that a report was going about, that in spite of the agitation made by the newspapers, that certain parties had told the French Ministers that the people of Quebec would not be excited if this man were executed—I took the trouble myself to come and tell the hon. Ministers that any man who said the French Canadian people would not be excited was speaking either on a subject he did not know anything about, or else in a manner that he thought would suit his own purposes. I told the Ministers that it must be understood that, through the agitation of the Rouge party in the Province of Quebec, there would be an attempt made to excite the people there, and they must adopt the course that was best calculated to serve the interests of the country—that if it was possible, consistently with the interest of the country to extend mercy to do so; but I felt it my duty to inform them what the state of the public mind was at the time. That I did without any solicitation on the part of any member of this House of the French nationality, and I take this opportunity of saying so publicly. Well, Sir, on the eve of execution I was called upon to express myself. It had probably never been thought worth while by the gentlemen taking part in the agitation to call upon me, until it was all over with this unfortunate man. Then I was called upon to sign a telegram to the Premier of this Government to tell them that this act was an act of cruelty. I was called upon to do this by men who to-day say that they cannot decide, that they are in the dark, that the documents have all been concealed, that there is nothing before this House. Why, Sir, what do these gentlemen mean? Have we not the information before this House? Have we not the indictment? Have we not the evidence? Have we not the verdict? Have we not the charge to the jury? Have we not the documents of the appeal from one end to the other? Yet these hon. gentlemen tell us we have no documents. To those who sought to coerce and who did threaten me, I replied, Gentlemen, if I never give another vote in the House of Commons, I will stand up for what I conceive to be right; during the 25 years that I have been working hand-in-hand with the French Canadian Conservatives in the Province of Quebec—during all those years in which I have sacrificed time and labor to help to return many of those gentlemen to this House as they have returned the compliment to me, I have never yet backed down from doing what I thought the French Canadian people were entitled to; and come what may, I never shall. I admire and love that people for their great virtues, noble chivalry, and the many marks of resemblance between them and the nationality to which I belong; but on an occasion of that kind, when the country, I conceived, was imperilled by the action of agitators, no consideration could induce me to fail in performing that which I felt to be a duty in conscience, in honor, and in patriotism. Now, Sir, as regards the position of this unfortunate man and his first rebellion, I do not intend to speak myself; but I do intend to give this House, at a later stage, perhaps, the evidence of a witness who spoke not merely as a private citizen of the Dominion, but as the leader of the Opposition in the Province of Ontario. If we take the history of the second rebellion, we find, put before the country, a document signed by six reverend gentlemen at Prince Albert. That document has been published and circulated and quoted upon the platform, and I have heard men who actually have had the audacity to say that it had been prepared by Government officials, and that these six clergymen were so lost to all sense of shame and consideration for their holy office that they signed it and sent it forth to the country, although it did not contain the truth. I do not propose for one moment to use that document again; I have other and more important papers to which to refer, and my reference shall not be made to any speech of the leader of the Opposition, or to any quotations from statements of his, or to any documents formulated or issued by the Government or in any of the Departments of the Government. I hold in my hand a work that, at all events, every Catholic throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion will believe, namely, the "Annals of the Propagation of the Faith." These volumes are published in London, and the one I refer to is the November number of 1885, number 276. These annals are published with reference to Catholic missions all over the world, and are under the special patronage of Leo the XIII and the Cardinals and Archbishops of the Church. I find here not merely what regards this trial itself, but, in fact, all the information those hon. gentlemen are so anxious to have before they will undertake to pronounce their verdict. An article in the September number says:

"We publish a touching letter on the civil war which ravaged Canada and caused the deaths of two missionaries, the Rev. Fathers Faford and Marchand."

I shall not read the whole of the document, but will begin at the point where the insurrection itself is spoken of. It says on page 333:

"The following narrative, forwarded to us by the Rev. Father Fourmond, completes the account given by the venerable Bishop, points out the causes of the different phases of the insurrection, and records several episodes illustrating the admirable faith of the Christians of the diocese of St. Albert:—

"About a year ago, some 30 agitators, under pretence that the Government violated their most sacred rights, frequently assembled secretly in the woods, and beneath the shadow of the gigantic firs, hatched their plots and bound themselves by oath not to divulge to any one the subject that had in view. Of course we disapproved highly of these secret proceedings, and the consequence was a sudden irritation excited against the clergy: the populace accusing us of no longer favoring their interest as we used to do. One of the first acts of these assemblies was to send to the shores of the Missouri, across the Canadian border, in search of the too famous Riel, the great chief of the Metis movement in 1870, who had since that event become an American citizen, and discharged the humble duties of teacher, under the direction of the Rev. Fathers of the Society of Jesus at Montana."

It goes on to state how this man was received in triumph by the people. He made long prayers, professed the most loyal sentiments, and, says the good missionary: "I congratulated him on his good qualities; he caused great edification, and was looked upon as a saint." On the 4th September, however, Monseigneur Grandin came to the settlement. Monseigneur, who know Mr. Riel well, could not share in the general feeling of confidence. He said:

"I cannot help feeling a great fear or dread of that man's influence and a heavy fear for the future that awaits us. These fears were only too well justified. During the six months and that followed, Riel continued to deceive the public and clergy by his persuasive words and apparent piety, and played the true wolf in sheep's clothing—the angel of darkness disguised as an angel of light. He chose the beautiful feast of St. Joseph, the patron given by Monseigneur to the half-caste nation, and under pretext of solemnizing the occasion, and also doing honor to the baptism of an English neophyte, he assembled the most devoted of his friends and put them under arms from the day before. On the evening of the same day, in order to bring the people together, and to have a pretext for making a general appeal to the nation, he spread a false report everywhere of the arrival of 500 police to massacre the fanatics, burn the houses and seize the lands. 'We must march out to meet them,' he said. 'If we are united they will not be able to stand against us.' A large number unwilling to believe the news, as they had no other proof of it, refused to revolt, but were soon forced to take up arms, as they were threatened with being shot themselves and having their farms pillaged. They almost all yielded to force; only some of them standing firm and braving death. On St. Joseph's eve, amidst the darkness of night, a provisional Government was proclaimed, and its first act was a sacrilegious one, the seizure of the Church of Saint Antony at Batoche, in spite of the earnest protestations of the Rev. Father Moulin. On Sunday the 22th March, a fervent and pious half-caste, one of the authors of the movement, seeing the bad turn affairs had taken, refused to take part in the revolt. On St. Joseph's day, he had preferred to submit to be taken prisoner rather than to participate in all the crimes which inaugurated it, and which must for ever brand this terrible revolution with disgrace."

He proceeds then to speak of the various acts done by the noble Metis, who thought to resist this man's authority. He speaks of the terrible influence Riel had over the Metis, and how he carried out his nefarious designs through that influence. He says that the Metis assembled together for the purpose of prayer and the carrying out of a counter movement, but Riel and his followers discovered this.

"They were bent on revenge and their vengeance was frightful, terrible, truly diabolical. I will tell you some of its principal workings. On the 25th March, Riel in his turn assembled his warmest partisans in the profaned church of St. Antony, and there, in the midst of scenes rivalling each other in absurdity, folly and impiety, he publicly renounced the Holy Church of God, which was henceforth to be contemptuously to be called by him the old woman of Rome. Having proclaimed his intended mission as a prophet sent from God to reform religion, the reformer gave himself the name Exovide, and his council the Exovidat. Orders were given for the persecution of the faithful, and especially the clergy, and they tore us from our dwellings, us and our pious, faithful companions of Jesus; and placed us in a place of siege and exposed us to the greatest dangers in the new presbytery of St. Antony at Batoche. We were indicted several times before the Exovidat, where, listening to the impieties and blasphemies of the Exovidat, Rev. Fathers Moulin, Vegreville and myself had to confess and defend our insulted faith, thereby drawing upon ourselves a deluge of outrages and threats, and exposing us to the fire of the enemy if we remain obstinate in refusing to submit to the will of the tyrant.

"Meanwhile"—

And here is a point which has been contested upon the public hustings by the friends of Riel—

"Meanwhile, messengers had been sent to the poor savages of the prairie, for the most part obstinate infidels, always discontent with the domination of the white man, and asking nothing better than to see the hour of deliverance, if not of vengeance, arrive. Barbarism has returned to the bloody ferocity of its worst days, and in some places, particularly at Frog Lake, the whites have been massacred, and with them the missionaries who tried to save them and prevent the revolt. The latter were the Rev. Fathers Faford and Marchand. Their mission has been burned as well as all the dwellings of the whites."

He goes on to speak of how Louis Riel assembled the families of the St. Laurent district under the pretext of protecting them, and how he maltreated them when he found them in his power. What does he say about other instances of this man's conduct, about other persecutions?

"The most admirable of all is our dear Baptiste Hamelin, the father of a large family reared in piety and the fear of the Lord. He also, like our good M. Melin, has received in his home a special favor from the Blessed Virgin, his wife having been also miraculously cured. He was one of those who resisted all provocations, and who, in answer to my appeal in the midst of the camp and in presence of the seducer, raised a loud and triumphant cry of 'long live the old woman of Rome! long live our holy father the Pope.' Persecuted more and more, condemned to be shot, he saw himself surrounded on all sides by fanatics of the Exovide. The martyr's crown hung suspended over his noble head, and by his side were his poor wife and large family of children, trembling for his fate, but standing firm like himself. A superhuman courage animated him, his looks, usually so gentle, became suddenly terrible. 'Well,' cried he, 'since you must have the sacrifice of either my faith or my life, my choice was made long ago, and the good God will give me strength enough to brave your threats and your rifles. If one of my brothers here present has the heart to do so, let him strike. You can shoot me, of course, but make me renounce my religion—never?' The vanquished apostates retired abashed, not daring to imbrue their hands in their brother's blood, and once more the tyrant's rage was baffled by the firmness of one just man."

After giving other accounts of the horrible treatment to which many people were subjected, how does the Rev. Father Fourmond wind up his letter?—

"What evils have the folly and hypocrisy of one man heaped upon our poor little population. About twenty killed, as many wounded, fires, sackings; a dark and gloomy picture we have now before our eyes. All is not over yet, either, for about thirty of our unfortunate Christians are prisoners of war and await their trial at Regina, the capital of the North-West Territory. Riel, the Exovide, is among the number, and is the one, it is generally believed, who will suffer death in expiation of the crimes he has committed and the blood he has caused to be shed. Mgr. Grandin has just left us, having shed abundant tears over our condition, but what a blessing his paternal charity has been to us, the weak have been strengthened by his presence, and we have great confidence that this trial will in the end serve for the greater glory of God who has permitted it. This will be the fruits of the mercy won by the prayers of everyone here, for we have indeed prayed night and day among the apostates. I am thoroughly convinced that it is a marvellous effect of this incessant prayer that we have not all been annihilated."

"FOURMOND, O. M. I.,

"Missioner Apostolic."

I will merely ask, having now read this church record of Louis Riel's proceedings, this one question, though I do not intend to deal with that branch of the subject at this moment—is there one hint of insanity throughout the whole of that letter?

Mr. MILLS. He swears insanity later.

Mr. CURRAN. Well, I will try to convince the hon. gentleman who, upon the floor of this House, casts an aspersion upon the Rev. Mr. Fourmond for what he spoke and swore to, that he spoke with Christian charity of that man, that he said he would be "too great a criminal" unless they put the charitable construction upon it that he was insane. Those were the words. Now, I do not think that very many people in this country, that very many of those who have been excited by the terrible harangues that have been made throughout the length and breadth of the Province of Quebec, by the writings of those who have not studied this question—I do not think that many of the Catholic people of the Dominion of Canada will consider Riel either a hero or a martyr. Now the next question comes—was he insane? And, in reading an interview with the leading counsel for the defence from the Province of Quebec, we have found it stated here that His Grace Archbishop Taché refused to go and give evidence on that occasion. Well, it is not for one in my humble position to speak of one so exalted as His Grace, but I will say that throughout this country, wherever his name is known, it is revered and respected, and that not only for his qualities of intellect but for his nobleness and generosity of heart. He is as widely known as any man in Canada, and when we know that fact, when we know the interest he took in this unfortunate man, when we know that unfortunate man owed everything to him, is it to be supposed that His Grace would not have gone to Regina, or even to the furthest extremity of the earth, if he could have given the testimony that this man did not know right from wrong, that he was insane, that he knew him to be so beyond what appears in the letter published by His Grace? We all know that His Grace would have gone, not only to Regina, but to the furthest extremity of the earth, to give evidence for his bitterest enemy if that evidence could have been of any benefit to him. We have had a medical commission which has been spoken of here to-day as one concocted for the occasion; we have had three respectable medical gentlemen slandered, I may say, on the floor of this House. We have had them held up as men who were willing to write and sign their names to a document which in their consciences they could not acquiesce in. We have had all this not from a man low in position, but from the leader of the Opposition himself. What right has the hon. the leader of the Opposition to make this assertion? What has been the past character of those three gentlemen? Do they stand high in this community, or are they miserable characterless physicians, who would lend themselves to an outrage such as he accuses them of having been guilty of? and are we to be told that not only have these men been guilty of an act of this kind, but that the Ministers of the Crown, men of every creed and every nationality, men who have served their country well and have enjoyed the confidence of the vast majority of the people of Canada, were a lot of reprobates who, in order to justify their act of having steeped their hands in the blood of an insane man, would turn round and make three respectable physicians perjure themselves—for it is nothing less—in producing a document in the manner in which he has accused them of having produced it? Now, does not every lawyer know what the legal definition of insanity is? It is not necessary to go into that point, because every man knows what has been the ruling of the highest tribunal in the Empire; but, if we are not satisfied with the testimony that has been adduced here to-day from that commission, if we are not satisfied with the documents which have been laid before us, if we think that Dr. Jukes and Dr. Valade and Dr. Lavell are three scoundrels, let us ask what has been the testimony of those who, without being medical experts in insanity, are people of common sense, are men who have watched the doings and the sayings of this unfortunate man Riel. And the first witness to whom I shall refer, one who has written over his own signature, is the Rev. Mr. Piquet, writing from Batoche in June last:

"Who is the author of the North-West troubles? It is Louis Riel, and as he is the author of them, it is he alone who deserves to be punished. If, like me, you had followed the steps and studied the hypocrisy, the cunning and the secret arts that Riel has used to deceive and seduce these people and drag them into rebellion, whether they would or not, you would, as I do, cast upon that cruel and tyrannical man all the blame of that revolt. Riel made use of their religion, he made use of their ignorance, of their simplicity, touching every sensitive cord to make them the dupes of his ambition.

"There are persons who say that Riel is mad, but the more his conduct is examined the stronger must be the conviction that that nefarious man, under the appearance of his madness, preserves the plenitude of his reason. All his plans have a sequence and a directness which show a fixed purpose to attain his end, and at the same time to escape the gallows if his criminal undertakings should fail. Riel must bear all the responsibility of this rebellion. He alone is to blame for all the calamities that have happened or are still to happen, the necessary consequences of those troubles which have caused us all so much suffering."

This is the testimony of another member of the Order of Mary Immaculate. Now, Sir, as I was interrupted a moment ago by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), let us see what Rev. Father Fourmond really did say :

"Q. Have you made up your mind about the prisoner being sane as far as religious matters are concerned?—A. We were very much embarrassed first, because sometimes he looked reasonable and sometimes he looked like a man who really did not know what he was saying.

"Q. Finally? A.—We made up our minds that there was no way to explain his conduct but that he was insane; otherwise he would have to be too big a criminal."

Now, Sir, a great point has been sought to be made from the fact that Dr. Howard, a distinguished alienist in this country, and one who has made a name for himself abroad, was not procured for the defence, that he had been asked for, but that, owing to the doctor having demanded the sum of $500 to go there, his evidence had to be dispensed with. Now, Sir, it is a well-known fact that the lawyers for the defence in that case really chose to take Dr. Clarke in his stead; but I deem it only right and due to Dr. Howard to say that the fact that he is a man of 70 years and over, and that he could not travel alone, was the reason of his apparent unwillingness to go up there without having money enough to take with him a person to assist him in his advanced years. In the correspondence which took place then, he said, writing to the solicitors of the Government, in the city of Montreal, to whom this matter had been referred :

"MONTREAL, 96 University St., 29th July, 1885.

"GENTLEMEN,—I beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of yours of this morning, informing me that the Hon. Sir Alexander Campbell refuses to pay me $500 to pay my expenses to and from Regina as witness in the case of Riel, for the defence. I asked that amount because, in my delicate state of health, I cannot go alone; I must have one of my family to accompany me. I wish, however, to have a record of the fact that I don't refuse to go."

He would not have refused to go. I had the pleasure of meeting Dr. Howard yesterday, and in the course of conversation, going home from church, he said to me that he wished to give me a document to show that he could not possibly have done Riel any good, even if he had gone to Regina; that he had had this man for nine months under his care, and the certificate he must have given was the one which I will now read :

"MONTREAL, 14th March, 1886.

"MY DEAR MR. CURRAN,—I notice by the papers that you are going to speak on the Riel question in the Dominion Parliament to-morrow. My name having been mentioned as one of the witnesses who should have given testimony for the defence at the trial of the unfortunate man, I enclose you a copy of a memorandum forwarded by me to the Government solicitors in this city.

"I think it well to say, however, that in my opinion my presence at the trial could not possibly have done Riel any good. You know my views on the question of responsibility, but when it came to the legal test, I should have been obliged to say that Riel was as responsible for his acts as any other criminal man.

"Yours sincerely,

"HENRY HOWARD,

"Medical Superintendent, Asylum St. Jean de Dieu."

I may say that Dr. Howard informed me that he had been solicited time and again to write something differently from this by the friends of Louis Riel and that he was desirous to have his opinion upon record. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we have shown from the "Annals of the Propagation of the Faith," and from the documents I have just read, that this man was neither a hero nor a martyr, and that he was not insane. No doubt he was devoured by an insatiable ambition, and, like Mahomet, he wished to establish a new religion as well as a new nationality. But, Sir, the idea of comparing this man to Emmet, the idea of comparing this man to the brilliant Meagher, or to any of the noble patriots of Ireland, as has been done upon the hustings, and I think, in this House, is the greatest insult that could be offered to the Irish; because, Sir, I believe that the humblest Fenian who ever shed his blood upon the gallows, would be disgraced for ever by such a comparison. Why do I say so? Not that I have any antipathy for the unfortunate man, whom I have never seen. No, Sir; but I am obliged to take account of the evidence of men—not the evidence of people who were opposed to him in religion or politics, but those who had done him good service in the past, those who had always stood by him, those who had welcomed him there amongst them, and who wished him to succeed in doing what was right. I speak now of the evidence of Father André, given at the trial, and what does he say about this man, who has been represented to us as a hero, a martyr and a patriot? This is what he says :

"Q. Will you please state what the prisoner asked of the Federal Government?—A. I had two interviews with the prisoner on that subject.

"Q. The prisoner claimed a certain indemnity from the Federal Government, didn't he?—A. When the prisoner made his claim I was there with another gentleman, and he asked from the Government $100,000. We thought that was exorbitant, and the prisoner said: 'Wait a little, I will take at once $35,000.'

"Q. And on that condition the prisoner was to leave the country if the Government gave him $35,000?—A. Yes, that was the condition he put.

"Q. When was this?—A. This was on the 23rd December, 1884.

"Q. There was also another interview between you and the prisoner?—A. There has been about twenty interviews between us.

"Q. He was always after you to ask you to use your influence with the Federal Government to obtain an indemnity?—A. The first time he spoke of it was on the 12th December; he had never spoken a word of it before, and on the 23rd December he spoke about it again.

"Q. He talked about it very frequently?—A. On these two occasions only.

"Q. That was his great occupation?—A. Yes, at those times.

"Q. Is it not true that the prisoner told you that he himself was the half-breed question?—A. He did not say so in express terms, but he conveyed that idea; he said, 'if I am satisfied the half-breeds will be.' I must explain this. This objection was made to him that even if the Government granted him $35,000, the half-breed question would remain the same, and he said in answer to that 'if I am satisfied the half-breeds will be.'

"Q. Is it not a fact he told you he would even accept a less sum than $35,000?—A. Yes, he said, 'use all the influence you can, you may not get all that but get all you can, and if you get less we will see.'"

This testimony of the Oblate Father, which will be found on page 113 of the official report, is supported by the evidence of a half-breed, Charles Nolin. On page 94 of the same report we read :

"Q. Did the prisoner tell you what he would do if they paid him, if the Government paid him the indemnity in question?—A. Yes.

"Q. What did he tell you?—A. He said if he got the money he wanted from the Government he would go wherever the Government wished to send him.

"Q. When did you finally differ from the prisoner in opinion?—A. About twenty days before they took up arms, I broke with the prisoner and made open war upon him.

"Q. What happened on the 19th?—A. On the 19th of March I and the prisoner were to meet to explain the situation, I was taken prisoner by four armed men.

"Q. Who were the armed men?—A. Philipp Gardupuy, David Tourond, Francis Vermette and Joseph Lemoine. I was taken to the Church of St. Antoine. I saw some Indians and half-breeds armed in the church.

"Q. Did you have occasion to go to the council after that?—A. During the night I was brought before the council.

"Q. Was the prisoner there?—A. Yes.

"Q. What did he say?—A. I was brought before the council at ten o'clock at night; the prisoner made the accusation against me.

"Q. What did you do?—A. I defended myself.

"Q. What did you say, in a few words?—A. I proved to the council that the prisoner had made use of the movement to claim the indemnity for his own pocket."

I think, Mr. Speaker, we may well say that we have disposed of the patriotism of this man. But during all this time there was an agitation going on in the country. There was an agitation by the Reform party in one direction in the Province of Ontario, and there was an agitation of a similar kind, but in a different direction, going on in the Province of Quebec. We have had from the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) several extracts from the writings of the Globe newspaper, which was trying to influence the minds of the people of Ontario at the time; and I propose, if the House will allow me, in view of the importance of the debate now going on, to make a few quotations from the Globe during that time. The first quotation to which I shall refer is dated 24th July, 1885, in which the Globe says:

"The trial programme points all in this one direction: Hurry through the case; hurry through the case. Remember that every moment the court is open there is danger that something may be blurted out that will damage the Government. Let the judge somewhat brusquely set aside all objections, though every one of them may hold large material for an appeal. Let what many think are reasonable facilities for securing evidence for the defence, be refused, and everything be proceeded with as if conviction were a foregone conclusion. Then what follows? A good case is made out on which Riel's friends and co-patriots can say that the criminal has not had a fair trial. The Imperial Government can be worked upon to bring its influences to bear on Sir John A. Macdonald. Lord Salisbury will never face the country without having first tried all he can to avoid in British Territory the shedding of a surrendered rebel's blood. There will be sent to Sir John A. Macdonald a communication to the effect that, inasmuch as a large number of Her Majesty's subjects are of opinion that Riel's trial was unfairly conducted, therefore it is Her Majesty's earnest wish that the criminal's life should be spared. Sir John will shelter himself behind Her Majesty, will reprieve Riel, will 'wish to God he could catch him,' will point to the Globe to prove that he tried very hard to convict Riel, and every Tory politician in the land will be satisfied."

They kept it up. They kept up the old cry and continued to set Province against Province and man against man. On 12th August the following appeared:—

"La Patrie is afraid that after all Riel will be hanged, as Sir John needs to surrender some victim to satisfy Upper Canada. And it adds very naively: 'It is understood that when the English of Upper Canada have spoken nothing remains for us (the French) but to obey.' The impression up here is that Room No. 8 has still the advantage and uses it to this day as ingeniously and as successfully as when the well-known place was first used. Sir John would no more think of resisting what his Quebec followers insist upon than he would of flying—whether they ask millions for a railway, amnesty for a rebel, $500 each extra pay for themselves, it is all the same, he cannot choose but yield."

But we were told that the Orangemen were being aroused and were excited. Who was exciting them? At that time we had the election in Cardwell going on, the hon. member for Cardwell having been made a Minister of the Crown; and who excited the Orangemen on that occasion? Take the Globe and see how anxious it was to put down party bickerings, sectional bitterness and all those unfortunate feelings that crop up in election matters and which tend to set man against man. The Globe on 25th August had the following:—

"The campaign in Cardwell is almost over and still the electors do not know whether Mr. White favors the execution or reprieve of Riel. Does Mr. White propose to compel the Orangemen of Cardwell to go to the polls blindfolded?"

On September 18, the Globe published the following:—

"On the 15th September, La Presse got the length of saying: All the English papers which don't wish to be fanatical or absurd not only believe but suggest that Riel is not going to be hanged on Friday; such hanging would be at once an iniquity and an inconvenience.' English papers in general have not suggested that 'Riel should not be hanged,' but it took a very small amount, not of second sight, but of ordinary intelligence, to foresee that he would not. Sir John knows better than to offend his masters, especially masters who know so many of his discreditable tricks and to whom he has yielded so often before. The first bell rang to say nothing of the second."

Now, Sir, about this time an outburst of indignation went up throughout the land from the independent papers at the course pursued by the Globe. Even the Daily Witness, a paper unfavorable to this Government, denounced the conduct of the Globe, and that paper felt bound to say something in reply. It said:

"As to the statement that the Globe expects to make political capital out of Riel's case, the Globe is not so wholly ignorant of latter-day torism as not to know that whatever is done to Riel, not one of those votes which Sir John calls his own will be lost to him. Had Riel's plans for raising the Indians succeeded, had his second rebellion deluged the North-West with blood, and there had been two thousand instead of two hundred slaughtered as at one time seemed possible, had the whole country been laid desolate, we know enough of the unprincipled gang which supports Sir John A. Macdonald to know that he would not have lost one vote in Parliament."

Now, Sir, I would ask what the Rouge press were doing during all this time. Were they following up the same tack? Were they denouncing the Government and agreeing with the Globe, or were not they and those acting for them—the Riel committee—not only stating that they would not be satisfied even with the reprieve of Riel, but when that was granted they would go further, and they would have what must have eventually turned out to be another amnesty agitation in this country.

After Recess.

Mr. CURRAN. Up to the present time in the course of the remarks I have addressed to this honorable House, I have not used my own words, I have not given my own ideas. I have given the words, the written language of missionaries, who, with a devotion almost unparalleled, have sacrificed their lives to go out to convert the heathen in our North-Western Territories. But, Sir, if I must proceed now with another branch of my subject, I can assure you that I do so with feelings of pain and sorrow. I have always sought, ever since I have been in public life, to cultivate as far as lay within my power, a feeling of good fellowship among all sections of Canadians. That has been my aim, although I have had on one occasion on the floor of this House to speak up for those principles in which I have been educated, which I entertain now, and which I intend to die still entertaining. If, Sir, we look at the history of the world we find that nations generally have been consolidated by the shedding of blood in defence of the fatherland and in the maintenance of its integrity. We believed—every good man, every good citizen, every person that has within his breast a cherished idea for the future of this great country—believed when the alarm sounded, when our volunteers, our citizen soldiers, were called from one section of this great country to another to go and defend the integrity of Canadian soil, that the day was come when this Confederation, based on an Act of Parliament only, would be consolidated by the blood of our young men, shed upon a common field in the defence of this Canada of ours. But, unfortunately, that belief has not been realised, through the machinations of those who have sought to make this unfortunate question which we are now discussing one of a sectional character. We find that instead of our country being consolidated we have Province arrayed against Province, people against people, section against section, and creed against creed; and we find on the floor of this House an hon. gentleman standing up here and endeavoring to revive over this man's sad end—to revive in the hearts of the Irish people of this Dominion the old fight of Orange and Green. We find him endeavoring to rekindle the hatred of days gone by, and undoing the good work that has been progressing for so many years when we found Orangemen and Irish Catholics, in so far as the material interests of this country are concerned, standing shoulder to shoulder and laboring together, laboring for the fiscal policy and for the railway policy, that will ensure the prosperity of this country—laboring together in every great national enterprise. And, Sir, if there is a man in this Dominion who has taken the sting out of the bigoted associations of the past, that man is the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. It was under his guidance and management, it was with the admirable skill he has always displayed, that we have been enabled up to the present time to see our people working harmoniously together.

And, as I said before, if we want to know where the bigotry and sectionalism, where the spirit of animosity against the race to whom I belong, are to be found, look at the benches on the other side of the House. Look there, and you will not see an Irish Catholic following the hon. gentleman. The party which he leads has too great a hatred of our race and our creed to return even one man, whilst the party which has been denounced as the Orange party, the bigoted party, the party without principle, the corrupt party, the party which has sought to crush out a noble and generous patriotism—this party has combined not only Englishmen, Scotchmen and Frenchmen, but it includes Scotch Catholics, Irish Catholics and French Catholics, who are all working together harmoniously for the development of the great material interests of the country. Now, Sir, was it generous or patriotic in the hon. gentleman who preceded me to try to revive the animosities of the past, to send it broadcast throughout the length and breadth of every land where the English and French languages are spoken, that in this country any one sect, the Orange or any other sect, could trample on the necks of their fellow citizens? Can any attempt at justification be made for sending it abroad that the Dominion of Canada is ground down beneath the heel of the Orange Association? If we look at the past history of the question we are now discussing, if it has become a provincial question, a question of Protestantism or Catholicism, if this question has been embittered, there is one man in the country who is responsible for it, and who cannot avoid the responsibility; there is one man whose responsibility is down in black and white and will remain so as long as the records of this country last, and that man is the leader of the Opposition. We had from that hon. gentleman some time ago, a speech in which he spoke about the noble and generous efforts he had made all through his career to cement the union of the different sections of this country. Why, Sir, I was surprised that he could have spoken in such language. After having made a tedious argument to arrive at the point, he endeavored to express his views in a metaphor, by saying that he was not going to construct a political platform out of the scaffold of Regina. No, Sir, he was not; but I tell this House and this country that if he did not wish to construct a political platform out of that material, there was one thing he did, which I will prove beyond contradiction, and that is, he constructed a political banner out of the blood-stained garments of Thomas Scott and with his own hand he wrote the device upon it, "$5,000 reward for the rope that hangs Louis Riel." What did he say on that memorable occasion? The following is the Toronto Globe's report of the proceedings in the Ontario Legislature on the 3rd of February, 1871:

"Mr. BLAKE moved the following resolution:—

"That the cold-blooded murder (for his outspoken loyalty to the Queen) of Thomas Scott, lately a resident of this Province, and an emigrant thence to the North West, has impressed this House with a feeling of sorrow and indignation, and in the opinion of this House every effort should be made to bring to trial the perpetrators of this great crime, who as yet go unwhipt of justice."

"After tracing the progress of the rebellion of 1870, Mr. Blake said: While I am disposed to treat legally anything which may properly be called a political offence, I cannot treat this murder as a political offence, if it were to be so treated. I call your attention, Sir, to the mode in which the 'political offences' of the victim were treated by Riel. What, I ask, was his crime? It was loyalty to his Queen, loyalty to the constitution, loyalty to the country. For this he was done to death in a way which I shall presently lay before the House. I am not going to trust myself to a statement of that barbarous event. It is better I should read to you the official report of the Hon. Donald A. Smith, who was on the spot at the time."

Then the hon. gentleman proceeds to read that harrowing account—

"Now, Sir, we have also before us the evidence which, on a motion of mine, was brought before the House and was printed—the evidences of eye-witnesses of that barbarous crime. At that time justice could have been done on Riel here in Ontario and, perhaps, also in England. He fled to the United States, but there was no demand made for his extradition. But, Sir, it is a son of ours that he has murdered. It is our justice that he has violated; it is our duty to see, as necessary, that this justice is vindicated. This person, Riel, is living a little way outside the boundaries of the North-West, in the United States. He is receiving deputation from the people of that country, asking him to stand as a candidate for the Local Legislature and for the Parliament of Canada. Yes, for the Parliament of Canada. We find him declining for the good of the country and from patriotic motives to allow himself to be nominated. But, Sir, I say that unless this Province speaks out it will not be long that he will act thus, and we may yet undergo the humiliation and disgrace of seeing the murderer of one of our people, elected to the Parliament of Canada, and representatives from Ottawa sitting in council on the affairs of the country with one guilty of murder. I warn this House and this Province that unless we act in this matter the murderers will go unpunished. This, Sir, is no ordinary murder. It was no murder for revenge, for money, or for any of the causes that generally provoke that great crime. This is no case of hurried, passionate transaction in which the excuse of want of time or deliberation, or of passionate emotion, may be pleaded. Even in the presence of the delegate sent by the Canadian Government to treat with these people, and while he was engaged in his mission, and this deed was done, and its enormity was enhanced by the solemn mockery of a pretended court-martial and a so-called condemnation of death. The victim died because he was a loyal man; he died because he would not aid rebels; he died because he resisted rebellion—he died in fact for loyalty to Queen and country.

"That this is no ordinary murder is proved by the fact that it provoked an universal fever of indignation throughout this Province. If the indignation has subsided, if it does not blaze so high after this interval, still that indignation burns deeply, and is not to be soothed by anything less than the meting out of justice to the perpetrators of the crime. We have been told that we have nothing to do with this matter. We Canadians, we men of Ontario—we the representatives of the people of Ontario—sembled here to express the feelings of the Province of Ontario—have nothing to do with one of our sons. (Cheers.) We are told that it is our duty, our right, our pleasure to express to the Governor General our joy on the occasion of his blood being ennobled. We were asked to discharge that duty and we did it with pleasure and with decent warmth. But, Sir, am I to compare for an instant the feeling of the people of the country on the ennoblement of the Governor General's blood with the feeling that was evoked by the spilling of the blood of one of our sons. No, Sir, we have learned here to value the lives of the people. We recognise the truth of the poet's words:—

'The king may make a belted knight,
A marquis, duke, and a' that;
But an honest man's aboon his might,
Guid faith he mauna fa' that.'

"It is true that we have solemnly recorded our satisfaction because the blood of the Governor General has been ennobled; and as the blood of one of our sons has been spilled, it is our duty, it is our privilege, it is our right to express our sorrow and indignation at that event. I hope that we shall show that we are bound to one another by a tie as men of Ontario, bound by the tie of kinship; that we shall show that our Province is dear to us; that our people are dear to us, and that the men of Ontario have but one feeling on this subject. Let us join our sorrow to the sorrow of his kinsfolk. To them has been denied the poor consolation of giving a decent sepulchre to his ashes, and of mourning over the place where they await the Great Day. That spot is unknown; nor can any monument be placed over his remains. Let his country write his epitaph in the records of her assembly, and express a people's sorrow for his untimely death, and a people's stern resolve that that death shall be avenged."

To be avenged—under what circumstances? Does the hon. gentleman pretend that when he was doing this in spite of protestations of the Conservative party in the Assembly of Ontario, who stood up and said: This crime has been committed outside our jurisdiction, outside the boundaries of Ontario, and asked that this act, which would leave a standing barrier between the people of the two Provinces, be not committed—does the hon. gentleman pretend that he was then acting in the interests of harmony and peace? Did he seek on that occasion to do otherwise than to sink deeper and deeper into the hearts of the people of Ontario those feelings of hatred, which he and his men say are the cause of the death of Riel to-day? Does he pretend to tell any hon. member of this House that he was blind to what was going on in Quebec all that time? Does he pretend that he did not know the people of Quebec were up in arms and clamoring, in a state of feverish excitement, for the protection of Riel, just as he was clamoring for his blood? Was that the way to cement the Provinces together, to cement the different races together? Or was it the way to drive them apart and make them enemies for years to come? I say, if we have the state of affairs which the hon. gentleman who preceded me has depicted, it is due mainly, almost solely, to the unpatriotic and fiery denunciations which were made on that occasion by the leader of the Opposition. We have been told by the hon. gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Cameron, Huron) that some of the Orange lodges of Ontario passed resolutions asking for the execution of Riel. Now, Sir, I do not pretend to say that those resolutions were not passed, but I have it on the best authority, and it has been shown here by other hon. gentlemen, that the men whose names are mentioned in connection with these resolutions are not Conservatives but are Grit Orangemen, who passed those resolutions and published them for the purpose of embarrassing the Government and exciting feud between Quebec and Ontario. These resolutions were passed for the special purpose of driving from the ranks of Sir John the French Conservatives who supported him for so many years. I will not refer much longer to this point, but will say that upon that particular section of this subject my words never had any uncertain sound. I felt, when this unfortunate excitement broke out and I saw the turn things were taking—the excitement in Quebec and the counter excitement in Ontario, an anti-Riel meeting having been publicly called in Toronto—that it was the duty of every man, who felt he had any influence, no matter how little, to exert it as an honest man in the endeavor to stem the tide of the terrible excitement which was then rushing forward. I undertook to write to a friend of mine—not a political friend, but, at all events, a friend in whom I had confidence—and asked him to publish in his paper my views. I knew that in doing so I was cutting ties that bound me to many with whom I had been associated for years; but when I sent my words abroad, through the press, did I then seek more than I do now to conciliate the Orange body? No, Sir. In that letter, referring to the Grit Orange lodges which had passed those resolutions—hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh—I said, referring to the allegation that Riel was hanged because the decree went forth from the Orange lodges, that any resolution calling for his execution, whether it came from a Conservative or a Grit Orange lodge was a disgrace to them and to the country, I consider that allegation utterly unfounded and capable of working incalculable injury to our Dominion. "Granted that certain lodges did go so far as to pass such resolutions, as certain preachers, in platform outpourings, thought fit to call on the Government to hang Riel, I say all this was cruel and disgraceful. At almost any moment in any civilised community, you will get men to sign a paper asking the Government to exercise clemency, but it remains for the Black Lodge at Peterboro and a minister of the Gospel, Oversorth, to clamor for a man's blood." When the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) spoke the other night, he had not one word to say in defence of the action of those who called on the Executive to see that the sentence of death was carried out. The responsibility that devolved on the shoulders of the Ministers of the Crown to meet in council to decide upon the fate of a human being, was a heavy one; but people to sit down where they have no responsibility, and in cold blood to clamor for the life of any man is something I cannot conceive, yet we are told that the Orange body, as a body, had made these representations. I say there is no proof of anything of this kind, there is not one tittle of evidence to support such a statement. Whilst all the public meetings were going on in Quebec, whilst all the outpourings of excited feeling appeared in the press of Quebec, not one meeting was held in Ontario to force the Government to carry out the sentence. But we are told that this case turns on Orangism, that we ourselves are Orange Catholics. I ask any hon. gentleman in this House—

Mr. LANGELIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CURRAN. The hon. member for Megantic says, "hear, hear." Who sent him to this House to oppose the
Mr. CURRAN.

Government? Who voted for him to oppose the leader of the Government? The Orangemen of Megantic, the men who, he says, clamored for the blood of this man. These are the men who voted for him and sent him here to oppose the leader of the Government. Who have sent other representatives from the Province of Quebec? Why, surely the hon. member from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) will not deny that he sits in this House to oppose the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the Government, by virtue of the Orange votes of Huntingdon, and throughout the length and breadth of Lower Canada every Orange lodge has been arrayed, on all occasions, against the Conservative party in every election. When the Conservative party were driven out of office, did the Reform party forget the good services they had received from the Orange body? Why, the only Orange procession we have had in the city of Montreal within my recollection, under the guise of a funeral, with bands playing and banners flying, was carried out under Grit bayonets furnished by the Reform Government; and, Sir, when the Reform Government arrived in power, when they reached the Government benches, who was the first man to be recognised, whose services were the first to be rewarded in the city of Montreal, who first received the favors of the Government, if it was not Mr. Dunbar Brown, who had published The Altar and the Throne, who had established that paper in the interest of the Reform party, had devoted to it all his time and all his energy. He was rewarded by being made Collector of Inland Revenue of the district of Montreal. And that was not all. There was the ex-grand master to be provided for. He too had labored day and night for the Reform party. He had never taken any rest until he succeeded in placing his great Reform leaders in office; and, when I tell you that the past grand master, Mr. George Smith, had an office—not an ordinary office but a brand new office, an office created for him—that he was made shipping master of the port of Montreal, an office that had always been filled before by the collector of Customs, there is the best proof that upon all occasions these people, although now they raise the Orange cry in order to revive the old feud between the Irish Catholic and the Irish Orangeman on an issue as foreign to their differences as day is from night, have always sought to curry the favor of Orangemen wherever they could manage to do it. But it is not merely with regard to old times, not merely in years gone by that this has been going on, that we have seen and heard and read how great the love of these hon. gentlemen has been for Irish Catholics, how great their love has been for Ireland, how greatly that love has been manifested in their public press whenever a man happened to come forward as an Irish Catholic candidate. On those occasions, how did they manifest it? I will not go back to days gone by. I will not go back to 1863, when the late Hon. D'Arcy McGee was opposed by the late Hon. John Young, and the principal grounds taken against him was that he had been connected with the '48 movement. Though he had given them the benefit of his great talents and had been connected with them for years, when he parted from them they revived the cry that he had been connected with the movement of '48. I remember hearing the great outburst of the Hon. Thomas D'Arcy McGee on the Haymarket Square in Montreal, when he spoke in reply to that charge, and told what had transpired before his own eyes in Ireland when a young boy of 18 or 19 in that country, how he saw the unfortunate people dying by the thousand from famine and from fever, how he saw them pitched out of their houses into the ditch by heartless landlords. He said that his heart revolted at the sight, and he stood up, and no doubt he raised the flag of rebellion; and "Great God," said he, "older as I am to-day, if I saw the same thing happening over again, I feel that my heart would lead me to take the same stand as I did on that occasion." And yet it is these people, even after the six hours' speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition had been delivered here in reference to the sufferings of the half-breeds, whom we find stating in one of their papers that :

"They had farms provided with agricultural machinery, and comfortable homesteads, which the correspondent of the St. Paul, Minn., Pioneer Press said might have been put alongside the average farm of Minnesota without fearing comparison. These were in jeopardy through the neglect of the Government to grant them titles to their land. They feared that they were about to be driven off them, and they took up arms in the defence of their hearths."

These people justify the rebellion on the ground that the Government had not sent patents to them. As the leader of the Government said, not one man, woman or child was disturbed; not one man, woman or child was put into the street; not one man lost his property; and yet they were justified in the rebellion, they were justified in taking up arms against the Dominion of Canada, but the downtrodden Irishman, who saw his people dying of famine and sickness, who saw his roof torn down, was not to be so justified. The Grit party said the half-breeds had a right, but the Irishman in his own land had no right. But I need not refer to ancient history. It is only a few years ago that my young friend, Mr. C. J. Doherty, was a candidate for the city of Montreal in the Conservative interest. The Montreal Gazette took up his case, and laid before the people of Montreal the fact that he was the first prize scholar of the St. Mary's College, that he was the gold medallist of McGill University, that he possessed all the talents and educational requirements to make him a first class representative. Well, what was the result? I may tell this House that, since that time, when the alarm sounded that this country was in danger, Mr. Doherty went with his regiment, the 65th Battalion of Montreal, and fought like a man with his French Canadian friends, left his sick bed and went up to the North-West like a Canadian who felt he had a duty to perform to his country. But what was that man said to be when he came out as a candidate? Take the Montreal Herald of that time, then the recognised organ of the Liberal party. What did it say on the 29th November, 1881?

"What will be the effect in the business circles of England should the tidings be cabled over that the largest and in fact the only strictly commercial electoral district in Canada should find no more fitting representative than a pronounced land leaguer? We may well ask, what has Montreal West done to be branded with such an odious stigma as this?"

Then on the 30th November, 1881, it said :

"If Mr. Doherty should be lucky enough to get elected for Montreal West it would be an enlivening piece of news to send to the Old Country to say that the greatest city in British America had returned the President of the Land League as a member of Parliament. The Land Leaguers in Ireland would be greatly encouraged and all the more, as Mr. Doherty is to go in if he can on the Conservative ticket. They say the Conservatives and Liberals are getting to be good friends at home, and so it would be all right. But the society for preventing cruelty to animals here would have to look sharp, as after the election some of the Liberals' cows might find themselves without their tails."

And, again, the evening organ of the Reform party said :

"What would be the effect if it were cabled over to Parnell in Kilmainham that the President of the Land League has been elected as a member of Parliament for the city of Montreal.

These are a few specimens of what has been done in the recent past by the great Reform party, and they show the great love which they bear to the people whose votes they now seek to obtain. But we have been speaking here about an execution, about an unfortunate man having been hanged under a Conservative Administration when that man was recommended to mercy by the jury which tried him. One would imagine, from the outpourings on the other side that no man or woman had ever been executed in this country under similar circumstances before. But, Sir, I find recorded in the True Witness, of 23rd January, 1863, when the Reform party was in power, a case against that party—not of the execution of one man, but of the execution of an unfortunate man and his wife, who had been strongly recommended to the mercy of the court; and that man and his wife were both hanged, despite the strong recommendation of the jury and despite the most piteous appeals made from all parties in their favor. Let us read, Sir, a brief extract from the paper I have just mentioned. This man was named Aylward and he had settled with his wife in a township in the rear of the county of Hastings. Their neighbor was a man named Munro. The parties lived in good fellowship until, unfortunately, some hens belonging to Munro had caused depredations in a wheat field belonging to Aylward. One thing brought on another, and three or four days after this had taken place, one of the hens belonging to Munro was shot by Aylward; Munro and his son went to Aylward's house to see him about it, they spoke about the hen, and were told, it might be found upon the land where it had committed the depredation. They went out together, Aylward taking his gun; a scuffle took place between Aylward and Munro and his son. During its progress the wife of Aylward came to the assistance of her husband, and a wound was inflicted upon Munro which produced death sometime after. This is how the True Witness narrated some of the facts :

"The husband and wife were Irish Catholics, both young and much attached to each other. The man was twenty-six years of age, of medium size, but strong and robust; of intelligent cast of feature, and, like the generality of his countrymen, capable of displaying strong friendship, but easily estranged by unkindness or acts of selfishness. Mrs. Aylward had a very youthful appearance and did not look to be more than eighteen or nineteen years of age, although some two or three years older. She was considered to possess more than the ordinary share of beauty, and was of light and elastic figure. Any person who visited their home could not but be struck with the neatness and cleanliness with which everything about it was kept, and which gave an air of comfort and cheerfulness to their humble home. At the time of her death she was the mother of three small children, girls, the youngest an infant at the breast."

Chief Justice Draper presided at the trial, the jury found a verdict of guilty, accompanied with a strong recommendation to mercy, and says the paper :

"And now comes the application to the Executive for a commutation of the sentence. The petition was prepared by Mr. Finn, the prisoner's attorney and was signed by all the leading inhabitants of the county of Hastings, by high and low, by rich and poor. There was no distinction of rank or class or creed, the Orangemen of the county being the foremost on the petition. In fact every one felt with the exception of the Grit M.P.F., that their lives ought to be spared. The Grit Government refused the petition. Everyone thought they should not be executed and a respite of one month was asked. All of no avail, they were hanged by the neck until dead, on the morning of the feast of the Immaculate Conception."

That, Sir, is a statement of the facts as they happened under a Reform Government. And the Reform party now appeals to the people of the country and to the heart of the French Canadians, and says that the execution of Riel was an outrage, that it was a brutal murder, that it was a judicial murder. But what did they say when this poor unfortunate Aylward and his young wife were both launched into eternity? Because no appeals that they made would be listened to, although that appeal was signed by all classes and creeds in the community, with the exception of the Grit member of the Legislature of that county. Mr. Speaker, in this matter what was the position in which I found myself placed? I have read here, from the writings of the missionaries, what had been the career of the unfortunate man whose fate we are discussing. I was asked to do what? To stand up for him in the name of the French Canadian race—to stand up for him and do what? To roll in the gutter, and to disgrace and degrade, and denounce as traitors, the three French Canadian gentlemen in the Ministry who have stood by the French Canadian people for years and years. Was I doing more honor to the French Canadian people by standing up for the hon. Minister of Public Works in this House, the chosen friend of the late lamented Sir George E. Cartier, his chosen lieutenant, his chosen successor in this House and country, who had labored for thirty years and never once betrayed the interests that were confided to him by his people? Was I to sacrifice him? Was I to degrade and disgrace him for the sake of Louis Riel, because the people clamoured against him and called him a traitor? Was I to see my hon. friend the Minister of Militia treated in the same manner, whom I have known, respected and admired for his pluck, and for the manner in which he has stood up for his countrymen upon all occasions? Was I to sacrifice that hon. gentleman for the sake of Louis Riel? Was I doing more honor and more credit to the Canadian people by believing that these men were instigated by honest, and high and pure motives, than by espousing the cause of the wretched man, Louis Riel? Was I, Sir, to sacrifice the friend of my youth, the man with whom I have grown up side by side, whom I have seen raised to the highest position in his own Province, the idol of the French Canadian people for his noble, generous and brilliant eloquence—was I to sacrifice my hon. friend Mr. Chapleau, the Secretary of State? Was I doing more honor to the French Canadian people by believing that these three hon. gentlemen remained true to their people, and was I to be justified in preferring Louis Riel to them? And, Sir, more than all that, I was asked to sacrifice the right hon. leader of this Government, and to believe that he was capable—he and his colleagues—for the satisfaction of any organisation in this country whatever, of steeping their hands in the blood of a fellow-creature? And I was asked, Sir, to sacrifice the man in this Government who belongs to my own race and creed—all for the sake of Louis Riel. I was asked to sacrifice the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, the man who had carried the Irish resolutions in this House, which had caused joy and gladness to my fellow-countrymen on the other side of the Atlantic—I was asked to sacrifice him. I was asked to sacrifice everything that is near and dear to me! Could I do it? Could I do it in the face of my experience in the past? Could I do it after what I knew had transpired in the North-West?—in the face of the history of this unfortunate rebellion, and all for the sake of a man whose character has been described by the missionaries whose evidence I have quoted? No, Sir, I could not do it. I felt that I should be unworthy of the position I hold, if, standing up here, speaking in behalf of the people I have the honor to represent, I allowed myself, under these circumstances, to be carried away by this passionate cry. I acted, Sir, knowing and feeling fully how painful my duty was; but in performing that duty, I have acted as a man who felt the responsibility of his position, as a man who loved the race who have taken this unfortunate man for a time to their hearts; but who will find out their mistake before very long; and I feel, Sir, that the future will justify me and prove that I acted as a man of honor, as a man of conscience, as a man who loves his country, and who hopes to see that country great and glorious in the future.

Mr. COURSOL. Mr. Speaker, before giving my vote on this question, a question which I believe is classed among the causes célèbres of this Dominion, I desire to offer a few remarks in order to explain my position and my views on this case. During the last eight years I have given to the men in power a fair support. In 1878, when I was called to give up a judicial position which I had held for 20 years past, I did so in order to support the National Policy, a policy which I believed was calculated to do good to the country, to bring it back to its former prosperity, to assist our manufacturers and to protect our manufactures. I also supported and pledged myself at the time to support any well matured scheme which would give the Dominion that long desired work, the Canadian Pacific Railway. On those points I am happy to say that nothing has since occurred to check my confidence in the Government, and I am sure the Government must themselves feel that I have been loyal to the promises I then made. But I regret to say that in the course of last fall events occurred in the North-West which have considerably strained the entente cordiale between the Government and many of its best and most faithful supporters, men who had supported the Government for many years past and would have been prepared to continue their support, which they cannot continue on the Riel question. I have studied that question in all its details, and, after a review of all the evidence adduced at the trial, I came to the conclusion that the Government has committed an act of cruelty in sending the prisoner to the scaffold, and I am satisfied they committed a great political blunder in hanging him. After I had come to that conclusion and had made up my mind that the Government had committed an act of cruelty, what was my proper course as a former supporter of the Government? I felt bound to oppose the Government in this matter; I felt bound to place my duty before my party and my conscience before my leaders. And who are the men who brought about the whole agitation; who are the men guilty of placing the Province of Quebec in a state of complete turmoil? The very ones sitting on the Treasury benches. The newspapers under the fostering care of those Ministers have published article after article that have set the whole Province on fire. They have newspapers publicly acknowledged as their organs, and those organs have published by thousands, copies of articles of a vile description against the respected leader of the Government, against the Minister of Public Works, against the Minister of Militia, denouncing them in advance as traitors, as cowards and using even stronger expressions, if Riel was hanged. One of the papers, the organ of one of the principal Ministers, stated while the trial was going on, that the jury had been packed, that the judge was unfair, that the witnesses were bribed, that the whole trial was illegal and unconstitutional. That was published while the case was before the Court, and also when it was before the Privy Council. And after the case came back and it became apparent that Riel was doomed, then they agitated still more. When they were asked as to the position into which they were bringing the people they said: The Liberals had Riel condemned, we, Conservatives, will save his life and take him from the hands of the executioner. When further pressed they declared that Riel would not be hanged, and I remember that, on the Saturday before the execution the paper I am alluding to said: It had received an official announcement or a positive announcement that Riel would not be hanged. In view of those facts, is there any wonder that the people have been excited and that the whole Province of Quebec has been in a state of agitation? And by whom was this caused? If Riel was to be hanged, if it was decided on the 8th of November that he was to be hanged on the 16th or 22nd, why did not the Government say so openly and in a manly manner to their friends and the public? They sent a commission, a sham commission, composed of doctors who were their own employees, to make a report. That report has been published. How did those gentlemen go to the North-West? Did they travel as medical men generally do, as do gentlemen belonging to a noble profession? No; they changed their names and travelled incognito. They arrived at Regina and proceeded to ascertain whether Riel had become insane and was in a worse condition than before the trial. Why did they not give notice to Riel of their arrival? because, as every medical work will tell them, that is the course generally followed. If the report was favorable, why did not the Government publish it broadcast over the country before Riel was executed? and then the people might have said: "We have the report, and it declares Riel sane, or that he is subject to hallucinations only; we have nothing therefore to say; the Government has considered the matter and has decided what ought to be done." Ministers are now pretending to wonder that the people have been excited. What we wonder at is that the men who have been the cause of their excitement are now surprised that the people have been and are excited. The execution of Riel, and the want of information as to his state of mind, were the sole causes of the agitation; there was no war of race and revenge, as it is called. The Province of Quebec had no reason to be antagonistic to any other race. The French Canadians in the Province of Quebec have lived in peace for years and years past with the people of other races. The large city I have the honor to represent is composed of English, French, Irish and Scotch, who live together in peace, and among whom there is no war and revenge party. The idea of a race and revenge party only existed in the mind of an Ontario editor, who invented it to raise his Province against our own. I say those who use that cry use it purposely to injure French Canadians and to save the Government. There has been no danger of race and revenge, and the newspaper which has said that is the newspaper which is known to the public as the principal organ of the Conservative party in the Province of Ontario. It has published articles which are libellous against our race, our civil institutions and our laws. Is that the way that a paper generally representing the Government on all occasions is to bring peace into the country—by assailing a race as fair, as proud and as courageous as any other in this Dominion—a race who have proved their loyalty everywhere, and are ready to do it now—a race who can carry the banner of England as proudly and as courageously as any coming from the Province of Ontario. This Government organ, which, not long ago, was in the habit of doing justice to French Canadians, became, all of a sudden, its bitter enemy, threatening to tear to pieces the treaty of Paris, and to reconquer the Province of Quebec—threats and boasts as silly as its former praises were hollow and interested. It has been asked, Sir, why the French Canadians took an interest in the Metis and in the Riel matter—why they were so friendly, apparently, to the Metis race. Those who are putting that question ought to know that over 100 years ago, La Verendrye, when he went to the Rocky Mountains on his first visit had with him a number of Canadians; that from every part of the Province of Quebec there went to the North-West and Hudson Bay hundreds and hundreds of French Canadians, the hardiest pioneers to be found in America, leaving behind them their friends, their wives and their families. Well, Sir, it is natural enough that those French Canadians, leaving their families behind them, would also leave remembrances of that time as they had occasional opportunities of communicating with their friends and families up to the present day by means of correspondence. Is it not natural that we should feel for them? I feel for them because my father was a pioneer of the North West, and worked there like many other traders who were the great support of the Hudson Bay Company. Is it not natural, then, that we should send forth our prayers in favor of Riel and of his friends? I would ask those who have spoken so much about the murder of Scott, if he had not been an Orangeman, if he had been an Irishman, or a French Canadian who had been murdered, would they have given themselves so much trouble? I shall not follow my friend and colleague from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) in all he has said. I am sorry that he has introduced the name of His Grace Archbishop Taché into this discussion, and the names of some of the priests of the North-West. He has said that His Grace would not have gone to Regina, and would not have testified under oath that Riel was insane. I think the hon. gentleman has ventured a great deal when he said so, and I doubt his authority on that point. I am sorry he has said so, because Archbishop Taché had a different opinion which he has published in a letter, and to make the matter right I am bound to read an extract from that letter to show that the hon. gentleman had not read it, and so was deceiving himself. His Grace said:

"The Government allowed the execution to take place. The Government have then the responsibility, and it is an indignity to them to lay the blame on others. For my part, a close observation of twenty years have given me a conviction diametrically opposed to those who are now calling the matter in question. I had many reasons to study the character of Riel in its most minute details, and the disposition and acts of my unfortunate protégé, in order to be able to give an account of what had driven him to this deplorable course. For many years I have been convinced beyond all possibility of a doubt, that apart from the brilliant qualities of his mind and heart, the unfortunate chief of the Metis was subject to megalomania, which alone can explain the position he has taken and the acts he has committed."

This is the character given to Louis Riel by his Grace Archbishop Taché, quite a different character from that which the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) has given him. That hon. gentleman said that Riel was a great deal worse than the vilest of the Fenians. I do not know what authority he had for saying that. But I am sorry he saw fit to bring the Fenians into the matter, and still more sorry that he brought into it the name of His Grace Archbishop Taché. Now, when I concluded that the Government had not acted properly in hanging Riel, I looked upon the question as a question of law. After carefully examining the record, I came to this conclusion for the following reasons: Riel had received a letter from General Middleton, a most extraordinary letter, stating that if he and his council would surrender, he would give him up to the authorities, meaning—what such letters written by any General in the field to a belligerent party must mean—that his life would be spared. In this sense the letter was sent and received. Riel was taken a few days afterwards with the letter in his hand, and he asked where and when he could surrender. He was frightened, because he knew that if he was caught he would be shot. Well, Sir, the trial which has been termed an illegal one, was not so in my opinion; it was a legal trial; but it was an un-British trial, because every man living under the flag of England in any part of the world is entitled to be tried by twelve of his fellow countrymen, whereas, in this case there were only six jurors, and a magistrate, not a judge, presided. That magistrate selected the jury. His selection may have been perfectly fair. I have no possible desire to impugn the motives of the magistrate or the jury. I simply take the case as it stands, and I find that these jurymen, with the facts fresh in their minds, returned the verdict of guilty, recommending the prisoner to the clemency of the court. The indictment was for high treason, and there was no other plea than the plea of insanity. There was nothing clearer than that the prisoner was guilty of high treason, and why did the jury recommend him to the clemency of the court if it was not because they had doubts about his sanity? Moreover, this is one of those cases in which the recommendation of the jury ought to tell in favor of the accused. The two doctors called in his behalf were examined as closely as possible. I do not remember any case in any criminal court in my experience in which the medical men were cross-examined so severely as the doctors for the defence have been in this case; yet their evidence was strong enough to convince these jurymen that there were some doubts as to the prisoner's sanity. I shall take the liberty of citing in the presence of the hon. Minister of Justice, the definition of the crime in the "General View of the Criminal Law of England" by Stephen. [The hon. gentleman here read from the work referred to.] This shows that the recommendation of the jury, when given in cases of this description, is given for an object, and that object is the clemency of the Government; and I contend that in this case, where the troubles had arisen suddenly, and as to which the Government could not say that they were entirely free from blame, they ought to have taken the verdict into consideration. Notwithstanding that the Privy Council of England had affirmed the legality of the trial, the Government became the judges of the case themselves. In ordinary cases, where the accused is condemned, the Government may interfere, and if they do not the man is hanged. But in a case like this, it is the Government who order the prisoner to be hanged, so that they become the judges in the case, and their duty is to review the whole case when it comes before them. Well, I contend that in this case they did not need to have gone further than the verdict of the jury. That verdict meant something. It meant the desire of the jury to save the man's life. The Province of Quebec, which has long been faithful to the Government of this country, and has kept it in a constant majority, and has been loyal to the core to the Premier, from one end to the other, sent petitions asking, not that a man of that description, so dangerous to society, and the cause of so much harm and bloodshed, should be set free, but asking for mercy. No, Sir; we asked merely that life should be saved, and we had good grounds for doing so; and it seems to me that a Government, which has so often exercised clemency, might have done so in this instance. I know their position was a difficult one. On the one side they had the whole Province of Quebec, their devoted friends, asking them to save Riel's life; and on the other were men calling for his blood. But, Sir, they were a strong Government and should have had courage enough to do their duty by exercising clemency. The Government's own friends in Ontario, who threatened them, would have seen after a time that the sentiment of mercy was really the one which should have prevailed. But the Government decided not to exercise their prerogative. To his credit, be it said, one of the Ministers of the Crown went to a public meeting, and there declared that he had done his best to save Riel's life but could not succeed. This showed that in the Administration there were some who believed Riel's life should have been saved. In making these few remarks, I want to be well understood that it is not any personal sympathies I might be supposed to have for Riel that actuates me; on the contrary, from the very first day that I heard of his exploits in the first rebellion, from the day I heard how he had sacrificed Scott, I never had any feeling of sympathy for him. But, it seemed to me that Riel, who was a subject of Her Majesty, ought to have been tried like others, and that his case deserved looking into. I wish it to be understood that the sentiment in the Province of Quebec, so far as Riel personally is concerned, is not that of men who wanted to save Riel simply because he was a French Canadian. It is unfair to state, as it has been stated in some papers, that what French Canadians want is a law for themselves. Such a statement is a calumny against our race. I hope that all that has been done and said may be forgotten, but there are certain acts that live and certain acts that are forgotten. The conduct of the Government in this case may be forgotten by many members of this House, but it will rest with the people at large to decide if it can be forgiven. I hope, however, that peace and harmony will return, that friendship will be again our common aim, and that these different origins and classes and creeds in all the Provinces will be on the best relations with each other. But I should like to ask any hon. gentleman opposite whether we, in the Province of Quebec, had not a right to agitate on this point. Is it because Quebec is inhabited by French Canadians that we are to have no right to blame the Government? Our movement was a legal and a constitutional one, one open to every British subject in the land, and I hope French Canadians are considered as British subjects and as having the rights and privileges of British subjects. We have the right to blame the Government if we think proper, but that need not be a cause of ill-feeling between us and other Canadians. If the Conservative friends of the Government, when the Government have committed an unjust act, when our consciences tell us clearly that the Government is wrong, are not to be allowed to express their opinion, but are supposed to sit here as slaves, for my part I believe the sooner we leave public life the better. I shall not further enter into the matter under discussion. I have no desire whatever to say anything that would excite the feelings of others. I think many imprudent expressions have fallen here, and have found their way into the press, but I know that many have been recalled after sober second thought, and I hope that expressions which were used in former days and have been used again against the Province of Quebec, our institutions, laws and religion, will shortly cease to be used. We have, for instance, the Mail the other day, referring to the tithes paid to our clergy in a manner which showed evidently that the editor did not know of what he was speaking, as otherwise he would have known that the system in use with us was the most simple and economical way in which the Province of Quebec could support its clergy, which it is bound to support and of which it is proud. If editors of newspapers would only be more careful in what they say, in attacking the origin or religion of any one sect of the Dominion, the whole community would benefit by their moderation. I shall record my vote, Sir, in favor of the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry.)

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I am sure every hon. gentleman has listened with a great deal of pleasure to the moderation in which the last speaker couched the remarks he has made on the subject under discussion. I regret exceedingly that all those who have preceded him on that side have not been as moderate in their tone as the hon. member for Montreal West (Mr. Coursol). For him I have always entertained feelings of the highest respect, and I trust and believe those feelings will remain undiminished in their strength, notwithstanding that in the future we may occupy seats on opposite sides of the House. For the patriotic sentiments that he has just given utterance to, I am sure that no one upon this side of the House felt more like applauding him than I did. He was quite right when he said that this subject was one peculiarly of a legal nature. This Parliament has for the time being been transformed into a court, a court of review, reviewing the action of the Executive in ordering that the execution of Louis Riel should proceed. It is a case of more than ordinary importance, because it is the first time in the history of this country, so far as I am aware, that the Parliament of the country was ever called upon to review, or sit in judgment upon, the Executive for making such an executive order; and it has been given greater prominence by the turn that certain members sitting on the Opposition benches have given it in introducing subjects that I am sure we all regret in connection with this discussion. I see no reason why the question of Orange and Blue should be raised in connection with this matter at all. I see no reason why the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) should have introduced into his speech the language he did, having, as it must, a tendency to excite race against race and creed against creed. I was born after that period in our history when those men who are our political fathers have said it was the day-dream of their youth that there should be a confederacy of all these scattered Provinces of British North America, and that one day the Canadian people would be proud of its nationality and every man who was a subject of this country would be proud to say he was a Canadian. I have indulged in fond hopes that, whatever might be the future of this country from a political standpoint—using the word political in its widest sense—though we might in course of time be separated from the Mother Country, though we might be independent, or whatever might be the future of our nationality in that respect, a sentiment of Canadian nationality would remain strong within us, that we would be one people, a united people; but I confess that the events of the past few months have driven into my mind the first suspicion that I might be wrong. I regret that a certain section of the people in one Province—not the whole people, not a majority of those people, I firmly believe—have been led to make of the execution of Louis Riel a national cry, and thereby to raise an issue which in its consequences may result, unless timely counsels prevail and moderate men, such as the hon. member who preceded me, take a foremost part in leading that movement, in great danger to the young confederacy of which we are so proud. I care not, so far as I am concerned personally in the discussion of this subject, whether Louis Riel was a Catholic, a very good Catholic or a very indifferent one, whether he was a Protestant, or what his religious views may have been, I have simply to regard this in a legal aspect, and as such I will endeavor to explain to you, Sir, to the House and to my constituents in the country, the reason why I shall oppose the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry). Now, the case made by the Opposition against the Government is based upon three grounds. First, that the half-breed population of the North-West had very grievous complaints. None of them, I think, go so far as to justify rebellion, or to say that the crime with which Louis Riel was charged was not properly termed high treason. In the second place, they say that, supposing that was true, the prisoner was undoubtedly insane, and upon the ground of his having been insane, the Executive should not have ordered his execution. They say, thirdly, that the recommendation of the jury should have been taken into consideration, or that the Government did not attach proper weight to that recommendation. I think these three grounds are the grounds upon which those who are opposed to the Administration for the course they have taken upon this matter rely, and I shall endeavor very briefly to answer the case made out by the opponents of the Government upon those points. I do not suppose that any hon. gentleman who is a lawyer, would say that there is any law that lays it down that a judge has any other option than to impose the death penalty for the crime of high treason. Notwithstanding it has been said that this offence is of a political nature, no country in the civilised world to-day would for a moment think of establishing it as a law that the death penalty should not be carried out in cases of high treason. If a law was introduced into this Parliament, I do not suppose we could pass it, but if it were introduced in the British Parliament providing that the death penalty should in future not be carried out in cases of high treason, or, to use a term which has become so popular of late, in cases where the offence was of a political nature, I do not suppose there is a Legislature in the world to-day that would enact such a law. They would be crazy to do it. Well, it is said by those who oppose the action of the Government in ordering the execution of Louis Riel that, his offence being a political offence, the Government should have acted in accordance with the custom of modern nations, and should never have allowed the death penalty to be carried into effect. I shall devote a few minutes to that, and, however my views may impress the House, they carry conviction to my own mind that the action of the Government was just in the case of Louis Riel. There is not a case upon record, as far as I am aware, where a man who has been twice guilty of the offence of high treason has escaped. This theory, to which such prominence has been given, that a man should not be hanged for high treason because it is a political offence, turns wholly, in my opinion, upon the circumstances surrounding the particular case. Reference has been made by analogy to the case of Jefferson Davis in the United States. I say it would have been wrong to execute Jefferson Davis for the crime of high treason, because it is not considered advisable in the case of one accused for the first time of such an offence, having in view the future interest of the country; but, if Jefferson Davis had a second time raised the standard of rebellion in the United States, he would have met the same fate as that of Louis Riel; and, if Louis Riel had profited by his previous experience, he would in all probability have been alive to-day; he brought himself to his own fate by wholly disregarding the law of the land not only once, but twice. Now, it seems to me that, if it is made out that the first offence of which Louis Riel was guilty, the rebellion of 1870, can properly be called a rebellion, you cannot reason otherwise than that was a political offence on his part. I do not mean to say that every effort on the part of the leader of a mob can be termed a rebellion. I say, Sir, speaking from memory, the force which Louis Riel commanded in 1871 was larger than the force he had at his command during the recent trouble. In so far as the number of men were concerned, and having regard to their discipline and equipment, the former rebellion was more worthy the name than that which he so recently originated and organised in the North-West. Now, Sir, he was pardoned for his first offence, including the murder of Thomas Scott. Louis Riel left this country and became an alien, but not satisfied with his first offence, he came a second time and raised the standard of rebellion, and by that act excluded himself from the operation of the modern rule of not hanging a man for political offences. Now, I want to ask these hon. gentlemen one question. They say that this Government was in the position of a judge; so said the last speaker, and I agree with him. I have no desire to deny that at all. The course of procedure in a trial in the North-West is different, as we have heard more than once in this discussion, from that obtaining in any other Province. Here a man is arrested, brought before a magistrate and committed. A grand jury sit upon his case, and find either a true bill or not, and afterwards a petty jury of twelve men decide whether he is guilty, and if he is found guilty, sentence of the court is pronounced upon him. In the case of the prisoner at Regina, he was tried by a jury of six men. The stipendiary magistrate must be a lawyer of five years' standing, and so far as legal ability is concerned, he is on a par, no doubt, with most of the judges of our land. Well, Sir, there is no grand jury there. Louis Riel was not brought before a magistrate and committed, it is true. In all these respects, the formality of the procedure by which Louis Riel was tried differs from that which obtains in any of the other Provinces. But that being the case the law of the land has made provision that special care must be taken to review the judgment and to see that a man under those circumstances is not improperly executed. Therefore, it is said that before the execution can proceed, the Executive must convey word to that effect to the Lieut. Governor, and the execution is carried into effect. That makes it an executive act, and makes the Government responsible for that act, just the same as they would be responsible for any other executive act. That brings this Parliament, then, in the position of reviewing that act of the Government. The Government being the judges, and when you say that, you are right, they have a right to take into consideration all the different circumstances attending the case; they have a right, not only to go into one portion of it, but to go into any other; they have a right to give just and due consideration to every single circumstance that would weigh in favor of the prisoner. I agree with that view, but I say on the other hand, that they have a right, at the same time, and it is their duty, to take into consideration every single circumstance in the previous character of the prisoner, which would aid them to form a favorable opinion of the man himself and the wisdom of allowing him to go loose again. Sir, that course of procedure is seen in our courts of law every day. If a prisoner has been more than once before a judge, if it is his second offence, the judge does not impose the same penalty as he would if it were his first offence. Hence, I say that the Government of the day, in deciding as judges in the case of Louis Riel, had a perfect right, and it was their duty, to go back into the circumstances of the prisoner's history, and in doing so they found that he was a man more than ordinarily dangerous to the State. Mr. Speaker, that is a feature in this case that those who strongly condemn the execution of Riel, do not seem to take into consideration at all, and I submit, Sir, that it is a most important consideration. But they say again: How can we take into consideration all the circumstances of the case when we have not certain papers before us. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what papers they want. I am afraid that if we waited for the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) to get all the papers he wants, we would be here till next January. I do not see what in the world that has to do with the consideration of this case by this Parliament. You take your stand upon the question of Riel's insanity, that is your strong plea. The speaker who has just taken his seat stated that that was the only defence raised in the trial. The records show that; it was the only defence that was raised in behalf of Riel. If there were any other defences existing, they were abandoned by the counsel acting for the prisoner. Well, Sir, supposing you had all the papers that went from the Department of the Interior to the North-West; supposing they were all laid upon the Table; supposing they were to show that the Metis had very great grievances; supposing—to go to the very limit—that they were justified in rebelling against the law in that country; supposing all that, our opponents would then say: What does that amount to? The man was insane, he was not responsible at all; it is a question of insanity. It does not make any difference at all whether they had grievances or not, they will say, this man was not a free moral agent; he was insane. Well, Mr. Speaker, taking that view of it, I ask any reasonable man among those who are opposed to the action of the Government, what possible good it could do to their cause if they had all the papers they want in connection with the grievances of the Metis. Surely, Mr. Speaker, they could have no possible weight or bearing upon the question. Then, as to this question of insanity, it has a direct legal bearing upon the discussion before Parliament. I want to ask those hon. gentlemen another question: Can they point out, in the history of criminal jurisprudence, a single case where the defence of insanity being the only one raised at the trial on behalf of the prisoner—whether they ever knew of a medical commission being appointed immediately afterwards to examine the prisoner and find out his condition, and do exactly the work the jury had to do? I do not wish to be misunderstood now in what I am going to say. I would not oppose the issuing of a medical commission to satisfy those who are doubting that justice had been done; but I do say that the Government would have been thoroughly justified in not appointing a medical commission, and for this reason: the defence of insanity being the only one raised at the trial, what right have those who come forward a couple of months afterwards to ask for the appointment of a commission? The time between the man's conviction and the request that they made to the Government for a commission to be issued, was too recent to make it reasonable that such a demand should be made by the Government. I think, Mr. Speaker, that point is well taken, and that, at all events, the least these parties can do is not to find fault with the Government for doing that which, in one sense, they had no right to do. Now, in connection with this subject, and with the recommendation of the jury to mercy, I am astonished that some gentlemen who profess to be lawyers, and who are lawyers, and who have attained a standing at the bar in their own Province, assign so much importance to that act of the jury. Any person who has had experience in our courts

must know that the recommendation to mercy, after a jury has brought in a verdict of guilty, follows almost as a matter of course. It seems to me that it is a way a jury have of consoling themselves when they place the noose about an unfortunate man's neck. Can it be said that this jury at Regina, when they added a recommendation of mercy to the verdict they had given, really thought that Riel was insane? Then, Sir, it is the greatest reflection that could be made upon the honesty of those six men. If by that recommendation to mercy, they mean that Louis Riel was not responsible for his acts, they inflicted a cruel wrong upon a human being when they made their verdict, the only defence raised being that he was not sane. We can take from that recommendation but one meaning, we can draw but one inference—namely, that in making that recommendation to mercy they were letting themselves down easily. They were naturally sorry, as jurors will be, that it was their painful duty by their verdict to perhaps consign a fellow being to an ignominious death, and they took that means of satisfying their own consciences as they supposed. In the remarks of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) on this case he commented on the action of the counsel engaged by the Crown, and I was somewhat surprised at the nature of his comments. First, he paid a very high eulogium to the character and abilities of the gentlemen employed by the Government to conduct the prosecution. Any person who knows the character of those men in the Province where they have so long lived and practised their profession, can agree with him on those points. But speaking at the time of the refusal of the Crown counsel to grant a delay in the progress of the case, the hon. gentleman said it must have been this Government that gave the order, and he characterised it as a cruel and dishonorable thing for the Government to do. Now, no counsel engaged in any case is bound to do a dishonorable act; whether he be acting for the Crown or a private individual it matters not. Counsel engaged in the prosecution of that case when they received that dishonorable order, as the hon. gentleman calls it, if they ever did receive it, had no right to act upon it; their duty was to withdraw from the case if they deemed it dishonorable. So the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), in making that statement must have made it for political effect alone, because I am satisfied, the trial, so far as regards the formalities prescribed, was one in which those formalities were fairly observed, and Riel had, according to the laws of that country, a fair and honest trial. If a man goes into a country and stirs up rebellion, goes into a community where peace reigns and changes it into a state of war, if he is guilty of acts of cruelty such as have been laid to the charge of Riel, if he shows himself to be a man devoid of sympathy, as Riel is proven to have been, certainly it does not lie in the mouths of his defenders to say that his conduct ought not to be judged by the law of the land in which he happens to have stirred up strife and turmoil. It comes with very bad grace now from some hon. members to say that Louis Riel did not receive what is called a British trial. Riel received a trial that very few men are fortunate enough to receive. He received at Regina a trial according to the prescribed laws and forms of the country. His case was tried thoroughly, it was reviewed thoroughly by three able judges in Manitoba, one of whom, I can safely assert, was amongst the ablest lawyers in Ontario, if two of them were not. Again, no obstruction was placed in the way of the Privy Council reviewing it again. We are here called to review it, and judging by the attitude of certain members of the opposite side of the House, I suppose the great tribunal of the people will yet judge of the action of the Government in this case, and if they do, I feel sure that the result in the country will be as it will be in this House when parties come to decide upon it. There seems to be an idea prevailing in this country that political offenders are never to be executed for the crime of high treason. I wish to read—and it is the only extract I will read—the remarks made by the late President Johnston to a deputation from Illinois which called upon him after the death of President Lincoln. He said:

“Here, gentlemen, you expect me to present some indications of my future policy. One thing I will say, every era teaches its lessons. The times we live in are not without instruction. The American people must be taught, if they do not already feel that treason is a crime, and that it must be punished—that the Government will not bear with its enemies, and that it is strong not only to protect but to punish. When we turn to the criminal code and examine the catalogue of crimes, we find arson laid down as a crime with its appropriate penalty. We find there, too, theft and robbery and murder given as crimes, and there, too, we find the least and highest of all crimes, treason with other and inferior offences our people are familiar. But in our peaceful history treason has been almost unknown. The people must understand that it is the blackest of crimes, and will surely be punished. I make this allusion not to excite the already exasperated feelings of the public, but to point out the principle of public justice which should guide our action at this particular juncture, and which accords with sound public morals. Let it be engraved in every heart that treason is a crime, and traitors shall suffer the penalty. While we are appalled, overwhelmed at the fall of one man in our midst by the hand of a traitor, shall we allow men, I care not by what weapon, to attempt the life of the State with impunity? While we strain our minds to comprehend the enormity of this assassination, shall we allow the nation to be assassinated? I speak in no spirit of unkindness. I leave the events of the future to be disposed of as they arise regarding myself, as the humble instrument of the American people. In this, as in all things, justice and judgment shall be determined by them. In general terms, I would say that public morals and opinion should be established on the sure and inflexible principle of justice. When the question of exercising mercy comes before me it will be considered calmly and judicially, remembering that I am the executor of the nation. I know men love to have their names spoken of in connection with acts of mercy, and how easy it is to yield to this impulse, but we must not forget that what would be mercy to the individual is cruelty to the State. In the exercise of mercy there should be no doubt left that this high prerogative is not used to relieve a few at the expense of many.”

I think the remarks I have quoted particularly applicable to the position of the Government which I support. When they came to the conclusion after what was, I am sure, a most careful investigation, when they came to the conclusion with sorrow that it was their duty to order that a human being should lose his life upon the scaffold—when they came to that conclusion, I am sure they did so with great reluctance; but I say it was in the interest of the public, in the interest of the State, and they would in my humble opinion be untrue to their oaths of office, untrue to the Canadian people, untrue to themselves, if they had acted otherwise than they did.

Mr. LANGELIER. Before addressing myself particularly to the subject before the House, I must say a few words in answer to a remark which was made by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). He reproached me for having made some remarks during the course of his speech, and seemed to think that I had no right to say anything in this debate because, as he said, I was here by the votes of Orangemen. Well, I can tell the hon. gentleman that he is entirely mistaken. There are Orangemen in my county, and there is no more respectable or law-abiding class of electors. There are some who vote in my favor and some who oppose me, but I can say that those who voted for me did not do so because I made them any promise in favor of the Orange order. They voted for me on the merits of the questions discussed before them and nothing else. They considered that the affairs of the country were badly administered by the present Government, and they voted for me because I said I was opposed to that Government. I distinctly refused to make any engagement when asked to do so, if a Bill was proposed to incorporate an Orange order, and I said I would see when the time came what course I would take.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGELIER. And I added—if it is any satisfaction to the hon. member for East Hastings—that as presently advised I would vote against it unless my feelings and opinions changed. I probably lost some Orange votes, but here is the answer made to me by one Orangeman. He said he preferred a man who told the truth to a man like my predecessor, a good Tory, who got the votes of almost all those Orangemen by promising that he would vote for the incorporation of the Orange order, but who, when the time came, failed to redeem the promise he made. That is my answer to the hon. member for Montreal West. I am prepared to meet him in my own county before my Orange and Irish Catholic electors. I have not two ways of addressing the electors. I have not one kind of a speech for the Orangemen of my county and another kind for the Irish Catholics. I do not do as I have seen some gentlemen do who are now on the Treasury benches. I have known one of the gentlemen on the Treasury benches coming into my county and making a most violent speech against me on account of the speech of the member for West Durham; and at that speech he was asked by an Orangeman, who was a most intelligent elector, whether he would be prepared to repeat that speech before the Irish Catholics in another portion of the county. He did not say that he would be prepared to do so. Any speech I make here or in any other place, I am prepared to make before an Irish Catholic audience, a French Canadian audience, or an Orange audience.

There is no denying the fact that no event during the last twenty years has excited so much interest and feeling in the Province of Quebec, or rather I should say in the French Canadian portion of that Province, as the execution of that unfortunate man, Louis Riel. For several days, if not for weeks, not one man desiring to have the respect of his compatriots in the Province of Quebec, would have dared to show himself on a public platform and say publicly that he approved of that execution, and few dare to do so at the present time. For a long time all the French Canadians in the Province of Quebec, and in Ontario and the United States, were unanimous in denouncing the Government for that act. The speakers of both political parties at meetings largely attended have denounced the Government in very strong terms. I can speak on that subject in a very impartial manner because I took little part in that agitation, not because I condemned it, however, for I said enough to show the views I held on that subject.

If a convincing proof was wanted of the unanimous feeling of the Province of Quebec on that subject, it would be found in the motion now before this House. That motion is proposed by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), a gentleman who has been returned twice to this House as a supporter of the Government, and every one knows that he has supported the Government through thick and thin. But what do we see to-day? We see him moving a motion of censure against the Government on this question. When a gentleman in his position is compelled to move such a motion, hon. members may understand what is the public feeling in the Province to which he belongs.

This makes it of much interest to enquire what is the cause of that great agitation which has been going on since the 16th of November, and which has caused such a disruption of party ties—I might say such an upheaval of the political world in the Province of Quebec. Is it because Riel was a French Canadian? The Mail and some other organs of the Government have been trying to impress the public with the idea that the agitation which was going on in the Province of Quebec was due only to the fact that Riel was a French Canadian. Well, it is useless to go into a long and elaborate argument to prove that such is not the case. It is sufficient to recall what was said by the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol), that this is not the first execution of a French Canadian. Unfortunately, some of our countrymen have lost their lives on the scaffold, and I defy any member of this House or any man out of it, to mention one single case where an attempt was made to save the lives of any of those parties because they were French Canadians. It never entered into the minds of anybody in the Province of Quebec, to save a man from the scaffold because he was a French Canadian. In almost all cases where those men have been condemned and executed, they were convicted by French Canadian jurors and condemned by French Canadian judges, and no one tried to throw any blame on them for the course they took. Why has the execution of Louis Riel caused so much agitation? It is because the offence for which he was condemned and executed is not an ordinary offence, and his execution is not an ordinary one. The present Government can boast, not only of having had two rebellions during their administration, but of having shown this country what we have not seen before since the dark days of 1838, when a certain number of our countrymen lost their lives for political reasons; this Government can boast of having raised again in this country political scaffolds, which we might have thought had passed away forever. Riel was not an ordinary criminal. If he had been an ordinary criminal, some of his friends closely related to him might have taken an interest in his fate; but the whole public would not have taken that interest in his execution which has been shown in the Province of Quebec on this occasion.

At the same time that we have seen nearly a whole Province asking that that man should not be executed, we have been confronted with a most remarkable occurrence. I do not think that within the memory of any member of this House there has been an occasion when the execution of a man has been insisted upon by any class of people. A country where men could be found to demand that a victim should be put to death would be a considered a country of cannibals. What people are accustomed to do on such occasions is to abstain from interference; but we have heard resolutions of public bodies quoted before this House, asking that the sentence of death should be carried out. If newspaper reports can be believed, public men have even come to Ottawa on purpose to insist on the Government that Riel should be executed. I avail myself of this occasion to correct an injustice which I unintentionally did to an hon. member of this House, at a public meeting held at St. Hyacinthe in the month of December last. I stated that the member for East Hastings (Mr. White) had come to Ottawa to ask that the sentence of death on Louis Riel should be carried out. I have since met the hon. gentleman, and he has told me that not only did he not come to Ottawa for that purpose, but that if it had rested personally with him Riel would not have been executed. I am glad to be able to correct that mistake, which I was led into by newspaper reports, and I am glad to find that the hon. gentleman had no share in the measures which were taken to secure the execution of that unfortunate man.

Riel not being an ordinary criminal, but a political offender, we have to consider the nature of his offence and the circumstances of the rebellion in which he took part. I do not intend to enter at length into the causes of the North-West troubles of last year, but a few remarks are necessary to enable us to understand the circumstances under which Riel came into this country in the summer of 1884. During the latter part of the last century and the early part of the present century, a great many French Canadians left the Province of Quebec and went to what was then called the Great West, that is, the country between Lake Superior and the Rocky Mountains. Many of them belonged to the best families in the Province of Quebec, and they were the best in their families—the most plucky and the most adventurous. It required a great deal of courage at that time to go into that country, which was inhabited only by barbarous Indians. Still, the great companies, the Hudson Bay Company and the North-West Company, never had any trouble in finding young men in the Province of Quebec ready to enter their service in the North-West. The Great West was not entirely new to the French population of Quebec. Everybody knows that at the time when the Dutch scarcely dared to go beyond Manhattan Island, and when the settlers of New England would not go far from the sea, the French voyageurs had gone over nearly the whole Northern continent of America, and had penetrated into almost every part of the North-West. Things had come to such a pass that the Sovereign Council of new France was compelled to pass a law forbidding those expeditions, because of the frequent loss of life that took place; yet they still went on during the whole period of the French régime. A great many of those who went to the North-West married with Indian women; and if we are to believe the reports of travellers, who have lived a long time in that country, the Indian population was not then what it is to-day. The Indian women were remarkable for their purity and good morals. The French half-breeds of the North-West of the present day, are the descendants of those French-Canadian voyageurs who married Indian women. They were living in a very happy manner when the North-West was annexed to the Dominion of Canada, most of them by fishing and hunting, and a few by agriculture. Coming from Lower Canada, it was natural that they should adopt a mode of dividing their land which was in existence in the Province of Quebec. Everyone knows the way the land is divided in that Province, extending in long and narrow strips from the rivers. It has been said that this system of the division of property was taken from France. That is a mistake. Nothing of the kind is to be found in France; it is entirely Canadian, arising from the peculiar circumstances in which the population of New France was living. Being constantly exposed to attacks from the Indians, especially the ferocious Iroquois, who committed many murders among them, if they had been scattered in villages, they would have been in great danger of being killed. But by dividing the lands as they were divided, they were put in a position to call on their neighbors for assistance, so that within a few minutes of an Indian attack, some twenty farmers, with their sons and servants, could be gathered together for their defence. Such are the causes of the settlements of lands as they were settled in the Province of Quebec. It was attempted at first to divide the lands otherwise. In the neighborhood of the city of Quebec there are villages which had been laid out just as villages are laid out in France; in Charlesbourg you will find a village from which all the lands of the Parish radiate. It was intended the people should live in the village, and not on their lands, but this system had to be given up on account of the danger of attack from the Indians. After that custom was established, social habits were brought which caused the maintenance of the system.

Such was the universal system of dividing lands in the Province of Quebec when the French Canadians left the country, at the end of the last century and the beginning of this, to go to the North-West. It was natural they should there adopt the same division of property; that is, take up the lands along the rivers, even if there was not the same local necessity for that system. But the same necessity did exist, because in the North-West they were exposed to attacks of Indians as the French population in New France had been exposed to the attacks of the Iroquois. Although the large majority of the half-breeds were living pretty much like Indians when the North-West was annexed to Canada in 1869, a good many of the half-breeds had settled themselves on the principal rivers of the North-West, on the Saskatchewan and Qu'Appelle; and as soon as the settlement of the country by the Dominion commenced two difficulties arose: Were those already in possession of lands to continue occupying them and those who had none to get some, and were the limits to be kept as they were before. It is to the knowledge of every hon. member that those two questions were the main causes of the first rebellion in Manitoba in 1870. It is useless to examine the question whether the half-breeds had or had not the right to their property. The Statute of 1870, passed after and in consequence of a kind of treaty or arrangement entered into between the Government of Canada and the half-breeds of the North-West, enacted that 1,400,000 acres of lands should be set aside to extinguish the Indian title of the half-breeds of Manitoba. According to that Statute, an enumeration of the half-breeds in Manitoba, who were in the country on the 15th July, 1870, was made, and the lands were apportioned to them at the rate of 160 acres for each head of a family and 240 acres for their children. No further difficulty occurred in Manitoba under that settlement, but there remained a great many half-breeds belonging to Manitoba, who were out of the Province during the distribution of the 1,400,000 acres and who got no share in the distribution, and there was still a larger number of half-breeds who had never belonged to the Province of Manitoba. If there is any doubt, and there can be none, as to the rights of the half-breeds in Manitoba in getting lands, there can be no doubt either as to the rights of the half-breeds outside Manitoba, because, as remarked last year by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), there cannot be one justice for Manitoba and another for the North-West Territories. If it was right to grant the lands to the half-breeds of Manitoba, it must be right to grant lands to the half-breeds of the North-West Territories.

It is that right to lands to extinguish the Indian title which the half-breeds of the North-West have been claiming since 1873. It is a sacred right, the right of property, for which they contend, and if they have rebelled it was in order to defend that right. If the half-breeds have a right to some property to extinguish their Indian title, it cannot be contended that they have obtained the land to which they are entitled. It is within the recollection of all hon. members that on the 30th March last year, just four days after the first fight between the half-breeds and the troops of the Dominion, a commission was issued to enquire into the claims of those half-breeds. What has been the result? Within a few months 2,000 claims of half-breeds have been recognised by the commission, so that it cannot be contended that those who are claiming lands in the North-West Territories were half-breeds who had already obtained scrip in Manitoba. Nobody sets out such a pretention now, it would be impossible to do so, because that commission has admitted, as well founded, over 2,000 claims within a few months, which admission, if it had been made before by the Government, would have prevented the rebellion of 1885. If the Government had done, not only few years but only a few months, perhaps a few weeks, a before the 30th March, 1885, what they then did, if they had issued a commission to enquire into the representations of the half-breeds, there never would have been a rebellion in the North-West.

But it is contended by the Government that the half-breeds, admitting their right to get lands, are criminal because they did not resort to legal and constitutional means to enforce their rights. Everyone remembers the celebrated letter written by the Secretary of State in answer to a petition or letter which he had received from certain French Canadians of Fall River, U. S. He said, in substance, that the half-breeds did not deserve any consideration, because they had never resorted to the constitutional means at their disposal.

Let us see what were those constitutional means, and whether they could have availed themselves of them. The first legal means available in a civilised country is recourse to courts of justice. Had they courts of justice? It is well known there were no regular courts of justice in the North-West; there are none there now. We have only stipendiary magistrates, appointed principally to administer the criminal law. There are no regular civil tribunals, and even if there were the half-breeds could not have recourse to them, because their rights are more treaty rights than regular titles which could be enforced before a court of justice. No one could show, except those who had already lands on which they were settled, and for which they had obtained patents, titles to property which could be enforced in a regular court of justice. Therefore, they could have no resort to a regular court of justice.

Another constitutional means at the disposition of Her Majesty's subjects is the right to apply to Parliament through duly elected representatives. The North-West was not represented. It was proposed last year, I think, by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) to give representation to the North-West Territories. The Bill was not passed. The Speech from the Throne this year announces a measure of that kind, but at this moment the people of the North-West Territories have no representation in Parliament. How can they, then, avail themselves of the right to apply to Parliament? And even if they had, it is very doubtful if they could have obtained any redress, judging from what took place, two years ago, when the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) moved for the appointment of a committee to take into consideration the claims and grievances of the people of the North-West, and especially the half-breeds, and his motion was voted down by an immense majority. This shows that that very important and efficient constitutional means of redress was not open to the half-breeds of the North-West Territories.

Then, what remained to them? The right to apply to the Executive. Did they so apply? Is it true, as stated by the Secretary of State in that letter to which I referred, that they did not avail themselves of the right to petition the Executive? Why, the half-breeds have been doing nothing else since 1879. When we look at the documents laid before the House last year, we see that they petitioned singly, petitioned collectively, petitioned at public meetings, addressed themselves to the North-West Council, to the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories, to the Minister of the Interior, to the Prime Minister, to the Governor General, to the House of Commons and to the Senate. They did that not once, twice, or ten times but hundreds of times. What could they do more than they have done?

They did not content themselves with petitioning, but, in the winter of 1883, seeing that their petitions and memoranda had had no effect, they decided to send a deputation to Ottawa, and, although very poor, they subscribed among themselves $700 to pay the travelling expenses of their delegates, Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney. Those delegates came to Ottawa. How were they received? Judging by the report of Father Leduc, it took weeks before they could be admitted into the august presence of the minister of the Interior. They had to obtain the influence of Ministerial supporters in order to get admission to his presence. Most probably, if they had been election wire-pullers, or if they had come to Ottawa to get grants of land in the North-West or British Columbia, or if they had been speculators or people asking for Government appointments, they would at once have been admitted to the presence of the Minister of the Interior; but as they came there as representatives of a poor though very brave people, who had no representatives in Parliament, who could not elect Ministerial supporters, they had to wait weeks and weeks before they were admitted. What answer did they get? They were very politely received, so politely that Father Leduc said at once—as we say in French—c'est de l'eau bénite de cour, and he would not content himself with eau bénite de cour, and he asked the Government to put in writing the promises made verbally to them—promises of complete satisfaction of their grievances. The minister of the Interior said: Put your demands in writing and we shall put our answer in writing. They put their demands in writing, and then the Minister of the Interior told them to go home quietly, and that the answer in writing would reach the Saskatchewan before they did. They went away quietly, and I do not know whether the answer has ever reached them yet. I do not think it ever reached them. In 1884, having exhausted all the means at their disposal to obtain the redress of their grievances, they thought of sending for Louis Riel.

It may at first seem extraordinary that they should have thought of sending for Louis Riel. Why did they do so? They remembered that, in 1870, Louis Riel had been the means of obtaining redress for the Manitoba half-breeds, for grievances of exactly the same nature, and they thought that, by bringing him into the country, they would succeed, as the Manitoba half-breeds had succeeded. This is very well explained in the instructions given to the delegates who were sent to him. Riel was then living in Montana in the United States. It is very important to understand this circumstance. The hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) stated that Riel had stirred up the rebellion. That is not in accordance with the facts which are of record in this House. If anyone stirred up the rebellion, it was this Government and not Riel. It was the state in which the negligence of the Government had put the half-breeds which was the first cause of all the troubles in the North-West. Riel was only asked to come into the territory when all other means of redress had been exhausted without any result whatever. Riel, after some hesitation, consented to come into the country, but he said to the delegates that he would come into the country—why? To rebel against the authority of the Queen? To raise a civil war? There is not a word of that kind to be found in the papers which are before the House. He said he would come to agitate legally with them. He said he had the same grievances, he was himself entitled to lands as a Manitoba half-breed, lands which he had never got, and he said he would come into the country and assist them in their constitutional agitation. These were the feelings he expressed before leaving Montana. What did he do when he came to the North-West Territories? Did he advise the half-breeds to resort to violence? Nothing of the kind. It is a remarkable circumstance that, some months after his arrival in the territory, when there had been no trouble and no threat of trouble—he arrived in July, 1884, and this was on the 6th January, 1885—a dinner is given to him at the residence of one Boyer, at which he makes a speech, and the man who presides at that dinner is one Charles Nolin, whose testimony has been quoted so frequently against Louis Riel. Hon. members can read both of those speeches, the one by Charles Nolin and the one by Louis Riel. Nolin made a most violent speech, threatening the Government, a speech which explains very well the opinion given of him by one of the men in the Mounted Police, whose name I forget now, but who said once, in a report which is to be found in the papers before the House, that Nolin was a very bad and dangerous character, that he was inciting the half-breeds to violence, from the very beginning of the troubles in the North-West. But Riel made a very quiet speech, according to the reports, and advised them to do—what? To resort to arms and violence? Not at all. He advised the half-breeds present at that dinner to go on petitioning the Government and to do so in a quiet, respectful manner, because, said he, we want to get something from them, and the best way to get something from a party is not to go to him with threats; that is the way he spoke on that occasion. He went on with that same kind of agitation for several weeks, and probably there never would have been a disturbance if a misunderstanding, to which I shall now advert, had not taken place. From the moment he came into the North-West until the next day after the rebellion broke out, we do not see that he advised the people to resort to violence. He held a great many meetings at each of which resolutions of a character which might be passed at a meeting at another portion of the Dominion, were adopted; resolutions to petition the Government. But the result was the same as before: no answer could be got from the Government to those petitions. At last, in the fall of 1884, Riel was determined to leave. He was discouraged, he said, to his friends who had brought him from Montana, and he wanted to return to the United States. However, he was prevented from leaving the country by sheer force by Gabriel Dumont and some others, amongst whom Charles Nolin was probably one. He was kept almost by force in the country, which I can prove by a letter from Dumont himself. He kept Riel against his own wish because Riel thought nothing more could be done. The agitation went on during the winter. A few moments ago the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) quoted letters from missionaries, and I must say I was very glad to see those letters of Catholic missionaries received with demonstrations of pleasure by the neighbors of that hon. member. I hope that all the words and words of the Catholic missionaries will always receive a similar reception from those hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for Montreal Centre quoted one of those letters to prove that something very bad must have been going on, because the half-breeds were acting in secret. Well, Mr. Speaker, there may have been something wrong in those meetings, but I do not think we have any right to pronounce them illegal because they were secret. Everywhere we see the people meeting secretly. They may have reasons, good, bad or indifferent, to meet secretly, but we have no right to condemn meetings of any kind because they are secret.

Mr. BOWELL. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGELIER. I am very glad to receive such a hearty approval from the hon. Minister of Customs.

Mr. BOWELL. I would like to see you vote in accordance with the sentiment.

Mr. LANGELIER. We do not object to secrecy. It is not to secret meetings that we object, but to the oath which binds to secrecy. But there is nothing of the kind here. Business men have meetings which they keep entirely secret, and there is no objection to that. In the winter of 1884-5, as I stated a few moments ago, after all that agitation, all these petitions and memoranda that were sent to the Government, no answer had been obtained, and, of course, there was dissatisfaction. Then, the half-breeds expected to be ejected from their lands. That was always what they had been afraid of. At the moment when they were on the qui vive, expecting to see the Mounted Police coming from day to day to drive them from their property, they heard that Mr. Lawrence Clarke, of the Hudson Bay Company, had been to Ottawa, and they asked him whether there was any answer to their numerous demands and petitions. What was the answer of Mr. Clarke? It was a most foolish and mischievous answer, which was the match which set on fire the whole North-West. Mr. Clarke answered that they would receive their answer in a short time; that it would be carried by the Mounted Police, and that it would be in the shape of lead and bullets. That was the answer they got from Mr. Clarke. They immediately flew to their arms. They did not want to be expelled from their properties, and they defended them. It is true they were mistaken. At that time I do not think there was any serious danger on the part of the Government to expel them from their land, but they honestly believed that such was the intention of the Government, and seeing what had taken place before, we can not wonder that they believed it. But I repeat that I do not say that it was the intention of the Government. We have no proof that the Government had come to any decision to eject them from their lands. Well, as if to corroborate the answer given by Mr. Clarke, a few days afterwards a party of Mounted Police, and volunteers from Prince Albert, came to Duck Lake. They did not come to attack the half-breeds; they were going to take provisions from the stores of one Mitchell at Duck Lake. But the half-breeds, expecting a visit of the police, from day to day, thought that the police were going to expel them from their land. They met the police, and the first engagement of the civil war took place, with the result that is known to every one. The police were defeated. Who fired first, or who fired last, is of very little consequence. I am not going to enquire into that question, because I consider that it is of no practical interest. One thing is quite sure that at that moment the half-breeds were upon their own property, and honestly believed they were defending it against unjust and unwarranted aggression. That was their honest belief and they defended themselves. Valuable lives were lost on both sides, and very regrettable circumstances followed therefrom. But, Mr. Speaker, who would reproach them for what they did? I have heard it repeated very often that the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), had said last Session that if he had been on the Saskatchewan he also would have shouldered his musket with the half-breeds. Well, Sir, I am not ashamed to say the same thing, and a man would be a coward who would not do so. I say the man who would not stand up and resist those who came to turn him out of his house and home unjustly, and defend his family, deserves to be branded as a coward. Well, Mr. Speaker, there were peculiar reasons on that occasion for the half-breeds not to allow themselves to be turned out of their homes and property without resistance. In 1870 they had been branded by that great enfonceur de portes ouvertes, Colonel Wolsely, with being cowards. They knew that they did not deserve that epithet. They knew they were not cowards. They had been lulled into security by promises made to Archbishop Taché, and that is the reason why they did not oppose the entry of Canadian troops into Manitoba, but it was not because they were cowards. They were afraid to be called cowards if they did not defend their property. This was a very imprudent expression on the part of Colonel Wolsely in 1870. He should have known the circumstances under which he went into that territory, and these did not justify him in branding as cowards the half-breeds because they did not resist him. Perhaps if they had resisted they would not have been branded with being cowards. I was saying a few moments ago that any man who had blood running through his veins would have done exactly as the half-breeds did under the circumstances, because they honestly believed they were being expelled unjustly and unwarrantably from their homes. They are French; but if there is one class of our population which should not reproach them with the course they followed on that occasion, it is certainly the English speaking population of the Dominion. If we look back into history, what do we find? Why has England always stood at the head of Europe in the matter of national liberty? It has been a free country when almost all the other countries were ruled by despots and tyrants. Why was it when liberty was chained almost everywhere else, its flag was floating over England? It was because the English people always rebelled when an attempt was made to deprive the nation of its liberty. What were those men who wrested Magna Charta from King John at Runnymede? They were rebels, and if they had not succeeded they would have been condemned to death and probably hanged. What were those who not only opposed Charles I but took his life? They were arch-rebels. What were those who not only expelled James II from England but gave his throne to William III. I am sure they are very much admired by the Minister of Customs. They were arch-rebels and arch-traitors; they acted against the law. Under the law then in force they were guilty of high treason, and if they had been caught and brought before a court of justice they would certainly have been condemned to be hanged. Still, no one will pretend, in these days, to say that they did not deserve well of their country. What was the American rebellion? The Americans rebelled against the English and would not pay a tea duty imposed by a Parliament in which they were not represented. What were those Americans? They were rebels and traitors in the eye of the strict law at that time. They were no more and no less so than the half-breeds of the North-West. In fact there was more justification for the rebellion of the half-breeds than for any of the rebellions of which I have been speaking. Not only does the English nation glory in those rebellions of which I have been speaking, but even at the time of the American rebellion Lord Chatham, speaking in the English House of Commons on the American rebellion, said:

"I rejoice that the Americans have rebelled, because three millions of people who would have submitted to what was required of them would be enough to insult the whole nation."

What is the difference between all these rebellions of which I have been speaking and the Metis rebellion of last year? The former was for political rights, the latter for civil rights; the former for political freedom, the latter for defending the sacred right of property. The American rebels were defending their purses against taxation; the Metis were defending their homes against land speculators and grasping colonisation companies. There is another difference between all these rebels and the half-breeds. The former were successful, the Metis have been unsuccessful. Are we to judge of the justice or injustice of the rebellion by the result? It would be just as well to say that might is right if those who succeeded are to be applauded, and those who do not succeed under the same circumstances, or under circumstances more favorable, are to be held as criminals. There is another difference. The half-breeds were French and Catholics; but I am sure there is not a member of this House who would say that religion or nationality should make any difference in their treatment.

Such is the position of the North-West half-breeds. They had ten times more reason to rebel last year than had the authors of the great historical rebellions to which I have referred. It is very important to know whether the rebellion of the half-breeds was justifiable; because, if the rebellion was justifiable, how can the leader of the rebellion be unjustified? Riel has been considered as the leader of that rebellion; it is in that character he has been treated. I do not want to be considered as condemning the measures taken to suppress the rebellion of last year, no more than Lord Chatham, in the British House of Commons, was blaming the Government for trying to suppress the American rebellion; because, however justifiable a rebellion may be, the power of the authorities must be supreme in every country, and the necessary means must be taken to enforce its laws. But I say that the rebellion being justifiable, it was a reason why the Government should have shown a great deal of leniency to all those who had been mixed up with it. There was only one class of people connected with that rebellion who deserve no leniency and who should obtain none from the country. They are the Ministers, the Ministers whose negligence has been the principal cause of the rebellion.

Another reason why clemency should have been shown to the chief of the half-breeds is the way his trial was conducted. He was charged with high treason, not under the Statute of 1668, but under the Statute of Edward III. One of the main contentions of his counsel was that under the charge of high treason, under the Statute of Edward III, he should have been indicted and the trial should have taken place according to the procedure enacted by the old Statute of William III. Such was not the case. Instead of that, the trial was conducted according to the summary procedure enacted in the statute concerning the North-West Territories. That mode of procedure may be strictly in accordance with the law; I am not going to condemn the judge in regard to the legality of the trial, but there are in this House a good many members who were present when the question was brought here and voted upon. I am sure when the summary mode of procedure was provided, there was no member who thought that that procedure would ever be applied to the trial of a man charged with high treason under the Statute of Edward III. No man would say he would have voted to have established that mode of summary procedure for such an important trial as a trial for high treason.

Not only did the Government resuscitate the Statute of Edward III, not only did they prosecute Riel according to the procedure of 1883, but they deprived him of as many as they could of those guarantees which he might have expected under that most extraordinary procedure. Let us take their choice of the magistrate who was to conduct the trial. It is admitted that the Government had the choice of the magistrate, and it must be admitted that the choice was a most unhappy one. There was in the North-West a magistrate of the same nationality and speaking the same language as the prisoner—Magistrate Rouleau. Why was he not selected instead of Judge Richardson, when one would have done just as well as the other? Then, as to the choice of the jurors. They were selected by the magistrate himself, but he might have found jurors who spoke the French language. There were enough of French Canadians in the North-West to have selected, at least, half the jury speaking that language. In the Province of Quebec, a man who is charged with the slightest offence is entitled to a jury, one-half of whom speak his own language. We do not refuse that to a man who is charged with even a small theft. But here is a man charged with the greatest crime known to our law, and not only are jurors not of his own nationality selected, but as soon as an Irish Catholic juror happened by accident to be called by the court, the four lawyers representing the Government rose at once, as if moved by a spring, and challenged him peremptorily. Another difficulty was that Riel's language was the French language while the trial was conducted in the English language. We who are compelled to speak in this House in English, which is not our own language, can at once appreciate the difficulty under which he must have labored in conducting his defence in a language foreign to himself. If Mr. Rouleau had been selected the trial might have been conducted in French, which would have given him much more advantage. Another difficulty that he labored under was that he had no money. As he eloquently said in his address, he was left at Regina hundreds of miles from his family and his friends, as helpless as the day of his birth. There does not seem to have been, with the exception of his counsel, one individual well disposed towards him in the court. I have it from the lawyers who so ably and generously defended him, that on several occasions, whenever there was anything said by him in his defence he was interrupted by insults from the audience which were not repressed by the magistrate. I do not say that it should have been otherwise, for I have been informed that it might not have been prudent for the magistrate to interfere because the crowd was too violent. At times, when strong evidence was brought out against him, the witnesses were cheered, while those in his favor were insulted, and that without the interference of the judge. Now, another difficulty is, as I have said, that he had no money. He wanted to have some witnesses, and amongst them Dr. Howard, the medical superintendent of Longue Pointe Asylum, and Dr. Gray, medical superintendent of the Utica Asylum. The latter is certainly the most celebrated expert on insanity known in America. What did the counsel for the Crown answer to that demand? He said it would cost too much money. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) has not denied it. He admits that the Crown counsel refused to have Dr. Howard because it would have cost too much. He says he was asking $900 to go out to Regina. I say even if it had cost $3,000, he should have been brought there, because it would have given satisfaction. Dr. Howard was not an ordinary witness; he had had Riel under his care as an insane person for nine months. He knew very well what kind of delusions he was laboring under. The member for Montreal Centre mentioned a certificate he had from Dr. Howard, but what does it signify after all? He says he could not have done much for Riel, and I must say that I think nobody could have done much for him, for from what I have seen since the trial, I think it was a foregone conclusion that he should be hanged and if that had not succeeded some other means would have been tried. Dr. Howard probably alludes to the way the law was expounded to the jurors by Magistrate Richardson. He said to them that if Riel was able to distinguish right from wrong he should be found guilty, no matter what his hallucinations and delusions might be. I am not surprised at what Dr. Howard says now, for if such was the law to be applied to the case, his testimony would not have availed much. But what has Dr. Clark said since? He is Superintendent of the Toronto Insane Asylum, and everyone has read his interview with regard to the condemnation of Riel. He says he is not prepared to contradict the statement of the law which was made by Magistrate Richardson, but he adds this, which is very important—"that if that law was to be applied in all cases, I must say there are a great many people under my care who would be liable to be condemned, because I know a great many of them who are able to distinguish right from wrong." I can mention a case well known to those who have lived in the city of Quebec of late years. We have had in Beauport Lunatic Asylum an ex-officer of the Commissariat Department of Quebec, a Mr. Marshall, a well known gentleman of high university education. His only madness consisted in the delusion that the Queen owed him a large sum of money. If you went to the asylum any morning you would have found him making very elaborate calculations. He was a great mathematician, and he was covering sheets and sheets of paper with very accurate calculations of the amount the Queen owed him in principal interest, and compound interest. As soon as he had finished his calculations, he wrote a very fine letter to the Queen, informing Her Majesty that at noon on that day she owed him so much. Then he went to the post office of Quebec, where he was allowed to go because he was quite inoffensive, and he posted his letter to the Queen. To talk to him on any other subject you would never suspect him to be insane; he could certainly distinguish right from wrong; yet he has been in the Quebec Lunatic Asylum for more than twenty years, and whenever the subject of his insanity was referred to he became very violent. Now, Dr. Gray had been consulted on the subject by Dr. Roy, who had taken the trouble to visit him at Utica; and as Dr. Roy had Riel under his care at Beauport Asylum for a long time, he could state the delusion under which he was laboring, and after he had described that delusion to Dr. Gray, Dr. Gray gave the opinion that he should not be held responsible. The prisoner was deprived of the testimony of those two men. He had not the means of bringing them, and if he had the means he had not the time. As remarked by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) he was given only one week in which to prepare his defence, to get witnesses from Quebec and other places to prove his insanity. The only witnesses he could obtain were those who went voluntarily. If Dr. Roy and some others had not been generous enough to go on telegrams from the prisoner's counsel, Riel would not have had one single witness; and every one knows that a witness cannot be compelled to go to a court on a mere telegram without a subpoena. In fact, the means adopted seemed to imply that it was desired that he should have no witnesses at all.

It was stated a few moments ago by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) that the only defence set up was that of insanity. Well, there was good reason for that defence; but the defence was also set up that the insurrection of which Riel was the leader was justifiable. The counsel for the prisoner wished to summon Mr. Burgess, the Deputy Minister of the Interior, and Mr. Van-koughnet, Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, in order to prove by these two witnesses that the half-breeds had claims which had been shamefully neglected, and that therefore the insurrection, of which Riel was the leader, was justifiable to some extent. The court ruled that no such witnesses could be brought, and it was useless to bring them as the court would not hear them. The counsel for Riel also wanted to prove that Riel had not come into the country of his own free will in order to raise a rebellion, but that he had come after having been asked to do so by the leaders of the agitation which had been going on for many years in the North-West Territories. The principal leaders were Gabriel Dumont and Michel Dumas. Those men were living in the United States, and they would not come unless they received a promise not to be molested while in the country. The counsel for the prisoner read letters, of which I have copies, showing what sort of evidence these men would give. Here is a letter from Napoléon Nault:

"DAKOTA, ST. JOHN POLLETTE COUNTY, 31st July, 1885.

"GENTLEMEN,—According to what I have seen in the papers, Mr. Riel intends to have me as a witness for him, I shall be very glad to do so, if he believes I can be of any use to him, and at the same time, I think I can be useful to him. I will go on Canadian territory if the Canadian Government assures me that I shall be allowed to come back without being molested. You may try to induce the Government to consent to do that. I saw in some paper that Riel said that I had documents which would be very useful to him. Be kind enough to speak to him on that subject, in order that I may be kept informed of this matter. I am confident that you will answer me one way or the other, and, in the meantime, please present my compliments to my cousin."

He was a cousin of the prisoner. Here is a letter from Michel Dumas:

"FORT BENTON, MONTANA, 1st August, 1885.

"SIR,—I wrote you a letter a few days ago which I do not know whether you have received or not. It is on this account that I take this opportunity of writing to you another, with the address of the one formerly sent to you. You might get it out of the Regina post office. I think it had the address 'Kirkpatrick, Lawyer, Regina,' instead of 'Fitzpatrick.' It is concerning Mr. Riel's trial.

"In an article in the Red River press, it says that he might be wanted to help the defence on the trial now taking place at Regina. We are ready to go, provided the Government will grant us immunity for the participation taken in the recent troubles in the North-West Territories. If not, the climate of Montana suits us very well."

Here is another one, written at the dictation of Gabriel Dumont, by two gentlemen, Messrs. Carter and Clayberg, of Helena, Montana. It is dated 13th July, 1885, and is addressed to Mr. Fitzpatrick:

"13th July, 1885.

"DEAR SIR,—Replying to your esteemed favor of the 6th instant, we beg leave to state that Dumont appears very warmly inclined toward the cause of Riel, and if his testimony could be introduced by deposition we are satisfied that it would be of material aid on any line of defence you may adopt.

"The general deductions to be drawn from the story of Dumont, in so far as Riel is concerned, are in substance thus:

"1st. In the summer of 1884, a public meeting of the half-breed settlers determined to send to Montana for Riel, whom they assumed to be familiar with the rights guaranteed to them by treaty with the Government. Dumont was, by the meeting, selected as one of two persons to proceed across the country to St. Ignatius Mission, Mont., for Riel.

"Riel returned with Dumont, and remained in the North-West Territory without any intention of making his home there, but as the selected advocate of the people's rights, under existing treaty stipulations.

"Riel always counselled peaceful measures, and finding these measures fruitless, he publicly proclaimed his intention of leaving the country for Montana about three weeks prior to the opening of the rebellion.

"He was prevented by the people from returning to his home.

"The war was commenced and conducted under the directions of a council of fourteen persons. Of this council Riel was not a member.

"Dumont had sole charge of the troops, and was accountable only to the council of fourteen.

"Riel did not participate in any engagement until the final charge, when he was driven from shelter with the body of the population.

"Dumais will support the statement of Dumont. Both these men are here and anxious to lend a helping hand to aid their friend.

"I presume that you are aware that Riel is a citizen of the United States, having declared his intentions in this country.

"If, in the outline of facts stated, you discover anything likely to prove available and useful to your client, please inform us of your pleasure and we will endeavor to conform thereto.

"We owe you an apology for not forwarding this statement sooner, and can only offer one excuse, i.e., Mr. Dumont speaks no English, but a species of French which is difficult to understand, so that we were compelled to have his statement taken by a person conversant with his dialect and translated. The person selected for this purpose has been extremely dilatory, and it has been only after considerable exertion on our part that we have succeeded in obtaining it."

Those were the letters that were read in court by Riel's counsel, and on which they applied to the court for permission to bring those parties to give evidence and a guarantee that they would not be molested. Nobody can deny the importance of the testimony that Dumont and Dumais were prepared to give. It contradicts most specially the statement that Riel caused the rebellion, for not only did he not raise it, but he was not even a member of the council which directed the warlike movements against the Dominion troops. That application was flatly refused, and an application to send a commission to the United States to get this testimony was also refused.

One other reason why some leniency should have been shown to the prisoner, was the state of his mind. I will not go at length into that question, which has been treated fully by other speakers, but it is known that Riel had been confined three times in a lunatic asylum, and it therefore cannot be pretended that his insanity during his trial was a put-up job. For a time he was at the Longue Pointe Asylum, but becoming very violent, he had to be removed to Beauport Asylum, because the ladies in charge of Longue Pointe found him uncontrollable. What did Riel's conduct show him to be during those troubles? If you read the testimony put before us you will see, that at the outset, before any act of violence was reported, he acted like a fool; for instance, when he spoke of dividing the Dominion into seven provinces, giving one to the Italians, another to the Jews, another to the Poles, and so on, it was evident he was speaking as a mad man. Although we have not the telegrams upon which the execution was ordered, we have the reports of the physicians who were sent to Regina, and these show that Riel was laboring under delusions, that he considered himself a kind of prophet who was to lead the half-breeds to a great mission. Although, according to the charge of the judge, the proof of his insanity was not sufficient to prevent a conviction, yet still it is quite evident the jurors could not believe that he should be treated as an ordinary criminal; they had sufficient proof to convince themselves his was a case for leniency, and they recommended him to the mercy of the court, and it has been stated on good authority that the recommendation of the jurors for mercy was founded on the consideration that although the jury had been instructed by the court to return a verdict of guilty, still it was a case for the exercise of the clemency of the Crown. During the trial, it is not surprising that the jurors came to such a conclusion. Not only was it proved he had been a lunatic, but the very physician who had him in charge for a longtime in Beauport Asylum, Dr. Roy, gave his opinion that he did not consider him as responsible for his actions, especially in connection with political and religious subjects. Against those testimonies, we have the testimony of Dr. Wallace who says he did not examine the prisoner long enough to give an opinion, and Dr. Jukes who, on his own admission, was as well prepared to speak on insanity as a horse is to explain the Bible. It would be useless to worry the House with a long array of precedents, but I can defy the Ministers or their friends to give a single case during the last half century where a prisoner has been executed, not only under circumstances so strong, but under circumstances at all approaching the circumstances in this case. There is not an honorable or sane man who will contradict me when I say that if Riel had been found guilty of killing his father or mother and all his family, he would never have been executed under those circumstances. There must have been some extraordinary circumstances, which we did not see in the report of the trial, which must have induced the Government to take the course they did.

There is another reason why, in my mind, leaving aside all these questions as to the way the trial was conducted, as to the difficulties Riel had to contend with, as to the state of mind he was proved to be in, even if he had been found of perfectly sound mind, it was a case in which he should not have been executed. He was certainly prosecuted and executed for a political offence. This cannot be disputed. If he was guilty, certainly Gabriel Dumont and Michel Dumais are more guilty than he. They are now in the United States, as everyone knows. Has any attempt been made to have them extradited? None has been made, and for a very good reason, because their extradition would be flatly refused by the American Government, because it is a political offence of which they are guilty. No one pretends that it is not a political offence, and if so I say the execution should not have taken place. For 50 years no political execution has taken place in civilised countries. In this country we saw the last political execution in the dark times of 1838, and we all believed we should never see one again.

Mr. TASSÉ. 1839.

Mr. LANGELIER. I am not going to quarrel for a year. The present Government can boast of having brought back those dark days of 1837-38. I am not very much surprised at the Prime Minister being so severe and so desirous to bring us back to that dark period of our history. He is the same man who, in 1849, was violently opposing the Bill granting an indemnity to the victims of 1837-38. His friends, to show their loyalty for their then young Queen, were pelting with rotten eggs that distinguished Governor General Lord Elgin, and were setting fire to the Parliament House in Montreal. Why? Because the two Houses had passed a Bill, which the Governor General had sanctioned, granting those indemnities to the victims of 1837-38. I am happy to say that amongst those who were foremost in promoting that Bill, was the father of the distinguished leader of the Opposition. But, if I am not very much surprised to see the Prime Minister among those who want to take us back to those dark days, I am amazed to see among those who follow him in that course, men like the Minister of Public Works and the Secretary of State, who both claim to be the political sons and heirs of Sir George Etienne Cartier, one of the victims of 1837-38. Where are to-day the countries where you can see an execution for political offences? In 1848, one of the first acts of the Constituent Assembly of France was to decide that hereafter nobody should be executed for political offences, and one of those who most strenuously supported that measure, which was carried unanimously, was Victor Hugo, and every one will admit that he was most consistent on that subject, for on every occasion, when he had the opportunity he interfered to save the lives of political offenders, especially in Russia and Austria. In England, no such law was passed as that passed in France in 1848, but the Government has always acted as if such a law was in existence. There might have been political executions. Smith O'Brien and his followers of the Young Ireland party were found guilty and condemned to be executed, but not only was their sentence commuted, but a few years afterwards they were set at liberty, and one of them has since been the Prime Minister of one of the principal Australian colonies—I refer to Sir Charles Gavin Duffy, who is so well known to every member of the House. Even in Austria, that empire which has so bad a record in connection with political liberty, which was considered for many years to be at the head of retrograde countries, we have seen lately a Prime Minister who, not further back than 1849, had been condemned to death, and a very witty remark was made by the present Emperor of Austria on that subject. He said he was very glad he had been advised not to allow the sentence to be carried out against Count Andrassy, in 1849, because he would have been deprived of the services of one of his best Foreign Ministers. In 1866, this country was invaded by a band of Fenians, who had absolutely nothing with which to reproach this country. We had never offended them; we owed them nothing; they invaded this country only to avenge upon us, because we were a British dependency, the wrongs they pretended Britain had inflicted upon their country. They were defeated; they caused the loss of valuable Canadian lives; they had their trial, and not one was executed, and I do not know if all are not at liberty now. As a matter of fact, I know of but two countries to-day, where the death penalty is still inflicted on political offenders—I am speaking of European countries, not Asiatic—and those are Russia and Turkey. Even in Turkey, they have relented of late years in carrying out death sentences. We have seen, in Turkey, men pardoned and men exiled. All civilised nations are against political executions. It would be useless to go at length into the example already cited of the United States. We have seen, in the United States, one of the most terrible civil wars which have ever been seen. Hundreds of thousands of lives and thousands of millions of money and property were lost, but not one single political execution was thought of. Some of the leaders were arrested; the President of the Southern Confederacy was put in gaol, but he was set at liberty not a long time afterwards, and it never occurred to the mind of any man in the United States to execute any one of those offenders. A very important circumstance has been related recently by a friend of the late General Grant. It was a secret made public recently which every one may have seen in one of the late numbers of the Century Magazine. Mr. Chauncey Depew, one of General Grant's greatest friends, stated that after the war was over, and after General Lee had capitulated with all his army, when General Grant came back to Washington, President Johnson was very violent and wanted General Lee and all the leaders of the Confederacy to be shot. General Grant said that he had given his word when he accepted their surrender as prisoners, and that he would never consent to such a thing taking place. Then what did President Johnson do? In speaking of him I am reminded that the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) quoted President Johnson a few moments ago as being in favor of political execution. I think he could not have quoted a worse example. President Johnson said to General Grant: But you forget that I am Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States. Grant replied: You are the Commander-in-Chief, but I was in command of the army which forced the surrender of General Lee, and as long as I am a general of the United States armies I will never permit these men to be hanged. President Johnson commenced to tremble. It appears that General Grant had actually threatened to resist, and he said he would see whether the army would obey President Johnson or himself, and the President abandoned the idea of punishing the leaders of the Southern Confederacy. That is an example that we have before our eyes in a country from which we are only separated by an imaginary line. All civilised nations are against the death punishment for political offences, and they are quite right. I am not prepared to say that the death penalty should be abolished for all sort of offences, but I say it should be abolished for all political offences. There is a difference between a political offence and other offences, like theft or murder. But, Mr. Speaker, what is a political offence? What is a rebel? The rebel of to-day may be the ruler of to-morrow, and we have seen that already in this country. I have mentioned one example—that of Count Andrassy, who has been Minister of Foreign Affairs in Austria, after having been condemned to death as a rebel in 1849. But not to go out of this country, last year, with great pomp and ceremony, we attended the inauguration of a statute to the late Sir George Etienne Cartier. Now if the death penalty had been carried out in this case, the country would have been deprived of his services. There was a time when he was exactly in the same position as Louis Riel. He was among the insurgents at St. Charles and St. Denis, in Lower Canada, in 1837. He escaped, like many others, but he came back to this country after having obtained a full pardon. But suppose he had been arrested and put to death, as some others were, as the unfortunate Delorimier was, we would have been deprived of his services, which were so much appreciated especially by the gentlemen on the other side of the House. Well, Sir, I have no doubt Mr. Cartier was as badly spoken of by the Ministerial papers at that time as Riel is by the Ministerial papers of to-day. I have no doubt that the rebels of 1838 were denounced as bitterly by the Government press of that time as are the rebels of 1885. Mr. Speaker, the doctrine I am now laying down is not a new one for me. Several years ago I had an opportunity to take exactly the same view, and it was in connection with the execution of the unfortunate Scott. At that time an attempt was made to defend Riel. I was then a supporter of the Mackenzie Government, and Mr. Mackenzie and his friends were attacked on every hustings in the Province of Quebec because Riel and Lepine had not obtained a full amnesty. One of the arguments adduced was to the effect that the killing of Scott was justifiable because he was rebel against the de facto government in Assiniboia. That was the defence set up by gentlemen who are now occupying a very high position in this House. Well, I defended the Government. I took the ground that Riel was not justified, because, taking it for granted that he had a de facto government, and that Scott was a rebel against that government, the offence charged against Scott was, at most, a political offence, for which he should not have been executed. I take the same ground to-day that I did then, and I say that Riel should not have been executed for the same reason that Scott should not have been executed. Admitting the fact, as contended by the Conservatives of Quebec at that time, that Scott was a rebel, I say he was only a political offender, and I say he should not have been executed, although he might have been imprisoned. I do not say that Riel in this case should have been allowed to go free. We must all admit that even if he was politically guilty, he was certainly a dangerous lunatic and should have been confined in some asylum, if not sent to the penitentiary. To this I would not have objected, because the law of this country must be supreme, but the law of the country would have been maintained as well if Riel had been sent to gaol, or to penitentiary, instead of the gallows. To-day we hear very harsh expressions used towards him, but in a very few years all these will have been forgotten, and some of those who defend his execution, may regret that he will not be living then. But there is a class of people in this country who should be more lenient towards him—I mean the gentlemen to whom he was so useful on a very difficult occasion in the history of their party. Everyone knows that in 1872, Sir George E. Cartier was very badly beaten in Montreal and could not get elected in Lower Canada, and it was that same Riel who procured him a constituency in Manitoba on that occasion. An attempt is made to-day to go back to the troubles of 1869-70, and to say that because Riel was a rebel then, he should be punished at this time. Well, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, there is a class of people who have no right to speak in that way of Riel, that is the gentlemen on the other side of the House to whom he was so useful at that time that they could only get one of their chiefs returned to this House through his instrumentality. Why is it, that notwithstanding all these circumstances, the death sentence was carried out on Louis Riel? Is it because the Ministers considered they were performing a duty and acting from lofty motives, drawn from the best interests of the country? No, Sir, we cannot find any motives of that kind, and that is easy to prove. When a man does what his conscience demands, when he performs a duty, he is not ashamed to say so publicly, he does not attempt to conceal what he is going to do. Now, Mr. Speaker, what have we seen? From the first day of November, if we are to believe their own statements, the Ministers had decided that the death sentence should be carried out. We see it in the testimony of no less a personage than the Prime Minister; because, in a letter addressed to the Minister of Militia, and sent to him for his justification, he says he was present before his departure for Winnipeg when the Government arrived at the decision to carry out the death sentence. If I am not mistaken, the Minister of Militia left for Winnipeg not many days after 1st November, I think the 3rd or 4th. Then the letter of the Prime Minister proves that so far back as 3rd or 4th November the Government had decided to carry out the death sentence on the prisoner. What course did they follow? If they had been acting in a conscientious, straightforward manner they would have stated their decision publicly, not only to their friends but to their adversaries, namely, that they had decided that the sentence should be carried out. Did they do anything of the kind? No. Even their best friends, their most faithful supporters, did not know what decision had been arrived at. Not only so, but the Ministers actually left them under the impression that Riel was not going to be executed. They made their organs speak in such a way as to make the public believe he was not going to be executed. What did Le Monde, the organ of the Minister of Public Works, say about that time? After the decision of the Privy Council was given Le Monde, which paper is considered, as I have said, the organ of the Minister of Public Works and whose chief editor is the member for Yamaska, speaking of the Riel matter, said the Liberals had spoiled the cause of Riel, but the Conservatives were now going to take it up. What did that mean except that the Conservative party had decided to save Riel's life? Even at the last moment, on the Saturday preceding the execution, which took place on Monday, when the death warrant was actually on the way to Regina by special messenger, the Minister of Public Works would not speak out and announce the decision at which the Government had arrived. He said his mouth was sealed. Even his most intimate friends could not learn what was to be done on the following Monday. Is that the way a public man, acting from lofty and conscientious motives in the public interest, acts. Does he conceal such important action on the part of the Government? The truth is they themselves felt that their conduct was shameful; they were justly ashamed of what they were going to do, and that is the reason why they did not let their friends know it. The Ministers did not act as public men who act from lofty motives of public interest, but they acted as criminals who try to hide themselves from the public gaze. The reason why the sentence was carried out was, not that the Government honestly believed they were bound to have it carried out in the best interests of the country, but because they thought it would advance their party interests. I do not hesitate to say that this is worse than a man who commits a murder in a burst of passion. Here are men who deliberate quietly and calmly whether they are going to take the life of that man and who are calculating the strength or otherwise it would bring them; whether it will give them more votes to kill Riel than to let him live. That was the only consideration which entered the minds of the Ministers. Their conduct shows it quite clearly. I repeat that I do not think it is possible to find in the history of any country, any parallel case of men sitting down at a table and calmly deliberating whether they will take the life of a human being or not according as it will subserve their interests one way better than the other. What was the consideration which most entered the minds of the Ministers; what interest had they? The interest was this. In 1870, after the first rebellion, they acted privately. They would not let the public know what they were doing. They seemed to be very serious about arresting Riel. Everyone remembers the remark made by the First Minister at a public meeting in Ontario, in Peterboro', I think, when he said, "Would to God I could catch him and hang him;" and yet at that very moment he had given money to take him away out of the country. All these facts might have remained unknown if there had not been a committee of the House of Commons appointed to which they were disclosed. That must have disappointed immensely the friends of the Government; and seeing their friends had no more confidence in them they thought in order to bring back the support of their Ontario friends it was necessary to do, as they say in French, an act éclat, and execute that unfortunate man.

To show the change of feelings and the course which has taken place with some of the hon. gentlemen on the other side, it will be of interest to the House to see the way they were speaking of Riel in 1874 and compare it with the manner in which they have been speaking of him recently. I shall quote from a speech delivered by the Minister of Militia when Lépine was under sentence of death by the Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba. An attempt had been made to call a meeting in Quebec East to condemn the conduct of the Mackenzie Government. The attempt had been unsuccessful. Subsequently a meeting was regularly called; a large number of citizens attended and a great many speeches were delivered. I was present myself, as was also the Minister of Militia. I shall content myself by reading the speech of the Minister of Militia in which he called Riel his brother. I take the report of the speech from Le Canadien. It was then, as is now, the organ of the Minister of Militia. Last year when I quoted from Le Canadien as a Ministerial paper, the hon. gentleman sneered; but I do not think I shall hear the same sneers on this occasion:

"This is the second time I have had the honor to address you in this hall. The first time the decorations of the hall and the joy which was reigning therein indicated a holiday. I was then joining you in welcoming brothers coming from France to a country settled by our common ancestors. It was on the occasion of the visit of L'Astrolabe. To-night I come again to speak to you of a brother, but there are no decorations, there is no joy in the hall. It is with sorrow that I come to speak to you of our brother of Manitoba, whom circumstances have put in such a painful position. I was pleased to hear the speakers, who have preceded me, say that politics would be excluded from this meeting. I am of opinion that we should all be united to save Lépine from the scaffold, and obtain an amnesty, and put an end to the disastrous troubles due to the troubles in Manitoba. It is time for us to join in a common occasion in order to save those in Manitoba from the consequences of acts which they committed under exceptional circumstances."

Well, lately the hon. Minister came down to Quebec and he pretended that this man had been a murderer. His opinion seems to have changed very much since 1874. At that time he was a brother who should be saved from the consequences of acts which he had committed under exceptional circumstances. I think the circumstances are the same now as they were in 1874. I do not see any reason why gentlemen on the opposite side have changed their minds. Then he went on in this way

"I shall always be happy to join the patriotic population of St. Rochs—whenever there is such a patriotic object in view as we have to-night—to save an unfortunate man from the scaffold and demand an amnesty which is calculated to put an end to the Manitoba troubles."

That speech of the Minister of Militia was entirely in accordance with what was found in his press at that time. For instance, Le Canadien of the 2nd November, 1874, had the following article. I should have said that resolutions were adopted on that occasion unanimously, for although these resolutions were directly against the Mackenzie Administration, the Liberals voted with the Conservatives asking that an amnesty should be granted. Here is a very short editorial which will give an idea of what the French Canadian Conservative press was then saying, and I could quote dozens of similar articles:

"French Canadians have heard with sorrow that the Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba has declared Riel unworthy of the protection of the law. That decision has not surprised us. We had not forgotten the threats of Mr. Mackenzie against the member for Provencher. We expected to see Mr. Brown's fanaticism find some means to reach the victim of the hatred of Ontario. We knew the cowardice of our Lower Canadian ministers, and when we saw their organs not daring to ask for an amnesty, we understood that the cause of the half-breeds was to be shamefully sacrificed to the greed for power of the Liberals."

On the 22nd October, the following appeared:—

"The abandonment of Riel by the chiefs of the Liberal party has been the cause of his expulsion from the House."

If I am not mistaken, it was not a Liberal who moved for his expulsion, but the Minister of Customs. The article went on as follows:—

"The position now presents more difficulties than these. New complications have arisen, and Lépine's trial is not the least of them. Lépine can no more be executed than Riel. The cause of one is that of the other.

"The Liberals are responsible for the persecutions which our friends of Manitoba have been and still are the victims.

"The right of Riel and his comrades was the same one year ago as today.

"When all the Conservative press is working energetically to secure the triumph of a cause, which is that of all French Canadians, those gentlemen (of the Liberal press) spend their time in abusing us."

I say it is the same now as it was in 1874, but the Minister of Militia does not think so, judging from his speech the other day. As I said a few minutes ago, I could give a great deal of that literature from Le Canadien, La Minerve, and other French Canadian organs at that time. I see only one parallel in history to the conduct of the French Canadian Ministers, and especially the Minister of Militia, and that parallel is the case of Christ and Judas Iscariot who delivered him to his enemies. Judas had this advantage, that he only delivered Christ to be condemned to death—he did not condemn him himself. It is useless, Sir, to try any further to prove that the Ministry deserve the censure of this House and the country. They have admitted their guilt. Qui s'excuse s'accuse, is a French saying. The Ministers have been doing nothing else since the execution but attempting to excuse themselves. The Minister of Public Works was saying the other day how glad he was at last that he could defend himself; that he had put up with the obloquy, the insult, and the abuse levelled at him because he did not think the hustings a fit place to defend himself; that the House was the only fit place. I think he forgot that by speaking in this manner he was giving a slap at his colleagues the Minister of Militia, the Secretary of State, the Minister of Justice, and the Minister of Inland Revenue. We have seen one of the Ministers, the present Post master-General, publishing a pamphlet—actually resorting to that most extraordinary if not unconstitutional course of publishing a pamphlet in the name of the Government to defend the Government. We have never seen the like of it. Not only was it printed and published but was actually circulated, enclosed in the Ministerial papers of the Province of Quebec, those papers being paid to distribute the pamphlet in question to their readers. This shows how anxious the Ministers were to defend themselves, not before this House, which according to the Minister of Public Works is the only constitutional way, but before the country a few weeks before the meeting of Parliament. What did the Secretary of State go to St. Jérôme for, accompanied by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Inland Revenue, if it was not to defend the conduct of the Government? He did not wait until this House had met to repel the attacks which had been made against him. What did the Minister of Militia do? I must admit that he did not go into the heart of his county, but he went to the outskirts. He went to Stoneham, amongst a few settlers in the Laurentian Mountains, where nobody who reads the newspapers could reach him. Then he came nearer; he came to speak at Sillery, near Quebec; and not only did he think it proper to defend the Government, but he gave a half-holiday to all the laborers working for the Government on the Citadel, to the number of 200 or 300, to enable them to go and hear his defence of the Government. This shows that he did not consider it unconstitutional to defend the Government before the House met. No, Sir, the Ministers could not resist the pangs of a guilty conscience, and they hoped, that by making a public confession they would get absolution from their electors. We have seen something more remarkable still—something which has never been seen before, and which is not likely ever to be seen again. There is in Montreal a very respectable clergyman of the Catholic Church, who is not supposed to be very friendly to the Orange order, and who did not show much friendship towards it at the time of the celebrated procession. But we have seen the representative of the Orange order in the Cabinet, the Minister of Customs, actually going to pay a visit to Father Dowd. What was the reason of that extraordinary sight? The explanation is a very easy one. It appears that Father Dowd had been reported in some of the Montreal papers as having condemned the Riel agitation from the pulpit, and I suppose the Minister of Customs thought that respectable priest was the very best man to give a complete absolution to the Government for all their sins.

No, Mr. Speaker, the Ministers are guilty, and they feel it. But in order to save themselves from condemnation, they are trying to raise false issues in their newspapers, especially in the Toronto Mail. They are trying to raise a war of races by making the electors of Ontario believe that the French people of the Province of Quebec want to declare war against other nationalities. They know perfectly well that there is not a word of truth in that. If there is any population in Canada that has no fanaticism, that desires to live in peace with all nationalities and creeds, it is the French population of the Province of Quebec. We have seen in that Province what we have not seen elsewhere—counties composed almost entirely of French people electing English-speaking members to represent them in the Dominion Parliament or in the Legislature of Quebec. But now we are threatened with a war of conquest, and we are warned that this time there will be no treaty. As the treaty of 1763 guaranteed our civil rights and our religious liberty, the Mail's threat means, if it means anything, that we shall not be permitted to practice our religion, and that the properties of the Catholic Church, and even our private properties, will be confiscated. This must be very encouraging to the land grabbers of the Tory party. If their party is left in power a few years more, all the lands and mines of the North-West will have been gobbled up by them. Then they will be in a position to turn their attention, as a last resort, to the lands of the clergy of the Province of Quebec. But I can tell the friends of the Mail that they should not rely too much on those spoils. As we say in French, "Il ne faut pas vendre la peau de l'ours avant de l'avoir tué." Our ancestors, when only 60,000 in number, including men, women and children, stood their ground for five years against 50,000 of the best troops, not only of England, but of the world. Now that we are a million and a half we could offer a pretty stiff resistance to the Tory land grabbers who threaten us. Our fathers met the admirable Scotch highlanders of Wolfe; their sons will be prepared to resist the assaults of the brawling brood of bribers of the Mail newspaper.

Mr. RYKERT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12:30 a.m., Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 16th March, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 48) to amend the Act to incorporate the Niagara Frontier Bridge Company.—(Mr. Rykert.)

Bill (No. 49) to incorporate the Ontario, Minnesota and Manitoba Railway Company.—(Mr. Royal.)

Bill (No. 50) respecting the Picton Bank.—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 51) to incorporate the Nova Scotia Steamship Company, Limited.—(Mr. Kinney.)

Bill (No. 52) to reduce the capital stock of the Union Bank of Halifax.—(Mr. Stairs.)

Bill (No. 53) to incorporate the Calvin Company, Limited.—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Medicine Hat Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Small.)

MARITIME COURT OF ONTARIO.

Mr. ALLEN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 5) to extend the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of Ontario. He said: This is practically the same Bill that was passed by this House last Session, by which the Maritime Court was given power over permanent equipment and repairs to ships, but was amended by the Senate: that the equipment shall be furnished and the repairs made "with the consent of the managing owner." This is the only amendment made. But time was not given for concurrence at the close of the Session. As we had a discussion on this Bill last year, and as we all understand it pretty well, and no amendments were made except what I have stated, I move the second reading of the Bill.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I move in amendment that Order (No. 22) resuming adjourned Debate on the motion of Mr. Landry, be now called.

Mr. BLAKE. How will that affect the position of the present Order?

Mr. SPEAKER. The Order will drop altogether and it can be placed on the paper again.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not desire to prevent the hon. gentleman having this Bill on the paper; and if the leader of the Opposition has no objection, we will call Order No. 22, and will allow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Allen) to withdraw his motion, and his Bill will then remain on the paper.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course we know, after the vote of yesterday, what the result will be if my hon. friend does not agree to allow the motion to be withdrawn; and as the hon. Minister of Public Works persists in this course of debate, I would personally recommend my hon. friend to withdraw his motion.

Amendment agreed to, and motion withdrawn.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Landry (Montmagny): "That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution," and the motion of Sir Hector Langevin: "That this question be now put."

Mr. RYKERT. The motion which is in your hands, is, as has been stated by other hon. members, a direct censure upon the Government for their action with reference to the execution of Louis Riel. The hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution has very properly placed his case before the House, and he has done so in a very temperate manner, in a manner to which no person can take any exception. The Government have met that motion by moving the previous question, in order that the question might be fairly and squarely met on the floor of this Parliament. I apprehend, Sir, that the motion made by the Government is entirely in accord with the views expressed by the gentlemen from the Province of Quebec at the several meetings held in that Province in the course of the agitation which has taken place upon this question. We have now a direct censure of the Government because they permitted the execution to take its course, and I am satisfied that the action of the Government was in accord, up to a few days ago, with the opinions expressed by the Grit party in the Province of Ontario, if you take the organs of that party as expressing its opinion. They all said that the Government dare not have a direct vote upon this question. But when a direct vote is now placed before the House, these hon. gentlemen say that they are being taken advantage of, that it is a piece of tyranny on the part of this Government not to desire to have the question fairly and properly discussed. They have suddenly discovered, Sir, that it is necessary for the due consideration of this question that a large number of papers which have no relevancy whatever to the matter should be brought down. They have already expressed their opinion, outside of this Parliament, that the execution was a judicial murder; they have declared that the Government is wrong in so acting. They have made up their minds long before they came here, and now they seek to cover themselves by pretending, that it is necessary to the proper consideration of the question that all these papers should be brought down. They can find no real objection to meeting the question fairly and squarely. I know it is inconvenient to that party to be brought face to face with their own declarations outside this Parliament. I know it is inconvenient to the leader of the Opposition to be brought face to face with the expressions of the organs of his own party. He knows right well that the Grit organs through the whole of Canada clamored for the execution of Riel, and when he finds that he is brought face to face with their opinions he finds it convenient to seek cover, if possible, by moving amendments which would give the question the go-by and not have it put directly before the House and the country. The question is now being put before us fairly and squarely, every vote must be recorded on that question in the manner it should be recorded, and if there are other motions of a different character to be brought up at a future time, they can be brought forward, and this whole question of the policy of the North-West can be fairly discussed. But meantime, let us see whether or not the execution was what is called a judicial murder. I say the moving of the previous question is the fairest way to meet this motion. It puts it where those gentlemen wanted the question put. Now, from whom does this howl come? From whom does this opposition come? Do the hon. gentlemen from the Province of Quebec make any complaint about the previous question being moved?

Mr. AMYOT. Yes.

Mr. RYKERT. Has a single person done so? Why, they have discussed the question now in all its details, and the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), who now says yes, made no such complaint. The complaint came from the hon. member for Huron, and not from the gentlemen from Lower Canada—it came from that hon. gentleman who desired to rake up old issues, and who showed by the speech he made how able he was for that task. The discussion of this question has opened up a wide field, as exhibited by the several speeches which have been made by these hon. gentlemen and they certainly cannot claim that the moving of the previous question has limited them in the discussion. If we take the speech of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), in the first place, and the speech of the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier) last night, it is evident that no limit whatever has been imposed in the discussion of this question. The circumstances surrounding the execution of Riel must, in my judgment, have been of an extraordinary character in order to induce Parliament to pass judgment upon the propriety of that act. Sir, the doctrine laid down by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) in his London speech, is a doctrine which will meet with the approval of every right thinking man in this country. I do not say that it will meet the approval of gentlemen like the hon. member for West Huron, but it certainly will be approved by every right thinking man in this Parliament. The hon. member for West Durham said:

"But I declare that the occasion must be special which renders discussion opportune, and the case clear which renders censure expedient."

But we have another person who is an eminent authority upon constitutional law, a gentleman who professes to take a high place in that kind of literature. That gentleman has declared over and over again his views on constitutional questions; and through the mouth of his organ a few days ago, in discussing this question, he seemed remarkably surprised that the French population of Lower Canada should be so agitated with regard to the execution of Riel. I refer to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who is said to be a proprietor and editor of the London Advertiser. Here is what that paper said on the 3rd September last:

"The position of the Province of Quebec on the subject of the trial and conviction of Louis Riel is a puzzle to the great majority of the people of this Province. They cannot understand how it is that the whole people of a Province like the Province of Quebec should come to the rescue of Riel, and should put forward such extreme efforts to save him from the fate to which he has been condemned. Neither the constitution of the court nor those superintending can explain the matter. There was no complaint as to the constitution of any court when Riel was charged with the murder of Thomas Scott, and yet the people of the Province of Quebec were quite as much interested in reference to Riel then as they are now. It was not for one moment then supposed that Riel was insane, and yet his pardon was quite as fiercely demanded then as it is at this moment."

Those, Sir, are the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Bothwell. Sir, as I have said, this debate has taken a wide range indeed. On the one hand, we have our friends from Lower Canada, who for the present differ from the Government on this question, and find them taking quite a different view from the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), whose views we must treat as the views of the Grit party in this House and throughout the country. The members from Quebec have declared that the insurrection was provoked by the mal-administration of the affairs of the North-West. They say that Riel was irresponsible for his acts, and, as such, should not have been condemned. They complain that, as the jury recommended him to mercy, this recommendation should have received the favorable consideration of the Crown. Moreover, they say that under any circumstances, at the request of themselves, without any evidence being produced to back up that request, the Government should have issued a commission to enquire into the question of Riel's sanity or insanity. That seems to be the position taken by our friends from Lower Canada. But how different is the position of our friends from the Province of Ontario. Why, Sir, the corporal of the Grit party of this House seems to have taken a different view of the whole matter. He seems to aim at gaining a reputation for extravagance of conduct and language in this Parliament. He has gained it outside of this Parliament, and I think I can safely say he has gained it in this Parliament. Why, Sir, he gives as a reason why Riel should have been pardoned that he was pardoned once before, and he charges the Minister of Public Works with having promised him an amnesty. I will show to the House and the country before I am done how thoroughly the hon. gentleman has misstated the facts, and what improper conclusions he has drawn from the facts as stated. He said that the trial was not a fair one, that the prerogative of mercy should have been extended to the prisoner, that the court was improperly constituted and unfair; but he forgot to tell the House that the court before whom Riel was tried was constituted by his friends, the late Mackenzie Government. He said the Government had yielded to an influence outside of Parliament, which he afterwards characterised as Orange influence. He further said that they were going to build up a party on the scaffold of Regina. There we find him entirely at variance with the views of his leader, who, in his speech in the city of London a short time ago, expressed a different view. His leader's first ground was that the Government were not censurable, inasmuch as they had tried Riel under the existing law. He knew that he had a hand in the making of that law, and he knew that the country was deceived with regard to that law. It was declared in every school section of Ontario that the man was tried by an arbitrary law, tyrannical in its character; but, at the same time, those who made that assertion forgot to tell the country that that law was passed by their own friends. In his speech at London the hon. leader of the Opposition made this observation:

"But I do not see that the Government is censurable for having tried the prisoner before the tribunal provided by the standing laws, though I may regret that those laws did not provide a more satisfactory tribunal, and it is always to be remembered that the special provisions requiring the decision of the Executive before execution, and the attendant responsibility of Government, have been retained."

The hon. gentleman further said he would not build up a party on the scaffold of Regina, and he was not going to discuss the question, which ought to be decided in Parliament. He admitted, as was well pointed out by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), that the accused had been fairly tried. On these important points he differed from his corporal who undertook to speak the views of the Opposition in this House. It seems impossible to reconcile the views of these two hon. gentlemen. No wonder the leader of the Opposition keeps silent; he must either bolt down what the hon. member for West Huron stated or he must disavow what he stated; he must take either one horn of the dilemma or the other. What is the real cause of the hon. gentleman's silence? We have, on other occasions in this Parliament, discussed legal and constitutional questions of such great importance that the members of this House felt that the great knowledge of the hon. gentleman and his position as the leading lawyer of Ontario, perhaps of the Dominion, demanded that he should give the House his views upon them; but the hon. gentleman invariably remained silent and had not a single word to say. Where was he when the Boundary question was being discussed, when his followers were all at sea, when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) got confused on the question? He remained dumb. Where was he when the great question of the licenses was being discussed? He was dumb. And where was he when the Streams Bill question was being discussed? He had not a single word to say. On all these great questions he remained silent, and it cannot be wondered at that he has nothing to say now. His corporal has put his foot in it; to use a common expression, he has gone the whole hog; but the hon. gentleman cannot swallow that speech after his London address, and he cannot ask his followers to support the resolution on the same grounds as the hon. member for West Huron. Now, I think the House has a right to know what the views of the leader of the Opposition are on this important question on which the country is so thoroughly agitated, as upon his views will probably largely depend the vote of this House. The hon. member for West Huron distinctly disclaimed speaking on behalf of the party; he said he spoke for himself; but at the same time his observations were so general that we have a right to believe that he spoke on behalf of the whole Reform party in this House. Therefore we ought to have some expression from the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), as to whether he repudiates that hon. gentleman's expressions or not. I am not going to attempt to reconcile the differences between them; but it seems to me that the hon. member for West Huron was put up to test the feeling of the House. We have heard of a bargain that was made in the city of Montreal between a certain portion of the population there and a gentleman from Ontario. That bargain we heard was consummated, and I suppose the hon. member for West Huron was put up in order to feel the pulse of the House and to see whether they would ratify the bargain or not. We have not heard that the hon. member for West Durham has ratified that bargain. On the contrary, judging by his London speech, he repudiated it. Therefore we would like to hear from the hon. gentleman as to his opinion in relation to the Orangemen and other questions raised by the hon. member for West Huron. It is a remarkable circumstance that on a question of such importance a member like that hon. gentleman should be put up to represent the views of the Opposition. Was there ever heard a speech delivered of the character of the speech of that hon. gentleman. It was reckless in assertion from beginning to end; it was coarse, vulgar and arrogant; it lacked all the essential features that ought to characterise a speech; it lacked that greatest essential of all, truthfulness.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I hope the hon. gentleman will withdraw that.

Mr. RYKERT. I apologise to the House. I would like to use strong language, but I dare say it is a little unparliamentary; at the same time, I think it is hardly less parliamentary than some of the remarks that were made by that hon. gentleman. However, I will not trespass on the rules of Parliament if you think I am doing so. I was not aware, when I made that remark, that I was doing so. At the same time the House will understand what I really meant by my observation. I cannot understand how a man having the reputation of a lawyer could be found making such statements and quoting such law as the hon. gentleman did in this House. He misquoted, he deceived the House—if that expression be parliamentary—but I will not say so; at any rate he made use of many observations which, in my judgment, should be characterised as very improper. I will also direct the attention of the House to the fact that on other occasions the same hon. gentleman has been found misquoting and making misstatements in this House. I think that when an hon. gentleman has been once convicted of this, he ought to be more careful about misquoting on other occasions, yet I can refer to several occasions in which he misquoted the law, I will not say wilfully, but for reasons best known to himself. He boasts of his knowledge of criminal law; the records of Parliament show that in one branch, that of bribery and corruption, he is well versed; and in another branch, that of fraud and misrepresentation, judging from his speech the other night, I am warranted in saying he has fair knowledge. I think that a more inflammatory, a more violent, a more outrageous speech never was delivered on the floor of Parliament. It stands in marked contrast with the speech made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Girault) and that made by the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol). These gentlemen discussed the question from their peculiar standpoint with a calmness and moderation which did them credit, but I cannot say so much for the speech of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). Underlying the whole of his declamatory oration was a spirit of revenge. It was not that he was not satisfied with the law as it is; it was not that he had anything to say about the grievances in the North-West, because we know well what his views of these were on another occasion; but underlying the whole of his speech was a spirit of animosity to some members of the Cabinet. I am not going to refer at length to the speech of the hon. gentleman who spoke last night. Suffice it to say, that it must be satisfactory to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) to know that he has one recruit to the corporal's guard which is going to shoulder the musket on the banks of the Saskatchewan. He must be delighted to find that another hon. gentleman is going to join that awkward squad which the hon. gentleman for Quebec East depicted, when he said he was ready, if a similar occasion to the last should again arise, to shoulder his musket in favor of the half-breeds and in defence of their homes in the North-West. I propose dealing with some questions brought forward by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the first I shall discuss is the question of amnesty as treated in the remarks of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). That hon. gentleman either misstated the question wilfully or was ignorant of the facts. In his declamation, he made use of the following observations:—

"Does the hon. Minister not know that he, in his sworn testimony in 1874, before the commission in this House, declared that the Government of which he was a member had promised an amnesty to Riel? Does he not know that his own political chief, by whom he has stood for many long years, pledged the faith of the Crown that this red-handed murderer would escape the punishment of his crimes, because the Conservative Government of Canada saw fit to agree to extend to him the Royal clemency?"

Here we have an express declaration on the part of the hon. gentleman, which, I say, is entirely at variance with the facts. The hon. gentleman cannot plead ignorance—because he was in Parliament at the time—of the fact that no amnesty was promised, but that Archbishop Taché took upon himself the whole responsibility of the promise of amnesty. But if the hon. gentleman does not know that, I will read him a letter from Archbishop Taché to prove it. Further, he must know that in the documents which passed between Lord Carnarvon and the Government that question was fully discussed. In 1875, I find at page 29, an observation made by Mr. Mackenzie, who, at that time, was moving for amnesty in favor of Riel:

"It was true that Lord Carnarvon and His Excellency in his despatches both asserted that there was no proof in these documents of 'promise of amnesty' having been made an absolute promise either by Her Majesty's Imperial representative or those acting for him here."

Here, therefore, you have, Sir, an answer at once to the declaration made by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron).

Mr. RYKERT.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will read my motion.

Mr. RYKERT. I am not going to read the hon. gentleman's motion, but will tell the House what it was, and his motion ought to be in accord with his speech. That motion expressly ignored the question of the amnesty being promised. If the hon. gentleman likes that kind of literature he may read it, but I have given the facts. I will read, first, the letter of Archbishop Taché, dated 9th June, 1870, in which he says:

"I hasten to communicate to you, for the information of His Excellency in Council, a very important promise I have just made in the name of the Canadian Government. I feel all the responsibility I have incurred in taking such a step, while, on the other hand, I am confident that His Excellency the Governor General and his Privy Council will not judge with too much severity an act accomplished in order to avoid great misfortunes and secure the welfare of the country."

You will see by this that Archbishop Taché takes on himself the responsibility of making that promise to Riel on behalf of the Imperial and Dominion Governments. We have another witness to this fact, the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). He reviewed the whole question on that occasion, and I will quote from his speech some of his remarks. He said (see page 89 of Hansard):

"The hon. gentleman (Sir John) declared that Archbishop Taché had himself stated in his letter of June 9th, 1870, that he had taken the responsibility upon himself with reference to the promise then made. That was perfectly true. He held with the hon. gentleman that the statement made in that letter practically, though not expressly, amounted to an admission that the Archbishop did not conceive he was authorised by the Canadian Government in its name to promise an indemnity."

Let us examine a little further, and see whether what I have said or what the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has said, is correct. Mr. Blake goes on to say:

"The Archbishop fully explained that. He stated that he did conceive himself authorised to promise an amnesty in the name of the Imperial Government, that he went up to the country with that belief, that he did promise an amnesty in the name of the Imperial Government upon his arrival, that the people were afterwards disquieted and disturbed, that the country was in a dangerous condition, that he found they were not relying as much as he desired in the pledge that he gave them in the name of the Imperial Government, and that to accomplish the object he had in view he had to take upon himself the responsibility of making the promise in the name of the Canadian Government as well; and that promise made by the Archbishop acting in the bona fide belief that he was authorised to make it as the promise of the Imperial Government, and the promise he subsequently made in the name of the Canadian Government on his own responsibility, were not disavowed by the Canadian Government. It was quite true that, with reference to the second promise, two letters were written to His Grace—an official letter from the Secretary of State pointing out to him that he must take all the responsibility of the promise, and a private letter from Sir Geo. Cartier pointing out the reason for the despatch, that his colleagues were in great dread of public opinion, and therefore it was necessary to write a disavowing despatch. * * With the exception of what the First Minister had done in sending Archbishop Taché to that country, he had no personal, individual responsibility, and he believed it had been established that, anterior to the commencement of the hon. gentleman's illness, there was no agreement that there should be an amnesty, if there was one subsequently."

So you will see that what I said is confirmed by my witness, the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). He goes on further, and says:

"On the 3rd of January the Archbishop wrote about 'hope of more consolation,' and explains in his evidence that the expression referred to the granting of an amnesty. He adds: 'There had, up to the time of the writing of this letter, been no promise of an amnesty by the present Government, or any member of it, though I had been led to expect it, as I have mentioned.'"

So you will see that the Archbishop expressly repudiates the statement that an amnesty was promised. I will call into the House another witness, the Globe newspaper, which distinctly repudiates the promise of an amnesty, so that in that part of his speech the hon. member for West Huron has made a misstatement, to use the mildest term—I only wish I could use a stronger one. Now, in regard to the question, Why did Riel come to the Dominion of Canada? It has been said over and over again that he came here with patriotic motives, that he came to assist his friends and neighbors in the North-West to redress their grievances in a constitutional manner. The whole thing is explained in a letter which he publishes, and which was read in the House last year by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). I think the letter was also repeated by the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). He says:

"Gentlemen,—You have travelled more than 700 miles from the Saskatchewan country, across the international line, to make me a visit. The communities in the midst of which you live have sent you as their delegates to ask my advice on various difficulties which have rendered the British North-West unhappy under the administration of the Ottawa Government. Moreover, you invite me to go and stay amongst you, your hope being that I, for one, could help to better in some respect your condition. Cordial and pressing is your invitation; you want me and my family to accompany you; I am at liberty to excuse myself and should say no: yet, you are waiting for me: so that I have only to get ready, and your letters of delegation assure me that a friendly welcome awaits me in the midst of those who sent you.

"Gents, your personal visit does me honor and causes me great pleasure: but on account of its representative character, your coming to me has the appearance of a remarkable circumstance, which I record as one of the gratifications of my life—an event which my family will remember, and I pray to God that my assistance will prove so successful to you as to render this event a blessing amongst the many blessings of this, my 40th year. To be frank is the shortest. I doubt whether my advice given to you on this soil concerning affairs in Canadian territories, could cross the border and retain an influence. But here is another view of the matter: I am entitled, according to the 31st and 32nd clauses of the Manitoba treaty, to land, of which the Canadian Government have directly or indirectly deprived me, and my claim to which is valid notwithstanding the fact that I have become an American citizen."

So you see that from the very outset he came here with a mercenary motive, with a desire for gain. He did not come for the interest of his friends in the country, but with a personal desire to make money.—

"Considering, then, that my interests are identical with yours, I accept your very kind invitation, and will go and spend some months among you, in the hope that by petitioning the Government we will obtain the redress of our grievances."

His interests were not identical with those of the North-West half-breeds, he had no claim for a location, no claim that he should have any land allocated to him, no claim for scrip or any other claim against the Government, except an imaginary claim for money or for land, of which we will hear hereafter. This shows that this patriot came to this country with an interested motive, he came for a selfish motive and a desire of gain. What further proof of this do we want than we find in the record of the court? In the examination of Father Andre, we find the following:—

"Q. I believe in the month of December 1884, you had an interview with Riel and Nolin with regard to a certain sum of money which the prisoner claimed from the Federal Government?—A. Not with Nolin; Nolin was not present at the interview.

"Q. The prisoner was there?—A. Yes.

"Q. Will you please state what the prisoner asked of the Federal Government?—A. I had two interviews with the prisoner on that subject.

"Q. The prisoner claimed a certain indemnity from the Federal Government, didn't he?—A. When the prisoner made his claim, I was there with another gentleman and he asked from the Government $100,000. We thought that was exorbitant, and the prisoner said, "Wait a little, I will take at once $35,000 cash."

"Q. And on that condition the prisoner was to leave the country if the Government gave him $35,000?—A. Yes, that was the condition he put.

"Q. When was this?—A. This was on the 23rd December, 1884.

"Q. There was also another interview between you and the prisoner?—A. There have been about twenty interviews between us.

"Q. He was always after you to ask you to use your influence with the Federal Government to obtain an indemnity?—A. The first time he spoke of it was on the 12th December, he had never spoken a word of it before, and on the 23rd December he spoke about it again.

"Q. He talked about it very frequently?—A. On these two occasions only.

"Q. That was his great occupation?—A. Yes, at those times.

"Q. Is it not true that the prisoner told you that he himself was the half-breed question?—A. He did not say so in express terms, but he conveyed that idea; he said, if I am satisfied the half-breeds will be. I must explain this. This objection was made to him that even if the Government granted him $35,000, the half-breed question would remain the same, and he said in answer to that, if I am satisfied the half-breeds will be."

You will see, as has been stated over and over again in this House, that the only object this man had in coming to the Dominion of Canada was of a mercenary character; and this is the great patriot to whom our friends from Lower Canada are trying to do so much honor. Now, I proceed briefly to discuss whether or not the grievances which are alleged justify the rebellion, and, in order to do so, I propose to quote from hon. gentlemen opposite and their organs on that question. I do not wish to add anything myself or to go into that question which was discussed last year. I have refreshed my recollection from the six hours and a half speech of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), in which he so eloquently showed to this House that these people had no right to complain. Before the trial, the Globe newspaper gave this opinion on this question. This was on July 6th, 1885:

"If what he (Riel) says could only be proved to be true, as some is admitted by the Government press to be true, it would not be a sufficient defence as nothing can justify rebellion that does not become revolution, and there is said to be abundant evidence to prove that he did all in his power to induce the Indians to join in the rebellion."

So that witness expressly declares that they had no grounds in their grievances to justify a revolt. On July 9th, he says:

"No one says that the wrongs done the Metis justified rebellion. They do not even take that ground themselves, as their defence now seems to be, that they did not rebel, but only defended themselves when attacked."

Then we have a declaration made by a certain gentleman in this House some years ago as to grievances justifying a rebellion. When this matter was discussed in Parliament in 1875, Mr. Mackenzie said:

"He did not allege that as a justification for succeeding events, because he considered that no mere act or fault of the Government of the day could have justified the insurrection and its consequences."

So he laid down the broad proposition that no mere act or fault of the Government could justify rebellion. But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) justifies rebellion. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) justifies rebellion. He says it is all right. The hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier) justifies rebellion. He says he would have taken up arms to wage war against Her Majesty's Government. But we have another witness, another member for Huron. Sir Richard Cartwright, in a speech made in Orillia, December 17, 1885, says:

"But to say that rebellion is justified is a very different thing. A rebellion may be excused, and parties who goad unfortunate, ignorant men into rebellion may be punished. But that is a wholly different thing from justifying rebellion, and least of all can I undertake to justify rebellion in an Indian country, where, as I have said, an enormous number of our countrymen and countrywomen would have been exposed to all the horrors of savage war if that rebellion had spread."

So you will see that one member for Huron is answered by the other member for Huron. Now, Sir, it is well known that the ground taken by the Globe was that their grievances should be redressed by constitutional means. In an article published by that paper in 1885, under the heading "Redressing Grievances by Constitutional Means," we find the following language:—

"A number of Metis formed a union and continued for months to act in concert with Riel, whose agitation they regarded as quite loyal and constitutional. After a time Riel began to urge that the Indian title to the North-West had never been extinguished. That it was not with the Hudson Bay Company but with the Indians, the half-breeds, and pioneer white settlers to whom the country really belonged, that the Government had to deal. It is believed also that he was bent in claiming from the Government indemnity for personal losses which he had sustained by the confiscation of property ones belonging to him in Winnipeg, and which has increased enormously in value since the time of his banishment. It is almost certain he began to put forth claims such as the white settlers could have no sympathy with and the Government could not for a moment entertain; and, unknown to the English-speaking people, a recent combination was formed to enforce these demands by illegal and violent means. Some say Riel began to use stronger language, in hopes that he might be arrested on insufficient grounds, and then excite public sympathy in behalf of himself and the movement of which he was the leader."

Now, Sir, we have another witness, a very important witness in this debate, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) who said :

"I say that I do not approve of this rebellion, because I think that the serious grievances of which the half-breeds had to complain, were not such as to justify a rebellion."

It is not contended that there were grievances, yet we find the hon. member for Megantic openly declaring that the rebellion was justified. The hon. member for West Huron himself has repudiated that idea. We find on page 110 of the Hansard, that he said :

"I do not want to justify the rebellion; I want to show the state of things in the country and to show the prisoner was justified in coming into the country, and to show the circumstances under which he came."

We find further that the Globe on July 25th, 1855—and I make these quotations from the Globe and the organs of the party, because I know that those gentlemen have great respect for their own organ, particularly when they are brought face to face with them on the floor of Parliament. On that date the Globe said :

"It is now alleged on behalf of Riel that he never advised the half-breeds to resort to violence, that when he found the constitutional modes of seeking redress unavailing he wished to leave the country and was prevented, and that to the last he did all in his power to dissuade the half-breeds from taking up arms. This is not believed, and indeed it seems absolutely inconsistent with much that has been stated on authority apparently good."

Yet the Globe did not recognise that fact. And what were the grievances complained of? Why, Sir, no person can tell. Have any new grievances been stated in this House? Has any hon. gentleman in the debate pointed to a single grievance? Not one. We find that Father André, at the trial, declared that their grievances were changing from time to time. One day they claimed one thing, and another day they claimed another thing. But, no matter what these grievances were, they could not justify rebellion. At page 111 of the trial Father André testified as follows:—

"Q. Will you state if, since the arrival of the prisoner in the country up to the time of the rebellion, the Government have made any favorable answer to the demands and claims of the half-breeds?—A. Yes, I know they have acceded to certain demands in regard to those who did not have any scrip in Manitoba. A telegram was sent on the 4th of March last granting the scrip."

"Q. Before that time?—A. Yes. Regarding the alteration of survey of lots along the river, there was an answer from the Government saying they would grant it, and that was an important question."

"Q. What question then remained to be settled?—A. The question of patents. That has also been settled in a certain way, because Mr. Duck was sent and I went with him as interpreter."

"Q. What other question remained?—A. Only the question of wood, timber."

Now, Sir, what further had they to complain of? He goes on to say :

"Q. What were the claims of the half-breeds?—A. Since when, you must distinguish ?

"Q. From 1884 till the time of the rebellion?—A. Since the arrival of the prisoner in the country ?

"Q. Yes?—A. It would be difficult to tell that, they changed from time to time since the arrival of the prisoner."

"Q. Before his arrival?—A. They demanded patents for their land, demanded frontage on the river and the abolition of the taxes on wood, and the rights for those who did not have scrip in Manitoba."

So you will see that they had really no substantial grievances as was stated by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) last Session, there were no such grievances as would justify rebellion. At any rate, they were not of a permanent character, but shifted from one thing to another. One day they had one set of grievances, and another day another set, so that any person will see that it was utterly impossible to find out what their grievances really were. Well, we have another authority. The hon. member for Mr. RYKERT.

West Huron answers himself again. The other night he waxed very eloquent upon the question of their grievances. He called the attention of the House to the fact that they had grievances that should be redressed, and that these grievances justified the rebellion. Well, we find that last year the hon. gentleman made a speech in Parliament in which he answered himself now. At page 3245 of the Hansard last year, he used the following language:—

"He admitted that the half-breeds had grievances, but he said they had no such grievances as would justify rebellion. Who said they had? Who made that statement? Did any hon. gentleman on this side ?

"Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes."

"Mr. CAMERON. No, no man on this side made any such statement as that the half-breeds had grievances that would justify rebellion."

Yet the hon. member for Quebec East, the hon. member for Megantic and the hon. member for West Huron himself, stated a few nights ago that they had grievances that would justify rebellion. So you will see, Mr. Speaker, that I have produced evidence, perhaps not of a very reliable character, yet, notwithstanding, evidence which emanated from that party, that half-breeds never had grievances that would justify rebellion. A good deal has been said about the duty of the Government to have been prepared for the rebellion. It is said that they should have watched Riel as soon as he came into the country; that he came there months and months before the rebellion, and that they ought to have watched him. We have the answer to that in the Globe under the heading, "Mounted Police," January 19th, 1885, where we find this language :

"The Government seem to think that the principal use of the Mounted Police is to overawe poor settlers so as to prevent them from protesting against outrages perpetrated upon them by the Government and its agents. A large body is now at Prince Albert watching Riel, who apparently does not contemplate any mischief."

Shortly after this the organ got new light. On March 20th, 1885, it said :

"Louis Riel, the hero of the Red River rebellion recently exiled from Manitoba, has created dissensions among the half-breeds, and an outbreak is imminent."

The Globe thought there was very little danger. On March 23rd, it said :

"Hopes of preserving the peace seem to hinge upon the possibility of concentrating at Prince Albert and Carleton within the next few days, of a force competent to overawe the insurgents. Of course the rising will soon be quelled, and it is hoped the Government will be able to make a demonstration of such overwhelming strength as to render bloodshed unnecessary."

So far there was no cause for apprehension. Again, we find that on March 25th the Globe ridiculed the idea of a rebellion, and it gave, in corroboration of the view then expressed, the opinion of the Manitoban Metis organ, as follows:—

"Respecting the recent telegraph reports from Prince Albert in reference to an uprising of the half-breeds of that district under Louis Riel, Le Manitoban affirms that no trouble is to be apprehended from the half-breeds in the North-West. It adds: 'It is true there exists among them discontent, which is for the most part for legitimate reasons, and the Federal Government is seriously considering the cause of those grievances, and promises to remedy them as soon as possible.' Now, as to there being some agitation meetings, even to violent speeches, any thing is impossible. Certain individuals believe that justice cannot be obtained unless people complain, cry and lament. That is their manner, but it is far from them to rebel. The thing would be, besides so ridiculous that it is impossible for us to believe that our friends down there would have the least idea of compromising themselves to this point even should they be advised by those who ought to know better."

The Globe quotes another proof that there was little to fear on the same date :

"From the Prince Albert Times, March 6.—Last Tuesday afternoon the Farmers' Union held a meeting in the Halcio settlement, which was attended by a large crowd from all parts of the country. Mr. Riel and several others addressed the meeting. The president, in his opening speech, we are glad to learn, confined his remarks to the real wants of the country, and if other leaders in the movement were to follow in the same course they would receive more sympathy from the general public."

So that up to that time the Globe had no idea that Riel contemplated rebellion. The Globe suddenly discovered that Riel was a very dangerous man, and ought to be watched. Mark you, on 19th January the Globe said it was a waste of public money to have Riel watched, but on 30th March they thought it was necessary to watch him. In its issue of that date (30th March) it said:

"But he (Sir John) neither redeemed the grievances complained of, nor dealt with Riel as prudence dictated; so dangerous a man should have been closely watched and as soon as he began to unite the people to revolt he should have been arrested and treated as his crime deserved."

I now proceed to ask the question: Was the Government responsible for the rebellion? Hon. members opposite said, yes; the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) said, certainly; the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Lange-lier) endorsed that opinion; the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) voiced that opinion also. But we find one of the hon. members who are now opposing the Government on this question recording his opinion upon it. We find the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), last Session, expressing his views upon the question and repeating them in a speech before his constituents. That hon. member, on August 15th, said:

"It is evident that the Government is not responsible for the misfortunes of the North-West. What, then, was the cause of them? 1. The spirit of revenge on the part of Riel. 2. His blind and inordinate ambition. He believed himself to be the King of Heaven and Earth, with power to dispose of the whole world, and speaking as a prophet out of God himself. 3. The agitation of speculators and agents of American companies, whose interest it was to promote trouble. 4. The cries raised by certain hungry and disappointed politicians; and lastly, the inflammatory tone of certain articles in the journals that guide a portion of public opinion, such as the Globe."

So the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who is not in accord with the Government on this question, is with them on one point, namely, that the Government were not responsible for the rebellion, and that the responsibility for it lies at the door of Riel and the Globe newspaper and other organs of that party. Father McWilliams also gives his opinion as to the responsibility of the Government for the rebellion. On November 26th, 1885, he was interviewed, and the following is an extract from what he said:—

"Q. What do I consider caused the rebellion?—A. Well, I believe that the poor people were goaded on by capitalists who had gone into the North-West and received vast territories of land around Batoche and Prince Albert, which I am told is the garden of Canada. You are probably aware that the immigrants to the North-West are totally ignorant of the country and live in mental terror of the noble red man, and the half-breed is next door to an Indian. Well, then, the capitalists seeing their fortune was not accumulating as they desired, incited the poor people who looked up to them, to rebellion, in hopes that they could drive the Indians and half-breeds out of their homes and then secure for themselves the land."

So, according to Father McWilliams the responsibility for the rebellion rested entirely with speculators who goaded the people on to rebellion. We have other high authorities. We have Father Fourmond, who wrote letters which were published in several of the newspapers. They have appeared at length in some of the Quebec and Manitoba papers. He is asked the question as to the author of the North-West rebellion. He states as follows:—

"Who is the author of the North-West troubles? It is Louis Riel, and, as he is the author of them, it is he alone who deserves to be punished. If like me, you had followed the steps and studied the hypocrisy, the cunning and the secret arts that Riel has used to deceive and seduce these people and drag them into rebellion, whether they would or not, you would, as I do, cast upon that cruel and tyrannical man all the blame of that revolt. Riel made use of their religion; he made use of their ignorance, of their simplicity, touching every sensitive chord, to make them the dupes of his ambition."

All his plans have a sequence and a directness which show a fixed purpose to attain his end, and at the same time to escape the gallows if his criminal undertaking should fail. Riel must bear all the responsibility of this rebellion. He alone is to blame for all the calamities that have happened or are still to happen—the necessary consequences of those troubles which have caused us all so much suffering."

What does the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) say to that? These authorities are recognised by their church as celebrated divines, as persons in whom they have entire confidence and against whose reputation nothing can be said. Yet they say the whole responsibility for the rebellion rests on Riel and the Grit organs in Ontario. I now come to the question, did Riel have a fair trial? And in discussing this point it will be necessary to refer to different observations made by persons connected with the trial and other evidence. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) in his inflammatory speech, said:

"I propose, however, to discuss the question of the fairness of Louis Riel's trial, and I say, at the outset, that in my humble judgment, after giving this matter the most careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the scantiest possible measure of justice was meted out to Louis Riel in the trial of that case. And I go beyond that—it was not the kind of justice which we are accustomed to in the administration of the criminal law in the Province of Ontario or in the British Empire."

Sir, that was well answered by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). He read from the speech of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), delivered at London, in which he thoroughly justified the course pursued by the Government on that question. He thought that Riel had had a fair trial; he had no reason to think that he had not had a fair trial, and, on the contrary, he said that the country had the best guarantee of the fairness of the trial in the fact that the most eminent counsel in Ontario were engaged on behalf of the Crown. The hon. member for West Huron, however, gives himself entirely away towards the end of his speech where he says:

"I know, Mr. Speaker, the counsel representing the Crown too well—two of the ablest counsel practicing at the Canadian bar, gentlemen distinguished for their honor and integrity—I know them too well to believe that they would have been parties to any proceedings of this kind. I charge that this Government instructed the judge and instructed the counsel to press on the trial of this case, to press it on at that sitting of the court, and not give the prisoner an opportunity that every prisoner is entitled to in order to prepare for his defence."

There you see, the hon. member for West Huron says that the counsel were reliable men—men whose reputation was at stake, and men whom he knew would not be found allowing any Government to interfere with their right of action, or the course they were bound to pursue towards the prisoner at the bar. It does seem to me that when the hon. gentleman makes these statements—statements which I say are not founded on fact—when he charges the Government with having sent such instructions to Crown counsel, he should be prepared to substantiate those accusations. We have the instructions which were given to the Crown counsel, and from them the House will be able to see how much reliance can be placed on the statements of the hon. member for West Huron, when he says that instructions were given to them to act differently from what they appear to have acted on the trial. In those instructions there is not a word of the kind suggested by the hon. gentleman, for the Minister of Justice knew right well that he dare not give such instructions as the hon. member for West Huron alleges were given, to such counsel as Mr. Robinson or Mr. Osler, or any instructions which would be inconsistent with their duties to the Crown, to the people and to themselves. Here is the letter of instructions which was given to the counsel for the Crown:

"To Messrs. C. Robinson, Q.C., B. B. Osler, Q.C., G. W. Burbidge, Deputy Minister of Justice, T. Chase Casgrain, D. L. Scott."

"GENTLEMEN,—In the matter of the prosecution of Riel and others, growing out of the recent rebellion in the North-West Territories, and in which you are engaged as counsel in behalf of the Crown, I have thought it best to send you this note of general instructions."

"1. Riel and all the leading men among the prisoners, white or half-breed, to be prosecuted for treason.

"2. The Indians who committed the murders to be prosecuted for murder.

"3. Other Indian chiefs and principal men to be prosecuted for treason.

"4. I think after a certain number of convictions many prisoners will probably plead guilty.

"5. I think it would be well at this stage that you should report to me for further instructions.

"6. The object of the Government would be accomplished by the obtaining of a certain number of convictions. I should expect to hear of 30 or 40 leading half-breeds or white men and leading Indians having been found guilty.

"7. It may be from the information the Government has, and it seems probable, that the rebellion has been encouraged actively by whites, particularly of Prince Albert. Nothing in the whole duty entrusted to you is, I apprehend, more important than that we should, if possible, find out some of the men who have with far better knowledge than the half-breeds and the Indians stirred them up to rebellion, and your special attention is asked to this point.

"I am, etc.,

"A. CAMPBELL,

"Minister of Justice."

Now, Sir, what are the facts in relation to that trial? It is said it was carried on improperly. Riel was arraigned on the 6th July; he was formally brought into court and before him was placed the charge made by Chief Stewart, of the city of Hamilton, and at the request of his counsel the case was adjourned until the 20th July. On that day he made another request for adjournment, and he asked to have certain witnesses brought forward. He asked that he might have some witnesses from the Province of Quebec, some from the Province of Ontario, and others from the United States. The Crown acceded to all these requests, except the one with regard to witnesses from the United States. They refused to give a passport or indemnity to witnesses coming from the United States, who were implicated in the rebellion, to testify with regard to the rebellion; but they gave him the time he wanted, and that time was accepted as sufficient, when his counsel found they could not have the witnesses from the United States. The member for West Huron has cited Chitty and Archibald to show that in cases of high treason delays are granted by the Crown and the judges. That is true; but the circumstances must be placed before them, and they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the witnesses are necessary, that they have taken means to procure the attendance of the witnesses and failed, and also that there is some probability of getting them within a reasonable time if the delay be granted. When that was shown in this case, those acting for the prisoner were granted sufficient time. If you examine the Globe of 13th July, 1885, you will find that when application was made for a month's delay, Mr. Fitzpatrick, the counsel for the prisoner, addressed the court and said:

"May it please your Honor, I, in behalf of the defence, assume the responsibility of accepting the delay, which, as stated by the Crown counsel, the Crown is prepared to offer us."

So up to that time there was no apprehension that time would not be given to bring forward the necessary witnesses, but, on the contrary, he said he assumed the responsibility of accepting the delay, and he was satisfied with it. Yet these hon. gentlemen; and especially the hon. member for West Huron, says: Look how they rushed on the trial—a trial upon which they should not have hung a dog. That is the choice phrase used by the hon. member for West Huron; and not only was the time granted, but the Crown paid the witnesses. Now, if the hon. gentleman had been fair to this House in quoting from Chitty and Archibald, he would have gone on to the next line and would have found that in the case of witnesses out of the country time is not granted, unless a commission is applied for to examine the witnesses. The hon. gentleman would not read that to the House, for he wanted to convey the idea to Parliament and the country that the Government wanted to hurry on the trial and would not give the prisoner a fair opportunity to defend himself. Let us take another witness on this point. I do not say it is a reputable witness, because I do not think much of it. I refer to the Hamilton Times, which said on the 3rd August, 1885:

"The jury at Regina has found Louis Riel guilty of treason. The trial we believe was a fair one. There was abundant evidence that Riel headed an insurrection against the Government, which was only suppressed with loss of life and destruction of property. The jury could not, on the face of that evidence, find him innocent of the crime charged to him."

What do we find the prisoner himself saying, in addressing the jury, as reported on page 147 of the pamphlet relating to the trial:

"Bless also the lawyers for the Crown, because they have done, I am sure, what they thought their duty. They have shown me favors which at first I did not expect from them."

There was a meeting at Papineau square at which the little army for the Saskatchewan was present, headed by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), and at that meeting Mr. Fitzpatrick made a speech. He said:

"It was unfair to arraign before the tribunal of public opinion the judge and jury who tried Riel. They were simply the instance of the law, and it was found in the Statute-book. The law was passed by our own representatives, and we were responsible for the iniquitous portion of it."

So, up to that very time, in the presence of the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), and other hon. gentlemen, Mr. Fitzpatrick gave this testimony to the manner in which the prisoner was tried; and yet some hon. gentlemen have the effrontery, the audacity, to stand up in this House and declare that the trial was not a fair one. But let us follow the matter further. Mr. Fitzpatrick went to England, and in an interview with the representative of the New York Herald he said:

"Most of those who are in favor of Riel are French Canadians. They look upon the trial as one conducted under a system entirely unknown in the Province. There was no justification for a rebellion."

What does the hon. member for Quebec East, and the hon. member for Megantic, say with regard to that?—that there was no justification for the rebellion:

"and throughout the trial the Government tried the case fairly. But it was never believed by the people that the statute meant to give the Government power to deal with high treason in a summary manner."

Then we find that one of the judges of the court of Manitoba—not a Conservative judge, but a judge of the Reform party, Mr. Justice Killam—said:

"I agree with him also in saying that the prisoner has been ably and zealously defended, and that nothing that could assist his case appears to have been left untouched. If I could see any reason to believe that the jury, whether from passion or prejudice or otherwise, had decided against the weight of the evidence upon the prisoner's insanity, I should desire to find that the court could so interpret the statute as to be justified in causing the case to be laid before another jury for their consideration, as the only feelings we can have towards a fellow creature who has been deprived of the reason which places us above the brutes are sincere pity and a desire to have some attempt made to restore him to the full enjoyment of a sound mind."

Will the hon. gentleman point to a single instance in which Mr. Fitzpatrick claimed that the prisoner had not had a fair trial. If it had been the case that the trial was not fair, or that the judge had acted partially towards the Crown and against the prisoner, Mr. Fitzpatrick and Mr. Lemieux would have raised an objection, and asked the judge to note it. But no such objection was raised. On the contrary, we find throughout the whole trial a disposition on the part of the defence to put evidence of an improper character before the court. This was objected to by Mr. Osler and the other gentlemen acting for the Crown; but, with a desire to help the prisoner and in the interest of humanity, they waived their objection, and allowed the counsel for the prisoner to give any evidence they pleased. Then there was an appeal to the Lords of the Privy Council, and what do we find there? Mr. Bigham, the counsel for the prisoner, said:

"The petitioner has been tried for the crime of high treason and found guilty, upon evidence which was not questioned in the court in the first instance, and therefore it was to be assumed that if the petitioner were responsible for his actions, as to which there appeared to be some doubt, he was guilty of the crime of which he was charged. The question in the first instance, and insisted upon in the Court of Queen's Bench, was that he was not responsible for his actions, but the Court of Queen's Bench, which undoubtedly had power to hear the appeal, came to the conclusion that the verdict in the question of insanity was abundantly supported by the evidence."

"The jury before whom the petitioner was tried negatived that defence (insanity), and no argument has been presented to their Lordships to show that that finding was otherwise than correct."

So, you will see that this man Louis Riel had not only every opportunity to call whatever witnesses he desired at the expense of the Crown, but to take whatever time he wanted to call the witnesses, and to present to the jury and the court all the facts necessary to his defence; and yet the jury found him guilty. What else could they do? When the hon. gentleman examines the whole record and all the facts, I am satisfied that he must see that the prisoner was tried fairly under a law placed on the Statute-book by his own friends. Now I come to the question, should the prisoner have been punished? Upon that question, I wish to call into court the evidence of men whose evidence is not altogether reliable, judging from their antecedents, yet of such a character that their friends must believe it. I want to call into court the Globe, the Advertiser, and other newspapers of the same kind, in order to show the country the hypocrisy of those gentlemen and the vacillating, shilly-shally course they have pursued on this question from beginning to end. First, they cried aloud for vengeance and blood; but when they saw a chance of reaching the Treasury benches, what did they do? They said, this is a cruel thing, this is a judicial murder, to hang this man. They thought they saw power looming up in the distance. They had power before for five years, and they were sent ignominiously out of power by the people. I remember the eloquent language in which the hon. member for West Durham said, I appeal to the tribunal of the people. He did so, and the righteous indignation of the people placed him and his followers where they are now. Now, what was the course pursued by these hon. gentlemen and their organs previous to the trial? This is not the kind of literature I like to indulge in, but it is the kind they like to wallow in, and I now give it to this House. On March 26th, 1885, I find the Globe saying:

"If such crimes as are reputed have been committed it will perhaps be thought necessary that the leaders, at least, should be punished. But what is to be done with Riel this time? He, it seems, incited the people to revolt. He, it is said, leads those who have committed so many grave offences. Shall we again have a price set upon his head?"

Then, on March 30th, we find the following language in the same strain:—

"The first feeling was that of profound regret. The next was that law and order must be maintained at any cost, and that the insurgents, no matter what the grievances may be, must be taught that armed resistance to the supreme authority is a crime so great as to deprive them of all claim for sympathy."

That was the declaration made by the leading organ of the party, and it was echoed throughout the Province by all the smaller lights of the party. On March 31st, we find the Globe belching forth its language in this style:

"The rebellion must be quelled, and all parties must heartily sustain and assist the Government in restoring peace in the North-West, and in bringing to justice those who have incited those people to insurrection."

Who were they? On March 26th the Globe stated who they were; it said Louis Riel was the man. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) and eminent divines have said the same thing. Some time afterwards, when the rebellion was well under way, the Globe thought it well to agitate for amnesty to all who joined in the insurrection except Louis Riel. On April 4th we find the following in the Globe:—

"It is to be trusted that Major-General Middleton's instructions include offering an amnesty to all except Riel and the few who fired on Major Crozier's flag of truce, if any such firing actually occurred, and except those personally concerned in any other outrages which may have been perpetrated."

So you find that the Globe, the organ of the party, was determined that any man who had a hand in the rebellion, no matter who he was, should be brought to justice, and should receive such condign punishment as such criminals deserve. Now we find the Globe wanted the same miserable man punished—the Globe which, to-day, has so much sympathy for our friends from Lower Canada, who swear by it; which has the support of the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier), who quotes from it and revels in it, and the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Laurier), who draws inspiration from its utterances. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) inspire most of its articles, and yet we find that the Globe wants the miserable man punished. On May 25th the Globe says:

"They were never more in earnest, never more determined that justice shall be done, and that the doing of it shall not be unnecessarily delayed. The mode in which it is to be done they are willing to leave to the Government, but what the Government does they will watch closely, and a policy of procrastination they will not tolerate. They desire that this miserable man, charged with having incited the rebellion, shall have a fair trial; but as they are resolved to have no more rebellions, as they desire to prevent the effusion of the blood of their young men, they will hold Sir John and his colleagues responsible should there be a failure of justice. They make no demonstration, they raise no cry of vengeance. Calm, but stern and determined, they demand that justice shall be done."

This was the language used by the Globe, inspired by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), or by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier), or the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), or the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), I cannot tell which. At any rate, they are responsible for its attitude, for they dare not express sentiments other than those expressed by their organ. We find that after the trial these gentlemen also cried for blood. They determined that the leader of the rebellion should be punished; they had no qualms of conscience as to its being a judicial murder then. They knew he was condemned to be hanged, and they were determined that the stern vengeance of the law should be executed. In August, 1885, we find the Globe used the following language:

"The moment Riel's letter to Major Crozier was put in evidence, it became clear that the prisoner had been not only a participator in, but the instigator and leading mind of the rebellion. No shadow of doubt remained that he was guilty as charged in the indictment. The testimony that followed only deepened the certainty of his guilt. There never was made out a clearer case, and the only doubt that remained was as to the extent of the prisoner's responsibility."

Where were the members for Montreal (Mr. Coursol) and Megantic (Mr. Langelier) then? Had they taken up arms as they said they would, they would have shared the same fate, according to the Globe; the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) would have been given the same dose, according to the Globe.

"As to this medical experts differed, and it would have been natural too that the jury should have differed. But the jury seemed to have brushed aside all the medical evidence, and dealing with the facts only, they returned a verdict of guilty. They could do no less."

So says the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and the Globe newspaper. Let us go on further. The organ wants him hanged at once, but that was before its new friends from Lower Canada began to kick a little over the traces, that was before the Globe found out it was a judicial murder, before these gentlemen began to feel that in the veins of Riel flowed the same blood as in their veins, and before they came to the right-about-face. These gentlemen felt they had to do something in behalf of their countrymen, but the Globe did not then believe they were in earnest, and consequently still thought Riel should be hanged. On August 4th it used this language:

"The crime for which Riel has been convicted is one of the most dreadful that can be imagined. It has cost the lives of two hundred Canadians, and has caused the cruel maiming and crippling of probably twice that number. Had his efforts to incite an Indian rising been more successful the white residents in the North-West would, in all probability have been subjected to outrages more dreadful and horrible than can be imagined. It was of the essence of Riel's crime, that he knew what the Indians were capable of, and what atrocities they would probably commit when their savage nature was thoroughly excited. The Free Press is right in declaring that nothing of which the half-breeds had to complain could justify Riel's conduct, and that the crime of which he was convicted is perhaps the most heinous that could be conceived. No one who has read the evidence can doubt that Riel richly deserves death."

What does the hon. member for Hochelaga say to that?

Mr. DESJARDINS. We have nothing to do with the Opposition; it is with the Government we have to do.

Mr. RYKERT. We have also another important witness whom I would not wish to place in the same category as that which I have already laid before the House, Sir Richard Cartwright, who stands head and shoulders over some of the Opposition. He delivered a speech at Millbrook on August 17th, in which he said:

"He agrees with him (Mr. Fraser) also that there was hardly any punishment too great to be inflicted on men who had been the cause of shedding so much innocent blood and had inflicted so serious a blow on the welfare and prosperity of the North-West, as those men who were really guilty of instigating that rebellion."

We have still hopes that those gentlemen who at the present are not altogether in accord with the Government will see the error of their ways; we have no doubt whatever that when their blood has cooled off a little, they will feel, as they always did, in sympathy with the great party of progress; we have hopes that they will sink their little differences and come back to their former allegiance. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) will return to the party from which he has severed himself temporarily, and that the time will arrive when the whole of them, including the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) will be glad to rejoin the party of progress and leave the party of bankruptcy. On a former occasion, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) also delivered a speech, for which he was somewhat berated by the Globe. At that time the Globe had not extended an invitation to its Bleu friends to come to its little parlor; the Globe then considered them as the exorescence of the earth, as clogs to the wheel of Confederation and in speaking of the speech of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), used this language:

"The Bleus, after having for a time bowed before the public opinion of Quebec, and joined in the declaration that the Metis were greatly wronged, and in the demands for the commutation of the sentence of Riel, have begun again to assert that Riel committed great crimes and that he has no right to the sympathy of Canadians. Mr. Girouard, M.P., a gentleman who sometimes talks in an independent tone, but who nearly always supports the Government, had something to say to his constituents a few days ago. He said the insurrection was an insane act, and there was nothing to justify it. He said the Government had dealt with the Metis in a most fair and just way. He then broached the question, what was to be done with Riel, and read the evidence of Father André, given at the Regina trial, and a letter from Father Fourmond, to show that Riel was a renegade, hypocrite and an impostor, and deserved no mercy or misplaced sympathy—that he had usurped the sacred duties of his pastors, misled the people and driven them to destruction."

What does the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Laurier) say to that? What does the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier) say to that? Here they are patting this gentleman on the back, passing him notes asking him to "speak now," but I venture to say they will not endorse the sentiments which the hon. member for Jacques Cartier expressed then. They know that the tie which binds them to those who now desert the Government is not strong and will not stand any strain. Another paper of the Reform party—a paper which, I am happy to say, with all its great efforts in behalf of the party, failed to keep my hon. friend the member for East Durham (Mr. Ward) out of the House—said on August the 5th, before the execution:

"It has come to a pretty pass indeed when a red-handed rebel can thus snap his fingers at the law."

Well, Sir, we have another gentleman, I will take another witness; I know he will be glad to be called upon to give testimony. I suppose this gentleman, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), will not object to the little evidence I read a few minutes ago from the Port Hope Guide; he will not object to any utterances made by the organiser of the party, this gentleman who ran in the interests of the Reform party in East Durham; no doubt, he will echo them. Well, the member for Bothwell came out like a man on that occasion, for once in his life, as some one here says. On September 26th, 1885, he said in his organ:

"The law makes treason a crime. The law, through its tribunal, has pronounced Riel guilty of that crime and condemns him to death. The functions of the Executive are ministerial, and the law commands their performance. The duties of the Executive as laid down are clear and simple, but he, indeed, would be a simple man who would assume that because such are their duties, they will necessarily be performed."

Now there is the evidence of a young lawyer, a gentleman who was made a lawyer, I believe, by Act of parliament. The gentleman who runs the machinery of western Ontario for the party, that gentleman who is always so fond of giving his opinion upon constitutional law, he declares that the functions of the Executive are ministerial, that they have simply a duty to perform like a clerk in an office, like the clerk at the Table who finds what the Orders of the Day are and has to carry them out. He says:

"The functions of the Executive are ministerial, and the law commands their performance. The duties of the Executive as laid down are clear and simple, but he, indeed, would be a simple man who would assume that because such are their duties, they will necessarily be performed."

That is the evidence of the member for Bothwell. I leave the House to judge how reliable that testimony is. I venture to say that, when the vote is taken, we shall find him facing right-about. Now, I would like to give some more literature from the hon. gentleman, who devotes most of his time to that sort of thing. He thought he would write an article on the sentiment of race, but in that article he gives an unmerciful blow to our Bleu friends. He had not any idea that Ontario was to be given up to French domination, and I suppose he has that idea now.

Mr. MILLS. What is your own idea?

Mr. RYKERT. I rejoice to know that I have always acted with my Lower Canadian friends. I am half a Lower Canadian myself. My mother was a Lower Canadian, and I am thankful to say that for twenty-five years I have stood side by side with the Lower Canadians. Upwards of twenty-five years ago, I was blackguarded by the Grit press because I stood by them and voted for the Separate School Bill, and upwards of twenty-five years ago I was sent to the right-about in my county by the Orangemen and the fanatics, goaded on by the organs of the Grit party, on that account. I have always believed in religious liberty, and no one can point to anything in my record which is not in accordance with that view. I have not shown any bigotry against religious institutions. I knew how they clung to their religious institutions, and I felt that they had a right to them; I felt that they had their right to worship God as they chose, and I have always supported that right.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Continue the argument.

Mr. RYKERT. I am coming to it. I am not nearly done with it yet.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Go on with the scrap-book.

Mr. RYKERT. I have some more in the scrap-book, and I have not done with the hon. member for Bothwell yet or the hon. member for Grey. The hon. member for Bothwell, writing an article a little while ago on the subject of race, on the 8th September, 1885, thus delivered himself:—

“But the question still remains, why should the Province of Quebec come to the rescue of Riel? Why should Quebec do for Riel what it would never have thought of doing for anyone who was English, Irish or Scotch? Why should it say that anyone having French blood in his veins should enjoy immunities which it would be the last to accord to a man of any other race? Why should it wholly ignore Riel's efforts to produce an Indian insurrection? Why should it overlook the massacre of men and women, of clergymen and laymen, as the consequence of Riel's appeal to the Indians' aid? What is there in Riel's case which makes his life in the estimation of the people of Quebec of so much more value than the many lives he has caused to be sacrificed? We are not demanding Riel's execution; we are simply drawing attention to the demand put forth by the people of Quebec, that Riel shall be dealt with different from other men; that he shall be at liberty to do with impunity what would send any English-speaking man to the gallows.”

These are the sentiments of the member for Bothwell. I wonder what the member for Quebec (Mr. Laurier) says to that. I wonder what his ally from Megantic (Mr. Langelier) says to it, or the member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault), or the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). No thinking man would endorse the sentiments uttered by that man, though they were uttered by the member for Bothwell. He also gives evidence upon the subject of the conviction. Observe the legal mind—a mind that ought to be able to dissect evidence in a proper and sufficient manner, a lawyer by Act of Parliament who upon every occasion has his legal voice by Act of Parliament thrust into the debate.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what he means by being legal by Act of Parliament?

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman can reply when his turn comes.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman has no right to insinuate.

Mr. RYKERT. If the hon. gentleman does not know what an Act of Parliament is, he can go to the clerks upstairs and consult them.

Mr. MILLS. He is insinuating what is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman persists in insinuating what is not true.

Mr. RYKERT. I am glad to find that there is a different law for one side of the House from that for the other. I was called to order a few minutes ago because I said an hon. member's speech lacked all the characteristics of truthfulness; and I yielded. Now I am addressed in this way by the hon. gentleman, and he is not called to order, but he says what he dare not say outside in the lobby, and what no man on the other side dare say in the lobby. When the hon. gentleman thinks he can interrupt me, he is very much mistaken. I can keep my balance of mind as well as he can, and I am glad to know the difference in the disposition of the two sides of the House towards observing the rules of the House. It is not the first occasion when I have been interrupted by the Speaker of this Chamber, for using language called unparliamentary, and a few moments afterwards members on the opposite side of the House have used the same language and were not called to order for it. I do not accuse the present Deputy-Speaker of doing it, but I have been subjected to that once or twice in this House, and I do not propose to be subjected to that again without testing the feeling of the House on that question. I was going on to say that the hon. member for Bothwell joined in the hue and cry of the Globe, and other Grit organs of Ontario, that Riel was properly convicted. Yet, Sir, he will have the boldness, the audacity, to stand up here to-day and declare to the House that he was improperly convicted. Sir, he sat there the other evening listening to the speech of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), yet he dared not dissent from him, and no doubt he felt humiliated, yet an hon. gentleman behind me states that he applauded the hon. member for West Huron. Yet this is the hon. gentleman who formerly contended that Riel was properly convicted. Now, for the benefit of hon. gentlemen from Quebec, I would like to read what he said. Mind you, I am not altogether done with the hon. member for Bothwell yet. I have several more of his choice quotations. In the London Advertiser of September 19th, 1885, I find the following language:—

“No one can maintain that Riel was not properly convicted upon the evidence submitted. Whether he is sane or insane is a question upon which experts examined before the court differ in opinion, so that a conclusion even on this question is one which in all probability would have been reached by jury in the Province of Ontario or Quebec as well as by the jury who tried the case. The point then which the Judicial Committee will have submitted to them will not be that he was unfairly tried or unjustly sentenced, but whether the tribunal before which he was tried was a legal tribunal having jurisdiction in the case.”

So you see here he had no sympathy whatever with those who said he was improperly tried. I will quote from him again, and I apologise to the House for being obliged to quote again from the hon. member for Bothwell. I hope he will not interrupt me, as he has done in your presence, and tell me that what I say is not true, though I have no objection to his saying so outside of this Chamber. Yet I propose still further to call him as a witness. I will not say he is a reliable witness. He is a witness in whom I have very little confidence, but in whom the members of that side of the House have implicit confidence.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to correct the statement that the hon. gentleman has made relating to me personally, and I think it is my right to do so. The hon. gentleman, after my denial, has persisted in making the statement that I was made a member of the Bar by Act of Parliament. I say, Sir, that is not true. I say it is not true, and the hon. gentleman has no right whatever to persist in an untruthful and malicious statement of that sort.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course the hon. gentleman will accept the statement that is made.

Mr. MILLS. He does not accept it. He has no right to go on and make a misstatement.

Mr. RYKERT. I have not said anything just now about his being made a member of the Bar by Act of Parliament, but I did a moment ago state that he was a member of the Bar by Act of Parliament, and probably gave him more credit than I should have done. Let us, then, listen to this very reliable witness again. This is what he said on the 7th November, 1885:

“It may be that Riel will be hanged. This unquestionably was the intention of the Government at the time of his arrest, and all the Government supporters, Tories and Bleus, were at that time content that if Riel was convicted he should be executed. The Tory supporters of the Government favored it, because of what he had done in the first rebellion, the Bleus because of what the Government did that led to the second rebellion. Certainly if he were possessed of his rational faculties, the killing of Scott was an atrocious murder, for which he deserved to die, but for which offence he was pardoned. Scarcely less wicked was his attempt to stir up the savages of the North-West and let these cruel and bloodthirsty men loose upon unoffending settlers. An Indian war is always a most serious affair, and the white man that prompts it and seeks to persuade the Indian population to engage in the massacre of unoffending women and children is deserving of no sympathy.”

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) if he agrees with that sentiment. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) probably will not. Now, let us see what his pastor and his spiritual adviser states, and I would like to know if they are not to be recognised in this House. Did they not tell the country that some of their kinsfolk were butchered by the savages incited thereto by Louis Riel, and let loose upon unoffending settlers? We find a letter published in Prince Albert, June 12th, 1885, in the following language:—

"We, the priests of the district most particularly affected by the rebellion, to wit, St. Laurent, St. Antoine, Grandin, Duck Lake, and Batoche, since it was there, in the midst of our people, that Louis David Riel had established his headquarters, desire to draw the attention of our fellow countrymen in Canada to these facts: this miscreant, Louis David Riel, does not merit the sympathies of the Roman Catholic Church or the members of that Church, having usurped our mission as priests, and robbed our people of the benefits and consolations it was our duty to render them. He has done all this in his purely personal interest."

Just as I stated in the outset of my remarks, his whole object in coming to this country was his own personal aggrandisement. This letter is signed by Fathers André, Toussaint, Moulin, Fourmond, Vegreville and Lecoq. And Father Fourmond, the parish priest of Batoche, writes as follows:—

"I have been very near death, for if I escaped the bullets and madness of the insurrectionists, war, apostasy, treason, persecution, everything seemed to have been let loose upon us; one might have thought that the end of the world had come. Already we had our anti-Christ in the person of this famous Riel, against whom we were obliged to fight at the peril of our lives in order to destroy the sinister influence he had secured over our poor people.

"My God! what a man! what hypocrisy and what impiety combined! It is for this he ruined our Christian families by pillage and fire. It is by a horrible consequence of his diabolical plans that was shed the blood of the white man and of our beloved and zealous confrères who were massacred by the Indians by his own orders."

And yet, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen pretend that this Government should be censured for having judicially sacrificed such a man. I have another witness. We find the Winnipeg Free Press said of Riel's case:

"Riel was fairly tried, deservedly condemned, justly executed. There is no cause to regret his fate; no patriotic Canadian should regret it. It would have been a gross insult to the laws of our country to have permitted him to escape condign punishment."

What does the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) think of that? What does the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) think of that? Of course the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) highly applauds it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I must again apologise to the House for calling the hon. member for Bothwell as a witness. On the 13th August, 1885, I find his organ delivered itself in the following language:—

"Whether Riel's hallucinations are of the character to relieve him of responsibility is a wholly different question, and one upon which we at present express no opinion. The jury, who had the best opportunity for judging, hold him responsible. It is not at all creditable that interference on his behalf should be based upon his nationality. Frenchmen ought not to do for Riel what they would not do for an English Canadian under the same circumstances."

Listen to that. This is the hon. gentleman who is seeking the alliance of the discontented Conservatives from the Province of Quebec, but with a hypocritical sneer he asks: Who these Bleus are? Is that the kind of man, the kind of representatives of the people who should receive the confidence of our friends from the Province of Quebec? They should know to what they are coming, and before I sit down I shall show them where they will land if they fall into the arms of the Grit party. Probably it may not be amiss to let the country and, at all events, our French Canadian friends, see the record of inconsistency which the Reform party has piled up for itself in Ontario and the Dominion at large. Let us see what jumping-jacks they have been, what somersaults they have made in every direction, one day preaching one thing and another day another. Here are some specimens. Let them go side by side on the records of Parliament and before the people as the utterances of the leaders of the party. Here are men professing to form public opinion, one day professing certain principles, and the next day for their own private ends professing different principles: Let me, I say, give a few specimens of inconsistency, so that our friends from Lower Canada may see exactly where they will land when they fall into the arms of hon. gentlemen opposite. The Port Hope Guide said before the execution of Riel:

"It has come to a pretty pass indeed when a red-handed rebel can thus snap his fingers at the law."

After the execution of Riel the same journal said:

"It has come to a pretty pass indeed, that in the noontide glare of the nineteenth century political offenders must suffer death if they dare to assert their just rights."

The Brandon Sun before the execution said:

"Riel has been found worthy of death by the courts and highest tribunals in the land, and yet the Government, for base purposes, intervene and prevent the just execution of penalties prescribed by laws of their own making."

After the execution:

"And now the wholesale hanging of Her Majesty's subjects who were provoked into hostilities by the horrible mismanagement and neglect of those entrusted and sworn to guard their lives and property and interests, will close the terrible drama."

The Ottawa Free Press, which is celebrated for turning somersaults, said before the execution:

"Louis Riel knew well the nature of the Indian, and that with them the usages of warfare were revolting in civilised eyes. When Riel conspired with the Indians he opened the gates of rapine and murder, and for that offence deserved the severest penalty possible."

After the execution:

"The execution of Louis Riel, which took place this morning, will scarcely rank above a State lynching."

The Belleville Ontario, a leading Reform paper in the centre of the Province of Ontario, said before the execution:

"Not only as a traitor to Canada and her institutions, the murderer of her sons, but as the deadly deceiver of an ignorant though brave community, Louis Riel deserves the penalty affixed to his offence. That penalty is death."

After the execution:

"He was tried. Eminent jurists claimed that the court was incompetent. He was put on trial for treason—not a capital offence for the past fifty years. He was found guilty, and the jury, with a knowledge of the circumstances of the case and the culpability of the Government, added to their verdict a recommendation to mercy. That recommendation practically meant that, in the judgment of that jury, the uprising was justified to the extent that a life sentence, and not capital punishment, should be imposed. From first to last the conduct of the Government has been a black disgrace to Canada."

Port Hope Guide again, before the execution:

"If the rebel leader is not hanged it will be because Sir John Macdonald dare not go in opposition to the Frenchmen of Quebec."

After the execution:

"We are firmly of the opinion that the consideration of whether he was right or wrong did not actuate the policy of the Government, but because they believed something had to be done to weld the rank and file of their followers to the leaders of the political branch of the Orange order."

The St. Thomas Journal, a rather notorious Reform organ, and the organ of the hon. members for East and West Elgin, said before the execution:

"The time is near at hand when the people of Ontario must decide whether they will maintain the Confederation by doing their share to place in power men who will not bend at the selfish demand of a foreign-speaking Province, or whether the Confederation must go."

How do our French friends like that expression—foreign-speaking Province. After the execution the same paper said:

"We would willingly see Mr. Blake at the head of an Administration which depended for its existence upon this fateful French vote. We say, put Edward Blake in John Macdonald's place, even if it be by the hand of the Frenchman, and give him a chance."

Hon. gentlemen opposite are willing to allow Frenchmen to do their dirty work, to place them in the ignominious position of raking up the dirty and old sores of the party. They are making every effort to induce them to oppose the Orangemen of Canada who have ever been the allies of the Conservatives of Quebec. Such are the kind of men in the Reform party who are trying to form public opinion in Ontario. We go still further. The Globe before the execution said :

"The French Bleus rule Sir John's actions to a greater extent than is generally supposed. They are jealous of the progress, wealth and importance of well-governed Ontario."

After the execution :

"The greatest enemies of Ontario have never been the Quebec Bleus, though they have often been so represented."

The Globe also said before the execution :

"A vote for a supporter of Sir John Macdonald is to endorse the policy of the man who has for long been subservient to the Quebec Bleus, the most intolerant faction of the Dominion."

How do our French friends like that phrase: "The most intolerant faction of the Dominion." Then we find other organs of the party using most violent language. Not to be outdone by any other organ, the Globe said :

"Nothing short of hanging for Riel will satisfy the people of this Province. If he does not get that it will be because the pistol has been put to Sir John's ear by French Canadian influence, and this should be a just and sufficient cause for Ontario to call a halt and demand a reconstruction of the federal ship or a disunion. A French ascendancy is out of the question, and not to be endured or tolerated."

Again the Globe said :

"The English-speaking people will not much longer submit to French dictation. If Confederation is to be maintained intact, the laws must be impartially administered irrespective of nationality, color or religion; neither must one Province be allowed to bleed another, as is the case at present. Riel not only shed blood himself, but caused blood to be shed without having the slightest cause to do so. And not to hang such a villain is unpardonable. The demand made in Ontario is not a cry for vengeance, but a demand simply to let the law take its course on a notorious malefactor."

It seems to me that I recollect the expression, "Go unwhipt of justice," in a certain resolution moved by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) in the Ontario Legislature. If hon. gentlemen have not had sufficient material on this point, I can give them more; but the people will be able to see from the extracts I have given what a set of hypocrites the Reform party has outside of Parliament trying to direct the public opinion of the country. People will be able to understand from the quotations I have given that they are capable of doing almost anything. At one time they are denouncing the Government for extravagance and corruption, and the next day when they obtain office they are guilty of greater extravagance and corruption. One day they are crying out for the blood of Riel, and the next day they term his execution a judicial murder. That is the course of the party from beginning to end, and when the sober sense and judgment of the people is asked they will declare, as they have done on two previous occasions, that those men are not deserving of their confidence. I now come to another branch of the subject, a branch upon which my friend from Grey (Mr. Landerkin) and myself may, perhaps, not take issue. It is a branch not peculiarly within the province of the hon. member for Bothwell, although that hon. gentleman does monopolise almost every subject when he writes in his paper. Still it is a medical subject, as to which I am sure the hon. member for South Grey will agree with me. One thing struck me as being remarkably singular, though I should not have been struck with its singularity if I had remembered the antecedents of the hon. gentleman, and that is the extraordinary utterances of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). I cannot conceive how a man can stand on the floor of this Parliament and declare in the presence of the assembled wisdom of the country, in the presence of the representatives of the people, that he will approach this subject with careful consideration, that he will separate it from all bias and all previous opinion, and discuss it fully and impartially—I say I cannot imagine how a man could make that public declaration, and still should go to the library, bring a book from it and make quotations from it which he knows are not correct. That hon. gentleman has been convicted on a former occasion, and I will convict him now. I will not say he did it maliciously, for that perhaps would not be parliamentary; nor will I say he did it wilfully, for that would not be parliamentary; but I will say that it is not creditable for a representative of the people to stand on the floor of Parliament and make use of expressions which are not corroborated by the facts. It is not creditable to a member of Parliament, and especially one who is a lawyer, to sacrifice his reputation as a lawyer, if he ever had one, by making statements which are not correct. We all know that there is nothing by which a lawyer can disgrace himself more, nothing which will more completely justify a court in taking his gown from him, than that he should stand up and pretend to quote law which is not law. I have seen a lawyer in this House quoting law which he knew was appealed and overruled, and still he had not the manliness to say that he was mistaken. I find that the hon. member for West Huron has been guilty of quoting a lot of old Yankee law and palming it off on the House for British justice. More than that, I have the very book from the library which was marked by himself, and had he desired to do himself justice, or to do this House justice, he would have quoted the observations which he himself marked, preceding those which are mentioned in his speech. Let us see what the hon. gentleman says. The question of insanity is a broad question, I admit, but is a question which, fortunately for the legal fraternity of this country, has long been settled; and when we find a lawyer standing up in Parliament and speaking of the McNaughten case and misquoting the law, as laid down by the Privy Council, what can we think of him? Can we for a moment believe that he desired to make his reputation as a lawyer, that he wishes for the future to be looked upon as a gentleman dispensing law—as an embryo Minister of Justice in the Grit Government which is to come in about 20 years hence? That is the gentleman who from time to time rises in his place, and with dignity and self-assurance, thinking possibly that when he uncovers his head he uncovers the whole wisdom of the country—with all the arrogance, the assurance and brass which it is possible for a gentleman to assume, deliberately misstates and misquotes the law.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. RYKERT. Well, I did not think, Mr. Speaker, that the word brass was unparliamentary.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman not to state that an hon. member has deliberately misquoted or misstated.

Mr. RYKERT. I will say misquoted, but I will leave out deliberately. Of course there are some expressions used on the other side of the House which are parliamentary there, but are not parliamentary when used on this side. The hon. gentleman used such words as outrageous and other expressions which I would like collected for the benefit of this House. He used words and phrases of the most extraordinary character—of a character which would imply criminality on the part of the Government, and they were used without his being called to order, and yet I am being called to order because I said his speech lacked the most essential element of any speech in this House, and that is truthfulness. I recognised your bidding, but I was told afterwards that I had told an untruth, and the hon. gentleman who said so was not called to order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I may make a mistake, but if I do it is an error of the head and not of the heart. I try to keep order, and it is my desire that hon. gentlemen on both sides should be as little personal in their remarks as possible.

Mr. RYKERT. I am glad you have laid down that rule and I only hope it will be enforced, and that it will not be applicable to one side more than the other, because I have experienced that difficulty this afternoon, and I did not feel, as a member of Parliament, that I should stand it any longer without taking the sense of the House. Now I will proceed to discuss, as I have said, one of the most important questions ever discussed in this Parliament—that is, the question of the sanity or the insanity of Louis Riel. It is important because the members from the Province of Quebec have placed that question as an issue between themselves and the Government. These gentlemen have declared, Sir, in their utterances outside of Parliament, that it was a judicial murder to hang a man who was insane. They have assumed that the man was insane, though the jury at the trial found to the contrary. They say that the Government should have issued a commission to see if there was evidence of insanity, though they have not shown that after his conviction there were things discovered in his character, his manner, or his actions, indicating that he was insane, and they assume that it is right to challenge the decisions of the courts of the Province of Manitoba, and the decisions of the jury. They say that, notwithstanding that the jury found that he was perfectly sane, notwithstanding that the courts of Manitoba have, upon review, stated that the jury were justified in finding their verdict, notwithstanding that the highest court in the land has publicly declared that the trial was a fair and a just trial, and that the evidence justified the verdict,—these gentlemen have assumed, notwithstanding all these things, to say to the country and to tell this House, that it was the duty of the Government, under these circumstances, to issue a commission for the purpose of trying his insanity. They have made that the issue. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) did not make it the issue; nor did the Globe and the other organs of the party. The hon. member for Bothwell said that it was a purely ministerial and not an Executive matter. He declared publicly as a lawyer and a journalist that the Government of this country had no other duty to perform but to carry out the sentence; that their duty was Ministerial purely; that they had no more power to say whether he should be hanged or not than the clerk at the Table. I say, therefore, it is for us to consider these matters, and to say whether the Government performed its duty, whether they acted consistently with their duty to themselves in allowing the sentence to take its course. The hon. member for West Huron, in discussing the question of insanity, laid down the law as he said the law is. I am sorry I cannot say that he did not try to make it appear as it should be; but I will not infringe on the rules of parliamentary debate. The hon. member in making his speech, made this observation:—

“There is a popular misapprehension—”

I do not know where the misapprehension is unless it is in his own mind:

“There is a popular misapprehension as to the rule that ought to prevail in criminal cases when insanity has been set up as a defence. The popular opinion is, that if a man is able to distinguish right from wrong he is held responsible for violation of law. I say, Mr. Speaker, that that is an entire misapprehension of the law.”

And you will recollect with what force and in what a theatrical style the hon. gentleman said: “I say it is not the law of the land.”

“A man may be able to distinguish right from wrong, a man may be perfectly rational upon every subject but one, and if he commits an offence within the scope and limit of that subject, then in the eye of the law he is not responsible. Now, I observe that the Minister of Public Works has fallen into this error in discussing this question. I say there is no excuse for him, and there is no excuse for the Minister of Justice, if they have fallen into that error. It is an error into which it appears to me the medical commission sent up to investigate the mental condition of Louis Riel have also fallen; because I observe that after they pronounced that he was suffering under two delusions, they say he was perfectly responsible. I say it is not a proper rendering of the law; I say it is not the law of the land.”

That is the utterance of the hon. member for West Huron, and it is just such an exposition of the law as we might expect from that hon. gentleman, who has the habit of not always quoting the law and stating facts as they really are, whether from misapprehension or not I cannot say, if within the bounds of parliamentary order. I would like to say more than that. I say he ought to have known the law. If he did not know it, he should not have assumed the right to expound it in this House. Assuming an air of importance which belongs to the position which he hopes some time to occupy as Minister of Justice, he declared the law to be different from what is laid down by learned commentators and celebrated writers—different from what he himself found it to be, as laid down in the Manitoba Court by Chief Justice Wallbridge, Mr. Justice Taylor, and Mr. Justice Killam. I will not go so far as to say that he did not read the case tried before that court; but if he did read it, he must have seen that the judges based their decision on the principle of law which is thoroughly established and well recognised by all English-speaking people. It is well known that the McNaughten case settled the law on the subject of insanity. After the trial of that unfortunate man, although he was acquitted, the House of Lords was called upon to ask the judges of the Privy Council to expound the law. They did expound it, and that law is so expounded and laid down in the very work which the hon. gentleman had in his hand while he was speaking, and I see that the passage is marked by himself. Now, Sir, what did the hon. gentleman say?

“Wharton & Stille, in their work on Medical Jurisprudence—

He forgot to tell us it was a celebrated Yankee work—

“lay down the following law:

“That the ‘right and the wrong’ test does not cover all the cases of legitimate insane irresponsibility. Medical observation, based on an induction which each year makes at once more extended in its materials and more absolute in its results, tells us that there are persons unquestionably insane who are capable of being instructed in the law of the land, if knowing what this law is, both in its general character and in its results, and of being deterred by proper sanction from breaking such law.”

That is the law as laid down by Wharton & Stille, on page 122, and I find the letter “C” marked beside it, I suppose by the reporter, and meaning “Cameron.” If the hon. gentleman was desirous of letting the House and the country know what the law really was on that question; if he had so small an opinion of the knowledge of the members of this House as to suppose they did not know what the law was, why had he not the fairness and candor to read what is marked by himself just preceding the passage he read, which states what he knew was not the law at all?

Mr. COOK. How do you know he marked it?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). How do you know he did not?

Mr. RYKERT. I do not know whether the reputation the hon. gentleman has for betting is true or not, but if he is prepared to put up a little sum for the benefit of the Ottawa Hospital I would like to bet him on it. Now, Sir, what does the author say at page 122? And I wish to draw the attention of the hon. member for West Durham to it, because it seemed to me that when the hon. member for West Huron was speaking I could see a scowl on the face of the hon. member for West Durham. It seemed to me that the hon. gentleman was indignant at the idea that any gentleman who pretended to aspire to the position of Minister of Justice should have the audacity to make such an exposition of law. I felt for the hon. gentleman; I knew that his corporal was put up to expound the law for his party; I knew what he was telling—I will not use an unparliamentary expression—was not correct and that which no person would look on as the law of the land. This is what the author says at page 120 :

"But it is proper here to state that by the Courts of England, of Massachusetts, of New York, and perhaps a majority of the American States, in decisions to which reference has been already made, the two forms of defence which have been just stated are rejected, and the 'right and wrong' test, with greater or less emphasis, is declared to be that by which alone insanity, as a defence, is to be defined."

The hon. gentleman says that is not to be the test; yet that is the law as stated by the very author from which he quotes, and in a foot note the very case of the Queen vs. McNaughten, to which he referred, is cited. Therefore the hon. gentleman, I will not say did know, but I say ought to have known, when he was reading law from one page, that that was the American law, and he was bound to say whether that was the law of the land or not. It says further :

"Did the defendant know enough to distinguish right from wrong as to the particular case? If so, the defence of insanity is not made out. If not, he is to be acquitted. In England, this rule continues to be laid down, in cases which will be hereafter fully discussed with inexorable rigor; and such is the unanimity with which it is uttered that there is no probability of its being changed except by Act of Parliament."

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman must have known that; I will not say he was so ignorant as a professional man as not to have known it; I will not so underrate him as a lawyer, even though he may be a fifth rate lawyer, as to say that he was not aware that such was the law of the land. Now, Sir, let me go a little further. I am sorry to be obliged to give the case so much importance; but we have been called upon to pass our judgment upon it, and the people have been so misinformed that it is necessary that they should know what the law is and how it applies to a particular case. Now, let me point out what Mr. Stephen says in Blackstone's Commentaries :

"The judges on a late occasion, however, gave it as their opinion that if a man who takes another's life appears to have known at the time that he was acting contrary to law, his being under an insane delusion that he was thereby redressing some supposed grievance or producing some public benefit, will not exempt him from the guilt of murder; neither will he be exempted by being under an insane delusion as to facts; provided that the supposed facts, if real, would not have justified the act; but that, on the other hand, he will be exempted by such delusion as last mentioned where the facts, if real, would have justified the act."

That is the law as laid down in Blackstone's Commentaries, page 103, Stephen's edition. Hon. gentlemen will see from those two authorities that the hon. member is entirely mistaken, and made a quotation which, to my mind, is not creditable to a lawyer. What were the questions asked by the House of Lords? When I cite the question asked and the answer given, every hon. member of this House, every tyro in the profession, every student at the Bar, will tell you there never was a case so like the case before us as the McNaughten case. Well, in the McNaughten case the man was acquitted—

Mr. LANGELIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. RYKERT,—but the House of Lords held he was wrongly acquitted. Take the decision, and see what it says. I will quote the question, then the answer, and, perhaps, the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) will not turn up his nose so indignantly. Of course, as he is the leader of the Canadian Bar, I feel some delicacy in arguing law points with him. I know that in Chancery cases he thoroughly understands the law, and I must there give place to him, but I submit that in questions of criminal law there are others who have knowledge at least equal to his. On questions of Chancery law, trusts and that sort of thing, no doubt, however, the hon. gentleman has a thoroughly well-balanced mind and is fully developed. I find at page 105 of Bennett's Leading Cases, second edition, this language used :

"The same test of legal responsibility was deliberately pronounced by the judges of England, after great and anxious deliberation, upon questions put to them by the House of Lords, after the trial of McNaughten, 10 Clarke and Finely, 200, one of the most striking cases of insanity on record. The first question was: What is the law respecting alleged crimes committed by persons affected with insane delusion, in respect to one or more particular subjects or persons; as, for instance, where at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, the accused knew he was acting contrary to law, but did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some supposed public benefit?"

Could there be a stronger case than that?—a case parallel in every respect to the one we are considering. To use the vulgar expression some hon. gentlemen at the bar use, it is "on all fours" with the case before us.

"To which the judges answered, assuming that such enquiries are confined to those persons who labor under such partial delusions only, and are not in other respects insane, we are of opinion, that notwithstanding the party accused did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some public benefit, he is nevertheless punishable, according to the nature of the crime committed, if he knew at the time of committing such crime, that he was acting contrary to law, which expression we understand to mean the law of the land."

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. RYKERT. When the House adjourned, I was endeavoring to show that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) had misquoted the law in reference to the question of insanity. I pointed out the fact that he made his quotation from a certain American writer, who had distinctly declared that the law as he laid it down was not applicable to England, that it had not been recognised by the laws of England for a great many years, and had not been recognised by the States of New York and Massachusetts. The hon. gentleman simply quoted an opinion that amounted to nothing, and that, too, in the face of the fact that the learned judges of Manitoba had pointed out the grounds on which they decided the question of insanity against the prisoner. The hon. gentleman relied on the McNaughten case, which is familiar to every professional man in the House, but the hon. gentleman is entirely at variance with the opinions expressed by those learned judges. Justice Taylor, on the trial before the court, stated the law on the subject which I quoted, and gave his opinion :

"This has, I believe, ever since it was laid down, been regarded as a sound rule of law on the subject"

Chief Justice Wallbridge, a gentleman whom, I have not the least doubt, the Reform party recognise as a prominent lawyer, and whose ability is well known throughout the land, said :

"In my opinion, the evidence against his insanity very greatly preponderates. Besides, it is not every degree of insanity or mania that will justify his being acquitted on that ground. The rule in that respect is most satisfactorily laid down in the McNaughten case, 10 Cl. & Fin. 200."

I find it also laid down, in the case of the Queen against Barker, 3 Cox, C.C. 275, by Baron Parker, who is recognised by all authorities as one of the ablest judges that sat on the Bench in England :

"There is but one question for the jury's consideration, viz., whether, at the time the prisoner inflicted the wounds which caused the death of his wife, he was in a state of mind to be responsible for the murder. That would depend upon the question whether he, at the time, knew the nature and character of the deed he was committing, and, if so, whether he knew he was doing wrong in so acting."

That sets at defiance the law as stated by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron). Then we have still further the opinion of that learned judge :

"This mode of dealing with the defence of insanity had not, he was aware, the concurrence of medical men: but he must nevertheless, express his concurrence with Baron Rolfe's views of such cases, that learned judge having expressed his opinion to be, that the excuse of an irresistible impulse, co-existing with the full possession of necessary powers, might be urged in justification in every crime known to the law; for every man might be said, and said truly, not to concur in any crime except under influence of some irresistible impulse."

With that the hon. member for West Huron does not agree. Then, in the case of the Queen against Layton, 4 Cox, C. C., 149, tried before Baron Rolfe, in 1848, where a boy of 12 years of age was convicted of poisoning his grandfather, under circumstances showing great contrivance and deliberation, the defence set up was that the act was done under an irresistible impulse which amounted to insanity. The jury were told by Baron Rolfe:

"The witnesses called for the defence described the prisoner as acting from uncontrollable impulse; and they made other statements of the value of which it would be for the jury to decide; but he must say that it was his opinion that such evidence ought to be scanned by juries with great jealousy and suspicion, because it might tend to perfect justification of every crime that was committed. What was the meaning of not being able to resist moral influence?"

"Every crime was committed under an influence of such a description, and the object of the law was to compel persons to control these influences; and if it was made an excuse for persons who had committed a crime, that he had been goaded to it by some impulse, which some medical men might choose to say he could not control, he must observe that such a doctrine would be fraught with very great danger to society."

Now, Mr. Speaker, this budding Blackstone on the other side of the House does not agree with that. He takes issue on that question also, and he also takes issue with Mr. Justice Taylor, one of the most eminent judges in the Province of Manitoba, in his judgment in which he discusses the question fully, as will be found on page 189 of the case which has been laid before the House. He says:

"After a critical examination of the evidence, I find it impossible to come to any other conclusion than that at which the jury arrived. The appellant is, beyond all doubt, a man of inordinate vanity, excitable, irritable, and impatient of contradiction. He seems to have at times acted in an extraordinary manner; to have said many strange things, and to have entertained, or at least professed to entertain, absurd views on religious and political subjects. But it all stops far short of establishing such unsoundness of mind as would render him irresponsible, not accountable for his actions. His course of conduct indeed shows, in many ways, that the whole of his apparently extraordinary conduct, his claims to divine inspiration, and the prophetic character, was only part of a cunningly devised scheme to gain, and hold, influence and power over the simple-minded people around him, and to secure personal immunity in the event of his ever being called to account for his actions. He seems to have had in view, while professing to champion the interests of the Metis, the securing of pecuniary advantage for himself."

That is the opinion of Mr. Justice Taylor, and that is at variance with the learned gentlemen on the other side of the House. It appears that all these gentlemen, the member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault), the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), and the member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), set up their opinions against that of the learned judge. But there were other judges who gave their opinion also. Mr. Justice Killam, a gentleman who is very well known, a gentleman who was a distinguished member of the Reform party, who was placed upon the Bench in Manitoba, was called upon to give his opinion at the same time, and his views are consistent with the laws of the land, consistent with common sense, and consistent with the views laid down in the celebrated McNaughten case, and his opinion shows that the views of hon. gentlemen on the other side are entirely at variance with the law of the land, as laid down in England, and as laid down in this country at the present day. Mr. Justice Killam says:

"The argument for the insanity of the prisoner is based to a certain extent on the idea that he was in such a state of mind that he did not know that the acts he was committing were wrong; that he fancied himself inspired of Heaven, and acting under the direction of Heaven, and in a holy cause. It would be exceedingly dangerous to admit the validity of such an argument for adjudging an accused person insane, particularly where the offence charged is of such a nature as that of which this prisoner is convicted. A man who leads an armed insurrection does so from a desire for murder, rapine, robbery, or for personal gain or advantage of some kind, or he does so in the belief that he has a righteous cause, grievances which he is entitled to take up arms to have redressed. In the latter case, if sincere, he believes it to be right to do so, that the law of God permits, nay, even calls upon him, to do so, and to adjudge a man insane on that ground, would be to open the door to an acquittal in every case in which a man with an honest belief in his wrongs, and that they were sufficiently grievous to warrant any means to secure their redress, should take up arms against the constituted authorities of the land. His action was exceedingly rash and foolhardy, but he reasoned that he could achieve a sufficient success to extort something from the Government, whether for himself or his followers. His actions were based on reason and not on insane delusion."

That is the opinion of these eminent judges. Now, we are told, and very coolly told indeed by the member for West Huron, that, if there had been any doubt at all about the insanity of the prisoner, he should have had the benefit of that doubt. That is entirely at variance with the law in a case of insanity. The Crown is bound to prove beyond all reasonable doubt that the offence was committed, but, when the prisoner sets up the defence of insanity, he is bound to prove that defence. The Crown is on its defence and the prisoner has to make the proof. It is the exact reverse of the case where the question of the guilt of the prisoner is in doubt and he receives the benefit of the doubt. To prove that I am right on this point, I will quote the Queen against Stokes, 3 C. and K., 188. Baron Rolfe says:

"If the prisoner rests to excuse himself upon the plea of insanity, it is for him to make it clear that he was insane at the time of committing the offence charged. The onus rests on him, and the jury must be satisfied that he was actually insane. If the matter be left in doubt it will be their duty to convict."

What does the member for West Huron say? He takes issue with Baron Rolfe. I do not wonder at that; he takes issue with all these judges. This aping Blackstone appears to be at variance with all the judges of modern days. Now listen to the arrant nonsense, listen to what the hon. gentleman stated in this House a few nights ago. Was anything so preposterous and so absurd ever heard on the floor of Parliament? Why, if a fifteenth-rate lawyer ever made such an assertion in a court of justice, he would be turned out of court.

"In view of what I believe to be clearly established—the insanity of Louis Riel; or taking the lowest possible view of it, in view of the fact that his sanity was in doubt, and the disregard of this Government of the plainest principles of common justice to give every person the benefit of the doubt."

Now, the courts have held differently. The doubt must not be given in favor of the prisoner in a case of insanity. I find, in the case of the Queen against Higginson, 1 C. & K., 130, Chief Justice Tindal said:

"The question, therefore, is not whether the prisoner is of sound mind, but whether he has made out to the satisfaction of the jury that he was of unsound mind."

The hon. gentleman, I suppose, will not agree to that. The hon. gentleman cites cases which are not at all parallel, which are not of the same character as the one we have now before us. I have quoted to this House the opinions of learned judges, and they are entirely to the effect that Louis Riel was not insane, and that on a fair and impartial trial he was properly and fairly convicted. But, in our own country, let us quote from those authorities that I was obliged to quote from before recess; let us call into court those witnesses for whose characters I have very little to say, but who have great weight when they are quoted by members on the Opposition side—I refer particularly to the utterances of the Globe newspaper. On 6th July, 1885, the Globe said:

"If, as some say, he is insane, there is much method in his madness. A better defence than he has fully outlined it would be impossible for his lawyer to make."

On 25th July, 1885, is another article on the same subject, the Globe said:

"Altogether this document (Riel's diary) is an interesting one. It will, we repeat, give no aid or comfort to those who build up the hopes of the writer's release on the insanity plea, very much the reverse. If all who are mentally astray, only as far as these jottings indicate that Riel is, were shut up in one asylum, we should have to increase the capacity of these institutions very considerably."

So it goes to show, according to the opinion of the Globe newspaper, the recognised organ of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), that if all parties should entertain the same views of right and wrong which Louis Riel did, we would not have room to accommodate them in our asylums. On August 4th, the same organ tries to prove that he was not insane, in these words :

"Sir John's organ says that the Crown is bound to act upon the verdict unless the felon's insanity is established to its satisfaction. It is right in saying that no one would care to see a madman hanged, even for so monstrous a crime, but it will be exceedingly difficult for the Government to decide that the evidence of his insanity, which the jury deemed insufficient, should be held sufficient, and it must be difficult to add materially to the evidence on that point submitted to the jury."

So that for once the Globe coincided with the Mail, which declared that the Government could not review the finding of the jury upon the question of insanity. Moreover, we have the distinguished opinion of no less a gentleman than the hon. member for Bothwell, in which he showed that the duty of the Government was simply Ministerial, and that the Government had no right whatever to express their opinion on the evidence at all. Now, we have the same organ again declaring on 22nd October, 1885 :

As to the prisoner's guilt of the highest crime that can be laid to a man's charge there has been no shadow of doubt since his letter to Poundmaker was produced. Nor as to his sanity has there been any doubt since the jury having heard the experts evidence, decided that Riel was responsible.

And on the same day, 22nd October, it says again :

"We must say that the view taken by the chief organ (The Mail) as to the impossibility of re-opening the question of Riel's sanity after the jury pronounced upon it is quite sound."

What does the hon. member for Rouville think of that ? What do the hon. members for Bellechasse, Hochelaga and Quebec East think of that ? Why, Mr. Speaker, they have been arguing against that from the beginning to the end, and yet there is their own organ—well, I must take that back, not the organ of my hon. friends on the opposite side, but the organ of the hon. member for Quebec East. I will not afflict this organ upon those hon. gentlemen for I am satisfied they will repudiate it. The Mail said :

"As it is not the province of the Executive to review the findings of juries in question of fact, unless new evidence has in the meantime come to light, and it is not pretended that such a thing has happened here, it follows that the verdict cannot be challenged on the ground of the prisoner's insanity."

In which the Globe entirely concurred. And yet our friends from Lower Canada, who take this strong ground upon the plea of insanity, do not recognise the importance of that statement. Now, I will once more call into the witness box the hon. member for Bothwell, though he has got angry several times to-day, and has thrown very hard names across the floor at me. On 14th August his paper contained this language :

"When Riel's counsel put forward the plea of insanity they practically admitted that there was no other defence. Other defence, in truth, there was none. But the plea of insanity was desperate. No man would commit a crime if he were wise or had a well-balanced mind; and it seems that Riel was a victim of that extravagant egotism which, apart from disease or lesion of the brain, is perhaps the most common source of madness. But to those who knew him best he was so far from appearing insane that they sent for him expressly to lead them in a most difficult and dangerous enterprise, placed themselves under his guidance, and apparently trusted and obeyed him to the end."

That is the opinion of that renowned lawyer, the member for Bothwell. Now, I think I have shown to the satisfaction of the House that the opinion of learned judges in this country and England run in the direction that Riel was properly convicted. We have the records of the Privy Council, the records of the court in Manitoba, all declaring that he had a fair trial, at a time when he put forth all his evidence on the plea of insanity, and upon that evidence the jury found him guilty. Unless the hon. member for Bellechasse and the hon. member for Rouville can prove that he became insane between the time of the sentence and the time of execution, and that the Government knowing that fact, refused to issue a commission to examine him, their case entirely fails. Then we are told that his sentence should have been commuted. The hon. member for West Huron quoted a number of cases in which he says that the sentences were commuted, but in no one of the cases he quoted were the circumstances similar, and they have no relevancy to the case of Riel. Now, Sir, this resolution calls upon the House to censure the Government because it allowed the execution to take place. That is a debateable point as regards the prerogative of the Crown, and it is not wise or expedient, nor is it usual in Parliament, to pass judgment upon acts of the Crown where it is purely a question of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. I am borne out in my observation by the hon. member for West Durham, before he became fully aware of the bargain and sale between the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) and some of his Bleu friends in Lower Canada. He made a speech in London, wherein he laid down very broadly the grounds which should be taken by the Minister of Justice. He said :

"As Minister of Justice I have had to advise in many capital cases, and I do not forget the heavy responsibility which rests on those in whose hands are the issues of life and death, and whose task is rendered all the more difficult by reason of the large measure of discretion vested in them, and expressed in the word clemency. I know how much these difficulties are enhanced by heated partisan and popular discussion, in which distorted views and an imperfect appreciation of facts are likely to prevail. I have been falsely and wantonly accused of selling the prerogative for personal and for political gain. I deprecated then, as I would deprecate now, such attacks on Ministers unless made with good and sufficient reason. So delicate, in my opinion, is the exercise of this prerogative, that while I have sometimes been unable to reconcile my judgment to that of the present Ministers, I have felt it, on the whole, the lesser evil to be silent than to raise a debate, and I can easily conceive, in fact I have known of cases in which, though I might differ from the conclusion of the Ministers, I should yet refuse to censure them for honestly taking a line which I would not follow."

Those are patriotic and statesmanlike sentiments. The hon. gentleman takes the view that upon a question of the exercise of clemency, a matter coming purely within the knowledge of Ministers, they do not deserve censure except upon the most extraordinary occasions. Then, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rouville cites cases from Sir William Harcourt's speeches :

"There was the case of the difficulty, however, where the jury recommended mercy, and the judge did not second the recommendation, and in that case it remained for the Secretary of State to form his own judgment on the subject."

His argument was that where the prisoner was recommended to mercy, the executive should exercise clemency towards the prisoner. But he shows cases where it should not be done. Now, then, what does the hon. member for Rouville say :

"He should have called men of experience, alienists, who could make a report which would commend itself to public opinion and would leave no doubt as to the sanity or insanity of Riel."

Now, Sir, who asked for this pardon ? What evidence was there presented to this House that Riel was insane, or that there were grounds for believing him to be so ? It is true, that the Government, at the request of gentlemen from the Lower Province, did have a certain commission issued, and what was the result of that commission ? That commission confirmed and corroborated the finding of the jury and stated what the court themselves had recognised. Now, Sir, it is a well known principle of law that pardons should not be granted unless they are to be beneficial to the State. That is laid down in Chitty's Criminal Law, page 791, in the case of pardons :

"With respect to those cases where favorable circumstances may induce the Crown to extend its prerogative of remission no general rules can, of course, be given. The King, by his coronation oath, is bound to administer justice with mercy. But nothing can tend more to unsettle the public ideas of crime than the frequent exercise of the latter. It is contended with great eloquence and ability by a celebrated writer on merinal law, that clemency should shine forth in the laws, and not in the Executive. But it must be admitted that there are many cases to which no general rules can apply, where summum jus would be summa injuria; and where forgiveness is at once beneficial to the Crown which bestows, and just to the party who receives it."

That is the rule laid down by learned writers in England, whose writings are recognised as law in this country. Notwithstanding all that has been said about this man, what do those who knew Riel best, who knew the state of the country in which he was operating, say? The representatives of the North West Council unanimously passed a resolution to the following effect:

"Whereas public meetings have been held in certain portions of the Dominion at which it was sought to condemn the Dominion Government for allowing the sentence of the court to be carried into effect in the case of Louis Riel, who had stirred up rebellion among the half-breeds and Indians in these Territories, and who, after a fair and impartial trial by a competent tribunal was convicted of high treason;

"And whereas the peace, progress and prosperity of these Territories would have been jeopardised and a feeling of insecurity would have been caused among the settlers had the man twice guilty of rebellion, and who had not shrunk from the terrible responsibility of exciting the half-breeds and Indians to armed insurrection been permitted to escape the just penalty of his misdeeds;

"And whereas a fair, firm and impartial administration of the law must be had if the laws of our country are to be respected by all classes irrespective of nationality;

"This Council desires to place on record its endorsement of the action of the Dominion Government in allowing the sentence of the court on Louis Riel to be carried into effect."

I have dealt with that branch of the subject, and now I come to one which I would rather have avoided, but I feel the responsibility of discussing it because the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has dealt with it in a manner totally unjustifiable and has dragged the discussion into the House where no such discussion was necessary. He has seen fit to allude to the position of the Orangemen of Canada. I do not hesitate to declare that I am an Orangeman, and as such I believe in the principles of the order in which toleration and moderation are guiding principles. The hon. member for West Huron said:

"In England they do not hang lunatics, but the Canadian prisoner, although beyond doubt a lunatic, was executed by this humane Government, not in obedience to the law, not to vindicate the majesty of the law, but in obedience to an unseen and irresistible power behind the throne."

He pointed to the fact that ten lodges out of two thousand have given some expressions of opinion on this question; but he might have gone further. He might have said that eight out of those ten lodges were Grit lodges. It is a notorious fact throughout Ontario that those Grit Orangemen have been endeavoring to control the order, that they have been endeavoring to do so for years. Grits or Reformers as they are sometimes called, have been zealously and insidiously themselves working into the Orange order, and whenever they could create trouble they have done so, as is evidenced by the fact that eight out of those ten lodges were Grit lodges, and they placed on record their views on the Riel question. I should like to know who it was that cast this firebrand into Parliament; who it was that cast the firebrand on other occasions into other Parliaments; who it was that proposed to cast a firebrand throughout the Dominion, raising the Catholics against the Protestants and Orangemen against Catholics? The Grit party; and we all know that fact. Let the Orangemen be true to their obligations. If he is so he must be liberal towards his fellow countrymen and towards all religious bodies. I have here the constitution of the order.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is that the Grit or Tory order?

Mr. RYKERT. When the hon. gentleman goes back to his constituency he will find out what it is.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I should like to meet you there.

Mr. RYKERT.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What about timber limits?

Mr. RYKERT. We know something about those timber limits; about 200 square miles extending all over the Dominion; and that grant was made upon the eve of the Government being kicked out of office.

Mr. COOK. That is false.

Mr. RYKERT. I will read the declarations on page 4 of the constitution of the Orange order:

"Disclaiming an intolerant spirit, the association demands as an indispensable qualification, without which the greatest and wealthiest may seek admission in vain, that the candidate shall be deemed incapable of persecuting or injuring anyone on account of his religious opinions, the duty of every Orangeman being to aid and defend all loyal subjects, of every religious persuasion, in the enjoyment of their constitutional rights."

That is a portion of the constitution. Can it be wondered at that the Orangemen of Canada were incensed on this question? Is it not fresh in the recollection of the House and the country that inflammatory speeches, some of them were quoted by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) were made by the hon. member of West Durham (Mr. Blake) in which most inflammatory and violent language was used? That speech was sent out broadcast throughout the Orange lodges of Canada. Every Orangeman had one put in his hands, and were told that the Conservative party were those who opposed the resolution in regard to the murder of Thomas Scott. The hon. gentleman inflamed the public mind, and if he sees the result of that speech he, at least, cannot complain. Is it to be wondered at that Orangemen are incensed in the Province of Quebec? I came across a little French work entitled: "Letellier de St Just and his time," by C. B. Casgrain, M.P., and a Rouge. In that I find some inflammatory language in regard to the murder of Thomas Scott. And can it be wondered at that in the face of all these declarations the Orangemen of Lower Canada are incensed? At page 146 I find this language:

"In the interval, the 4th March, Riel, either to disembarass himself of an inconvenient prisoner who threatened him, or to show an example of his authority, or through fear for his own person, brought Thomas Scott summarily before a pretended court martial, and some hours after caused him to be shot by a platoon of soldiers, commanded by Captain Lepine. The execution, stupidly directed, was brutal, and the groans of the unfortunate victim were heard from under the lid of his coffin, when it was raised to give him the coup de grace. The body, refused to the parents, disappeared during the night, and no one has ever yet been able to discover what became of it."

That is a statement published by the member for L'Islet. Does it show a conciliatory spirit towards those who differ from him? We find also the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in his endeavors to catch the Orange vote in Ontario and thereby upset the Government of the Hon. John Sandfield Macdonald, moved a resolution in this language:

"1. That the cold-blooded murder, for his outspoken loyalty to the Queen, of Thomas Scott, lately a resident of this Province, and an emigrant thence to the North-West, has impressed this House with a deep feeling of sorrow and indignation, and, in the opinion of this House, every effort should be made to bring to trial the perpetrators of this great crime, who, as yet, go unwhipt of justice."

And, Sir, look at the rallying cry of the hon. gentleman and his party for vengeance, we find that it was given in his speech:

"The victim died because he was a loyal man; he died because he would not aid rebels; he died because he resisted rebellion—he died in fact for loyalty to Queen and country. Let his country write his epitaph in the records of her assembly, and express a people's sorrow for his untimely death, and a people's stern resolve that that death shall be avenged."

That was the appeal which he made to the Province of Ontario in 1871 over and over again. In answer to that, what have the Orangemen of Canada done to deserve the new outburst, the change of front? At a meeting of the Grand Lodge held this summer, they did not cry for revenge like the Grit party who showed their eager desire for the blood of Riel, their desire to have him hanged no matter what the consequences might be. The resolution passed by the Grand lodge was read by the hon. member for West York, but it will bear to be repeated, because it will exhibit the tolerance of Orangemen notwithstanding the efforts that were made to inflame them by firebrands like the hon. member for West Durham. This is the resolution:

"Resolved, that this Grand Lodge, in annual session assembled, takes this, the earliest opportunity afforded, to express its admiration of the loyal, patriotic spirit displayed by the members of the volunteer force, shown as well by the alacrity with which they responded to the call to arms as by the bravery displayed on the field of battle and the hardships endured without a murmur; it expresses its deepest sympathy with the relatives of those who have fallen in the fight or whose lives have been sacrificed by the insurrection in the North-West, as well as with those who are now suffering from wounds received in action; it expresses the hope that the arch-rebel Riel will be captured. That the rebellion will be speedily suppressed, and that such steps will be taken by the proper authority as will avenge the foul murders already committed and preclude the possibility of their recurrence."

Is that language as strong as I have read this afternoon? Nothing like it, Sir. It is rather amusing to hear these hon. gentlemen discuss this question. Why, Sir, they have forgotten the history of the past. Have these Reform members forgotten the history of this Parliament and of the old Parliament of Canada? There was a time when they made strong appeals to the Orangemen. In 1857 we found the following in the Globe newspaper, and I read it in order to show that one day they are patting the Orangemen on the back, and the next day they are patting the Catholics on the back—that one day they are appealing to the Orangemen to destroy the Catholics, and the next day appealing to the Catholics to destroy the Orangemen:

"Go to the polls at once. Orangemen, don't surrender! We are glad to see, that in spite of the efforts of some of their officials, who have sold themselves to the Ministry, a large number of the Orangemen of Upper Canada stand firmly by their Protestant principles in the present contest with the minion of the Pope."

A short time before that the Grit organ proposed to shake up the Orangemen and Catholics in one bag. The Globe said:

"We are not content to wait for that time in order to do something to stem the Popish tide that threatens to sweep everything before it in Canada. It is not necessary that we should obtain a greater accession of forces to drive off the black petticoated gentlemen who invade our territory. If we throw off dishonest Liberals on the one side, who are ready to sell themselves to Popery for a pittance, and the High Church Puseyites and recreant Orangemen on the other, who grant all the demands of the Hierarchy, there would be an end to political Romanism in Canada."

Then a long and powerful appeal is made to the Orangemen to put down the Roman Catholics of this Dominion. We find that the Globe also said:

"In another part of this morning's paper (the Globe) will be found an address to Mr. George Brown inviting him to be a candidate for the representation of the city. It bears the signatures of the Grand Secretary and several hundreds of the most respectable and influential members of the Orange Association. We confess that this is a most gratifying fact. No question the present Government and their supporters have sold their party, their principles and the country to the 'Romish priests,' for the base consideration of obtaining office. It is they, that have attempted to destroy our noble school system at the bidding of the Romish hierarchy. It is they that have sought to over-run Upper Canada with nunneries and monkeries."

That is the opinion expressed by these gentlemen upon that matter some time ago. But all at once we find them still more enamored of the Orange Association. An application made to this Parliament to incorporate the Orange Association was voted down by a considerable majority, and the Roman Catholics got their share of abuse for voting in that direction. The Globe said:

"The fact is undoubted, we believe, that the members of the present Ministry have refused to support or permit the introduction of a Bill to incorporate the Orange Association though frequently demanded by the people. The Orange Society is as well entitled to an Act of incorporation as the Oddfellows or Freemasons, the Bible, or Tract, or French Mission Societies, and certainly as well as the hundred varieties of monks and nuns. We know the reason why the Government would not grant it, however, it was because the Papists would not let them. They dare not incur the wrath of Thomas D'Arcy McGee."

Well, in the old Parliament of Canada I had the honor to hold a seat.

An hon. MEMBER. Which party did you belong to then?

Mr. RYKERT. I did not hear the remark of the hon. gentleman, but I do not suppose I lost very much. In the year 1863 an attempt was made to pass a law relating to separate schools. That Bill was introduced by R. W. Scott, now a member of the Senate. He was a strong Roman Catholic as every person knows. He placed the Bill before the House and he showed that they were asking simply the same privileges which were enjoyed by the Protestants of Lower Canada; every Orangeman in that House, to their credit be it said, voted in favor of the Bill. But their reward was meted out to them, and I, in common with the others, had to bear the infliction, and I was compelled to retire in the face of the contest, because Orangemen and bigoted Protestants were inflamed against me, because, in the exercise of my obligations as an Orangeman, I was in favor of granting to my Roman Catholic friends in Upper Canada the same rights which we enjoyed in Lower Canada. The Globe abused the supporters of that measure in this language:

"The facts show how little Upper Canada need hope for in this question from the supporters of the Ministry, and there is pressing need for the exercise of a wholesome public opinion at next election. The Grand Master of all the Orangemen, as usual, voted for the Bill. When will the absurd farce of professing Protestantism, giving its aid to the machinations of the Romish hierarchy come to an end?"

And it gives the following list of those who voted for the Bill:

We were condemned in unmeasured terms, and that is not all. We found that the Grit press throughout the country condemned the Orangemen because they desired and felt it to be their duty to grant to their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen the same rights which they enjoyed themselves. I find a choice article on the subject of the Orange and the Bleu in the Hamilton Times of 24th November, 1885:

"The combination of the Orange and Bleu piled on the taxes and divided the spoils, wherever the Bleus showed signs of revolt Sir John raised the reward for their allegiance. The railway grants and the virtual assumption of a part of Quebec Provincial debt are recent illustrations of this method."

I wonder how our Bleu friends from Lower Canada, who on this matter are at variance with the Government, feel on this question. Now, I propose to show who is to blame for this rebellion as indicated by the Globe newspaper, and I think our friends from Lower Canada will be highly flattered when I read the compliments paid to them by that paper:

"If Le Monde, which is said to be the property of Sir Hector Langevin and the other Bleu journals of Quebec had then seconded our efforts, this rebellion would have been prevented; unhappily they thought more of their party than they did of the Metis or of the country, and they now share with Sir John the responsibility of all that has taken place."

Here is another quotation from the Globe of 18th September, 1885:

"English papers in general have not suggested that Riel should not be hanged, but it took a very small amount of 'second sight,' but of ordinary intelligence, to foresee that he would not. Sir John knew better than to offend his masters, especially masters who knew of so many of his discreditable secrets, and to whom he has yielded so often before the first bell rang, to say nothing of the second."

Well, Sir, in order that these gentlemen may see exactly what they may expect from the Grit party, I propose to show them a few opinions which the organs of that party have expressed with reference to them. A few days before the execution of Riel, a celebrated Ontario Grit journal made use of this language:

"It is the only way (hanging Riel in effigy) that Riel will be hanged by the present Government, who are sold body and bones to the French Canadians."

The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), also joins in condemning the Bleus. He had not much love for them, but now his arms are open for them. I should like to know how they would feel in the arms of those gentlemen—how they would like to be embraced by the hon. member for Bothwell and the hon. member for West Huron. On the 18th of November, 1885, the paper of the hon. member for Bothwell said :

"Here are the names of the fourteen Bleus who denounce the Government for sentencing Riel to death. These men are themselves largely responsible for that condition of things which gave rise to the North-West insurrection. They defended the Government; they resisted criticism."

Thus you find the Globe newspaper, and other organs of the Grit party, blaming the Bleu party of the Province of Quebec for the insurrection. I think our friends, who are not in accord with us for the time being, will feel, when they come to hear the record of their new allies, that they are in bad company; and I doubt not that before this debate closes, these gentlemen will find that they have made a mistake, and will come back to their former love. It is well known that the chief plank in the platform of the Reform party has been, "Down with French domination." When the great Reform convention met in Toronto in 1859, at which 570 noble Reformers were present—no doubt the hon. member for South Grey was among them—

Mr. LANDERKIN. I was not born then.

Mr. RYKERT. It is unfortunate for the country, I think, that you ever were. I find that that deliberate body of 570 of the yeomanry of Ontario laid down a platform for the guidance of the Reform party, the fundamental principles of which was, "Down with the Lower Canadians." I want to trace this thing down to the present time, and let these gentlemen, the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) particularly, see where they are going to land themselves. Here are the resolutions passed by that convention:

"Resolved that the existing Legislative Union of Upper and Lower Canada has failed to realise the anticipations of its promoters, has resulted in a heavy public debt, burdensome taxation, great political abuses, and universal dissatisfaction throughout Upper Canada; and it is the matured conviction of this assembly, from the antagonism developed through difference of origin, local interest and other causes, that the Union in its present form can no longer be continued with advantage to the people."

In support of this resolution a manifesto was issued, in which is to be found the following:—

"The Lower Canadians soon put their power to the test. New demands are made, concession follows concession, and the public feeling is outraged by fresh acts of injustice and prodigality."

That is how these men are described who are now going to fall so quietly and calmly into the hands of the Grit party. Again:

"We further allege that it enables Lower Canadian politicians to rule the people of Upper Canada to an extent, and in a manner which no high spirited people ought to tolerate."

And again:

"The option presented to them (members) is: Maintain your principles, claim justice for Upper Canada, and remain powerless in opposition; or forsake your principles, become obedient to Lower Canada and the path of ambition is open to you."

The Grit organ followed this up by saying, on the 17th of May, 1879:

"The representatives of Quebec have no right to rule Ontario and prevent her acquisition of the territory of which she has so long been deprived."

Then, Sir, we have a beautiful description of these gentlemen by the same organ of the 27th of May, 1879:

"We have no doubt that possession of the territory is withheld from Ontario for political reasons, and those of the most cowardly and despicable character. Sir John's 'French tail' cannot endure the prospect of a growth in the Province of Ontario."

Mr. RYKERT.

We find another attack made on these same gentlemen in the same organ on the same day:

"It is not beyond the bounds of possibility that Sir John has sold out the rights of Ontario in order to stop the mouths of the anti-Le tellier faction. It is pretty clear that the last mentioned patriots, who at one time were protesting that no appropriation Bill and no tariff Bill should be passed until the Lieut.-Governor's head was in the basket, were induced by some more or less questionable means to become all at once as gentle as sucking doves. Has Ontario been made to pay the Bill for buying of the Opposition of their doughty Quebecers?"

I am sure these gentlemen will highly appreciate that opinion of them. Coming down to 1882, they are still denounced as the enemies of Ontario, as they are up to the time of the bargain made by the dispenser of gas, the member for West Ontario, (Mr. Edgar) with the Bleus of the Province of Quebec. The Globe of 14th February, 1882, said:

"As a matter of fact the other Provinces were not protesting. We know not what private pressure the Bleus of Quebec, ever the enemies of Ontario and of progress, may have sought to bear on the Premier, knowing themselves to be the right arm of his power, but no public objection has been made, no open, manly protest uttered by any Province in this Dominion."

This paper keeps following it up, and on the 16th of February, 1882, it said:

"The report concerning Ontario boundaries which was published yesterday is very fully accredited to the Hon. J. A. Mousseau, a conspicuous representative of Blue interests in the Ottawa Cabinet. It contains all that the animosity of Mr. Mousseau, aided by the ingenuity of Sir John, can find against the rights of this Province. Sir John wishes to please the Bleus of robbing Ontario for their benefit and then insulting him for the gratification of his own and their spite."

Such is the certificate of character these gentlemen get. Then, we find another organ, the organ of the hon. member for West Huron, the Huron Signal. Speaking out boldly on 29th May, last year, as follows:

"We have seen what has resulted from the rising in arms of a comparatively few uneducated and ignorant half-breeds and Indians, smarting under grievances which are small in comparison with the indignities that Sir John has seen fit to reflect on our Province of Ontario. If the present course of the Dominion Government be persisted in, the sooner Confederation ceases the better it would be for the Provinces. Ontario has nothing to lose and everything to gain by secession. As it is now, she is held by the throat by Sir John, at the back of the French Bleus, and no effort is left untried to lessen his influence."

That is the way the hon. member for Hochelaga, the hon. member for Beauharnois, the hon. member for Bellechasse, the hon. member for Rouville, and others, are described. Now we have had another illustration of the easy conscience of the Grit party in the Province of Quebec. A few days ago we found that a certain gentleman occupying a seat in the Quebec Local House, Mr. Watts, resigned his seat for the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska, on the same ground as that which Mr. Joly took, namely, that he could not recognise the fact that Riel should not be hanged. What do you think happened lately? Why, this very Rouge party in the Province of Quebec actually asked Mr. Watts to become their candidate again, but he respectfully declined their invitation, for he knew quite well where it would lead him. We have some other evidences, which I will read for the gratification of our Quebec friends. The Globe in September, 1885, says:

"From Tories, French and English, inconsistency must be expected, and disregard of principle. The Quebec Tories, while they appear willing to support Sir John Macdonald in everything that effects either the Dominion at large, or any other Province than their own, do insist in all that relates to their Province in their race, the wishes of Quebec shall be respected. It is one of the worst consequences of Sir John Macdonald's unprincipled administration that the people of Quebec are thus trained to regard their interests as in all respects distinct from the interests of the people of the other Provinces and from those of the Dominion at large."

We find also the Globe goes wild over the same question, and speaks of "the unprincipled gang which is supporting Sir John Macdonald." In October, 1885, it said:

"The Globe is not so wholly ignorant of latter-day Toryism as not to know that, whatever is done with Riel, not one of those votes which Sir John Macdonald calls his own will be lost to him. Had Riel's plans for rising the Indians succeeded; had his second rebellion deluged the North-West with blood as at one time seemed possible; had there been 2,000 instead of 200 victims slaughtered; had the whole country been laid desolate, we know enough of the unprincipled gang which supports Sir John Macdonald to know that he would not have lost a vote in Parliament."

The Globe then suddenly sees power looming in the far distance, begins to repent of its intemperate language, drops down on its marrow bones, and, beginning to feel its way cautiously, tries to coax the French Bleus a little, asking them to walk into its parlor. It says:

"To refuse sympathy to our fellow-countrymen in Quebec, to hold that because they wish to punish the Government we will maintain it, would be almost an incredible instance of narrow-minded race prejudice and bigotry."

Then we find another organ, the Port Hope Guide, which, I showed this afternoon, had jumped the fence just about as quick as the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) could if he tried. That organ, bidding for the French vote, in the hope that a certain number of Bleus were going to upset the Government, says:

"It has come to a pretty pass indeed that in the noontide glare of the nineteenth-century political offenders must suffer death if they dare assert their just right. We extend our hearty sympathy to our Quebec brethren, and we assure them in the name of the Liberal party that they have hosts of friends in Ontario who will help them to organise a national party whose platform will be broad enough to hold the Reform members of the English speaking Provinces and our French Canadian friends. God save Canada."

I wish them luck when they go into the arms of those men. As a fair sample of what they may expect from the Globe's party, let me give you, Sir, from the St. Thomas Home Journal, the organ of the hon. member from Elgin (Mr. Casey) and the second or third organ in standing of the Grit party in Ontario, a quotation on 30th April, 1885:

"A Toronto contemporary has organised a crusade against the French in Canada, and advocates the formation of an anti-French society. The objections are not so much to the people themselves as to the perpetuation of their language and customs in this country. With this we agree. We have altogether too much French in Canada for Canada's good. This is an English country in preponderance of numbers, in speech and in sentiment; and it is anomalous, degrading and dangerous for us to longer recognise a foreign language as official. It is anomalous that the people of a portion of one Province should possess the right of speaking in a foreign tongue within the Federal House of Parliament to the detriment and annoyance of six other Provinces. It is degrading that the conquerors should permit the conquered to remain an isolated community, maintaining a language and customs separate and distinct from those of the successful nation, and thus ever prove a danger and a menace to the latter. The solid body of French who inhabit the Province of Quebec is the most dangerous element to the success of Confederation."

What does the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) think of that? The Home Journal again says:

"Increasing at an alarmingly rapid rate, and maintaining the ideas and customs of two hundred years ago, the French Canadians are nothing less than a huge obstruction in the path of Canada's progress. They are a distinct nationality imbedded in the heart of the Dominion, keeping themselves to themselves, utterly devoid of the sentiment of loyalty to Canada, and the progressive ideas common to the rest of the country, and hoping for nothing more eagerly than the re-establishment of a French dominion on this continent. That can never be, and the sooner our French brethren become convinced of the fact the easier it will be for them to swallow the unpalatable dose which sooner or later will be administered to them. The time is coming, and nothing is hastening it more than the conduct of the French themselves, when the English speaking provinces of the Dominion will refuse to longer bend the knee to Quebec, and will assert the right of British North America to be governed as a nation of Anglo-Saxons in speech, sentiment and custom."

Then we find that this paper, like the others, suddenly turns to the right about face, as soon as it was discovered there was some feeling of hostility being excited in Quebec against the Government. The Globe gave the cue to the lesser lights, and this is the way that organ turned its political sommersault:

"The greatest enemies of Ontario have never been the Quebec Bleus, though they have often been so represented (by the Globe). However much the people of Ontario (see Resolution of Reform Convention, 1859) may have thought themselves aggrieved by the unwavering support those Bleus gave Sir John Macdonald, it was never denied that in all their doings they sought the interests of the Province they represented. They felt they were justified in making the demands which they made, and they had a right to presume that if the Premier and his Ontario followers thought this, that, and the other measure so reasonable and right as to support them, there was no particular reason for them to oppose what they knew to be advantageous to their own Province."

We find also the St. Thomas Journal, from which I previously quoted, jumping the fence and turning over to what it supposed to be the side of patronage and power. The Journal thus recants entirely, after the execution, what it held before:

"We would willingly see Mr. Blake at the head of an Administration which depended for its existence upon this fateful French vote. We say put Edward Blake in John A. Macdonald's place, even if it be by the hand of the Frenchman, and give him a chance."

That is the paper which denounced the French a foul execration on Confederation. There is one speech to which I can refer to with some degree of satisfaction, and I think, with benefit to the Province of Quebec, and that is the speech of Senator Girard in the Senate. His remarks will commend themselves to the intelligence of every right-thinking man in the country. He said:

"Certainly, had I acted as my friends in Quebec have done towards the people of Manitoba, I would have been forced to seek a home in some other country. Our friends in Quebec must understand that we do not care to submit to injustice when an injustice exists, any more than they do, and for that reason we desire to protest against the agitation that is brought about, as not being in the interests of the Confederation. It is very painful for me to have to rise in my place and say we do not thank the Province of Quebec for what it has done, and we ask it as a favor to let Manitoba alone."

That is the sentiment of an hon. gentleman who is thoroughly posted on all political matters in the Dominion, who understands the interest and welfare of Manitoba, and has the interest of the whole Dominion at heart, a Frenchman who lives in that section of the country, and who gives good advice. I hope our friends in the Province of Quebec will follow it. I think I have pretty thoroughly reviewed the arguments advanced by hon. gentlemen on the other side. I have endeavored to show that certain of those gentlemen have laid down the law differently from what it really is, and I have endeavored to show how fallacious is the position they have taken on these questions. These people now ask for an appeal to the people. I do not know that it would be refused by anyone on this side of the House. I think we would be rejoiced to have an appeal to the people. We have been twice before challenged to have an appeal, on both occasions that challenge has been accepted by us, and on both occasions the people have returned Sir John Macdonald's Government to power by an overwhelming majority. When an appeal does come, I am certain that the people will know how to choose between the friends of the Dominion, the friends of the Confederation, on the one side, and those on the other side who have shown themselves to be the party of bankruptcy and have so clogged in its working the machinery of Confederation.

Mr. BECHARD. I am not expected, I am sure, to follow the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. He does not come from my Province, and I think it is only an act of courtesy to leave the duty of answering him to some other gentleman coming from the same Province that he comes from. Besides that, the length of the speech, the very numerous quotations from newspapers with which he adorned it, render it impossible for a man, excepting perhaps a distinguished lawyer, as he may be, at least for a layman like myself, to swallow and digest such a dish as fast as it is prepared. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman, in the course of his long remarks, said something which peculiarly attracted my attention. In addressing himself to my hon. friends from Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) and Rouville (Mr. Gigault), he told them that there was a paper in this country which formerly attempted to incite religious fanaticism, to array Protestants against Catholics, and he mentioned the Toronto Globe. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman ought to remember that the proprietor of that perfidious paper, the Globe, was, after having published all these terrible articles, embraced by the present First Minister of this country, that he was taken into the Cabinet as his associate and accepted by the late Sir George Cartier and the present Minister of Public Works. After this, I will leave the hon. gentleman to the reflections and meditations which that unnatural and unholy alliance can inspire. While I was listening the other day to the speech delivered by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, I noticed the cold reserve with which his words were received by his friends from the Province of Quebec. The applause, instead of coming as on former occasions, from all the friends of the Government in this House, came far more from those hon. gentlemen a part of whom are supposed to be the representatives of people who have nothing but sympathy for Riel, and the other part representatives of people who are considered the most bitter enemies of Riel and the half-breeds. Doubtless the hon. gentleman's Quebec friends expected that he was prepared to give stronger reasons and more valuable explanations than those which had been published some time ago by two of his colleagues in vindication of the Government's course in regard to Riel, but, at the close of the hon. gentleman's speech, you could notice the same reserve on the part of his Quebec friends as had been manifested from the beginning. However, the hon. gentleman was not to be discouraged by that quasi desertion of his old friends, and, as if to intimate that he had other friends in the House, he told us he was not representing in the Cabinet only the Province of Quebec but the whole Dominion. It is quite true that the hon. gentleman is Minister of Public Works for the whole Dominion, but it cannot be forgotten that, when Confederation was established, the rule was laid down that the different parts of the Dominion would have respectively a certain number of Ministers in the Cabinet; that Ontario would have five, Quebec four, and the Maritime Provinces four. According to that rule, I hold that, although the hon. gentleman is Minister of Public Works for the whole Dominion, and as such is in duty bound to act with equal fairness to all the Provinces, he represents particularly the Province of Quebec in the Cabinet, and if he has held so long a position in the Government of this country, he is indebted for it to the people of that Province. It is on that ground, and because he is in the Cabinet a representative of the Province of Quebec, that he would have been deeply affected, I am sure, by the quasi desertion of his friends the other day, had it not been only apparent. If anyone ever supposed that the majority of those hon. gentlemen would abandon him on that question completely, he must feel enlightened to-day and free from all illusion in that respect. It is obvious to everyone, after the vote which was taken yesterday in this House, that, although a certain part of those hon. members may be prepared to vote for the motion which is now before the House, although a certain number of them may be prepared to give a vote of censure against the Government for fear of being censured themselves by their electors, there is no doubt that, after that vote, they will next day return to their former allegiance, with the exception of a few, who, I think, mean to be persistent and consistent in the course which they have adopted. The hon. Minister of Public Works, in the course of his remarks, complained that he and his colleagues had been insulted, that the Government's conduct had been assailed in the public press and in public meetings which were held in many parts of the Province of Quebec; that he did not care to vindicate his conduct before the people, but preferred to wait until he could meet these charges and accusations here in Parliament, which he considered the proper tribunal to judge the conduct of Ministers. Sir, although the hon. gentleman chooses Parliament as the most competent tribunal to judge of the conduct of Ministers of the Crown, it will be admitted, I think, that the people are another tribunal who have a good deal to do with these matters. Sir, the people of the country are also a competent tribunal. They are the supreme tribunal, and whilst Parliament may decide one way they may decide another way—they may reverse the decision of Parliament, and they pronounce the final judgment. Sir, one day the hon. gentleman, as well as the rest of us, will have to make his appearance before the high tribunal of the people, and I think I am not mistaken in saying that when that day comes they will let the hon. gentleman understand that when they sent him to Parliament and elected him a Minister of the Crown, it was not with the expectation that he would at one time remain deaf to the solicitations, to the prayers, to the supplications of his friends, of his people, of his Province, for the purpose of securing the allegiance and the influence of the Orange lodges of this country. In another part of his speech, the hon. member informs us as to the practice of the Government in criminal cases, where sentence of capital punishment has been pronounced, and when petitions are sent to the Government asking for a commutation of the sentence. He said that in these cases the Government examined all the facts relating to the case; that they weighed well all the reasons pro and con, and then came to the conclusion which they considered right. Well, Sir, was this practice followed in the case of Riel? Has that rule been followed in all its integrity in the case which occupies the attention of this House? Did the Ministers well consider the facts and reasons which weighed in favor of Riel, as well as those which weighed against him? Did they weigh well all the extenuating circumstances of the case? If they followed that rule, they must have considered a great many facts which pleaded in favor of the unfortunate man. They must have considered the fact that the half-breeds have been for years petitioning the Government for a settlement of their claim. Sir, I hold in my hand a document which I have reason to believe is perfectly authentic, and which contains a large number of instances in which the attention of the Government was drawn to the claims of the half-breeds. I find in it a memorandum from Bishop Taché, urgently and eloquently exposing the grievances of the half-breeds, which document was sent to the Government in January, 1878. I find that a like document was sent in January, 1879, to the Government, by Bishop McLean, of the English Church. I find here that a memorandum upon the same subject, dated 17th December, 1879, was sent to the Government by Colonel Richardson; I find that a letter from Mr. Orde, Indian Agent, was sent to the Government on the 3rd April, 1880. I find the report of a meeting convoked by the Rev. Father André, at Duck Lake, on the 23rd February, 1880. I find a petition sent by Thomas MacKay, dated 10th May, 1880, from Edmonton and Prince Albert, and bearing 102 names; I find a petition to the Governor General from the half-breeds during the summer of 1881, bearing 112 signatures. I find a memorandum from the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West, on the 14th June, 1881. I find, Sir, a telegram—and this is a most important document—sent by the Deputy Minister of the Interior from the North-West to the Government, and stating that steps ought to be taken to prevent a crisis and formidable agitation. I find that energetic resolutions were passed by the North-West Council, bearing date 21st July, 1884, and reasserting the absolute justice of the claims of the half-breeds. I find a letter from the Comptroller of the Mounted Police, dated 3rd December, 1884, asking that dispositions should be taken with the view of increasing the Mounted Police in the District of the Saskatchewan. Sir, these are only a small portion of the documents by which the attention of the Government had been called to this question. Surely if the Government gave due consideration to Riel's case, they must have paid some attention to these documents. The Government must have considered that Riel did not go to the North-West of his own motion, that he was living in the Territory of Montana, where he was working to earn his livelihood, and that of his wife and children. Did they consider the facts that he was solicited, entreated by a delegation of his friends, the half-breeds, to come to the North-West, as they looked upon him as the only man who had sufficient education to obtain redress of their grievances? They must have considered the fact that from several persons in the North-West they had learned of the presence of Riel there, and that the agitation was increasing and might lead to serious consequences. Did the Government consider the fact that the half-breeds have Indian blood in their veins, that they are not so civilised as whites, and, consequently, ought to be treated differently and more leniently? Did the Government consider the fact that the half-breeds did not intend to rebel, as the fact has been already shown to this House by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), a well-known supporter of this Government? Did they consider the fact that the half-breeds did not intend to rebel until their minds had been poisoned by some white settlers in the North-West who made them believe that the last answer they would receive to their petition would be bullets sent by the Government? Surely the Government must have considered the fact that the first shot was not fired by the half-breeds but by the Government Mounted Police; a fact which has been declared by no less person than Archbishop Taché to be a declaration of war. The Government have surely considered the fact that the Royal Commission which they had appointed last spring, after the first blood had been shed, for the purpose of investigating into the claims of the Metis acknowledged as well founded almost all those claims, more than two thousand of them, thus justifying the demands which the half-breeds had been for so many years pressing, but in vain, on the Government. Did the Government consider this other fact, that the late Minister of the Interior had to resign his position, a resignation which was interpreted by the people of the country as a confession and admission of the misconduct of the Government towards the half-breeds? If the Government have considered all these facts, if they have paid due attention to all the circumstances of the Riel case, they must have come to the conclusion that if we had an insurrection last spring in the North-West which cost the lives of brave soldiers and poor half-breeds and to the public treasury millions of money; if the homes of the half-breeds have been destroyed and the settlement scattered; if those people have been left upon the prairie destitute of all resources and in a most distressing condition; if respectable men, heads of families, have been arrested and sent to gaol, and if besides all that Louis Riel died by the hand of the hangman at Regina; that all those misfortunes have been brought upon this country by the Government's bad administration of the affairs of the North-West. We were told by the Minister of Public Works, and by other hon. members who have taken part in this debate, that the Government had to take the verdict of the jury, and that although the jury, after having found Riel guilty of the crime with which he was charged, thought proper to recommend him to the mercy of the Crown, the Government had nothing to do with this recommendation, but were bound to take the verdict of the jury as it was. I confess this is a piece of reasoning which seems to me very peculiar. I can well understand that it might apply to the judge who presided over the tribunal at Regina. I can well understand that, after the verdict had been brought in by the jury, the judge could not modify it; that he had nothing to do with the recommendation for mercy other than to transmit it to the Government, and that the sentence he had to pronounce was prescribed by law; but I think the Government of the country had more latitude in this respect than the judge. The very law organising the court which tried Riel provided that in regard to sentences of death passed upon prisoners, they should not be carried out except upon a special order from the Government. But there is more than that. They had the use of the royal prerogative which stands above the law, and they had before them the humane practice followed in England for a number of years which has been pointed out by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) in the extract quoted from a speech delivered by Sir William Harcourt, in which it is reported that in criminal cases where a sentence of death had been passed against a criminal, and he had been recommended to the mercy of the Crown, the sentence never had been executed. The hon. gentleman and some of his friends pretend that after having set aside the question of the recommendation of the prisoner to the mercy of the Crown, they had only to deal with the question of the insanity of the prisoner. But the Government remained as firm on this as they did upon all the other questions. They appointed a medical commission composed of three gentlemen. I may say at once that the composition of that commission was not satisfactory to the people of Quebec. Sir, although the three gentlemen who composed the commission may be very respectable and honest men, and clever in the exercise of their profession, still they are not specialists; they do not profess to have the special knowledge necessary to make an investigation into mental diseases; one of them had already given his opinion, and it was therefore perfectly idle to put him on that commission. But, Sir, they made their report, and one of them says that although Riel has delusions upon the subject of religion, yet he holds him responsible. Another one says that although Riel has delusions on the subjects of religion and general government, yet he is responsible. The third one says that Riel is responsible on everything except on the subjects of religion and politics. Therefore, we see that those three gentlemen do not perfectly agree in their opinion as to the state of mind of Louis Riel. But, Sir, there was other evidence before them. They had the testimony of Dr. Clark of Toronto, who is a specialist, and who said he could not give a decisive opinion because he had not seen the prisoner for a sufficient time, that he would require a few weeks to have the prisoner under his notice and make a thorough study of his disease, in order to be in a position to give a positive opinion. However, he added that from the testimony he had heard in court, relating to the sayings and actions of Louis Riel, he had no doubt that this unfortunate man had delusions, and that respecting the subjects with regard to which he had delusions he would not hold him responsible. But, Sir, the Government had other evidence and stronger evidence than the evidence of these gentlemen. They had the evidence of Dr. Roy, who is a specialist, and who, for the last fifteen or sixteen years, has been engaged in the treatment of mental diseases in a lunatic asylum. He had had Louis Riel under his care for more than a year and a-half, and therefore had been able to make a study of his mental condition. He had had sufficient time to treat the disease with which Riel was afflicted, and, Sir, he swore that Riel had been a fool, that he had been insane, and from what he had heard of the evidence given by the other witnesses who had been heard in the case, as to the doings and sayings of Louis Riel, and from what he had himself seen of him during the short time he had been at Regina, he swore that he was irresponsible, not only with regard to the particular subjects with regard to which he had delusions, but that he was irresponsible generally. Sir, that is most positive evidence, but it seems to have had no influence with the Government. The Minister of Public Works, in the course of his speech, exclaimed: Had Louis Riel the right to be tried by another tribunal because he had French blood in his veins? I ask has the evidence of Dr. Roy, who was the only specialist sworn in the case, who knew the patient thoroughly, has his evidence been set aside because he has also French blood in his veins and is a French Canadian? But, Sir, it has been alleged that the jury did not find the prisoner insane. I can well understand that, Sir. I can well understand that the jury, though they did not think that the prisoner was insane, yet that they had doubts as to his insanity, and that by reason of those doubts they felt bound in their consciences to recommend him to the mercy of the Crown. I can easily conceive that the jurors were not thoroughly convinced of his insanity, for it requires medical men to understand the peculiar effects of some mental diseases, and it may have appeared strange to them that a man may be insane respecting some peculiar subjects, whilst respecting all others he remains a sensible man. But, Sir, at all events there was enough to put doubts in their minds as to the insanity of Riel. Of course if they had been persuaded that he was insane, their verdict would have been different; but the fact that they recommended him to the mercy of the Crown gives reason for inferring that they were moved to that course by the doubts they entertained as to his sanity. But, Sir, that is not all. The extravagance of language and the extravagant pretension exhibited by Louis Riel were of themselves evidences of his insanity. The very language quoted yesterday by the hon. member for Montreal Centre, that language so offensive to Archbishop Taché, the benefactor and friend of Louis Riel, was proof that the man who used that extravagant language towards his benefactor was nothing but an insane man. The fact that he wanted to divide the territories of the North-West into seven parts, which he intended to give to seven different nationalities; the fact that he expressed the extravagant intention of giving Ontario to the Irish and Quebec to Prussia; that he intended to go to Rome to accomplish there no less a reform than to depose the Pope—all these facts, to any unprejudiced mind, show that they could be nothing but the dream of a lunatic, an insane man. But, Sir, the Minister of Public Works told us that after having considered and well weighed all the reasons which militated in favor of and against Riel, they have found out that they had a duty to fulfil for their Queen and country. I would like to know if Her Majesty the Queen had anything to do with the troubles in the North-West? Does any man believe that the poor half-civilised half-breeds ever thought they were fighting against the authority of the Queen? Sir, these men knew they had rights, and those rights have been acknowledged; they knew they had suffered for many years: they knew they had been threatened to be driven from their homes, which they had been improving for fifteen or twenty years, by white speculators, the friends of this Government; they knew that they had received cruel and brutal treatment at the hands of some of the Government agents in the North-West; they felt after that, having been so long the objects of the Government's neglect they could not obtain justice; and they fought, not against the authority of the Queen, but only to vindicate the rights which they thought were theirs and which had been trampled upon. Ah! Sir, if all the appeals which were made to this Government in favor of mercy had been sent to Her Majesty, and she had been left free to act upon them, independent of interference from the Canadian Government, I have no hesitation in saying that her mind would have soon fully appreciated the extenuating circumstances of the case, and that, finding her mind in accordance with the dictates of her noble heart, she would have pronounced the word "mercy," and Louis Riel would not have ascended the scaffold. The Government had their duty to fulfil to the country, it is said. Is it possible, Sir, that the prosperity and welfare of the country can depend upon the hanging of one man? But, Sir, the Government had for their instruction on that point several examples from other countries, where, in cases of political prisoners, it was not thought necessary to take their lives. The cases of Smith

Mr. BECHARD.

O'Brien, John Mitchell and John Meagher, the leaders of the Young Ireland party of 1846, have been cited by some of my hon. friends who have spoken. After having been condemned to death, the sentence of these men were commuted, and they were sent to Van Dieman's Land, to receive after a few years full amnesty. The case of Cetewayo has also been cited. It is well known that after some time spent in England, he was sent back to his country in Zululand. We have also the case of Arabi Pasha, who, after having been defeated by the British army, was pardoned. He was a rebel against the legally constituted authority of his country. Was he sent to the gallows? No, Sir; he was sent to the Island of Ceylon, where he is to-day living, as we usually say, the life of a Pasha. More than thirty years ago the French army captured the celebrated Arabian chieftain, Abd-el-Kadir, who had on many occasions succeeded in fomenting insurrection in French territory. After many encounters with him the French army captured him, and he was sent to France. Was he condemned to the guillotine? By no means; he was treated with all the respect and honor due to a conquered hero. After some time he was set free, and he lived in France for many years. He had during that time an opportunity to study the character and institutions of the French nation, and afterwards France had no better friend than the brave Arab Chieftain Abd-el-Kadir. The Government had another great example, which has been already quoted, but which cannot be quoted too often, as it forms one of the greatest acts of magnanimity ever witnessed by the world. After the terrible revolution of the Southern States, which began in 1861 and lasted four years, and which cost the United States thousands of millions of dollars and the lives of more than one million of men, the leaders of the rebellion were arrested; but were they sent to the gallows to become the victims of the hangman? No; after a short time they were set at liberty, and I do not hesitate to say that the American Government by that act of generosity and magnanimity did more to quell the passions of the people of the South, and to conciliate and consolidate the whole nation, than they would have done if they had resorted to the avenging arm of the law. These, Sir, are great examples, which should have taught our Government what was the best policy to have followed with regard to political prisoners and even rebel leaders. They show that some of the most civilised governments of the world have come to the conclusion that instead of taking the lives of political prisoners, it is better policy to extend to them the mercy of the nation, and by that means to bind them to future good behavior by a feeling of gratitude. Besides all these great examples, the Government of Canada had before them the numerous petitions, solicitations and applications which were sent to them by the people of the Province of Quebec. The people of that Province are well known to be an honest, peaceful, law-abiding people; they are sensitive and chivalrous in their character, always disposed to sympathise with the weak against the powerful, with the oppressed against the oppressor. Although they were willing that this insurrection should be suppressed, although they encouraged our soldiers when they left their homes to go to the field, yet the people of Quebec, who knew from the beginning that the half-breeds had been ill-treated by the Government and provoked to this rebellion, who knew the brutal treatment they had received at the hands of the Government and some of their agents, were willing that this Government should not hesitate to exercise clemency in their regard. The people of Quebec did not hesitate to send solicitations and prayers to this Government, and innumerable petitions were sent from all parts of the Province praying for clemency; petitions were also sent to the Government by people living outside of the country, by people living in the States, and some came even from old France and England, all asking the same thing. The press, at least the French press of Quebec, was unanimous—both the organs of the Government as well as those of their opponents—in advising the Government to be merciful; a portion of the press of the United States, and of the press of France, and of the English press, joined in advising the Canadian Government to be merciful. They told the Canadian Government that the death of Louis Riel would be considered as a political crime, and would cause him to be regarded as a hero and a political martyr. But all this was of no avail; nothing could move the hearts of the Canadian Ministry, and Louis Riel had to ascend the scaffold of Regina and perish a victim of the hangman. Yesterday the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) told this House that the indignation aroused in Quebec had been excited by the Rouge leaders. Does he not remember—and no man knows better than he—that the night of the very day when the execution took place, indignation meetings were held in the great cities of Montreal, Quebec, and even here, at Ottawa, at the very doors of the First Minister? This movement was spontaneous and soon became general. The people did not wait the suggestions or instigations of the Rouge leaders, and numerous meetings took place in different parts of the Province. Who were heard at those meetings denouncing the Government's conduct? Was it only the Rouge leaders? No; but some of the most distinguished and best friends of the Government as well. Now, with all those petitions, with all those appeals under their eyes, all praying for mercy, how is it that the Government could not come to the conclusion that Riel should be pardoned? The hon. Minister of Public Works (Sir Hector Langevin) told us why. He said the Government had before their eyes the fact that fifteen years ago Riel had been the cause of the death of Thomas Scott, and that he had not been tried for that offence; in other words, the unfortunate Thomas Scott had friends in this country, and Riel had to be sacrificed to their vengeance. Sir, I never, for my part, excused Riel for the death of Scott. When that sad event occurred I happened to occupy a seat in this House, and I did not hesitate to call that odious deed an act of insanity, an unnecessary act. But since I have known Riel more thoroughly than I did then, I am convinced that then, as afterwards, he was an insane man, because there was no necessity in that rebellion to put Scott to death. Scott could have been easily kept in gaol, and there was no reason which made it necessary to sentence him to death. In my view Riel was not excusable, except on the ground that he was then very likely insane, as he was shown to be afterwards. But Riel had already suffered punishment for that crime; and, Sir, according to English law, no British subject ought to be punished twice for the same offence. This man, however, stands to-day as having received a double chastisement for his crime. I could well understand that the First Minister should try to punish him a second time for the death of Scott, for I well remember that when my hon. friend the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), who was leading the Government, introduced the resolutions inflicting upon Riel and Lépine a compulsory absence of five years from the country, the right hon. gentleman, who was then leading the Opposition, laughed at the punishment, and said, in answer to my hon. friend from East York: Your resolutions inflict upon a bloody murderer the punishment that would have been inflicted upon a man who had stolen a sheep. The right hon. gentleman voted against those resolutions on the ground that the punishment they inflicted upon Riel was too light. But, Sir, how can the hon. the Minister of Public Works feel in accord with his leader on that point? It is true the Minister of Public Works was not in the House at the time, but his friends in the Province of Quebec, those who were then and are still his followers, those who act in sympathy and harmony with him, those who share his feelings and of whom he is the leader and the instructor as a politician, all voted against the resolutions on the ground that the punishment was too light? No; but on the ground that it was too severe; they advocated a complete and full amnesty in favor of Riel. Now, after the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec, of whom the Minister of Public Works was and still is the leader, took such a position how can he agree with the leader of the Government in inflicting upon Riel a second punishment for an offence committed fifteen years ago? Sir, there are men sometimes who do not always hold the same opinions with regard to cases which, however, are analogous; and this was very well stated last night by my hon. friend from Megantic (Mr. Langelier) when he pointed out the fact that there were, in this House, hon. gentlemen who, while they were denouncing Riel as a rebel, were full of admiration for those who participated in two great rebellions which formerly took place in England. It is perfectly true that, if Riel had attempted to conquer the North-West and succeeded in establishing a permanent Government in that country, it would have been regarded to-day as a glorious event and he would have been a hero, and have been called by no one a rebel and a traitor. It is equally certain on the other hand that if Oliver Cromwell and the Prince of Orange had not succeeded in their attempts against the legitimate monarchs of England, they would have been treated as traitors and rebels and would have lost their heads on the scaffold. Yet I am sure that there are many gentlemen in this House who admire those great rebels of England, and who do not regard Oliver Cromwell and the Prince of Orange as rebels and traitors, while they consider Louis Riel as a rebel, a traitor and a deserter from his faith, though he is a rebel on a less scale. I cannot sit down without referring briefly to the speech made by my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. Royal). The hon. gentleman, who is known to be a solid friend of the Government, admits that the half-breeds have been neglected by the Government, and such an admission, made on the part of a gentleman who is so strong a follower of the present Government, means a great deal. The hon. gentleman does not blame the agitation which has been for some time taking place in the Province of Quebec. He terms it, very mildly, the exaggeration of a noble feeling, but he would advise that it should not be continued, for it might lead to serious consequences; and, do you know, Mr. Speaker, what are these consequences? The first is, that it might lead to a change of Government. I can well understand that this would be, for my hon. friend, one of the worst consequences to be feared; but, for my part, I do not fear that consequence, and if we are to have it, I think the sooner the better, for the benefit of the country. The other consequence, he says, would be, perhaps, the annihilation of our special institutions in the Province of Quebec. I would ask if my hon. friend has been frightened by the threats of the Toronto Mail and the Winnipeg Siftings. If so, I can tell him that they have frightened no one in the Province of Quebec. We have, in that Province, as my hon. friend perfectly well knows, special institutions, special rights guaranteed to us, and we mean and intend to keep them, to maintain them and to defend them against all assaults, no matter from what quarter they might come; but we have no reason to fear that we shall ever be pushed to that extremity. So far, the hon. gentleman says, we have been well treated by the English majority in this Dominion. That is quite true, but at the same time it is well known that we, the majority in Quebec, treat with generosity the English minority in that Province. So long as we continue to act with that generosity towards our English friends; so long as we content ourselves with defending our rights, and resort to no other means but legal and constitutional means; so long as we never encroach upon the rights of others, I am sure that we will ever be met with the respect and the sympathies of all honest, peaceable citizens, of all fair and good-minded men, and those form the vast majority of the English people of this Dominion. I am sure that the advice of my hon. friend from Provencher, although very charitable and friendly, will not be followed in the Province of Quebec, for, if the theory contained in such advice was to be put into practice, the people might become slaves, and the people of the Province of Quebec will never consent to be slaves in this Dominion. The people would only then have to let governments do as they please, and never hold them responsible for their actions. The people do not think so in the Province of Quebec, as they do not in old Ireland, where for some years they have been agitating for the redress of grievances of a very important and grave character. Both parties in England have been in power within a few years, but no Government ever attempted to arrest the Irish leaders, because those people are making a constitutional agitation; and I am free to say en passant that, although I deplore as deeply as any man the excesses, the outrages, the crimes which have been committed in some parts of that country in the course of that agitation, I could not prevent my heart enlisting its sympathies in favor of that people. I do hope that the present First Minister of England, who is regarded, and justly regarded, as one of the greatest statesmen of the age, I do hope the Grand Old Man, as they call him, will successfully prepare some measure and pass it through Parliament by which he may pacify Ireland in giving satisfaction to her people. I would be too happy if I could expect as much from the Canadian Government towards the poor half-breeds of the North-West.

Mr. LAURIER. Since no one on the other side of the House has the courage to continue this debate, I will do so myself. The Minister of Public Works stated that the Government were ready and anxious to discuss this question, and this is an evidence of the courage they pretend to possess. Sir, in all that has been said so far, and that has fallen from the lips of hon. gentlemen opposite, there is one thing in which we can all agree, and one thing only—we can all agree on the tribute which was paid to the volunteers by the Minister of Public Works when he entered into a defence of the Government. The volunteers had a most painful duty to perform, and they performed it in a most creditable manner to themselves and the country. But under the uniform of a soldier there is generally to be found a warm and merciful heart. Moreover, our soldiers are citizens who have an interest in this country, but when they are on duty they know nothing but duty. At the same time it can fairly be presumed that when on duty the heart feels and the mind thinks; and it may be fairly presumed that those who were on duty in the North-West last spring thought and felt as a great soldier, a great king, King Henry IV of France, thought and felt when engaged in battle for many years of his life in fighting his rebellious subjects. Whenever his sword inflicted a wound he used these words: "The King strikes thee, God heal thee." It may be presumed that perhaps our soldiers, when fighting the rebellion, were also animated by a similar spirit, and prayed to God that he would heal the wounds which it was their duty to inflict, and that no more blood should be shed than the blood shed by themselves. The Government, however, thought otherwise. The Government thought that the blood shed by the soldiers was not sufficient, but that another life must also be sacrificed. We heard the Minister of Public Works attempting to defend the conduct of the Government, and stating that its action in this matter was a stern necessity which duty to our Queen and duty to our country made inevitable. Mr. Speaker, I have yet to learn—and I have not learned it from any thing that has fallen from the lips of gentleman opposite—that duty to Queen and country may ever prevent the exercise of that prerogative of mercy which is the noblest prerogative of the Crown. The language of the hon. gentleman was not the first language of the same nature. This was not the first occasion when responsible or irresponsible advisors of the Crown attempted to delude the public, and perhaps themselves as well, that duty to Queen and country required blood, when mercy was a possible alternative. When Admiral Byng was sentenced to be shot for no other crime than that of being unfortunate in battle, there were men at the time who said to the King that the interests of the country required that the sentence should be carried out, though the court which had convicted him strongly recommended him to mercy. Those evil counsels prevailed, and the sentence was carried out; and the verdict of history, the verdict of posterity—posterity to which hon. gentlemen now appeal—has declared long ago that the carrying out of the sentence against Admiral Byng was a judicial murder. And I venture to predict, Mr. Speaker, that the verdict of history will be the same in this instance. In every instance in which a Government has carried out the extreme penalty of the law, when mercy was suggested instead, the verdict of history has been the same. Sir, in the Province to which I belong, and especially amongst the race to which I belong, the execution of Louis Riel has been universally condemned as being the sacrifice of a life, not to inexorable justice, but to bitter passion and revenge. And now, Sir, before going any further, it is fitting that, perhaps, I should address myself at once to the state of things which has sprung up in Quebec from the universal condemnation of the Government, not only by their foes, but by their friends as well. The movement which has followed the execution of Riel has been strangely misconceived, or I should say, has been wilfully misrepresented. The Tory press of Ontario at once turned bitterly and savagely upon their French allies of twenty-five years and more. They assailed them, not only in their action but in their motives. They charged them with being animated, not with any honest conviction of opinion, but with being animated with nothing less than race prejudices; they not only charged their former friends, but the whole French race as well, that the only motive which led them to take the course they did in the matter of Riel was simply because Riel was of French origin. They charged against the whole race that they would step between a criminal and justice, the moment the criminal was one of their own race. They charged against the whole French race that they would prevent the execution of the law the moment the law threatened one of their own. Mr. Speaker, on this matter I am not desirous of following the example which has been set before us by hon. gentlemen opposite of citing copious newspaper extracts, although I could cite extracts of the most bitter nature that ever was penned, of the Mail newspaper and other Tory organs against French Canadians. I will not import into this debate any more acrimony than can be avoided, but I will simply quote a single paragraph from the Mail—and one of the most moderate—which will show the general spirit of the attacks made upon us. On the 7th of December last, the Mail wrote as follows, speaking of the French Canadians:—

"Their leaders are paying us back at the present time by asserting that they should have the right of suspending the operation of law against treason whenever they choose to demand its suspension in the interests of a traitor of French origin, even though he may have been twice guilty."

Sir, I denounce this as a vile calumny. I denounce this as false. I claim this for my fellow-countrymen of French origin that there is not to be found anywhere, under heaven a more docile, quiet and law-abiding people. I claim this for my fellow-countrymen of French origin—and I appeal to the testimony of any of those who know them and have lived amongst them—that whatever their faults may be, it is not one of their faults to shield, conceal and abet crime. It is true that upon the present occasion the French Canadians have shown an unbounded sympathy for the unfortunate man who lost his life upon the scaffold on the 16th November last. But if they came to that conclusion, it was not because they were influenced by race preferences or race prejudice, if you choose to call it so. They were no more influenced in their opinion by race prejudice, than were the foreign papers which deprecated the execution of Riel. It is a fact that the foreign press, the American press, the English press, the French press, almost without any exception, have taken the ground that the execution of Riel was unjustified, unwarranted and against the spirit of the age. Certainly, it cannot be charged against that press that they were influenced by race feelings or prejudices, if you choose to call them such. And in the same manner, I say, the French Canadians, in the attitude which they took, were not impelled by race prejudices, but by reasons fairly deducible and deduced from the facts of the case. But if it had been stated that race prejudices, that blood relations had added keenness and feeling to a conviction formed by the mind, that would have been perfectly true. I will not admit that blood relations can so far cloud my judgment as to make me mistake wrong or right, but I cheerfully admit and I will plead guilty to that weakness, if weakness it be, that if an injustice be committed against a fellow-being, the blow will fall deeper into my heart if it should fall upon one of my kith and kin. But I will not admit anything more than that. That race prejudices can so far cloud my judgment as to make me mistake wrong from right, I do not believe to be true. Before I go further, I desire to say this: It has been stated, time and again, by the Mail newspaper and by other Tory organs, that it was the present intention of the French Canadian leaders to organise a purely French Canadian party, to lay aside all party ties and to have no other bonds of party in this House but that tie of race. I protest against any such assertion. Such assertion is unfounded, it is calculated to do harm, it is not founded on truth. It would be simply suicidal to French Canadians to form a party by themselves. Why, so soon as French Canadians, who are in the minority in this House and in the country, were to organise as a political party, they would compel the majority to organise as a political party, and the result must be disastrous to themselves. We have only one way of organising parties. This country must be governed and can be governed simply on questions of policy and administration, and French Canadians who have had any part in this movement have never had any other intention but to organise upon those party distinctions and upon no other. In order to lay this question at rest, I cannot do better than to quote the language of the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) at a meeting that took place recently at Longueuil. That meeting took place in January, I believe. Mr. Benoit, the hon. member for the county, had been invited, but had not put in an appearance, and the fact had been commented on by some speakers who had addressed the meeting. Mr. Desjardins spoke as follows:—

“Mr. Benoit has perhaps done well to hesitate, because I have myself hesitated, seeing at the head of the invitation I received, ‘Parti National.’ If it be understood by ‘Parti National’ that it is a party other than those already existing, I am not of that party; but if it be understood that Liberals and Conservatives shall unite in the same idea and present a united front when their national interests may be imperilled, I am of that party. In our movement we have not desired that a criminal should escape death because he was a French Canadian; but because as regards Jackson and Riel, if the first had his life saved, the second should have had it also. We do not want any more privileges; we are strong enough, but what we want is justice for all.”

It has been stated by sober-minded people that the execution, even if unjust, of the man who was executed and who is believed to have been insane by those who sympathise with him, does not make this a case for the outburst of feeling which has been made in Quebec on the occasion of Riel's execution. I differ from that view. In our age, in our civilisation, every single human life is valuable, and is entitled to protection in the councils of the nation. Not many years ago England sent an expedition and spent millions of her treasure and some of her best blood simply to rescue prisoners whose lives were in the hands of the King of Abyssinia. In the same manner I say that the life of a single subject of Her Majesty here is valuable, and is not to be treated with levity. If there are members in this House who believe that the execution of Riel was not warranted, that under the circumstances of the case it was not judicious, that it was unjust, I say they have a right to arraign the Government for it before this country, and if they arraign the Government for it and the Government have to take their trial upon it, it must be admitted as a consequence that certain parties will feel upon the question more than others. It is not to be supposed that the same causes which influenced public opinion in Lower Canada acted in the same manner with all classes of the community, that the causes which actuated the community at large were identical in all classes of the community. Some there were who believed that the Government had not meted out the same measure of justice to all those that were accused and who took part in the rebellion. Others believed that the state of mind of Riel was such that it was a judicial murder to execute him; but the great mass of the people believed that mercy should have been extended to all the prisoners, Riel included, because the rebellion was the result of the policy followed by the Government against the half-breeds. That was the chief reason which actuated them, and it seems to me it is too late in the day now to seriously attempt to deny that the rebellion was directly the result of the conduct of the Government towards the half-breeds. It is too late in the day to dispute that fact. Yet we have heard it disputed in this House. By whom? By the last man whom I should have expected would have disputed it—by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal). He gave us the other day his version of the origin of the trouble. Everybody is responsible for the rebellion except one body. The Globe is responsible for it; the Farmer's Union is responsible for it; the white settlers are responsible for it. Everybody you can conceive is responsible for it except the Government. The Government is perfectly innocent of it, as innocent as a new-born child? Such was the statement made by the hon. member the other day. But if the hon. member is now earnest as to that matter, how is it that the half-breeds alone have been prosecuted. If the Globe is the cause of that rebellion, the Globe should have been the first to be indicted. If the white settlers were the instigators, the white settlers should have been indicted also. There is more than that. The counsel for the Crown received authority and even instructions specially to proceed against the instigators of the rebellion, the white settlers, who certainly would have been more guilty than the half-breeds whom they had instigated to rebellion. Here is part of the instructions given by the late Minister of Justice to the counsel for the Crown:

“It must be, and from the information which the Government have it seems probable”——

It seems the Government share the opinion of the hon. member for Provencher, and they profess to act accordingly.

“It must be, and from the information which the Government have, it seems probable that the rebellion has been encouraged actively by whites, particularly in Prince Albert. Nothing in the whole duty entrusted to you is, I apprehend, more important than that we should if possible find out some of the men who, with far better knowledge than the half-breeds, stirred them up to rebellion, and your special attention is asked to this point.”

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) does not seem to have given any help to the counsel for the Crown, notwithstanding the knowledge which enables him to say on the floor of Parliament, with the responsibility attaching to his utterances, that the white settlers are responsible for the rebellion. If they are, how comes it that no white settler has yet been indicted—that every white settler is at large? What are we to infer from this? Are we to infer that the Government has receded from the position which was here taken by Sir Alexander Campbell? Or are we to infer that the statement of the hon. member for Provencher is only one of those wild assertions made as a last expedient in the defence of acts otherwise indefensible? But the hon. gentleman went further. He not only charged the white settlers, the Farmer's Union, and the Globe newspaper, but he also held responsible the Mackenzie Administration. He said that the Administration of that Government, from the time that they took office to the time they left had been a perfect blank. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is a charge which cannot be made against the present Administration. Their Administration was not at all one blank. Blood, blood, blood, prisons, scaffolds, widows, orphans, destitution, ruin—these are what fill the blank in the Administration of this Government of the affairs of the North-West. But, Mr. Speaker, there might be something to say, as the hon. gentleman will apprehend, upon the Administration of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) of the affairs of the North-West Territories, but the present would not be a seasonable time, and the occasion may arise hereafter. But let me tell this to the hon. gentleman: If the Administration of Mr. Mackenzie was blameable for its treatment of the affairs of the North-West, if they were remiss in their duties, how much more blameable must be the present Administration, which have not yet done that which should have been done by their predecessors? But I forget; the hon. gentleman has nothing, or, at least, very little, to say against the present Government. It may be possibly that they have not been altogether diligent in the duties they had to perform, but still they have shown a great deal of good will—at least, so says the hon. gentleman. Here is what he says:

"In 1880 Sir John Macdonald took the first opportunity he had, in order to bring in a Bill in this House—he himself, the leader of the Conservative party, introduced a Bill in Parliament to extend the same privileges and rights to the half-breeds in the territories as those enjoyed under the Manitoba Act by the half-breeds in the Province of Manitoba."

This statement is correct, except with regard to the date which should have been 1879 instead of 1880. Sir John Macdonald, as he says, introduced a Bill to extend to the half-breeds of the North-West Territories the same privileges as have been granted to those of Manitoba. That was done in 1879, and the Act which I hold in my hand reads as follows:—

"That the following powers are hereby delegated to the Governor in Council to satisfy any claims existing in connection with the extinguishment of the Indian titles preferred by the half-breeds resident in the North-West Territories, outside the limits of Manitoba previous to the 15th day of July, 1870, by granting land to such persons to such extent and on such terms and conditions as may from time to time be deemed expedient."

The provisions of this statute were repeated in the Act of 1833. But before we proceed further, it may be important to at once define what were those privileges and rights which were extended to the half-breeds of Manitoba. By the Act of 1870 it was decreed as follows:—

"And whereas it is expedient towards the extinguishment of the Indian title to the lands in the Province to appropriate a portion of such ungranted lands to the extent of 1,400,000 acres thereof for the benefit of the families of the half-breed residents, it is hereby enacted that under regulations to be from time to time made by the Governor General in Council, the Lieutenant Governor shall select such lots or tracts in such parts of the Province as he may deem expedient, to the extent aforesaid, and divide the same among the children of heads of families residing in the Province at the time of the said transfer to Canada."

And by a further Act, the Act of 1874, the same privileges were extended, not only to heads of families but to minors,

the children of half-breeds, as defined in section 32 of that Act. These Acts, as they were administered, assigned, first, to each head of a family the plot of land of which he happened to be in possession at the time of the transfer, to the extent of 160 acres; and, besides that, the half-breeds were also granted, for the extinguishment of the Indian title, 160 acres of land or scrip for 160 acres of land; and each minor, 240 acres or scrip for that quantity. In 1879 the First Minister took power to extend the same privileges to the half-breeds of the North-West. It will be seen that the half-breeds of Manitoba were treated as a special class. They were not treated as Indians; they were not treated as whites, but as participating in the rights of both the whites and the Indians. If they had been treated as Indians they would have been sent to their reserves; if they had been treated as whites they would have been granted homesteads; but as I have said they were treated as a special class, participating in both rights of whites and Indians; as whites they were given a homestead of 160 acres on the plot of land of which they happened to be in possession; as Indians, they were given scrip for lands to the extent of 160 acres for each head of their family, and 240 acres for minors. In 1879, as I have said, the Government passed a statute similar to the statute of Manitoba. Did they act upon it? When did they act upon it? When was the first thing done by the Government of Canada to put in force the Act of 1879? The first thing ever done by the Government of Canada to put in force the Act they themselves had passed was on the 28th January, 1885. Six long years elapsed before they attempted to do that justice to the half-breeds which they had taken power from Parliament to do at the time. During all that time the Government was perfectly immovable. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) told us the Government had done their duty by the half-breeds. Sir, if the Government had done their duty by the half-breeds, how is it that the half-breeds so often petitioned the Government to grant them their rights? How is it that they so often deluged the Department with petitions and deputations? How is it that they so often appealed to the hon. member for Provencher himself? How is it, for instance, that on the 19th of November, 1883, Maxime Lépine, now a prisoner in the Manitoba penitentiary, Baptiste Boucher, wounded in battle, Charles Lavallé, wounded in battle, Isidore Damas, killed in battle, and several others, addressed Mr. Duck, the agent at Prince Albert, asking him to try and induce the Government to grant them their rights, representing at the same time that they had petitioned, and that their petitions had been supported by prominent men, amongst others the Hon. Mr. Royal, the member for Provencher, and all without avail? How is it that these men, in order to obtain the rights which were denied them, have gone through such an ordeal as they have, if the Government did justice by them? Is this not the greatest condemnation that could be pronounced against them? An agitation was going on all the time in the North-West, and the Government were perfectly immovable. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) stated the other day that the Government during all those years were slumbering and snoring. I believe the expression was none too strong, because we have evidence of its truth in the Government's own blue book. Would you believe it, Mr. Speaker, we have evidence that the Department had forgotten the law which they themselves had placed on the Statute book; we have evidence that the Government actually forgot that the half-breeds were entitled to special privileges. The thing is almost incredible; yet here is the evidence of it. There was a meeting held at Prince Albert of the settlers of the locality, to take into consideration their own grievances and the grievances of the half-breeds as well; and amongst the resolutions carried was the following, the third one:—

"Moved by Mr Miller, seconded by Mr. Spencer, and carried unanimously:—'Whereas the Indian title in this district or territory has not become extinct, and the old settlers and half-breed population of Manitoba were granted scrip in commutation of such title, and such allowance has not been made to those resident in this Territory—Resolved, that the right hon. the Minister of the Interior be requested to grant such scrip to such settlers, thus placing them on an equal footing with their confrères in Manitoba.'"

This resolution simply asked that the half-breeds of the North-West should be treated just as the half-breeds of Manitoba were treated—just as the hon. member for Provencher said they should have been treated; and what was the answer of the Department? The answer of the Department will show precisely what I have stated, that the Department at that time, in 1881, had forgotten the tenor of the statute they had placed on the Statute-book before. Here is the answer, addressed to the Hon. Lawrence Clarke, who had transmitted the petition:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OTTAWA, 22nd Nov., 1881.

"SIR,—By direction of the Minister of the Interior, I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of memorial handed in by you, of certain resolutions passed at a meeting of the inhabitants of the district of Lorne (which you represent in the North-West Council), held at Prince Albert on the 18th October, 1881.

"In reply to the questions involved in the several resolutions contained therein, I am to say as follows:—

"Resolution No. 3. As by treaty with the Indians their title to any portion of the territory included within the district of Lorne has been extinguished, this resolution would need explanation."

Here was a resolution calling upon the Government to give effect to a law passed by themselves—to give the half-breeds the special rights to which by law they were entitled to, and yet the Government declares that this resolution requires explanation. Well, the explanation came, and it was not long in coming. Mr. Clarke answered as follows:—

"CARLTON, N.W.T., 25th January, 1882.

"SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22nd November last, embodying the reply of the right hon. the Minister of the Interior to a memorial, handed in by me, of certain resolutions passed at a meeting of the inhabitants of the district of Lorne, held at Prince Albert on the 18th October, 1881.

"With regard to resolution No. 3, it is remarked that:

"As by treaty with the Indians, their title to any portion of the territory included within the district of Lorne has been extinguished, this resolution would need explanation."

"I would respectfully submit that the Indian title, no doubt, has been extinguished, but evidently not that of the half-breed residents of the North-West Territories.

"The Government of the Dominion of Canada have repeatedly acknowledged the right in the soil of the half-breed inhabitants, as is proved by the Parliament of Canada, in 1870, 33 Vic., chap. 3, section 31, as follows:—

Then he recites all the acts by which the Parliament of Canada had declared, time and again, that the half-breeds were entitled to for their Indian title; and goes on:

"It will be seen, therefore, that from the first enactment, in 1870, to the last, in 1879, the rights in the soil of the half-breeds, have been recognised by the Government, and provision made for the extinguishment of their title."

This explanation was certainly clear enough, but the Government at once fell again into the state of immovability in which they had been living, and the Minister fell again into the state of repose in which he had been living for so many years before. The half-breeds petitioned again; they sent their friends upon delegations to Ottawa; they sent the hon. member for Provencher; yet the Government never took any action in the matter until the 28th of January, 1885, when the Minister felt his seat shaken by the tempest that was threatening to sweep over the country. But it was then unfortunately too late. When the seeds of discontent have long been germinating, when hearts have long been swelling with long accumulating bitternesses, and when humiliations and disappointments have made men discontented and sullen, a small incident will create a conflagration, just as a spark on the prairie, under certain circumstances, will kindle a widespread and unquenchable fire. Then the Government moved, but it was too late. The incident occurred—what was it? The hon. member for Provencher told us what it was. After the Government had sent a commission, a man had the imprudence to say that a commission would not come, but that bullets would come instead; and this statement of the hon. gentleman is corroborated by a statement of Archbishop Taché in a letter published in December last, in which, speaking of the commencement of the rebellion, he said:

"The assurance that a commission would be sent was not accepted. People preferred to believe a rumor which went to show that instead of granting them their rights, the authorities were to send irons for their leader, and bullets for those who would protect him. That conviction produced the result which was to be expected. The half-breeds thought they would resist and defend themselves. Badly armed, without ammunition or provisions, they took possession of the stores in the vicinity. The unfortunate attack made against them at Duck Lake was a declaration of war."

It will strike many minds now that there is a great analogy between the origin of this rebellion and the origin of the rebellion in Lower Canada in 1837. An agitation had been going on in Lower Canada for many years, as it had been going on in the North-West for many years, and it was when the Government attempted to arrest the leaders of the movement that the rebellion broke out; and without going any further, I am glad to recall the fact that, deplorable as was this rebellion in Lower Canada, it secured at once to the Lower Canadians the rights which they had been vainly seeking for so many years, and secured this further result: that although the population had been hitherto in favor of rebellion they at once became the most faithful subjects England ever had. In the same manner, though the last result has not been obtained, it may be and will be obtained, I have no doubt, in the North-West, because the immediate result of the rebellion there has been to secure to the half-breeds the rights which had been denied to them up to that time. I have charged the Government with not only having been negligent in the duty they owed to the half-breeds, but with denying to the half-breeds the rights to which they were entitled. I charge them with, not ignoring only, but actually refusing, of design aforethought, the rights to which the half-breeds were entitled. The first order the Government passed under the statute was that of the 23th January, 1885. What was that order? Its provisions are important to consider, in view of the charge I have just preferred against the Government. The order runs as follows:—

"On a memorandum dated 26th January, 1885, from the Minister of the Interior, submitting that it is desirable, with a view of settling equitably the claims of half-breeds in Manitoba and the North-West Territories, who would have been entitled to land had they resided in Manitoba at the time of the transfer and filed their claims in due course under the Manitoba Act, and also of those who, though residing in Manitoba and equitably entitled to participate in the grant, did not do so, to ascertain the number of such half-breeds, and recommending that he be authorised to obtain an enumeration of them, and to employ three persons to make such enumeration."

The provisions of the order, you see, were, first, to cause an enumeration to be made of the half-breeds who were entitled to compensation, in order to settle equitably the claims of those half-breeds. What was to be that equitable settlement? The order is vague upon that point; it is not only vague, it is silent. Was the settlement to be that which was granted to the half-breeds of Manitoba, as was insinuated the other day by the hon. member from Provencher (Mr. Royal)? I say no; I say that the settlement that the Government then contemplated, and which is called equitable, was not the settlement which had been made in favor of the half-breeds of Manitoba. I may here recall what was the latter settlement. The half-breeds of Manitoba were given, first, a free grant of the plots of land which they occupied, to the extent of 160 acres each, as whites; they were given, in the second place, in extinction of the Indian title, land to the extent of 160 acres for each head of family, and land or scrip to the extent of 240 acres for every minor. Was this to be the settlement which was to be given by the Government under order of 28th January? I say it was not; and I call to witness upon this point the language spoken by the First Minister himself on the 26th March last, when this matter came before this House. On that occasion he said:

"As a whole the half-breeds have been told that if they desire to be considered as Indians there are most liberal reserves that they could go with the others; but that if they desired to be considered white men they would get 160 acres of land as homesteads. But they are not satisfied with that; they want to get land scrip of equal quantity—I think upwards of 200 acres—and then get, as a matter of course, their homesteads as well."

You see, therefore, that the Government, on the 26th March, 1885, was not disposed to treat the half-breeds of the North-West Territories as they had treated the half-breeds of Manitoba. If they had been disposed to do so, the First Minister would have said: We will give them, as we have given the half-breeds of Manitoba, the plots of land on which they reside, as free grants of 160 acres each, this to be their rights as homesteaders; and as Indians we will give them, in extinguishment of their rights to the Indian title, land scrip to the extent of 160 acres for each head of family and 240 acres to each minor. No; the language of the First Minister shows that he was opposed to their being treated in this way. He said: "If they wanted to be treated as Indians, they could go on the reserves; but if they wanted to be treated as whites, they could have a homestead like other whites." Therefore I charge the Government with this, that when they passed the order of 28th January, 1885, it was not the intention of the Government to afford the same justice to the half-breeds of the North-West Territories that had been afforded to those of Manitoba. But, by the way, I may mention that this passage, which I have just quoted from the speech of the First Minister, has been eliminated from the bound volume of Hansard, and I call the attention of the Debate; Committee to this fact. *The intentions then expressed in the language I have just quoted from the First Minister were carried out four days later, on the 30th March, when another Order in Council was passed, and how did that Order in Council read? It read as follows:—

"The Minister of the Interior is of the opinion that it is expedient that those claims should be satisfied by granting: First, to each half-breed head of a family resident in the North-West Territories, outside of the limits of Manitoba previous to the 15th July, 1870, the lot or portion of land of which he is at present time in bona fide and undisputed occupation by virtue of residence upon and cultivation thereof, to the extent of 160 acres, and if the lot or portion of land for which he is in bona fide occupation as aforesaid, should be less than 160 acres, the difference to be made up to him by an issue of scrip, redeemable in land, at the rate of one dollar per acre, and in case of each half-breed head of a family residing in the North-West Territories previous to the 15th day of July, 1870, who is not at present in bona fide occupation of any land, scrip be issued, redeemable in land, to the extent of $160."

The same provision is thereafter made for the minors. Let us examine this Order in Council. What does it provide for? It provides simply this, that the half-breed, shall get a grant of 160 acres as settler or homesteader, but that nothing shall be given him in extinguishment of his Indian title. If the half-breed is in possession of a plot of 160 acres, he is to receive a free grant of it—nothing more; if his lot is not 160 acres, he is to receive the difference—nothing more; so that it is manifest at that date, under this Order in Council, it was not the intention of the Government to give to the half-breeds of the North-West Territories the same rights that had been given to the half-breeds of Manitoba. The commission being issued under this order, it was not possible for the commissioners to do otherwise than to carry out the provisions contained in the order. They had no authority to go to any greater length than they were authorised by that order. The commission was issued to Mr. Street, Mr. Goulet and Mr. Forget, and, as soon as they came to the North-West, as soon as they came to investigate the matters involved, they saw at once that this proposed settlement would be no settlement at all, that the half-breeds would be still dissatisfied; and, upon the 4th April, Mr. Street telegraphed to Mr. Macpherson, the Minister of the Interior, as follows:—

"If desired by half-breeds, would it not be advisable to grant scrip, one sixty or two forty dollars, permitting them to acquire title to lands in occupation through possession? Otherwise, Government really gives nothing for Indian title. Do you wish me to give notice that commission will take evidence of claims other than those of half-breeds? Pearce concurs in first suggestion."

Here is the telegram in which the commissioner at once points out that, if he carries out the Order in Council, the Government gives nothing to the half-breeds for the extinguishment of the Indian title. Then the next day, a letter followed up the telegram from Mr. Street, and it is still more significant:

"MY DEAR SIR DAVID,—We arrived here early this morning, and I met my fellow commissioners at the Dominion Lands Office at 10 o'clock. They introduced the subject as to which I telegraphed you yesterday, and spoke very strongly as to its being one which was likely to be a serious stumbling-block in our dealings with the half-breeds. Lest you should not fully have understood my telegram I will shortly state the point. Suppose we find that a half-breed has been upon and, since 15th July, 1870, in occupation of a parcel of say 160 acres, under circumstances which, if he were a white settler, would entitle him to a grant of the land under the homestead clauses under the Dominion Lands Act, under the authority we now possess we could, if he were the head of a family, allow him nothing more than the 160 acres; we could allow him nothing for his claim as a half-breed, and, inasmuch as the Government has all along been purporting to deal with the half-breeds as if they had some general rights beyond those of ordinary incoming settlers, my fellow commissioners say that great dissatisfaction and disappointment will be created if we give to these occupying half-breeds only that which any ordinary settler can claim, and nothing for the extinguishment of his Indian title. Mr. Pearce discussed the matter very fully with us and concurred in the advisability of our obtaining, if possible, the power to enable us to allow the half-breed to claim the land occupied by him under the homestead provisions, and in addition to give him his scrip for the $160 or $240, as the case may be, for his Indian title."

There was the policy which was suggested by Mr. Street as soon as he had commenced to investigate the matter, and what was the answer? The very following day there was this telegram which should have been sent six or seven years before at least:—

"W. P. R. STREET, Q.C., Chairman Half-breed Commission, Winnipeg.

"No objection to your suggestion to give scrip, and allow occupants to acquire title through possession when desired by them."

At last justice had been given to these people. For seven long years they had petitioned, and petitioned in vain. On the 26th March, the Prime Minister in his place in this House, gave it as his policy that these men were not entitled to any special privileges, that they had no such rights as were given to their confrères in Manitoba, that they were to be treated not as half-breeds, not as a special class, but either as Indians or whites. At last justice was coming to them. At last what they had been petitioning for for so many years was coming to them, and what was the cause? In ten days, from the 26th of March to the 6th of April, the Government had altered their policy and had given what they had refused for years. What was the cause? The bullets of Duck Lake; the rebellion in the North-West. The Government had been refusing for years, and at last these men took their lives and liberties in their hands, and at last the Government came down and gave them what they were entitled to. I appeal now to any friend of liberty in this House; I appeal not only to the Liberals who sit beside me, but to any man who has a British heart in his breast, and I ask, when subjects of Her Majesty have been petitioning for years for their rights, and those rights have not only been ignored, but have been denied, and when these men take their lives in their hands and rebel, will anyone in this House say that these men, when they got their rights, should not have saved their heads as well, and that the criminals, if criminals there were in this rebellion, are not those who fought, and bled and died, but the men who sit on those Treasury benches? Sir, rebellion is always an evil, it is always an offence against the positive law of a nation; it is not always a moral crime. The Minister of Militia in the week that preceded the execution of Riel, stated his sentiments of rebellion in these words: "I hate all rebels; I have no sympathy, good, bad or indifferent with rebellion." Sir, what is hateful—I use the word which the hon. gentleman made use of—what is hateful is not rebellion, but is the despotism which induces that rebellion; what is hateful are not rebels, but the men who, having the enjoyment of power, do not discharge the duties of power; they are the men who, having the power to redress wrongs, refuse to listen to the petitions that are sent to them; they are the men who, when they are asked for a loaf, give a stone. The hon. gentleman hates all rebels, he says. I wonder if he will extend his hatred to the great rebel whose proud statue stands almost at my arm's length. I venture to say that if that man whose statue has been erected here had been living to-day, and had occupied his place on the Treasury benches, he would have remembered that he was once a rebel. I have seen the day when the Minister of Militia had not for rebellion the horror he now possesses. I have seen the day when the Minister of Militia had not for rebels the deep hatred which he proclaimed to the world almost within the hearing of a condemned man; I have seen the day when the Minister of Militia had great sympathy in his heart for rebellion, when he had deep sympathy in his heart for the very rebel whom he had in his mind, and whose death knell he was in advance ringing when he was proclaiming his hatred of rebellion at Winnipeg. Riel was once before a rebel; he was indicted before, not for rebellion, but for murder connected with a rebellion. The hon. gentleman who now has such a hatred for rebels spoke on that occasion. Resolutions were introduced into this House on a certain occasion to extend an amnesty for all offences connected with the rebellion and to all offenders, Riel and a few others excepted, and granting an amnesty even to them, but with certain restrictions. The hon. gentleman spoke on that occasion. Did he then proclaim, as he now does, his hatred of rebellion? Did he speak the language which he spoke lately in Winnipeg? Did he say he hated all rebels? "I have a hatred of all rebels; I have no sympathy, good, bad or indifferent with rebellion." No; but this is what he said:

"Mr. Caron said that he will vote against the resolution because it does not afford a complete solution of the North-West difficulty. Having voted against the expulsion of Riel from this House he cannot vote for his banishment from the country. A complete amnesty is the only practical solution, and he is sure that the same difficulties will recur next year."

Mr. Speaker, that was the sentiment of the hon. gentleman at that time. Well, if on that occasion Riel was entitled to a full amnesty, was he not entitled, at least, to a commutation of sentence on this occasion, when this last rebellion had not been darkened by such an act as darkened the pages of the first rebellion? The hon. gentleman in those days stated again and again that the first rebellion was justified. If the first rebellion was justified, was not the second rebellion equally justified? Where would be the half-breeds to-day if it had not been for this rebellion? Would they have obtained the rights which they now enjoy? I say, Sir, that the Canadian Government stands convicted of having yielded their rights only to rebellion, and not to the just representation of the half-breeds and of having actually forced them into insurrection. Mr. Speaker, such were my sentiments, and I spoke them elsewhere. I appeal, upon this occasion, as I did elsewhere, to every friend of liberty, to all those who, during twenty-five years past, have felt their hearts thrill whenever a struggle for freedom was going on in any corner of the world; with the Italians, when they delivered their country from the yoke of Austria; with the Americans, in their stupendous struggle for national unity; with the Mexicans, in their successful attempt to resist the foreign domination which the French Emperor sought to impose on them; with the French themselves in their generous though often misguided efforts to establish amongst themselves the bulwark of freedom and responsible government; with the Danubian population, when they attempted to rid themselves from the degrading domination of the Turks; and when at last—at last—a section of our own countrymen rose in arms to claim rights long denied them, rights which were immediately acknowledged to be just, as soon as they were asked with bullets, are we to have no sympathy with them? Though, Mr. Speaker, these men were in the wrong; though the rebellion had to be put down; though it was the duty of the Canadian Government to assert its authority and vindicate the law, still, I ask any friend of liberty, if there is not a feeling rising in his heart, stronger than all reasoning to the contrary, that these men were excusable? Such were, Mr. Speaker, my sentiments. I spoke them elsewhere. I have had, since that time, occasion to realise that I have greatly shocked Tory editors and Tory members. Sir, I know what Tory loyalty is. Tories have always been famous for preaching loyalty to others. Tories have always been famous for being loyal, as long as it was profitable to be so. Under the reign of James, the Tories were gushing in their loyalty as long as the tyranny of the king fell upon the Whigs and Dissenters; but when at last the tyranny of James fell upon the Tories themselves and the Church of their heart, their slavish notions received a most salutary shock. They took side with the Whigs, and, horror of horrors, they shouldered the musket and joined the Prince of Orange and put him on the throne; and I believe that to this day the Tories will say that it was a happy day for England when that rebellion took place. If we pass from England to this country we have the same tale to tell. In 1849 the Tories were gushing in their loyalty as long as they expected the Governor General to be disloyal to the people, but when they found the Governor General was loyal to the people, their own loyalty oozed out of their bodies and vanished into thin air. They did not shoulder the musket—that would have been too noble a weapon—but with eggs and stones they pelted the representative of Her Majesty. They did not shoulder the musket, but with pen and ink they wrote and signed annexation manifestoes. And, Mr. Speaker, if we continue the story, even down to the days since this Government has been in power, we find that when they introduced the National Policy, and it was objected that that policy was unfair and ungenerous to England, and that it might possibly endanger British connection, the cool Tory answer was: "So much the worse for British connection." Sir, this is Tory loyalty. Ready they are to-day to sacrifice British connection, if British connection stands between them and their selfishness; ready they are to-day to sacrifice British connection if it stands between them and their enjoyment of power; ready they are to sacrifice British connection for mere sordid greed, but they affect, forsooth, to be shocked when we profess sympathy for men who, in the west, have been vindicating their rights long denied. Sir, I will not receive any lectures on loyalty from men with such a record. I am a British subject, and I value the proud title as much as anyone in this House. But if it is expected of me that I shall allow fellow countrymen unfriended, undefended, unprotected and unrepresented in this House, to be trampled under foot by this Government, I say that is not what I understand by loyalty, and I would call that slavery. I am a British subject, but my loyalty is not of the lips. If hon. gentlemen opposite will read history, they will find that my ancestors, in all their struggles against the British Crown in the past, never sought anything else than to be treated as British subjects, and as soon as they were treated as British subjects, though they had not forgotten the land of their ancestors, they became amongst the most loyal subjects that England ever had. Sir, since our loyalty has been impugned by hon. gentlemen opposite, I am inclined to quote the sentiments of my race and of my party, as they were expressed by my hon. friend from Megantic (Mr. Langelier) on an occasion which was not political. Last summer certain delegates from boards of trade in France visited Canada. They were entertained by the Corporation of Quebec which presented them with an address, and the hon. member for Megantic, in his quality of mayor, answered as follows:—

“The fate of arms has decreed that our political destinies should be united with the destinies of England, and when we consider all the advantages which we have reaped from that state of things, our regret at being separated from France is not without compensation. When we can establish with France extended commercial relations, nothing more shall we want. We preserve a political régime of which we are proud, and we obtain at the same time the satisfaction of preserving our interests and sentiments.”

This is the loyalty of the French Canadians to-day. They are true to their ancestors. And who should object? We speak the French language, and if you look at it from a purely utilitarian point of view it is a great disadvantage, because we have afterwards to learn a foreign language to take our part in the national movement of this country. Everyone must learn to speak it the best he can in his own poor way. It would perhaps be best, from a utilitarian point of view, to have only one language; but the French is the language of our mothers, the language which recalls to our minds the most sacred associations which first dawn on the heart of man and which can never die out, and so long as there are French mothers the language will not die. But these sentiments are quite consistent with our loyalty to England, and loyal we are to England; and if I were called to illustrate it, I could not do so better than by quoting the remark of a French Canadian lady to Mr. De Bolvize who, in 1855, visited Canada by order of Napoleon III: “Our hearts are with France, but our arms are to England.” But loyalty must be reciprocal. It is not enough for the subject to be loyal to the Crown; the Crown must also be loyal to the subject. So far as England is concerned she has done her duty nobly, generously; but this Government has not done its duty towards the half-breeds. The Government are shocked, and their friends profess to be shocked, because those men claim their rights and demanded them with bullets. Have the Government been loyal to those half-breeds? If they had been loyal to the half-breeds no such trouble would have occurred. But the Government have not been loyal to the laws. If the Government do not respect the law themselves, and if afterwards men, to vindicate their rights, take weapons in their hands and brave the laws, I say the Government are bound to search their consciences and see if they have given occasion for rebellion, and if they have, to give the benefit to the guilty ones. This is what we, in Lower Canada, have been claiming, and this is one of the reasons why we have felt so warmly upon this question. But such is not, however, the doctrine of the Government. The doctrine of the Government is not put in that way in the memorandum which was issued some time after the execution of Louis Riel. Shortly after that execution the Government thought it proper, and I do not blame them for it, to put their defence before the country. They did it in a very able paper signed by the late Minister of Justice, Sir Alexander Campbell. In the very first words he speaks as follows:—

“The opponents of the Government have asserted that the rebellion was provoked, if not justified, by their mal-administration of the affairs of the North-West Territories and inattention to the just claims of the half-breeds. With this question, which has been made one of party politics, it is not thought becoming to deal here. Upon such a charge, when made in a constitutional manner, the Government will be responsible to the representatives of the people, and before them they will be prepared to meet and disprove it.”

Mr. LAURIER.

That the Government should be compelled to submit their reasons for having so acted goes as a matter of course. They were to give their reasons—they were responsible to the people. This is a matter of course. But this is not what is contended here. The contention laid down is that when the people of Canada are to examine the action of the Government in executing Riel, the question whether or not the rebellion was provoked is not to be taken into consideration. Was there ever a more unconstitutional, more intolerable doctrine propounded? I say it is contrary to the true doctrine, for if there is any occasion when the Government is bound to search into the matter to see if provocation has been given for the committal of an offence, which has involved the death penalty, it is when the offence charged is purely a political one. It is always with regret that the Minister of Justice finds himself unable to report in favor of the commutation of a death sentence. Whenever in this country a sentence of death is passed upon any of our fellow beings, it is the duty of the Minister of Justice to enquire into the causes of the crime in order to see if the requirements of the law would not be equally met if the death sentence were not carried out. Nothing is left behind that can lead to that desired end? And yet we are told here that when a man is charged with a political crime, the Government are not to consider whether there was provocation or not by the Crown? With the Government all rebellions are alike, whether provoked or not, and they have all to be treated in the same way. You are to look at all rebellions as utterly bad. You have to look upon the rebellion of Junius Brutus and the attempted rebellion of Cataline as equally bad. I say, on the contrary, that this is one of the grounds on which I arraign the Government. It was their duty when they came to consider, whether the death sentence should be carried out on Riel, to consider whether he had received provocation for the deed which brought him into that situation; and having failed to do so, the Government, on their own confession, stand guilty of having failed in a duty, which is one of the most sacred that ever can fall upon man. But the doctrine of the Government is so untenable that they could not adhere to it to the last. Even before Sir Alexander Campbell had reached the end of his factum, he abandoned his theory, for in the very bottom lines, he says:

“Whether rebellion alone should be punished with death is a question upon which opinions may differ. Treason will probably ever remain what it always has been among civilised nations, the highest of all crimes; but such conviction for that offence must be treated and disposed of by the Executive Government upon its own merits, and with a full consideration of all the attendant circumstances. In this particular instance, it was a second offence, and, as on the first occasion.”

The ex-Minister of Justice commenced by saying that we should not look into the causes which had induced the rebellion; he had conveniently left aside looking into the causes, but he no less conveniently looked into the fact that this was a second offence. This was the second offence. So it was, and for the second time the Government was guilty of that rebellion; for the second time Riel was a rebel, and was a rebel on account of the conduct of the present Government. Sir, I am not of those who look upon Louis Riel as a hero. Nature had endowed him with many brilliant qualities, but nature denied him that supreme quality without which all other qualities, however brilliant, are of no avail. Nature denied him a well-balanced mind. At his worst he was a subject fit for an asylum; at his best he was a religious and political monomaniac. But he was not a bad man—I do not believe at least that he was the bad man that he has been represented to be in a certain press. It is true that at the trial a most damaging fact was brought against him; it is true that he had offered to accept a bribe from the Government. But justice to his memory requires that all the circumstances connected with that fact should be laid before the House. If he accepted this money, it is evident that in his own confused mind it was not with a view of betraying the cause of his fellow countrymen—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, yes.?

Mr. LAURIER. Why, Mr. Speaker, I do not expect that the members who now interrupt me would deal in the same manner, but, Sir, I give them the credit of having better balanced minds than Louis Riel. In his own dazed mind it is evident that if he accepted the money it was not with a view of betraying his fellow countrymen—it was with the view of working for them in another way, since he said he would start a paper in the United States and raise up the other nationalities.

An hon. MEMBER. Another rebellion.

Mr. LAURIER. I grant that if that reasoning had been made by a man in his senses, such as an hon. gentleman on the other side, it would be enough to stifle any sympathy we could have for him; but we must make due allowances for the fact that it is proved that if he was not actually insane, no man can deny that upon this subject of politics his mind was not right or sound; and of course in the case of a mind unsound or insane we cannot apply the same tests that we should apply to a reasonable mind—it would be unfair to him. But that he was insane seems to me beyond the possibility of controversy. When the reports first came here last spring and in the early summer of his doings and sayings in the North-West, when we heard that he was to establish monarchies in the North-West, that he was to depose the Pope and establish an American Pope; those who did not know him believed he was an impostor, but those who knew him knew at once what was the matter with him. In the Province of Quebec there was not an instant's hesitation about it. Almost every man in that Province knew that he had been several times confined in asylums, and therefore it was manifest to the people of Quebec that he had fallen into one of those misfortunes with which he was afflicted. When his counsel were engaged and commenced to prepare his trial, they saw at once that if justice to him and only justice to him was to be done, their plea should be a plea of insanity. It has been said that the trial was a fair one. I deny it. I will not go over some of the arguments which have been put forward on this subject, but I ask the special attention of the House to this fact: This man asked for a month's delay for his trial; he obtained eight days. Was that justice? Was that British justice? Was that giving fair play to the accused? When he swore that justice to his case demanded a delay of one month could there be any public reason that militated against that demand? Could there be any public reason why such a request as that should not have been granted? and yet it was refused. Again, when he asked for witnesses, was the request granted him? No, it was again refused. I again recall the attention of the House to the affidavit which Riel gave, that he wanted several witnesses, amongst others Gabriel Dumont, Michel Dumas and others. I grant at once that to bring Gabriel Dumont and Michel Dumas to this country, both of whom were fugitives from justice, was hardly possible; but remember that he asked as an alternative a thing which was perfectly feasible, and it was denied him. He asked this alternative under oath:

"That unless the Government of this country or this honorable court do provide the means with which to secure the attendance of the above-named witnesses before this court, it is essential to my defence that the various papers, writings and documents taken from me at the time of my surrender to General Middleton, and taken by him and his officers from my house subsequently, should be placed in the hands of my counsel for their examination and consideration, previous to being put upon my trial."

Sir, you see the treatment of the accused on that occasion; he asked one of two things. He said either procure me the attendance of certain witnesses, Gabriel Dumont and

Michel Dumas and others, or if you cannot or will not do that give to my counsel the papers taken at Batoche. Was there ever a more moderate or reasonable petition presented to a court of justice? When this man simply said: I do not ask those witnesses if you cannot give them to me, but there is one thing you can give to me; you can give me communication of my papers which were taken from me at Batoche. Why were they not given? Reasons of State. Why, these papers have been moved for in this present Session, and the Government granted the motion without any objection. There could not, therefore, be any reason of State. True they have not been brought down yet, but the reason of State which was invested at the trial is not brought forward in this House, and why? Because such a reason would never have stood discussion in this public Parliament. That was the reason—I can see no other. But with this imperfect trial the jury recommended him to the mercy of the court. The Minister of Public Works said the other day that it was nothing unusual for juries to bring in verdicts with recommendation to mercy. No, it is not unusual, but what is very unusual is that the Government should give no heed to this recommendation. That was the unusual thing done on this occasion. After the trial was over the conviction was so deeply seated in the minds of many friends of the Government that ample and full justice had not been done, that they at once petitioned the Government to issue a commission to examine the prisoner, to see whether he was sane or insane in mind. This petition was made, as I am informed, by friends of the Government, to the Government, again and again. The Government did not refuse, but treated it simply as the petitions of the half-breeds were treated—put off, put off, until the very week that preceded the execution. And then the commission—was it a commission? I do not know what kind of a thing it was, what kind of instructions were given we do not know. But we do know that upon the 8th of November, 1885, just a week before the execution, two medical gentlemen from the east were at Regina and examined the prisoner. Were those gentlemen sent to Regina with the object of advising the Government whether or not the sentence should be commuted? I say emphatically, no. I charge this against the Government again, that when they sent this so-called commission to Regina to examine the state of mind of Louis Riel, it was not with a view of determining the question whether the sentence should be carried out or commuted, but it was to throw dust in the eyes of the public and enable the Government to say afterwards, we have consulted specialists and they have reported in favor of sanity. But Mr. Speaker, we have it on record that when this commission was sitting in Regina, when on the 6th, the 7th, and the 8th of November, Dr. Lavell and Dr. Valade were examining Riel to see whether he was insane or not, at that time the Government had determined to hang Riel; and this fact stands to the shame of the Government, perhaps more than anything else, because at that time they were simply playing a comedy; they were not acting with a view to justice; they were simply attempting to blindfold the people—to deceive the people. Why, Sir, the Order in Council containing the decision of the Government was passed on the 12th of November, but long before that time the Government had come to their conclusion. The hon. Minister of Militia about that time made a trip to the North-West. He arrived at Winnipeg on the 7th or 8th of November, so that he must have left Ottawa about the 3rd or 4th, or the 2nd of November; and before the hon. gentleman had left Ottawa for Winnipeg, the sentence, if not recorded, had been decided upon by the advisers of His Excellency. We have the evidence of the Premier himself as to that. Here is a letter which was sent by the hon. Prime Minister to the hon. Minister of Militia:

" OTTAWA, 20th November, 1885.

" MY DEAR CARON,—You say you are charged with having left Ottawa before the decision of the Governor in Council was arrived at with respect to Louis Riel, and as if for the purpose of avoiding being party to the decision.

" This is not the case, the Council had come to the conclusion that it was necessary, in the interest of justice, that the sentence should be allowed to be carried into effect, in your presence as a Member of the Council, before you left for Winnipeg."

Sir, we must give the Minister of Militia his due; he has had a full share in the hanging of Louis Riel; let him have what really appertains to him. Before he left Ottawa, the sentence had been decided between him and his colleagues. Let him have his full share of the merit, if merit there be or the shame; let him have also his full share of the comedy which was afterwards played before the public. For, I ask it of any man in his senses—I ask it of any man on the Opposition benches; I ask it of any man in this country—was there ever a more shameful thing enacted by a Government, than—after they had decided to execute for the purpose of blinding the public, to send a commission to enquire whether the convict was insane or not? What was the object of enquiring whether he was insane or not, if the Government, at that time, had made up their minds and decided that he should be hanged? The object was to do what has since been done—to say to the people of Canada: We have consulted medical officers, and they have reported, and upon their report we have acted. Sir, it was not upon this report that they acted; this report was a false note, and they did not act upon it, because when they got it their decision had been arrived at; and upon this I arraign the Government of the country, not only as being guilty of a cruel act, but as being guilty of an attempt to deceive the people of this country. Sir, if the Government had been desirous of learning whether Riel was insane or sane, there was no need of sending a commission to examine him. It would have been sufficient to look at his history; it would have been sufficient even to look at his record in the rebellion. We have it now as a fact of history that while Riel was inducing that rebellion, he chose as his chief adviser and secretary, a man notoriously insane, William Joseph Jackson, who signed his letters and Orders in Council. Will it be pretended by any man that if Riel had been in his senses, if he had had a sane and discerning mind, he would have accepted an insane man as his chief adviser? Why did this not strike hon. gentlemen opposite? One of the things which we in Lower Canada have felt as deeply as we have ever felt anything, is that we have believed that the measure of justice which was extended to Louis Riel was not the same measure of justice which was extended to William Joseph Jackson. Jackson was put upon his trial, and I am bound to say this, in duty to the Crown prosecutors, that upon that occasion they did their duty. They acknowledged at once the insanity of the prisoner and directed an acquittal. The trial of Jackson took place on the 24th of July last. Mr. Osler, counsel for the Crown, in opening the case, spoke as follows:

" The prisoner is charged with having participated in the recent rebellion, with having acted in the capacity of private secretary to Louis Riel, the leader of the rebellion. He is charged here now formally with this crime, but it is understood that the counsel for the prisoner, Mr. McArthur, will be able to give you satisfactory evidence of the insanity of the prisoner, and that he is not really responsible, and was not responsible for the acts committed by him. The Crown do not propose to contest that contention on the part of the prisoner's counsel. The evidence, in fact, comes from the medical men who have examined the prisoner on the part of the Crown, and evidence that has come to the knowledge of counsel for the Crown, during the course of preparation for other trials, is conclusive that, at the time he committed the acts, he was not responsible for them."

Now, Sir, it is important to look at the evidence which was adduced on that occasion. Dr. Jukes was examined:

" By Mr. Osler—Q. Is he so insane that it would be unfair to say he was not responsible for his acts?—A. There are occasions when I would consider he would be quite responsible; to-day he spoke and reasoned with me in a manner that was very clear, but only three days ago he was dazed. His mind seems to be dazed. I do not think that, to bring him at a moment's notice, he would be capable of conducting his trial, or of doing justice to himself in any manner.

" Q. To a considerable extent, your opinion is, that he could not control his actions?—A. I have never seen anything about him to give me the impression that his actions were uncontrollable. It is rather his mental hallucinations, his ideas. He holds peculiar ideas on religious matters in connection with this trouble, and in connection with the new religion of which he thinks that Louis Riel is the founder, and which he thinks it is his duty to sustain.

" Q. Would this be consistent with his committing crime?—A. If he spoke rationally I would think so, but he does not.

" Q. Then you would not hold him responsible for acts done in connection with these ideas?—A. If he committed any acts in the condition he is now, I would not hold him responsible. The slightest excitement produces a great effect upon him."

Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask any fair-minded man if this applies to William Joseph Jackson, would not every line of it apply equally to Louis Riel? Is it not a fact that these two men were deluded on the same subjects? Jackson spoke rationally, but he had hallucinations, just as Riel had; and yet one of these men is acquitted, is sent to an asylum, and is then allowed to escape, while Louis Riel is sent to the gallows. He is free to-day, and Riel is in his grave. I therefore cannot come to any other conclusion than that upon this occasion the same measure of justice which was extended to one man was not extended to the other. I do not want to raise national prejudices, but prejudices are not always the outgrowth of ignoble passion; sometimes they are simply the outgrowth of a noble passion; national prejudices may be the outgrowth of national pride, and when the people of Lower Canada found that the one prisoner was treated in one way and the other in a different way, there was occasion, at least, why they should feel as they did upon this matter. But we never knew, until the Minister of Public Works spoke the other day, what was the true reason of the execution of Riel. We have it now; he has spoken and we know what was the true inwardness of it. The Government had written a pamphlet in order to justify themselves. The utility of that pamphlet is gone; it never had any; not one of the reasons it gave for the execution of Riel was the true reason. It never had any usefulness at all, except, perhaps, as affording to the Government job printing to settle the wavering consciences of some of their followers. But now we know the true reason why Riel was executed, and here it is in the language of the Minister of Public Works:

" We had this before us, we had the fact that Louis Riel had, fifteen years before this, committed an act which was considered at the time one that should have been punished in the most severe way. The prisoner, Louis Riel, at that time was not condemned to a severe punishment; he was allowed to remain out of the country for five years, and he was not brought before a tribunal to be tried, and punished or absolved, for the death of Thomas Scott."

Here is the reason—the death of Thomas Scott. Since I have named Thomas Scott, let me pause a moment. The Minister of Public Works said the other day that those who to-day sympathised with Riel could not condemn the Government for his execution, because that excused him for the execution of Scott; and the only defence made in his favor was that the act was done by a de facto government. This was not the true reason. Whether the government of Riel was a de facto government or not, is a question upon which there may be considerable difference of opinion. The death of Scott has not been prosecuted for other reasons, to which I shall come presently, but since I have spoken of the death of Scott, I must say that I have always held the view that it was one of the most painful tragedies that has ever occurred in the life of any country; it was one of those acts for which there could be no possible excuse, unless the excuse we now have, that the man's mind was unsound. I cannot conceive that any one of sound mind could have committed so cruel an act. Whether the death of Scott was the act of a de facto government or not, does not matter. De facto governments are sometimes guilty of judicial murders, as we know to-day. Whether the act of Riel was the act of a de facto Government or not, if that man had been responsible for his acts, as gentlemen on the Treasury benches are responsible for theirs, then the execution of Scott would be a stain on the memory of Riel, just as the execution of the Duke D'Enghien is a stain on the memory of Napoleon, as the execution of Louis XVI is a stain on the records of the French Convention, as the execution of Admiral Byng is a stain on the English Government of that day, as the execution of Mary Stuart is a stain on the memory of Queen Elizabeth, and as the execution of Riel will be a permanent stain and shame on the present Government. The death of Scott is the cause of the death of Riel to-day. Why, if the hon. gentleman thinks that the death of Scott was a crime, did not he punish Riel at the time? Scott was executed in the early days of 1870, the Government remained in power until the fall of 1873, yet they never did anything to bring that man to justice, who had committed such a crime as they say now he committed. 1870-71-72-73, almost four full years, passed away, and yet the Government, knowing such a crime as it has been represented here had been committed, never took any step to have the crime punished. What was their reason? The reason was that the Government had promised to condone the offence; the reason was that the Government were not willing to let that man come to trial, but, on the contrary, actually supplied him with money to induce him to leave the country, and, Sir, I ask any man on the other side of the House, if this offence was punishable, why was it not punished then? and if it was not punishable then, why should it be punished now? The language of the hon. gentleman is obvious, it is plain, it is transparent, it was spoken with the view of reaching the feelings of a certain section of our countrymen; but I recall to hon. gentlemen the language which was spoken by the Minister of Militia, who showed that this offence should have been fully pardoned at the time. Well, if the offence was to be fully pardoned at the time, is it fair to bring it as a charge against the offender now? Is it now fair to base a condemnation of death against him upon it? Sir, I say it is one of the greatest mistakes—not a mistake alone, but one of the gravest faults against the rights of mankind that ever was perpetrated by any Government. But I must say I was not altogether surprised at the language of the hon. Minister of Public Works. We had heard something of that before. The Secretary of State visited his county in the month of January, and he also spoke of this event and the execution of Louis Riel. The Minister of Public Works would not meet his accusers except upon the floor of Parliament. The Secretary of State did not object to meet the people, but not his accusers. Still, he went to Terrebonne, and here is the manner in which he spoke of the death of Scott:

"I have my sympathies for the half-breeds, and I have proved it; I have proved it before to-day. In 1874, when Ambroise Lépine was accused of murder, I travelled over 2,000 miles to defend him. I did not go round passing my hat for subscriptions to pay me for defending the accused. I did it manfully, without any hope of reward. (Cheers) The insurrection of 1870 had a color of an excuse. Men higher than I am in politics have gone so far as to say that there was justification for the rebellion of that day. It was the assertion of the rights of nationality against the cession of territory by supreme power. I defended my client and during that defence I had proof, and the best proof, too, that the killing of the unfortunate Scott was one of the most atrocious murders ever committed. That atrocious murder was without the connivance and without the approval of Lépine, but it was the result of the selfish vengeance of the then dictator of the North-West—Louis Riel."

Such was the language spoken of by the hon. gentleman on that occasion. He was speaking something like ten years after he had gone to the North-West to defend Ambroise Lépine, and after he had acquired that knowledge which enabled him to say that the murder of Scott was one of the most atrocious murders ever committed. Yet, scarcely a few weeks after his return from Winnipeg, where he had defended Lépine, the hon. gentleman moved in the Legislature of Quebec, a resolution, in which he thus characterises the act which he now represents as one of the most atrocious murders ever committed:

"The troubles in the settlement of the Red River, now the Province of Manitoba, in 1869-70, unfortunately produced a conflict of such a nature as to develop into a rising of considerable magnitude. The leaders of that movement then constituted themselves into a government, and one act to be deplored, perpetrated under the assumed authority of that government, was the execution of one of the subjects of Her Majesty. * * * * * While bowing to the verdict rendered against one of the actors in the movement above mentioned, public opinion in that remote Province of Manitoba, as well as in the other Provinces of the Dominion, and even in England, has been strongly impressed with the idea that the deplorable act of violence is so interwoven with the political events of that unhappy period as to render it impossible to assimilate it to ordinary cases of murder. * * * * * With the view of satisfying such sentiment of clemency, and of realising the ideas of conciliation, peace and tranquility, which presided over the establishment of the Confederation, and further, with the view of removing all causes of divisions and hostile sentiments from among the various nationalities of the country, and especially with the view of giving effect to the recommendation to mercy which the jury coupled with their verdict, your Excellency is humbly prayed to be pleased to exercise, in favor of Ambroise Lépine, now under sentence, the royal prerogative of mercy, by extending to him grace and pardon."

Now, if in 1874, the hon. gentleman, just fresh from Winnipeg, where he had just defended Lépine, represented this act as one "so interwoven with the political events of that unhappy period as to render it impossible to assimilate it to ordinary cases of murder," in order to obtain the life of one man, is it fair and just now to represent the same act as an atrocious murder in order to take the life of another man? Sir, this issue of the death of Scott has long been a buried issue, and it should not have been brought up again for political consideration. There was a time when it was a living issue, too living an issue, before the people of this country. When the Administration of my hon. friend the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) came into power, that had been for years a living, burning issue before the public. Scott had been executed in the early days of January, 1870. An amnesty had been promised by the men who now sit on the Treasury benches, but they never had the courage to carry it out, they never had the courage to stand by their word and deal to the offenders in that rebellion what they had promised to them. They allowed years and years to pass, and, in the meantime, passions were getting more and more bitter. There are prejudices in Ontario and there are prejudices in Quebec, and upon such a question the people of Ontario took one view and the people of Quebec took the other view. The people of Ontario demanded that the law should take its course; the people of Quebec demanded that the promises of the Government should be carried out; and between the two Provinces the Government had not the courage to do anything, and they allowed this bitterness of feeling to grow until it became a public danger which they had not the courage to face. But, when the Government of my hon. friend the member for East York came into power, they grappled with the difficulty and settled it in a way which must ever be a credit to them. They asked their followers from Ontario and their followers from Quebec each to give up a certain portion of their pretensions for the common weal, each to sacrifice upon the altar of their country something of their pretensions and to unite upon a common course; and upon that they united, and the result has been what was stated by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault), that at least peace prevailed which had been unknown for so many years. This issue of the death of Thomas Scott has been long dead, and now it is raised by whom? It is raised by members opposite—the last men who should ever speak of it. Sir, we are a new nation, we are attempting to unite the different conflicting elements which we have into a nation. Shall we ever succeed if the bond of union is to be revenge, if we are to rake up the old scores and launch them at the heads of one another? I am sorry that the Government upon this occasion did not take a leaf from the book of our friends to the south of us. After the civil war was over, there were men who, when they learnt of the outrages at the Andersonville prison and other places, demanded that, if an amnesty was given to political offenders, at least those who were guilty of those outrages should be brought to justice, but not a drop of blood was shed, not a trial was had, and it is manifest to-day that the nation is the greater for it. I am sorry also that the Government did not take another leaf from the book of the American nation. I believe there was a reason—a reason adequate to my mind, at least—why they should have granted, if not an amnesty—I do not say that—at all events a commutation of sentence. On the 13th May, the day after the battle of Batoche, General Middleton, the commander of the forces, wrote as follows to Louis Riel:—

“MR. RIEL.—I am ready to receive you and your council, and to protect you until your case has been decided upon by the Canadian Government.

“FRED. MIDDLETON.”

Riel surrendered. Did he or did he not surrender in virtue of that letter, of that invitation of General Middleton? On that point there can be no better evidence than that of General Middleton himself:

“May 15th.—I sent out parties of mounted men, under Major Boulton, to scour the woods. In the afternoon two scouts—Armstrong and Hourie—who had been sent out with Boulton, and had moved away by themselves, came upon Riel, who gave himself up, producing my letter to him, in which I summoned him to surrender and promised to protect him until his case was considered by the Canadian Government.”

Sir, is there not evidence that Riel then surrendered by virtue of the invitation given by General Middleton? If such is the case, then I submit it to any man's sense of justice and honor if the Canadian Government were justified afterwards in executing a man, their prisoner upon their own invitation? It may be that legally speaking Riel could not bring this as a bar in his trial to any indictment against him, but it seems to me that it is repugnant to any one's sense of honor and justice that a man whom you have invited to become your prisoner in order to avoid the death of a soldier upon the battle field, should afterwards be hanged to a gibbet. The letter of General Middleton was undoubtedly dictated by the most humane sentiments, and not only that, but it is evident also that the course was politic. We see by the report of the General that, after the capture of Batoche, one of his objects was the capture of Riel. We can easily understand that. As long as Riel was in the field the rebellion was not ended, and there was a possibility that he might organise guerilla bands, and more lives and treasure would have to be spent before the rebellion was suppressed. We see that the General states in his report:

“May 14th.—We marched for Lépine's Crossing. Having halted for dinner, I received information that Riel was somewhere in the vicinity, so determined to make for Guardapui, or Short's Crossing, which was some miles nearer, and camp for the night.”

You see the General is obliged to alter his course because Riel is in a certain direction which he had not anticipated. Then when Riel surrendered, the least the Government could do, was not to treat him as they would have done if he had been taken on the field of battle. We have in this matter the precedent of General Lee and General Grant. On the 2nd April, 1865, Richmond, which had so long withstood the Union forces, surrendered, and General Lee commenced his retreat with the object of joining his forces with those of General Johnston. He was followed closely by the victorious army, and, on the 7th of April, General Grant sent him a letter, not inviting, but simply suggesting to him to surrender. General Lee refused, and continued to fight; but, two days afterwards, finding that his situation was hopeless, he sought a conference with General Grant, and accepted the invitation to surrender. General Grant dictated his terms, and here they are:

Mr. LAURIER.

“APPOMATTOX COURT HOUSE, VIRGINIA, 9th April, 1865.

“GENERAL.—In accordance with the substance of my letter to you of the 8th instant, I propose to receive the surrender of the army of Northern Virginia on the following terms, to wit: Rolls of all the officers and men to be made in duplicate, one copy to be given to an officer designated by me, the other to be retained by such officer or officers as you may designate. The officers to give their individual paroles not to take up arms against the Government of the United States until properly exchanged, and each company or regimental commander to sign a like parole for the men of his command. The arms, artillery and public property to be packed and stacked, and turned over to the officers appointed by me to receive them. This will not embrace the side arms of the officers, nor their private horses or baggage. This done, each officer and man will be allowed to return to his home, not to be disturbed by the United States authority so long as they observe their paroles and the laws in force where they may reside.”

General R. C. Lee.

There you see that the surrendered army were paroled. They were not confined, but allowed to go at liberty so long as they did not take up arms again and violate the laws of the United States; but some authorities in the United States held that this did not prevent the Government from prosecuting the leaders for treason, for guilty of treason they certainly were. The new President of the United States, Andrew Johnson, took steps to bring General Lee, and several of the most prominent officers, to trial. This was steadily opposed by General Grant. The magnanimity of General Grant's character then came out, and he threatened to resign his position in the army if General Lee and the other prisoners of war were tried for treason. A few months afterwards a committee of Congress sat upon the question. General Grant was brought before the committee and gave this evidence:

“I frequently had to intercede for General Lee and other paroled officers, on the ground that their parole, so long as they observed the laws of the United States, protected them from arrest and trial. The President, at that time, occupied exactly the reverse grounds, viz., that they should be tried and punished. He wanted to know when the time would come when they would be punished. I told him not so long as they obeyed the law and complied with the stipulation.

“Eldridge.—You looked on that in the nature of a parole, and held that they could only be tried when they violated that parole.

“Grant.—Yes, that is the view I took of the question.

“Eldridge.—Did you consider that that applied to Jefferson Davis?”

“Grant.—No, Sir, he did not take any parole. It applied to no person who was captured—only to those who were paroled.

“Eldridge.—Did the President insist that General Lee should be tried for treason?”

“Grant.—He contended for it ... I insisted that General Lee would not have surrendered his army, or given up their arms, if he had supposed that after surrender, he was going to be tried for treason and hanged.”

Now, is it not manifest, as was stated by the hon. member for West Huron the other night, that if Riel had supposed that in surrendering he would meet with the same fate as if he was taken prisoner, he would never have surrendered, but would have done as Gabriel Dumont and several others did? Recurring to the American case, who can doubt that of those two men, Andrew Johnson and General Grant, the true statesman, the true patriot, was the one who advocated clemency? You see the result to-day. Scarcely twenty years have passed away since that rebellion, the most terrible that ever shook a civilised nation, was put down, and because of the merciful course adopted by the victors, the two sections of that country are now more closely united than ever before—more closely even than they were when fighting for their independence. The Canadian Government should have followed this example, and I repeat again that we cannot make a nation of this new country by shedding blood, but by extending mercy and charity for all political offences. But the Government say they were desirous of giving a lesson. In the last paragraph of their written defence, they say:

“In deciding for the application for the commutation of sentence passed upon the prisoner the Government were obliged to keep in view the need of exemplary and deterrent punishment for crime committed in a country situated in regard to settlement and population as are the North West Territories; the isolation and defenceless position of the settlers already there; the horrors to which they would have been exposed in the event of an Indian outbreak; the effect upon intending settlers of any weakness in the administration of law, and the consequences which must follow such a course in a country if it came to be believed that such crimes as Riel's could be committed without incurring the extreme penalty of the law, by any one who was either subject to delusions, or could lead people to believe he was so subject."

Indeed the Government have convinced all the people here mentioned, the half-breeds, the Indians, the white settlers, that their arm is long and strong, and that they are powerful to punish. Would to heaven that they had taken as much pains to convince them all, the half-breeds, Indians and white settlers, of their desire and their willingness to do them justice, to treat them fairly. Had they taken as much pains to do right, as they have taken to punish wrong, they never would have had any occasion to convince those people that the law cannot be violated with impunity, because the law would never have been violated at all. But to-day, not to speak of those who have lost their lives, our prisons are full of men who, despairing ever to get justice by peace, sought to obtain it by war, who, despairing of ever being treated like freemen, took their lives in their hands, rather than be treated as slaves. They have suffered a great deal, they are suffering yet, their sacrifices will not be without reward. Their leader is in the grave; they are in durance, but from their prisons they can see that that justice, that liberty which they sought in vain, and for which they fought not in vain, has at last dawned upon their country. Their fate well illustrates the truth of Byron's invocation to liberty, in the introduction to the Prisoner of Chillon:—

"Eternal Spirit of the chainless Mind!
Brightest in dungeons, Liberty, thou art!
For there thy habitation is the heart—
The heart which love of thee alone can find;
And when thy sons to fetters are consigned—
To fetters and the damp vault's dayless gloom—
Their country conquers with their martyrdom."

Yes, their country has conquered with their martyrdom. They are in durance to-day; but the rights for which they were fighting have been acknowledged. We have not the report of the commission yet, but we know that more than two thousand claims so long denied have been at last granted. And more—still more. We have it in the Speech from the Throne that at last representation is to be granted to those Territories. This side of the House long fought, but fought in vain, to obtain that measure of justice. It could not come then, but it came after the war; it came as the last conquest of that insurrection. And again I say that their country has conquered with their martyrdom, and if we look at that one fact alone there was cause sufficient, independent of all others, to extend mercy to the one who is dead and to those who live.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.10 a. m. Wednesday.

PRAYERS.

ADJOURNMENT—ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that when the Speaker leaves the Chair at 6 o'clock, the House shall stand adjourned until to-morrow at 3 o'clock p.m.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Portage la Prairie and Lake of the Woods Railway and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Watson.)

Bill (No. 56) to incorporate the Nova Scotia and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Dodd.)

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EXTENSION.

Mr. POPE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 57) respecting the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from a point at or near Stellarton to the Town of Pictou.

Mr. BLAKE. Explain.

Mr. POPE. An appropriation was made for this railway last year or the year before—last year, I think. It is from Stellarton, about fifteen miles from Pictou. We had not authority, of course, to expropriate the land, and this Bill is for the purpose of giving us authority to build the road.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HOMESTEADS WITHIN CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BELT.

Mr. BLAKE asked, How many homesteads have been entered within the Canadian Pacific Railway belt up to 31st December last, between: 1. The first and second principal meridians; 2. The second and third; 3. The third and fourth; 4. The fourth and fifth?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The number between the first and principal meridian is 11,644; between the second and third, 3,862; between the third and fourth, 40; and between the fourth and fifth, 98; or a total of 15,644.

NORTH-WEST TRIALS—LETTER OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether any report has been received from the Government counsel in the North-West rebellion prosecutions, on any, and if so, on which of the points referred to in the letter of the Minister of Justice to them, of 20th June, 1885; and whether any report has been received from them with reference to the trials, or to the discharge of their duties in the North-West; particularly, whether any report has been received from them on the subject of the seventh paragraph of the letter of the Minister of Justice, which is as follows:—"It may be, and from the information which the Government has, it seems probable that the rebellion has been encouraged actively by whites, particularly of Prince Albert. Nothing in the whole duty entrusted to you is, I apprehend, more important than that we should, if possible, find out some of the men who have with far better knowledge than the half-breeds and Indians, stirred them up to rebellion, and your special attention is asked to this point."

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Reports have been received on all those points.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTIES IN RICHELIEU.

Mr. MASSUE asked, Whether it is the intention to offer for sale the properties owned by the Government in the county of Richelieu, and of which the leases expire in April next, and if so, when and in what places?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is the intention of the Government to dispose of the properties owned by the Government in the county of Richelieu, but whether by lease or sale has not yet been determined. They will be offered by competition, whichever plan may be adopted.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY TO PASPEBIAC.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether any contract or agreement has been entered into by the Government with Senator Théodore Robitaille, Mr. L. J. Riopel, M.P., or any other parties, corporation or association, for the construction of a railway from the Intercolonial to Paspebiac? If such agreement has been made with individuals, what are their names? If with a corporation, what are the names of the directors thereof? and will such agreement be submitted for the approval of Parliament?

Mr. POPE. There has been a provisional agreement with the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company. The directors of the company are the Hon. Théodore Robitaille, President; the Hon. Thomas McGreevy, Vice-President; the Hon. Louis Robitaille, L. J. Riopel, Robert H. McGreevy, Francis Giroux and Octave Martin. The agreement will be laid before the House, and is subject to the approval of Parliament.

BLUE BOOK PRINTING—QUEEN vs. LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. BERNIER asked, Where, and by whom was the blue book entitled "The Queen vs. Louis Riel" printed? How many copies were printed for the Government, and what was the amount paid for them?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. This book was printed by the Minerve Printing Company. 4,000 copies were printed, English and French, of which 1,200 copies were for Sessional Papers, at the cost of $92.21.

PRINTING JOINT STOCK COMPANIES BLUE BOOK.

Mr. BERNIER asked, Where, and by whom was the blue book giving particulars of the Joint Stock Companies incorporated in 1885, printed? How many copies were ordered by the Government, and at what cost? Was the work done at the rates mentioned in the contract with the present contractors for Departmental printing, or at higher rates?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The book was printed by La Minerve Printing Company—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I did not ask hon. gentlemen to applaud me. There were 2,500 copies printed in English and in French, and 470 for Sessional Papers, at a cost of $315.07—at a slightly higher rate than the Government contract rates.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LAURIER. I beg the indulgence of the House to correct a misstatement which I made last evening when addressing the House. Having quoted a passage from a speech delivered by the Premier on the 26th of March last, I stated that this passage was not to be found in the bound volume of the Hansard. My attention was drawn to the matter, and I find I was incorrect. My impression was that the statement was made in a passage I quoted on a motion made by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and I made a search for it in the bound volume of the Hansard, but I found the passage, where it should have been, in a speech previously delivered by the Premier on the same date. Therefore I beg to say that my statement was incorrect, and I offer the fullest apology to the House and to the parties affected by it.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

CASE OF LOUIS RIEL—QUESTION OF ORDER.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentlemen opposite will have no objection to our doing as we did yesterday—dropping the notices of motion.

Mr. BLAKE. The question differs to-day.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL—RETURNS.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation) moved for:

Copies of all telegrams, letters, petitions or documents asking or recommending that the sentence of death against Louis Riel should not be commuted, or that it should be executed.

He said: It is useless for me to say, Mr. Speaker, that this motion is extremely important, and I am fully convinced that the Government will move no amendment with a view, not only to exclude it from the list of motions, but even to put it at the foot of the roll. For nearly a week we have been discussing the most important facts of the great question which agitates the Parliament after having agitated the country, and we have not yet before us the documents required for this debate. I have ascertained that several parts of the records have not been included in the blue book, which was submitted to the House and the country. I fail to understand this exclusion, this very extraordinary exclusion, as this blue book, at first sight, seems to be a complete copy of the record, which it is not. Why it is that one part was printed and then the other, I will leave it to the hon. ministers to explain; as for us, we are unable to find a satisfactory explanation. What I demand is that part of the documents which was laid on the Table in the Council room, when the ministers arrived at a decision and also the petitions praying that the execution should take place; that part is not yet before us and I do not see why the hon. ministers should find it necessary to oppose this motion and to withhold from us these documents to which we have a right and the contents of which the public has an interest to know. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I venture to hope that my motion will be granted and that we will soon have the required documents. If I am not mistaken, it has been stated by the hon. Minister of Public Works that in the Executive Council, the arguments and the petitions for and against the execution had been duly considered. We are now here, as a Committee of the Whole House, to examine whether the decision taken at that time was really such as to be justified by the law and by the facts, and it is our right to have all these documents.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I made a proposal just now to the hon. gentleman opposite, in order that it might not be necessary to move that the 17th Order be now called on, as I did yesterday and the day before. But as the hon. gentleman insists, I must make that motion again. The reason of that is, as the First Minister stated at the beginning, that it is desirable that the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) should go on from day to day, as the Government wished to know whether their action is approved or disapproved by the House, and the only way to do that is to go on with the debate from day to day until we come to a vote. Therefore, I hope the House will sustain me in voting that the 17th Order be now called.

Mr. EDGAR. This debate has been going on for some time, and surely the House might fairly have expected that during all these days the Government would have brought down for our information a great many of the papers that have been so long promised us. A great many were promised last Session, and many more have been ordered to be brought down this Session. I have no doubt there are many hon. members fully prepared, from the information in their hands, to give an intelligent vote on the question moved by my hon. friend, the member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry); but we have heard from other hon. members that they require the light of further papers and fuller information before giving a vote. At any rate, it is not proper for the Government to hold back information that might possibly influence the members of this House one way or the other. Why, Sir, it is only within the last moment or two that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has moved for very important telegrams bearing on this question, and instead of that motion being allowed to pass, an amendment is moved to strike it off the paper, and to put this other motion in its place. We also find, from the answer given by the Minister of Justice, just now, to a question put by the leader of the Opposition, that there are very important reports which have lately been received by the Government from their counsel, relating to a matter upon which great stress has been laid, that is, the complicity of the white settlers of the North-West in the rebellion; and we heard the other day from the Minister of Justice that there were certain important telegraphic reports as to the sanity or insanity of Louis Riel, on which the execution was ordered, and these reports, instead of being placed before the House, were given back to the men who made them. Surely the Government have had time to get copies of them, either from the telegraph office, or from the men to whom they gave them. Now, in order to test the feeling of the House, I beg to move the following as an addition to the original motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse: ¶

And that it is the duty of the Government without further delay to bring down further papers relating to North-West affairs, and throwing light on the situation prior to, during, and subsequent to the late rebellion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it is in order to move an amendment. The amendment now before the House is in the nature of moving the previous question, and, according to the rules, I do not think it is in order to move this amendment.

Mr. BLAKE. The motion which you, Sir, put the other day, was this, and it was in order:

Mr. Farrow moved, that it is expedient to provide that members of the House of Commons of Canada and members of the Senate of Canada, who may be absent from the House by sickness in themselves or their families, though not in Ottawa during such sickness, shall not be deprived of their indemnity by such absence.

Sir Hector Langevin moved in amendment thereto, that all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question, be left out, and the following substituted therefor: "the 35th Order of the Day, on the Public Bills and Orders, be now read."

The hon. Minister of Public Works, therefore, proposed to strike certain words out of the main motion, and to substitute other words. It was not a substitutory motion, such as would take place on the Order of the Day being called, but it was a motion in amendment to a motion; and I do not understand why it is not competent to any other member to propose another alteration, to propose a second amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. I expressly called the attention of the Clerk to this, to know whether the amendment was correctly entered, and he said it was not, that the motion in amendment had been put without leaving out the words after "that." Bourinot on "Parliamentary Practice" says:

"If a question on the motion paper is under consideration, any member may move, 'That the Orders of the Day be now read,' or 'That the House do now proceed to the Orders of the Day.' If this question is resolved in the affirmative, the original motion is superseded, and the House must proceed at once to the Orders of the Day. It has been ruled in the Canadian, as well as in the English House, that no amendment can be made to the motion to proceed to the Orders of the Day, it being considered equivalent for a motion to the previous question."

And I understand now this is a motion to proceed to a particular Order of the Day.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand you to say that the motion made the other day was either not put in the words in which I find it put in our proceedings, or, if it was put in those words, it was incorrectly put.

Mr. SPEAKER. I called the attention of the Clerk to it specially, and he told me the way the motion was put in the Votes and Proceedings is incorrect, and that it is correctly put in the Journals.

Mr. BLAKE. Under these circumstances, I hope that the error will be noted in our daily record, so that we may know what motions are put to the House and what the regular course of business is. When the hon. gentleman proposed that we should adopt the course he urged yesterday, I ventured to say that the situation was not the same. The situation yesterday was this: An hon. member had a Bill in the Orders relating to another matter before the House, and the result of pressing the motion that we should proceed to the Orders of the Day, as against the Bill, would injuriously interfere with the progress of a Bill which had nothing to do with this question; but the question we are called on to consider to-day is which of two propositions we will adopt, both of which have relation to the matter in hand. The first is that we should have the evidence material to the formation of a judgment before proceeding to a judgment, and the second is that we shall proceed to judgment before getting the evidence. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) proposes that certain papers of high consequence in considering the question, and in considering the conduct of the Government—papers upon which the Government proceeded in coming to a conclusion—shall be laid upon the Table, so that we may know what that was which the Government had before it when they came to their conclusion. In amendment or in supersession, at any rate, with a view of defeating that proposal and obliterating it from the Order paper, the hon. gentleman proposes that we should proceed to judgment in the case. Of course, we all understand that there is a well-known rule of law which is based on the common sense of mankind and which will answer the purpose of a judgment in this particular, though not so satisfactorily as the production of documents. That rule is:—Omnia praesumuntur contra spoliatorem. Everything is presumed against the man who suppresses, conceals, or gives away the documents in the case. If the Government, in preference to submitting to the Order to produce the papers, insists upon the trial of the case without the documents, that presumption will be drawn here amongst lawyers and laymen and by the world at large. I am prepared to draw it, and I think other people will draw it as well. But that is not satisfactory to me, because I believe the proper course is that the papers should be produced, and that, not upon such presumptions, however well founded they may be in law and common sense, but on the documents themselves should we proceed to judgment. I call your attention, Sir, to this question of the production of papers, and to the view this Government seems to take as to its duties and responsibilities, and as to the rights and responsibilities of Parliament in that connection; because it seems to me that it is extremely material to the disposition of this motion that we should understand, once for all, what is the duty and responsibility of Government, and what are the rights and responsibilities of Parliament. Now, remember that the first papers which are material to the particular question in hand, so far as that question at all bears upon the conduct of the Government before the rebellion, were moved for by myself as long ago as pretty early in the Session of 1883. These papers were connected with the complaints and representations of the settlers near Prince Albert, and the House unanimously ordered, on that occasion, the production of those papers. The Session of 1883 went on, and it ended, and the papers were not produced. The Session of 1884 commenced, it ran its course, and it ended, and the papers were not produced. The Session of 1885 commenced, and ran a long way in its course, and the papers were not produced. The rebellion broke out; the Government was pressed, time and again, to bring down the papers so long delayed. It was pressed to comply with this Order, so contemptuously ignored for these several periods, and at length, long after these repeated demands were made, in the Session of 1885 these particular papers, or some of them, were brought down, in obedience to the Order of 1883. I say that if the Order of the House had been complied with, it is in the highest degree improbable that the rebellion would have occurred. If this Parliament had obtained those documents and papers which were called for in time for it to consider them, with the light and knowledge those documents would have given us, with the knowledge of what were the grievances of the people and what the Government had done and was doing, we might have been saved the shame and pain and disgrace of the events which have since occurred. But the Government ignored, as it always has done, its duties and obligations towards this House, not indeed by contesting our right to the papers, except very rarely, but by passing the motions without a word, and then contemptuously ignoring the Orders of the House, with the results to which I have referred. Then the rebellion broke out just about this day a year ago, or a little earlier. The call was made again for papers, a call which has been repeated continuously since that time. I point to your attention that upon the occasion of a former outbreak, the outbreak of 1869-70, the Government had recognised their duty in that regard. The moment Parliament met, the outbreak having taken place during the recess, although it was still going on, although there was an alleged provisional Government, or a de facto Government, in that country, the Government felt that it was their duty to the Parliament, that it was their obligation to the public of that day, to lay before Parliament the papers which contained the information with reference to the causes of the outbreak, and with reference to the course and the conduct of the Government in connection with the outbreak, the papers which would enable us to measure what had been the discharge of their duties by the Government in that regard. They felt it to be their duty to lay those papers before Parliament, voluntarily and spontaneously. They were promised in the Speech from the Throne, and they were laid before us a very few days afterwards. It was said, indeed, that there might be some phrases or a name or two which it might be inexpedient to publish at that time, and the First Minister pointed out, and pointed out with propriety, the importance of not doing any damage to private interests in that region; and the Government therefore proposed a secret committee to look over the papers and decide which could be published without damage to public or private interests. The First Minister did not then arrogate to himself the right to be the judge of what should be the materials to be brought down to Parliament to enable us to decide upon the cause which might be pending between the people and the Administration of the day. He felt that his own position demanded that men on both sides of the House should see all the papers, and that to men from both sides of the House should be committed the task of determining whether public or private interests required the publication or the suppression of certain papers; and, from this side of the House, my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie), the late member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), and myself, and I think another, but I am not quite sure, were appointed. We met, we looked through all the papers, they were all brought down, and I think we omitted one sentence and two or three names, and it was agreed between us unanimously that these should be omitted; but, as to all the rest, we agreed that they were fit to be made public, that they were fit to be made known to Parliament and to the people; and so they came on the Table of the House, so they were made public to the world, and so the whole information as to the events which had preceded the rebellion, the events which had brought about the rebellion, the course, conduct and policy of the Government, which could be discovered at that time in the public offices, were brought forward. I say not that everything was brought forward; I say that much was not brought forward which ought to have been; I say not that much was not then concealed. All of us who have since watched public events, all of us who have since read the proceedings of the Select Committee on the North-West troubles, know that much was kept back; but still ostensibly all was brought down; the duty was acknowledged if it was not performed, to bring down everything affecting the matter; and hon. gentlemen on both sides decided what should be published. Here, a rebellion takes place, an outbreak takes place, many lives are lost, millions of treasury are expended, I call for papers, and the hon. gentleman says: I will decide for myself what papers should be brought down and what should not be brought down. No longer does he say he will bring down all the papers, and strike a committee to see what should be made public and what should not; but he says that he will himself see what papers should be brought down, with a view to the effect which such and such papers will have on the fortunes of the Government of the day. Do you mean to tell me that the Government of the day, whose political futures, whose political as well as personal reputations depend upon the evidence to be brought down, are the fit judges of what papers are to be kept back and what papers are to be laid before Parliament? Do you mean to tell me that it is to be left to them to say what pieces of evidence are innocent enough, or harmless enough, or are sufficiently well known to hon. gentlemen opposite to render it useless to retain them, what papers can be safely brought down or what papers can be safely kept back? It is not human nature, to is not common sense that such a doctrine should be laid down, that those who are charged and who admit, as the First Minister admitted last Session, in answer to myself, that an outbreak has occurred of such serious consequence as to render them responsible to the House and to the country, should have it left to themselves to say what shall come down, and that too at a moment when they are pressing on a decision upon one of the important questions involved in this matter. With one breath they call upon us to sit from day to day, and from hour to hour to discuss this question, to the suppression of all other business; and with the other, they hold back, they refuse to produce the documents which are important to arrive at a right conclusion on that very matter. A few papers were brought down, under dint of constant pressure—pressure administered from day to day—were brought down after as much reluctance and difficulty as if the operation had been one of the extraction of teeth referred to by me last Session. At one time we heard that the clerks' time prevented these papers coming down, that there were not enough clerks in the Department to copy them; and, after that was told to us, they were brought down, and I had them copied by one or two men in twenty-four hours. While millions of dollars were being expended in the suppression of a rebellion, we were told we could not hire enough men at a dollar and a half a day to copy the documents which would tell the people who were responsible for that rebellion. At another time, we were told that the public interest required the suppression of certain papers during the revolt. We are yet to have it shown or pointed out to us that there is a single paper, the production of which would have hurt the public interest at that time. The fact is, that the hon. gentlemen have for a long time confounded the public interest with their own, that they have confounded the public interest with the interest of the Tory party, and that they are disposed to say that whatever hurts the Tory party hurts the public interest, and, therefore, they will not bring down these papers. Well, some evidence was omitted; some papers were refused for another reason. I was told that, in a heartless manner, regardless of the interests of the missionaries in the North-West who were there with their lives in their hands; regardless of the temporal interests of Bishop Grandin and of other missionaries, Protestant and Roman Catholic; regardless of the interests of the officers of the Government, I was calling ruthlessly, while yet there was war between the half-breeds and the rest of Canada, and, after that was over, while yet there was danger of an Indian war, for the production of documents which would endanger the lives of these men—documents, Sir, which would have proved that these men had done their duty by the people of that country, documents such as those which my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), the other day produced, though the Government declined, out of tender consideration and care for the interests of Bishop Grandin and those under him, to bring them down last Session; documents which proved that that prelate had, in the month of June, just after or just before Riel had arrived, communicated to the Government the condition of affairs, communicated to the Government the condition of discontent, communicated to the Government the condition of excitement, pointed out what the nature of the demands was, pointed out that some were reasonable and some were unreasonable, called upon the Minister of Public Works to do his duty by his compatriots and his country, called upon him to give his early and earnest attention to this subject, and called upon the First Minister as well, that these documents, which pointed out that there had been great neglect on the part of the Government in the past, that Bishop Grandin himself had appealed to them time and again, that he had been received, as he said he was, as we know that everybody is, by the First Minister with most courteous words, with the kindest promises, but with no measure of performance; documents which prove the urgency of the case, documents which speak of another interesting event, also up to that time concealed from us, which speak of a visit of the Lieutenant-Governor to those quarters, which occurred prior to the month of June, and of the reception which that dignitary met with from the inhabitants of that country, an unsatisfactory reception which the Bishop regretted, but which he explained by the existence of discontent. Well, Sir, we were told that Bishop Grandin would be injured; his authority, already shaken, would be destroyed, if the Government brought down the papers which proved that Bishop Grandin had done his duty by his people. He had made representations of their interests and of their condition, and had exhorted the Government repeatedly, though without success, to give attention to the matter. We were told by the First Minister that the production of the papers at that time would hurt Bishop Grandin. I answered him, that the production of such papers was necessary to preserve the honor, to maintain the authority and in the true interest of those dignitaries, whether they be officers of the Government of Canada, or officers of the church of that country; and I say so now. I say once again, that you cannot believe, in the face of the fact that the officers of the Government in that country still hold their office—you cannot believe but that they have reported from time to time, and fully, to the Government, what the position of that country was, and what was going on. Have they or have they not? if they have not, how does it come that Government dares to meet Parliament with these men still in office. If they have, is it not of the last consequence that we should see what their reports say, and understand what the situation of affairs was? one way or the other—these men are unfit for their duty wholly, and proved to be unfit, or they have reported. If they have not reported, how are they in office? if they have reported, why have we not their report? It is utterly impossible, Sir, to escape from the view, the men being retained in office, that those reports have been made. It was their first duty, their first charge, to have made them, if their duty was fully performed. Then, Sir, there is another report to which I have already referred, which has been suppressed, the report of Colonel Houghton, of the 28th July previous, when he reported the condition of affairs in that country at that time, when he went to get the arms, and which report the Minister of Militia declines to give us, but which gave most important information as to the condition of that country, information which indicated what the duty of Government was, in a very plain way. Now, Sir, the Government has not ventured, much as it ventures upon the fidelity, not to say the subserviency, of this Legislature—the Government has not ventured openly to aver that it would not bring down the papers. Towards the close of last Session I made further demands. As to some, the First Minister, and as to some, the present Minister of Finance, then acting as Minister of the Interior, answered me that there were such and such papers, and that they would be brought down. And this Session, having appealed four times, or five, to the First Minister upon this subject, he has at length stated that the Government was about to bring down spontaneously the papers of the North-West. Why? Because he acknowledges it his duty to do so, because he acknowledges that it is his obligation towards this House to bring down these papers. And why not now? Because they are now in course of preparation! Sir, the rebellion commenced a year ago, Parliament has been prorogued for six or seven months, we have met now for three weeks, and if an obligation is admitted to bring down papers to Parliament, does it not imply, and necessarily involve, the obligation to have these papers ready for Parliament, to bring them down in time to Parliament? Does it not, at any rate, involve the proposition that so long as you tell us that your neglect of your duties has prevented you from preparing the papers and from implementing your obligation, so long as you ought not to press on with the decision of the cause, that you will not, with one hand, force a motion into the Speaker's hands, insisting upon a decision on it, and put the other hand behind your back and say: In our own good time; after you have a decision of the question, we will bring down as many papers as we think it safe to bring down, or as we think we cannot escape from bringing down, and leave you to prove how many more you know of, or to move a committee of enquiry, or some other futile step, because we do not know what are the papers which remain. Sir, the First Minister, when I first called upon him this Session, declared that he would look at the demands which I made last Session, and give me an answer. Two or three times I appealed to him, and he said that he had not been able yet to go through it all, and in the end he said to me: Really, the documents were so numerous, would cover such a large amount of ground, that he must ask me to do it myself, must now ask me once again to say what it is I want. Whereupon I asked whether any papers were to be brought down spontaneously, to which the hon. gentleman replied, yes. I suppose that nobody here was so very innocent as not to understand the meaning of the First Minister's observations. He was extremely anxious to put it upon me, who have not access to his department and his pigeon-holes, who do not know all the papers that are there, who cannot tell what he has got, to specify all that I may have heard of, and thus to limit the scope of his obligation and his duty. Sir, he acknowledged that he had a duty, that duty he has neglected, and still persistently neglects. I say that we ought not to proceed with the enquiry at this time. I believe, Sir, that the proposal which is now being made is one to put the cart before the horse. My opinion is, and always has been, that it was necessary that the debate of which the hon. gentleman proposed the resumption, should be proceeded with, that it should be fully discussed in Parliament, that it should be debated and decided here; but my opinion also is, that an essential element in a final judgment and satisfactory conclusion of that question is a thorough threshing out of the events which preceded the rebellion, and of the conduct of the Government with reference of all those events, and an ascertainment of the relative measure of the responsibility of the Government and of the half-breeds in that regard. I do not think these questions can conveniently, owing to the great magnitude of each of them, be conjoined; and am of opinion that it is putting the cart before the horse to dispose of this question first and the others afterwards. But the Government, by the use of its majority, and for various obvious purposes, has chosen to put the cart before the horse and to propose that this question should be decided first, before the other question which is, in order of time, in order of convenience, in order of reason and common sense, the first to be discussed and threshed out. Well, we are obliged to submit to the decision of the majority as to the time and mode in which the trial of the Government will take place. They have selected, apparently, an accuser, they have framed an indictment, they have got hold of a jury, they are now deciding what the evidence shall be against themselves. I say that the form of procedure being selected by themselves, the least that should happen to us is that, at any rate, we should get the evidence before we are called on to decide the cause. I do not believe, Sir, that in any other Parliament in the world would a motion, such as the hon. gentleman has just now made, prevail. I do not believe any House in which the forms of constitutional government and parliamentary government still represent its substance are still animated by its spirit, would allow a motion to bring down material evidence to be superseded at the instance of the accused by a proposal to proceed to judgment. I shall not believe it in spite of what I see before me, in spite of what I fear. Until I see it, I shall not believe that this Parliament will deliberately determine to proceed to judgment in preference to obtaining the evidence material to form the judgment. It may be so, but if so, I shall deeply regret it, and I shall know, of course, what inferences to draw as well as regards those who propose as those who support such a course.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, may rely upon this, that the public of Canada will know what inference to draw from the position which he has taken upon this question since the House opened. We have had to day a speech from him, one of a series of speeches which he has delivered since the House opened, in which he has endeavored, if possible, to shield himself from the embarrassment in which he and his party find themselves, under the pretence that they have not the information which will enable them to come to a judgment upon this question. What has been the history of this agitation? Do hon. members from the Province of Quebec who commenced this agitation the day after, or, rather, the very day of the hanging of the unfortunate man, Louis Riel, pretend to say there is no information before Parliament and the country which will enable them to judge of the wisdom or otherwise of the act of the Government in permitting the execution to take place? Are they prepared to say that those meetings which were held in Quebec, that that great inaugural meeting which was held on the Champ de Mars at Montreal, that that effigy burning, which I am bound to say was a disgrace to the party politics of Canada, in which too many of them indulge, and sustained by their presence—do they pretend now to say that all those things took place under circumstances which rendered it impossible for them to find a fair judgment as to whether the Government were right or wrong in the course which they pursued? The hon. gentleman has, since the opening of this House, on more than one occasion called for papers; but he has been most careful not to specify the particular papers which he asks from the Government. He has not ventured to put his finger upon a particular paper which he desires and which he says should be furnished. He has not ventured to take the responsibility of stating the documents he asks, and which he says are absolutely necessary to enable him to form a judgment upon this question. We had, last Session, from that hon. gentleman a speech of six hours—seven hours, if I mistake not—an admirable speech from his point of view, a speech in which he indicated most clearly his own conception of his public duty—that of holding a brief for his party—in which he came before this House with that brief in his hand, endeavoring to arraign the Government for their conduct in the management of the North-West Territory; and after that speech, based upon information which the Government had furnished him, after that speech in which he cited document after document, which he held justified the condemnation of the Government, he now comes forward and tells the House and the country, forsooth, that the Government have concealed the papers which would lead to their condemnation and have refused to bring those papers down, furnishing only such as they please. Sir, what are the papers that have been brought down? Has there been a single petition from the people of the North-West suppressed?

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Has there been a single letter, so far as the hon. gentleman can name it, from anyone in the North-West suppressed?

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Have we not the letters from Bishop Grandin, of Father André and of Father Vegreville; have we not the petitions of the half-breeds of the North-West, complaining that delays were taking place in the administration of affairs connected with their lands and in the settlement of the question of the Indian title? Have we not all those petitions brought down?

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No? Let the hon. gentleman look at the blue book.

Mr. BLAKE. I have.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Let the hon. gentleman look at the Sessional Papers of last Session.

Mr. BLAKE. I have.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Where, then, did the hon. gentleman get those petitions which he cited here last Session? Where did he get the letters? Where did he get those documents upon which he arraigned the Government for neglect of duty in not bringing down papers and information to Parliament? I have no hesitation in saying that as one I recognise to the fullest extent the duty of the Government to furnish this House with all the information necessary to be laid before Parliament. I recognise at the same time the equal responsibility of the Government of the day to withhold, if they think proper, such papers as in their judgment in the public interest should be withheld.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I tell the hon. gentleman this, and I leave it to the future to decide whether I am right or not, that as to the papers to which he refers as having been suppressed, the private communications which the First Minister, last Session, declared he could not at that time bring down, if they are brought down the hon. gentleman will find that the Government, instead of suppressing papers which would militate against themselves, suppressed papers which bore testimony to the truth of the position they took and in relation to which they certainly, on party grounds and on personal grounds, had no reason whatever to fear publication. What is the particular motion which is now brought up by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), and in relation to which this motion has been made as an amendment? It is a motion for petitions sent to the Government praying for the commutation of the sentence or for the execution of the sentence passed on the unfortunate man, Louis Riel. Are we to be told in Parliament that the judgment of the Executive is to be formed by public petitions from people praying for commutation or for the execution of the death sentence? Are we to be told that the solemn responsibility that rests on the Executive is to be affected by popular clamor of one kind or another? Is that the hon. gentleman's conception of his duty, if he were Minister of Justice to-day as he was Minister of Justice in the past? Is this question which is before us to-day going to be affected in any way whatever by the production of any petitions either for or against the commutation of the sentence on Louis Riel?

Mr. BLAKE. Why did you give a list of them in your own blue book?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). We have given a list of them; and there, Mr. Speaker, is the statement of the hon. gentleman. Did we conceal anything? Would he have known any more if the words of the printed headings—for that is what most of them were—had been put there—if they had been brought down with a list of the names attached to them? Was that going to alter the judgment of the House in the matter? Why, Sir, the fact that the list of petitions was put in, the fact that the Government frankly stated in the report which they brought down to Parliament, that there were petitions, and gave the number of those petitions in the Blue Book they submitted to this House—the very fact that they did that, is a proof that they did not want to shield themselves against the suggestion that, in spite of petitions, they have permitted the execution to take effect. Sir, the hon. gentleman pretends that he has not got information enough upon which he can decide this question. For one, Sir, I think it would be a most unfortunate thing if we had to deal with the whole question of the administration of affairs in the North-West and the execution of Louis Riel, as one question. They are not one question. Admit every single thing which the hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Laurier) so eloquently said last night, in a speech of which,—although I differ from him altogether, and I trust I shall be able before this debate is closed to show that his appreciation of the facts was not at all accurate—in a speech of which I, as a Canadian, am justly proud, because I think it is a matter of common pride to us that any public man in Canada can make, on the floor of Parliament, such a speech as we listened to last night; but I say, admit for the sake of argument, everything he said; admit that there was delay in settling the Indian title of the half-breeds; admit that there was delay in settling the land question; admit, for the sake of argument, that their petitions were unanswered—will the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), the leader of the Opposition, take the responsibility of saying that that justified the rebellion in the North-West? Does it justify the bereavement of the families who have been brought to grief throughout this country, the Metis in the North-West, the English people of Manitoba and Ontario, who to-day find their hearths desolate by the absence of loved ones—will he pretend to say that these delays justified a rebellion which brought about that condition of things? The execution of Louis

Riel, his conduct in connection with that rebellion, must stand by itself, and it does stand by itself with information far more sufficient to enable a judgment to be formed upon it than was the information which the hon. gentleman had fifteen years ago, when he paraded Ontario from one end to the other against “the red-handed murderer,” as he described Louis Riel, and when by the purchase—I cannot say by him, but certainly under circumstances which were at least suspicious in relation to the matter—by the purchase of a man who betrayed his colleagues, and by appeals to the very classes in the Province of Ontario whom his friends are now so violently denouncing, he managed to obtain office. I say he did this, Mr. Speaker, on evidence far less than that which he has to-day, and which, unfortunately—so little capable is he, according to his own judgment, of forming an opinion on a subject of this kind—he considers insufficient to enable him to say whether Louis Riel was justly executed, whether he justly expiated his crimes on the gallows, or whether, on the other hand, he should have been reprieved—should have been set at liberty in order that in a few years more he might, if possible, inaugurate another rebellion. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has counted without his host, if he thinks he can divert public attention from this question by talking of the absence of papers. I tell him that he will find—and I have predicted with regard to him before in Parliament, and my predictions have turned out to be correct—he will find that when he comes to face his constituents, and his followers at his back from the Province of Ontario, when they come to face their constituents, will find that the people there are not going to be told that all that has occurred during the last eighteen months is a blank to them, and they cannot make up their minds whether this man committed a crime sufficient to justify his execution, or whether he did not. The whole thing is an attempt to draw a red herring across the trail, which the hon. gentleman will find to have been a fatal mistake. I predict it now, and he will realise before he is very much older that my prediction has been a true one.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire to say that the hon. gentleman has misunderstood a part of my speech. I did not say that the absence of these papers would disable me from forming a judgment. On the contrary, I have said that in the absence of these papers I knew what inferences I should draw, and I am prepared to draw them. I am prepared to give my vote and my reasons for my vote, and will do so before this debate is over; but I did say that it would be infinitely—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not out of order; I am perfectly in order, but I did say—and here is where the hon. gentleman misunderstood me—that it would be much more satisfactory to this House that the material for a judgment should be placed before it is called on to decide.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). This, Mr. Speaker, is another of the many attempts made by the Government—hon. gentlemen on the other side are prepared to decide this question and render their verdict, evidence or no evidence; it is of no kind of consequence to them. As soon as the Minister of Public Works cracks the ministerial whip they will vote according to his dictation; I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is another of the many attempts made by this Government to cripple this discussion and to stifle the enquiry that we are endeavoring to make with respect to the conduct of this Administration. The hon. member for Cardwell ventures upon a prediction. He says that the public of this country will be able to draw their inferences from the conduct of my hon. friend from West Durham. There is another inference which the people of this country will be able to draw, and which they will draw from the conduct of this Administration in destroying, in mutilating and in refusing to submit to Parliament the evidences of their own misconduct, that inference is that the Government have something to conceal. The hon. gentleman says that we have all the papers before us that are necessary to form an opinion on this subject, and he refers to the discussions which took place last year, and the papers which were then before Parliament. Why, does not the hon. gentleman know that what we are now discussing is an entirely different question from that which we were discussing last year? We were then discussing the question of the grievances of the half-breeds, and then, as now, in every movement we made we were crippled by the action of the Administration. They refused then to produce the papers, and my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake), day after day, week after week, and month after month, made motion upon motion, and besought the Administration to bring down papers upon which to form an opinion; but the Government delayed until the closing hour of the Session, and the documents upon which to form an opinion had not been printed by Parliament. So it is now. Documents are required to judge of the conduct of the Administration, to form a clear opinion upon their conduct, have many of them been suppressed. Fortunately, in the papers submitted to Parliament last Session, in those brought down this Session, and from other sources, we have sufficient to justify any reasonable man in coming to the conclusion that the conduct of this Administration, from the beginning to the end—from the outbreak to the closing of the rebellion, to the closing scene at Regina, was such as to deserve the condemnation of this country. The hon. gentleman asks, are we prepared to justify a rebellion? We do not pretend to justify the rebellion; but we say that the responsibility for the rebellion, with all its consequences—the loss of life, the shedding of human blood, the ruin and desolation of the homes of the half-breeds,—rests on the shoulders of hon. gentlemen opposite; and they know it. Why, Sir, one of their own officials says—and they will find it in the last report of the Department—that the Indians of the North-West were forced to join the rebels because they were starved; and yet we are told that the conduct of the Government prior to the rebellion has been fair and honest conduct. The Minister of Public Works, when he undertook to defend the Government, two or three days ago, stated, candidly enough I suppose, that he desired that this should be a fair, an open, a full discussion—that the Government had nothing to conceal, that they desired to disclose everything, and that he was delighted to have the opportunity of meeting his accusers face to face; but the hon. gentleman has taken good care not to submit to Parliament the very documents on which hon. members may be enabled to form an opinion on this case. In a pamphlet that has been scattered broadcast throughout the Dominion, printed at a printing office owned by a member of Parliament, they have set forth some of the petitions against the execution of Louis Riel. If they publish the petitions against the execution of Louis Riel, is there any reason why they should not publish those in favor of that execution? We know that there were petitions, letters, telegrams, insisting on the Government carrying out the law, and yet not a single one of those documents is submitted to Parliament. The Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Militia, and the Minister of Inland Revenue knew perfectly well the influences that were brought to bear on the Administration, to induce them to let the law take its course with respect to Louis Riel; and yet not a single one of the documents showing that influence has been submitted to Parliament. Is it pretended that any of those resolutions and other documents I read to the House, asking the Government to let the law take its course, threatening them with the loss of support if they did not do so, and directing that copies should be sent to Sir John Macdonald, have not been submitted to the Government? and if they have been, I say Parliament ought to be put in possession of them. The hon. gentleman tells us we have all the documents we require. Have we the reasons why the Crown did not proceed with the prosecution against Jackson? We know, as a matter of fact, that the counsel for the Crown in that case declined to proceed; we believe that the Government so directed him; and if that is so, we ought to have the instructions which were given to the Crown counsel on that subject. We also know that the First Minister charged that the rebellion was caused by the conduct of the white settlers. If so, why were the white settlers not prosecuted? I am told the report as to that is not down yet. And hon. gentlemen see fit to force on this discussion in the absence of all these documents. We know that Father McWilliams wrote a letter to a high official in this country; we believe the Government are in possession of that letter. Why is it not produced? Now, Sir, I am not very much surprised at the conduct of this Administration, as a general rule; but I am a little surprised at the course of the Minister of Justice. He was a judge; he has only lately descended from the Bench and laid aside the ermine, to enter the political arena. When he was a judge, I know from report that he held the scales of justice in an honest hand. But evil communications corrupt good manners, and the moment he gets beside his colleagues he lays aside the impartiality that he exercised as a judge. I ask him if, when he was a judge, a criminal were brought before him, and the Crown counsel had suppressed and concealed or mutilated one-half of the evidence, what would he, holding the scale of justice, have said, of such conduct on the part of the Crown prosecutor? He would probably have recommended the Law Society to strike his name off the roll. On the other hand, suppose he was trying a prisoner, and one-half of the evidence that would exculpate him and relieve him from the punishment that he would receive, if convicted, were suppressed by the Crown prosecutor, would the Minister of Justice have forced on the trial? Not at all; he would not have allowed the case to go on until the matter was fairly and honestly placed before the court. But when he becomes a politician he acts in a different sense. He is quite willing now that a verdict should be given by this House with one-half of the evidence before it. Why? Because his colleagues are the offenders, and are now on their trial before the people of this country. The hon. gentleman tells us we have all the papers. Where are the papers moved for by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot)? He had four or five motions on the Notice paper. Those motions were passed by this House and assented to by the Government; and yet scarcely a single document that he asked for have the Government seen fit to bring down. I myself have submitted motions for documents of the first consequence to enable us to decide this case, but they have not been brought down. What has become of the diary of Louis Riel, which I believe would throw a flood of light on the conduct of the Administration, and very likely on the question of the sanity or insanity of Riel? The Government have these papers in their hands, and yet the Minister of the Interior tells us with his usual composure that we have all the papers we require to enable us to form a judgment on this case. What has become of the minute book containing the Order in Council of the insurgents' council? Is that not of essential consequence to the forming of a fair and reasonable opinion on this case? So far as I am concerned, I said, when I addressed myself to this question, that I felt embarrassed because these documents were not submitted to the House. It is true, we have the judge's charge; but who has seen it? The truth of the matter is, the Government are afraid to produce these documents—afraid of the consequences of their production—afraid that this country will condemn them on their production: and they refuse to produce them. And yet the Minister of the Interior tells us that these documents, if produced, would relieve the Government of all responsibility, and exculpate them. If the Government had any documents that would relieve them of their responsibility and of the consequences of their actions, neither the people of Canada nor the members of this House are so green as not to know that they would be submitted to Parliament. What are the Government afraid of? We have moved for these documents and we are anxious to see them. If they will exculpate the Government, bring them down. But we know that that is not the case. The fact of the matter is, this Government is treating this House as they treated Louis Riel. They decided to hang him before they had a report of the medical commission, and now they want to get at the hands of Parliament a snap verdict of acquittal without producing the evidence, because the evidence will incriminate themselves. The people of the country, when called on to pronounce on the question—and I do not care how soon, in the light of the prevarication of the Government, in the light of their concealment of documents, in the light of the fact that they have mutilated documents and eliminated from the report material portions of the report itself, in the light of the fact that by their own organs and some of their leading men they have been accused of being the authors of, and having provoked, the rebellion—how soon the Government will appeal to the country; and I venture this opinion, that among those who will not come back will be the hon. member for Montreal by way of Cardwell.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Before being called on to record my vote on the amendment proposed by the hon. Minister of Public Works, I must explain why I shall oppose it. I am ready to pronounce judgment on the main question. I have enough information to form a sound judgment upon it, but political friends in our Province, who are here, refused, when called on to give their opinion by their electors, to give it, for the reason that they wanted to give fair play to the Government, and to give the Government every occasion of giving to the House all the documents and information they had in reference to this question. They said: We do not want to condemn the Government hastily. Moreover, at the beginning of the session the Government organs asked us not to press any motion bearing on this question, but to give fair play to the Government and to afford hon. members who had not formed any opinion—because they pretended they had not sufficient information—an opportunity to obtain information. Also upon the very legitimate demand of the leader of the Opposition, asking us not to press any motion in amendment to the Address, because he wanted the documents which the Government had promised to bring down, before being called upon to judge the question. I thought it was only fair that we should allow those hon. gentlemen an opportunity of forming their opinions, and it was in accordance with the desire expressed by them that we took the stand we take. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. White) said, speaking against the motion brought by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot): Why bring those petitions asked for by this motion; they have no bearing in any way; they have had no influence on the question? Well, this is the first time that I hear it stated that petitions sent by the people to the Government or to the House of Commons are to be treated in this way. My impression was that petitions were one of the forms of constitutional means to bring to the Government and the House of Commons a knowledge of public opinion, and I thought they should be better received than the Minister of the Interior seems disposed to receive them. I do not wonder now that the petitions sent to the Government from the North-West for so many years received so little attention. The Minister of the Interior, pointing to the French-speaking members, referred to the meetings that took place in the different parts of Quebec, and spoke of the burning of effigies as disgraceful to the cities where those burnings took place. Well, he who resides in Montreal ought to be better versed as to the burning of effigies on the Champ de Mars. I condemned myself the burning of effigies which took place after the 16th November; but these were not the first burning of effigies that took place in Montreal. The hon. gentleman ought to have remembered that in 1849 effigies were burned in Montreal, and something more than effigies; and if those burnings took place, I can say that they were not the work of French Canadians, but of the Tories of that time.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Whom you have supported ever since.

Mr. DESJARDINS. No, Sir.

Mr. BOWELL. And they are now the Grits.

Mr. DESJARDINS. The population of Montreal had that example in view probably when the burning of effigies took place. As for us, we are satisfied with constitutional meetings—regular, quiet and loyal meetings—to give expression to our opinions, and we thought it our duty to do so. I think it but fair that when such motions as my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), and other motions of that kind are made, they should receive at the hands of the Government the credit and attention they are entitled to.

Mr. AMYOT. When we had the pleasure and honor of hearing the Minister of Public Works speech, he told us, after having stated that the place for discussion was not the hustings, thereby exhibiting the scandalous spectacle of a Ministry divided among themselves—he said the proper place for the discussion was in Parliament, and then he added:

“But to-day, here before the representatives of the people, before our peers and judges, that are to give their verdict either for or against us, we can be heard, and we intend to be heard, and we intend to explain the position of the Government, what we have done, why we did it, and also the reasons why we should be sustained by this House.”

Since many days we have heard of petitions sent in to the Executive against the commutation of Riel's sentence and in favor of his execution. We want to know if there were any such petitions. The blue book does not give even a list of those petitions or the names of the petitioners, and it is certainly a mistake on the part of the hon. member to say that the blue book contains them. The blue book does not say there were any petitions calling for blood, and my motion asks for the production of those petitions. What is the reason that is given for withholding this information? The Government says it is against the public interest. Does the Government believe that in order to understand exactly what is in the public interest, we must hold a portfolio? Does the hon. gentleman think that, when we are members, selected by counties to represent them in Parliament, we are not judges of that also? And when the Government have said they would give all the information to the House, does the hon. gentleman think that he can withdraw that statement to-day? In the name of my friends from the Province of Quebec, I beg of the Minister of Public Works to use his great influence and his position as leader of the House, in the absence of the Premier, to obtain that information. I ask it on behalf of the members from the Province of Quebec, who form part of the majority of peaceful men in this Dominion; I ask him to give us the information as to those who love peace and harmony in this Confederation, and those who will only be satisfied when their thirst for blood is satisfied. We want to know who are in sympathy with the finding of the jury, and who are those who will have blood in any case, notwithstanding the finding of the jury. We want now, for later it will be too late, to know the whole cause of this rebellion. The hon. Minister who spoke says we have enough information to explain the rebellion. He made the first admission we have had that there were some causes bringing about that rebellion. To-day we had a long and excited speech in reply to the most admirable speech of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) who proved last night, that the Government not only ignored the law, but ignored the petitions presented to them on behalf of the half-breeds, and to-day the Ministers admit that there are causes sufficient to justify the rebellion. We have not sufficient evidence to show us all those causes, but, no doubt, we have enough to enable us to decide rightly as public men on this motion. The Minister of Justice will admit, I am sure, that, in order to decide as judges, we should have the whole record before us. It was only yesterday that I could investigate the record, which is now upstairs, and I was struck by finding that a great part of it is not in the blue book. The charges of the judges and divers incidents of the trial are not printed there in a blue book which purports to be the whole record, but which is not so. Why it is not I will leave the Ministers to say; but it is most extraordinary that anyone should have the audacity to put before Parliament a record in an incomplete shape. They say that the part which is withdrawn is in favor of the Government. My answer to that is that the fact of the Government withdrawing that part of the record from the public would be in itself sufficient to withdraw from them the confidence of the public. The conduct of the Government in this case has been very extraordinary from the beginning. First, there is a motion made. I will not accuse the mover, and I will not accuse his intentions, but it is known—and, if it is not, I will make it known—that his motion was made without consulting the other members of this House who are in favor of that motion. It was proposed at a time when the Government had not put the papers before the House; and the second step was to come in with a motion for the previous question, so that the debate would go on from day to day and from hour to hour until a decision was arrived at, without the production of the necessary documents. What is the necessary consequence? Some of the members from Ontario, not being cognizant, perhaps, as others may be, of the facts of the case, will have to support the Government, and the game will be won. If we have any consideration for the public and for our individual honor, we must insist upon having the whole case brought before the House, upon having the whole of the documents before us, and then there will be no excuse for any member when he comes before his constituents, and has to answer for the verdict which the Minister of Public Works said the Government were expecting from this House. The hon. Minister of the Interior said the agitation in the Province of Quebec was a disgrace. Well, over 200 municipal councils, over 300 public meetings, over 300,000 people have made that agitation, and they were led by the organ of the hon. Minister of Public Works all the time; and, if there has been any disgrace, it is due to the one who has reached the position of being the leader in his Province, and it is upon his own colleagues that the hon. gentleman is laying the blame, though the Minister of Public Works has been snubbing those who had the courage to face the disgrace which he referred to before the public. All these affirmations show the Government cannot boldly come before the House and say: Here is the whole record, here are the whole of the facts, here are the whole of the documents; read them carefully, and we are not afraid of the appeal to the people when the decision of the House comes before the country. But there is something to hide at the bottom of all that. Beginning with the telegrams of the Medical Commissioners, the decision arrived at before the commission was sent out, continuing with the telegrams that must have been sent from Winnipeg to Ottawa by the Minister of Militia to the Prime Minister, and with those petitions and letters and telegrams pressing for the hanging and asking for blood, there is something to hide everywhere. We cannot reach the bottom, and everything will remain hidden for some time, perhaps; but, sooner or later, the country will get at the truth, and the country will know the causes of the rebellion and the justice of our pretensions.

Motion agreed to.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Landry: "That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution ;" and the motion of Sir Hector Langevin : "That this question be now put."

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker : Last night, at an hour far advanced, I moved the adjournment of this debate. For several days the time of this House has been occupied in the discussion of this most important subject, and I must say that I hail with pleasure the opportunity which is furnished me to-day of submitting to Parliament and to the country the view which I have taken from the beginning of the now historical Riel question, and the reasons which actuated me in the conduct which I considered it my duty to take in reference to it. Of all the charges that can be levelled against a public man, of all the grave accusations which can be brought against a public man in the discharge of his official duties, I think the most infamous is that of being a traitor to his country, a traitor to his people. For weeks, nay, for months, my hon. colleagues and myself have been traduced before public opinion in our Province. We have been accused of being traitors to our blood and traitors to our Province. Sir, I wish to ask to-day how came it that we could have laid ourselves open to such a grave charge. I want to know how it is possible that men, who for years and years have enjoyed the confidence of their countrymen, of the friends who support us in Parliament, should have rendered themselves guilty of the charge which has been brought against us. Sir, under circumstances of extreme difficulty, knowing as we did know, and as it was our duty to know, what public opinion was in the Province of Quebec in regard to this question, we have been charged with being traitors to our people and our Province, because we allowed the law to take its course. We did so because we considered it our duty not to interfere with the carrying out of the sentence against Louis Riel. Mr. Speaker, I consider it my duty ; I consider, moreover, that I would not be displaying that courage which every public man should possess in the performance of the duties entrusted to him, if I were not to state, from my place, to Parliament and the country, that if similar circumstances should arise again to those which took place last year, I should do exactly as I did on that occasion. I do not wish, Sir, to be misunderstood. I felt, and I feel to-day, more than I can express, how painful was the duty which we were called upon to perform. I felt that it was not a light thing to sever those ties, political and social, which had bound me to those friends and countrymen who had entrusted me with their confidence and who withdrew it on that occasion. But I felt that it was my imperative duty to my own Province of Quebec, which I love so much, to take the course I did ; and I say again, notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen opposite may say, that if the same circumstances should arise again, I would do exactly as I did before. Sir, I am glad to be able to say that since this debate commenced it has, with few exceptions, been conducted in a manner befitting the gravity of the question under discussion, and in a manner of which we have no reason to be ashamed. In doing my little share in this discussion, and in the presentation of my views, I hope I shall be able to follow that which has already been set by several hon. gentlemen, and that I shall do so without injuring the feelings of those who differ with me. Sir, I think I am expressing the opinion of all my friends, which opinion has already been expressed by my hon. colleague the Minister of Interior, in saying that we all feel proud in having as a member of this House, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), in view of the speech which he made last night. It was a speech of which I believe I am safe in saying any Parliament could be proud, and in discussing the question which to him, coming from the Province of Quebec, as to me coming from the same Province, is one certainly which must have appealed to his feelings, as he showed it did during the delivery of that speech,—I say, he has conducted the discussion in such a way as I hope will have a beneficial effect on the whole debate. I have said that I considered it was my bounden duty to my country, to my Province, to act as I have acted as an adviser of the Crown. Mr. Speaker, as Ministers of the Crown, occupying, as we do, the Treasury benches, we are here representing, not one individual Province but the whole Dominion of Canada. I deemed it was an obligation for us, occupying those positions, to maintain the peace and order in the Dominion. I considered it our duty to maintain the credit of this country at home and abroad. I considered that was our duty as Ministers of the Crown, responsible for the peace of the citizens inhabiting this country. I say more. We know, from the public documents of this Parliament, how much treasure Canada has been investing for the purpose of bringing to our vast and fertile prairies of the west, the population of the overcrowded centres of Europe. It is necessary, if we are to hold out inducements to immigrants to come to Canada and to settle in happy homes in our country, to show that Canada can protect those who entrust their future to her care. It is necessary for us to show that, whether in the extreme North-West or in the older Provinces, the Government of Canada is sufficiently strong to protect her people and to maintain law and order. It was important from that standpoint that there should be no uncertain sound about the action of the Government. It was important that it should be known abroad, in the old country and all over Canada that the Dominion was strong enough, vast as are her territories, to maintain, as I have stated, law and order in every portion of her domains. We have, moreover,—and this is a most important feature, as I understand it, in the present debate—thousands of an Indian population in the North-West. I believe every man who desires to see Canada advancing and prosperous must feel that, having acquired those territories which formerly were the uncontested homes of the Indians, we should be true and loyal to those whom we have taken under our protection. We have a large number of Indians in that territory who have a right to expect that they shall be loyally and kindly treated, that the treaties into which they have entered with the Government shall be scrupulously carried out ; but it is of the greatest importance that they should also learn that peace and order must be maintained in those territories. It is of the greatest importance that they should understand that whatever grounds there may be for agitation, there is a constitutional way of agitating. A constitutional agitation will always achieve results much more satisfactory than those secured by violence ; and I say, therefore, that, whatever the complaint may be, the people of Canada should understand that they can only agitate in a constitutional way without appealing to force, violence and arms. Under those circumstances we felt that it was of the utmost necessity that we should allow the law of the land to take its course in the case of Louis Riel, and not to interfere with the carrying out of the sentence which had been passed. It would be useless for me, after the speeches which have already been delivered, to enter into the question of the origin of the Riel risings in the North-West. We all know the circumstances which led to the first rising. We know that Louis Riel, in 1870, organised a rebellion in the North West ; and it must be remembered that when the case which is now under review by this Parliament, is dealt with, that the second revolt and trouble which took place was also the work of the man who had originated and perpetrated the first. By organising those two revolts among the half-breeds, whom he so shamefully deceived, and which, for a moment, threatened to call into play all the Indian population of the North-West, it cannot be denied that Riel rendered himself guilty of one of the most heinous crimes of which a man in any country can be guilty. I consider that he deceived his people, that he tried to sell them and to carry out blackmail by consenting that if money were given to him by the Government, he would give up their cause, would retire and allow them to fall back upon their own resources. In doing this, I think he is not deserving of the sympathy of men who wish to go into this question calmly and dispassionately, who consider it from the standpoint of the interests of the country, from the standpoint merely of a duty which had to be performed by those who occupied responsible positions as advisers of the Crown. When we consider, reading as we have read, the history of these Indian wars, what might have been their result if these Indian tribes, who fortunately kept quiet to a very great extent, and who, if they did keep quiet, did not do so because Riel had not endeavored in every possible way to get them to help him in fighting the Government of his country—who, after considering what might have been the consequences of an Indian war, can for a moment have any sympathy with the movement which had been inaugurated by Riel? We know perfectly well that at the very beginning of the outbreak, when he had succeeded by his machinations in getting the Metis to withdraw their allegiance and their confidence from their clergy, from the missionaries who during so many years had been laboring so disinterestedly in the interests of the Metis nation—when we come to consider that at the beginning of the outbreak the first victims of Louis Riel and of his agitation were the two missionaries, Father Marchand and Father Fafard, I ask myself how it is possible to afford to Louis Riel the sympathy which in some quarters it has been attempted to make believe existed. When all the circumstances of this outbreak are fully gone into, when we come to consider the manner in which it was prepared and organised, when we come to consider the number of lives which it has cost the Dominion, the treasure that has been expended during the revolt, I say it was time for us to consider whether the most energetic possible means should not be taken to prevent the recurrence in the future of any such troubles as we had in the North-West. But, Sir, I hope that within the precincts of this Parliament we shall not find any hon. gentleman who will say that, in allowing the law to take its course, in not interfering with the execution of the sentence legally passed on Louis Riel the Government has sacrificed a martyr and a hero. I do not see how this is possible, although I have been reading, for the last several months, articles in newspapers which would really indicate that some of those who edited or wrote them must have considered that this man was a great hero and great martyr. I ask myself, reading the evidence which has been taken in his case, knowing the circumstances which attended the rising, knowing everything he did for the purpose of getting up the troubles in the North-West; I ask myself how it is possible that any person having at heart the interests of his country, should consider that the example of Louis Riel is one which should be held out to the admiration of the people of any country, or that he should be considered a hero and a martyr. Is he not the man who stirred up an Indian war with all its horrors? Is he not the man who wrote to Major Crozier that he wanted to commence without delay a war of extermination; and, Sir, upon that one point, I should like to read a very short extract from the evidence which has been taken during the trial and published in a pamphlet by the Government. At page 168 there is this letter which he addressed to Major Crozier:

"ST. ANTONY, March 21st, 1885.

"In case of non-acceptance, we intend to attack you when to-morrow (the Lord's Day) is over, and to commence without delay a war of extermination upon all those who have shown themselves hostile to our rights.

DAVID TOUROND.

PH. GARNOT, Secretary."

Here, Mr. Speaker, is this man who is held up as a hero, writing this letter wherein he states that his object is to get up a war of extermination. Can the signification of this letter be misunderstood? Can it be contended that that man, being carried away by his devotion to his people, wanted merely to agitate for the purpose of having rendered to them the justice which he had tried to get for them, when we see among the papers which have been produced, forming part of the evidence which has been taken in that case, that his object was to get up in the North-West a war of extermination? It was his purpose to get up a war the most horrible of all wars, an Indian war; and more especially so, among a population like that of the North-West which is so widely scattered over that country, not living together compactly like the population of the older Provinces of the Dominion, but where the settlers are living at considerable distances from each other, and where it is almost impossible for them to give help or succor to each other. It was under these circumstances that he intended, as is established by his own letter, by evidence which cannot be controverted, that he intended, as he states here, to get up a war of extermination. He took all the means that were at his disposal to get up such a war; he tried everything in his power to make his nefarious project a successful one; he used every means he could to get up a war which, so far as it went, had the most disastrous results for Canada, and which, if it had been complicated by an outbreak of the Indian population, would have been more terrible and more disastrous still.

I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

It being six o'clock, the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 18th March, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CASE OF LOUIS RIEL—PETITIONS FROM ORANGE LODGES.

Mr. TAYLOR asked, 1st, Were any, and how many, petitions sent by Orange lodges to the Government praying that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel for high treason be not commuted; and if any, from what lodges, and where situate? 2nd. Were any, and how many, copies of resolutions sent to the Government passed by either the Grand Orange Lodge, district, county or private lodges, to the same effect; and if any, by what lodges, and where were they located?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There have been no petitions sent by Orange lodges to the Government; there have been no copies of resolutions sent to the Government passed by either the Grand Orange Lodge or by district or county lodges to the same effect. The only things that have come to the Department over which I preside are: A letter from a member of Parliament transmitting certain representations from an Orange lodge, two petitions from the North-West, transmitted by Nicholas Flood Davin, and a private letter from a person of the name of Charles O'Hara, of Cranbourne, Quebec, which I lay before the House.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Landry (Montmagny): "That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution;" and the motion of Sir Hector Langevin: "That this question be now put."

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned, I was expressing the hope that within the precincts of this Chamber no hon. member would be found who, upon his responsibility, would say, as I read in some newspapers, that Riel was a hero, and that the Government had allowed him to be sacrificed and to be made a martyr. In the course of my remarks I read a letter which was addressed by Riel to Major Crozier, to show what kind of a hero Riel was—a letter in which he was expressing his determination to carry on a war of extermination. I shall to-day, Sir, supplement the information which that letter conveyed to us by reading another which Riel addressed to Poundmaker, and which proceeds to say:

"Since we wrote to you, important things have occurred. The police attacked us. We met them. God has given us a victory. Thirty half-breeds and five Crees stood the fight against one hundred and twenty men. After fighting during thirty-eight or forty minutes the enemy took flight.

"Bless God with us for the success that he has had the charity to give us. Rise up. Face the police. If possible, if it is not done yet, take Fort Bataille. Destroy it. Save all the provisions and goods, and come and join us. You are in sufficient numbers to send us a detachment forty or fifty strong.

"All that you do, do it for the sake of God Almighty, under the keeping of Jesus Christ, the Holy Virgin, St. Joseph and St. Jean Baptiste.

"(Signed) LOUIS DAVID RIEL, Excoedé."

This letter shows what kind of a hero Louis David Riel was. Now, Sir, with your permission I shall read a letter which was addressed to me some time ago by His Grace Archbishop Grandin, and which I now read to the House with his permission. The letter is dated the 12th of July, 1885. To avoid reading the original and translating it before the House, I have translated it myself, and I shall read to the House the translation I made. The original, however, is here, and can be given to Hansard; but so as not to inflict upon the House the reading of the letter in French and English, I thought it might be more convenient and more acceptable to the members if I read from the translation:

"HONORABLE AND DEAR SIR,—Assuredly the troubles in the North-West did not fail to worry you a great deal, and it seems to me that Your Honor must breathe more freely now that they are subdued. I fully share your satisfaction. However, I must add that, as to me, it is far from being complete. The rebellion has particularly wounded my heart; I have suffered when I saw our good half-breeds—deceived and terrified by a miserable maniac—despise our advice, mistrust our devotion, declare against the Government, against the Church and against God. Above all, I have been painfully affected when, at the voice of that sort of po-essed man, I saw the Indians rise and go to the extent of murdering persons who had never done them any wrong, who had never done them aught but kindness—persons who, like our dear missionaries, had sacrificed for them their very existence.

"The murders, the almost entire destruction of our settlements, the absolutely complete destruction of many others, the poverty, the uneasiness, the anguish of mind, the fear, the discouragement among the vanquished, the hatred and despair among many—this, above all, is what frightens me and causes me almost to forget my personal disasters. No doubt every one suffers more or less from this uneasiness and these sad forebodings; but it seems to me that I suffer therefrom more than any one."

Here is another extract from that letter, which I beg also to read:

"I forward to the Minister of Justice a petition in favor of the half-breeds compromised in this lamentable rebellion, not that I approved of it, far from this, but I positively know that these poor rebels have been shamefully deceived; their simplicity was prevailed upon, they were made to take up arms almost without being aware of it. A wretched man had carried their confidence by holding himself up as one Divine. They were convinced that he enjoyed a power almost Godly, they feared his anger and his threats; had his hand held the thunderbolt, they would not have dreaded him more. He did not reach this of a sudden. He has turned everything to his advantage, his former popularity, his reputation, the affection and the confidence his countrymen had for him, their truly religious and sometimes superstitious spirit, and, above all, their grievances against the Government. Well aware that in order to master them he absolutely needed the help of religion, he at first tried to secure the help of the clergy, whilst he was attempting to incite the half-breeds against the Government. It was but too easy for him to succeed upon the latter point, but he failed with the priests. To obviate this loss, he labored a long time to earn from his countrymen the reputation of being a saint and a great saint. He spent in prayers both days and nights. He would fast often and told everyone that his was a truly Divine mission. He wound up by giving himself as a man of God, and from that moment there was nothing to hinder him. Enjoying a Divine authority, he was superior to the clergy and to all religions; these words were always in his mouth, 'the will of God must be done.' Many of his countrymen were frightened at his excesses; as the priests had done, they wished to resist him; in the debates, he would conquer them with abuse, lies and threats; he caused them to be imprisoned, and even condemned them to death. Understanding that it was impossible to resist him, many took refuge either in Prince Albert or in the bush. When they returned they found themselves ruined as well as the others. So it is, honorable and dear Sir, that the greater part of the prisoners at Regina are victims specially of terrorism. They are more stupid than guilty, and, therefore, I claim indulgence towards them. When I asked this favor, I can say that I would be borne up by all reasonable persons in the country, of all nationalities and of all religious denominations."

The Bishop goes on to speak of the councillors who also were prisoners at Regina:

"As regards the councillors of this new Mahdi, how can they be justified. Alas! dear Sir, these poor people have positively been chosen on account of their ignorance and of their timorousness; in the meetings they dared not open their mouths, resolutions were passed in their name; when they did not even know what was the matter. To-day terror reigns amongst all the half-breeds of the district, nay, through all the nations, although they praise the noble conduct of General Middleton, who—said to me poor mothers and the missionaries—acted more like a father than as a conqueror."

These letters go to show what kind of a man Riel was. It is almost impossible, the more one goes into the history of this rebellion, the more one reads the documents and papers relating to it, to understand how even an attempt could be made to convert Riel into a hero. Not only have we got these letters which I have read, but we have got letters which I will not read, because they have been already submitted to the House, from Fathers André, Moulin, Vegreville, Lecoq, and Frère Piquet, who states positively that the rebellion was entirely the work of Louis Riel, and that he was perfectly sane. We have got, if it were necessary to complete the testimony adduced, evidence to show the disastrous plans entertained by Riel, and to show that he was perfectly capable, from the state of his mind, of carrying out his nefarious schemes. His own writing which he published, his last will and testament, his letters to his mother and to his wife, his farewell letters, his retraction of his religious errors—all these go to show that he was really in a sane state of mind and perfectly accountable for the acts of which he was found guilty. We have also evidence to show what his intentions were, for he tried to induce the Indians to join in his rebellion, and we have an interview, which was published in the newspapers, establishing beyond the possibility of doubt that he had tried to induce Crowfoot, one of the leaders of Indians, to rise in rebellion. We have undoubted proof that he tried to kindle an Indian war in 1879-80; we have also the evidence of Father André, which establishes beyond the possibility of discussion, that the motives of Riel in the agitation were interested, personal motives, and that he stated he was perfectly prepared to give up the Metis cause provided his claims against the Government were satisfied. We have, further, the very important piece of evidence, to my mind, that on the 2nd February, two months before the outbreak, Sir John sent a despatch to Nolin, which was communicated to Father André and to Riel, about the settlement of Metis matters. In this despatch there was no mention of indemnity to Riel, who, in consequence of this, decided to take up arms. We have all this evidence, which cannot be controverted, to show how far this man was deserving of the pedestal on which he is placed to-day as a hero before the people of Canada. Who forgets what an enormous amount of influence the sermon delivered by Father Dowd had upon the population of this country? Here is a gentleman who, being outside of all party questions, outside of any political consideration, having merely at heart the interest of his own people, states positively that he has had an interview with Bishop Grandin, and says:

"He had enjoyed the privilege of a personal interview with His Lordship Mgr. Grandin, Bishop of the North-West Territory, the scene of the late rebellion. From His Lordship's own lips he had heard the recital of all the atrocities that had been committed by the pagan Indians and easily deceived half-breeds, urged on by a bad and unscrupulous man; how poor missionaries had been butchered almost under His Lordship's eyes; how the half-breeds had been led to revolt not only against the Government of the country, but under their wicked leader had been induced to abandon their faith and turn their backs on the devoted clergy to follow that leader who wished to set aside Pope and Church, and all authority, ecclesiastical and civil."

But, Sir, there is more. In all that has been done by this unfortunate man, I think nothing was more deserving of the fate that followed his acts than the manner in which he tried to get the Indians to join in the troubles. I hold in my hand a letter addressed by Poundmaker and other Indians, dated, Cut Knife Hill, April 29th, 1885.

"To Mr. Louis Riel:

"I want to hear news of the progress of God's work. If any event has occurred since your messengers came away let me know of it. Tell me the date when the Americans will reach the Canadian Pacific Railway. Tell me all the news that you have heard from all places where your work is in progress. Big Bear has finished his work; he has taken Fort Pitt. 'If you want me to come to you let me know at once,' he said, and I sent for him at once. I will be four days on the road. Those who have gone to see him will sleep twice on the road. They took twenty prisoners, including the master of Fort Pitt. They killed eleven men, including the agent, two priests and six white men. We are camped on the creek just below Cut Knife Hill, waiting for Big Bear. The Blackfeet have killed sixty police at the Elbow. A half-breed who interpreted for the police, having survived the fight, though wounded, brought this news. Here we have killed six white men. We have not taken the barracks yet, but that is the only entire building in Battleford. All the cattle and horses in the vicinity we have taken. We have lost one man, a Nez Percé, killed, he being alone, and one wounded. Some soldiers have come from Swift Current, but I don't know their number. We have here guns and rifles of all sorts, but ammunition for them is short. If it be possible, send us ammunition of various kinds. We are weak only for the want of that. You sent word that you would come to Battleford when you had finished your work at Duck Lake. We wait still for you, as we are unable to take the fort without help. If you send us news, send only one messenger. We are impatient to reach you. It would encourage us much to see you, and make us work more heartily. Up to the present everything has gone well with us, but we are constantly expecting the soldiers to visit us here. We trust that God will be as kind to us in the future as He has in the past. We, the undersigned, send greeting to you all.

This letter is, to my mind, of very great importance, because it shows what really were the dangers which we were exposed to at the hands of that man. Now, I will address myself to another part of this case. I want to ask any hon.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

member who has followed this matter up, whether the Government have gone out of their way, whether they have gone out of any ordinary course of law to punish Riel? Have we not followed the laws which have been passed by this very Parliament? Have we not during the whole of the trial, as far as it was possible for the Government to do, met in every way the requests which were made to us by the counsel for the defence? The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), the other day, in addressing this House, stated that the trial had been an unfair one. I do not know how the hon. gentleman can say that this was an unfair trial, in any case he and his friends certainly do not agree on that subject. I read in a speech delivered by the hon. leader of the Opposition in London his appreciation of the manner in which the trial was conducted, and I see that he states there:

"I think it right to say that, in my opinion, Government acted in a proper spirit in providing for the attendance of the prisoner's witnesses; and that, from what I know of their leading counsel, I should think it impossible that in their management of the case there was anything unfair to the prisoner or derogatory to the high character they deservedly enjoy, or the responsible duties they undertook to perform. I am not implying, then, any present doubt as to the justice of the trial. For all my enquiries, it may have been perfectly just. Besides justice, in fact, the creation of a feeling of public confidence, of a general impression that all was fair and that every security was taken for fairness is important, and, in that view of the duties of the authorities, I think these questions should be examined."

But there is more than this, however high an authority this may be. There is also the testimony of one of the counsel for the defence—the testimony of Mr. Fitzpatrick, who in Montreal was interviewed, I believe, by a reporter of the Star. In the course of that interview he stated that the trial had been a fair trial, that it had been conducted as fairly as it was possible to be under the circumstances. As I stated yesterday, the responsibility which we had to take was a very considerable one, and I think that every hon. member here and every man outside of this House who really takes to heart the interest of Canada will consider that, in a matter of that importance, it became the bounden duty of the Government to consider what would be in the future the result of the course which we were following. Looking to the future of Canada and in the interests of that future, it seems to me that the head, the one who had got up two rebellions within such a comparatively short period, two rebellions which had cost so much treasure to Canada and so many valuable lives, should suffer the penalty of the crime which he had committed. It was important to teach, with a view to the future, those who had some supposed grievance, or who, believing that they had a grievance, imaginary or real, could simply follow the example given them by Riel in trying to do justice to themselves by taking up arms against the Government and the constitution. Such an example as has been given by this unfortunate man, who has paid the penalty of his high crime, certainly will teach others in the future that if they follow such an example they will become liable to the same fate, and that at any cost the constitution and the institutions of this country must be maintained and protected at all hazards. Nobody will doubt, I am sure, how deeply we felt the nature of the frightful penalty of death which it was our duty to sanction; but, Sir, the example of not only this country, but almost every other country, teaches us that that frightful penalty is, after all, the only means which society has of protecting itself against those who would attack it, and who refuse to respect the law and the constitutions which are established for the protection of society. Twice, Mr. Speaker, had Riel raised the standard of revolt—in 1870 and 1885. Now, I ask any reasonable man, inside or outside of the House, whether we would not have been recreant to our duty if we had allowed him to go on unpunished after a repetition of the rebellion which he had organised in 1869-70? Would we not almost have been inviting him to organise a third rebellion? Would we not have set an example likely to prove disastrous to this country in future? And if we had interfered with the sentence which was passed by the proper tribunal, would we not in effect have said to the world that the Government of Canada winked at such crimes as that rebellion, with all its frightful murders and other sad consequences? I think we would have failed in our duty, we would have lacked that courage which, as public men and as responsible Ministers of the Crown, we ought to possess, if we had not, having regard solely to our duty, allowed the law to take its course and the sentence to be executed. Sir, I stated in another place and at another time, that I hated rebellion, and that I had no sympathy for rebels, and I have been fiercely attacked for that statement. Well, Sir, I beg to-day to repeat that statement; I beg to repeat it from my place in Parliament, and to express the hope that all those who are dear to me, and all those who will bear my name, will always be true to the sentiment I expressed on that occasion. I go further, and I say I believe that the Province of Quebec, that Province of which I am so proud, and which is my native Province—I believe that that Province hates rebellion and has no sympathy for rebels. True it is, that in a moment of surprise public opinion, but a portion only of public opinion, may have been carried away by agitators who, for some object or other, desired to turn that public opinion against the Government of the day. True it is that for the moment a portion of that public opinion seemed to disapprove of the action of the Government in this now historical Riel matter. But, Sir, that surprise lasted only for a moment, and the reaction has already set in; the reaction is growing stronger and stronger every day, and I fear not, when the time comes, to appeal again to that public opinion upon the course which has been followed by the Government upon that matter, and I know my Province sufficiently well to be perfectly sure that the verdict will be that the Government did its duty under most painful and distressing circumstances—did its duty to the country, and that is what we were put here to do. Sir, I was pained to see in some of the papers published in this country, an accusation of disloyalty levelled against the Province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, those who have read the history of our country, those who know the history of the Province of Quebec, know very well, that in 1812, after that Province, or French Canada as it was called, had changed its allegiance and had passed from one flag to another—that Province, French Canada, stood by the Crown and resisted all the tempting offers which were made to them by the American Republic, to join in the fight against England, in which they were told they would have an opportunity of revenge. Sir, I claim for that Province—and I believe I express the opinion of all those who are in a position to speak for their fellow-countrymen—that in all this vast Dominion of Canada, among all the races which people it, among all the nationalities which make up our population and form the Canadian people, there is not one nationality, there is not one people more loyal and more true to the Crown of England than the people of the Province of Quebec. Sir, we want nothing but what is due to us. We care little if we are traduced in the columns of certain papers; we want nothing more than our rights, we want no privileges which are not accorded to others, but we want to be treated on an equal footing with everybody else. In any case, I can say that in the ranks of the Conservative party, at least, there are no disloyal men. Whether it be on the shores of the St. Lawrence, or whether it be on the banks of the Saskatchewan, when we shoulder our rifles it is for the purpose of maintaining the authority of the law and defending the Government of the country, not to aid and abet rebellion and rebels. I must say, Sir, that I was surprised when I read, if properly reported, a statement made by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). I read in the papers published in Montreal the following statement:—

“If I had been on the banks of the Saskatchewan when the rebellion broke out I would have taken up arms against the Government.”

Well, Mr. Speaker, I happened, shortly after reading this statement, to read over the oath of office which the hon. gentleman had taken on the 8th October, 1877, when he became a member of the Privy Council of Canada, and I read in that oath:

“I, Wilfred Laurier, do solemnly and sincerely swear that I will faithfully bear true allegiance to Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, as Sovereign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and this Dominion of Canada, dependent on and belonging to the same Kingdom, and that I will defend her to the utmost of my power against all traitorous conspiracies, and all attempts whatever which may be made against her person, Crown and dignity; and that I will use my utmost endeavors to disclose and make known to Her Majesty, her heirs or successors, all treason or traitorous conspiracies, and attempts which I shall know to be against her or any of them; and all this I do swear without any qualification, mental reservation or secret reservation.”

I believe the hon. gentleman who represents Megantic (Mr. Langelier) stated that that outbreak was not against the Crown but against the Government. That hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and I have no manner of doubt that he knows perfectly well that the British North America Act, section 9, declares:—

“The Executive Government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.”

Taking it whichever way the hon. gentleman pleases, he will see that the statement—which, of course, I suppose is properly reported (I know not whether such is the case, and I was not present at that great meeting when the hon. member for Quebec East delivered himself of that opinion)—is an extraordinary statement. I am very glad to say that within the ranks of the Conservative party at least we do not possess any gentleman who would, I believe, make such a statement. I stated that we simply did our duty towards Canada and towards the Province of Quebec. We claim for our people, for those who are the descendants of the very men who opened up to Christianity and civilisation this vast North American continent, equal rights with the people of other nationalities who inhabit the country. Upon that point we will never give in; I know, for one, I would not consent to give in upon any question of equality of rights with any other Province in the Dominion. In any case it is our interest to have a criminal law in this country which applies equally to French and English, to Scotch and Irish. There must be no law different for one man from that which is applicable to another; there must be no criminal law which applies to one nationality and does not apply to another nationality. We wish to be one Canadian people, united, happy and law abiding, and it is only on that condition we can carry out, or attempt to carry out, what I believe is reserved for us to do upon this continent. I, for one at least, can never agree to pressing upon the people of the Province of Quebec a feeling of jingoism which would be fatal to us. This feeling, if carried out, would mean isolation and the separation of the Province of Quebec from the other Provinces, and it would arouse against the Province of Quebec a hostile feeling from the other component parts of the Dominion. In reading up this Riel case I also observed that some people supposed that the people of the Province of Quebec were not in sympathy with the aspirations of the people of the other Provinces. I can assure this House that they are completely mistaken, if they suppose for one moment that sound public opinion in our Province is not in sympathy with sound public opinion in other Provinces; and they are also mistaken if they suppose for one moment that the people of the Province of Quebec are in sympathy with this Riel movement. The other night the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) denied, as I understood him, that it had been attempted to organise a French National Party upon the Riel question. Allow me to quote from the speech which the hon. gentleman delivered at the meeting on the Champ de Mars, and from that speech and the speech of Mr. Mercier and other evidence I possess, I want to know whether it is possible for the hon. member for Quebec East to ignore the fact that an attempt was made to organise a French National party in the Province of Quebec, that all party lines should disappear and a French National party be organised. Here is an extract of the speech which the hon. member for Quebec East delivered at the meeting on the Champ de Mars, as reported in La Patrie of 26th November, 1885 (translation):

"Henceforth there will be neither Liberals nor Conservatives; only the great national party composed of the old liberals and the old conservatives. If he was called upon to make an historical sketch of the grievances of the half-breeds, he might say that they had been the victims of all kinds of extortions, and he believes that in such a case none of his hearers would have hesitated in shouldering a musket to fight against shameless speculators."

Mr. Mercier, who was also present on the same occasion, stated (translation):

"In the face of these crimes, of these failings, what is our duty? We believe we have three things to do in order to punish the offenders: To break the alliance which our members have made with the Orangemen, and to seek, in a more congenial and less dangerous alliance, the protection of our national interests. To unite! How glad I feel when I pronounce this word! For twenty years past I have sought to unite the vital forces of the nation."

I believe, moreover, that shortly after that great meeting and several other meetings which were held, the object of which was to organize this National party, communications were made to my hon. colleague and friend the Secretary of State, wherein he was offered the leadership of that new French National party; that the Liberals and the Conservatives which would compose this new Liberal party, he was assured, would accept him as their leader. I notice that in making that assertion the hon. gentleman quoted some speeches, but, Sir, the only one which he did quote was a speech of the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), a Conservative at that time, and in making his statement about the organisation of the French National party he certainly did not quote any of Mr. Mercier's speeches, or the speeches delivered by any Liberals on that occasion. I cannot but ask myself the question, how it can be possible that our people in the Province of Quebec should have any admiration for Riel. As is well known, our people are sincere Catholics; they are led to a very great extent by their clergy, owing to the great attachment existing between the people and the clergy, and how could it be possible that the people of the Province of Quebec would have such an admiration for that man. For his own purposes he gave up his religion; for his own purposes he was ready to give up his own people; and I ask again, how is it possible that this man could be a hero? The letter which I read of Monseigneur Grandin shows what frightful destruction, what misery he had caused to the people in that district. Anyone reading the letters which my hon. friend, the member from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), quoted the other day, from the papers published in the Propagation of the Faith—I say, for one who has read such papers, and knows anything of the position of those parishes on the Saskatchewan previous to the rebellion, how is it possible to recognise in the man who has laid waste almost every hamlet on the Saskatchewan; how is it possible to have any admiration for such a man, but rather a feeling of hatred than anything else. I never did consider, and I cannot consider now, that his cause has ever been our cause. I cannot for one consent to recognise in him the representative of our race. He is not the representative of our race, and has never been so. I was told a short time ago by an hon. gentleman who knows whereof he was speaking on that subject, that the brother of Louis Riel stated that he would sooner vote for almost any man than a French Canadian. I want to know why we, the people of the Province of Quebec, without having been consulted by him when he first undertook the agitation which resulted in the rebellion—I want to know whether we should look upon his cause as ours, and whether we should look upon him as the representative of our people? He is not the representative of our race, and I for one will not consent to recognise him as such. Now, Sir, I am quite certain that if we had interfered with the law, if we had interfered with the sentence which was passed, I believe there would have been a universal clamor all over the Province of Quebec if we had not done what we did, and if, after the sentence had been carried out, we had given up our seats as representatives of the Dominion Cabinet. Now, I must ask the indulgence of the House while I refer to a matter which has been very much made use of against me personally, and which has been intentionally misinterpreted by my opponents for the purpose of injuring me in my own Province. I refer to that often spoken of banquet which I attended in the city of Winnipeg. I was accused of having accepted a banquet on the day upon which Riel was to pay the penalty for his crime. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) who to-day thinks very differently of myself from what he used to, has deemed it his duty, in delivering his speech the other night, to refer to that banquet, and to say that I had gone up for the purpose of drinking champagne under the gallows of Riel. Well, Sir, the matter as I understand it is very simple and easily explained. I was going up to Winnipeg, as is well known, for the purpose of settling the claims arising out of the rebellion. People had travelled hundreds and hundreds of miles to come to Winnipeg so as to be able to procure evidence which it was necessary to procure and to have their claims adjusted. It was at the very beginning of winter, and some of these people were absolutely dependent on the money which they were entitled to get, whatever that might be, from the Government, to be able to stand the rigor of a north-western winter. On my way up I received a telegram communicating to me the information that my friend, the Minister of the Interior, who had been travelling in the North-West on matters connected with his Department, and who had created, as he generally does wherever he goes, a most favorable impression, had been tendered a banquet by his friends in Winnipeg. I was invited to join that banquet. Now, Sir, I left Ottawa on the 31st of October. I knew when I left, as a member of the Government, that Riel was not to be executed on the 10th. I knew that the medical men were going up—in fact, they left on the very same day. I shall read a letter which has been addressed to me by the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, which the hon. member for Quebec East read, but did not read in full. This letter is addressed to me, and is dated 20th November, 1885:

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

"OTTAWA, 20th November, 1885.

"MY DEAR CARON,—You say you are charged with having left Ottawa before the decision of the Governor in Council was arrived at with respect to Louis Riel and as if for the purpose of avoiding being party to the decision.

"This is not the case. The Council had come to the conclusion that it was necessary, in the interest of justice, that the sentence should be allowed to be carried into effect, in your presence as a member of the Council, before you left for Winnipeg.

"But in consequence of Mr. Lemieux's affidavit that Riel's state of mind had altered for the worse after conviction, it was settled in your presence that an enquiry should be made as to whether since his trial he had ceased to know right from wrong. And in that case only would the carrying out of the sentence be interfered with. Your presence at Winnipeg was absolutely necessary to settle the accounts for the military expedition caused by the outbreak.

"Yours faithfully,

"J. A. MACDONALD."

That shows, Sir, that when I left it was decided in Council that unless the medical reports were such as to establish that the mental state of Louis Riel had changed for the worse since his conviction and sentence, the sentence should be allowed to be carried out. The Order in Council of the 12th is not at all in contradiction to this letter. The letter shows that it was decided to send out medical men, and it was understood in Council that in consequence of that the execution could not take place on the 10th.

The report of the medical men is dated Regina, the 8th, and it was impossible for it to reach here and the order for the execution to be sent up on the 10th. That was physically impossible. Riel was respited by the magistrate until the 16th, and the Order in Council of the 12th was that the law should take its course. Therefore I cannot see where there is any contradiction, as some hon. gentlemen have tried to show, between the letter of Sir John Macdonald to me and the Order in Council I refer to. I was also very severely handled for having uttered the words I did at that banquet. Well, Sir, I must repeat what I have already said, that the few remarks I made there have been published, and I am perfectly ready to be judged by my utterances on that occasion; and I ask, Sir, is it not quite evident that it was for the purpose of injuring me that this great cry was raised about this banquet at Winnipeg? If it were within my knowledge that the execution was not to take place on the 10th, what reason had I to refuse an invitation that was conveyed to me by the Liberal-Conservative Association at Winnipeg, the organisation of our own political party, composed of gentlemen in the confidence of the leaders of that party, and who were tendering a banquet to the Hon. Mr. White, and were kind enough to invite me? It really made no difference when I knew that the execution was not then to take place; and the statement I made there was simply what every loyal man in this country would make, that I had no sympathy with rebels and that I hated rebellion. Is it an utterance that I, as a French-Canadian, coming from the Province of Quebec, should not have made? Is it an utterance that my people would refuse to allow me to make in the city of Winnipeg, or in any other place in this Dominion, or outside of this Dominion? But, Sir, I was attacked. Men attempted to make my case different from the case of my colleagues, who, I must say, and I am proud to say, have been so loyal to me during the whole trouble. The men who attacked me said that we had given up the rights of our Province, that we had been traitors to our own people, and had sacrificed them to the interests of Orangeism and Protestantism. Well, Sir, the return my hon. friend placed on the Table of this House to-day shows how much we were influenced by any consideration of that kind; and, Sir, many other statements equally rash will disappear when it is possible to lay on the Table the papers which will show how unjustly we have been treated during the whole of the agitation. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), in speaking of myself, stated that I had sacrificed my Province and my people to Orangeism. Well, Sir, that hon. gentleman when he came to us—and I admire him for doing so—and offered his services and the services of the battalion he commanded, to go and help to quell that rebellion, was he doing any more than his duty? Was he not doing just as I have done during the whole of this trouble? He, a soldier, was fighting the battles of his country at the front; and I, invested with authority as Minister of Militia, was trying my very best to make those who went up as comfortable as it was possible to make them; and, Sir, I do not want to be judged by any other standard than the standard by which that hon. gentleman himself judged me. I shall refer to some of his letters and telegrams in which he expressed his great admiration for the services I had rendered. In fact, Sir, in his great kindness during that period, he exaggerated my merit as he to-day exaggerates what he supposes to be my misdeeds. But before I pass away from the subject of the banquet, I would like to place before the House some statutory declarations which were sent to me, and to explain the object of those declarations. I am not known as a rule to run after dinners or to put myself to any great trouble to get dinners. Having a number of friends, I can generally manage to get a dinner and to enjoy a dinner without having to beg for one. But it was stated in the papers, and an hon. gentleman used the statement, that that banquet would have fallen through if I had not given a pledge to those who organised it that Louis Riel was going to be hanged. Well, Sir, I ask whether it is not as unjust towards the gentlemen who organised that banquet as it is to myself to say that those men, who sent an invitation by telegram to two Ministers of the Crown, and who are gentlemen, would have consented to break their engagement with us unless we gave them a pledge? If any hon. gentleman had come to me and asked me to make any pledge, however insignificant, in order to get a dinner from him or others, I would have said, Keep your dinner, I can pay for one, and do not wish to sit down at the dinner table of any gentleman who would force from me a pledge to do however small a thing in exchange for his hospitality. I have here communications which were sent to me by the organisers of this banquet. I shall read one of them, as I do not want to take up the time of the House by reading them all, but, if allowed to do so, shall hand them to Hansard, so that they may appear in the report of the debate, as it is of some importance to me that they should appear. The paper I am about to read is a declaration from Mr. Searth, who is well known here and better known still in Toronto, and whose honor is above any suspicion. His declaration runs as follows:—

"I, William Bain Searth, of the city of Winnipeg, in the county of Selkirk and Province of Manitoba, Esq., do solemnly declare—

"1. That it has come to my knowledge that a report has been circulated that the banquet which was given to Sir A. P. Caron and his colleague on the 10th day of November, under the auspices of the Conservative Association, would not have taken place had it not been for an assurance from the said Sir A. P. Caron that Riel would hang."

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON:

"2. That such report is untrue."

The hon. gentleman might say "hear, hear" now. Although an opponent of mine, he must be glad to hear that the character of one of his colleagues in the House of Commons has been vindicated in a matter of this kind—

"3. That I am the President of the Winnipeg Association, and was Chairman of the Banqueting Committee, and presided at the said banquet, and have a knowledge of the facts connected with the same. 4. That on the 30th day of September last, I mentioned to the Hon. Thomas White, who was then in Winnipeg, that the Conservative Association would like to entertain him at a banquet on his return from his trip to Manitoba and the North-West Territories, and asked him to let me know when he was likely to return so that the Association might be properly advised. 5. That on or about the 29th of October last past, the said Hon. Thomas White telegraphed me that he would be in Winnipeg on Tuesday, the 3rd day of November last past. 6. That on the receipt of said telegraph, I called the Association together, and it was then decided to tender a banquet to the Hon. Mr. White on the 10th day of November, and as it was reported that Sir A. P. Caron was coming to Winnipeg, it was decided at such meeting to make it a banquet to the two Ministers, Sir A. P. Caron and the Hon. Thomas White, to take place on the aforesaid date. 7. That the following telegrams were sent:—

"WINNIPEG, November 3rd, 1885.

"Hon. THOMAS WHITE, Manitou, Man.

"Conservative Association tender you and Sir A. P. Caron banquet Tuesday evening, 10th inst. Please wire acceptance.

(Signed) "W. B. SCARTH."

"WINNIPEG, November 3, 1885.

"Sir A. P. CARON, Ottawa, Ontario.

"Conservative Association of Winnipeg tender you and Mr. White banquet Tuesday evening 10th inst. Wire whether you will be here.

(Signed) "W. B. SCARTH."

To which replies were received as follows:—

"CHICAGO, ILL., November 5, 1885.

"To CONSERVATIVE ASSOCIATION, Winnipeg.

"Shall be in Winnipeg Saturday. Many thanks to the Conservative Association of Winnipeg for the kindness in tendering banquet to myself and colleague.

(Signed) "A. P. CARON."

"MORDELI, November 3, 1885.

"To W. B. SCARTH

"Please convey to Conservative Association my grateful acceptance to proposed banquet on 10th inst.

(Signed) "THOMAS WHITE."

"8. That preparations were at once commenced on the strength of said replies, and without any other assurance or communications to said Ministers, and without any interruption continued up to the time of the said banquet, notwithstanding the fact that it was known before said banquet that Riel was respited. 9. That I did not, nor, so far as I know, did any member of the banquet committee or any person having any control of the arrangements of the banquet, speak to Sir A. P. Caron before said banquet about whether Riel would be hanged or not, or seek to obtain any assurance from Sir A. P. Caron that Riel would be hanged. 10. That I did not, nor, I believe, did any of the banquet committee or other person in charge of said banquet, hear or have any assurance from Sir A. P. Caron, before said banquet took place, that Riel would be hanged. 11. That the question of the Government dealing with Riel was mentioned by some members of the said committee at a meeting held on the evening or the afternoon of the day previous to the banquet, and the only statement I then made was that we might rely on the law being properly administered, and could safely leave the matter in the hands of the leader of the Government who had for so long a time properly and well administered the affairs of State. 12. No deputation, delegation or body was ever appointed on behalf of the Conservative Association to discuss the question of Riel with Sir A. P. Caron, and, of course, no such discussion took place. And I make this declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of an Act passed in the 37th year of Her Majesty's reign, entitled "An Act for the suppression of Voluntary and extra-Judicial Oaths."

(Signed) "W. B. SCARTH.

"Declared before me at the city of Winnipeg,
in the county of Selkirk, the 30th day of November, 1885.

(Signed) "A. D. McCLENNAGHAN,
"Commissioner for taking Affidavits."

The following is Mr. Gilmour's declaration:—

"I, Thomas Henry Gilmour, of the county of Selkirk, in the Province of Manitoba, barrister-in-law, do solemnly declare as follows:—

"I now am and since before the 1st November instant I have been the secretary of the Winnipeg Liberal-Conservative Association. 2. I acted as secretary of the committee appointed by the said association to tender a banquet to Sir A. P. Caron and the Hon. Thomas White at Winnipeg, on the 10th day of November, inst., and as one of said committee I was ex officio secretary of all the sub-committees appointed in connection with said banquet. 3. In the said capacity of secretary I was at all the meetings of the banquet committee, and while arrangements were being made for said banquet, and for about twelve days prior to said banquet, I came in daily contact with the various members of the banquet committee in connection with the arrangements for the banquet. 4. I met and conversed with Sir A. P. Caron prior to the banquet, and at no time did I ever hear any one speak to him that the banquet would not be held if Riel was not executed, and I never heard Sir A. P. Caron state or intimate, to myself or to anyone else, that Riel would be executed, and I never heard him give any assurance to that effect. On Monday afternoon, the 9th November—the day prior to the banquet—a meeting of the banquet committee was held to make final arrangements for the banquet, and I was present at this meeting and acted as secretary to the committee, and at this time I did not know, and to the best of my knowledge none of the members of the committee knew, what action would be taken regarding the execution of Riel; and an enquiry having been made by one of the members of the committee as to whether it was known whether Riel would be executed or not, Mr. W. B. Scarth, the President of the said Association, who occupied the chair, then stated that all Conservatives should be satisfied that the Government would adopt a right course, whatever might be done, and that he thought this question should not in any way affect our action concerning the banquet, and up to the hour of the banquet, and until after it was over, I had no intimation from any source whatever regarding Riel, further than that he was respited until the 16th November, and I do not believe any member of the banquet committee or of the association received any intimation whatever at any time from Sir A. P. Caron as to the course that the Government would adopt in regard to Riel.

"That the statement or report which I understand are in circulation in some quarters to the effect that the banquet would not have taken place had not the assurance been given that Riel would be executed is without foundation and is wholly untrue, to the best of my knowledge, the sole motive on the part of the Conservatives being the desire to honor two of their trusted leaders; and I make this declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of an Act passed in the 37th year of Her Majesty's reign, intitled: "An Act for the suppression of Voluntary and extra-Judicial Oaths."

(Signed) "T. H. GILMOUR.

"Declared before me at the city of Winnipeg,
in the county of Selkirk, this 30th day of November, 1885.

"J. W. E. DABBY, Commissioner for taking Affidavits."

These declarations, which are also corroborated by letters I have received from my valued friend the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) at the time, and several other letters from gentlemen who saw me while I was in Winnipeg, and who distinctly state that the report, which was circulated with the intention of injuring me, was altogether untrue. The letter to which I referred from Mr. Royal is in French, and reads as follows:—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

[Translation.]

"ST. BONIFACE, MANITOBA,

"November 30th, 1885.

"MY DEAR SIR ADOLPHE,—I received your letter of the 24th and I hasten to state that it is untrue that the Conservative banquet given at Winnipeg, only took place after an interview which you and the Minister of Interior had with a deputation, and during which interview you promised that Riel would be hung. If my memory serves me right, you received your invitation to attend that banquet organised in honor of Mr. White, at St. Paul, on your way to Winnipeg.

(Signed) "J. ROYAL."

It was also stated at some meeting that my own compatriots, the French Canadians in Manitoba, had refused to entertain me or to have any communication with me after the banquet had taken place. Here is another letter which I received from Mr. Royal on this point:

[Translation.]

"ST. BONIFACE, 27th Decembar, 1885.

"DEAR SIR,—When you paid a visit to Mgr. Taché, in November last, I am happy to state that not only His Lordship received you, but made you visit the institutions of St. Boniface in his own carriage. His Lordship accompanied you, and after you had left St. Boniface, he took you to Winnipeg to visit the convent of the Rev. Sisters of Jesus-Marie.

"I saw you on that occasion; the Superintendent of Education, Mr. Bernier, and Mr. Larivière, a member of the Provincial Ministry also accompanied you.

(Signed) "J. ROYAL."

Now, these gentlemen who so kindly tendered me the hospitality of Winnipeg, and who were so good as to accompany me to the various institutions which make that city very interesting, showed me all these attentions after the celebrated banquet had taken place; and I would like to know whether these men who take as great an interest in North-Western matters as any of the agitators who unsuccessfully tried to get up a cry in Quebec against the Government—I ask, is it possible to suppose, if my conduct had been so reprehensible as represented, that all these gentlemen in Winnipeg would have shown 'me the kindness they did? But the hon. gentleman, a few evenings ago, stated also that some telegrams had been sent by me to the right hon. the leader of the Government. I take a telegram, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman referred to this or not, but it is the telegram which appeared in his organ, and which was communicated through that journal to the press of the country,—I take these telegrams as republished in the Mail. The hon. gentleman stated that, on November 8th, Sir A. P. Caron despatched the following telegram to Sir John Macdonald:—

"People very much excited. I fear if the law is not allowed to take its course there will be more trouble than anticipated. I can produce no evidence of this, but know it to be a fact."

I can tell the hon. gentleman that I never sent such a telegram. That telegram was never sent by me to Sir John Macdonald or to anybody else. The hon. gentleman, seeing a contradiction of this having been sent by me, turned around and said: No, it is not Sir A. P. Caron who sent it to Sir John A. Macdonald, but it is Sir John A. Macdonald who sent it to Sir A. P. Caron. In any case I did not attach more importance to this statement than it deserved, but I hope the denial which I give is emphatic enough to serve the purpose of preventing the circulation of such a rumor in the country. Now I come to reading the interesting letters which I stated I would read, from the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). I think he should not have stated, even being a bitter opponent of mine, what he did publish, that I had attacked the 9th Battalion of Quebec. I will leave it to every hon. member of this House if during the troubles, the unfortunate troubles in the North-West, I did not take every possible opportunity of expressing my honest conviction that the two French battalions which went to the front were equal to any battalions that were sent to the North-West. I ask the hon. gentleman whether I did not on every occasion—little time as I had from the pressing occupations which required my continual attention at the Department—whether I did not, when any telegram or anything came to me which could be of any use to our volunteers, whom I admired so much during those trying times, take the first opportunity of mentioning it to the House and praising those volunteers as they deserved to be praised? How is it possible that I could have injured that battalion which the hon. gentleman is so anxious to defend, when it is not attacked? How is it possible, in view of the letters which I hold from him, in which he says:

"Thanks, many thanks, for what you have said of the 9th Battalion." Does that look like a letter addressed to a man who was hostile to that battalion? Does it look—jealous as the member from Bellechasse is of his battalion, and properly so—like a letter which he would have addressed to me if I had been unjust to the 9th Battalion; but to-day to return him thanks for having done so. These letters were very interesting at the time, and they turn out very useful now. Here is one, dated the 15th April, 1885:

[Translation.]

"Everywhere was discovered the friendly hand of the Minister and of the Department, who seemed to me to have done wonders in the fulfilment of their duty."

He goes on again:

"Thank you for what you have said in the House about the 9th Battalion. I have a fine battalion. They are manly soldiers and I appeal to their heart.

(Signed) "G. AMYOT."

Mr. BERGERON. They are men of heart.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. They are brave men, and all brave men are full of heart. In another letter of the 9th May, the hon. member says:

[Translation.]

"I must tell you, and you may repeat it on my behalf, that the Militia Department has always done the utmost for the army.

(Signed) "G. AMYOT."

Mr. AMYOT. I change nothing of that.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Further:

[Translation.]

"On the northern shore of Lake Superior, there again, at each step may be seen the efforts of the Department to allay the misery, &c. Besides, when we consented to make this journey we knew we were not going to a wedding. The spirit, the health and the moral of the troops are excellent. If I go back to the country, I will endeavor to see that justice shall be dealt to those who, like yourself, do their utmost to ensure the comfort of the volunteers."

The hon. gentleman also differed from what he used to say in his newspaper, and out of it, in attacking General Middleton who was in command of the troops. Well, in the same letter which the hon. gentleman addressed to me he says:

[Translation.]

"Middleton, who has never been out west, cannot know anything about it. He does his best where he is and is worthy of the highest praise. He is a galant General, and I have full confidence in him, but he cannot do all by himself in such a vast country as this."

He goes on further to state:

"Ouinmet and Strange also ask for reinforcements. I understand how much all this will cost, but we must vanquish by all means, and vanquish once for all."

Now, I fail to see how it is possible that the hon. gentleman, who went up in command of his battalion wishing to conquer, to-day should be so anxious to defend those very people who put us to all this trouble and expense, and endangered the lives of our troops. But, Sir, long after the troubles were all over, it pleased Her Gracious Majesty to confer upon me a title, and, long after the troops had returned here, the hon. gentleman was one of the very first to send me a telegram of congratulation—for which I was very much obliged to him—in which he says: "Most hearty congratulations upon so well deserved a knightship."

Mr. AMYOT. Would the hon. gentleman kindly give the date of that telegram?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. August 19th, 1885. I said it was long after the troubles were over.

Mr. AMYOT. They are not over yet.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The most serious troubles are over, but the trouble which the hon. gentleman is trying to get up, and which is not very serious, is not over, I know.

Mr. AMYOT. Why does it trouble you so much, then?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman reminds me, by asking for the date of this telegram, that he knew very well that Riel was then under sentence of death, and yet he sent this complimentary telegram, for which I felt very much obliged to him.

Mr. AMYOT. Because the Monde was saying that Riel would not be hanged.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman knows that the first duty of a soldier under fire is to be calm and not to get excited. Well, Mr. Speaker, my friends in Quebec, the leading men there, joined in presenting me with an address of congratulation when this title was conferred on me, and one of the very first to sign this address was the hon. gentleman again, and, of course, he must have read it, because I know him too well to believe that he would sign an address of that kind without taking the trouble to read it. In that address occurred this paragraph:—

[Translation.]

"What an amount of gratitude the country owes you for the activity and zeal with which you have fulfilled your important duties during these days of trouble. Our soldiers, whose heroic courage during the recent campaign is now known far and wide, know how to appreciate, to their just value, the promptness with which you have acted, your vigilance and your anxiety for their welfare."

That was signed by the hon. gentleman. Sir, the hon. gentleman also said that I had attacked the troops. Now, I feel that more, if possible, than anything which the hon. gentleman may have said, and I felt it at the time, because I can not, even to-day, express to you the great anxiety which, night and day, lay upon me when I felt the responsibility entrusted to me of the welfare of the battalions in the field; and I can say, in justice to myself, that I believe that I did, whether successfully or not, the best I could, and if there was any fault, it was in my ability and not in my intentions. I did everything I could, as the hon. gentleman had to admit, to make our troops as comfortable as possible, and to spare them every possible trouble that was in my power. But the hon. gentleman went up to the front, and he expressed his opinion about the troops that were there. He has placed upon the paper a notice of motion to produce his telegrams and his letters, and really, I am very glad indeed to be able to do so. But in order to give him an avant goût of some of his telegrams, I wish to read one or two of them. Here is one dated Swift Current, 25th April, 1885:

"CARON.—Arrived here all right. Found Gen. Laurie perfect soldier. Advance of Middleton's troops too hurried; consequence being immense useless expense. Volunteers should be used for garrison and protection of place and ammunition. American scouts and Indians and half-breeds doing the same kind of fighting as rebels, should do the fighting and attacking. Part of Middleton's force exposed to be slaughtered. Troops hearty. Rely upon 9th."

So I did. Now here is another telegram dated at Calgary, 14th May, 1885:

"I add, and I persist in saying, that this war should be made by men fighting in the same way as rebels. Volunteers are specially adapted for protection of forts and provisions."

It had not come to my knowledge that the provisions were in danger, and, so far as I can judge, they were well looked after by the volunteers. But it goes on to say:

"Our volunteers are being slaughtered. 500 scouts are worth 2,000 volunteers for actual fighting of that kind. Men cheerful.

(Signed) "G. AMYOT."

The hon. gentleman when he deemed it his duty to attack me, as he has a perfect right to do if he pleased, should not have forgotten that he himself had expressed an opinion as to what I had done for the troops, and he should not have taunted me with having attacked the 9th Battalion when within his own telegrams appears a judgment about our force that I cannot understand. The hon. member also attacked the Major-General who commanded the forces. I will read to the House a letter (with the General's permission) which the hon. member addressed to the Major-General on the occasion of his being knighted. It reads:

[Translation.]

QUEBEC, August 26th, 1885.

"Sir FREDERICK D. MIDDLETON, K.C.M.G., Ottawa.

"DEAR SIR,—I should have written you sooner to join in the unanimous concert of congratulations which you receive from all parts, but a prolonged absence from the city prevented me. Your elevation to the Knighthood is only the just recognition of the services which you have rendered to the Dominion of Canada, and the honors which are bestowed upon you is reflected on all those whom you have encouraged by your personal bravery surely guided by your experience, and who have all largely benefited from the science which you have acquired during an honorable military career.

"I deeply regret the attacks of a mean and malicious press against 'our general,' but your reputation stands so high that these foolish slanders cannot reach it.

"Allow me to present, through you, my respects to lady Middleton and believe me,

"Your very devoted,
G. AMYOT."

Mr. RYKERT. By whom is that letter signed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. By the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). So far as the General is concerned it is no use my expressing an opinion which everyone who knows anything about military matters has already expressed, in regard to the services he rendered. In England and Canada his services have been justly appreciated, and in any case it comes with very bad grace from the hon. member to have attacked the Major-General after having expressed in writing the opinion I have read respecting his services. Before concluding I desire to clear up one point which has been referred to by several hon. members who have spoken during this debate. It has been stated here that in consequence of Riel having surrendered, the Government should have pardoned him. I state, and I am prepared to show, that Riel never surrendered at all. I read first a declaration made by the Major-General himself. It is an important point for history, and it has an important bearing on the question in debate, and it will be interesting to hon. members to see the interpretation which the Major-General places upon a certain letter. The Major-General says:

"I only wrote one letter to Riel, on the last day of Batoche fighting, telling him (in answer to a letter from him brought by Mr. Astley) that 'if he would place his women and children in safety, and let me know where the place was, I would take care no shots were fired in that direction.' When Astley brought me that letter he told me Riel was in a 'funk' and he thought he would surrender, and he asked me what terms he could carry back to him. My answer was, 'unconditional surrender.' The second note from Riel, thanking me for my letter, was handed to me just as we were forcing, under a heavy fire, our way on to the clear ground about Batoche. Astley again told me that he thought Riel would surrender, but I answered, 'too late now; we are almost there, and I must push on to save the prisoners.' I did not send the letter to Riel offering to protect him and his council until the 13th May (the day after the last day at Batoche), and I did so because a priest and a half-breed told me they knew, or thought they knew, where Riel was, and that he would give himself up, but that he was afraid of being killed in my camp by some of my men. I then wrote the letter and gave it to the priest to take. He, however, could not find Riel, but the half-breed did, and gave it to him. Early on the morning of the 15th, at Guardupuis Crossing, I received information that Riel and Dumont were not many miles off, near the Birch Hills, and I sent off Major Boulton with his mounted infantry, with orders to scour the country towards Batoche, which he did, and Riel, finding troops between himself and Batoche, gave himself up to the three (3) scouts, Hourie, Armstrong and Diehl, who had started with Boulton, but left his detachment, and, spreading out, had come across Riel, with my letter in his pocket. Dumont, who was well mounted and knew the country, escaped.

"FRED. MIDDLETON, Major-General."

Copy of letter sent to Riel alluded to above:

"BATOCHÉ, May 13, 1885.

"MR. RIEL,—I am ready to receive you and your council, and to protect you until your case has been decided upon by the Dominion Government.

"FRED. MIDDLETON, Major-General,
"Commanding North-West Field Force."

I have also the declaration of the two scouts who captured Riel. It is as follows:—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

"Canada,
North-West Territories,
To Wit:

"We, William Diehl and Robert Armstrong, of Prince Albert, in the North-West Territories, do each of us solemnly declare:

"1. That during the rebellion of half-breeds and Indians which took place on the Saskatchewan in the spring of 1885, we were duly enrolled in the Prince Albert volunteers, and served as scouts for and in connection with said volunteer force for about two months.

"2. We have seen it asserted in certain portions of the press in eastern Canada that Louis Riel, the rebel leader, did, after the battle of Batoche, voluntarily surrender and give himself up to the authorities, and that said Louis Riel might have easily escaped from the country had he so desired.

"3. We, together with one Thomas Hourie, were three of the Prince Albert volunteers who took part in the search for Louis Riel and other rebels who took flight after their defeat at the battle of Batoche.

"4. We further distinctly state that we, together with the aforesaid Thomas Hourie, were the three scouts who captured said Louis Riel and handed him over to General Middleton. At the time we made the capture we believed and we now affirm that said Louis Riel had no intention of surrendering himself, but was preparing for a hasty flight. He was then looking for a horse and had in his possession a saddle and bridle, and was well armed. The two half-breeds in whose company we found him (Riel) were also well armed. The statements before referred to that Louis Riel voluntarily gave himself up to us are entirely untrue."

"And we severally make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the Act passed in the 37th year of Her Majesty's reign intitled 'An Act for the suppression of Voluntary and extra-Judicial Oaths.'

"WM. DIEHL.

"ROBT. ARMSTRONG.

"Severally declared before me at the town of Prince Albert, in the North-West Territory, this 28th day of December, A.D. 1885.

"W. R. GUNN,

"A Notary Public for the North-West Territories."

The other scout who was also present when he was arrested, was away from Prince Albert and his declaration could not be obtained, but he stated to several gentlemen whom I have seen since that he viewed it in exactly the same light as those did who made the declaration. I shall also read a portion of a very interesting letter which appeared in the papers from Major Boulton, than whom there is no better authority so far as the history of the campaign is concerned:

"In discussing the question with Astley about the surrender, Riel said: There are three things that will save me. One is politics, another is that I have assumed the office of priests and another is that the papers which are all here will implicate the council more than me.

"On this occasion he wished to surrender and was most anxious to get safely into the General's hands. However, it was too late, and in consequence he had to make his escape as best he could. Astley, however, kept track of him after the day was won, and got a letter signed by the General guaranteeing his protection until handed over to the civil authorities. Upon receiving this he was most anxious to get safely into the General's hands and surrendered to Hourie."

Now, Sir, I think that upon that question the evidence is so far satisfactory that I do not see how it is possible to consider, under this evidence, that Riel surrendered and was in consequence entitled to any consideration from the Government. It was my pleasure, in beginning the few remarks which I considered it my duty to address to the House, to congratulate the hon. member for Quebec East upon the speech which he delivered, and I expressed upon that point my honest opinion with reference to that gentleman. But, Sir, I must regret that his eloquence, which I recognise, should have been used in the defence of a rebellion against Canada. The hon. gentleman charged the Government with having, by its negligence, caused the rebellion. Well, Sir, this charge I deny completely and testotally, and I think any impartial man who takes the trouble to read the record will come to the conclusion that the Government are not liable to that charge. In Père André's evidence there occurs the following:—

"Q. Will you state if, since the arrival of the prisoner in the country up to the time of the rebellion, the Government have made any favorable answer to the demands and claims of the half-breeds?—A. Yes, I know they have acceded to certain demands in regard to those who did not have any scrip in Manitoba. A telegram was sent on the 4th of March last, granting the scrip.

"Q. Before that time?—A. Yes, regarding the alteration of survey of lots along the river, there was an answer from the Government saying they would grant it, and that was an important question.

"Q. What question then remained to be settled?—A. The question of patents; that has also been settled in a certain way, because Mr. Duck was sent and I went with him as interpreter.

"Q. What other question remained?—A. Only the question of wood, timber."

This shows that a telegram was communicated to him as it was also communicated to Riel and to others, stating that these questions had been settled. Besides the evidence which I have just read from Father André, the following occurs in Charles Nolin's examination:—

"Q. Were those conditions accepted by the prisoner?—A. Yes. The next day I received an answer to a telegram from Macdonald; the telegram said that the Government was going to grant the rights of the half-breeds, but there was nothing said about Riel's claim.

"Q. Did you show the answer to Riel?—A. I showed the reply I received next Sunday.

"Q. That was in the month of?—A. February.

"Q. In the beginning of the month?—A. Yes.

"Q. What did the prisoner say?—A. He answered that it was 400 years that the English had been robbing and that it was time to put a stop to it, that it had been going on long enough."

Immediately on ascertaining that the Metis grievances were all settled, but that he was not receiving the money that he wanted to get from Government, on the 5th March he determined to take up arms. Let us see again what Charles Nolin says on this point:

"A. The prisoner came with Gabriel Dumont to see me. He proposed a plan to me that he had written upon a piece of paper. He said that he had decided to take up arms and to induce the people to take up arms, and the first thing was to fight for the glory of God, for the honor of religion and the salvation of our souls. The prisoner said that he had already nine names upon the paper, and he asked for my name. I told him that his plan was not perfect but since he wanted to fight for the love of God, I would propose a more perfect plan. My plan was to have public prayers in the Catholic chapel during nine days, and to go to confession and communion and then to do as our consciences told us."

This is the man who is held up as a hero and patriot. All he wanted, as is quite apparent, was to get money from the Government. If he could succeed in getting that money, we see what he intended to do with it. On page 94 we find:

"He said also if he got the money he would go to the United States and start a paper and raise the other nationalities in the States."

He had already organised two rebellions, and after sacrificing the Metis he wanted to get money, which, he said, he was going to use in the United States to raise up all the nationalities and get up another revolution. Is it necessary to give a stronger proof of the wisdom of the Government in not interfering with the sentence of the law upon him?

"He said: Before the grass is that high in the country you will see foreign armies in this country. He said: I will commence by destroying Manitoba, and then I will come and destroy the North-West and take possession of the North-West."

And, forsooth, we are told that we should have shown mercy to this man. I ask any hon. gentleman who has read this evidence whether he showed much mercy to the prisoners and the people who happened to be under him? On page 44 we find:

"He came to the door of the cellar, and the first words I heard him say was: 'Astley! Astley! Come here and go tell Middleton if they—I think massacre was the word used—if they massacre our children and women and children, we will massacre you prisoners.'"

Here was this man, who had arrested these few prisoners on account of their loyalty to their country; on account of their refusing to join in his rebellion, saying that if any harm happened to any of his people (which harm could never have happened if it had not been for his doings) he would massacre all the prisoners in the cellar. Did he show much mercy when he said to McKay what is reported on pages 18 and 19, "Report of Evidence in Riel's Trial?"

"He became very excited and got up and said: 'You don't know what we are after—it is blood! blood! We want blood! It is a war of extermination! Everybody that is against us is to be driven out of the country. There were two curses in the country, the Government and the Hudson Bay Company.'"

"Q. Yes?—A. He turned to me and said I was a traitor to his Government. That I was a speculator and a scoundrel and robber and thief, and I don't know what all.

"Q. He used very violent language to you?—A. Yes. He finally said it was blood, and the first blood they wanted was mine. There were some little dishes on the table, and he got hold of a spoon and said: 'You have no blood, you are a traitor to your people; your blood is frozen, and all the little blood you have will be there in five minutes,' putting the spoon up to my face and pointing to it."

Did he show much mercy when he condemned to death Nolin and Boyer when they refused to take up arms? On page 60 we read:

"Q. What was the chief event of that day as far as you can remember?—A. He was giving orders to go and take William Boyer and Charles Nolin prisoners.

"Q. Did you hear him say why they were to be taken prisoner?—A. Because they would not take up arms.

"Q. Did he say anything about because they had been movers up to that time?—A. Because they had been movers, and had left it at the time of taking up arms.

"Q. Was Nolin tried?—A. About his trial I cannot say exactly, I heard Riel saying he ought to be shot or that they should shoot him.

"Q. You understood Nolin and Boyer were to be shot?—A. Yes, both of them.

"Q. And because they would not join the movement in taking up arms?—A. In not taking up arms."

I was very much pleased the other evening, and think the country is to be congratulated upon the fact, that the hon. leader of the Opposition in the Province of Quebec expressed himself so very loyally as he did on that occasion. That hon. gentleman said that Tory loyalty was very much interested indeed, and stated that when Lord Elgin sanctioned the Indemnity Bill, the Tories became disloyal and signed an appeal for annexation to the United States. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, forgot to mention the fact that that very manifesto—which was signed by some Conservatives, I admit—was also signed by such men as the Hon. A. A. Dorion, the late Mr. Doutre, Mr. Papineau, Mr. Laflamme, Mr. Holton, and other leaders of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec. No doubt, those who did not know the facts of the case would have been led to believe from the hon. gentleman's statement that this manifesto was signed only by Conservatives, and that not a single Liberal leader would have consented to put his name to it. But the hon. gentleman knows that that manifesto was not signed by Sir George Cartier, the leader of the Liberal-Conservative party in the Province of Quebec. In speaking of Sir George Cartier, the hon. gentleman was most eloquent, and expressed great admiration for the late lamented Sir George Etienne Cartier; but, Sir, when, unfortunately for the country, Sir George Cartier was removed from our midst, and from that career of usefulness which we Conservatives can never forget, and which we every day still recall with pleasure, the hon. gentleman must have forgotten that even then the Liberal press attacked the hon. gentleman fiercely, although now they claim him almost as one of their leaders. He must have forgotten the manner in which Liberals in this House and outside of this House outraged him during his life, although they now attempt to eulogise him, as the hon. gentleman did the other evening. If Sir George Cartier were still among us, I mean to say, and I believe it, that he would have acted exactly as we have acted in reference to the Riel matter. During his lifetime was he not treated exactly as we are treated to day? Did they not say that he was sold to the Orangemen? Did they not say that he sold the Province of Quebec to John A. and the Protestants of Ontario? Did they not say that he had sold his Province to English influence? Well, Sir, he loved his country sufficiently well to attach no more importance than he should have attached to such insults, which were levelled against him as they are levelled against us to day. Sir George Cartier did his duty, and he left behind him a memory which, even after his death, has not been respected by the Liberals.

In the history of the late Mr. Letellier, written by a member of the Opposition, the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain), the memory of Sir George Cartier is outraged; and when the hon. member from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) was speaking of Sir George Cartier in such eloquent terms, I could not help thinking of the sad page which I read in the book I have referred to. As far as I personally am concerned, and I believe I can say the same for my colleagues, we did, under the greatest difficulties and most painful circumstances, what we considered to be our duty, and I believe that what we did, Sir George Cartier, whose motto was what the motto of the Conservative party is, "Franc et sans dol," would have done under the same circumstances. I must apologise to you, Sir, and the House for having been so lengthy and imperfect in my remarks; but the matters which I treated I deemed it advisable to bring under the notice of the House, and I tried to do so in as concise a manner as possible.

Mr. DESJARDINS. In rising at this stage of the discussion, I do not expect to throw much new light, or to attract much interest on the question which has been before the House since a few days. But in the position in which I am, I think it is my duty to explain why I intend to vote in favor of the motion brought by my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Landry). At the opening of the debate, the hon. Minister of Public Works said he was glad the time had come to vindicate his position on the floor of the House, that here was the proper place for him to declare what had been the motives that decided him to consent to the deed against which we have protested. It is true that it was easier for him to come here on the floor of Parliament than to go to his own Province. Some of the other Ministers tried that experiment, and I can only congratulate them on the great courage they displayed in meeting their electors, but of course the positions in the two cases are not the same. They are in the Cabinet, but they are not leaders, and it is very likely that the Minister of Public Works, on account of his superior position as leader of the great party, thought he should not expose himself to the eventualities that the other Ministers had to face; and in hearing him say that it was not becoming on his part to go and meet his electors, I could not help remembering those lines from Boileau on the passage Du Rhin, speaking of Louis XIV :

"Louis les animant du feu de son courage, Se plaint de sa grandeur qui l'attache au rivage."

But the other Ministers tried the experiment. They went to their electors, and I was rather surprised to hear the Minister of Militia tell us a moment ago that the great indignation which had burst forth on the day of the 16th November had quite fallen through, and that he was already quite sure public opinion in his Province was turning in his favor. Well, I would ask the Ministers of Justice and Inland Revenue what they think of that kind of popularity which the Minister of Militia and the Secretary of State met when they came before their electors. They must have thought, after reading the reports in the papers of what took place on these occasions, that in the Province of Quebec Ministers had a curious kind of popularity. The Minister of Militia has complained very bitterly about what was said as to his having attended a banquet at Winnipeg on 10th November. If he has any complaint to make against anyone, he must look to his own friends and see how they formed public opinion in the Province as to the decency on his part of attending such a banquet, when he ought to have known the anxiety and sorrow then existing in his own Province. He ought to have known that very near the spot where he was banquetted, the echo of his own words was reaching a poor family who were sharing in the agony in which an unfortunate man had been allowed to linger for six days or more. To see what opinion was expressed then by some ministerial papers, which to-day find fault with us because we cannot share their newly acquired opinions as to the tragedy of the 16th November, I shall quote from L'Événement, a paper which enjoys great authority now among the friends of the Government and the Ministers themselves. In L'Événement of 14th November last, there is a small article headed :

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

[Translation.] "EXPLAIN.

"All shades of opinion agree to brand the infamous banquet of Winnipeg, where two members of the Government—Sir A. P. Caron and Mr. White, went to inform the Orangemen,—under Riel's scaffold, so to speak—that the man for whose head they are clamoring, will die on the gallows on Monday next. The Étendard is terribly severe but still it is only echoing public opinion. La Minerve, La Presse, the Herald, &c., mercilessly denounce this disgraceful feasting.

"In the name of the Province we will fearlessly declare that the man from among us who has been guilty of the enormous fault of attending to it, only represented himself and no one else.

"With L'Étendard we will say to Sir A. P. Caron: Defend yourself, explain; act in such a manner that the name of a French Canadian may not remain coupled, without protest, with this bloody love-feast where insult was thrown at the supreme anguish of a doomed man."

That is the first article announcing to the Province of Quebec the presence at that Winnipeg banquet of one of our French Ministers. Here is another editorial :

[Translation.] "SIR A. P. CARON.

"We have not insisted, except in the shape of a protest, on the presence of Sir A. P. Caron at the Winnipeg banquet. If that painful fact could have been concealed from the country, we would have done our share towards ensuring silence on the subject. But the multiple voice of the telegraph had spoken, proclaiming to Canada that on the very day which had been previously determined upon for the execution of Riel, a French Minister had attended a banquet given by fanatics who, before entering the dining room, had exacted the promise that the death of their victim would be announced. The fault of Sir A. P. Caron ought to devolve on himself alone; it was impossible that we should for one moment let the foreign races believe that Lower Canada would accept the responsibility of the incredible conduct of one of its sons."

And he goes on in the same strain. Well, I know that L'Événement had based its editorials on papers which had come from Winnipeg, papers friendly to the Government, which had said, on having heard of the last respite, that, unless the Ministers were ready to declare at the banquet that the hanging would take place, that banquet would certainly be a failure. So, he has not to complain of his foes if he has been so hardly dealt with, but of his own friends.

After Recess.

Mr. DESJARDINS. When you left the Chair I had referred to the boast of the Minister of Militia that the Province of Quebec had already returned to the Government, that what was called the fire of straw had subsided, and that the gas explosion, as others called it, was already a thing of the past. I instanced, as an illustration of the accuracy of that statement, the experiment that the hon. Minister of Militia himself and the Secretary of State had made as to the great popularity of the Government and themselves in our Province since the 16th November. Now, I have to come to the main motion. There has been much said about that motion. Some say that it was a motion which the Government itself had chosen. I do not believe it. And they say that the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) was not in good faith. Well, I know my hon. friend enough to believe that, when he put that motion on the Orders of the Day he was in earnest. For my own part, as I said on a previous occasion, I was ready to give those who wanted further information all the necessary time to get it; but I was satisfied with that motion; I was from the beginning ready to vote upon it. The Government accept it as a vote of censure. That meets precisely what I want, that the motion may be understood. It covers fully the ground I took in accord with my political friends on the 13th November, 1885, when I signed, along with them, that telegram :

"Under the circumstances, the execution of Louis Riel would be an act of cruelty, the responsibility of which we refuse to accept or to share."

That telegram as has been mentioned, was signed by seventeen members, according to Le Monde, in which it was published on the 14th November, whose names are as follows: C. J. Coursol, Alphonse Desjardins, D. Girouard, F. Vanasse, L. H. Massue, F. Dupont, A. L. Desaulniers, J. B. Daoust, J. G. H. Bergeron, J. W. Bain, P. B. Benoit, E. Guilbault, G. A. Gigault, S. Labrosse, L. L. L. Desaulniers, F. Dugas, H. Hurteau. The same paper further mentioned the fact that, in addition to these names and to that telegram, other telegrams had been signed and forwarded to the leader of the Government. Those telegrams had been signed by Mr. Ouimet, deputy for Laval; Mr. Fortin, deputy for Gaspé; Mr. Macmillan, of Vaudreuil; Mr. Jas. Taschereau, of Beauce; Mr. Landry, of Montmagny; and Mr. Lesage, of Dorchester. This Le Monde accepted, and said it was the true interpretation of the views, not only of those who had signed those telegrams, but of the whole public opinion in our Province. Those who happened to be present on that day, the 13th November, in Montreal and since that, knew perfectly well what the meaning of that telegram was. It was explained, after the execution took place, that the meaning of the telegram was that the political ties which had bound us to the Ministers would be broken, and that we would have no more confidence in them. That telegram was explained in meetings where some of the Ministers were present, and there was no concealment as to the intention of those who had signed it. So, Sir, they must admit that they were not taken by surprise, and, in point of fact, that accusation could be made more justly by ourselves. Public opinion soon finds ways to manifest itself in the press and public meetings. Here it is time for me to register my protest against the misinterpretation and calumnious signification which have been given to our action in this matter. I refer to the Mail newspaper, a paper which ought to have known better what were the feelings of the Province of Quebec. Gratitude, at least, ought to have taught it that it was no time to reproach a population when it had just suffered a great humiliation, a population which had so long been faithful in its allegiance to the Conservative party, and yet it chose that occasion to launch against us insults and calumny. Of course we knew the objects of the editorials in that paper. They were afraid that the Government would lose influence on account of the execution of the 16th November, and, in order to compensate for that loss in the Province of Quebec, they endeavored to raise prejudices in the Province of Ontario against the Province of Quebec, and especially against the French population. They went so far as to say that the French wished to set themselves above the other people in the Dominion; that they insisted, when one of their race was guilty of rebellion or murder, that the laws must be set aside in his favor and that he must escape punishment; that they wished to establish race supremacy and French domination. French domination, Sir! They have been a long time without fearing that domination; they had been very glad, in their hour of trial and weakness in the other Provinces, to find a large majority in the Province of Quebec—not to follow them, as the hon. Minister of Interior said, but to carry them. It was the first proof of gratitude that we received from the organ of that party. Well, Sir, that interpretation of the movement and of the feeling of the French population, was followed by a series of amenities, which I am about to read from the Mail. On the 23rd November, the Mail said:

"But let us solemnly assure them again that, rather than submit to such a yoke, Ontario would smash Confederation into its original fragments, preferring that the dream of a united Canada should be shattered forever than that unity should be purchased at the expense of equality."

And on the 25th:

"Then as Britons we believe that the conquest will have to be fought over again, and Lower Canada may depend upon it there will be no treaty of 1763. But the French Canadian people would lose everything. The wreck of their fortune and happiness would be swift, complete and irremediable."

Then again on the 28th:

"We say that the result of the conflict which the French are invoking is bound to be disastrous to them in every aspect of life, for it could not fail to create a slumbering war between the races, which, detrimental to the whole Dominion, would redound to their lasting and particular injury."

And then, seeing that all these threats would not avail amongst the English population, it altered its tone somewhat as follows:—

"If the French Canadians ever return to their senses, they will be the first to see their folly. When that day comes, our old friends, the Bleus, will throw themselves once more into the arms of the Conservative party; but at that time they may be sure that no fat calf will be killed."

Then again, on the 11th December, it says:

"If they choose to return to their allegiance, well and good; but they shall receive no honeyed words from us, nor never again be trusted by this journal as men of honor or stable resolve."

The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) the other day spoke of toleration, and of the kind feeling of the Orange section of the community. I have here an extract of the Orange Sentinel, which I suppose is the organ of that sect. What does that paper say:

"Must it be said that the rights and liberties of the English people in this English colony depend upon a foreign race? But English Canadians will not long submit to these ignoble ties, and the day is near when an appeal to arms will be heard in all parts of Canada. Then certainly our soldiers, benefiting by the lessons of the past, will have to complete in this country the work they began in the North-West."

Such, Sir, were the feelings with which we were met when we came to the Government and asked—what? Did we ask a justification of the rebellion; did we ask even a complete amnesty? No. The people of the Province of Quebec thought that, equally with other portions of the community, they had done their duty in those sad events that had taken place in the North-West, thought they had as much right to petition for clemency as others had to petition for blood, or for the stern execution of a verdict obtained under such circumstances as those which surrounded the verdict at Regina. But it seems we were mistaken. True, Sir, our men in the Province of Quebec, like those in the other Provinces, had as readily and as devotedly answered to the call. They had been obliged to pass through all the hardships of the campaign. Not one voice in our population had opposed that movement; not one voice in this Parliament coming from the Province of Quebec had objected to give the Government ample power to act in such a manner as to subdue the insurrection and obtain respect for our laws and our institutions in the North-West Territories. They had come back; and, on returning, what did they ask as a reward for the services they had rendered? They had not forced, I must say, the Government to go and implore from the Imperial Government medals that have been reluctantly granted. They thought that, instead of obtaining something to commemorate events that could not redound to the credit of the country, everything ought to be done to cast oblivion on those events. But they joined with the whole population to claim from the Government the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy. They were not moved by mere sentimental ideas. They had good grounds for asking the Government to show clemency and benevolence to those who were the victims of the insurrection, and this is a proper and fitting occasion to answer the taunts of the Conservative papers, or rather the papers that have kept friendly to the Government, when they say: "But how can you speak of the grievances of the Metis after your vote on Mr. Blake's motion last Session?" I must say this: That our opinion then was that as full prestige and authority as possible ought to be given to the Government, that nothing that might appear to give a semblance of encouragement to the Metis in their unfortunate outbreak should come from this Parliament, that so long as the insurrection was not entirely quelled it was wiser on our part to wait and let the Administration do its utmost to bring back peace in those parts of our country. But in the meantime, while we were ready to wait we were decided that after the insurrection had been quelled we would cast on the shoulders where it should lie the responsibility of that insurrection. I might justify that course by some quotations which would show that Parliament then acted on declarations made by some of the Ministers who were not at that time ready to give a sound opinion on the question. On 26th March, some days after the insurrection had broken out, the leader of the Government, in the opening sentences of a speech delivered on the North-West troubles, declared :

"Before Riel came in those settlers had never sent in a bill of rights to us, never sent any complaints to the Government."

The Secretary of State, in a letter addressed to some French Canadians at Fall River, who had sent him a petition on behalf of Louis Riel, repeated that assertion. He said :

"If the half-breeds had serious complaints against the Government the ordinary method of petition was open to them as to every free citizen. They did not avail themselves of it."

The Secretary of State very likely does not entertain the same opinion as to the value of petitions as the Minister of the Interior appears to hold. But he did not know of the existence of any of those petitions, as he said the half-breeds had not availed themselves of that privilege :

"If their petitions were not listened to by the Government, they had a right to enter upon a constitutional agitation and induce their friends in Parliament to make known their grievances."

And further on :

"Nothing on their part has been presented to the Cabinet, which would have required special action from their friends."

I must say this : We can more easily explain the ignorance of the Secretary of State respecting matters regarding the Department of the Interior, than we can explain the ignorance of the Prime Minister on those matters. We know very well that the previous year the Secretary of State was absent ; that last year he had been charged with a very important duty, that of enquiring into the morals and habits of the Chinese, and that great question must have taken so much of his time and attention that he had not an opportunity to study the whole question of the North-West and the half-breeds. I have here an answer to those allegations, a list of seventy six documents, petitions, complaints, notes of interviews with the Government, letters published in the newspapers, all going to show that the grievances of which the Metis were complaining were not redressed. Outside of this, I might refer to a petition which, I think, on account of those who have signed it, will show the whole story from the beginning of the insurrection. It was quoted last year by the hon. leader of the Opposition, but I think it my duty to repeat it to-night as being the best answer to those who would shield their responsibility behind the unfortunate man whom they had decided to hang on the 16th of November. That petition was addressed to the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, and was dated on the 4th September, 1882. I will read the last part of the petition only :

"In our anxiety, we appeal to your spirit of justice, as Minister of the Interior and leader of the Government, and we implore you to at once reassure us by giving orders so that we shall not be troubled on our lands, and that the Government will grant us the privilege of considering us as occupants of even sections, since we occupy those lands in good faith ; and having occupied this country since such a long time as masters and having so often defended it against the Indians at the price of our blood, we think that it is not asking too much that the Government give us the right of occupying peacefully our lands, and that it should make some exceptions to its regulations, by granting gratuitously lands to the North-West half-breeds. We further desire that Government should give orders to have the lands surveyed along the river ten chains wide by two miles long ; it is the old custom of the country to distribute land in this manner, and thus it would enable us to recognise the limits of our respective lands.

"Monsieur the Minister, we hope that you will favorably receive this petition which we send you, and that we shall know your decision as soon as possible. This is our anxious wish, while praying the Almighty to protect you and to keep you at the head of this great country of Canada, which you govern with so much wisdom."

And here follow the names of those who signed that petition, and it is a very sad list :

"Gabriel Dumont (wounded and in exile) ; Baptiste Rochlot (prisoner) ; Patrice Touron (prisoner) ; Calixte Touron (killed) ; François Touron (prisoner) ; Joseph Vandale (killed) ; Joseph Delorme (killed) ; Baptiste Vandale (prisoner) ; Adolphe Nolin (prisoner) ; Ignace Poitras (prisoner) ; Maxime Poitras (prisoner) ; Emmanuel Champagne (prisoner), and others."

After all, Sir, Mr. Lawrence Clark, when he said to the Metis : "You asked the Government for your rights and you will have them in the shape of bullets and lead and chains for your leader," was not very far wrong. The hon. Minister said he had received nothing to inform him what was going on on the Saskatchewan. My hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) quoted the other day one or two letters from Bishop Grandin, and what do those letters say ? I will quote only one which was addressed to the hon. the leader of the Government :

"PRINCE ALBERT, 13th June, 1884.

"SIR,—Your honor must have heard of the discontent felt by the half-breeds of the district of Lorne, of the message sent by them to Mr. L. Riel, and of the inhospitable reception made by them to Honorable E. Dewdney, Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West. I arrived in the district after all these events had taken place, and could not help regretting them."

"I have seen the principal half-breeds of the place, those who may be called the leaders, and I have become quite convinced of their state of discontent with everything. They are altogether embittered, and this may lead them to any extremities. I was deeply grieved to find that it is not they who are the guiltiest. They are excited and urged on, not only by the English half-breeds, but also by residents of Prince Albert—people of consideration, it is said—who are opposed to the Government and who doubtless hope to profit by the regrettable steps taken by the poor half-breeds. They must have been much worked upon for them to have acted thus, unknown to their priests, who have been represented to them as sold to the Canadian Government. Surely it would be easy for your Government to bring to naught this species of revolt, which may, however, have certain painful results, for the half-breeds can do what they like with the Indians. These things are already to be regretted, and should the consequence of them be but one gun fired at the humblest of Her Majesty's subjects, you can but acknowledge that even that would be too much.

"I blame the half-breeds and have not spared them reproaches, but I must be allowed respectfully to inform your Honor that the Canadian Government is not blameless either, and had I the same influence over its members as I have over the half-breeds, I would tell them so perhaps more respectfully, but certainly as frankly. How many petitions and complaints have not these half-breeds addressed to the Government without having been vouchsafed a reply. How many times, both by word and writing have I myself addressed your Honor, without obtaining anything but kind words in reply. I beseech you not to take amiss what I am so frankly saying. I have only the good of the country and of our citizens in view. From their dictation I have written down the grievances of the malcontents and the steps they had taken. I enclose them to you. I entreat your Honor not to remain indifferent, and to take such action as will prevent the evil from becoming aggravated.

"I remain, very respectfully, &c., &c."

And this will be an answer to those who want to throw all the responsibility for the disasters which have occurred during that rebellion on the shoulders of Louis Riel. He says, further :

"They must have been much worked upon for them to have acted thus, unknown to their priests, who have been represented to them as sold to the Canadian Government."

Riel was not in the country then, but the Bishop says that since the agitation he had been sent for, and asked to take the lead of that movement. Some of those who approve of the conduct of the Government, with regard to this question, say : "You should not go against the Government and vote censure on them, since the Grits, when they were in power, had done worse." Sir, this is not a question as between the Conservatives and the Grits, but it is a question of ascertaining how far the grievances suffered by the Metis were sufficient to justify the commutation of the sentence. Indeed, I am willing to go further, and to say that since the beginning the Metis have had to suffer from the Canadian Government; since the beginning they have been provoked; and if they have shown so much distrust and lack of confidence in the Canadian Government we can trace that state of things to the fact that Archbishop Taché was called from Rome to come and help the Government out of the unfortunate troubles they had created, on account of their policy in the North-West, when he had left here with a perfect understanding as he thought with the leader of the Government that a complete amnesty would be granted to all those connected with the troubles. But there is this besides. The Minister of Militia said that Riel was the cause of the second, as he had been of the first, insurrection. That is not in harmony with the facts, because if we consult the public documents of that time, what do we find? We find that at least one year before those territories were ceded to Canada such men as Colonel Dennis, Dr. Schultz and others acting in the name of the Canadian Government, had been inciting trouble, persecuting the Metis, organising the Indians against them, when they had not the least particle of authority to represent the Canadian Government there. Here, Sir, I may quote what the Governor General himself says as declared at that time as to the conduct of those representing the Canadian Government before the cession of the North-West Territories to this country. On the 26th of January, 1870, the Governor General showed his appreciation of the usual proclamation and actions of the Canadian delegate by saying:

(Translation.)

"I regret still more seriously the proclamation issued by Mr. McDougall and the commission sent by him to Colonel Dennis.

"The proclamation stated that Her Majesty had transferred the Rupert Land to Canada, which had not been done. He has assumed the authority of Lieutenant Governor which did not legally belong to him and tended to annihilate the powers belonging to Mr. McTavish who is in fact the only legal Governor of the territory.

"A subsequent proclamation authorized Colonel Dennis to arm his followers, to attack, arrest, disarm and disperse armed men disturbing the public peace, and to assail, fire, break into any house wherein armed men might be found. If Colonel Dennis had acted accordingly the most disastrous results might have followed. Under the present circumstances the McTavish Government must suppose that his authority has ceased, no other Government having been substituted to them, and the discovery that the statement of facts contained in the proclamation are untrue must diminish the weight of any subsequent proclamation."

One of the strongest reasons urged by the hon. Minister of Militia against any mitigation of the sentence rendered by the Regina tribunal against Riel was that he had been guilty of raising the Indians. Well, here we have the proof that that criminal act had been taught to the Metis by the Canadian officials themselves—that in 1869-70 Colonel Dennis had engaged a Metis of the name of Joseph Monkman, at the rate of 10 shillings a day, to try and raise the Indians against the Metis. So, if Riel was so guilty in doing that, how is it that Colonel Dennis, after being guilty of such a crime, was called here to be for many years the most intimate confidant of the Prime Minister—that he was put at the head of such an important Department as the Department of the Interior? How is it that Dr. Schultz, who was proved to be guilty of the same crime, was indemnified for all the losses he was alleged to have suffered during the first troubles, and was elevated to the high position of a Senator of the Dominion? That is the answer I give to the accusation made against Riel that he incited the Indians. Sir, the grievances of the Metis during that time were many. Venerable Archbishop Taché, relying upon what he declared to be the positive promises of the Government, had gone to his people and had told them that if they consented to return to their homes they would never be called to account for those troubles—that anything illegal they might have committed would be condoned. We have his testimony, and I do not suppose the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) will object to this, as he objected to another declaration made by that venerable

Archbishop. This he has sworn to. What does this document say? That on the return of Archbishop Taché to Ottawa from Europe Sir John A. Macdonald and the Hon. Mr. Howe met him, and in several conversations expressed the desire that he would return immediately to Red River; and, when he remarked that some who had been connected with the troubles might have committed something against the law, they said that nobody would be troubled by reason of the past. Then he said:

(Translation.)

"The question of the recent acts of violence was one of the daily topics between the Ministers and myself, and fears were expressed that the country would be laid waste with fire and sword. More than that—the members of the Privy Council expressed their surprise that such things had not already taken place, and they attributed that fact to the great moderation shown by the half-breeds. I had some conversation with the Ministers with regard to the policy of Mr. McDougall and Colonel Dennis, and their conduct was severely criticised by the Ministers.

And he adds:

"All the other conversations which I had were with Sir John A. Macdonald, who again insisted on the necessity of informing the people of the good dispositions of the Government towards them."

In a letter addressed to the venerable Archbishop by Sir John A. Macdonald, the latter said:

(Translation.)

"If the question relative to the consumption of goods or articles belonging to the Hudson Bay Company by the insurgents was raised, you are authorised to inform the leaders that if the Government of the country is re-established, not only will a general amnesty be granted, but in case that the country should claim to be reimbursed for such property the Canadian Government will see that protection will be given to the insurgents."

Well, Sir, he left with the impression that a complete amnesty would be given. He went to his people and declared that such was the case. Upon the faith of that declaration, of which the Canadian Government had the whole benefit, the Metis went back to their homes. They did more than that; some of them who had been connected with the troubles went to meet the troops under the command of Wolseley so as to assist them to reach Fort Garry with as little hardship as possible. What was the reward of their conduct in that instance? Colonel Wolseley had scarcely entered Fort Garry when he issued a proclamation declaring all those people to be banditti and cowards. The people had disbanded on the faith of promises conveyed to them by Archbishop Taché; they had laid down their arms so that they could not answer. But they did not forget; and one of the grievances which the Metis had against Canada was this insult that had been given to them as the first token of the intentions of the Canadian authorities towards them. Besides, their leaders were prosecuted; criminal charges were brought against them, and now amongst so many sad events let me mention a fact that is very much to the credit of one of our most brilliant lawyers in Lower Canada. When we saw that the prosecutions were going against Lépine Neault, &c., we went to the Secretary of State, who was then a young lawyer, and asked him to defend those unfortunate people; and I must give him the credit of saying that without asking us if we could do anything towards helping him in the expenses of such a trip, he went to Winnipeg and defended those unfortunate people. Sir, I think when as Secretary of State he had to turn that leaf of his life and accept the responsibility of saying, as one of the reasons why the sentence of death was to be carried out against one of the leaders of the Metis, that he was to be condemned because he was a récidiviste. I think he must have been put under the weight of an influence which he must have felt very hard to submit to. But, Sir, coming to this last insurrection, we saw it stated that not only had the Metis grievances but actual provocations to incite them to take up arms to protect themselves. Here is what a correspondent writing to one of the newspapers said after the beginning of the rising. He mentioned the fact that they had sent for Louis Riel:

"He was their last hope, and for eight months afterward they followed him in a strictly constitutional agitation, in which the best white settlers of the district took part. That path was unfortunately departed from under stress of the report—attributed to Lawrence Clarke, who was naturally regarded by the Metis as a good authority—that five hundred more police were on their way, and that Riel was to be arrested. He and his followers could not but feel that no hope then remained but in an appeal to arms, the last refuge of the oppressed; for what could they expect if they were to be denied the right of constitutional agitation as well as the privilege of representation? They immediately proceeded to put themselves in a position to oppose the expected force. Omelettes can't be made without breaking eggs, and the half-breeds seized munitions wherever they could be found. In doing so they were met by the police at Duck Lake, and as one force was bent on securing justice, and the other on maintaining law, there was no retreat for either without a conflict."

This is corroborated by the manifesto published by Archbishop Taché himself; and, Sir, when it is said after all these facts that Louis Riel was the first cause of the second, as he had been the first cause of the first insurrection, those are statements which are not borne out by the facts. I contend, Sir, that all those events ought to have had some weight with the Ministers when they had to decide as to the propriety of ordering that the sentence of death should be carried out against Louis Riel. Another reason, Sir, why public opinion in our Province had asked for the mitigation of the sentence, is the letter of Gen. Middleton, which has already been quoted, asking Riel to surrender, and promising his own protection until he was put into the hands of the Government. I have quoted this afternoon the opinion of a distinguished journalist, who seems to be very far in the confidence of the Ministers at the present time. I will quote from one of his articles as to the right we had to take the same ground with reference to that letter from Gen. Middleton. He said:

"The amnesty granted after the revolt of the Sepoys, by which all who had not personally been guilty of the murder of British subjects were pardoned. Nana Sahib was the leader of that rebellion. He committed unheard-of outrages; yet the English Government did not send him to the scaffold."

The Mail of the 14th April, which was not so wild and bitter as it has been since, and foreseeing that that letter of General Middleton might be sent to the Metis, seemed to have entertained the same opinion. What did it say?

"The news from the west this morning is not sensational at all. In our last issue was given the substance of the case as set forth by Riel. This morning it is further set forth with some degree of vehemence. Of course it must be obvious that men do not take up arms and fight and kill and risk being hanged and shot, like Riel and his followers, without at least a conviction that they have grievances. These grievances will have to be heard some day, and the sooner the public understands the better."

"An unreasoning cry for blood and revenge would be a misfortune. The expedition is probably costing $40,000 per day, and already in all probability some $300,000 has been spent or incurred. That is a very serious matter, and one that will make the average tax paying citizen by no means anxious to continue the contest, if any reasonable way out of the confusion offers itself. Fighting for the mere sake of fighting, or for revenge is a poor business, and our people will be best pleased with a bloodless, if successful campaign."

"The idea that Riel will run away as on a former occasion, is one that is useful to keep the Indians quiet; but it is not one on which a military policy can be framed. If he is forced to fight he will do so. If he offers to submit no doubt wisdom will guide the deliberations of those who will have charge of the negotiations. General Middleton, no doubt, has large powers, and is continually in communication with the authorities at Ottawa."

Well, Sir, is it possible to believe that General Middleton in sending in that letter, asking Riel to surrender, meant that, if that man answered by surrendering, he had no other alternative but to expect death on the scaffold? Sir, it is not understood that way amongst civilised nations, and the international code to-day acknowledges plainly that, when such things as letters have been exchanged between belligerents, between a party in insurrection and the General commanding the regular army, that is considered as acknowledging to the rebels all the rights of ordinary belligerents, and that they are not to be supposed, if they surrender under such circumstances, to be submitted to the extreme penalties of the law. There was another ground upon which public opinion in our Province expected that the

Mr. DESJARDINS.

Government would be induced to grant an amnesty. That, I admit, came at the very last moment. For what consideration the third respite was granted we cannot yet understand. According to the ministerial journals, although that respite was granted, it meant nothing but that the execution was changed from one day to the other. The Gazette of Montreal declared plainly that, upon as sound authority as they could gather from Ottawa, the last respite did not mean in any way anything favorable to the doomed man, but that the execution would surely take place on the 16th. Well, we thought then that, giving no sound reason for that unnecessary respite it was adding more cruelty to the already cruel execution, and now we have this declaration of the Minister of Justice that, on the 12th November, a final decision was arrived at, while we have the declaration from the Minister of Militia, in a letter addressed to him by the Premier, that everything had been decided before his departure. If we see that fact, if we read the declaration made by the ministerial organs, it is impossible to find out that any acceptable reasons can be given by the Government for having added six days of agony to the agonies already suffered by that man. It seems to me that the choice of the day, the 12th, to come to a decision like that, was a very bad choice. In fact, it is true that a banquet had been organising in Winnipeg for the 10th, and that two Ministers were to be present. Now we find that the interpretation given to these two facts is explained in another way. At the last moment, a medical commission was appointed, very likely in order to make good the promises made by the Minister of Public Works to the Province of Quebec and to political friends, in order that they might be fulfilled, if not seriously, at least that they might have an appearance of fulfilment. We had been promised a medical commission composed of specialists, a serious medical commission, not a sham one, not a commission composed of men who were to go there like detectives rather than physicians, concealing not only their titles but even their names; but we thought that, in that case as in all the others, all the necessary precautions would be taken, and that a serious commission would be granted. But what did we see? What kind of a commission have we had, and what kind of a report did the Government accept to base their final decision upon? Now, Sir, I will not argue very much longer on these facts. I could have said something of the promises of the Minister of Public Works as to the guarantee that would be given that the jurors in Regina would be chosen in the same manner and with the same rights to the prisoner as obtained in the other Provinces. That was not done, but yet, packed as it seemed to have been, the members of the jury seem to have had more consideration, more humane feeling than the Government, and, after having heard the trial, after having heard the testimony, they came to the conclusion that, although Riel was guilty, they ought to recommend him to the mercy of the court. I want to register two or three editorials published in newspapers in our Province, to show what opinion has been entertained about the conduct of the Government, and by this it will be easy to form an idea of what was the opinion outside. There is one editorial dated the 13th November in La Minerve. It was the same day that the French Conservative members met in Montreal. I am not in a position to translate it, but I think it is good that these articles should be quoted to show the consistency of those who would take a different ground now. The Minerve says:

(Translation)

"No news from Ottawa. Silent as the tomb. Still a decision must have been taken, for only two days remain before the execution, just the time required for a messenger who should have left on Wednesday night, to arrive in time at Regina, with the warrant stating that 'it is the pleasure of His Excellency that the law should follow its course.' What a sinister irony is contained in the words of that official form! We are convinced that the Governor General would willingly return to Her Majesty, for a few days, the high prerogative of mercy which she has delegated to him. His Excellency celebrated yesterday the Thanksgiving holiday proclaimed by him the other day. It was a day of prayer and propitiation. The strangest of comparisons are made on the subject of that dismal date, chosen by justice as the piece of news of the execution. Despatches from Winnipeg bring us another day. Wednesday was the date of a great banquet given to the Hon. Messrs. White and Caron. What had taste, not to say what impropriety, was shown by inviting to a public mercy-making on such a day two politicians who have such strong ties in our province! Rumors coming from Regina are such as to make us think that the Government has commissioned medical experts to enquire into the mental state of the prisoner. If true, this solicitude on the part of the Government is worthy of praise. To refuse this last demand of the prisoner seemed cruel. What will be the result of this enquiry? We have great doubt that serious medical men will pretend that Riel is not suffering from monomania, at least as regards the North-West question.

"Now, if he is a monomaniac, even if only partially so, His Excellency must think twice before intimating his 'good pleasure' that the execution should take place. If the Government keep in store for us the painful sight of the execution of a vanquished and broken down man, let them, at least, save us from the horror of thinking that an unfortunate man, deprived of his reasoning powers, was sent to the gallows. We have prayed for mercy and pity on a condemned man, we will cry out shame on the executioners of an insane man. We may tolerate that people should remain deaf to our supplications; we would not allow any one to insult with impunity the elementary principles of humanity."

Well, Sir, after having read that report, that improved report, of the physicians appointed to investigate the sanity of the doomed man, to what conclusion must we come, if we are to accept the authority of that ministerial paper against the report? It says that even though he were but partially insane, it would be a crime against humanity to bring him to the scaffold. The report was sent by telegram, we are informed. We have not seen those telegrams, but we have a report. Here is what the Minerve, of the 16th November, the day of the execution, says about that:

(Translation.)

"In all probabilities the sun will set to-night on the corpse of Riel. From several points of views it is a fatal day. But, although to-day, all the mourning may be on our side, we are fully convinced that the pangs of sorrow will be longer felt, and more painful with those who make this day their day of triumph. They have put cruelty in the place of justice; they wanted revenge, and they have it. From this day the conditions of politics are changed. For a quarter of a century past, the Conservative party of Lower Canada has tumbled after itself shattered and dissimilar fragments of hypocritical factions, who had managed to sneak into the Conservative party of Upper Canada. In the heat of a contest very little attention is paid to these arrière-bans of combatants whom one does not always know, and whom one does not mistrust. An honest, straightforward and generous man, will naturally suppose honesty, frankness and generosity in others. This is the way things have been going on for years, in a cordial understanding which we took for public spirit, and which on the part of an Upper Canada section was only plotting and intrigue. It is somewhat like the fable of the wild sow and her young ones. Because we have not carefully chosen our company, we have admitted in our midst a brood which has organised itself and which is now expelling us from our homes. This is the long and short of that cruel drama which is about to wind up by an execution."

The editor of the Minerve was quite right when he said that. Read the Mail, read the other papers. After we have followed the Conservative party so many years, so humbly and with so much docility, we must acknowledge that the writer was perfectly correct when he expressed such an opinion of those with whom we have been allied so long:

(Translation.)

"For what reason did he (Sir John) after all, give way to a handful of agitators, who are neither the nucleus nor the majority of his party? We shall know it later on; for we are not giving a piece of news when we state that accounts will be settled during the next Session. And we will try him like all the rest. If it is, as we believe, the Orange party who has presided to the impolitic act of to-day, there will be a definite settlement of accounts between that party and ours, unless the settlement of accounts should date from to-day, which we would be far from regretting. If the Government have been compelled to act by this sullen set, whose only dream is hatred, they must take the consequences. We are tolerance itself; our peaceful character sometimes seems to go as far as weakness; but defiance and struggles are far from frightening us. We have even chosen as our patron saint, a saint whose head served on the table of a courtesan, was the price of a hateful revenge. We are able to resist and we shall resist."

And I hope that resolution will be carried out:

"And such is the gravity of the situation that the proceedings of a party which, as a rule are kept secret, must to-day take place in broad day-light, in the columns of the newspaper as in the street conversations. We will have to hold council openly, in presence of everybody like brave men, who need not fear the consequences of their determination."

Well, Sir, I must say to the credit of that paper, that it exactly expressed the feelings of the whole population of Quebec at that time, and I can say, moreover, that they are still the feelings of the Province of Quebec. As another authority I can give a writer whom I have had the pleasure of quoting already, a writer in the Canadien of Quebec. Here is what that paper says:

(Translation.)

"Is the man who employs a fool as his secretary sounder in mind than the secretary himself?"

"Why, we are ready to admit once more that Riel was responsible for his actions when he came from Montana to join the half-breed people, who acted in harmony with the British settlers of the neighboring districts."

"Our opponents, those who exacted and obtained his death from the Dominion Government, dare not take the ground of the last rebellion to justify their conduct."

"They go back to the events of 1869 and say that Riel, twice guilty of rebellion, had no right to mercy."

The Minister of Militia wants to justify the execution of Riel, not on account of the verdict rendered by the jury at Regina, but on account of the troubles in 1869, those troubles which he himself, in public meetings, and in this House, had defended in the years 1874-75.—

(Translation.)

"The Mail soon forgets the history, or else it thinks that the people of this country is groping about in blind ignorance. Was the part taken by Riel in the events of 1869-70, as criminal as the Mail represents it to-day? If so, why did the Government of that day, which was presided over by Sir John A. Macdonald, treat with him? Why did they promise a general amnesty through Mgr. Taché? Even more! Why did Sir John, a member of the Privy Council of Her Majesty, give him money to enable him to escape from the hatred and fanaticism let loose by blood-thirsty Orangism?"

"Whatever the faults of Riel may be, he represented on Monday, on the scaffold, a principle of civilisation and humanity which had been ignored; political offences are not punished by death, in our times, and Riel was a political offender, a political convict. In taking his life, the Government have disobeyed the verdict of the jury, which, by recommending him to mercy, could not recommend anything else but a commutation."

"They have, without any necessity for the maintenance of order, shed the blood of a man whose unbalanced mind has perhaps not for years formed a correct idea of the important events with which he has been connected."

"And the Government understood all that, since they tried to save Riel, since they granted him respites and delays in the hope of appeasing the ferocity of the Orange beast. And the Government, with a knowledge of all that, did not have the courage to resist the demands of the Orange lodges which were clamoring for blood."

"History will tell what should have been the desire of the Government, and also what the sound opinion of the country desired."

There is another quotation I desire to make from the reports of those meetings, which the Minister of the Interior yesterday qualified as being a disgrace to our Province. Here is what Le Canadien says of a meeting held at Bienville:

(Translation.)

"The meeting held last night at Bienville terminated by three cheers in honor of Her Majesty Queen Victoria. This means that there has been calm dignity and public spirit. We place the great movement which agitates the Province in all its remotest parts, under the ægis of the British constitution which affords sure means of obtaining redress for all grievances, of securing the triumph of all just causes. The other provinces will not be long in joining us; they are as interested as we are to see the Government of this country carried on according to principles recognised in civilised countries. At this moment Canada is under the ban of Europe and America. The leading organs of public sentiment in the United States and in France tax the Executive of the Dominion of Canada with cruelty and barbarity. Let us show by our protestations that we are not, that we do not wish to be, responsible for the terrible crime which draws such universal reprobation on the heads of the culprits. The Government of which they form part has lost all the confidence of Lower Canada; they do not represent our opinions in the Council Chamber, and they know it. We will say more: they do not even represent their own sentiments, for it is impossible they should have wished to hang Riel. This is our candid opinion. We speak frankly also when we say that they are completely isolated in their Province. The union is formed against the fatal policy for which they are responsible from a constitutional point of view. They did not deem proper to resign; the future and history will judge them."

Such was the opinion of an important paper published in the district of Quebec, which was a true echo of the feelings of the people of that district; and I have quoted from La Minerve, another Conservative paper, which we know has great influence in our own district. As to myself, I worked earnestly for the commutation of Riel's sentence.

In this I acted all along in concert with my own political friends. I kept as much as possible in communication with the Government through the Minister of Public Works. When I was called to meet the electors of my county at Côte St. Louis, I had seen that Minister, and I must say this: That from what he declared to me then I thought I could tell my electors that if they were to maintain a constitutional agitation so as to obtain the respite that it was necessary to give the prisoner's lawyers an opportunity to go to all the legal tribunals, and, moreover, if we asked a medical commission, composed of specialists, to enquire into the sanity of the prisoner, that policy would likely succeed. We know very well what such words from the mouth of a Minister must mean. Upon the faith and recommendation of my chief, I went to Hochelaga, as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) went to his electors at Lachine, on the same day, and there we took the ground I have indicated. And as it has been stated that the agitation was disloyal, that it was brought about so as to raise a feeling among French Canadians that they should be treated otherwise than as the other races, I beg leave to quote a portion of the remarks I made on that day. At that meeting, presided over by one of the mayors of the county, and which was attended by at least six hundred people, I was the first speaker. Here is a quotation from the report as published in the paper of the following day:

"He (Mr. Desjardins) advised his hearers not to indulge in vain recriminations and violent words, but to do their best to maintain order and harmony, which was so essential in a mixed community like this. There was in this Dominion, he said, one million five hundred thousand French Canadians determined to preserve intact their laws, institutions, rights and privileges. But, on the other hand, there were over two millions five hundred thousand persons of English origin. Those were not strong enough to drive the French Canadians out. There are only a few fever-brained that entertain such an idea."

I did not know then that it might apply to a paper which I had been accustomed to accept as a great authority, the Mail.—

"But anyone will admit that they are numerous enough, and strong enough, and determined enough, to maintain their hold on the country and defend their just rights. Thus, we are two populations called upon to live side by side, under the same institutions and protected by the same flag. Ought we then, he continued, make war upon them; should we not rather do all in our power to maintain harmony between the two races, only rivaling them in our work, our industry and our zeal for the good and prosperity of all. There are times when the national feeling runs high, but it is at these very times that it is most necessary to appeal to the higher sentiments, the most purely patriotic, so that we may not place in peril the interests which have cost us so much to secure. The present is a time of excitement, but, so far, we have kept ourselves within the limits of reason. When the insurrection broke out, at the first call, our brothers, our sons, our soldiers, turned out with no other desire than to accomplish a faithful duty at all costs, namely, to reduce to subjection their brothers who had been led astray by malicious counsels."

You cheered those braves on their departure and wished them success, and welcomed them on their return, for they had accomplished their mission and brought back with them more than their share of prestige and glory. He referred to the meeting in the Champ de Mars and said that some of the speakers gave out that the tribunal was a machine made expressly for the purpose of persecuting the Metis. I say it was not the fact. Then I asked that the resolution based on the two grounds I have given already should be accepted by the meetings and then it was adopted unanimously. The same arguments that I used in my own county were repeated in Lachine in Jacques Cartier. In not one instance was there any disloyal cry, any appeal against the constitution or the law at any of those meetings. We acted within the constitution and on the rights which we preserved to agitate, and petition, and protest against anything we thought to be unjust on the part of the Government. Sir, I have said more. I had pledged myself that if those resolutions were passed I would go myself and present them to the hon. leader of the Government, and I did so. As I did not then mention that the interview was to be a public one, although I had a witness with me, I will not say what kind of a conversation took place between us, but I can say this, that I came back with the firm impression that such measures would be adopted as would meet our demands, that the promises that had been made, not only in conversation, but through his organs, by the Minister of Public Works, would be fulfilled. These promises were even made at public meetings as we see by L'Événement on the 18th of August. There was an address presented to Sir Hector Langevin at Rimouski, and the following telegram was sent and has never been denied:—

(Translation.)

"RIMOUSKI, 19th.—Yesterday, the citizens of Rimouski presented an address to Sir Hector Langevin, who answered in terms which were very flattering to the representatives of the county. Alluding to the trial of Louis Riel, he expressed the idea that the Government would take into serious consideration the demand to form a jury of medical men whose duty it will be to ascertain the mental state of Riel. Sir Hector added that that would be done in proper time."

That, added Sir Hector, would be made in the proper time. I ask if it was fulfilling such a promise to wait to the last day of the life of Riel and to send, not specialists as was promised, but officers employed by the Government—physicians who had no more experience on insanity than any ordinary physician that might have been sent, and sending them to make the report which we have received, and which after all turned against the expectation of those who wanted to be justified by it to the condemnation of the Government. I say that if you take these reports and read them, you must be convinced that the man who was sent to the scaffold was not a man with a sane or a well-balanced mind. Well, Sir, I have given all the reasons—and I think they are fair reasons—why we have agitated in the Province of Quebec, why we have so strongly demanded a commutation of the sentence. Now, Sir, since we were clamoring for clemency, it is impossible to accuse us of having been moved by feelings of hatred or revenge. In fact if we had been moved by such feelings what would we say? What accusations would we be entitled to bring against the Government since, despite the declaration made last year by the hon. the leader of the Government himself, that behind the Metis there were men much more guilty than they were themselves—that the whites of Prince Albert were the true organisers of the insurrection? Of that declaration we have seen nothing except the paragraph in the letter we have just received containing the instructions given by the Minister of Justice to the lawyers representing the Government at Regina. Have we seen anything to show that the Government was in earnest in taking action with regard to the men who have been accused on the floor of Parliament of having been the first cause of the insurrection. It is likely, Sir, that not only are those men quiet in their homes, but that they have already received at the hands of the Government sums of money to compensate them for any loss they may have incurred. Well, Sir, we have been asking for mercy, and we do not want to see those men troubled. What we want is oblivion and forgiveness for all those connected with the troubles in the North-West, and we want nothing else. We do not desire that the victims of the insurrection, if they happen to be English, shall be worse treated than were the Metis in that same insurrection, just because they are Metis or of French origin. We want equal treatment to all; and I think that the Government should have been able to forget that measure which we were expecting would have come from them, instead of distributing medals to perpetuate the memory of a fight which will never be to the credit of the country, though so brave and so well behaved has been the conduct of our volunteers, upon whom does not lie the responsibility for those troubles—I think it would have been better, instead of trying to shield the responsibility of whatever neglect of duty or whatever injustice they may have been responsible for behind the scaffold of Regina, that they should have shown an amount of clemency which would have prepared public opinion to judge more leniently of the conduct of the Canadian Government towards that unfortunate population. Sir, we Conservatives who have sustained the Government are obliged, and we know we are obliged, to share in the responsibility for the troubles that have occurred in those territories by reason of the loyal, undisputed support that we have given them; and we wanted them, by showing at least moderation in their victory, and a spirit of toleration and forgiveness that they would put us in a position to tell our people: "Well, there have been faults in the past, but we must hope, now, that such terrible lessons have been given, that they will be averted for the future." We are in this position, that we must vote to censure the Government on that question; but those who pretend to say that we shall for that reason betray our principles and the measures for which we have fought for so many years are much mistaken. It has been charged against us that out of hatred and bad feelings, and for the sake of overthrowing the Government, we intend to turn our backs on all the principles and measures we have sustained in the past. Well, if any have entertained this hope, they have been mistaken. We attach too much importance to our principles over the men in power to sacrifice them for the mere pleasure of having revenge against them. What we have defended in the past we shall defend in the future. We have approved of the construction of the Pacific Railway, and we shall continue to approve of it; and I think it would have been common good grace on the part of the Government who have been so faithfully sustained, if on the completion of a work which reflects such credit on the country, instead of forcing the first train of the Pacific Railway that left Montreal for the Pacific Ocean, to pass under the sinister shadow of a political scaffold, they had chosen that event to show to the different sections of the Dominion of Canada that the Pacific Railway, instead of being a means for conveying troops more easily to the new territories was rather a link of harmony and peace and good will between the different portions of the population of this country. Sir, we have been called foreigners in this country. I do not know whether I ought to answer that. I think it is perhaps better to leave it to the fairness and the good sense of our friends who speak another language, to decide whether we, the sons of those who settled first on the shores of the St. Lawrence, who were the first to civilise that country, and the first to penetrate into every part of the territory of Canada, to discover it, and to enlighten it with Christian civilisation—whether we are to be told now that we are foreigners to this country, that we are only tolerated here, that our language is a nuisance and an impediment to the progress and harmony of the people of Canada. Sir, if we hope to build up a strong nation in this great country, it is not to be done by such denunciations. It is not to be done by telling a million and a quarter of people that they are foreigners, when we invite all foreigners to come here and participate in our freedom and in all the benefits of our institutions. For my own part, whatever accusations or provocations may be raised, I shall make it a duty to myself and those whom I love, to try always to work for peace and harmony amongst all the different groups of our population; I shall strive to see that those principles of justice which are the only conditions of peace and happiness in Canada shall always be respected; and if here we are obliged to perform so painful a duty as that which we are called upon to perform to-day, it is because we place those principles above friendship, above old ties, above every other consideration, and act upon those grounds of equity and fairness which we are entitled to expect, and which we are bound to concede to everybody else.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent, N. B.) Mr. Speaker, I would hardly presume to address myself to this subject now, if it were not that I think it is necessary that a voice should be heard from every Province of the Dominion on this important question. I feel at the outset that this question has been quite thoroughly discussed, that almost all the strong points either on one side or the other have been dwelt upon and brought out according to the views the different speakers have taken of the events that have taken place during the last year or so. Feeling thus, I cannot expect to add anything particularly new to this discussion. Yet, Sir, as the subject has proved to be of such interest to this House and to the country, I hope the House will not think me too tedious if I attempt to make some observations, even at the risk of having to repeat something that may have been much better said by speakers who have preceded me. It is with pleasure that I follow the hon. gentleman who has just preceded me. When the news came to New Brunswick that, because of the hanging of the unfortunate Metis chief, a great excitement had arisen in the Province of Quebec, it came to us, as I thought at the time, in a very exaggerated form. Yet, having read for myself in the newspapers the editorials, the correspondence, and the reports of the speeches delivered at the different meetings in the Province of Quebec, I am not now prepared to say that the reports, which reached New Brunswick, were in a very exaggerated form; but such as they were, they had a tendency to excite the people in our Province who were not, perhaps, thoroughly cognisant of the facts connected with the North-West rebellion and the hanging of the unfortunate rebel chief. I felt it my duty on one occasion, when called on to speak in the city of St. John—although I had not thought of mentioning the subject until those who preceded me referred to it—to say something of what I thought of the agitation going on in the Province of Quebec, and the reason I say I am glad to have the opportunity of following my hon. friend who spoke last is this. That on reading afterwards in the public press, reports of what had taken place in the Province, I saw in one of the papers that my hon. friend had unmasked me before a large meeting in the manner in which I deserved to be unmasked. I had known my hon. friend for several sessions; I knew his generous character; I knew his universal courtesy; and I knew that spirit of toleration which characterised all his actions and speeches in this House. Although I did not know what it was that he had said which had so completely unmasked me, yet it made me think for a moment that, as he had used this expression, the hon. gentleman must have thought there was great occasion for its use, and that it was necessary I should be unmasked before the people of his Province. I felt anxious, therefore, to see whether he would undertake to unmask me here. But I am glad to say he has not. I do not even know what he said on the occasion I refer to, and therefore I was anxious to hear from the hon. gentleman in this House what it was I had said in the city of St. John which was so offensive to the hon. gentleman and the people of Quebec. His not having alluded to this in any way relieves me, since it affords evidence that no weight need be attached to this reported expression of the hon. gentleman. In what I said I did not intend to be offensive to any section of this Dominion, and I cannot conceive how it could have been so construed. I spoke then my convictions, and I now affirm, before this House and the country, that these convictions have not been in the least weakened since, but, on the contrary, have grown stronger from the events which have since taken place. I am not responsible for what I may have been reported to have said in the newspapers, but I am confident that I did not say a single word that could be considered offensive to my French Canadian friends in this House. What I did say was that the reports which had reached the city of St. John as to the agitation in Quebec were either exaggerated, or, if not, I felt that the occasion did not justify such an agitation. I said that my honorable friends, whose names I had seen as taking part in the agitation, would themselves be sorry for their action before many months had passed over their heads; and to-day I am more and more confirmed in the opinion I then expressed, for I believe these honorable gentlemen are now sorry for having lost their heads at the time.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). The hon gentleman says, "hear, hear" as a sort of denial. It may be that he now says he is not sorry, but I must say that if we can judge by the speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen from Quebec and by the reports of what they said at the outbreak of the agitation, they must feel sorry for the part they took, because not one of them has taken here the same line of argument he took then. If they are not sorry, how is it that we do not hear the same appeal to what I may call—it may not be the correct word, but it is the one that comes most handy—prejudices or passions, which they made in the Province of Quebec. I do not say that these hon. gentlemen were not then sincere, but I say that they were led into the agitation without sufficient reflection; and I believe they now regret it, as they do not now take the same line of argument that they did then. It would be useless for me to refer to reports of newspapers, because they have been copiously referred to here already, but we know that the agitation, whether general or not in Quebec, was great, and when the news of it came to the Province of New Brunswick, I, feeling myself closely allied to the people of Quebec by sympathy, by the ties of blood and religion, deemed it my duty to take a position which I could justify before the country and the House. I felt it behoved me, as a representative of a population in the Maritime Provinces, speaking the same language as the population agitating in the Province of Quebec, to see whether it was right, advantageous to us, to join in the agitation, and I could not but come to the conclusion that it was my duty to try and prevent the agitation reaching New Brunswick, or at least those whom I have the honor more immediately to represent. On thinking the situation over, although I felt sympathy with the French Canadians of Quebec, so far as our mutual aspirations are concerned, I believed that instead of helping along this excitement, I should try to diminish it, that I should try to persuade the people, as far as I could, whom I represent, that by no agitation, by no action on their part, should they uphold what I considered to be a violation of the laws and constituted authority of our country. The lesson I considered should be taught was moderation and submission to the laws, and not the mischievous theory that the proper way to redress grievances and wrongs was to rise in rebellion, as the unfortunate people in the North-West, though small in numbers and ignorant in education, had, instigated by the unfortunate Riel. Our people in the Maritime Provinces had been in the past somewhat similarly situated; they had suffered from grievances and wrongs, and even to-day, although there may not be anything very tangible in the way of grievances or wrongs to point to, yet we labor under grievances arising from the fact that we are in a minority and are not represented according to number in those places that give a power and influence, and have not a fair share of public patronage. Would it, therefore, have been proper for me to teach those people, by actions and words, by calling public meetings, that wherever they felt they had a grievance and the authorities would not give sufficient attention to their complaints, the proper way to obtain redress was to rise up in arms? No; I thought the best lesson to teach them was to agitate, in a proper constitutional manner, and not in a manner which might end in a resort to firearms. Feeling as I did, I thought it was my duty to take the line of conduct I did, and I do not now regret it, for the people have been since able to look on this matter with more calmness and justice than when the agitation was first started. My hon. friend who just preceded me (Mr. Desjardins), endeavored to use arguments for the purpose of creating political effect, not only in the Province of Quebec, but in the whole Dominion; and I will take the liberty of seeing whether his arguments can bear the construction he has put upon them, whether he can fairly deduce from them those deductions which he wishes the electorate to make. In the first place, he told us it was much more easy for the Minister of Public Works to defend his action here in Parliament than in his own constituency. Well, is not this the proper place for the Government to defend its actions? If it has been rendered difficult for the hon. Minister to go to his constituency and there defend his actions, what is the reason? Simply because of the agitation of which I disapproved, because, in my mind, the people whom we have been told here are so docile, who are always obedient to the laws of their country, had that very docility taken advantage of by representations being made to them that a great wrong had been done to their nationality. They therefore became somewhat excited, and it was very difficult for a time for gentlemen who took opposite views, and wished to justify the action of the Government, to appear before any audience in the Province of Quebec. But I do not think that state of affairs exists to-day. I believe that, to-day, almost before any audience in the Province of Quebec, the other side of the question will be heard, and that, that side being heard dispassionately and calmly, the decision of that Province would be the same decision that would be given in the other Provinces. My hon. friend has protested against the calumny, as he called it, that was sent broadcast against the French people of the Dominion of Canada by the Mail newspaper. If there be anything in what he has said in which I heartily join with him, it is in condemning the articles which were published in the Mail newspaper for a time during last fall; but, at the same time, I am prepared to condescend in the same breath the articles which appeared in the French press in the Province of Quebec. If, on the one hand, the Mail newspaper was violent, so, on the other, was the French press in the Province of Quebec, and it was that press which commenced the agitation in that violent manner; but, because I think the French press should be condemned for conducting that agitation in the violent way in which they did, I say at the same time that that was no reason why the press on the other side, and in the Province of Ontario, should have taken up the question in the same manner and should have become even more violent than the French press in the Province of Quebec. If we want to teach the people of this country respect for one another, respect for one another's nationality and creed, it is not to be done by the press of either the Province of Quebec or the Province of Ontario taking up a position in that violent manner. We are told that there was no attempt made at any time to build up a party that was to be called the national party, that the only attempt was—as I understood my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier)—not an attempt to build up a new party at all, but simply to fight on the line of the old parties as they existed. I understood him to say that the only attempt made was to fight on the same lines as before, but simply to add the new element of the hanging of Louis Riel. If that be so, I do not read aright the articles which appeared in the press in the Province of Quebec. I will not make any long quotations, because I know they are tedious to this House, but I will read one quotation from a paper called L'Electeur of the 17th November, the day following that on which the unfortunate man was hanged. On that day we find this article:

(Translation)

"Retaliation! yes, retaliation! Let this be for this day, for to-morrow, and forever the watchword engraved in bloody letters within the hearts of all French Canadians."

Now, what does that mean? Is that not as reprehensible as anything can well be? Here is a population in the minority, jealous of their rights, and rightly so, a population who have been taught, unfairly perhaps, to look upon the majority with some suspicion, because of the fear that some time or other their rights might be infringed upon because they were the minority, and, being so alive to their rights and jealous of their privileges, they are told on the day after the execution, the idea is sown broadcast among them that the word for the situation is revenge—"yes, revenge; this should be the word for to-day, for to-morrow, and forever; the word engraven with letters of blood in the heart of all French Canadians. "Now, do you pretend to tell me that this is not reprehensible? I have not followed that journal sufficiently to know on what side of politics it is, I do not know to-day, I speak simply of the fact in order to condemn it, the fact that after the hanging of a man such as Louis Riel on the 16th, the very next day should see sent broadcast over the Province of Quebec and wherever that newspaper might reach, the statement that row it was—for whom? not for the whole people of the Dominion, but for the French Canadians—to engrave the word revenge on their heart in letters of blood. Is it any wonder that the situation became difficult for the Ministers of the Crown? Is it any wonder that one hon. gentleman can find it a justification to say that those Ministers did not dare to go into their counties to justify their course, because such a cry had been sent broadcast over the Province, that the watchword was revenge and that the people were to engrave that word in letters of blood on their hearts for to-day, to-morrow, and forever hereafter. I find no fault with the French Canadians for possessing the generous and noble traits of character that always lean towards feelings of sympathy and of mercy or regret for anyone in a critical situation such as that of Louis Riel. But I regret these laudable feelings were taken advantage of and sent in a wrong direction by throwing broadcast over this country such inflammatory statements. I desire to do this paper justice, and it is true that it added:

"Not a revenge of communards or radicals, but a revenge of people proud and jealous of their rights and privileges."

This paper was sending this out to the people whom I have described here, a people proud of their rights and jealous of their privileges and they were told that their privileges had been violated and their rights trampled upon; they were told that the watchword was revenge. I ask this House and I ask the country: Revenge upon whom? Can we interpret that in any other way than revenge upon those who constitute that portion of the people who are not French Canadians? Can it be interpreted in any other way? I think not, and I know that is the interpretation I put upon it when I read it; and I say that such language is reprehensible in the highest degree; but not less reprehensible was the language of the Mail newspaper which has been cited here, when it said that, if it should be necessary, arms would be taken up again by the English-speaking people of this Dominion, and the people of the Province of Quebec might have to be reconquered, and the rights of treaty, which they had at one time, might not be conceded to them again. That language is quite as reprehensible as the language used in L'Electeur and other papers in the Province of Quebec. I condemn both. If anything conduces to raise ill-feeling, to cause jealousy, to make people suspicious of one another, it is these newspaper articles that we find coming out so frequently, at one time one part of the population pitching into the other part of the population, at one time the English pitching into the French; and at another the French pitching into the English; at one time the Protestants pitching into the Roman Catholics, and at another time the Roman Catholics pitching into the Protestants. I say there is nothing more injurious in a country like this, and it is the duty of every patriot to put it down. For that reason I condemn the press on both sides for using such language as this which has been referred to. It is not only this newspaper, and I simply quote this in answer to my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), who spoke so well and so eloquently the other night. Though, as I have said, he did not convince me by his arguments, he charmed me by the eloquence of his speech and the purity of his diction. I quote this to show that the position which he takes here is not the same position that he took before his friends in the Province of Quebec. The position taken here is a legitimate position. It is one with which I cannot find any fault. The speech delivered by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault), and by my hon. friend who proposed this motion (Mr. Landry, Montmagny) and by everyone from the Province of Quebec who has spoken on that side of the House, is a position with which I find no fault, a position which, as they have explained it, they have a perfect right to take, and a position which is not calculated to do any harm, because they have argued it fairly and honestly, according to the convictions of their heart, and because Louis Riel was a co-citizen with us they had a perfect right to say he was innocent if they believed it. They had a right to say that clemency should have been exercised towards him; they had a perfect right to say that for political offences he should not have been hanged, if they believed that also. They had a right to say, if they believed it, that notwithstanding every thing he did in the North-West, it was right for the Executive to exercise clemency towards him. I find no fault with that. I am finding fault with their conclusions, but not with their arguments, not with the arguments they used, because they were legitimate and proper. But I say they are not the same as those they used in Quebec at the time this agitation was begun, and they are not the same as they used in their journals in Toronto against the people of Quebec, which arguments were quite as wrong and quite as unfair as those which were used in Quebec. Now, Sir, in order to prove that the position taken by my hon. friend is not the same position that was taken in Quebec, I will read a little further from the Presse newspaper of the 16th November, 1885, which I will translate into English:

"From this day we can consider all the old political division of party as having ceased to exist in Lower Canada. When nationality is outraged and menaced, there can no longer be Liberals or Conservatives, there can be but the party of patriots. Henceforth, there can be but two parties, the national party and the hanging party."

Well, now, Sir, I ask you again, what is a fair interpretation to be put upon that? It does not speak of the Dominion at large at all, but it speaks only of the Province of Quebec. Can we draw any other conclusion from that but the conclusion that the writer called for the formation of a French party? I can draw no other conclusion myself. The appeal is not made to all the people of the Dominion, to those who could have seen the situation in the same light that we did, who may have condemned the hanging of Riel for the reasons I have mentioned, appealing to all the people of the Dominion, among whom there could, henceforth, be but two parties on that question, all other political distinctions to be obliterated and dividing into two parties upon this question, and inviting everybody to take one side or the other. Then I could have understood an appeal to everybody. But instead of that, the appeal is simply made to the French people in Quebec. I cannot understand that it means anything else than the meaning which the Electeur has given to it. Then we go on further, and we find in the same paper, the Presse of the 16th November, a report of some speeches that were delivered on that day at a meeting held in the city of Montreal by some students, I think. There was a procession of the students, followed by a large meeting where speeches were delivered; and what were the speeches in the presence of this population already excited by the reports it had received the day before, headed by the word "Revenge?" These people met in this way, and what do we find that they were told on that occasion? They were told this:

"This execution is a stain on the English flag, and an insult to our nationality. If Riel has been executed it is essentially because he was a Catholic, and because he had French blood in his veins."

Now, Sir, where can you find anything more inflammatory than a speech of that kind, delivered on an occasion of that kind, and delivered, as we are told by the same paper, by a man who was standing upon a cannon and holding the national flag in his hand, exciting them all the more? And this in a large city like Montreal, where we all know how easy it is to raise a dangerous excitement amongst the people. The orator spoke holding a flag in his hand, and thus making the occasion as tragical as possible, standing on a cannon, and proclaiming to the people that Riel was hanged because he was a Roman Catholic and because he had French blood in his veins. Now, Sir, I say that is extremely reprehensible. Going on, we find that the young man who spoke is reported to have said:

"Riel will be placed side by side with the political martyrs of 1837-38, and his name will remain engraved in our hearts, and when the hour of vengeance shall strike we will bite those who have bitten us."

Using the word "vengeance" on this occasion—is not that very reprehensible again? Was I not right in New Brunswick, when these reports reached us, in refusing to join the movement? And I may say, that these reports reached us more quickly than other reports usually do, whether there was an object in it, I do not know. My constituents received some of these papers that contained some of the inflammatory addresses, that contained these inflammatory headings. They received these papers in which I myself was attacked, because I had ventured to say a word on the other side. But why did these papers come so numerous to my constituents as they did on that occasion? It was for the purpose of spreading the excitement that had started so unjustly, in my opinion, from the Province of Quebec into New Brunswick. I say again, Sir, what other meaning could my constituents, what other meaning could the people of New Brunswick, put upon these reports but that the French Canadian people for whom we have very strong sympathy indeed, a people whom we love, a people to whom we look for sympathy and support in every question in which we may be concerned, and a people whom we have to thank for their sympathy and support in the past when we were in distressing circumstances, politically speaking—I say, what other conclusion could we come to than the one which I have indicated? "Sir, these inflammatory appeals have been sown broadcast among my constituents, and are they not right in saying: Why, the French people of Lower Canada are up in arms against all the rest of the Dominion? The leaders of the agitation were endeavoring to excite the people down in New Brunswick, and was it right for me to join in an agitation of that kind? I say, no, Sir, and I thought it my duty to say to those men who had written to me, that I believed my duty lay in another direction, and, moreover, I was not convinced that it was wrong to hang Riel, and not being convinced even of that, it was so much the more wrong in me to join in an agitation of that kind. We go a little further, and we find on the 17th of November, something else of the same kind. I find the following despatch from the city of Quebec:—

"The Electeur has appeared in mourning, and its articles are very violent. All its columns are devoted to Riel, and it invites French Canadians not to forget the martyr who was assassinated for the French cause."

Mr. LANDRY (Kent).

Is not that the same thing again? Is there not another strong and reprehensible appeal to those same people again? "Let not the French Canadians forget the martyr who has been assassinated for the French cause!" I would like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask other people of this country, whether that is a proper sentiment to be given utterance to: "Do not forget the martyr Louis Riel?" Louis Riel a martyr! Who can look at his antecedents and call him a martyr? Who can look at what he had done in the North-West, and call him a martyr? You may do that if you will, but by all that is good, do not say that he died in the French cause. Louis Riel dying for the French cause; Louis Riel dying for the Catholic cause if you will! Why, Sir, what French cause did he represent? I should like to know. Was he doing so at the time when he would not heed the advice of the priests or of the missionaries in the North-West, who were trying to effect the greatest good possible among the half-breeds whom Riel pretended to guide and to lead on to what he told them was for their benefit and material advantage? Was it because he despised their counsels and turned against them, and even disavowed the religion in which he had been brought up? Was it for this that he is said to have died for representing the French cause? If ever a mistaken appellation was given to a man, it is to say that he is a martyr and that he died representing the French cause. I should be very loath to admit that he represented anything of what I have conceived to be the French cause and French characteristics in Canada, the French Canadians as well as the French Acadians. I should be very loath to say that he represented any such cause. Represented it! How? Did he represent it when he was forcing those people to take up arms against the Government? Was he representing it when, as they themselves have sworn, and as I believe they assert now, generally, if not every one of those who joined with him in that rebellion, that they did so because they were afraid of their lives and because he forced them to do so? The only cause, so far as he interpreted it, which he was representing was his own cause. He was not even representing the cause of the Metis. How many joined him in the rebellion? They were not so very numerous. We have not, perhaps, the authentic figures, but I think the calculation is that there were between 250 and 300 French half-breeds in that rebellion. How many did they represent? We are told by the late census that there are something between 4,700 and 4,800 half-breeds in the North-West, and at a fair calculation there would be between 1,000 and 1,200 capable of bearing arms. How many do we find followed Riel? Something like 250 or 300 as I have said followed him. Out of all those whose testimony we have been able to get, almost every one has declared that he was obliged to follow Riel because he was afraid of his life. Was he representing their cause when he was forcing them into a rebellion which they did not desire? It cannot be said that Riel represented their cause. By his own declarations he was not representing the cause of the French Canadians or the French half-breeds, or of any of the French. Why, then, should it be said he died because he represented the French cause? I cannot subscribe to any such sentiment. I might go on and read a great many more such extracts, but I will not make myself tedious to the House by doing so. What I have cited is quite sufficient to show that I was right in condemning the agitation which I then thought unjustifiable, and I declared that it was one which the people who took part in it would regret before many days or months had passed. I repeat that statement now, and I believe that since that time they have had occasion to regret it. Some may have not had occasion to do so if they have been able to make political capital out of it, but they will be the minority. I believe the larger number, even if they felt they could make political capital out of the agitation and strengthen their position in their counties so far as regards receiving votes, when they saw the injury done to the people and to the progress and prosperity of the Dominion, would, themselves, regret their action. We find to-day that they do regret it for the reasons I have given, because they are very careful indeed to take a different position before the House to that which they took before the people. The hon. gentleman who preceded me said, a few moments ago, that last winter when an accusation was brought against the Government that there were grievances in the North-West that had not been remedied, that the reason he and other members had voted for the Government was because they did not want to give any encouragement to the half-breeds. They did not want by a vote of Parliament to endorse in any way the course they had pursued. If that be true, and no doubt the hon. gentleman spoke his sentiments, how is it that he desires to condemn the Government for the hanging of Riel? Would not such an action by this House give encouragement to those who took part in the rebellion if it were held to be right and proper to condone the offence of every man who had committed that crime? If there is anything in the argument of the hon. member that when they voted for the Government against their convictions, last Session, so far as the hon. gentleman was concerned at all events, because they did not want to give any encouragement to the half-breeds by the vote of this House, the case is five times as strong when the House is asked to say whether it was right to hang Riel under all the circumstances, and to declare that those who took part in the rebellion did not merit the punishment that the law provided. The laws of our country say that a crime of that character merits punishment by death. If Parliament declares or the Government declares such an act did not merit such punishment, would it not be to a very great extent justifying the acts of Louis Riel and those who followed him? But I look upon the matter from a different standpoint. I believe the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) when he told us a little time ago that the Government had given him, as a representative of the people, to understand that they would well consider petitions and representations presented for the exercise of clemency towards the unfortunate rebel. He found fault with the Government, as I understand him, because they had not given proper consideration or attention to the petitions. I cannot arrive at the same conclusion. I cannot help believing that the Government took into consideration all the facts, representations and circumstances of the case, and well considered the petitions asking for clemency for the unfortunate rebel. I cannot help believing that they fully considered the whole case, that they felt there was a strong sympathy in the Province of Quebec for the unfortunate man, and what they did was to arrive at their conclusion, not considering whether they were giving way to a certain portion of the population clamoring one way or to another portion clamoring on the other side, but simply on the ground as to what was best for the material prosperity of this country. If I thought the Government had been actuated by any other motive; if I thought they had calmly sat down and said to themselves: You give me an account of how the feeling is in your Province, and I will do the same in regard to my Province, and we will take accounts and find out whether we shall lose more votes by adopting one course than by adopting another; if they simply counted the number of votes they would get by their action—if I believed they were actuated by such motives, I would be the first on the floor of Parliament and in the country to condemn such action. I believe the life of a man is too dear to him and his family to be made so light of as to calculate the number of votes which will be gained or lost if that life is taken or spared.

I believe the Government felt fully the responsibilities of their position. They knew it was a question among the people who were excited on both sides, and yet they made up their minds and were not swayed by the agitation one way or the other. While they may have read the petitions, and no doubt they would look into them to see the reasons advanced for asking clemency for the condemned man, yet I believe they did not look to see whether the petitions were stronger on one side or the other, and whether the representations were stronger on one side or the other, but they simply looked to see which course would best promote the material prosperity of the country. And I for one am not prepared to say that they arrived at a wrong conclusion. Perhaps if I had been in their position, I might have arrived at a different conclusion—I do not know—I am not prepared to say whether I would or not. But when I consider that they weighed the responsibilities of their position, that they weighed all the facts and circumstances that attended the rebellion, and having done so, that they arrived at the conclusion that it was in the interests of good government, in the interests of peace, in the interests of good example, in the interests of order, to hang the man who had been guilty of such a crime as the one of which Louis Riel had been guilty; and that those considerations were the only motives which moved them to the course they took—I say, that I for one am not prepared to say that they arrived at a wrong conclusion. They knew that it would arouse excitement, but still they took the responsibility of acting, and I believe that they acted fully convinced that they were acting in the interests of the country, and in the interests more particularly, perhaps, of the people of the North-West Territories themselves. But, Sir, I ask hon. members now if they can look at this question fairly, as I believe the representatives of the people in this House can—I ask you now, was it in the interests of the peace, the prosperity, the good government, and good example to this country that Louis Riel should have gone unhanged. I do not believe that it would have been; not because, Sir, I think it was necessary that the death of Thomas Scott should have been avenged; not because I think it was necessary that Riel should be punished for the acts of 1869-70. Not at all; I am not prepared to say that those acts of his in 1869-70 were justified; but I believe that the time had gone by and that this was not the time when he should be punished for those acts. If he was guilty then he should have been punished at that time, and not allowed to go as long as he had gone without punishment. Still, I can readily understand that the Government, in passing judgment upon all the facts which were before them, would do the same as any judge of the Supreme Court or any court before whom a criminal comes for sentence. It is right to look at the antecedents of the criminal, and to see what has been his record before, and if his record has been a good one, if it has been one that can be approved of by his neighbors and by those who knew him best, and this is the only crime that has been committed by him—the only time he has been found guilty of an offence—then I say it is right for the judge in passing sentence to take these facts into consideration. So when this man came before the Government, it was right for them to look to the acts of 1869-70 in Manitoba for the purpose of coming to a conclusion, not as to whether he should be punished for them, but to see the effect of the example their judgment would be to the public. Punishment is not entirely to the individual on which we inflict the punishment, but it is also for the example that is given to others; and it was right for them to examine into these acts, and come to a conclusion with all those circumstances before them as to whether it was better to pardon him or to allow the law to take its course. And when they decided to let him suffer the penalty of his crime, I believe it was giving a good and proper example to the people of the North-West Territories. Sir, had the opposite course been taken, what effect would it have had—what would have been the evidence of it to the people of the North West? The evidence to those people would have been this: It is true you have risen in rebellion; it is true that you have been the cause of bloodshed and murder; it is true you have been the cause of a great deal of ruin and desolation; but, notwithstanding all that, the man who was at the head of that insurrection we think was so far justified in his conduct that we have spared his life; and then, if at another time grievances, even slight grievances, had come up, would they not say: We will get them redressed in the same way again; no great harm has come even to the leader of those who were engaged in the other insurrection, and they would be much more ready to rush into rebellion again than they will be after the punishment that has been inflicted on this man. That is my opinion with respect to that matter. But, Sir, was it not the duty of the Government to look at that aspect of the case rather than to look at the political effect of their decision? Was it not the duty of the Government to see whether the example to the people of this Dominion would be a good or salutary example, or whether it would be a bad example, according to the course they would take upon the matter which was then before them? Could the Government arrive at any other conclusion upon the evidence which was before them than the one that they arrived at? We are told that the prisoner should have received the clemency of the Crown. On what ground? First, because he was a lunatic. Another ground was because the jury had recommended him to mercy; another because it was a political offence for which he should not have been hanged. As to whether Riel was insane or not, that is a matter of opinion. Some may think one way and some another, but for myself I fail to be convinced by reading, by reading these letters, by reading that last memorial of his—or his last will, if you choose to call it so—I fail to be convinced that Louis Riel was an insane man. On the contrary, I believe that he was in possession of his faculties. He may have been excited at times; he may have been a man of great ambition, and a man who, in matters in which he thought he had a right to act, would be impatient and excited if contradicted, and still I believe that he knew right from wrong, that he appreciated the responsibility of his position. I have not a doubt of it. If we look at the evidence for a moment, if we go over it all minutely, it appears to me that no man who looks into that evidence can come to any other conclusion than that Louis Riel was perfectly sane and sound from the time he set foot on Canadian soil, and up to the time that he was taken prisoner, and suffered on the scaffold the penalty of his crime. We find him coming from Montana on to Canadian soil, and for what purpose? He tells us he was coming for the purpose of getting the wrongs redressed that existed in the North-West Territories, the wrongs under which suffered the half-breeds of those Territories. Now, Sir, what were those wrongs? Have not—I ask you and I ask the country—have not those wrongs been greatly exaggerated? Is there a man on the floor of this House who will seriously and calmly lay his finger on something tangible as a wrong, and say this was a wrong perpetrated there for which these people had the right to rise up in rebellion? I have not heard it yet. I listened with great pleasure, as I always do, to the leader of the Opposition last Session, when he made a speech of five or six hours, when he read the letters, the petitions, the representations made to the Government by the half-breeds, and those professing to represent them. I have also listened to those who have endeavored to show to this country that there were some grievances existing, and some wrongs perpetrated in the North-West Territory, but I must say that I have failed to be able to lay my finger on one single act, Sir, that could be fairly considered such a wrong as would justify any person in even taking revenge by rebellion. I will go further and say that I can find nothing that looks like a violation of any civil rights. Have they ever been interfered with in the exercise of their religion? Have they ever been interfered with in their manner of worshipping, in their liberty of speech, in their manner of working and gaining a livelihood? Have they ever been interfered with in the possession of the soil? Have they ever been interfered with in the possession of whatever personal property they may have had? Have they been interfered with in anything which we consider the rights of the subject under the British constitution? I fail to see it. It is true, Sir, for a long number of years they represented to the Government that they had grievances; it is true they sent all those letters and petitions and delegations here, but after all what were those grievances? I believe it would have been better on the part of the Government if they could have done it, to have endeavored to have removed whatever may have been the cause of these grievances more speedily than they did. It would have been better, perhaps, because sometimes imaginary grievances are quite as sore to those who feel them as are real grievances. But that there existed any positive, tangible, actual grievances, arising out of the violation of or infringement on actual vested rights, in the North-West Territories at that time, I myself have failed to see any evidence. I have failed to see any petitions presented to this House showing any actual wrong done to them or any violation of their rights by anybody. It is true they have asked for many things, but has it been pointed out that any one of them was interfered with in the possession of that which he considered himself entitled to? There is nothing to show that they were interfered with in the possession, occupation or cultivation of the lands. I have not seen a tittle of evidence in this House or anywhere else to show that one single half-breed was turned out of his house and home, or interfered with in any way in the exercise of any of those rights that belong to us in the other parts of the Dominion. If any of them have been, I should like to see the evidences of it, and I would be the first man to admit it, but I have seen none. What was their condition? They number some 4,000 out of a population of 40,000 in the North-West Territories. If it was right for them to rise in rebellion—and only a few of them, relatively speaking, did rise—it appears to me that those who say they were justified, or even those who say they were excusable in rising, ought to be able to produce some positive evidence to show that some of their rights had been violated; and no such evidence has been given. Had they a right to the soil by virtue of the fact that they were as the first residents? I do not believe, legally speaking, that they had the right to the soil. It may be that they had a right to be considered in preference to strangers or immigrants who came in there afterwards; I will not even say it was a vested right, but I say an equitable right, that they should be so considered. And were they considered? I say they were. After this Government came into power, in 1878, the first thing they did was to pass an Act in 1879, which recognised the rights of the half-breeds. After the passing of that Act, we are told that the Government who passed it, forgot it from 1879 until 1885. It appears to me they did not forget it. But they proceeded to do what was necessary in order to ascertain what equitable rights these people had. The first thing they had to ascertain was, where those people lived, to what lands they claimed title, by occupancy or otherwise. It was necessary that a uniform and proper system of survey should be had in order the better to give titles and make certain and systematic the boundaries and descriptions of these lands. The Government surveyed, from 1879 to 1884, 56,618,500 acres, as against 1,797,120 acres surveyed by the preceding Government from 1874 to 1879. Were this Government not turning their attention at that time to the interests of those people? And after all they were not a large people. It is not because they were a small people that they should be neglected, or that their rights should be violated; but they were a small people. And when we are told that the Government neglected them so long, we must remember the difficulties that existed. We remember the distance from here to there; we must remember the sparseness of the population and the extent of the territory; and we must also remember that in the Maritime Provinces, at any rate, there was a clamor at that time—and it exists to this day—that too much was being done for that new acquisition of ours, the Western Territories; that too much money was being spent upon it, and too much attention was being given to it, to the detriment of the older Provinces. No doubt, the Government had to consider this to some extent. They had to consider that they should not proceed too fast—that they could not devote all their money and attention to the North-West, but must give a little attention to the administration of affairs in other parts of the Dominion. And when I speak of the Government of this country, it is not to give undue praise to the present Administration; because I am not such an admirer of this Administration as to assert that they always do right, or that I have always been pleased with them; I believe they do wrong occasionally, but I believe they exercise the best judgment they have. But I say this: The people of this country believe that they were spending quite enough money in the North-West Territories, that they were devoting time, money and legislation to those Territories—I was going to say more extensively than to the other Provinces. And is it true, or is it not true? Since I have had the honor of a seat in this House—and it has only been a short time—I have heard more discussions relating to matters appertaining to Manitoba and the North-West Territories than to any other portion of this Dominion. Notwithstanding the small population there, and that the revenues received from them are not very considerable, relatively speaking, the attention of the Government has been almost exclusively given to that part of the country, and yet we are told that the Government neglected them and forgot them for five or six long years. I am not one of those who share in the opinion that too much attention was given to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I believe that was a great and important work, which it was necessary to complete as soon as possible; but I say that the Government thought too much, not of the Metis, but of that portion of the Dominion, to the exclusion of the other portions of the Dominion. They gave to the Metis the Act to which I have referred; and after that Act was passed, surveyors were sent out for the purpose of surveying those Territories, in order to ascertain where those half-breeds were located, and what they laid claim to. And was there a better plan by which these things could be ascertained, than to send properly authorised surveyors to survey the country? They were told that when the surveying was going on, the people's rights were infringed on, because the surveyors surveyed over the lands they were occupying. I have not seen that statement verified, and I am not prepared to say, from the evidence adduced, whether it is or is not correct; but taking for granted that it is correct, I am not here to say whether the surveyors were wrong in doing that. The Government, acting for the future of that great country, because we expect it to have a great future, and, in taking its first steps to survey that country and give titles to lands within it, were bound to see that their surveys were accurate, systematic and uniform, and if, in carrying out that policy, it became necessary to survey over lands already occupied, I do not see any great wrong in it, if it was not done for the purpose of taking them from the occupants and selling them to private corporations or individuals, but I say the Government should have surveyed them as well as all the other lands, in order to have a regular system of survey all over the North-West Territories. The half-breeds could have no cause of complaint at this, if they had the assurance that the survey did not mean their dispossession. As to this dispossession, I have failed to see any evidence in this House, or anywhere else, pointing out that the half-breeds had any reason to believe that these surveys were made for the purpose of dispossessing them. It may be that these people imagined a great many things, and that they did imagine, when they saw the surveyors going on their lands, that their lands were to be taken from them and sold to somebody else; but can a Government be held responsible for all the fanciful wrongs and grievances a people may conceive they suffer under? The Government gave them the assurance that they would not be disturbed in their possessions, but that these surveys were necessary in order to have a regular system of survey all over the North-West Territories. The Act secured lands and scrip to the half-breeds; the Government, it is true, had not to any great extent given to them what the law secured to them. I believe the Government afterwards yielded, and they yielded wrongly too, in giving them the scrip they gave the half-breeds since the rebellion broke out. I am not prepared to condemn the Government for this; and I am not prepared positively to say that, perhaps, under the pressure of circumstances and of the rebellion, they did not exercise their best judgment in giving the scrip; but I believe it was not in the interests of half-breeds that the Government should have so yielded. When we are told in this House that the fact that Government settled some 2,000 claims since the rebellion, is an indication of their mal-administration of affairs in the North-West up to that time, I give it as my opinion that the Government may have yielded judiciously to the pressure of circumstances, but certainly in so doing they did not act in the interests of the half-breeds. I may be wrong, but I would prefer hearing the Government declare that they had not yielded to the demands, that they had not given the scrip, but that they had not withdrawn from the assurance they gave that the half-breeds should not be disturbed in their possession of the lands; that the Government did not intend to take away the rights the half-breeds might have, not to the scrip but to the value of the scrip, but would not consent to the demand to give the scrip, because it was not in the interests of the half-breeds that they should do so. I am told that when the Government gave this scrip to the value of $240 to each individual, it was sold by the large majority of those who received it, and perhaps mortgaged by some before they received it, for $90, and in some cases for $70. Fancy scrip to the value of $240 being given to these people and then being sold by them for $90 each. To-day I believe the majority of the people who got the scrip for $240 and sold it for $90 are as badly, if not worse off, than when the rebellion broke out, yet we are told that this is great evidence that these people had great grievances and are satisfied with the remedying of those grievances in that way. I am not satisfied with it. I do not believe it was the proper thing to remedy the grievances in that way. After all, that is not a very heavy grievance, indeed; if that was the extent of them? Indeed if these people had been entitled to this scrip before and were refused it—it is not a very heavy grievance, if you measure it by the value, $90 to each individual. But while they had not yet received the scrip it was secured to them, and no Act of Parliament, Order in Council, no action taken by any one was such as to make them believe they were to be deprived of it? It is time enough for a people to rise in rebellion when they see that some action has been taken to deprive them of what they believe they have a right to get. But, in this case, no action was taken, either by Order in Council, or by Acts of Parliament, or by Government agents, to deprive the people of that which they thought they were entitled to. Therefore it is, when we look at the difficulties of the situation, while we admit these people supposed they were laboring under certain grievances, I believe the Government acted with considerable promptitude after all, and gave considerable attention to these people. Though it might have been better to have settled them sooner, now that we see the consequence, not of those grievances directly, but of a designing man who knew the people and wished to avail himself of their ignorance for his own aggrandisement—I do not wish to do the man any injustice, but I believe from the time that he left the United States for the purpose of going on Canadian territory in 1884, until the time when he was taken prisoner, his sole object was to make use of whatever grievances these people thought they labored under, by exaggerating them for his own purposes, and to-day we have the evidence of this. When Riel went to the North-West Territories, what was the first thing he did? He went to the parish priest and asked him for his blessing, and he did this in an ostentatious manner, so as to impose on the people who are religious and thus get their confidence. He said he left Montana with the blessing of the priest and wanted the blessing of the priest here in order that he might be better able to work for the half-breeds. We were told, Sir, by the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Desjardins), that previous to Riel's coming some of the people had said that the priests were sold to the Government, and the hon. gentleman gave this as an evidence to show that there was dissatisfaction among the people against the Catholic clergy before the arrival of Riel. I cannot interpret that evidence in that way. I interpret it to mean that when Riel came there, he came, knowing his people, in a hypocritical manner to show himself to be that which he thought the people would approve of; but when he found his plans were not seconded by the clergy, and that some people had commenced to agitate against the clergy, he thought he would succeed better by denouncing them and did not hesitate to induce the people not to listen to the voice of the clergy but to denounce them. From that time until he was made a prisoner, every step he took was with an object of getting greater control over these people for his own purposes. Does not the evidence show this clearly? What does he ask when in a position to ask something for his people? At the time when he was negotiating or authorising others to negotiate with the Government for him, was any attempt made to negotiate for the settlement of the half-breed claims? Does he tell them: "Yes, I will give up this agitation, I will go back to the United States of America and abandon this territory, and will not show myself here again if the Government will yield that which has been demanded for so long, and will redress the grievances of the half-breeds?" Is that the language which he holds out? It is not; but the language he holds is that, if they will pay him $100,000 or, as he afterwards comes down, $35,000, then he will forget the half-breeds; he will forget the race he comes there to represent; he will forget everything but that which was uppermost in his mind, that for which, in my opinion, he came there in the first place, to obtain for himself power and position, and to use these people for that purpose. He is willing to go back again if he is paid so much money, and, when he is told afterwards that the Government have telegraphed and made arrangements by which the claims of the half-breeds will be looked into by a commission and settled, what do we find him doing? That does not suit his purpose. He says: "It is too late, we want a war of extermination; we want to teach them a lesson; we want to take up arms." Perhaps those exact words are not in evidence, but that is the substance of what he said. He does not want the claims of the half-breeds, for which he professed to have so much sympathy before, settled now, because he is afraid that if they are settled his own claims will not be recognised, his own claims for money or position will not be recognised. Is that evidence of insanity? One of the witnesses who went there to swear his belief that Riel was insane, gave as one of the symptoms of insanity, that he had no control over his actions in certain particulars. Had he not full control of his actions, as the witness was asked? But it was desired to leave the impression that he could not control his actions when he got into matters of politics or religion, and yet he was quite willing to control his actions and to return to the United States for $35,000; willing to give up everything in the North-West which was so dear to him, as he said and as he wished the people to believe. I think that showed that he had perfect control over his actions, when he could have controlled them to such an extent as to return to the United States if he had obtained what he desired to get. With all these reasons, I can only come to the conclusion that Louis Riel came into that country for the purpose of gain to himself, and, to some extent, for the purpose of revenge, and that he tried to make use of these people for the purpose of succeeding better in his aims, and not in order to get their grievances remedied. What do we find? Was he actually at the head of these people who claimed that they had grievances? Would it not be natural, if he came there to redress the grievances of the half-breeds, and they weighed so deeply upon his people, if they were such great wrongs, is it not reasonable to suppose that the people who carried this weight would join him in the rebellion? Were they the people who joined him? I am told, and I believe it will be found to be correct, that, when the commission went out to examine into those grievances and sat there, there were only sixteen of those who followed Mr. Riel in his rebellion, who made claims before that commission, and yet we are told that some 2,000—though I believe the correct figures are 1,600 and odd, and not 1,700—claims have been settled. If he intended to get these grievances remedied, it is natural that those people should have followed him, and no other; and yet of those who followed him, and took up arms, only sixteen appeared before the commission, when they had abundant time and opportunity to present their grievances. Then I say he was not at the head of those who had grievances, those who had the grievances did not join him at all, the large majority, some 1,600 of them, did not join him at all, and had no sympathy with him, so far as they showed it during the rebellion. Further, out of those 16, 15 under oath or solemn declaration, stated to the commission that they had been forced by coercion on the part of Riel to join in the rebellion—not because they felt the weight of those great grievances, not that they thought that the Government had wronged them so grievously that they had risen in rebellion, but because they were afraid of the man who was leading them on. What do we find in the case of those who attempted to contradict him? Where were the priests who attempted to give him counsel? Did he not disown them? Did he not try to raise their congregations against them? There were one or two—I do not remember their names—whom he took prisoners and brought before his council for trial, because they did not want to join in the rebellion. We are told that he came there to use constitutional means, to agitate in a constitutional way, to get petitions prepared and sent to the Government, to act as a constitutional man would do to get the grievances remedied, and that it was the half-breeds, feeling so strongly on the matter, who led him, and not he who led them on. That is the inference to be drawn from some of the speeches which have been made, and yet we find, when the time for action comes, that he is the man who leads them on at the point almost of the bayonet, to take up their guns and fight against Canadian authority, and those who will not yield to his authority he denounces and ridicules and takes prisoners, and he holds them and brings them before his council, and even gets them condemned to suffer death at his hands because they will not follow him. If there is any truth in the statement that he came here for the purpose simply of leading these people on in a constitutional manner, would he have resorted to these things? I say: No. It is simply an evidence of what he came there for first. He told it himself. He said the war, or rather the rebellion, or the bloodshed which took place in 1869-70 was nothing to what he intended to do in 1885; he would show where the blood was going to flow. And yet we are told he went there to conduct an agitation in a constitutional way. I cannot come to any other conclusion than that he came there with no purpose of conducting these people to get their grievances redressed in a legitimate and constitutional manner; and it is their own proof we have for it. What has been done since that? Only a few days ago, I was reading in the press that a large meeting took place near the very spot where the rebellion broke out. This was a large meeting of French half-breeds, and it was most harmonious and complimentary to the Government in its expressions, and the name of Riel was never mentioned. If they had any sympathy with him, is it not to be supposed that they would have given him credit, and would have said, "After all, he has obtained for us what we have got?" But no; we find that at that large meeting they passed resolutions praising the Government for what they had done for them, and had not a word of sympathy for Riel. My opinion is that these people, instead of being favorably impressed with him were unfavorably impressed with him, and would have much preferred that he had not come into their midst. My opinion is that he forced them to this rebellion, to take up arms in the way that has been described against their better judgment and against their wishes. But, Sir, he did more than to incite these people against the constituted authority and against the Crown. Some people think that they would have been justifiable if there had been sufficient grievances to be remedied. But it is to be remembered that the first action of Louis Riel was not to take up arms against the Government of the North-West Territory. He first goes to some of the largest stores in that region and commits open robbery; he goes into their stores and forces the owners through fear and intimidation to give up—what? Give up anything for which they were suffering? Give up provisions to feed them because they were starving, or to give up clothing to cover them because they were suffering from the cold? Nothing of that kind. It might be excusable for destitute men who are unable to get enough to eat or enough to wear, and who have been suffering for a long time—I say it might be excusable for them, when they found a store full of those things they so much needed, forcibly to appropriate them for their own use. But these people required no such things. Louis Riel at their head, they go to a store of a Mr. Kerr, if I remember his name rightly, and what is it they demand from him? Remember Mr. Kerr is not an agent of the Government who has charge of provisions which he is authorised by the Government to deal out to the Indians or half-breeds, but he is a private individual living in their midst, engaged in legitimate trade like every other merchant, and living amicably amongst them. They go to him and they do not ask him for anything of this kind, but Riel says to him: "Give me all the guns that you have here, all the bullets you have here, all the ammunition you have here." What for? We want these things to prepare ourselves to fight the authorities of the Dominion, to resist the constituted authorities of the Dominion Government, or anybody else that may interfere with us. I say is that not high-handed robbery on the part of Louis Riel? Where was the justification? There was none. At that time, I believe, nothing had been done by the Dominion Government that showed that it meditated force against these people, nothing had been done at that time to give any evidence that the Dominion Government was going to send armed troops against them. But they themselves, headed by this man, though not of their own will and accord, were the first to commit acts of violence and depredation. And this is the individual for whom we are asked to show sympathy? Oh, it is a pretty thing to talk of sympathy! I admired the other night, as much as any man in the House, the eloquent language of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). I admired the language he used when he appealed to the members of this House for sympathy for Louis Riel and those who had joined in that rebellion, but, Sir, I thought that the sympathy was ill-placed. Certainly his language was beautiful, and if it had only been applied to a good cause, for people who were suffering, for those who had been made to suffer in spite of themselves, if it had only been applied to those poor priests murdered at the hands of those Indians incited by Louis Riel, if it had only been applied to those soldiers who went up there with their lives in their hands—to their families, to their wives and mothers, sisters and brothers—if he had only appealed for sympathy to them, in the beautiful language which he used in appealing for sympathy to a criminal, how much more effectual, it seems to me, it would have been with the people of this country. If he had only used those burning words, which we all admired so much, on behalf of those people I have mentioned, instead of Louis Riel, then, Sir, I would not only have been charmed with his discourse, but I would have been convinced that he was speaking the true sentiments of the people of this country, when they had calmly looked upon the situation as it existed. But, Sir, he forgot also some other victims when he was expounding this large amount of sympathy upon Louis Riel, and complaining that clemency had not been exercised towards him. Why did he not expend a little of his breath and of this eloquence so beautiful, over those other men who were executed as well as Louis Riel—those seven or eight Indians who were also executed in the North-West? What were they fighting for, pray? Had they not joined the rebels? Had they not been led into the fight by the advice of Louis Riel? Were they not fighting for the same cause as Louis Riel? Surely they were fighting the Dominion Government, they were killing the white people, and they murdered upon the fields there some seven or eight in one day; among whom were two priests who had gone among the half-breeds trying to do good. Yet, not a word of sympathy did the hon. gentleman bestow upon these people. He told us that one life was sacred, that one life was enough to draw from the human heart that sympathy which he called for, and also from the treasury of the country, money for the purpose of sending men to save even one life, if no more than one could be saved. Sir, the lives of these other people who were sacrificed were to me just as precious as was the life of Louis Riel. And why not? They were people of our country just the same, people for whom we should have just as much regard as for Louis Riel. And yet, not a word of sympathy did he extend to these people who were hanged on the scaffold just the same as Louis Riel. Sir, it is not to them alone that we should be asked to extend our sympathy, but to those who have sacrificed their lives for their country. And I ask the people of this country, I ask particularly those people in my own constituency, and in the Province of Quebec, where I have no doubt the people will be flooded with the eloquent speech of my hon. friend, flooded with the speeches which have been delivered here on the other side of the House, and those representations made for the purpose of forming public opinion, and though I am not able to make as eloquent an address as my friend, and appeal to the sympathies with as much force as himself, still, I would ask them to put aside for the moment that misplaced sympathy, and to look at the facts in a sober, calm and dignified manner. Let them read his speech if they will, and they cannot read it with greater pleasure than I have listened to it, and will read it over again in my leisure moments; but, Sir, when they have read it, let them ask themselves this question: On whom is bestowed all this beautiful language? On whom is bestowed all this sympathy? What were the great grievances that led this man to take up arms against Queen and country? Had anybody been imprisoned? Had anybody been murdered? Had anybody been deprived of his kith and kin? Had anybody's freedom been taken away from him? Had anybody's mode of worship been interfered with? Had anybody's mode of gaining his livelihood been interfered with? Had anybody's property been taken away from him? Had anybody been robbed in any way or dealt with contrary to the laws of our country, that these men should have taken up arms? If they ask themselves these questions, they will have to answer every one of them in the negative. Well, what was it then that required this man to be sent for from the United States after his record of 1869-70? What was it that required the use of arms to remedy? I ask them to put to themselves that question before they are led away by the eloquence of my hon. friend. Let them calmly come down to the facts of the case, and see if they can find any tangible reason, any grievances sufficient to justify those people in taking up arms against the Dominion Government. Were they fighting for their freedom, fighting for their mode of worship which had been interfered with, fighting for rights of which they had been dispossessed, feeling that death was preferable to any kind of slavery from which they were suffering? Will history say that they were fighting for a good cause, and in order to maintain their freedom and prevent themselves from being made slaves? But I say such language should not be applied to the grievances in the North-West. The half-breeds were not slaves, and were not interfered with in any way. The words of sympathy, the burning words of sympathy expressed by the member for Québec East, were misapplied to Louis Riel, who did not fight for a good cause, or for a cause requiring a leader, or for a people oppressed, because they had forwarded petitions to the proper quarter. The attention of the Government, moreover, had been turned to the position of the half-breeds, not only by words but by Act of Parliament and surveys had been made; and all these things having been done, there was no ground for sending for a leader to come to the North-West to represent a cause which did not exist. Again I ask the people of my native Province, those who are most dear to me—although as a public man all classes are dear to me—but I ask those who are dear to me on account of the ties of blood and religion and nationality, the French Acadians of New Brunswick, I will go further and say the French Acadians of the Maritime Provinces, those who have in the past honored me by calling me, most unworthy though I am of the title, their leader in politics, not to be led away by the burning eloquence of any man who appeals to them for a cause not worthy of support. I ask them to look at the facts as they exist. And if they find that the people of the North-West had grievances even then the rebellion would not be justified. But if they find they had such grievances, let them consider whether the Government brought to the alleviation of those grievances that amount of energy, attention and perseverance which they should have brought. But I do not think they will find the Government was negligent in that respect. I appeal to them because I believe their past history places them in a fair position to judge of these matters. They have suffered, they have suffered very much more I was going to say than the half-breeds of the North-West ever did. I repeat that the French Acadians in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have suffered more than the half-breeds of the North-West; and would it have been good advice to have advised them to take up arms? If they had had a Louis Riel would it have bettered their cause? I say, no; but, on the contrary, it would have inflamed opinion and made matters worse for having such a man in their midst. History tells us that when the French Acadians in the parish where I was born, some fifty, sixty or seventy years before the time to which I am referring, settled on lands in the county of Westmoreland on the banks of the Memramcook and the Petitcodiac, squatters you may call them for they had no title to that property, though they had cultivated their lands and brought up their families and had made their living out of their lands, those people after being there for a length of time, small in number and no one in the midst of them with influence in the councils of the country, and no representation in any matters connected with governing public affairs, were visited by a stranger in their midst. What was the object of his visit? It was to say to those people: I have a grant of all these lands on which you have settled; and he exhibited some old piece of parchment showing them that he had a grant of all those lands, eleven miles long extending from the mouth of the river almost to its head, including a prosperous settlement and a considerable number of people living happily, peacefully, harmoniously, docile and obedient to the laws of the country and as loyal to the Government and constitution under which they lived as any men surrounding them, although they had not the same voice in the Government of the country. But that stranger came along and said: These are my lands and I will dispossess you. What was done? He did dispossess them; he brought actions at law and dispossessed them. And those poor people were only able to retain such land as they had actually had in undisputed possession for twenty years, and all the rest they were obliged to surrender although they had been cultivating it for years and had considered it their own. I do not say it was wrong legally for this stranger to claim his rights. He possessed the land by virtue of his title; he put the people out, or they were obliged to buy from him at a stipulated price. Would it have been good advice to have told those people that their forefathers had been driven away from other lands and come and settled here, and you have grievances, and you had better take up arms against the Government. It would have been poor advice, and had I been there, knowing what I do to-day, I would have been very loath to have given it them. And I am glad no Louis Riel gave them that advice, and led them in revolt against the Government of the country. Down to the present time I venture to say that many of those people, both in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, have had as great grievances as the North-West half-breeds have endured, because they have felt, as the North-West people feel, that they were not exercising that amount of influence, receiving that amount of patronage and attention to their rights as they deserved. Would it have been wise for those people, because they are a minority, to have joined in this agitation started in the Province of Québec, and declared to those people: "You see your brethren in Québec, and that there is a war being made on the French people; join them; we know all about grievances, and knowing all these matters we will join in arms; not in arms, but in this movement for revenge." It would not have been good advice to have given them. I ask them to continue living peacefully and in order, and abiding by the laws and constitution. I believe that is the best advice to give them. I do not believe in inflammatory speeches, and if we condemn inflammatory articles and speeches, let us condemn them when they are made by the minority as well as the majority. Let me say to any with whom I have influence among the people who know me best, and indeed to any of the people of the Dominion, that my endeavor will be in the future, as I hope it has been in the past, to condemn at all times anything inflammatory, anything calculated to set one portion of the people against the other, and anything that will have the effect of making the people rise in rebellion for grievances that do not always exist. It must be only in extreme cases that rebellion must be had recourse to. I willingly join the hon. member who preceded me in stating that I hope representatives from all quarters of the Dominion will learn the lesson. When they find the press, whether representing their sentiments or opposing them, saying to the other portion of the community to come and rise in rebellion, and the answer is made: "If you rise in rebellion, you will fare worse than you did in the past"—I say, these are threats which should not be made by either one side or the other; and it is the duty of every public man, as I feel it to be my duty to condemn such language, to say that it is not right to rise in rebellion, to say that those who do rise in rebellion should not be raised to the dignity of patriots, to say that their names should not be engraved on the hearts of any people in Canada; but that it is those that went to fight for the maintenance of law and order, and to secure the peace and prosperity of their country, who should live in the hearts and memories of the people.

Mr. GUAY. (Translation). Mr. Speaker, in rising to express my opinion on the important question which is now before the House, I do not at all pretend to answer to the brilliant speeches of the distinguished orators who have preceded me, nor to that of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) who has just taken his seat; but I owe it to my country, and I owe it to my Province, to state here, before the country, what I think of this question, any why I shall vote in favor of the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry). The motion which is now before the House, and which involves a simple motion of censure against the Government for having allowed the sentence of death pronounced against Louis Riel to be carried out, does not express all the disapprobation with which the execution of the unfortunate leader of the half-breeds has been received in the country. However, I shall vote for that motion, and this House will allow me to say, with a journalist of Quebec, that Louis Riel should not have been executed, because on the 16th of November last this unfortunate man represented on the scaffold of Regina a principle of justice, a principle of civilisation which the Government has wantonly ignored. I shall not weary the attention of the House at this late hour of the night by recalling the well-founded grievances of the half-breeds nor their numerous demands, nor the provocations of the Government employees in the North-West, nor the part taken by Louis Riel in the rebellion, provoked by the refusal of the Government to give justice to his countrymen. These facts have already been discussed lengthily and in a brilliant manner by the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me. Therefore I shall limit my remarks to the event which the arbitrary action of the Government has provoked in the country, and especially in the Province of Quebec. I shall also examine the reasons given by the Government to justify their conduct, and I shall state why the Government are not justifiable in having ignored the verdict given by the jury at the trial of Louis Riel. The Province of Quebec, from which I come, has protested more than any other Province of this Dominion against the execution of Louis Riel. But this House would be laboring under a great delusion if it should believe that the drama of Regina has been the only cause of this constitutional and almost universal agitation which has taken place in the Province of Quebec during the last few months—agitation which, in high circles, has been called a sudden blaze, but which, I believe, is just as bright now as it ever was, and is certainly very far from going out. The provoking tone of a certain press which is friendly to the Government, the unprovoked insults thrown at the people of the Province of Quebec, have been a cause and a very important second cause of this agitation. A third cause, which I will only mention by the way, is the disapprobation of the general policy of the Government in the Province of Quebec. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I may say that the execution has only been the extra drop of water which has caused the overflow of popular indignation. As regards the first cause of the agitation, I must say that if the execution of Louis Riel has produced a deep feeling of disapprobation in the Province to which I belong, it is because the press of the country, the Ministerial press especially, had brought about the prevalence of the certainty that Riel would not be executed. And do you know why, Mr. Speaker? It was because, according to the Ministerial papers, if the half-breeds of the North-West, having Louis Riel as a leader, had thought fit to take up arms to defend their cause, that was owing to the fact that the Government had ignored their just claims, and that behind them were people who were more to blame than themselves, and who had instigated the rebellion. And I am glad to find that the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) has admitted these important facts, and has acknowledged that if the half-breeds of the North-West have rebelled it was because the Government had been exceedingly unfair in their dealings with them, in fact that the unfairness of the Government towards the half-breeds had been still worse than that which they had shown towards the Indians. Secondly, it is because the rebellion had been brought about by the white settlers who had been the leading agitators. A third reason is that the Farmers' Union of Manitoba had made the rebellion. Fourthly, it is because for several causes, under the control of the Government, the recognition and settlement of the claims of the half-breeds was considerably delayed. Fifthly, because the white settlers, and especially a man of high authority, Lawrence Clarke, had convinced them that after fifteen years of useless supplications and vain appeals on their part, the Government was about to give to their petitions an answer in the shape of five hundred men and some leaden bullets. Well, this avowal on the part of the hon. member for Provencher is an undeniable proof that the whole responsibility of the insurrection ought not to fall exclusively upon Louis Riel. I will say more: I will say that that same press asserted that if Louis Riel received capital punishment every French Canadian must come to the conclusion that the Government was sacrificing him to the fury and hatred of the Orange lodges of Ontario, who desired to avenge the murder of their brother, Thomas Scott. This, Mr. Speaker, is the manner in which the Ministerial press prepared the agitation. Therefore we need not be surprised at the large proportions reached by this agitation, and, to prove my assertions, I may be allowed to quote a few extracts from Le Canadien. I chose that paper in preference to several others published in the city of Quebec, because I believe it has the largest circulation in my district and has the most to do with forming public opinion. Here is what Le Canadien said on the 16th of November last:

"This date will hereafter be a day of mourning and of shame for us. Gold-blooded cruelty has been shown. A respite has been granted to Riel. The people was made to go through all the anxieties of clemency, and at the moment when these lines shall be read Riel will die. From his body will go forth 'the vacillating soul which for a long time was bruising itself and maintained itself on the wings of insanity' like a bird caught in a trap.

"Our history, which had been spotless up to this time, may veil its face, may put a black mark on the page which shall contain the account of the judicial murder of the 16th of November.

"This judicial murder is furthermore a national insult. We shall speak about it in proper time.

"We find among the papers of a college mate of the Regina prisoner a rhapsody in blank verse, which the late lamented Oscar Dunn attributed to Louis Riel:

"I am thine, he said; thine oh my country is this heart, this soul of mine. What should I love if I did not love thee.

"The interior of my breast is a church; thy image is the altar. Let the altar subsist, and if necessary I shall overthrow the church.

"And from my crumbling breast the following prayer will burst forth—this last prayer—

"A blessing on my country, O God, Thy blessing on her.

"I do not tell it to anybody; I do not cry it out on the prairie, nor on the roads, that thou art what I love best in this vast universe.

"Secretly, I follow thy footsteps, ever faithful, and not like the shadow which accompanies the hunter only in fair weather,

"But as the darkness increases when night comes on, my sorrow augments when the shades of night come down upon thee, Oh my country!

"And I go where all thy devotees, raising their cups, ask, the Fates to shed a new ray of brightness on thy holy life; and I drink to the last drop the wine of the brimful glass, a very bitter wine, for alas, my tears fall into it."

"These are certainly very fine sentiments. They betoken a great spirit of patriotism; but if these words are from Riel, was not the spark of insanity then inflaming that brain which the hand of God has been pleased to touch later on, by applying to it these words of the hymn, 'humilavit superbos?'"

"The interior of my breast, he said, is a church; thy image, Oh my country, is the altar! Let the altar subsist, and, if necessary, I shall overthrow the church for its sake."

"Is there not in these few words the mysterious and terrible germ which, later on, drove Riel into religious monomania, into the folly of greatness, before handing him to the executioner?"

"We shall mourn the useless murder of Louis Riel. His cause was not ours. Le Canadien has said so to all who have read it; but the cause of humanity is universal; neither Riel the madman, nor Riel the politician, have a right to enter proudly into history by ascending the steps of the gallows."

"More fortunate than others who have seen themselves dying by piecemeal, in the prison cells or in the asylums destined to monomaniacs, Riel the insane died joyfully, finding glory and renown in his insanity. His soul imprisoned in his proud, brutal, unconscious body, has found her wings. It must be now purified in the hands of its maker. Disencumbered from its mean swaddling clothes which choked it and trammelled its impulses, it has entered forever into the realm of light and of history."

A few days afterwards the same paper, this time making a violent charge against the Orangemen of Upper Canada, insinuated that if Louis Riel was dead, it was only, as I stated a moment ago, in order to satisfy the fury of the Orange lodges. It said:

"A political crime has just been consummated.

"Riel has died on the scaffold.

"This judicial murder involves besides a crying insult to our race and to our religion, for in this wanton murder it is the Orange opinion which has predominated.

"Let us therefore tell our people who are those who think that the French Canadians must disappear and that we must strike them wherever they show themselves. Let us tell them what those fanatics are, what they have done, what they intend to do."

I might quote a great number of extracts from newspapers, but I do not wish to take advantage of the patience of the House, and I will be very short. A second cause of the constitutional agitation which took place in the country has been the dissatisfaction of the Province of Quebec, as regards the general policy of the present Government. Let it be well known and let this House not forget it, for the Province of Quebec has not forgotten that after pledging her to do her full share towards paying the hundreds of millions which the construction of the Pacific Railway must have cost, by holding out to her, as a compensation, the glittering hope of the North-West trade, the Government has allowed the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to deviate 250 miles away from the centre of the population and left her isolated with the obligation of paying her share. And the people, especially in the Province of Quebec, had not forgotten, that for years and years the Government had turned a deaf ear to the representations of the unfortunate half-breeds of the North-West, who had sent them prayers upon prayers, petitions upon petitions, deputations upon deputations, in order to obtain justice and to put an end to the ruffianly acts of which they were the victims on the part of the Government employees. The people of the Province of Quebec had not forgotten that, instead of granting their just claims, the Government had continued to allow them to be wronged and despoiled until at last there was an outbreak, which brought with it the sad event which terminated by the drama of Regina. Consequently, when the unexpected execution of Louis Riel was known, the popular indignation was at its height and a loud cry of reprobation was heard from one end of the country to the other. Is it a wonder, Mr. Speaker, that the Province of Quebec should have protested more than any other Province in the Dominion against the injustice which had been committed in the execution of Louis Riel? Is it surprising that the French Canadians should have been aroused when they saw a certain number of their countrymen of different origin, rejoicing on Riel's tomb and throwing insults in their face? For, Mr. Speaker, if Riel went beyond the limits of a constitutional agitation, in his defence of the rights of the half-breeds, if he was found guilty by the jury, it was not as a vulgar assassin, but it was for having taken up arms against the Dominion Government who refused to give justice to his countrymen. Louis Riel never pretended to rebel against the authority of the Empire, he never ceased for a moment to hoist the British flag, for, like all British subjects, he knew that the British flag, in a well-governed country, has within its folds principles of justice and fair play, and it would be an insult to the flag which protects us to pretend that any fair play was shown to the half-breeds of the North-West. Louis Riel has been guilty of violence, I admit it, Mr. Speaker; he even went beyond the limits of constitutionality; but it is clear that he never intended to infringe upon the rights of the Crown as represented by the Government of Canada. Therefore, he was guilty of a political offence, and for a long time past, in civilised countries, political offences have not been punished by death. The half-breeds only asked one thing: They asked that justice should be given to them, and justice was not given to them. Will it be pretended, that in the countries over which floats the British flag, justice is not always the same whether people inhabit the shores of the Thames, the shores of the St. Lawrence or the banks of the Saskatchewan? Under such circumstances the great majority of the citizens of the country had reason to believe that the death sentence pronounced against Louis Riel would be commuted at the last moment. The recommendation of the jury to the clemency of the court, the solemn promises that the execution would not take place, promises which were made up to the last moment to the hon. members from Quebec, the many respites granted, the doubt on the mental state of the prisoner; I should say at once the insanity and irresponsibility of the prisoner, the supplications of a whole people, and above all the guilty neglect of the Government and their officers in the administration of the affairs of the North-West, which has provoked the rebellion of the unfortunate half-breeds of the North-West, had caused the prevalence of the certainty that the Government of the country would never dare to defy public opinion by allowing the execution of the sentence of death pronounced against Louis Riel. And allow me to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people would be most happy to-day were we not compelled to upbraid the Government for having committed this political crime, this judicial murder. Sincerely believing that the Government should not have ignored the jury's verdict recommending Louis Riel to the mercy of the court, were not the citizens of the Province of Quebec justified in protesting and in saying in their meetings that the Government had done wrong in ignoring that verdict, and in not commuting the sentence of death pronounced against Louis Riel? Consequently, what they did was a constitutional act. The agitation which has followed was not made, let it be well known, for a purely political object; its object was to protest against the injustice of the Government. There was nothing in these protestations to frighten our fellow-citizens whose origin and creed differ from ours. We did not ask to obtain new rights; thank God, we have no more conquests to make as regards political liberties; what the Province of Quebec demanded was not even the particular rights of the French Canadian people, but the rights of civilisation and humanity. No doubt, Mr. Speaker, it is hardly possible, under these circumstances, to forget the question of race and religion, but it has never had precedence on the question of political rights. In all civilised countries mighty voices have been heard demanding the commutation of the sentence of death pronounced against Louis Riel. In all civilised countries protestations have been heard against the Government who had allowed that sentence to be carried out, and was it reasonable to suppose that we French Canadians would not be allowed to protest? Mr. Speaker, it would have been difficult to have silenced our voice at a time when unprovoked insults were thrown in our face—perhaps to soothe our sorrow as they thought—by a certain press which supports the present Administration, and who upbraided us for our admiration of the bravery of the half breeds, and the coolness and manliness of their unfortunate leader on the gallows of Regina. It will be readily admitted, however, that there is a great difference between the admiration for a people struggling for their rights and the act of encouraging them in their revolt against the constituted authorities. Now, in order to restore peace in the North-West Territories, and especially to maintain it, was it necessary for the Government to take Riel's blood? This House will admit that the Government might have easily dispensed with this useless act of cruelty, and that they are mistaken if they think that by so doing they have overawed or terrified the Indians and half-breeds. On that subject we have the opinion of Mgr. Taché himself, who is an authority on the subject, and who states that the reverse will probably take place if we are to judge by the effect produced upon them by the display of our formidable armaments. Here is what Archbishop Taché says in his work on the situation in the North-West, page 15:

"I have read within a few days certain remarks which seemed very strange to me; they were—must I say it? jokes on the hanging of the Indians at Battleford. The author of that nonsense went so far as to threaten to hang all the Indians of the North-West in order to give them an efficacious lesson. That the canon should be the last argument of kings, is a sufficient matter for regret, but what is to be said of those who pretend that the hangman's rope should be the first argument of christian civilisation towards our Indians on the occasion of the first serious difficulty we have with them?"

"Before concluding these remarks, I feel bound to state what is, with regard to the Indians, the impression made on them by the events which occurred in the North-West. I do not know what they think of the executions which have just taken place, but I know very well what they think of the movements of our troops. The people of Canada would be in error if they thought that the Indians of the North-West are terrified and have a very exalted idea of our armaments; it is the contrary which is true. This result may surprise some, but, surprising as it is, it has its dangers and it is proper that it should be known in order that mistakes may be avoided."

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am justified in saying that the Government would have obtained a much more satisfactory result by using clemency and by commuting the sentence of death pronounced against Louis Riel. Therefore, I will say with Archbishop Taché: The Government have allowed the execution to take place; let them bear the whole responsibility of it, and it is an indignity to shift it to other shoulders. But this House has a right to judge the reasons given by the Government to justify their conduct. I will admit, Mr. Speaker, that I was anxious, very anxious to know what were the high reasons of state which the Government would give for not accepting the verdict of the jury of Regina recommending Riel to the mercy of the court. The hon. Minister of Public Works has given one, which, in my opinion, is far from being acceptable, but let us hear what the hon. Secretary of State, speaking on behalf of the Government, has to say, and let this House take notice of the one and sole reason which he has given to justify the Government. Here is what he says in a speech delivered to his constituents:

"Last winter, Louis Riel was not taking his first steps in his career of high treason. His rebellion of 1869, the useless murder of Scott, whose execution he ordered when it was impossible for that poor unfortunate man to do him any harm."

And elsewhere:

"To pretend seriously that a man, once guilty of high treason and murder, once pardoned and then taken carrying arms against his country might expect to escape with his life, would be to show a degree of assurance which Riel himself never had, because when he left Montana he himself declared that his head might be the price of the step he was taking."

"This doctrine of mercy in favor of political offenders could not, even if it was recognised, be applied to the man who in cold blood let loose on his countrymen the savage hordes of the Indian tribes."

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the great reason which has induced the Government to refuse, in 1885, a commutation of the sentence of death pronounced against Louis Riel, was, that Riel was a relapser, that Riel was unworthy of sympathy, because he was the murderer of that poor Scott, that he was a wretch, and that for these reasons he deserved capital punishment. And yet, in the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, in the month of December, 1874, the hon. Secretary of State moved a resolution stating that it was impossible to assimilate the action of Louis Riel in 1870 to the felonious acts which are ordinarily punished by law. What will the Ministerial press now say about the hon. Secretary of State and his colleagues in the Government after this avowal that Louis Riel was guilty of murder in 1870? Will it devote him and his colleagues to the hatred of the French Canadians, or will it disown its writings of fifteen years against the hon. leader of the Opposition? No, Mr. Speaker, the reason alleged by the hon. Secretary of State cannot be admitted, because, whatever may have been the faults of Louis Riel in 1870, the law could not certainly reach him in 1885, for offences which must necessarily have been obliterated by five years of banishment. I will say even more, Mr. Speaker, if the Government, in 1885, were of opinion that Louis Riel was still amenable for the murder of Thomas Scott, why did they not have him arrested in the month of June, 1884, the moment he set his foot on Canadian territory? What an amount of trouble, of disappointment would have been averted from the country? What a number of precious lives would have been spared? The blood of our brave soldiers would not have stained the plains of the North-West. Well, assuming that all the reasons invoked by the Government and their friends to justify them in allowing the sentence pronounced against Louis Riel were adequate, I believe the doubt on the mental state of the prisoner was sufficient to settle the question. There is one opinion admitted by the medical profession, and it is that the moment a poor unfortunate suffers from any mental disease whatever, he cannot be considered as responsible for acts committed even outside of his mania. And what is the conclusion to be inferred from the depositions of the different medical experts who have been heard at Regina during the trial? I will not quote the long depositions of Drs. Roy, Clarke, Jukes and Wallace, others have done so before me. However, the House will allow me to say that Dr. Wallace, although he is one of the medical experts who stated under oath before the court at Regina during the trial, that they thought Riel was sound in mind and responsible for his acts, Dr. Wallace, I say, admits that he has based his judgment on a conversation he had with Riel, which conversation only lasted half an hour. Besides he is forced to admit that Riel might have been insane and irresponsible without his being able to discover in him any symptoms of madness. He said furthermore, that he had happened to treat poor unfortunates deprived of their reason who had been under his care for weeks, in the lunatic asylum at Hamilton, without his succeeding in discovering any symptoms of madness. He also admitted that Louis Riel was suffering from megalomania. What says Dr. Jukes, Surgeon in the North-West Mounted Police? He says that he never tried to discover whether Riel was sound in mind or not. He conversed with him when he made him his ordinary visits, but he never tried to find in his conversation any trace of madness. He never specially examined whether he was insane or not, but he admits that there are cases of madness which can only be discovered by touching accidentally the subjects on which the patient raves; the subjects on which Louis Riel was wont to rave were religion and his providential mission to the North-West Territory, and he admits that he has never had any conversation with him on any of these subjects. What says Dr. Clarke, Superintendent of the lunatic asylum of Toronto? I have no need to read his evidence, it has already been quoted before the House. We know the opinion of that learned specialist. He does not hesitate to state that Louis Riel was certainly suffering from megalomania, and his opinion is shared by Dr. Roy, of the Beauport Asylum, under whose care the prisoner was for eighteen months, and who positively swears that Riel was suffering from megalomania and was certainly irresponsible for his acts. Well, Mr. Speaker, what is the conclusion to be drawn from the depositions of those different medical experts? It is this: That if Louis Riel was not certainly suffering from megalomania or theomania there were at least undeniable doubts that he suffered from these diseases, and then the benefit of the doubt should have been given to him. But, in my opinion, the doubt completely disappears when it is proved that Louis Riel has been confined during nineteen months in the Longue Pointe Asylum and in that of Beauport. The report of the medical commission itself does not reach any other conclusion unless it is that he really suffered from megalomania or theomania. But a very extraordinary fact, which will probably be one of the greatest discoveries of our days, is that the medical men, very distinguished men, no doubt, who formed part of the commission, admit that Louis Riel had not the full enjoyment of his mental faculties when he spoke about religious and political questions, and still they declare him responsible for an act which is essentially political. Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, the medical faculty is not bound to uphold that conclusion and I am glad of it. I might multiply the quotations from authors to prove the irresponsibility of Riel; other speakers have done so before me and I will simply quote the opinion of Archbishop Taché himself on this unfortunate man in his work intitled: "La situation au Nord Ouest." Here is what he says:

"For my part twenty years of observation have given me convictions which are diametrically opposed to those which are invoked. I had too many reasons to study in their minutest details the dispositions and actions of my unfortunate protégé not to be in a position to know what he was and what may have led him in the lamentable ways which he has followed. For long years I have been convinced beyond all doubts that apart from his brilliant qualities of the mind and heart he was suffering from megalomania or theomania which alone can explain all that he has done up to the last moment. My convictions are sincere, but it cannot be inferred from them that all who do not share them are lacking in sincerity. The natural consequences of my convictions on this sad subject have been put aside and the hopes I had entertained until the last moment were blighted. Notwithstanding this disappointment, I will not allow myself to insult those who have caused it. I do not despair of the future of my country to the extent of believing that our public men are capable of allowing themselves to be influenced solely by hatred and by the cold calculations which it inspires." Probably his Lordship was mistaken.

"I am not aware of what took place in the Council of those who rule us, but I cannot believe that they have not consulted their duty. At all events they have assumed the responsibility, and I do not wish to give rise to difficulties nor to develop obstacles to which it would be difficult to assign a favorable issue."

This is what Archbishop Taché himself thought of his protégé Louis Riel. He had no doubt that Louis Riel was suffering from megalomania and theomania. Now, Mr. Speaker, by uniting the concurrence of circumstances which militated in favor of clemency on the part of the Government, by bearing in mind, the fact, that Louis Riel was suffering from a mania which at two different times had necessitated his confinement in lunatic asylums, and by examining on the other hand, the more or less good reasons which have induced the Government to lay aside all principles of justice and humanity, I can arrive at no other conclusion but that the Government should have acceded to the verdict of the jury recommending Riel to mercy. And as they did not do it, I can only conclude that long before the trial the Government had decided that Louis Riel should expiate on the scaffold the crime of having revealed to his country the infamies of the administration of the affairs of the North-West. By not sending Louis Riel to the gallows, the Government would, undoubtedly, have admitted the extenuating circumstances of the rebellion which they provoked; and in order to cover the greatness of their crime, the Ministers decided to allow the sentence of death pronounced against Louis Riel to be carried out; but the people who will judge the Government on the day of retribution, must not forget the immense responsibility which bears down on the present Administration, and I hope they will not fail to say, that they withdraw their confidence from a Government who has, in defiance of all principles of justice and humanity, and for mere party considerations, allowed a poor unfortunate, deprived of reason and responsibility, to be executed. For these reasons I will vote in favor of the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny.

Mr. MACKINTOSH moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

* FRIDAY, 19th March, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

LANSDOWNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, copies of despatches and other papers with reference to the transfer of Cape Race Lightship and Steam Fog-Whistle from the Imperial Government to the Government of the Dominion of Canada.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 18th March, 1886.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 58) to incorporate the St. Lawrence and Atlantic Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Colby.)

Bill (No. 59) to incorporate the First Synod in the Dominion of Canada of the Reformed Episcopal Church.—(Mr. Beaty.)

Bill (No 60) to incorporate the Colonial Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Macmillan, Middlesex.)

DALHOUSIE BRANCH—INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. DAVIES. I moved in the Public Accounts Committee that the vouchers in connection with the expenditure on the Dalhousie Branch of the Intercolonial Railway, part of which was contained in the Public Accounts of 1884, be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts when in the House. Certain grave charges have been made in connection with the construction and maintenance of the Dalhousie Branch and the Inch Arran Hotel. It is desirable these charges should be investigated in the Public Accounts Committee, where such officials of the railway as may be required, will be examined. I move:

That the items of expenditure of 1884 on the Dalhousie Branch of the Intercolonial Railway, contained on page 259, Part II, of the Public Accounts of that year, be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. POPE. There is no objection to that.

Motion agreed to.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Landry (Montmagny): "That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution;" and the motion of Sir Hector Langevin: "That this question be now put."

Mr. MACKINTOSH. Mr. Speaker: I have not come to a conclusion, regarding the motion now before the House without very mature consideration, and without looking at every point pro and con regarding a question which is not only fraught with vital importance to the future of Canada, but exercises a present influence upon society in the various Provinces of the Dominion. Representing, a constituency of mixed nationalities, mixed creeds and mixed opinions, I have always felt that it was my duty, before giving a vote, to know why I was giving that vote, and upon what information such action was based. Living side by side with a large number of French Canadians, some of whom sympathise to some extent with the unfortunate man, Louis Riel, I have learned to honor them for their fealty to what may be called a lost cause, though it may be a bad cause—for their generosity, their spirit and the admirable manner in which they are prepared at all times to take part in the discussion of political questions and to hear what is to be said on both sides. Looking back, as I have done, since I became acquainted with the population of this country, I have not failed to remember, when we have had to some extent to pay respect even to the prejudices of the French Canadians, that two hundred years ago the chivalry of France offered its best sons in order to secure a great country to the French Crown. I cannot forget also that, twenty-one years ago this very week, the Canadian Parliament was discussing the question of Confederation, and I cannot forget that a great French Canadian leader, Sir George Cartier, whose statue stands without these halls, was one who raised his voice for the purpose of inducing his people, those of his nationality, to become part of one great national family, and who worked heart and soul in solving the problem of constitutional Government throughout this Dominion. Looking upon it in that light, I cannot consent to become the apologist of Louis Riel, I cannot consent to call this Government criminal for punishing a great criminal, while that statue stands without these buildings, a silent monitor to us that we should learn the lesson of forbearance, the lesson of thorough union and harmony. I cannot make a hero of Louis Riel and by so doing tacitly consent to admit that he was a representative of the French Canadian sentiment of this country. You, Mr. Speaker, know, and I know, what brought about Confederation; what induced the people of various nationalities to become one in heart, one in soul, one in instinct, in this country. We all recognise that the Hon. George Brown, at that time leader of the Reform party, was willing to bury the hatchet and to become a statesman for the time, and to unite with the leader of the Government in laying deep and strong the foundation of a great nationality in this portion of North America. But times have changed, and a few months since we found an hon. gentleman addressing a meeting on this very question, when the public mind was excited, and telling a public audience that if he had lived on the banks of the Saskatchewan he would have shouldered his musket; and, if he had shouldered his musket, what would he have done? He would have shot down the son of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, he would have shot down the son of the hon. the leader of this Government, he would have shot down the son of the ex-Minister of Finance. We find a Privy Councillor thus discussing that matter, stirring the passions of the people and teaching them violence instead of law and order. I feel that when he comes to deliberate upon the question calmly, he will find no large majority of the French Canadians prepared to endorse the opinion that any one man or any one Province, because it cannot have its own way, shall array itself in arms against the Government of the day. I do not believe that two-thirds of the hon. gentlemen who are advocating the cause of Louis Riel, the unfortunate rebel chief, are sincere. I do not believe that in their hearts they feel one touch of sympathy for him, and I doubt very much if some of them remember that there is an unfortunate widow at home mourning his death, and children mourning the loss of their father. Have we heard of their being looked after, fostered and protected by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) and other gentlemen who have shed tears in this House over the death of Louis Riel, and who have charged this Government with convicting him unlawfully and unfairly, and with being responsible for all the troubles in the North-West? I remember the old verses that tell us Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do. Had the hon. gentlemen opposite a policy which they could propound, something on which they could appeal to the people; had this Government such a record as could be attacked before the public and in Parliament, we should not have this question here to-day; but it is the result of a leader without a policy and followers who are ready to support that leader, not for the sake of the country, not for the sake of any national spirit, not for the sake of French Canadian interests, but for the sake of gaining office. It is a matter of supreme indifference to me whether I am in public life or not, whether I remain in Parliament or not, if by so doing I am obliged to sacrifice the national welfare; but, so long as I remain in Parliament, when a great question is to be considered and discussed, I shall discuss it from a point of view above partyism, above party feeling, and shall endeavor to establish every statement that I make, and to ask hon. gentlemen opposite to question those statements if they can. Sir, I became a politician early in life, still I do not desire the House to understand that I have yet reached a very advanced age. The reason I could not sympathise with the Reform party, now called the Liberal party, was that they never were a national party, and perhaps the only body that they ever sympathised with it in this country, of late years, is the party known as the Parti National. I looked at their record, I considered their public actions before deciding to join a party; I studied the history of Reform principles and found them mere professions likely to mislead, although calculated to flatter, young men. When I came to look at their record, what did I discover? That whenever in Opposition they always had a sectional cry; whenever they wanted power, they tried to crush the Irish Catholics, or to raise some sectional issue. Sir, I find that from the time the party was founded upon anything like a solid basis, they drew their strength and their inspiration from abusing the Catholics of this country, and I only mention it now because to-day the same tactics are resorted to. I remember the elections many years ago, when I was but a boy. I remember one election in which Mr. Mowat, the present Premier of Ontario, was a candidate, and what was done to stir up the Protestants against the Irish Catholics? Why, placards were circulated throughout various constituencies with this inscription:

"SOUTH ONTARIO.—Pray. Pray that every man and woman look to Heaven for help. Vote for the Queen and Mowat, and Morrison and the Pope."

Then there was another:

"ESSEX PROTESTANTS.—Stand to your colors. The command has gone forth. The Roman Catholic Bishop has advised all true Catholics to vote for O'Connor, simply because he is a Papist. Protestants of Essex, will you submit to this? Shall we be ruled by Priests?"

Here is another:

"PROTESTANTS OF AMARANTH (West Wellington).—Be not deluded into voting for the Conservative candidate whose real name is O'Gowan, and who is a bigoted Papist of the worst class."

My hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) has already referred to the Globe's course in abusing Irish Catholics, and I shall therefore refrain from any lengthy allusions. However, Sir, when discussing questions of this kind, they call back reminiscences of 1884, reminiscences of 1885. When we were struggling to put down rebellion in the North-West, he who had a true heart beating in his bosom, should have been at the front assisting the Government; and yet what was the reality? An attempt to array Orangemen against Catholics, French Catholics and Irish Catholics arrayed against Protestants, and a pamphlet containing Mr. Blake's great speech on Orangeism distributed amongst Catholics at a time when the public mind was already excited throughout Ontario—pamphlets franked and sent to the different constituencies to stir up the people against this Government, to make a little cheap capital for the party of statesmen in this House. Mr. Speaker, this is their platform: No policy; stir up the people; find something to do for our idle hands; and the result is to-day that we are rapidly approaching the hour when race will be arrayed against race, creed against creed, and section against section, and we are going back to the time when Confederation was looked upon as the panacea for our political ills. This can only be prevented by wise counsels prevailing and patriotic citizens doing their duty. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the position of the party when in power. In 1875 their chief organ deprecated raising sectarian prejudice in any community. This is from the Toronto Globe, when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was Premier:

"It is wicked to raise sectarian prejudices in any community. It is wicked to aggravate the Catholic minority instead of appealing calmly to their reason or their judgment."

To-day we see the change that has taken place, and they are now trying to make the Catholic minority believe that the right hon. leader of the Government, who has given his life to lay the foundation of a great nationality in this country, would betray them, to make them believe that the Conservative party, who have fought their battles for thirty years, would betray them, and for political purposes execute Louis Riel. I ask hon. gentlemen to look at the position to-day; I ask if it is statesman-like, if it is patriotic, if it is truly national for us to be forced to stand here discussing a question that should be patent to the mind of every man who desires to maintain the laws of his country, who desires to maintain strict constitutional usage? Sir, there was another cry that the idle hands of the Reform party prepared.

Mr. MACKINTOSH.

From 1855 to 1857 we had in Ontario the cry of "French domination," the cry of "no popery," the cry of "representation by population," the cry of "no separate schools;" and the right hon. leader of the Government, together with many others who supported him then, were denounced in every possible way, because Conservatives would not repeal the nineteenth clause of the Common School Act and abolish Separate Schools. We had the Grand Master of the Orange Association beaten and others defeated by the cry in various counties; and then, mark you, they formed their Government, and what took place? The Hon. George Brown, who formed his Government, lasting two days, selected Mr. Thibeau as Minister of Agriculture, and that gentleman gave three reasons for joining Mr. Brown: The first was, there more Roman Catholics in the Cabinet than there had been in any other Government since the Union; second, representation by population to be granted with certain checks; and his reason was that a majority of the Cabinet had voted against representation by population—7 to 5. Then Separate Schools were to be granted. Mr. Dorion stated that:

"Until enquiries were made into the systems prevailing in such countries as Belgium, Ireland and Prussia, the system should remain as at present."

A period of comparative quietude followed; then the old tactics were introduced. We had an Irish League formed in 1871, we had demagogues sent through the country teaching the Irish that they were unjustly treated by the Conservative party, and an agreement solemnly entered into by the leader of the Reform party of that day—the virtual leader outside of the House, the Hon. George Brown—by which certain constituencies were set aside in which Irish Catholics should be elected, and in return for that they were to hand over the Catholic vote. In 1872, according to that agreement—and you will see how the Reform party usually keeps its pledges—Mr. O'Donohoe was nominated in Toronto East, Mr. MacMahon in London and Mr. McKeown in Lincoln. These gentlemen were defeated by an aggregate majority of 1,000. We had Conservatives nominated as follows: Mr. O'Connor in Essex, Mr. O'Reilly in South Renfrew, and Mr. Dormer in South Ontario, and they were elected by an aggregate majority of 1,192. Throughout Ontario to-day they have not elected one French Canadian, whereas the Conservatives have my distinguished colleague for this city, Mr. Tassé, and Mr. Labrosse in Prescott; and we have in the Provincial Legislature a number of prominent French Canadians. I ask you, Sir, if at any time we have entered into a corrupt bargain with the Irish Catholics, or people of any nationality, for the purpose of carrying an election? Sir, there has been a great wrong done to an Irish Catholic, but happily for him he has one of the ablest politicians, and one of the most brilliant lawyers in this country as his advocate—I allude to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). A terrible outrage was committed on the Mr. Senator John O'Donohoe—Mr. Senator John O'Donohoe, who the hon. gentleman would not speak for in Toronto a few years ago when he (Mr. Blake) was in the Government, this Mr. O'Donohoe who left the Reform party because it was false to its pledges. And to-day we find the hon. gentleman and his supporters flattering the French Canadians and endeavoring to introduce another firebrand in order, if possible, to stir the passions of Irish Catholics. We find too, looking back at the record, that the hon. gentleman, when he refused to speak for Senator O'Donohoe in East Toronto, gave as his reason that he was not a property owner or voter there. That is a sample of the hon. gentleman's action, and I make that statement subject to correction, but I also say it having read the correspondence that took place after. There was another O'Donoghue the hon. gentleman had something to do with. The hon. gentleman seems to possess the peculiar faculty of taking one O'Donoghue under his wing and doing all he possibly can to minister to his comfort. But Professor O'Donoghue was a Fenian, one of those who have been said to love their country not wisely but too well. I find the hon. gentleman's party prepared, upon very slender grounds, to condemn the Government for not commuting the sentence passed upon Louis Riel, but I find his whole party when in power in 1875, voting to a man against an enquiry into the case of Professor O'Donoghue when he came to this House asking for that enquiry.

Mr. BLAKE. No; he did not ask.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. He asked through an hon. member of this House; he asked through the present Minister of Inland Revenue, who moved the motion; and the whole Reform party to a man voted against it, as the hon. gentleman knows. Now Sir, after Confederation was accomplished we enjoyed great prosperity throughout the country, and the people were contented and happy. But while the Conservative Government was in power from 1867 to 1872 the same issues were raised as are raised now, the old cries of section against section, people against people. In Nova Scotia there was an agitation for better terms. When we consider the question, what do we discover? Mr. Alfred J. Jones, who was afterwards Minister of Militia in the Cabinet of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), writing to the Halifax Citizen on 29th July, 1872, stated as follows:—

"What Messrs. Blake and Mackenzie wanted was that the increase to our subsidy should be made as on the basis of our debt and Public Works, and had their advice been followed we should have had $240,000 per annum for ever instead of $180,000 as at present, $85,000 of that being only for ten years, four of which have already expired."

There we find that while the Reform party in this House and throughout Ontario were condemning the Government for readjusting the terms with Nova Scotia, the member for West Durham and his colleagues were preparing, through Mr. Jones, to offer a very much greater settlement to that Province. And that was called a principle of statesmanship. Then we had the British Columbia question, and that was made sectional. Ontario was told that the Province would be a millstone around the neck of the Dominion, and the hon. gentleman called it "a sea of mountains." The Manitoba Bill was discussed, and was condemned in strong terms by, I think, the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie). Then the Reform party got what they wanted—a great national race issue. The unfortunate Thomas Scott was murdered, and the Reform party was jubilant. Looking over the records of the day—and hon. members are now condemned for referring to it—it is proved that the hon. member for West Durham was prepared to attend public meetings in Toronto, and did attend enthusiastic meetings, at which he delivered magnificent orations denouncing the red-handed murderer. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) shakes his head. If he was not there, and never called Louis Riel a red-handed murderer, then history does him grave injustice, and he should have taken an earlier opportunity than this to have given it a decisive denial. At the first public meetings called, the excitement was intense throughout Ontario, and the Conservatives were swept from the constituencies. Why? Simply because inflammatory speeches were made and burning articles written, and, in fact, the people were irritated and excited beyond measure by the agitation of Reform newspapers and eloquent speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite. The Globe said, April 4th, 1870:

"The trial of the poor man by a few French-speaking henchmen of Riel, and his inability to understand a single word said either for or against his condemnation, gives a view of things so utterly frightful that one has to seek in the records of savagery exclusively for any parallel. We have no wish to harrow people's feelings with further reference to the miserable mangling of the poor man at the final scene, or to that hour when he lay in his coffin without being a corpse. These things will be considered by a far wider jury than even the whole of Canada; but Canada will also consider them, and if such proceedings are to pass unrebuked and unpunished 'will know the reason why.'"

Then they not only proceeded to deal with that question in such a manner as to excite the people, but they proceeded to arouse the people against Archbishop Taché and the priests of the North-West. The Globe of April 18th, 1870, said:

"No priest dares to persist in a cause which his Bishop disapproves of. No ecclesiastic can continue within the pale of the Church to defy those who have been set over him in holy things, or to take any course either socially or politically which his superior condemns. Apply all this to Bishop Taché and the occurrence at Red River, and the necessary inference is manifest."

Strange to say, within the last two days the hon. member for West Durham has told us that, while he had not documents sufficient to judge the case, he could draw his inferences. The Reform party in 1870 dealt in inferences, as the hon. gentleman does to-day. The paper continued:

"Father Ritchot has been visited with no ecclesiastical censure for his course during the last few months, as a bustling, unscrupulous, political partisan. No whisper of episcopal disapprobation has been heard. He lodges in the Bishop's house at Ottawa as an honored guest, not only not under the ban but as one upon whom his superior bestows attention and care. Does Bishop Taché approve of all this priest has done? Does he give his conduct the benefit of episcopal endorsement? If nay, why has not the Bishop taken care to make his position unambiguous by openly declaring that he has no sympathy with the doings of Father Ritchot, and that he repudiates with horror the killing of Scott. To this hour not one word has been heard from him in the way of even the gentlest condemnation of that butchery. Is Riel to this moment in any measure under the censure of the Church for his doings in the Scott case? If he came to partake of any of the sacraments of the Church, would he be repulsed till he had expressed his sorrow for that deed of blood? We have no reason to believe that he would. Very great reason to believe quite the reverse."

Finding these efforts successful and that they were stirring the hearts of the people to their very depths, a month was allowed to elapse, and the organ, preparing the way for a speech to be delivered by the member for West Durham, made this broad assertion on May 18th, 1870:

"If the children of half-breeds up at Red River, and the half-breeds themselves, are to be acknowledged and provided for simply because they are their father's sons, we should think that men and women who have suffered severely because they have been faithful to Canada and Canadian institutions, would not have to appeal in vain to the honor and justice of a Canadian Government and a Canadian people."

Again, April 1st, 1870:

"It is said that Scott was murdered, not because he had broken his parole, though, if he had, Riel is simply unofficial, but because he was an Orangeman and obnoxious to the priests."

Because Thomas Scott was an Orangeman and obnoxious to the priests, because an election was about to take place in 1871, the leaders of hon. gentlemen opposite were preparing the public mind in Ontario to crush the Conservative party, while that party were trying to rule constitutionally, as they are trying to crush them to-day for having pursued a similar course and policy in 1885. I have said that the Reform leaders spoke at different meetings, they moved resolutions in the Provincial Legislature, and it is unnecessary for me to enlarge on that question. But it must not be forgotten that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), one of the ablest men that Canada ever produced, one of the closest reasoners, one of the most popular men in his party at that time, in addressing a public meeting at Lincoln, Ont., on October 13th, 1870, expressed himself as follows, according to the Globe's report:—

"Mr. Mackenzie (the leader of the Opposition) referred at length to the scandalous mismanagement of the North-West Territories, showing that this magnificent country had all but been handed over to the miscreant Riel, and pointing out the various miserable intrigues of the Government in first supporting the rebel, ill-using Governor Macdougall, and afterwards framing the Manitoba Bill at the dictation of the infamous men who had the audacity to appear at Ottawa as delegates from Riel and his council."

How did these delegates appear? The hon. gentleman knew, and the present leader of the Opposition knows, they appeared at the solicitation of the Governor General of the country and not at the solicitation of the Government; that the Governor General promised to listen to their grievances, to listen to what public meetings had to say through them, and the consequence was that the Government was condemned for countenancing to the "infamous men who had the audacity to appear at Ottawa as delegates from Riel and his council." They assert now that the leaders of the Government and the Government themselves never did anything for Manitoba. The hon. gentleman, in the same speech, went on to say:

"The Bill was framed entirely in the interests of Riel and his friends, and the ruffians, Scott and Ritchot, were received by the Government as if they were upright men representing the people of the Territory—notwithstanding the remonstrances of the people conveyed to them. In the passage of that Bill, and in everything connected with that country, he felt that the Canadian people had suffered an amount of degradation never equalled. He looked to the people of Canada, and especially Ontario, to justify the action of the Opposition on this question."

I am indulging in these brief reminiscences to let hon. gentlemen from the Province of Quebec and those who sympathise with them upon the question as affecting Louis Riel, see that the Conservative party were doing at that time what the Reform party condemned, and now that they have discharged their duty and have condemned a great criminal, some of the gentlemen opposite were willing to join in the hue-and-cry and condemn hon. gentlemen representing the Province of Quebec in the Ministry, as traitors, cowards and hangmen, because, in accordance with the oath they had taken, they discharged their duty fearlessly as patriots and statesmen. In 1872 the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), as Premier, and the hon. member for East York as Provincial Treasurer, offered a reward of $5,000 for the arrest of Riel. In 1871 the hon. member for West Durham desired a monument for Scott; in 1872 he was willing to subscribe privately to secure Riel, and in 1874 Riel was elected; in 1875 Riel was partially amnestied; and throughout the whole record hon. gentlemen will find there never was a sincere motive actuating these hon. gentlemen, so far as Ontario was concerned, in dealing with this question of Riel and the troubles of 1870. Having raised that excitement, what was the next proceeding? To agitate against the French Bleus. What do we find? Up to 1882 and prior to the general elections, these were the sentiments of the Free Press, the Ottawa organ of the Opposition, and this was the attack it made on my colleague:

"Everybody knows that the deadliest enemies to this Province are the Quebec Bleus, of which party Mr. Tassé is a strong supporter."

And these hon. gentlemen, after asserting that they were the deadliest enemies of Ontario, are willing to embrace them now, and for what purpose? Not to support and promote the public interest, but to get the opportunity of vaulting into the Treasury Benches. The Free Press went on to say:

"They refused to support Sir John unless he set aside the boundary award, and it was at their dictation that Ontario has been robbed of 96,000 square miles of territory. In view of these facts, it would be sheer madness for an Ontario constituency to elect Mr. Tassé. All our institutions, our magnificent school system, our asylums, charitable institutions, agricultural college, provisions of every kind for the care of the unfortunate and indigent, and the reformation of the vicious, now supported out of the proceeds of our provincial timber and mining lands, must cease to exist if these resources are taken from us by Sir John Macdonald at the bidding of Mr. Tassé and the Quebec Bleus."

My hon. friend and colleague (Mr. Tassé) is not a very formidable looking gentleman.—

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. The hon. gentleman should wait. I meant to add, until he speaks:—

"Will the people of Ottawa vote for Mr. Tassé, and thereby bring Ontario down to the bankrupt condition of Quebec?"

Mr. MACKINTOSH.

Again the Globe of July 3rd, 1882, said:

"To win the support of the Bleus to-day Sir John as thoroughly their tool as he was in ante-Confederation days, when he fought off the Upper Canadian demand for representation by population at their bidding. It is simply the old game that he is playing—denying Ontario rights to conciliate the Bleus. To maintain his hold upon them he is willing not merely to ignore the interests of Ontario as formerly, but to dismember the Province, to rob us of our territory, to reduce the power of our Legislature, to belittle and scorn and humiliate us in every way, that the jealousy of the Bleus may be gratified. The other allies of Ontario as against a Government founded on extravagance, corruption, high taxes, and Bleu domination are the Maritime Provinces. The Reform cause, though temporarily under a cloud, is based on sound principles and having the moral forces of the community behind it, its triumph is not far distant."

And yet the hon. gentleman desires to vault into power supported by the Quebec Bleus who were represented as wishing to bring Ontario down to the bankrupt condition of Quebec. I now come to the uprising and the North-West troubles of 1885. In 1884 my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Trow) was in that country. I read his magnificent description of its resources; I read of the happy, contented people, of the splendid fertility of the districts he passed through, of the universal happiness that existed, and it was not until the rebellion broke out we heard that everyone had been miserable, that the homes of the people were ruined, that the land had been desolate, and all classes depressed and broken-hearted. The hon. member for East York was there in 1884 and he was one of the first to give warning, when he said to a gentleman who interviewed him in Toronto for the Globe, that he believed that the mistaken expressions of opinion in some articles in the Ontario press, as well as the utterances of certain people, had done a great deal to damage the North-West. The hon. ex-Finance Minister was there, and we heard no cry of danger from him, although he gave the people some sound advice, as he is able to do, when expressing his opinions to them in Winnipeg. But it was not until Louis Riel set his foot on the soil and strengthened himself by means of intrigues with the Indians, that this country became aware of the danger which threatened it. Did we receive assistance from hon. gentlemen opposite? From the leader of the Opposition there was assistance to some extent; from the ex-Finance Minister there was to a certain extent, assistance; but I ask if the press of this country did not blame and condemn the Government for the uprising? Had it not been for the loyal priests of that country, whose wise counsels prevailed in many cases, much greater trouble might undoubtedly have ensued. But, Sir, when hon. gentlemen opposite assert that this Government is responsible for the uprising, that Louis Riel came to Canada because the Government policy was improper, unjust or tyrannical, they assert what the country knows to be far from the truth. As this discussion relates to the execution of Louis Riel, it is not necessary for me to go into the subject of North-West grievances. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will, no doubt, give the House some information on that subject. That hon. gentleman was Minister of the Interior when he wrote to Mr. Codd, his agent: "You must not look up claims; if people do not think claims worth looking up, let the claims go." The hon. gentleman refused to assist the half-breeds; he said they had no more right to assistance than the whites. The hon. gentleman, in 1877—informed the hon. member for Marquette, Mr. Ryan, that the non-allotment of lands had caused a great deal of trouble and uneasiness in that country; and when we turned last year to some returns from the Department of the Interior—I think the matter was mentioned in a speech made by my hon. friend, the present Minister of the Interior—we found that the hon. gentleman had disposed of 43 cases of half-breed grievances by simply writing: "No.—D.M." That was the manner in which the hon. gentleman summarily disposed of cases brought before him. As some one had remarked without this House: "It was a very summary method, but I suppose it was short and sweet, like an old lady's gallop." Now, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House, I shall refer to a portion of the evidence as briefly as possible, seeing that the plea of insanity has been introduced into this discussion and that a great many learned legal minds will, no doubt, be brought to bear upon the subject; and I shall show that Louis Riel throughout was systematic in everything he said, diplomatic in everything he did, and thoroughly alive to the danger which must ensue if he broke the law of the country. To Dr. Willoughby, 18th March, 1885, Riel said:

"The half-breeds had sent a deputation to Montana to bring him to this country.

"Q. What else?—A. That in asking him to come they had told their plans, and that he had replied to them to the effect that their plans were useless.

"Q. Did he say what the plans were?—A. No, I believe not, but that he had plans, and that if they would assist him to carry out those plans he would go with them.

"Q. Did he tell you what those plans were?—A. Yes, he did.

"Q. What next did he say?—A. He said: Now I have my police—referring to the men at the door.

"Q. Those 60 or 70 men?—A. Yes. He pointed to them and he said: You see now I have my police. In one week that little Government police will be wiped out of existence."

Was that the action of insanity? He made his arrangements most systematically and thoroughly, and yet we are told he was insane. Dr. Willoughby continues:

"The rebellion of fifteen years ago will not be a patch upon this one."

Again:

"The time has now come when those plans are mature, my proclamation is at Pembina, and as soon as I strike the first blow in the North-West, that proclamation will go forth, and I will be joined by half-breeds and Indians, and the United States is at my back."

Further, he said:

"Knowing me and my past history, you may know I mean what I say. The time has now come when I am to rule this country or perish in the attempt."

To Thomas McKay (page 18, report of trial), Riel said:

"I have been waiting fifteen long years; we have been imposed upon, and it is time now, after waiting patiently, that their rights should be given, as the poor half-breeds have been imposed upon."

Riel became very excited and got up and said:

"You don't know what we are after—it is blood! blood! We want blood! It is a war of extermination. Every body that is against us is to be driven out of the country. There are two curses in the country, the Government and the Hudson Bay Company."

Would hon. gentlemen opposite desire that we should consider them insane because they assert the Government is a curse to the country? They have asserted that for years, and yet I do not suppose any hon. gentleman opposite considers his leaders insane.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman quotes it as an evidence of Riel's sanity.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. The hon. gentleman is quite right; I quote it to show that he was in active sympathy with hon. gentlemen opposite, and quite as sane as they are, measured by this standard. Now, as there are two features of this question which have been particularly referred to in the Province of Quebec, and which will be discussed throughout the country—the question of sanity, and the question of recommendation to mercy—I desire to refer to those questions. In the first place, it is said that Louis Riel was insane. I have studiously examined many works on medical jurisprudence, and made adigest of some few cases which I will lay before the House. Taylor, in his "Medical Jurisprudence," at page 653, says:

"If a person when left to himself has managed his affairs with reasonable care and propriety and has acted independently of others, there can be no stronger proof of his legal competency."

Again, page 654:

"In idiocy there is no capacity for writing—in dementia, as there is no memory, it often happens that the same word is written over and over again. No person in a state of dementia can write a connected sentence, because, before the last part of the sentence is completed, the first is entirely forgotten. In imbecility, we may meet with every variety of mental defect, but the state of the mind is pretty well shown by the expression of the thoughts in writing."

I ask hon. gentlemen to read Louis Riel's letter in reply to the deputation that waited on him in Montana, requesting him to go to the North-West; I ask them to read his letter to Dr. Fiset when in prison; I ask them to read his diary, and then to say whether they could not convict nine-tenths of the people of Canada of being subject to dementia and imbecility or mental disorder if Louis Riel was insane. Again, on page 664:

"The proved existence of mental diseases does not necessarily exempt a person from criminal responsibility. Many a man whose mind is in an insane state knows perfectly well whether he is doing wrong; and so long as he knows that, he is considered subject to the criminal law. The question of morbid delusion cannot always be allowed to screen a criminal from the consequences of his own acts; while, on the other hand, there are instances in which the plea of insanity may properly be allowed, although no delusion can be proved. Each case must be taken with all its surrounding circumstances, and legal theories of insanity are chiefly valuable, not as rigorous axioms of law, but as cautions to be observed by the jury."

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I ask the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to peruse Louis Riel's letter in accepting the invitation of the delegates to come back, for I am sure he would not say "Hear, hear," if he had read it. Riel took twenty-four hours to consider; he said it was the proudest day of his life when asked by the delegates to go back to the North-West. I ask hon. gentlemen to read another document which bears the impress of Louis Riel's sanity, that is the delegates report on returning from Montana. This report of the delegates, I am satisfied, was inspired by Riel at the time. At page 665:

"When the defence of insanity is set up in a charge of murder, in order to warrant the jury in convicting the prisoner, it must be proved affirmatively that 'he was insane in a certain legal sense at the time of perpetrating the act.' If this be left in doubt, and if the crime charged in the indictment be proved, it is their duty to convict him."

I would ask hon. gentlemen, in order to gauge that point, to read the speeches of Louis Riel delivered between July, 1884, and July, 1885, and see how he urged his people to approach the Government as obedient children should approach a kind and indulgent parent, while, at the same time, he was holding intercourse with Poundmaker and other Indians, arranging and intriguing for the very uprising that took place; and yet we are asked to say this is the conduct of an insane man. More than that, I would ask hon. gentlemen to look at the evidence of the Rev. Father André; where he states distinctly the carefully prepared plan which Riel had arranged to get out of the country when he found himself in danger, and how, grasping at the last straw, he said to Father André: "If you cannot get me $35,000, get me what you can." That also they call the conduct of a mad man. In a case, that of Regina vs. Stokes, 2 H. Car. & Ker., it was ruled:

"That it is necessary to impress upon the mind of a medical witness that it is not medical but legal insanity which has to be proved upon this occasion to the satisfaction of the jury. Monsieur Esquirol, who wrote much upon the medical jurisprudence of insanity, expresses his belief that there are well formed distinctions between the action of an insane and a sane criminal. Amongst those he enumerates: 1st. Want of accomplices in 'homicidal mania.' 2nd. 'The sane criminal has always a motive.' The act of murder is only a means for gratifying 'some other more or less criminal passion,' and is almost always accompanied with some other wrongful act.' The contrary exists in 'homicidal mania.' 3rd. The victims of a criminal are those who oppose his desire or wishes. The victim of the 'monomaniac' are amongst those who are either indifferent to, or are the most dear to, him."

I would ask hon. gentlemen to turn to the evidence, and tell the House whether in the matter of the murder of

Thomas Scott at that time, and again in 1885, when he threatened to hang Thomas McKay and Charles Z. Nolin, Riel's conduct indicated that he was insane, or that he was perfectly sane, and had systematised in every particular a method of carrying out his plans. Again, commenting on the case of the Queen vs. McNaughten, tried at the Central Criminal Court, London, England, in March, 1843, in which a plea of insanity was advanced, a writer in "The British, Foreign and Medical Review," July, 1843, page 273, thus wrote:

"Before a plea of insanity should be allowed undoubted evidence ought to be adduced that the accused was of diseased mind, and that at the time he committed the act he was not conscious of right or wrong. Every person was supposed to know what the law was, and therefore nothing could justify a wrong act, except it was clearly proved that 'the party did not know right from wrong.' If that was not satisfactorily proved, the accused was liable to punishment. If the delusions under which the person labored were only partial, the party accused was equally liable with a person of sane mind."

I shall also refer to Roscoe's Digest of the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases, 9th Edition, page 75:

"This authority, dealing with the question of the defence of insanity, states that the principle appears to be well laid down by the following writers: Alison's Principles of Criminal Law in Scotland, pages 645 and 654, set forth, 'That, to amount to a complete bar to punishment, either at the time of committing the offence, or at the trial, the insanity must have been of such a kind as to entirely deprive the prisoner of the use of reason as applied to the act, and of the knowledge that he was doing wrong in committing it. If though somewhat deranged he is yet able to distinguish right from wrong in his own case, and to know that he was doing wrong in the act which he committed, he is liable to the full punishment of his criminal acts?'"

Was Riel cognisant of the fact or was he insane, when he said to Dr. Willoughby: "The time has come when I must rule this country or perish?" Dr. Mayo, in his work on "Medical Testimony and Evidence in the Case of Lunacy," 1854, page 9, says:

"It is certainly a great evil that under the present mode of laying this question before a jury the law operates unequally: One case becomes the subject of prominent public interest, and every exertion is made to construe the most trivial eccentricities of character into proofs of insanity."

I also quote from:

"Allison's Principles of the Criminal Law of Scotland, pages 655-656, referring to the case of Regina vs. Henderson, lays it down that the plea of insanity must be received with much more diffidence in cases proceeding from a desire of gain, as theft, swindling or forgery, which generally requires some art and skill for their completion, and argue a sense of the advantage of acquiring other persons' property. On a charge of horse-stealing it was alleged that the prisoner was insane; but it appears that he had stolen the horse in the night, conducted himself prudently in the adventure, and ridden straight by an unfrequented road to a distance, sold it and taken a bill for the price. The defence was overruled."

"In consequence of the acquittal on the ground of insanity of Daniel McNaughten for shooting Mr. Drummond, in 1843, the House of Lords asked the opinion of a bench of judges upon certain questions relating to insanity:

"Justice Maule held—That there is no law that I am aware of that makes persons in the state described not responsible for their criminal acts. To render persons irresponsible for crime on account of unsoundness of mind, the unsoundness should, according to the law as it has long been understood and held, be such as to render him incapable of knowing right from wrong."

"Chief Justice Tynnaal—'Assuming that Your Lordships' enquiries are confined to those persons who labor under such partial delusions only, and are not in any other respect insane, we are of opinion that, notwithstanding the party accused did the act complained of with a view and under the influence of insane delusions redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some public benefit, he is nevertheless punishable according to the nature of the crime committed if he knew at the time of committing such crime that he was acting contrary to law, by which expression we understand Your Lordships to mean the law of the land.'"

I ask then, whether, under any of these precedents, the plea of insanity could be established in Riel's case? Riel knew that efforts would be made to construe everything he did, and his peculiarities and eccentricities, into insanity; he was erratic, but only when it answered better than cunning diplomacy. I will now trouble the House with a few statements of cases where the plea of insanity failed:

"R. vs. Arnold—Collinson on Lunacy—475—16 How., State Trials—794 to 795;

Mr. MACKINTOSH,

"The prisoner was indicted for shooting at Lord Onslow. A defence of insanity was set up. It appeared from the evidence that the prisoner was to a certain extent deranged, and had misconceived the conduct of Lord Onslow; but he had formed a regular desire to shoot him and prepared the means of effecting it."

"Judge Tracy ruled that defence of insanity must be clearly made out. That it is not every idle or frantic humor of a man, or something unaccountable in his actions, which will show him to be such a madman as to exempt him from punishment; but that where a man is totally deprived of understanding and memory and does not know what he is doing any more than an infant, brute or a wild beast, he will probably be exempted from punishment."

"R. vs. Earl Ferrers—19 Howard, State Trial, 866:

"Lord Ferrers was tried before the House of Lords for the murder of his steward. It was proved that he was occasionally insane, and fancied his steward to be in the interest of certain supposed enemies. The steward being in the parlor with him, he ordered him to get down on his knees, and shot him with a pistol, and then directed his servants to put him to bed. He afterwards sent for the surgeon and declared that he was not sorry, and it was a premeditated act, and he would have dragged the steward out of bed had he not confessed himself a villain. Many witnesses stated that they considered him insane, and it appeared that several of his relations had been confined as lunatics. It was contended for the prosecution that the complete possession of reason was not necessary in order to render a man liable for his acts. The peers unanimously found His Lordship 'Guilty.' It was sufficient if he could discriminate between good and evil."

"R. vs. Bowler, referred to in Collinson on Lunacy, page 613:

"The prisoner was indicted for shooting at and wounding. The defence was insanity, arising from epilepsy. He had been attacked by a fit; was brought home apparently lifeless. A great alteration had been produced in his conduct, and it was necessary to watch him lest he should destroy himself. Mr. Warburton, keeper of a lunatic asylum, said that in insanity caused by epilepsy the patient often imbibed violent antipathies against his dearest friends, for causes wholly imaginary, which no persuasion could remove, though rational on other topics. He had no doubt of the insanity of prisoner. A Commission of Lunacy was produced, dated 17th June, 1812, with the finding that the prisoner had been insane since the 13th March, nearly three months. Judge Le Blanc said it was for the jury to determine whether the prisoner had committed an offence with which he stood charged was capable of distinguishing between right and wrong, or under the influence of any illusion, with respect to prosecutor which rendered his mind at the moment insensible to the nature of the act which he was about to commit, since in that case he would not be legally responsible for his conduct. On the other hand, provided that they should be of opinion that when he committed the offence he was capable of distinguishing right from wrong, and not under the influence of such an illusion as disabled him from discovering he was doing a wrong act, he would be answerable to the justice of the country and guilty in the eye of the law. The jury, after considerable deliberation, found the prisoner 'guilty.'"

In King vs. Parker, in Collinson on Lunacy, page 477, bears out the same rule. A prisoner was indicted for adhering to the king's enemies. His defence was insanity. He was counted, from a child, a person of weak intellect, so that it surprised many that he had been accepted as a soldier. Considerable deliberation and reason, however, were displayed by him in entering the French service, and he stated to a comrad that it was much more agreeable to be at liberty and have plenty of money, than to remain confined in a dungeon. The Attorney-General said that before the evidence could have any weight in rebutting the charge so clearly made out, the jury must be satisfied that the time the offence was committed the prisoner did not really know right from wrong. He was convicted. Sir James Stephen, dealing with the subject of insanity, page 177, Vol. 2, "Criminal Law in England," says:

"It is to be recollected, in connection with this subject, that though madness is a disease, it is one which, to a great extent, and in many cases, is the sufferer's own fault. In reading medical works the connection between insanity and every sort of repulsive crime, that it seems more natural to ask whether, in many cases, insanity is not rather crime in itself than an excuse for the crimes which it causes. A man cannot help an accidental blow on the head; but he can avoid habitual indulgence in disgusting vices—and these are a commoner cause of madness than accidents. He cannot avoid the misfortune of being descended from insane or diseased parents; but even if he has that misfortune, he ought to be aware of it and to take proper precaution against the effects which it may be expected to produce. We do not recognize the grossest ignorance, the most wretched education, the most constant involuntarily association with criminals as an excuse for crime; though in many cases—I think, not a smaller proportion of cases than is commonly supposed—they explain the effect that crimes are committed. This should lead to strictness in admitting insanity as being in doubtful cases any excuse at all for crime, or any reason for mitigating the punishment due to it."

Without quoting further authorities, I hold we have proof of Riel's sanity on the following grounds: 1st, Riel deliberately took one day to consider the request of the delegation; 2nd, Riel was a companion of theirs and held intercourse for many months, betraying no insanity; 3rd, he realised that Jackson, his secretary, was insane and committed him to jail; 4th, he had accomplices in his crimes and systematically and skilfully directed the whole campaign; 5th, he proved his sanity by confiding to Astley that he intended throwing the responsibility of the rising on the council; 6th, he stated distinctly that he would rule or perish; 7th, he admitted to Astley that he had prompted the disaffected to urge him to remain in the country; 8th, the first document addressed by the delegates to those who sent them to invite Riel, bears the impress of Riel's inspirations; 9th, he was capable of managing his affairs when he wrote Dr. Piset, formerly a member of the House, that the Government was indebted to him in land and money; 10th, he was sane, if ever man was sane, when proposing to sell his poor dupes for money; 11th, he was sane in the opinion of his church dignitaries, otherwise he could not have received the holy sacrament before his execution; 12th, he was sane as evinced by the thoroughly systematised method of all his actions from the day he left Lewis County, Montana, until he wrote a sketch of the troubles in which he was implicated; 13th, he was, up to the hour of leaving Montana, an instructor in a Jesuit college. There is one particular point which has been discussed in this House and throughout the Province of Quebec. Between the time Louis Riel was executed and the present hour, it has been insinuated that the Government, although there was a recommendation to mercy by the jury, cruelly caused the death of Louis Riel for political purposes; that they met the demands of the Orangemen of Ontario and of the Dominion, and it has been also insinuated that on no occasion have men been hanged where the jury had recommended them to mercy. I propose to show otherwise. Before quoting the cases which are local in their character, I will quote from the "Principle of Punishment," by E. W. Cox (Recorder of Portsmouth), 1877, page 188:

"But although a recommendation to mercy of the jury should always be received with respect and gravely considered, it is not always to be accepted in practice. It is a good rule to ask for the ground of the recommendation. In fact, when infrequent, it is nothing more than a ready means of bringing about unanimity. Some of the jurymen have doubts, or more properly, are reluctant to convict, not because they question the guilt of the prisoner, but because some soft place in their hearts makes them unwilling to punish. A recommendation to mercy satisfies a kindly emotion, and others assent; but without any such desire on their part. The question by the judge, 'upon what ground, gentlemen,' perplexes them and some give 'insufficient reason,' as the usual defence. So, likewise it is when the jury recommend to mercy in ignorance of the facts as to antecedents of the convict. I have seen cases in which the prisoner, so recommended, is afterwards shown to have been convicted previously. In all such and similar cases, the judge will not give effect to the desire of the jury."

Taschereau, in "Procedure in Criminal Law," vol. 2, page 377, 1875, referring to the judgment in Regina vs. Tribilcock, sets forth:

"What the jury may say in recommending the prisoner to mercy, is not a matter upon which a case should be reserved. When the jury say 'guilty,' there is an end to the matter—that is the verdict—and the recommendation to mercy is no part of the verdict."

Stephen, volume 1, p. 558, Criminal Law in England, contrasting the English and the French system of procedure, remarks:

"The English system is based upon the assumption that judge and jury will each perform their respective parts fairly and in good faith. That the judge will tell the jury what is the law applicable to the whole case, and that the jury will be guided by the judge's directions in finding their general verdict of 'guilty' or 'not guilty.' Both history and contemporary experience show that this system has in fact worked admirably and does so still. Under the French system elaborate and even intricate precautions are devised to keep apart the facts and the law, to leave the law for the court while the facts are for the jury. But in spite of these precautions the jury continually decide in the teeth of the law, and are in practice judges, both of law and of fact. The jury deliberate and then vote upon each question proposed to them. Each jurymen has two tickets marked 'yes' and 'no' for each question. The tickets are counted and burned after each vote, and the result 'yes' or 'no' is recorded on the margin of the paper of question. The matter is decided by a bare majority and the jury are expressly forbidden to state the number of the votes."

Yet hon. gentlemen have been perambulating the country, holding up before audiences in the Province of Quebec the terrible scandal of a jury of six at Regina, with a stipendiary magistrate, and a Justice of the Peace assisting, finding a man guilty of murder, while in old France seven out of a jury of twelve can find a man criminally guilty and send him to the gallows. Stephen also says, vol. 1, page 560, "Criminal Law of England:"

"There is one other point in which the English and the French systems are strongly contrasted. This is the French system of 'circumstances atténuantes,' and the English system of 'recommendation to mercy.' The finding of 'circumstances atténuantes' by a French jury, ties the hands of the court, and compels them to pass a lighter sentence than they otherwise would be entitled to pass. It appears to me to be as great a blot upon the French system, as the way in which that system sets the judge in personal conflict with the prisoner. It gives a permanent legal effect to the first impressions of seven out of twelve—altogether irresponsible persons, upon the most delicate of all questions connected with the administration of justice, the amount of punishment which having regard to its moral enormity and also to its political and social danger ought to be awarded to the given offence. To put such a power into the hands of seven jurymen to be exercised by them irrevocably—upon the first impression, is not only to place a most important power in the most improper hands; but also to deprive the public of any opportunity of influencing the decision in which it is deeply interested. Jurymen having given their decision disappear from public notice, their very names being unknown."

Again, p. 461:

"In cases where the judge has a discretion as to the sentence he always makes it lighter when the jury recommend the prisoner to mercy. In capital cases, where he has no discretion, but invariably in practice informs the Home Secretary at once of the recommendation, and it is frequently, perhaps generally, followed by a commutation of the sentence, it seems to me infinitely preferable to the system of 'circumstances atténuantes.' Though the impression of the jury ought always to be respectfully considered, it is often founded upon mistaken grounds, and is sometimes a compromise. It is usual to ask the reason of the recommendation. I have known at least one case in which this was followed, first, by silence, and then by withdrawal of recommendation. I have also known cases in which the judge said, 'gentlemen, you would hardly have recommended this man to mercy if you had known as I do, that he has been repeatedly convicted of similar offences.'"

And yet some honorable members contend that Riel's first offence should have had no weight in determining the action of the Executive. Mr. Speaker, I have quoted distinguished authors, in order to show, by contrast, how unfairly and unjustly those opposed to this Government have acted with reference to the question of recommendation to mercy, and I have taken the trouble to go through the different criminal cases which have been tried in the Dominion since Confederation, and I find case after case where there were recommendations to mercy, where insanity was set up as a defence, and where Ministers of Justice have refused to recommend Executive clemency. In the case of Ethan Allan, who was found guilty of murder and recommended to mercy (the prisoner was convicted of killing C. Driscoll by a blow with a crowbar) the Minister of Justice recommended no interference, and he was hanged on the 4th December, 1867. John H. Munroe was found guilty of murder and recommended to mercy, and was hanged on the 25th of January, 1869. Cyrus Picard was found guilty of murdering Duncan McVannell by shooting, and was recommended to mercy. He was hanged on 23rd November, 1871. John Travis, convicted of murdering John Johnson, was recommended to mercy. Sir Geo. Cartier (for the Minister of Justice) could discover no grounds upon which the jury could base such recommendation. He was therefore hanged on the 13th of February, 1872. James Carruthers was convicted of murdering his wife and recommended to mercy. The judge (Chief Justice Hagarty) reported that "there was no doubt whatever of the fact of the murder. The defence rested on endeavoring to prove that the prisoner was insane. The jury found against that defence and convicted him of murder, and at the same time recommended him to mercy." Sir John Macdonald, the Minister of Justice, recommended no interference, and he was executed on the 23rd of May, 1873. Elizabeth Workman was convicted of the murder of her husband, and recommended to mercy. The judge reported that he had nothing to say favorable to the prisoner. She was executed on the 23rd of May, 1873. Angus McIvor (Manitoba) was convicted of murdering Geo. Atkinson, and wounding with intent B. Charette. Chief Justice Wood charged against the plea of insanity, and the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Blake) reported that he saw no reason to doubt the evidence, nor any extenuating circumstances. McIvor was hanged on the 17th December, 1875. Thomas alias Iroquois (Manitoba) was convicted of murdering Henry Corneil, with a recommendation to mercy. Judge McKeagney made no comments. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Blake) reported the crime clearly proved, and the convict was hanged on the 4th of April, 1876. William Vaughan was convicted before Mr. Justice Wetmore at the city of St. John on the 1st April, 1878, of having brutally murdered an old woman of 70. On the 6th of the same month he was sentenced to be hanged on the 22nd June next ensuing. Insanity was not pleaded as a defence; but after the sentence it was suggested by the Attorney-General (Mr. King) to the then Minister of Justice (Mr. Laflamme) that there was undoubted insanity in Vaughan's family, his paternal grandfather having been of weak intellect, and one of his aunts on the same side insane for several years, while a sister of his was subject to fits, and prisoner himself of rather feeble intellect, though apparently perfectly aware of the moral character of the crime. Mr. King added that Dr. Steeves, of the Provincial Lunatic Asylum, had examined the prisoner, and would report, if asked to do so. Mr. King was asked to send, and sent Dr. Steeves' report, which corroborated what the Attorney-General had stated as to insanity in prisoner's family, and mentioned, besides, that the prisoner had two feeble-minded brothers, both criminals. The report concluded:

"There is, therefore, without doubt a congenital neurotic defect running through this branch of the Vaughan family, and that William possesses a faulty intellect and an effective nature, utterly bad, is proved by his last senseless crime, and also by his erratic habits, his lying and his thefts.

"Wm. Vaughan's mind is in a measure imbecile. He probably began life with an imperfectly developed nervous organisation, his affinities for evil gratifications were strong, and by easy gradations he passed to his last great crime. Notwithstanding this consummation, however, Vaughan possesses a pretty clear knowledge of the nature, character and consequences of his acts, and yet there is an element operating in him, due to congenital neurotic defect, rendering oblique his affective nature, perverting his volition and tending to produce crime."

The sentence of death was carried into execution. Many years ago the rising of what were called the 'Luddites,' in the west riding of Yorkshire, England, resulted in the hanging of 17 offenders. The organization had for its object the prevention of the introduction of machinery into the manufacturing of fabrics, in which the towns of Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire were specially engaged in producing. With reference to one of the prisoners, Thomas Smith, the verdict of guilty was returned, the jury recommending him to mercy. The recommendation was disregarded and he was hanged. The chronicler of this case says: "After this somewhat severe example of the danger attending those connected with such lawless acts, the spirit of the Luddites was broken and was never again revived in Yorkshire." I think, Mr. Speaker, I have shown that when recommendations to mercy are not accompanied by a recommendation from the judge, the Minister and his executive very seldom extend Executive clemency. But we have found throughout the country this Government condemned because there was a recommendation from the jury at Regina—a sentimental recommendation, perhaps—and it was referred to the judge, but he failed to endorse it, and referred it to the Minister of Justice, who, as I imagine, laid it before the

Mr. MACKINTOSH.

Executive. And because in the case of Riel and the others that policy was adopted, we find the hon. gentlemen opposite prepared to condemn this Government and endeavoring to make party capital out of questions of high constitutional law. Sir, I have shown, as briefly as possible, the battles the Conservative party have fought for national union, a union of all classes of people; I have shown that in questions of sanity and insanity, doctors and experts differ; I have shown that in cases of recommendations to mercy, this Government and the Reform Government on many occasions, when there was a recommendation to mercy, when there was an insanity report by medical experts, failed to take cognisance of those reports, and hanged the criminals. Again, Sir, even the respites granted Louis Riel have been turned against the Government. Take a similar case in England which now suggests itself: Michael Barrett, found guilty of the memorable Fenian outrage at Clerkenwell, England, was sentenced to execution on the 12th of May, 1868. The Government instituted an enquiry into the truthfulness of the alibi set up by several witnesses from Glasgow. Proper persons were appointed to sift the matter thoroughly. The investigation as to the enquiry did not terminate; the day of execution drawing near, a respite of several days was granted. This respite ended on the 19th of May. A further respite took place, and on Sunday, the 26th of May, the chief official connected with the Newgate goal intimated to the Fenian convict that the enquiry had closed, and that the Home Secretary saw no reason to interfere with the carrying out of the sentence. Early on the morning of the 26th of May Barrett was hanged, after being twice respited. I have now to quote in contrast to the almost inhuman action of some hon. gentlemen opposite, the words of their leader, when it suited him to sneer at the Province of Quebec and thus make capital with the other Provinces. I have expressed the humble opinion that I believe that if this sectional question is continued we will have ere long in this country a conflict of race and nationality and a policy of provincialism. If we do not stand by the federal constitution, grave results will follow. In this view, I am glad to know that the leader of the Opposition once agreed with me. He has laid down broad and strong, the great principles of federal government, the principles of federal stability; and looking over one of his speeches the other night I find an earnest appeal made, particularly to the Province of Quebec, to maintain the federal principle. In a speech on the address, delivered January 18th, 1884, the hon. gentleman said, referring to Mr. Belleau, who had just been returned for Lévis:

"I would say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Belleau, the then member for Lévis) that when he has adorned this Parliament a little longer, he will find that if there is one thing this Parliament is disposed not to do, it is to meddle with Quebec, and he will find that any danger which Quebec runs is because it is not always the case that the hon. members from that Province—and I have now one of them in my eye—who are, or make themselves the special guardians of its rights in the Parliament, are equally careful of the application of the same principles which they would desire to see applied to their own Province when the question concerns some other Province. I would desire him to remember that it is by a firm and careful adherence, and a uniform and undeviating application to all the Provinces of the same hon. gentleman's principles of respect for the federal principle, of respect for the local rights, and by resisting as endangering the whole fabric any attempted infringement upon them in any one Province, that the views of my hon. friend will ultimately prevail; and that so long as we find jealousy with respect to those rights when they affect a particular Province, and indifference, or even a disposition to assist in their impairment when only other Provinces are concerned, so long it is impossible to say that what the hon. gentleman wishes, namely, the maintenance on a sound and immutable basis of the federal principle has yet been attained."

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I ask him to turn to his supporters and while he says "hear, hear," I ask if they can sincerely say so too.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I am much pleased to know that so many hon. gentlemen opposite have obeyed for once the instincts of patriotism; I am very glad to hear them at last standing by their leader who will no doubt vindicate his professions by his actions. Although the hon. gentleman and his supporters say "hear, hear," to that principle, the hon. member for Huron, (Mr. Cameron) a few nights ago was doing everything he possibly could, amidst the plaudits of his party, to stir the bitterest kind of provincialism and animosity. He was warning his people against Orangemen; he had the raw-head-and-bloody-bones in the shape of the hon. member for West Durham's Orange speech to fall back upon and thus appealed: I ask you French Canadians and Catholics in this House and country, to support our party because the Government executed Louis Riel. He did all this, yet the hon. gentleman to-day, sitting calmly in his seat, asks the party to re-echo his stentorian "hear, hear," when I repeated his patriotic speech, the speech of one who has national feeling, but who has no policy, no determination, and has not the courage of his convictions or opinions. Sir, there is more than that to be said. We heard the hon. gentleman complain that he wanted more documents in this case, and yet a few nights before the hon. gentleman from West Huron delivered a firebrand speech in this House, denouncing the Government, saying the Government was clearly proved guilty, although they had not then the documents which they now ask for; and we heard the hon. leader of the Opposition applauding and congratulating him on his unpatriotic effort. He was able to make up his mind in the case, and found the Government guilty; but to-day his party want more documents to enable them to arrive at a just and unprejudiced verdict. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for West Durham wants returns, the hon. member for East Quebec wants returns; other hon. gentlemen want returns. Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite will get returns; they will get returns at the next general election, come it soon or late; they will get returns from the constituencies, returns from the counties, the same kind of returns they have received for the last two years, in nearly every by-election that has taken place—the same kind of returns that Antigonish sent them a few weeks ago; the same kind of returns that St. John sent them a few weeks ago; the same kind of returns that intelligent electors send from every constituency when they are called upon to decide whether demagogues or statesmen shall be entrusted with the management of national affairs. And when they appeal to the country they will find that they cannot cajole and deceive the people into supporting them. Sir, so far as the people can judge of their record for the last thirty years, and particularly of their course in this House to-day, the verdict will be that, neither in power nor out of power, have they fulfilled a single pledge that they ever made when in opposition or at any other time; and I challenge any hon. gentleman to prove a single case where they made a pledge to the people in opposition upon any great political issue that they fulfilled when they reached the Treasury benches. It is said this Government has persecuted Riel, that they have hounded him to death, that they handed him over to the Orangemen, that the Government wanted to discover some method of getting rid of him, and the only way was to pack the jury and get a verdict against him. Looking over the case, as I did before I made up my mind to say anything about it, I turned to the report of Chief Justice Wood as well as to the indictment against Louis Riel on 10th February, 1875. The indictment states:

"The Queen vs. Louis Riel. February 10, 1870. Judgment of outlawry on an indictment for the murder of Thomas Scott at Fort Garry, on the 4th March, 1870, was this day pronounced in open court at Winnipeg, against Louis Riel, and a record of the proceedings to judgment of outlawry."

Chief Justice Wood pronounced the sentence of outlawry on the same date. This judgment amounts to conviction of the crime, and therefore Riel was found guilty according to the law of the land as much as though he had been tried and found guilty of the murder by a jury. I turn now to the proclamation issued by the advice of the Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), dated 23rd April, 1875. It provides:

"And we do hereby further ordain, direct, declare and proclaim: That each of them, the said Louis Riel and Ambroise Lepine are and shall be acquitted, pardoned, released and discharged. And that all proceedings in respect thereof shall cease and determine upon this expressed condition that each of them the said Louis Riel and Ambroise Lepine shall absent and keep himself absent from the Dominion of Canada for the period of five years from the date of this Royal proclamation (23rd April, 1875) and abstain from the exercise and enjoyment of his political rights therein for and during the said term; and provided that upon breach of this condition by the said Louis Riel or Ambroise Lepine this our Royal proclamation and remission shall as to the said Louis Riel or Ambroise Lepine so committing breach thereof be utterly null and void."

If Louis Riel accepted these terms he thereby entered into a virtual contract with the Crown to absent himself from the country, according to the terms of the proclamation and the action of this House, for five years. What was the fact? Turning to the evidence given by Dr. F. Roy at Regina, I find the following:—

"Q. Had you any connection with the asylum at Beauport, in 1875 and 1876?—A. Yes.

"Q. You were at that time superintendent of the asylum?—A. Yes.

"Q. In those years or about that time, did you have occasion to see the prisoner?—A. Certainly, many times.

"Q. Where did you see him?—A. In the asylum.

"Q. Can you tell the date?—A. Yes, the date was taken from the register when I left Quebec.

"Q. What date is that?—A. I took the entry from the register in the hospital in the beginning of this month.

"Q. Was he admitted with all the formalities required by law?—A. Yes.

"Q. Will you tell me what time he left the asylum?—A. He was discharged about the 21st January, after a residence in the house of about nineteen months."

Although Riel was required by Royal proclamation to remain absent from the country for five years, he returned within the specified period. Turning to Addison on "Law of Contracts," 8th edition, page 149, I find that the breach of a contract entered into when sane, dealt with:—

"Although contracts of lunatics cannot be carried into execution against them, yet, if they were in sound mind when the contract was made, and the imbecility of intellect has subsequently intervened, the rights of the parties will not be altered."

Apart from the plea of insanity which is urged by some hon. members, and the force of which I do not admit, had this Government been desirous of persecuting Riel, they could have shielded themselves, according to my view, which is that of a layman, behind the fact that Riel was subject to arrest and execution without trial under the proclamation, the terms of which he had violated. If Louis Riel did not accept the terms or agree to any contract with the Crown, he was yet more culpable as he was an outlaw under the bill of indictment found against him in 1875. In any sense I can see no legal reason why, when he violated the terms of partial pardon he was not liable to be hanged at any time. I throw out that opinion to show that had the Government been desirous of persecuting and pursuing him like bloodhounds, as has been said, they could have done so in the way I have mentioned, and thus have brought Riel to justice, when at the recent trial evidence was given that he had been a resident in Canada and had never answered to the Crown for the murder of which he had been found guilty. This of itself proves that the action of the Government was promoted by high constitutional motives and not barbarous persecution. I find that another hon. member, whom we all respect for his ability, the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), made a speech on 17th December, 1885, in Orillia. The hon. gentleman said, in answer to a question asked by the Rev. J. B. Armstrong:

"I have no objection to answer the question put by my rev. friend. I do not condemn the Government for the execution of Louis Riel. My condemnation rests on a very much broader and deeper ground—on the ground of their maladministration of the North-West during the past seven years; the other question if I recollect aright was whether the first rebellion in 1870 was justified. * * * The condemnation is asked for on the ground of their general mismanagement, not, so far as I am concerned, on account of the sentence of death being carried into execution. As to the first rebellion in 1870 I am not so well informed on that, but I believe that the universal opinion now among those who have examined the matter, is that the population of the North-West were badly treated in 1870. But to say that rebellion is justified is a very different thing. A rebellion may be excused, and parties who goad unfortunate ignorant men into rebellion may be punished. But that is a wholly different thing from justifying rebellion, and least of all can I undertake to justify rebellion in an Indian country, where, as I have said, an enormous number of our countrymen and countrywomen would have been exposed to all the horrors of savage war if that rebellion had spread."

That was the opinion of the hon. member for South Huron, in contrast with the opinion of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), who a few weeks before had said he would, had he lived on the banks of the Saskatchewan, have shouldered his musket; and possibly the result would have been that the hon. member for South Huron would have had one son less. During this debate we have heard the Montreal Post quoted. That paper has condemned the Government for hanging Louis Riel, and published bitter diatribes against the Minister of Inland Revenue and against the Conservative party. When we examine the articles and know who the writer is—that he is a gentleman who failed to obtain a commission from General Middleton, and was yet so anxious to shoot down the half-breeds that he took his gun and went as a volunteer and fought at Batoche, we can understand that there are white grievances at the bottom of half the agitation. Hon. gentlemen opposite have challenged us to show where they used this question in Ontario to stir the people. I will tell them one place. I was in East Durham in August last, and the whole battle on nomination day was fought over the question as to whether Riel should or should not be hanged. An ex-member of the House, Mr. Kerr, of Cobourg, was there stating from the platform that it was the duty of the electors of East Durham to vote for the Government candidate as a warning to them that if they did not hang Riel in September, what the result would be at the next elections. I heard these declarations made on the platform by Mr. Kerr, an ex-member of this House, and a Reformer. He stated further that he condemned Sir John Macdonald for his actions in the House towards Riel, that it brought the blush of shame to his face to find that the Conservative party had supported him, and I turned to the journals and showed that Mr. Kerr himself had given his vote in favor of the very motion for which he was denouncing the leader of the Conservative party. More than that, advertisements were scattered over the riding, offering to devote $500 to a charitable institution should Louis Riel be hanged if some prominent Conservative would undertake to contribute a like sum in the event of Louis Riel not being hanged. We had some fifteen or sixteen gentlemen in that riding, of whom eight or ten were Liberal members of this House, and our candidate had a majority of between 300 and 400, and, as one gentleman remarked, if we had had the whole of the Reform party in this House in the riding at the time, the majority would have been at least 1000. As for the hon. member for East Quebec, I cannot believe that he spoke the sincere sentiments of his heart when apologising for rebellion; I believe he spoke under excitement, or else he has changed very much since the days when he was in the Ministry, the days when he made loyal speeches to his countrymen and recorded the sentiments embodied in speeches which I have in my possession. I have here a "Lecture on Political Liberalism, delivered by Wilfred Laurier, M. P., on the 26th of June, 1877, in the Music Hall, Quebec, under the auspices of the Canadian Club." In that speech he said:

Mr. MACKINTOSH.

"You wish to organise a Catholic party, but have not taken into consideration the evil of raising it; you will bring on your country calamities, the consequences of which it is impossible to predict."

"You wish to organise all Catholics into a single party, without other support, without other basis than that of religion, but you have not reflected that by that fact alone you organise the Protestant population as a single party, and that then instead of peace and harmony which now exists amongst the different elements of our Canadian nation, you will bring on war, religious war, the most frightful of all wars."

Then he went on to refer to the peace and happiness existing among all classes in Canada. He said:

"But if we are a conquered race, we have also made a conquest—the conquest of liberty. We are a free people. We are in the minority; but we have preserved all our rights and privileges. Again, why is it that this liberty is so valuable to us? It is because it is the constitution which was won for us by our fathers; and which we to-day enjoy. We have a constitution that places the Government in the hands of the people. We have a constitution that has been granted to us for our own defence. We have not greater privileges, but we have as many rights and privileges as the other races which compose the Canadian family. Again, it must not be forgotten that the other members of the Canadian family are divided into two parties—the Liberal and the Conservative."

Then the hon. gentleman spoke out for his country and gave his countrymen advice, which it is greatly to be regretted was not before him when he made his speech at the Champ de Mars. He further said:

"No, there is a fatal law which shall have always the same effect, in morality as in physics. Where there is compression there must be a violent and ruinous explosion. I do not say this to palliate revolution. I hate revolutions; I detest every attempt to force opinion by violence."

The hon. gentleman, after making these remarks, after teaching his countrymen constitutional rights, constitutional law and principles, went before an audience, and, in an hour of excitement, ere he had the documents before him, ere he had the report of the trial, ere he had a case upon which to base a fair judgment, told them that had he been on the banks of the Saskatchewan, he would have had his musket on his shoulder in rebellion against the Government and against the Queen, whom he had faithfully promised to sustain and support with all due allegiance, when he became a Minister of the Crown. There have been charges hurled against the Conservative party in this House that they play with loaded dice. Sir, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, and I ask you and through you, the country, who and what party have played with loaded dice; who is to-day gambling with the destinies, with the national interests of the country? Who is gambling with the sacred causes of Justice?—if not hon. gentlemen opposite—I do not say all of them—but I do say that to-day we have a party arrayed against constitutional Government, and we have the Conservative party, the constitutional party in this House, who are fighting the battle fairly and honestly against men who have no object, no ambition, no method in their actions, save and except the one idea of office. I have spoken as briefly as possible, not being desirous of occupying the time of the House any longer than absolutely necessary. But when a question of this kind comes up, though I may represent a constituency or I may not, I for one shall go for country, for constitution, for law, be the origin of the man whose fate is in question, English, Irish, French or Scotch. Sir, why is it that in times of trouble, in the hour of excitement and national danger, the people look with confidence to the Conservative party—feel that they are able to guide the Ship of State over the breakers, feel that they would scorn to betray their trust, that they would scorn to jeopardise the constitution or to make capital out of the nation's tribulations? It is because Conservatives have the courage of their opinions; it is because Conservatives have confidence in the present and future of their country; it is because Conservatives properly estimate the genius of the era in which they live, and realise that a nation governed on mere experimental principles cannot hope to keep pace with the march of modern civilisation. To-day the world's progress, the world's ceaseless activity, will not allow men time to consider mere threadbare doctrines or to embrace the dead issues of bygone decades. The people desire principles, aims, measures, issues that will live over night—a constitutional structure capable of withstanding the ravages of time; one that future generations may point to with pride and say: That edifice was erected by skilled mechanics, it was the creation of master workmen; the storms and passions and prejudices of centuries have beaten about it, yet it stands to-day as grand, as massive, as impregnable, as when first completed.

Mr. BLAKE. I trust the hon. gentleman who has just sat down will not impute any desire on my part to depreciate the varied and versatile talents of which he has just given us an illustration, if I do not devote any considerable portion of the time that I shall feel called on to trespass on the House, to a discussion of his speech. It was indeed a production which, if it were to be followed and discussed, would lead us tolerably far afield from the question we are now called upon to debate; and there is nothing I more admire than the apparent fervor and freshness and zeal with which the hon. gentleman in his peroration, denounced the propriety of dealing with dead issues, after he had commenced his speech by laying before us an olla podrida not very savoury of ancient fancies and fictions, rather than facts, which he proposed should be set before us to prevent us from dealing with the very serious issue which is really before us. I have admired his skill and talent in several capacities. I have admired his skill in the making of printing contracts; I have admired his powers in the acquisition of railway subsidies, and I am to-day called on to admire his attainments in the profession of law and in the profession of medicine, as well as in that process of the collection of odds and ends of dead issues, which he began by telling us about, though he ended by denouncing their being raised. Now, Sir, the question before us belongs to that part of the administration of justice for which the Executive is responsible to Parliament. It is, in its nature, out of the ordinary scope of our enquiries. But I am glad to know that the Government has frankly recognised the proposition which I ventured a few weeks ago to suggest in public—that this particular case comes fittingly within the scope of our enquiry; that it is a proper thing, under the circumstances which have occurred and in the condition of the question, that it should be brought into Parliament, and should be here debated and decided. There is, therefore, on this occasion no necessity to engage in the consideration of what are the limitations under which we may properly intervene in Parliament with this portion of the administration of justice, because both sides of the House appear to agree that this particular case does not fall within any rule which should prevent our interference, but rather that its nature is such as imperatively demands our interference; and, for my part, I should have thought it a humiliation to the Parliament of Canada if—in the circumstances which preceded, which attended, and which have followed the event round which the interest of this debate centres—it should have been argued by any responsible statesman that it was in this Chamber, and in this Chamber only, that there should not be free discussion, and a decision after that discussion, upon the conduct of the Administration. But while this is the case, and while I for my part do not desire to complicate the particular issue which is raised with any other issue not necessary to be considered in order to its determination, I am not equally able to compliment the Administration upon the mode in which they—because I drop disguises, and say they—have brought this question forward, and have insisted that it shall be debated. I entirely agree that, while the case is one for our consideration, the discussion is of a delicate character, dealing as it does with the administration of justice. It is a case in which I believe we ought absolutely to eschew all spirit of partisanship, in which we ought, as far as possible, to eliminate from our minds all spirit even of party, and which we ought to approach as nearly as we may with the calmness, the dignity, and the impartiality of the judge. This is always a difficult task for a political body, and therefore a task rarely to be attempted—to be attempted only under that pressure of necessity which rests upon us to-day. But it is a task peculiarly difficult on the present occasion, because of those questions of race and creed which have been drawn into the discussion; because of the old offence, which has been made, rightly or wrongly, a part of the question under consideration; and because also of the question of responsibility of the Government itself in connection with the outbreak which gave rise to the trial which resulted in the sentence which the Government ordered to be executed. But, Sir, though I quite recognise the special difficulties which surround us in approaching this our task in the spirit in which it ought to be approached, I conceive that the existence of those difficulties only makes the adoption of that spirit the more imperative, and that our duty is, so far as the interests of truth and justice will allow, to say no word that may irritate, and as far as possible to take a course which may heal old sores—and new sores too. I agree in the observation which was thrown out from the opposite side of the House the other day as to the general tone and temper of the debate so far; and I hailed with extreme pleasure the courteous and kindly compliments which were paid to my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier), by two of the Ministers, on his speech of the other evening. It is to my mind the crowning proof of French domination. My hon. friend, not contented with having for this long time, in his own tongue borne away the palm of parliamentary eloquence, has invaded ours; and in that field has pronounced a speech, which, in my humble judgment, merits this compliment, because it is the truth, that it was the finest parliamentary speech ever pronounced in the Parliament of Canada since Confederation. That speech has been complained of a little because it differed from the tone, it was said, of former speeches. Some things have been said upon it to which I may ask your permission to allude at a later date. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), announcing in varied tones and at different intervals, the attitude of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House with reference to this question, a little mistook it, and, I think, without any justifiable cause for such mistake. I have the honor to occupy, however unworthily, the position of leader of the Liberal party; and with a full sense of the responsibility attaching to that position, I took, at the earliest practicable moment after my return to the country, the opportunity of declaring publicly what I conceived ought to be and was the attitude of that party towards this question. I have since enforced by argument on all occasions the view that that was our true attitude; and I repeat to-day, in the presence of this Parliament, the declaration I then made, that upon this subject there has not been, nor is there intended to be, the slightest association of party in our ranks—that of set purpose, and in the belief that we shall so best discharge our duty to our country, we have agreed that each one of us shall, after listening to the arguments and coming to such conclusion as we can, vote as he conceives, entirely irrespective of all party alliances, the interests of his country demand.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. Hon. gentlemen opposite cheer derisively. I understand them perfectly; they cannot conceive of such an act. It is incredible to them that public men should so act, and I do not feel moved at all by their cheers, knowing as I do from eighteen years' experience, their manner of conducting business. But what I say is true, for all that; and so, upon this occasion, I must speak, not at all in my capacity of leader of a party, but as an individual, for myself alone. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), the other evening, very much complained that I had not been heard from earlier, and he also, with that vivid imagination which he shares with the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), made some statements with reference to my course in debates on important questions, which I might challenge if it were perhaps worth while. I had thought that I had expressed opinions which are recorded in the Debates, and of which I believe I have no cause to be ashamed, with reference to the Streams Bill, the Boundary question, so far as that was at all a constitutional question, and the License law. But it seems that the hon. member's diligence and researches have failed to recall to his recollection or to enable him to ascertain that I ever spoke on any of these topics. However that may be, I never intended that this debate should close without my saying something upon this question; but, as I stated upon the occasion to which I refer, I desired to hear, being entirely uncommitted by any declaration or absolutely formed opinion, what was to be said on both sides of the question, and I have awaited, I think, a convenient time for the presentation of the case by those who have been assailing the Administration and by the Administration in its defence. I think we have the right to assume, at this period of the debate, that all the material positions which could be brought forward on the side of either of the contending parties have now been advanced. I waited, I confess with some anxiety, to hear the legal adviser of the Government, who, I thought, might at an earlier period than this have enlightened us upon those portions of this important question which specially appertain to his duty, to his responsibility, and to his office. But when I saw, two or three nights ago, after the close of the speech made by the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), though half a dozen Ministers or more, including the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State, were in their places, that the Government declined to rise; when I saw their supporters calling "question;" when I saw the Government insisting upon Opposition members, or upon hon. gentlemen on this side, gentlemen who did not take the view that the Government took, following one another, and thus declining the debate; when I found my hon. friend from East Quebec (Mr. Laurier) obliged to rise after the hon. member for Iberville, and when I found, 24 or 48 hours afterwards, that still the Minister of Justice did not rise, I presumed he was not going to rise at all, or, at any rate, not until after he had heard some other speakers on this side. If, therefore, I shall be obliged to state some conclusions, to advance some opinions, which, after the further light that he perhaps may be able to throw upon this subject, I should have modified, I trust that the House will not suppose, at any rate, after the taunt from the hon. member from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), and after the course pursued by the Government so far with reference to the debate, that I have indecently hurried my presentation of my humble self to this House. I have said that I believe that there are materials very important to a satisfactory discussion of this question, which materials the Government have not thought fit to bring before us. I do not intend to enlarge upon that topic, having had an opportunity of referring to it a day or two ago. I say we ought to have had an opportunity of seeing some of the papers which have been brought down and which we have not yet seen, because we know that unprinted papers are accessible to but few. For my part, I have not yet had the opportunity of seeing a single paper brought down by the Government so far, with the exception of the instructions to the Crown counsel of which I obtained a copy. There are important papers, so far as I am able to gather from statements made by the Minister when presenting from time to time those which he did bring down, which are not yet brought down, and some, as I shall show before I resume my seat, very important. I think the conduct of the Administration on the question of the production of papers is blameable in the extreme. They use these papers as a fund upon which they can draw, so far as they think them advantageous to themselves in the conduct of the discussion; but such papers as they think do not tell in their favor, they hold back. Take the Minister of Militia. The other evening he thought it would help his argument with reference to the patriotism and disinterestedness of Riel, with reference to the degree of sympathy or the reverse which we ought to extend to him, to read a letter of Bishop Grandin. The Minister takes the letter out of his pocket, and he reads it. He thought it would help him and therefore he read it. He thought it would help him to anticipate the encounter, which I am sure we are looking forward to with great interest, of the two military men, the hon. Minister of Militia and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). He thought it would do him a little good to bring down some telegrams in advance, and he read extracts of a lot of letters, and a couple of telegrams, which he says were sent to him by the hon. member for Bellechasse, and he read them at a time when the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) having already spoken, had no opportunity, according to the rules of debate, of replying to him, and when they were but very little relevant to the question. Such was the course that the hon. Minister of Militia thought consistent with his duty to the House, with the dignity of his position, that he thought consistent with the generosity which ought to prevail between political opponents. The Government select such papers as they think they can make a point on in the debate. These they bring down at the moment they want to use them, but the mass of papers, on the perusal of which, if they had been placed in an accessible form before us, a proper general judgment could be reached, these they refuse to bring down. They say they have no time to bring them down, that they have no time to do anything else but to debate this question from day to day, and have time only to bring down those papers which serve their arguments. I said the other day, and I repeat, that in my opinion the whole question of the conduct of the Government, before the rebellion and up to the outbreak, and the whole attitude and relation of the half-breeds and white settlers to the Government with reference to the various questions which have been agitated, are extremely material to the formation of a judgment upon this question. I did not say what the hon. the Minister of the Interior the other day misunderstood me as saying, that I thought we ought to debate them in the same debate on which we debate this question. I did not think so for a reason which is very obvious, for the reason that, even the debating of them by themselves, taking them altogether, is a question so large in point of time, in point of subject, in point of reference to documents, as to transcend the limits, the ordinary and reasonable limits of debate, while the question we have before us is one of quite sufficient magnitude and complication at any rate to involve a debate by itself. So far I quite agree, but what I said the other day, and what I reiterate, is that, notwithstanding that proposition as to the complexity and magnitude of the questions rendering it inconvenient that they should be debated together, it is none the less important to a sound decision upon this question that the other questions should be debated, and we are doing a wrong thing: we are putting the cart before the horse, when we discuss first of all the final act in the great drama, instead of dealing in the first instance with those precedent facts and circumstances, threshing them out, sifting them, and endeavoring to reach a conclusion as to the relative responsibilities and attitudes of the Government of the country and of the people who rose. I say that we ought to know that in order that we may properly measure what the moral guilt was of those who rose, we ought to know it in order that we may properly measure what was the right of this Government to act as judge in this cause. And, therefore, Sir, I am of opinion that the course which the Government has decided and insisted upon being pursued in this matter is an inconvenient, an illogical, an unsatisfactory course. I think also that it must be thoroughly understood—and we may as well understand it now—that, if we are to put the cart before the horse, we shall have to deal with the horse a little later. I think it had better be understood that we are not debating in this motion, in the form in which it is insisted that the question shall be put, when we cannot call, if it were convenient to call, for a decision upon it, when we have not those materials to which I referred the other day, the obligation to submit which to us has been admitted by the Government but remains unperformed; that we are not now debating, still less deciding, that great question, a question which is the question, Sir; for what we are debating to day, however important it may be on the general principles which govern it—and I believe it is of grave importance—however important it may be with reference to the question of sentiment and the question of feeling which have been raised about it, that question is but an incident of the real question which is to be tried between the two sides of this House. And again, Sir, I am unable to compliment the Government upon the course which they have pursued in determining that, this question being brought forward now, the discussion, in its practical form and sense, should be limited, by their motion of the previous question. I am not hinting that we may not debate the main motion just as freely after the previous question is put as before—of course we may; but all the questions which are involved in the main motion are questions which are properly to be debated, and some of them should have been brought forward in a manner in which the opinion of the House should be taken upon them in this connection; and the capacity to take the opinion of the House upon them in this connection being taken away from us by the proposal of the previous question, the Government has, as I conceive, exercised a very unwise discretion, and pursued a very needless course as well, in so dealing with the matter. I say a needless course, because I think it is pretty palpable to all of us that no possible amendment that could have been moved would have prevented us in the end from coming back upon the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry). I should myself deplore any attempt to evade a decision upon that precise question, but quite consistently with a decision upon that precise question being desirable is this proposition also good that it is desirable that there should be decisions upon other questions as well. Therefore, Sir, upon these grounds, and notably on the ground to which I have referred a moment ago with reference to the papers, when we happily reach that stage in this debate at which our opinions are to be converted into votes, I shall myself vote against the proposition that this question be now put, believing it is not fit that, at this time and under these circumstances, that the question should be now put. I shall represent, I feel sure, though I do not know, I am quite satisfied I shall represent in that declaration the opinions of a minority—how small or how large a minority is of little consequence—the opinions of a minority, and therefore immediately afterwards we will come to the question itself, and, coming to the question itself and recognising therefore the fact that with that question we shall have to deal, I propose to discuss the method in which we should deal with it, as of course after that first vote there will be no opportunity for further discussion. Now, I could well understand and I believe that I could well justify this proposition—that under the circumstances to which I have briefly alluded, it would be fit further to emphasise one's view of the inexpediency, the impropriety, the unfairness of the course which the Government is pursuing by abstaining from voting either way upon the main motion. I can thoroughly understand the opinions of many people as being in favor of such a view, thus leaving the question to be debated at its proper time and under its proper circumstances; and I can understand also—as you will readily perceive—the opinion as existing in some minds that in the sum of this whole matter, though they may not be able wholly to agree with the view of the Government, they should yet think that it was not a case in which there were grounds for recording a censure upon the Government in regard to their action. I have already declared, on the occasion to which I have referred, that such circumstances have existed in my knowledge, paying as I naturally do, some attention to the operation of criminal justice in the country, and I say that I can very well understand that some persons should reach that conclusion. It is not the view or course which I propose to adopt. I have reached, for my own part, conclusions which seem to me to be so clear, which seem to me to be so well founded, which seem to me to be so important in the general interest of the administration of criminal justice, that I feel it my duty notwithstanding the disadvantages in which we are placed in coming to a conclusion, not to permit those disadvantages to deprive me of an opportunity which, perhaps, might not recur, of recording my vote or expressing my opinion. Now, then, as I have said, it will be necessary that we should, before we can finally dispose of this question, though we are called upon to dispose of it now, it will yet be necessary that we should, before we can really and properly dispose of it, thresh out the question of the North-West affairs. I do not propose to enter into that discussion now, for the reasons which I have given. It is, perhaps, needless for me to do so, because I have already, at some considerable length, variously stated at from six to seven hours—I hope it was not quite seven, Mr. Speaker; I dare say you know better than any one of us—but I have stated in a speech which was but, after all, a chronological recital of the actions of the one side and of the other, my view upon the evidence which was then presented, of the relations of the Government to the North-West to the white settlers, and to the half-breeds in the neighborhood of Prince Albert and elsewhere the facts; and I have declared, and I think I have proved, that there were in those matters gross, palpable, incredible delay, neglect and mismanagement. I was struck the other night when my hon. friend from East Quebec (Mr. Laurier) in the course of another branch of his argument altogether, referred to the execution of Admiral Byng. I thought I recollected something of a historical parallel in another regard between those times and persons and these times and persons; and turning next morning to the book I had in my memory, Walpole's book on George II, I found what happened at that time. At that time, too, Sir, there was a North American question with England; at that time there was a French question in North America; and just at that time the annalist of the reign of George II, records with reference to the Secretary of the Southern Department, the Minister of the Interior of that day, the Duke of Newcastle—that duke who, when he was told, as I said awhile ago in this House, that Annapolis must be defended, said, "Oh, yes, of course; Annapolis must be defended; certainly. Where! where is Annapolis?"—of that same Minister, he records that what facilitated the enterprises of the French was the extreme ignorance in which the English court had kept themselves of the affairs of America. "It would not be credited," says the annalist, "what reams of paper, representations, memorials and petitions from that part of the world lay mouldering and unopened in his office." And turning a few pages on to the other event which had called my attention to the subject, I find the account of this same Minister with reference to Byng, that when a deputation waited on him shortly before the trial took place, to make representations against the Admiral, he answered: "Oh, indeed, he shall be tried immediately, he shall be hanged directly." So you see, Sir, there are very curious parallels between past and present times. Now, Sir, I have held, and I hold this Government responsible for every dollar of the public and private treasure which has been expended, for every pang that has been inflicted, for every life that has been lost, whether on the field or on the scaffold in the North-West, and I believe that for this, their responsibility, they will be called to a strict and stern account, here first, and afterwards at the great tribunal so soon as they, who boldly challenge us to come on, choose to bring forward those papers which they hold—I do not know whether they be yet mouldering or unopened—but which, in some way or other, they hold within their vaults. Now, with reference to the insurgents, of course there was legal guilt—of course, rebellion, the old saying is, is always treason until it becomes revolution. The degree of moral guilt is not a question for the jury at all; it is a question to be considered when you come to award the punishment. It does not affect in the slightest degree either the verdict of the jury or the sentence of the court. Riel was legally guilty, no matter how great, and pressing, and long endured the grievances may have been; no matter how strong the case may have been; Riel was legally guilty, no matter what the moral justification or the moral palliation or excuse may have been; Riel, and those who rose with him, were legally guilty of the crime of treason, if they were mentally responsible. The Crown in the course of this trial, stopped the evidence about the grievances, and they stopped it—I make no complaint of their conduct—they stopped it rightly, because it was no defence at law, because it was utterly impossible, as the Crown counsel observed, that the court which sits under the authority of this Parliament and of this Government, could permit evidence to be taken to show that treason or rebellion against this Government was a justifiable thing. There was then, Sir, upon this trial before the jury, complicity with and a league in, the insurrection being abundantly proved, and in fact practically admitted, the single question whether the prisoner should be found guilty, or whether he should be found not guilty, on the ground of insanity. Now, before dealing with that question, I wish to refer to some only of the incidents connected with the trial, and I regret that the course of this debate has somewhat lessened, in one or two respects, the favorable impression which I had derived and had pleasure in expressing on a former occasion. I have myself expressed—and I had hoped, and hope now that what I said, though not said here, might have been thought, not wholly unworthy of some observations—I have expressed my regret at the choice of the judge in this case. I have pointed out there were some difficulties in relation to any judge who might be appointed under the existing circumstances; that in the first place these stipendiary magistrates, in the North-West were, in truth, inferior magistrates. They are not magistrates—I desire to speak of them with all due respect—but confessedly they are not magistrates in any sense of that weight, dignity, authority, and standing which belong to those magistrates, who, under the laws of the older Provinces of the Dominion, are entrusted with the trial of capital offences. I have pointed out, besides, that those judges are political officers, as members of the North-West Council, of that very North-West Council which, shortly after these trials, thought it within the sphere of its duty to pronounce an opinion—first of all, upon the conduct of the Government with reference to the transaction of its business, that portion of its business the neglect of which led to the insurrection or gave the opportunity for the insurrection; and, secondly, to pass an opinion upon the course which ought to have been, or the course which was, pursued by the Government with reference to the execution of this very sentence. I have pointed out also that the standing of those officers in another important respect is inferior to that which ought to be the standing of men entrusted with such issues, in this: That they are not officers holding their office during good behavior; they are officers holding office practically during pleasure. The security which grows from the entire independence of the judges of the Executive Government, does not subsist in this case, and the fact that it does not subsist has been emphasized by this Government, which in a well known case has removed one of those stipendiary magistrates from office. So that, not merely in theory, but in practice has the lesson been taught that these judges are under the control of this Government. Those difficulties, in my opinion, should have been removed by legislation. I do not think that Parliament as a whole, whatever the Administration may have done, really contemplated that trials for high treason or treason-felony should take place before those magistrates. I do not suppose that in what we thought was happy, peaceful and contented Canada there was any one who thought of the possibility of a trial for high treason or treason-felony. Speaking for myself I say it never occurred to me that we should have such a trial last year or any year in our country; and I therefore say that I fancy it must have been upon that view very largely that the legislation which was passed by the late Government and which was amended in a direction which diminished to some extent the securities for the prisoner by the present Government, was passed. You may say these are but theoretical difficulties after all. I say, no. I say they are serious practical difficulties. I have already said elsewhere that the question is not simply of the actual fairness of the trial. It is of the last consequence that the public should have all the securities which constitutional government and parliamentary government have wrested from the prerogative, and that there should be in the minds of the public a certain conviction that those securities exist and are available. This is not a new question with us.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. BLAKE. Before recess I was pointing out that we must not consider these points as theoretical merely; they are practical—intensely practical. The spirit of them is exhibited in our Statute-books, in the Act which constitutes the Supreme Court, in which it is expressly provided that the judges of that court should not be competent to accept any commission or employment, or any emolument under the Government of the day. In the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, an express prohibition of a similar character exists, and was brought into play we recollect, not so many years ago, by our late lamented friend, Mr. Holton, and that in connection with a North West matter too, when a learned judge of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec had been appointed administrator of the Government of the Province of Manitoba. This statute precluded the taking effect of that appointment. And how did this take place? How was it that this law was engrafted on the Statute Book? Because it had been found of practical consequence to the people of the Province of Quebec that it should be so. There also, as we know, there had been an agitation against grievances of many years' standing, which culminated in the rebellion of 1837; and for a great many years this question had been one of the questions agitating the people of that Province. You will find that as early as 1825 the resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of Lower Canada declared as follows:—

"That for the more upright and impartial administration of justice it is expedient to render the judges of His Majesty's Court of King's Bench and Provincial courts more independent than hitherto by incapacitating the said judges from seats in the Executive and Legislative Councils, and disqualifying such as have now seats therein from sitting or voting in such Councils.

"That it is expedient to secure by law to the said judges their respective offices during good behavior in the same manner as those officers are secured in England.

"That it will be expedient, for the purpose aforesaid, to secure adequate permanent salaries to the said judges on their being prevented from holding any other office of profit or emolument under the Crown."

It is not, Sir, in the heyday of liberty that we are to forget the securities for freedom. The price—according to a hackneyed but ever-to-be-remembered maxim—the price of liberty is eternal vigilance; and in this regard, as I have said, an error has been committed. Now, what is the measure and extent to which this Administration is chargeable in this respect? Certainly not in the existing state of the law with reference to a trial before one of the stipendiary magistrates. All that can be complained of fairly against them is, that their attention being called to the special circumstances of the case to the unprecedented and unanticipated circumstances, during the late Session of Parliament, by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), and the suggestion being made that legislation should take place, they declined to accede to the suggestion and insisted that the trial should go on under existing laws. Sir, I have said that trials of this description differ altogether from all other classes of trial in respect to the importance of the independence of the judiciary. They differ wholly, because in trials of this description there is hardly a conceivable case in modern times at any rate, in which the Government does not occupy a wholly different relation to the prosecution from that which it occupies in all ordinary cases in the administration of criminal justice. There can be no question, for example, of the Government being otherwise than an impartial and equal administrator of the law if John Jones or Tom Smith is taken up and accused of having picked somebody's pocket, or robbed somebody's barn, or maimed somebody, or killed somebody. But cases of this description wholly differ. In this case the Government may be, generally is, in this particular case unquestionably was—a prosecutor in altogether a different sense and with altogether different relations to the prisoners than in those other cases. I point out—for I desire through this discussion to sustain myself by authority—what authority says upon this topic. I refer to the well-known book of Lieber on Civil Liberty, where he uses these words:

"In the trial for treason the Government is no longer theoretically the prosecuting party as it may be said it is in the case of theft or assault, but the Government is the really offended, irritated party, endowed at the same time with all the force of the Government to annoy, persecute and often to crush. Governments have therefore been most tenacious in retaining whatever power they could in the trial for treason; and on the other hand it is most important for the free citizen that in the trial for treason he should not only enjoy the common protection of a sound penal trial; but far greater protection. The trial for treason is a gauge of liberty. Tell us how they try people for treason and we will tell you whether they are free.

"It redounds to the glory of England that attention was directed to this subject from early times, and that guarantees were granted to the prisoner indicted for treason centuries before they were allowed to the person suspected of a common offence. * * * Experience proves that not only are all the guarantees of a fair penal trial peculiarly necessary for a fair trial in treason, but that it requires additional safeguards; and of one or the other the following seem to me the most important.

"The judges must not depend on the Executive."

"The judges must not be political bodies."

Many safeguards are specified, of which I select the two that are apposite to the present case: "The judges must not depend on the Executive; the judges must not be political bodies." Now, Sir, being in the difficulty that in these particular trials the Government under the standing laws which they did not choose to propose to alter, had to select a judge who was dependent on the Executive—a judge who was one of a political body, it was eminently incumbent on them to have made the best selection, the one which was least objectionable, the one in respect of which it might be said, though there is a difficulty as to all to which I have adverted, this one is certainly the least or, at any rate, not the most obnoxious. But what I have objected to on a former occasion, an objection which I renew to night, is to the choice of the particular judge, because this particular judge, as you will see if you refer to the Public Accounts, was the recipient of special favors, the occupant of special relations to the Executive of the day. In the first place, he is the legal adviser to the Executive of the North-West; he is so appointed during the pleasure of the Government; he is so paid a salary during the pleasure of the Government. He answers to the Attorney-General, the legal adviser of the Government in the North-West Territories; and it needs not to enlarge upon the relations and responsibilities of a Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories to a rebellion in the North-West, and upon the relations and responsibilities of the First Minister of Canada, who declared that he was the medium of communication between the two Governments, and of the Minister of the Interior towards the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories to point out that it was an unhappy choice to select, of the three or four judges, the person who filled the position of the political adviser, the political law officer, to the Government in the Territories to be the judge in this particular trial. He is also the recipient of special favors. I find, in the Auditor General's Report, just brought down, a statement of his accounts. I find that, irrespective of his salary of $3,000 a year, there has been paid to him, during the year to which these accounts refer, a special rental allowance of $500, an additional salary as legal adviser to the Lieutenant-Governor of $200, three votes of $200 each as a nominative member of the North-West Council, his travelling allowance of $1,000, and something between $100 and $500 for expenses and allowances for attendance at Ottawa in connection, it is said, with the Torrens' Act; making a total of over $2,700 paid during the last year to this judge, in addition to his salary of $3,000. Now, as to travelling allowances, and allowances as nominative members of the North-West Council, the other judges were in the same position; but the allowances for house rent and as legal adviser and in connection with the Torrens' Act are peculiar to the
