particular officer whom the Government, I think, extremely unfortunately, decided they would entrust with the duty of conducting these trials. Well, the judge chooses the jury panel, and we have heard from the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) a statement, which I think is of considerable importance, and with reference to which I should have desired to hear something from the Government before now—a statement to the effect that there were persons of the faith and nationality of the prisoner eligible as jurymen, but that none or only one such was chosen of the panel. I heard the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) say that no objection of that description could apply, in consequence of the relations of the prisoner at the time of his trial to the church of his fathers and the church to which he himself belongs, but I do not think that argument holds; and, for my part, I must express my regret that, if the circumstances be as up to this moment they appear to be from the uncontradicted statement of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), a wider selection should not have been made of the panel; and I share the regret expressed by several hon. members that the single person who happened to be on the jury, of that faith, should have been peremptorily challenged. For that challenge there may have been, for all I know, a good reason; but we are not told, and we must not presume it was a challenge for cause. We all know the shock to the administration of justice which ensued when those of his faith were challenged on the occasion of the O'Connell trial. That ought to have been a lesson on this occasion, and the same difficulty ought not to have recurred in our day. Again, with reference to the character of the prosecution. The written instructions which were given to the Crown lawyers were to try all the leaders, with the exception of certain Indians and others who might be chargeable with murder—to try all the leaders for treason. No distinction whatever was made in those instructions between Louis Riel and the other leaders. Now, how did it happen, under these circumstances, that all the prisoners, except Louis Riel, were indicted—for the same offence it is true—but under the more modern statute and procedure, for treason-felony, while Riel alone was tried for high treason under the ancient law? Were there special instructions given which have not been brought down to us, or special verbal instructions or communications differing from the general instructions which have been brought down to us, as the only instructions given to the officers? If there were none such, I consider it to have been a violation of those instructions to try for treason-felony the mass of the leaders, and for high treason, one. They were all ordered to be tried for treason, and they all ought to have been tried under the same statute, unless special instructions were given to the contrary. It was, of course, with the cognisance of the Government that this difference was made, because it was everybody's news—it was reported in the papers; and, therefore, I assume that the Government either instructed, in the first instance, or else acquiesced in the course pursued; and I am entitled to assume that because I observe still further that the Deputy Minister of Justice was one of the officers associated with the others in the conduct of the trial. As to the time, I agree with the observations that have been made, that it seems to have been short; but I am not prepared, in the present state of the evidence, to maintain that it was too short, simply because I have been unable to observe any protest on the part of the prisoner's counsel that it was too short, excepting in so far as such protest may be implied from their having asked for a longer time than the Crown counsel granted. Upon that subject, I think we might have some further information. I was glad to be able to make an observation, which has been referred to before in this debate, as to the assistance given by the Crown in procuring the prisoner's witnesses; that observation can no longer be repeated in its full force, because I have learned, since this debate commenced, the course which was pursued with reference to the request for witnesses. In my view, it was of the highest consequence, and in saying that I do not overlook the letter which the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) read, that Dr. Howard should have been called. I do not, after the statement of that hon. member, charge his not being procured upon the counsel for the Crown, because the hon. gentleman read a letter addressed to Dr. Howard from the Department of Justice here, from which it appeared that negotiations had been going on between the Department of Justice and Dr. Howard as to the terms upon which that gentleman would visit Regina; that he had named, under the special circumstances which the hon. gentleman mentioned, the sum of $500; and that it was upon the question of that charge that the Department of Justice declined to arrange for Dr. Howard going up to Regina. Now, Sir, I regret that decision. I think it extremely unfortunate that Dr. Howard—who, besides being a well known alienist, also had charge of Riel for, as well as I could gather, a period of nine months in the asylum over which he presided—was not a witness at the trial, and that we have not now the benefit of his evidence. I do not think any such question as the difference between what might have been supposed to be his reasonable charge and the sum of $500 ought to have weighed for an instant in considering the question whether he should have been available or not. Then, Sir, I think it is unfortunate that we do not know more with reference to the complicity and responsibility of the whites in the rebellion. We remember the speech of the First Minister, last Session, in which he declared that it was not to the Indians or to the half-breeds, but to the whites of Prince Albert, that we owed the shame, the disgrace and the discredit of the rebellion. We find the law officer of the Government pointing out the same proposition, not as positively but still with a tolerable degree of certainty, to the counsel whom he was sending there, and instructing them that no point was more important than that they should secure evidence and convict those who are guilty in this regard. We hear from the Minister of Justice that reports have been received from the law officers of the Crown on all these points; we know the beggarly kind of attempt made to mete out justice to these guiltier whites. We know that two only were committed for trial, for the Minister of Justice has told us so; we know that one was Jackson of whom the Secretary of State, with that liveliness of imagination which characterises his oratory, told his constituents at Terrebonne that he was a Frenchman in all but the name, that he was Francisé, that he was just as much a Frenchman as Regnier, and there was no question of nationality about it.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I did not.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh! well, we will verify as we go on. Here is a report in La Minerve of the hon. gentleman's speech:

(Translation.)

"A VOICE. You have pardoned Jackson, the Englishman, why did you not pardon Riel? Jackson, gentlemen, what has been said and written with regard to Jackson's pardon is, allow me to use the words, downright stupidity. In the first place, Jackson is no more an Englishman than you or I. All the English there was in him was his name, and he was just as much French by blood and language as Riel himself. In this he was a good deal like a great many of our countrymen who are of English or Scotch descent, but who are thoroughly frenchified. Jackson was one of Riel's secretaries. His fate was that of Régnier, his colleague, who was a Canadian by name and origin."

And then the hon. gentleman proceeds to say:

(Translation.)

"They were both pardoned as accomplices in the second degree, so that the question of race had nothing to do with the case."

That was the hon. gentleman's statement by the revised report of the hon. gentleman's speech in the Minerve,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It was not my statement. The hon gentleman who corrects the Hansard here should allow other people to correct reports in other papers.

Mr. BLAKE. I do allow it to be corrected. So this is the account of the trial of Jackson, who, I admit, was an Englishman, contrary to the incorrect report of the gentleman's speech, which some wicked adversary, with intent to get him into a corner and injure him politically, has foisted into that well known hostile paper to him, the Minerve. I leave the responsibility to him and the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé) of settling with the reporter, and I hope the hon. gentleman will not blame me if I have chosen the report from that paper which has given ostensibly, in the first person, a verbatim report of his speech.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I blame the hon. gentleman for not accepting the statement of one of his colleagues in the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I said I hoped he would not blame me for having taken the report. With reference to Jackson, we know well the circumstances in his case. We know that he had joined Riel at an early period, and that he is said to have become a lunatic and was acquitted on the ground of insanity. The other person was one Scott, of whom we have not equal particulars, but of whom the Minister of Justice reports to us the result of the trial, saying he was found "not guilty;" and I think having read that in the instructions to the law officers and hearing the Government declare that the persons principally guilty were the whites of Prince Albert, it would be important to us in measuring out the degree of lenity or severity that was due to Riel, to have heard something more of the result of this search by the Government against their white enemies. I pass, although there are other points to which I might refer, to the issue which I have said was for the jury to decide on that occasion, and that issue was, not whether Riel was insane in the sense in which, in common parlance, we use that word, but whether he was insane in the sense of the word which is used in order that it may create irresponsibility for crimes. By our law, whether that law be right or wrong, he might be insane in the sense in which we ordinarily use the word, and yet criminally responsible; and the question for the jury was, in fact, whether he was so insane as, within the meaning of the law, to be responsible for his acts. This is a difficult question, as are all questions of insanity, and it may be divided into two headings: First, what was the effect if his conduct were genuine? And next, was it genuine or feigned? Now, I want to fasten, if I can, upon your mind the question for the jury. I want you to remember that the question for the jury was whether he was insane within the meaning which the law attaches to that term, so as to induce the consequence of irresponsibility for crime, because it must be always remembered, as the vital question, as the vital point, that, without disturbing in the slightest degree the finding of the jury, there may remain, and generally will remain, under circumstances like these, important considerations as affecting the moral guilt, and therefore, as affecting the degree of punishment to be awarded to the prisoner. The verdict then of guilty would be right, first of all, no matter how great were the faults of the Government, no matter how clearly political was the offence, no matter how great the grievances, no matter how long-enduring and suffering the people might have been, the verdict of guilty would be right, no matter how these things might have been, and also the verdict of guilty would be right no matter how clearly Riel's intellect were disordered, if it were not disordered up to a certain point; and these two things, the question of the political character of the offence and the resultant considerations, and the question of the disorder of intellect, would fall to be considered, consistently with not disturbing in the least the verdict of guilty by the jury, in the award of punishment. Now I shall make good after a little while by authorities those two propositions; but before touching the facts as to the mental condition of this individual, it may be as well to look for a moment at the general knowledge on the subject and the principles of enquiry. There is an old controversy between the lawyers and the doctors upon this head; the doctors widening the degree of irresponsibility due to disordered intellect, and the lawyers narrowing it. Both extremes were, I humbly venture to think, perhaps wrong, and I believe that these extremes are somewhat meeting now. I believe that many eminent men in the medical profession in these modern days have come round to the view that there may consist with a decidedly disordered intellect a measurable responsibility for crime, and that on the other hand the lawyers have come round largely to the view that the old and, what I may call in the main, the barbarous dispositions of the law, ought no longer to be considered as governing the case of insanity. But we have not to do, in the disposing of this matter, with the law as we would like it to be, or as we think it ought to be, or as we may hope it is going to be. It would be unjust entirely to try the Administration, or the judge, or to consider of the case on any such footing. We have to ascertain, if we can, what the law is, as applicable to the case and then see how the facts fit into it. Upon this question of insanity, so much has been said abroad and within this House utterly inconsistent, as I understand them, with the settled facts, that I desire, besides alluding to authorities which were quoted on the trial, and to the authorities which my hon. friend who spoke on that subject quoted, to refer to a very few passages from books. I have heard two hon. gentlemen speak of homicidal mania, as if we had anything very specially to do with that here, and point to the fact that the homicidal maniac acts without accomplices, and that, because Riel had accomplices, therefore he could not be a homicidal maniac. I have heard an hon. gentleman this afternoon illustrating this subject by reference to the description of idiocy, by reference to the description of imbecility, by reference to the description of dementia. Now, however much those descriptions may apply to very many respectable persons who entertain, and even to some who express, opinions on this subject, they certainly have nothing to do with the peculiar kind of insanity with which we are dealing. Now, Sir, the eminent French writer Georget, who is quoted by Browne, says:

"In conversing with patients on subjects foreign to their morbid delusions, you will generally find no difference between them and other people. They not only deal in commonplace notions, but are capable of appreciating new facts and trains of reasoning. Still more, they retain their sense of good and evil, right and wrong, and of social usages to such a degree that whenever they forget their moral sufferings and delusions, they conduct themselves in their meetings as they otherwise would have done, enquiring, with interest, for one another's health, and maintaining the ordinary observances of society."

"Those who conduct themselves so well in the asylum, in the midst of strangers with whom they have no relations, and against whom they have conceived no prejudice or cause of complaint, and in quiet submission to the rules of the house, are no sooner at liberty in the bosom of their families, than their conduct becomes unsupportable; they are irritated by the slightest contradiction, abusing and threatening those who address the slightest observation to them, and working themselves up to the most intolerable excesses."

Clouston, who had charge of the Morningside Asylum, a very well known institution at Edinburgh, in his lectures on this matter, says:

"But to return to D.M., who may be taken as a typical case of monomania of grandeur, his mind is not only affected with the delusion that he is king, but it is affected by an unreal tendency to elevation in all directions, and it is now somewhat enfeebled, as is commonly the case after many years in such cases. He often writes me long rambling letters proposing various impractical modes of managing the asylum, and he is the greatest fault finder in it. Then affectively, he is different from a sane man, showing small love for his wife and children, and he takes morbid dislikes to people without real cause. He is of course very inconsistent to work as a blacksmith, he being a king; but the conduct of by far the majority of the insane is quite inconsistent with their beliefs; and then, if he did not work he would get no tobacco, or beer to lunch, arguments that even royalty can appreciate."

Again he says:

"I have a 'prophet of the Lord,' D. O. B., a joiner who by no means at our disposal can be got to work at his trade. He says that the Lord has sent him a new work and he must follow it. He sees visions from God all the time, which he puts down on paper, &c., &c.

"I have another man, D. O. C., with almost precisely the same delusion, viz., that he is a 'man of God,' who is a capital worker in the garden, and enjoys a dance or concert immensely."

Then, referring to a number of the others of the inmates of the asylum, he says:

"Here is Jesus Christ, and here are the prophet Elias, the Emperor of the Universe, the Universal Empress, Empress of Turkey, the only daughter of God Almighty, Queen Elizabeth, four Kings of England, one King of Scotland, the Duke of Kilmarnock, the inventor of perpetual motion, a man who has discovered the new elixir of life that can cure delusions, 12 persons to whom this establishment and all that it contains belongs, a lady who daily and nightly has delightful conversations with the Prince of Wales and the rest of the royal family, &c. &c. Those are all calm and harmless people, bearing themselves in their deportment and manner as becomes such distinguished persons, though a few do not exhibit any outward or muscular indications of their greatness, all are some way inconsistent and absolutely unmoved by the most conclusive argument or evidence that their ideas are wrong or unfounded."

In the report of the Commission on Capital Punishment which sat in 1865, the very eminent physician, Dr. Tuke, being examined, gave the following answers to questions:—

"Q. I believe that the knowledge of right and wrong is by no means uncommon among persons who are decidedly insane?—A. It is the normal state for them to have such knowledge.

"Q. I suppose that in lunatic asylums you find a consciousness between right and wrong; that is to say, obedience to the rules which you lay down?—A. Except in cases of absolute idiocy or dementia, the knowledge of right and wrong is intact."

Then, with reference to the border line, Clouston says on the subject of delusional insanity:

"There are plenty of persons doing their work in the world well and getting through their labor under monomania of pride or suspicion in a mild form. The now famous case of M. Wyld who held an important government office and did his work well all his life, and yet had labored under the delusion of grandeur, that he was the son of George IV, and left all his money to the town of Brighton because that monarch had been fond of that place, is one in point. He was held to be sane in everything he did but his will making. I am constantly consulted by their friends about the insane delusions of persons who do not show them to anybody but their near relations, and continue to do their work and occupy responsible positions. I now know in Scotland lawyers, doctors, clergymen, business men and workmen who labor under undoubted delusional insanity, and yet do their work as well as if they had been quite sane."

The latest work I have been able to see on this subject is that of Dr. Ireland, published last year, called "The Blot upon the Brain;" and he says this:

"Thus between the soundest intelligence and the most disordered there are differences our vague adjectives will not define. People mad enough to be shut up in asylums are not so rare—say one in every 500 in highly civilised countries. Then again, people with a less dangerous or intractable degree of insanity are very common. Every man skilled in the symptoms of lunacy knows this. In the world's history, men somewhat deranged in mind have had a great influence; but to effect this their delusions must harmonise with the delusions of the multitude.

"The history of religious imposture shows how powerful may be the influence of the insane upon the sane. If disposed to enlarge upon such a subject, we might have the characteristics of some of the founders of the wild sects which sprang into being during the period of the Reformation, from John of Leyden to Venner. Towards the end of the last century, Mr. Richard Brothers, of whose insanity there can be no question, infected some educated people, and many of the vulgar, with his claims to be an inspired prophet. Mr. Halhed, a well-known Orientalist and member of Parliament, was one of his followers. There are people still living who remember Joanna Southcott, who was, when 60 years of age, to give birth to the Messiah, and who was said to have had 100,000 followers. In 1838 John Nicholl Thom collected a number of followers among the ignorant rustics of Kent, and killed a constable who came to apprehend him. After this he persuaded his dupes to face the military, under the assurance that he would make them invulnerable. Thom killed with a pistol the officer of a detachment which came to arrest him, and was instantly shot dead, with nine of his credulous followers, by the soldiers. It was even believed that he would rise again within a month."

MR. BLAKE.

I read this—partly to meet what I conceive the erroneous argument stated in the report of Sir Alexander Campbell, in which he argues the impossibility of Riel having been seriously affected in his mind, because he could not have done what he did do, and had the followers he had, and pursued the career in that respect that he did, unless he were sane. Then, Sir, we come to the question of the legal view of insanity and of responsibility as affected thereby, and here again I trouble the House with what I conceive to be the best records of the expounded law upon the subject. Amos, in his work, says:

"Insanity, in the largest sense of the term as used for legal purposes, is a temporary or permanent disorder of the relations between the mental and physical functions of man, of such a nature as to destroy the value of the current presumptions, founded on those relations, as existing in a condition of health."

The other quotations which I make are from Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, the well known criminal lawyer, who has devoted, I suppose, more attention to the principle and theory, and the practical operation of the criminal law, than any, or, at any rate, most, other modern criminal lawyers, who has been practically engaged in the attempt at codification, and whose knowledge and position has been recognised by his appointment to the judiciary, subsequently to which he became a member of the latest commission upon this subject. Now, in his very recent work upon the history of criminal law, he gives an exposition upon this subject which he derives principally from the writer Griesinger, of whom he says that, after having read all that was to be found upon it, he thinks that this concurs with, if not all, the overwhelming bulk of medical authority, of which may be fairly taken as a summing up:

"Sanity exists when the brain and the nervous system are in such a condition that the mental functions of feeling and knowing, emotion and willing can be performed in their regular and usual manner.

"Insanity means a state in which one or more of the above mentioned mental functions is performed in an abnormal manner, or not performed at all by reason of some disease of the brain or nervous system.

"There are two grand groups or fundamental states of mental anomalies which represent the two most essential varieties of insanity. In the one the insanity consists in the morbid production governing and persistence of emotions and emotional states, under the influence of which the whole mental life suffers according to their nature and form.

"In the other the insanity consists in disorders of the intellect and will which do not (any longer) proceed from a ruling emotional state, but exhibit without profound emotional excitement, an independent, tranquil, false mode of thought and of will (usually with the predominant character of mental weakness). Observation shows further, that, in the great majority of cases, those conditions which form the first leading group precede those of the second group; that the latter appear generally as consequences and terminations of the first, when the cerebral affection has not been cured.

"Then the emotions are divided into two classes: those which tend to depression, resulting in melancholia; and those which tend to excitement, resulting in mania, the condition in which the disease of the brain constitutes an excited vehement state of the emotions tending to morbid energy and restlessness.

"Melancholia often passes into mania. The approach of mania displays itself by great restlessness and loquacity, accompanied with morbid activity of thought.

"The effect of mania upon the intellect is to increase the rapidity and quantity of thought. In its most moderate degrees this relation appears as an exaggeration of the normal faculty of thought.

"The principal effects of mania upon the intelligence is incoherence arising from precipitation of thought. The patient may call himself Napoleon, the Messiah, God, in short, any great person. He may believe that he is intimately acquainted with all the sciences, or offer to those around him all the treasures of the world.

"Mania may be incompletely developed, in which case the patient shows a natural activity and restlessness, adopts strange, eccentric projects, and is apt to be exceedingly vain, cunning and intriguing, but does not manifest either definite marks of disease of the brain or positive disturbance of the intellect. This state may be the first step towards mania proper, or it may continue for a length of time.

"The earlier form of madness, melancholia and mania, sometimes pass into a condition of feeling in which, however, particular delusions which, in the earlier stage of the disease, may have occurred to the patient in an unstable, transient way, become fixed in his mind and regulate his conduct.

"The condition in which a person is a victim for a time or permanently of fixed delusions is called monomania. The word has been objected to on the ground that it suggests that the disease is much more limited than it really is, involving nothing more than isolated mistaken beliefs not capable of being dispelled by reason. It appears that this view of the disease is incorrect. Such fixed delusions proceed from a profound disturbance of all the mental powers and processes. It may seem as if there were merely a partial destruction of the intelligence, while, in reality, the essential elements of thought, normal self-consciousness, and a correct appreciation of the special individuality and its relation to the world are utterly perverted and destroyed.

"The more limited the circle of these delirious conceptions, the more do they appear on superficial consideration to be simple and even inconsiderable errors of judgment. But how much do such errors, even in the most favorable cases, differ from those mistakes which in the same proceed from deficient knowledge? A long series of psychical disorders must precede them; they are inwardly developed from states of emotion. The whole personality of the patient is identified with them; he can neither cast them from him by an act of will, nor rid himself of them by argument, and in order to the existence of the delirium in this mild form, not only must that long series of emotional states from which it grew have run their course, but there must also remain behind a deficiency of thought to ensure its existence.

"This account of the disease of madness may be summed up in the following short description:—Any one or more of numerous causes may produce diseases of the brain or nervous system, which interfere more or less with the feeling, the will and the intellect of the person affected. Commonly the disease, if it runs its full course, affects the emotions first, and afterwards the intellect and the will. It may affect the emotions, either by producing morbid depression or by producing morbid excitement of feeling. In the first, which is much the commoner of the two cases, it is called melancholia, in the second mania. Melancholia often passes into mania. Both melancholia and mania commonly cause delusions and false opinions as to existing facts which suggest themselves to the mind of the sufferer, as explanations of his morbid feelings. These delusions are often accompanied by hallucinations, which are deceptions of the senses. Melancholia, mania and the delusions arising from them, often supply powerful motives to do destructive and mischievous acts.

"Insanity affecting the emotions in the form of melancholia and mania is often succeeded by insanity affecting the intellect and the will. In this stage of the disease the characteristic symptom is the existing permanent incurable delusions commonly called monomania. The existence of any such delusions indicates disorganisation of all the mental powers, including not only the power of thinking correctly, but the power of keeping before the mind, and applying to particular cases, general principles of conduct.

"The result of all this is that insanity produces upon the mind the following effects which must be considered in reference to the responsibility of persons shown to have done acts which would, but for such effects, amount to crime. Insanity powerfully affects, or may affect the knowledge by which our actions are guided, the feelings by which our actions are prompted, the will by which our actions are performed, whether the word "will" is taken to mean volition or a settled judgment the reason acting as a standing control on such actions as relate to it. The means by which these effects are produced are unnatural feelings, delusions or false opinions as to facts, hallucinations or deceptions of the senses; impulses to particular acts or classes of acts, and in some cases (it is said) a specific physical inability to recognise the difference between moral good and evil as a motive for doing good and avoiding evil."

That being the statement by, I suppose, the most eminent and recent authority upon the legal view of what insanity is, so far as it is material to the question now in hand, namely, responsibility for criminal acts, I turn to the question of responsibility according to the law. Amos says:

"This topic which in many criminal cases excites an interest often-times of the most strained and afflictive sort is one surrounded with peculiar difficulties of its own, due to the complexity and variety of the facts which it brings into consideration. These facts are partly physical or belonging to that indistinctly marked region which lies between physical and psychological science; partly ethical or dependent on a given person's apprehensions of right and wrong under abnormal or exceptional conditions, partly legal or political or dependent upon the amount of legal responsibility attributable to various degrees of mental health, in view of the protection claimed by individual persons, and of a due regard to the general safety of the whole community. It is probably rather in the first of these regions, that is the physical or psychological one, that the main practical difficulty is experienced. It is generally admitted in all systems of law that sufficient and satisfactory grounds for exculpation are found in an actual mental incapacity, whether fixed or transient, of knowing at the moment of doing an act that it is forbidden by law, or at any rate that it is morally reprehensible according to some moral notions in the agent's own mind—or in a physical incapacity to abstain from doing the act. The difficulty is presented at the moment at which it is attempted to establish the fact of either of these sorts of incapacity, and it is greatly exaggerated in cases where a legal system instead of exculpating all insane persons as a class affects to attach different degrees of punishment to different measures of presumed moral responsibility. . . . The records of criminal trials are full of an almost endless diversity of conditions of medical and moral theories to account for them."

Then Stephen's notion of the law, as it probably is, is given at page 149; extracted from the Digest:

"No act is a crime if the person who does it is at the time when it is prevented (either by defective mental power—or) by any disease affecting his mind:

"(a) From knowing the nature or quality of his act, or

"(b) From knowing that the act is wrong, or

"(c) From controlling his own conduct unless the absence of the power of control has been produced by his own default. But an act may be a crime although the mind of the person who does it is affected by disease, if such disease does not, in fact, produce upon his mind one or other of the effects above mentioned in reference to that act."

Then, in answer to the question: What is the meaning of a maniac laboring under such a defect of reason that he does not know that he is doing what is wrong? He says:

"It may be said that this description would apply only to a person in whom madness took the form of ignorance of the opinions of mankind in general as to the wickedness of particular crimes—murder, for instance—and such a state of mind would, I suppose, be so rare as to be practically unknown. This seems to me a narrow view of the subject, not supported by the language of the judges.

"I think that any one would fall within the description in question who was deprived by diseases affecting the mind of the power of passing a rational judgment on the moral character of the act which he meant to do.

"Suppose, for instance, that by reason of disease of the brain, a man's mind is filled with delusions, which, if true, would not justify his proposed act, but which in themselves are so wild and astonishing as to make it impossible for him to reason about them calmly or to reason on matters connected with them, &c., &c."

He quotes Bucknill and Tuke as follows:—

"It is of the highest importance to distinguish between that part of wrong conduct which patients are able and that which they are unable to control.

"Clinical experience alone gives the power of distinguishing between the controllable wrong conduct which is amenable to moral influences, and that violence utterly beyond the command of the will which yields only to physiological remedies."

Then Sir James Stephen shows very clearly that the language of the judges is doubtful and capable of different interpretations. He adds this:

"I understand by the power of self control the power of attending to general principles of conduct and distant motives and comparing them calmly and steadily with immediate motives and with the special pleasure or other advantage of particular proposed actions.

"Will consists in an exertion of this power of attention and comparison up to the moment when the conflict of motives issues in a volition or act.

"Diseases of the brain and the nervous system may in any one of many ways interfere more or less with will so understood. They may cause definite intellectual error, and if they do so their legal effect is that of other innocent mistakes of fact.

"Far more frequently they affect the will by either destroying altogether, or weakening to a greater or less extent, the power of steady, calm attention to any train of thought and especially to general principles and their relation to particular acts. They may weaken all the mental faculties so as to reduce life to a dream. They may act like a convulsion fit. They may operate as resistible motives to an act known to be wrong. In other words they may destroy, they may weaken or they may have unaffected power of self control.

"The practical inference from this seems to me that the law ought to recognise these various effects of madness. It ought, where madness is proved, to allow the jury to return any one of these verdicts:

"(1) Guilty;

"(2) Guilty; but his power of control was weakened by insanity;

"(3) Not guilty on the ground of insanity."

I once again call the attention of the House to the suggestion as to what the law ought to be, and I call attention to it because I shall point out before I have done that this practical result of dealing with the second class of cases, namely: "guilty but his power of control was weakened by insanity," is achieved by other means to-day, namely, by the action of the Executive. Again, Stephen says:

"As to the verdict of not guilty on the ground of insanity, the foregoing observations show in what cases, in my opinion, it ought to be returned, that is to say in those cases in which it is proved that the power of self-control in respect of the particular act is so much weakened that it may be regarded as practically destroyed, either by general weakening of the mental powers, or by morbid excitement, or by delusions which throw the whole mind into disorder or which are evident that it had been thrown into disorder by diseases of which they are symptoms, or by impulses which are irresistible and not merely unresisted."

"The position for which lawyers have always contended as to insanity is that parts of the conduct of mad people may not be affected by their madness, and that if such parts of their conduct are criminal they ought to be punished for it. It may, however, be asked how ought they to be punished? Ought they to be punished in all respects like sane people? To this I should certainly answer, yes, as far as severity goes; no, as far as the manner of punishment goes. The man who, though mad, was found guilty without any qualification of murder would hang, but if the jury qualified their verdict in the manner suggested in respect of any offender I think he should be sentenced, if the case were murder, to penal servitude for life, or not less than, say 14 years, and in cases not capital to any punishment which might be inflicted on sane man.

"The question what are the mental elements of responsibility is, and must be, a legal question.

"I believe that by the existing law of England, those elements, so far as madness is concerned, are knowledge that an act is wrong and power to abstain from doing it, and I think it is the province of judges to declare and explain this to the jury.

"I think it is the province of medical men to state, for the information of the court, such facts as experience has taught them, bearing upon the question whether any given form of madness affects, and in what manner, and to what extent it affects either of these elements of responsibility; and I see no reason why, under the law as it stands, this division of labor should not be fully carried out."

In the case of the commission to which I have already referred, Baron Bramwell sends a letter to the commissioners stating the results of his murder trials, from which I extract this:

"Six persons in six cases were acquitted on the ground of insanity, and rightly. I do not mean that the prisoners were as insane as the law requires, but the cases were those of real madness."

Now, Sir, having thus attempted to state, not in my own words, but in words which I think will be taken as those of the greatest authority, what are the doctrines of the law upon this subject, I propose to address myself for a brief space to what was the evidence in this particular case adduced at the trial as distinguished from other circumstances which might have been adduced. And first of all, the most important point in the case is this: The man had been insane. Unquestionably he had been insane. I say that is a most important point, and therefore it is first to be taken up. Dr. Roy, the medical superintendent of the Beauport Lunatic Asylum, was examined, and the substance of his testimony was:

"The prisoner was put in the asylum by the Quebec Government in June, 1876, and discharged January, 1878.

"Dr. Roy, in discharge of his duty, studied his case and attended him. He was unquestionably insane at that time. The type was megalomania. The symptoms or prominent features connected with religion, or power, pride and egotism. The patient cannot bear contradiction, and becomes irritated. These are delusions.

"On ordinary subjects, and where not affected by the delusions, the patient seems to reason well, and may be clever. Riel had these symptoms, and was at that time of unsound mind, and incapable of controlling his acts.

"The disease may disappear, or intermit and recur.

"Riel was of sound mind when released.

"The witness heard the evidence given by the witnesses as to Riel's words and conduct during his visit to the North-West.

"The symptoms were the same as he had witnessed himself in the asylum at Beauport; and he believed Riel was insane at the time in question."

Now, according to this statement, if we were to assume that that was to conclude the case according to the opinion of Dr. Roy as to what his condition was during the rebellion, it would infer the right to acquit him on the ground of insanity. But what is undisputed and indisputable, is that the man was insane from 1876 to 1878, and that the symptoms had recurred in the year 1885—the same symptoms which occurred when he was unquestionably insane, from 1876 to 1878. Now, there was more evidence on this subject which I want to refer to at another period; but I may say that what has been made very plain, though it was not proved on the trial, is that he had been in two other asylums, and I now refer to the probabilities of a recurrence of insanity. Brown, in the "Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity," says:

"One circumstance must not be overlooked in connection with the durability of insanity, and that is that there is a tendency to recurrence even after complete restoration to health. Perhaps of 100 persons who have an attack of mania and recover from it, fifty will, after such recovery, again become insane. After insanity has passed away there seems to exist a hyper-sensitive condition of mind which is ill-suited to carry on the rough intercourse of the world and its society. The man who has recovered is not so well as he was before he was taken ill. Disease always chooses the weak for its victims. Disease, like water, will take the easiest way, and as the individual who has recovered from insanity is weak, in that he labors under this hyper-sensitive condition of mind, he a second time falls under the wheels of some Juggernaut catastrophe. Any great events in the world's history cause insanity; but the events are seeds which have fallen by the way-side, they require to fall on ground well suited before they can spring up and blossom in insanity—and the good ground is weakness.

"Thus we have insanity connected with child-birth, we have it connected with the weakness of childhood, with the weakness of age, with the change of life and various bodily diseases, and finally, we find it in connection with previous attacks of mental disease. The result then of these researches, which have been made into the intricacies of this subject, are these: that of twelve persons attacked with insanity, six recover and six die sooner or later; that of the six who recover three only will remain sane during the rest of their lives, and that the recovery of the other three will not be permanent."

The result of that is, that once it is found that a man is unquestionably insane, the chances are three out of four either that he will continue insane till he dies, or if he recovers, that the recovery will be but temporary and he will once again become insane. Brown says again:

"With regard to the one, when it does take place, it is to be remembered that health no more than Rome, is to be built up in a day. Health returns very gradually. In some cases it is true that a man is sane to-day and insane to-morrow, and that the change from insanity to sanity may be as rapid; but it is certainly exceptional. It is easy to jump over a precipice, but if one wants to get to the top from the bottom he must be content to clamber up the hill. It need scarcely be added that as recovery of health is gradual so must the recovery of responsibility, or civil ability be also a matter of time. But as the law cannot recognise the minute distinctions which exist between to-day and to-morrow, it cannot recognise graduated responsibility, and it is only necessary to remember that this recovery of mental strength is gradual, that due allowance may be made for those persons who have recently suffered from an attack of mental disease, and that it is safe to regard such persons as still irresponsible for criminal acts and incapable of civil privileges, even although the recovery may seem very complete, unless the contrary can be proved. Let the presumption be in favor of their want of capacity and their irresponsibility, and no injustice is likely to arise. At the same time this presumption is liable to be rebutted by proof of its opposite."

In the commission to which I have already referred, Dr. Tuke, being examined, made these answers:

"The fact is certain that insanity constantly exists with long lucid intervals, and that it is more or less patent at different times

"Q. And that the patient fluctuates in a condition between what may be termed sanity and insanity, the line between which is not easily definable?—A. Yes; that is a constant form of what we call insanity with lucid intervals, or insanity with remissions, or recurrent insanity."

Then Clouston gives one example, that of a patient "C.Y." of whom he says:

"His mental condition was at that time exactly that intense exaltation, that morbid mental 'expansion,' that 'ambitious delirium,' or 'mania of grandeur' which we find so commonly in general paralysis, and which some physicians suppose to be characteristic of that disease. * * In three months he had become quiet in manner, self composed and rational, but had just a suggestion of his former state of mind in being too pleased with things and too grateful for little kindnesses. His friends thought him well and he was removed home.

In seventeen days he was back again. He would come up and be most pleased to see you, and in a moment, sometimes with some little provocation, such as your not agreeing at once with him that he was an earl and sometimes without he would strike you suddenly, very often going down on his knees immediately after and in a theatrical manner begging your pardon and hoping he had not offended you. * * He labored under chronic maniacal exaltation."

Then comes the instance of "D.J.," who was admitted, October, 1866, discharged, January, 1867; admitted April, 1870, discharged May, 1870; admitted, August, 1871, discharged, September, 1871; admitted, December, 1872 discharged, February 1873; admitted, February, 1875, discharged, May, 1875; admitted, August, 1877, discharged, September, 1877; admitted, November, 1880, discharged, January, 1881; admitted, December, 1881, discharged, March, 1882, and he gives several other instances showing the constant recurrence of insanity. I do not think that too much importance can be attached to the circumstances of the unquestioned and unquestionable insanity of Louis Riel, as proved by the facts to which I refer at this precedent time, and to the character of his alleged illusions or delusions, as you please to call them, at the later date, having regard to the knowledge and experience we have with reference to the probability of recurrent insanity. It seems to me the circumstances show that he was laboring under insane delusions on religion and politics, prior to, and during the outbreak, and that these delusions were directly connected with the crime with which he was charged. He believed himself a prophet, a priest, a religious potentate; he had visions; he had irrational ideas as to foreign policy, as to the lands and the division of them, as to other nationalities, as to religion, as to politics, as to his influence, as to his mission, and as to the Metis nation. Of these facts I think the evidence taken at the trial afforded abundant testimony. I think it affords abundant testimony as to his condition anterior to the outbreak, and I have taken the evidence chronologically. Now, the evidence which was given by the priests as to his condition is to be accepted, with this observation—that if it were possible for any one to suppose that any course of conduct on his part could have influenced them to swerve from the accurate, honest truth—if it were possible, which I am the last to suggest, that such a thing could be, it is clear that they would not have been swerved in favor of this man, from whom they had suffered so much, who had cast aside their religion, who had profaned their churches, who had insulted themselves, who had assumed their position, who had led away their flocks, who they thought was instrumental, directly or indirectly, for the murder of two of their order, who had caused all the misery of the people in benefiting whom their whole lives had been spent—I say it is impossible to suppose that they could have been swerved in favor of this man by anything in the way of feeling; and at that time he had not recanted his religious errors. But they state not only opinions, but facts, and facts of the most important character. Father André says on religion and politics he and Riel frequently conversed, against his will; because on these subjects Riel was no longer the same man; it seemed as if there were two men in him; he lost all control of himself on those questions. Twenty times he told Riel he would not speak on those subjects, because Riel was a fool, did not have his intelligence of mind; that was the witness' experience; he had the principle that he was an autocrat in religion and politics, and he changed his opinions as he wished; his ideas changed; to-day he admitted this, and to-morrow he denied it; he believed himself infallible; he would not allow the least opposition: at all; immediately his physiognomy changed and he became a different man. Then comes a most important act. All the priests met and they discussed whether it was possible to allow Riel to continue in his religious duties, and they unanimously decided that he was not responsible on these questions; that he could not suffer any contradiction; that he was completely a fool in discussing these questions; it was like showing a red flag to a bull. Now, remember that these statements of Riel to Father André were made and these conclusions reached long before the outbreak, and before, as he says, he had actually risen against the priests. These erroneous ideas, and these manifestations of irregularity of mind, were during the latter part of 1884, and the early part of 1885, before the rebellion. Father Fourmond says that he was present at this meeting of the priests, that it was he who raised the question; and he states the facts on which his view rested. He says: Before the rebellion it seemed as if there were two men in the prisoner; in private conversation he was affable, polite, pleasant and charitable; if contradicted on religion and politics he became a different man and would be carried away with his feelings; he would use violent expressions. As soon as the outbreak began he lost all control of himself; he often threatened to destroy all the churches. He had extraordinary ideas on the subject of the Trinity; according to his ideas it was not God who was present in the Host but an ordinary man six feet high. As to politics he wanted first to go to Winnipeg and Lower Canada and the United States, and even to France; and he said "We will take your country even," and then he was to go to Italy and overthrow the Pope, and then he would choose another Pope of his own making; he said something to the effect that he would appoint himself as Pope. As the agitation was progressing he became a great deal more excitable; at the time of the rebellion Father Fourmond thought him insane. At one time when there was a gathering he kept following the witness into the tents and compelled him to leave the place and cross the water. There was a very extraordinary expression on his face; he was excited by the opinions he had expressed on religion. He said to the women: "Woe unto you if you go to the priests, because you will all be killed by the priests." All of a sudden, when the witness came to the boat, Riel came up with great politeness and said: "Look out, Father; I will help you to get on the boat." In an instant he passed from rage to great politeness. Once again at the Council the witness was brought up for trial; Riel was enraged, and called him a little tiger; but when the witness was leaving, he passed again from rage to extraordinary politeness, offered a carriage and took the witness' parcel and carried it for him. Then Charles Nolin (whose conduct seems to have been inconsistent and certainly unfriendly) says, that about a month after prisoner arrived, say the end of July, he showed him a book he had written in the States. The first thing there was to destroy England and Canada, and also to destroy Rome and the Pope. He said he had a divine mission to fulfil, and showed Bishop Bourget's letter, eleven years old, as proof. Riel showed him a book written with buffalo blood, the plan in which that was, after taking England and Canada, he would divide Canada, and give Quebec to the Prussians, Ontario to the Irish and the North-West Territories he divided between the European nations. The Jews were to have a part, and the Hungarians and Bavarians. As to the money he wanted from the Government, he said if he got the money he wanted from the Government, he would go wherever the Government wished to send him. He told Father André, if he was an embarrassment to the Government by remaining in the North-West, he would even go to the Province of Quebec. He said also if he got the money he would go to the United States and start a paper and raise the other nationalities in the States. He said: "Before the grass is that high in this country, you will see foreign armies in this country." He said: "I will commence by destroying Manitoba, and then I will come and destroy the North-West and take possession of the North-West." He told the witness that he considered himself a prophet; one evening there was a noise in Riel's bowels, and Riel told him that it was his liver, and that he had inspirations which worked through every part of his body. He wrote his inspirations on a sheet of paper, and said he was inspired. Whenever the word "police" was pronounced, he became very excited. He proposed a plan to the witness, and said he had decided to take up arms, and the first thing was to fight for the glory of God, for the honor of religion, and for the salvation of our souls. Before the Duck Lake fight, he was going about with a crucifix a foot and a half long, taken out of the church. Now, all these things save the last are before the rebellion, and a great portion of them in the year before the rebellion, the year 1884. Then, P. Garnot proves that about the beginning of the outbreak, Riel talked to him about changing the Pope, wanting to name Bishop Bourget Pope of the new world; he said that the spirit of Elias was with him; he wanted the people to acknowledge him as a prophet, and said he had the spirit of Elias in him and was prophesying. Another time he declared that he was representing St. Peter. Almost every morning he would come in front of the people and say such and such a thing would happen. When he slept at the witness' house he was praying loud all night; there was no one else there. He would not stand any contradiction by anyone. He several times said how this country was to be divided into seven Provinces, one for the French, Germans, Irish, and others; he mentioned Italians; he expected the assistance of an army of several nationalities; he mentioned the Jews, he expected their assistance and money, and he was going to give them a Province as a reward for their help. He had no doubt of his success, or that any obstacle could prevent him from succeeding; he always mentioned that he was going to succeed, that he had a divine mission, and was an instrument in the hands of God. The witness thought the man was crazy, because he acted very foolish, and communicated to others at the time this impression of him. George Ness says that at the beginning of the outbreak he witnessed a difficulty between Riel and Father Moulin, in which Riel accused Bishop Grandin and Bishop Taché of being thieves and rogues; Father Moulin wished to speak to the people, Riel refused and said: "No, we won't let him speak; take him away, take him away, we will tie him." Riel said he would take possession of the church, Father Moulin said he protested. "Look at him," said Riel, "he is a Protestant." He said that the Spirit of God was in him. Father Moulin said he was making a schism in the church. Riel said Rome had fallen. "Rome est tombée," and that the Pope was no longer legally Pope; that the Spirit of God was in him (Riel), and that he could tell future events. Dr. Willoughby says: At the commencement he saw Riel. He said his proclamation was at Pembina, that it was going forth, and he would be joined by Indians and half-breeds, and that the United States was at his back. He intended to divide the country into seven portions; he mentioned as parties, Bavarians, Poles, Italians, Germans and Irish. There was to be a New Ireland in the North-West. These nationalities were going to assist him in the rebellion, before the war was over, and they would have their portion. He mentioned the Irish of the United States, the Germans, the Germans, Italians, Bavarians and Poles. He put Germany and Ireland twice; first, the Irish and Germans of the United States, then Germany and Ireland themselves. The proposition did not appear rational to the witness, who also proves the excitement of Riel. Saunderson says: Riel told him that he was going to divide the country into sevenths, one-seventh for Canadians or white settlers, one for the Indians, one for the half-breeds, three-sevenths to remain to support the Government. He said he had cut himself loose from Rome altogether, and would have nothing more to do with the Pope. Walters says: Riel told him that the land was to be divided—one-seventh to the pioneer whites, one-seventh to the French half-breeds, one-seventh to the church and schools, and the balance was to be Government lands. He said that if the whites struck a blow, a thunderbolt from heaven would strike them, that God was with their people. Lash says: He mentioned that he was going to give one-seventh to the Indians and one-seventh to the half-breeds. He had been waiting fifteen years, and at last his opportunity had come. Astley proposed an exchange of prisoners, but Riel came up and said he could not see it in that light, but that he would exchange them for Hon. L. Clarke, Registrar Sproat and McKay. We know what an exchange of prisoners is, but Riel proposed that the most important personages on the other side should be given up to him in lieu of inferior prisoners on the same side whom he had in his hands. Jackson says Riel told him his brother's mind was affected; that it was a judgment on him for opposing Riel. He talked of giving one-seventh of the proceeds of the land to the Poles, one-seventh to the half-breeds, and one-seventh to the Indians, and some to the Hungarians, and so on. I was surprised to hear it stated that it was a mark of sanity in Riel that he should have thought Jackson insane, while we know that inmates of the insane asylums know that their neighbors are insane and discuss the question of their insanity. Mackay had a conversation with Riel. He appeared very excited and said:—

"It was blood, and the first blood they wanted was mine. There were some little dishes on the table, and he got hold of a spoon and said: You have no blood—you are a traitor to your people. Your blood is frozen, and all the little blood you have will be there in five minutes, putting the spoon up to my face and pointing to it. I said: If you think you are benefiting your cause by taking my blood you are quite welcome to it. He called his people and the committee, and wanted to put me on trial for my life, and Garnot got up and went to the table with a sheet of paper, and Gabriel Dumont took a chair on a syrup keg, and Riel called up the witnesses against me. He said I was a liar, and he told them that I had said all the people in that section of the country had risen against them. He said it was not so, that it was only the people in this town. He said he could prove that I was a liar by Thomas Scott."

Then goes on the account of the trial during which Riel was up stairs. And then "When he came down, he, Riel, apologised to me for what he had said, that he did not mean it to me personally, that he had the greatest respect for me personally, but that it was my cause he was speaking against and he wished to show he entertained great respect for me, he also apologised in French to the people there, and he said as I was going out that he was very sorry I was against him. That he would be glad to have me with them, and it was not too late for me to join them yet."

Young says:

"Riel explained that at Duck Lake he gave three commands to fire.

1. In the name of God who made us reply to that.
2. Then they fired and Orozier's men replied: and Riel said: In the name of God the Son who saved us reply to that.
3. In the name of God the Holy Ghost who sanctifies us reply to that."

He gives a like account in less detail to half a dozen witnesses of his actions at that time; and General Middleton says:

"Of course I had heard constantly before about reports of his insanity. I heard for instance one or two of the people that escaped from him, scouts, half-breeds. One man, I remember, told me 'Oh! Riel is mad, he is a fool.' He told me what he was doing at Batoche. So that I really had heard it, but I came to the conclusion he was very far from being mad or a fool."

To that is to be added the prisoner's own conduct at the trial the statements he made, even in the course of his interruptions during the trial, with reference to these points, and then in his addresses. In them, you find him declare that he does not plead insanity, and you find him saying he was showing that calmness which they said he could not show. He obviously, in the address he made to the jury, was doing his best to restrain himself in respect to those matters which had been presented as proofs of his insanity, with the view and in the hope, so far as was consistent with his assumed position, that he might prevent the jury from coming to the conclusion that he was insane. For instance, this extraordinary division of the territory into sevenths among different nationalities was pressed very much. What does he say to that? He says:

"A good deal has been said about the settlement and division of lands, a good deal had been said about that. I do not think my dignity to-day here would allow me to mention the foreign policy, but if I was to explain to you or if I had been allowed to make the questions to witnesses, those questions would have appeared in an altogether different light."

A little after, when the verdict had been given and he was showing his reasons against the sentence, you will find he developed the policy which, at this time he preferred not to do, and restrained himself, as these people often do under similar circumstances, in order to obtain that which he desired, a verdict which would not find him insane. He speaks in the same way, thanking General Middleton and Captain Young for proving him as he believes he is sane. Having touched the question of foreign policy, as he calls it, in the lands, he feels called upon to deal with this question of inspiration, and he attempts to explain that matter. He says:

"It is not to be supposed that the half-breeds acknowledge me as a prophet if they had not seen that I could see something into the future. If I am blessed without measure I can see something into the future, we all see into the future more or less. As what kind of a prophet would I come? Would it be a prophet who could all the time have a stick in his hand and threatening, a prophet of evil? If the half-breeds have acknowledged me as a prophet, if on the other side priests come and say that I am polite, if there are general officers, good men, come into this box and prove that I am polite, prove that I am decent in my manners, in combining all together you have a decent prophet. An insane man cannot withhold his insanity, if I am insane my heart will tell what is in me. Last night while I was taking exercise the spirit who guides and assists me and consoles me, told me that to-morrow somebody will come 't'asider,' and help me. I am consoled by that. While I was recurring to my God, to Our God, I said: But woe to me if you not help me, and those words came to me in the morning: 'In the morning some one will come t'asider, that is to-day.' I said that to my two guards and you can go for the two guards. I told them that if the spirit that directs me is the spirit of truth it is to-day that I expect help. This morning the good doctor who has care of me came to me and said: 'You will speak to-day before the court,' I thought I would not be allowed to speak, those words were given to me to tell me that I would have the liberty to speak. There was one French word in it, it meant, I believe, that there was to be some French influence in it, but the most part English. It is true that my good lawyers from the Province of Quebec have given me good advice. Mr. Nolin came into the box and said that Mr. Riel said that he heard a noise in his bowels and that I told him that it meant something. I wish that he had said what I said, what I wrote on the paper of which he speaks, perhaps he can yet be put in the box. I said to Nolin "Do you hear?" Yes, I said there will be trouble in the North-West and was it so or not, has there been no trouble in the North-West? Besides Nolin knows that among his nationality which is mine, he knows that the half-breeds as hunters can foretell many things perhaps some of you have a special knowledge of it. I have seen half-breeds who say: 'My hand is shaking, this part of my hand is shaking, you will see such a thing to-day,' and it happens. Others will say: 'I feel the flesh of my leg move in such a way, it is a sign of such a thing, and it happens.' They are men who know that I speak right. If the witness spoke of that fact with which he mentioned to show that I was insane he did not remember that perhaps on that point he is insane himself, because the half-breed by the movement of his hand, sometimes of his shoulders, sometimes his leg, can have certain knowledge of what will happen. To bring Sir John to my feet, it was well reported it would appear far more reasonable than it has been made to appear. Mr. Blake, the leader of the Opposition, is trying to bring Sir John to his feet in one way. He never had as much at stake as I had, although the Province of Ontario is great it is not as great as the North-West.

"I am glad that the Crown have proved that I am the leader of the half-breeds in the North-West, I will perhaps be one day acknowledged as more than a leader of the half-breeds, and if I am I will have an opportunity of being acknowledged as a leader of good in this great country.

"One of the witnesses said that I intended to give Upper Canada to the Irish, if he had no mystery he would have seen that Upper Canada could not be given to the Irish without being given to England, he rested only upon his imagination.

"There is another thing about the partition of the lands into seven. I do not know if I am prepared to speak of it here because it would become public information, there is so much at stake that if I explained that theory Canada would not very long remain quiet."

Then, he says about the delegations:

"The half-breeds also know that I told them that I would be punished, that I did not say it of my own responsibility but that I said it in the same way as I had told them other things. It was said to me that the nation would be punished. Why? Because she had consented to leave Rome too quick. What is the meaning of that? There was a discussion about it too quick. They said that they should do it at once. Too quick do's not mean too soon. If we say yes, it shows no consideration to the man. If God wants something and if we say yes, that is not the way to answer him; He wants the conscience to say yes: Oh my God I do thy will; and because the half-breeds quickly separated from Rome in such a quick manner it was disagreeable to God and they were punished, and I told them it would happen—fifty of those who are there can prove it. But you will say: 'You did not put yourself as a prophet.' The nineteenth century is to be treated in certain ways, and it is probably for that reason I have found the word 'Exovede' I prefer to be called one of the flock. I am no more than you are, I am simply one of the flock, equal to the rest. If it is any satisfaction to the doctor to know what kind of insanity I have, if they are going to call my pretensions insanity, I say humbly, through the grace of God I believe I am the prophet of the new world.

"I wish you to believe that I am not trying to play insanity; there is in the manner, in the standing of a man, the proof that he is sincere, not playing. You will say 'What have you got to say?' I have to attend to practical results. Is it practical that you be acknowledged as a prophet? Is it practical to say it? I think if the half-breeds have acknowledged me, as a community, to be a prophet, I have reason to believe that it is beginning to become practical. I do not wish for my satisfaction the name of prophet. Generally the title is accompanied with such a burden, that if there is satisfaction for your vanity there is a check to it."

Then, the moment the verdict was given and the prisoner was called to speak in respect of sentence, he congratulates himself, and thanks the jury for having found him sane, and says: "At least, if I were going to be executed, I would not be executed as an insane man." Then he goes on to say:

"Must not I take advantage of the situation to show that they are right and that I am reasonable, and yesterday, when I said by repeating the evidence which has been given against me, when I said in conclusion that you had a decent prophet, I have just to-day the great opportunity of proving it is so, besides clearing me of the stain of insanity, clearing my career of the stain of insanity. I think the verdict that has been given against me is a proof that I am more than ordinary myself, but that the circumstances and the help that is given is more than ordinary, are more than ordinary, and although I consider myself only as others, yet by the will of God, by his Providence, by the circumstances which have surrounded me for fifteen years, I think that I have been called to do something which at least in the North-West nobody has done yet, and in some way I think that to a certain number of people the verdict against me to-day is a proof that may be I am a prophet, may be Riel is a prophet. He suffers for it. Now, I have been hunted as an elk for fifteen years. David has been seventeen, I think. I would have to be about two years still; if the misfortunes that I have had to go through were to be as long as those of the old David, I would have two years still, but I hope it will come sooner."

Then he proceeds to describe what he had kept concealed in the earlier speech—the question of the lands. He says:

"The half-breeds had a million and the land grant of 1,400,000 acres owned about 9,500,000, if I mistake not, which is about one-seventh of the land of Manitoba. You will see the origin of my insanity and of my foreign policy. One-seventh of the land was granted to the people, to the half-breeds of Manitoba, English and French, Protestant and Catholic. There was no distinction whatever, but in the sub-division, in the allotment of those lands between the half-breeds of Manitoba, it came that they had 240 acres of land. Now, the Canadian Government say, that we will give to the half-breeds of the North-West, 240 acres. If I was insane I would say yes, but as I have had, thank God, all the time, the conscientiousness that I had a certain degree of reason, I have made up my mind to make use of it, and to say that one-seventh of the lands in Manitoba, as the inauguration of a principle in the North-West, had to bring to the half-breeds of the North-West, at least as soon as possible, the guarantee for the future that a seventh of the lands will also be given to them. And seeing and yourself understanding how it is difficult for a small population as the half-breed population to have their voice heard, I said what belongs to us ought to be ours. Our right to the North-West is acknowledged, our co-proprietorship with the Indians is acknowledged, since one-seventh of the lands is given us, but we have not the means to be heard, what will we do? I said to some of my friends: If there is no other way, we will make the people who have no country understand that we have a country here which we have ceded on condition, we want the seventh of the land, and if the bargain is not kept, it is null and void, and we have no right to retreat again, and if we cannot have our seventh of the lands from Canada, we will ask the people of the States, the Italians to come and help us as immigrants, the Irish I will count them."

"Now, it is my turn, I thank you. I count them and I will show you if I made an insane enumeration of the parties. I say, we will invite the Italians of the States, the Irish of the States, the Bavarians of the States, Poles of the States, Belgians of the States, and if they come and help us here to have the seventh, we will give them each a seventh; and to show that we are not fanatics, that we are not partisans, that we do not wish only for the Catholics, but that we have a consideration for those who are not Catholics, I said, we will invite the Danes. We will invite the Swedes, who are numerous in the States, and the Norwegians, to come around, and as there are Indians and half-breeds in British Columbia, and as British Columbia is a part of the immense North-West, we said, not only for ourselves, but speaking for our children, we will make the proposition that if they help us to have our seventh on the two sides of the Rocky Mountains, they will each have a seventh; and if the Jews will help us, and on the condition that they acknowledge Jesus Christ as the Son of God and the only Saviour of human kind, if they help us with their money, we will give them one-seventh. And I said, also, if the principle of giving one-seventh of the lands is good in the North-West, if the principle of giving one-seventh of the lands to the half-breeds in the North-West is good, it ought to be good in the east also, and I said, if it is not possible that our views should be heard, we will—I, as an American citizen—I will invite the Germans of the States and I will say: If you ever have an opportunity of crossing the line in the east, do it, and help the Indians and the half-breeds of the east to have a revenue equivalent to about one-seventh. And what would be the reward of the Germans? The reward of the Germans would be, if they were successful, to take a part of the country and make a new German-Indian world somewhere in British North America. But that is the last resort, and if I had not had a verdict of guilt against me I would have never said it. Yesterday it was just those things that I have avoided to say, when I said, I have a reason not to mention them. And when I said, as one of the witnesses said, that my proclamation was in Pembina, I think I am right, because of this trial. You see that my pretensions is that I can speak a little of the future events: My trial has brought out the question of the seventh, and although no one has explained the things as I do now, still there is enough said about the sevenths of the lands and the division of the lands into sevenths, seven nationalities, while it ought to have been said between ten nationalities, that by telegraph to-day my proclamation is in Pembina truly, and the States have my ideas. They have my ideas. . . . And Gabriel Dumont, on the other side of the line, is that Gabriel Dumont inactive? I believe not. He is trying to save me from this box. This is no threat. I have written it. I have written a document of that kind, and put it in the hands of Captain Dean, three weeks ago. This is not an inspiration of the moment. I have the right to thank God for the prevision of what happens to-day. But there is another means. I don't wish these means."

Then he reverts to it again, and says :

"My heart will never abandon the idea of having a new Ireland in the North-West, by constitutional means, inviting the Irish of the other side of the sea to come and have a share here ; a new Poland in the North-West, by the same way ; a new Bavaria by the same way ; a new Italy in the same way. And on the other side in Manitoba—and since Manitoba has been erected it has been increased since 1870, at least by 9,600,000 acres of land, now it is 86,000,000, say there is about 86,000,000 acres of land to which the half-breeds title has not been extinguished. One seventh gives 12,000,000 of those lands—and I want French Canadians to come and help us there to-day, to-morrow, I don't know when I am called here to answer for my life to have time that I should make my testimony. And on the other side of the mountain there are Indians, as I have said, and half-breeds, and there is a beautiful island, Vancouver, and I think the Belgians will be happy there, and the Jews who are looking for a country for 1,800 years, the knowledge of which the nations have not been able to attain yet, while they are rich and the lords of finance. Perhaps will they hear my voice one day and on the other side of the mountains while the waves of the Pacific will chaunt sweet music for them to console their hearts for the mourning of 1,800 years, perhaps will they say : He is the one thought of us in the whole Oree world, and if they help us there on the other side between the great Pacific and the great Rockies to have a share, the Jews from the States."

Then he says :

"The Scandinavians, if possible, they will have a share. It is my plan, it is one of the illusions of my insanity, if I am insane, that they should have on the other side of the mountain a new Norway, a new Denmark, and a new Sweden, so that those who spoke of the lands of the great North-West to be divided in seven forgot that it was in ten, the French in Manitoba, the Bavarians, the Italians, the Poles and the Irish in the North-West, and then five on the other side too."

Then again he says :

"Not insanity, because it is disposed of, but whether I am a deceiver or an imposter. I have said to my lawyers : 'I have written things which were said to me last night, and which have taken place to-day.' I said that before the court opened last night the spirit that guides and assists me told me : 'The court will make an effort.' Your honor, allow me to speak of your charge, which appeared to me to go on one side. The court, made an effort, and I think that word was justified. At the same time there was another thing said to me : 'A commission will sit; there will be a commission.' I did not hear yet that a commission is to take place. I asked for it. You will see if I am an imposter thereby."

"In Batoche many things which I said have already happened. It was said to me : 'Not far from here.' And that is why I never wanted to send the half-breeds far. I wanted to keep them, and it was said to me : 'I will not begin to work before 12 o'clock' and when the first battle opened I was taking my dinner at Duck Lake. When the battle began it was a little after 12 o'clock. 'I will not begin to work before 12 o'clock.' And what has happened? And it was said to me : 'If you don't meet the troops on such a road you will have to meet them at the foot of a hill, and the half-breeds facing it.' It is said my papers have been published. If they have been published examine what took place, and you will see we had to meet General Middleton at the foot of the hill. It was also told me that men would stay in the belle prairie, and the spirit spoke of those who would remain on the belle prairie, and there were men who remained on the belle prairie."

Now, these were the events of the trial itself, and apart altogether from the evidence which is before us, although not official. There was, besides, the evidence of the other medical witnesses. Dr. Clark was called and examined. He had examined Riel three times, had heard the evidence, and if he was not feigning, he was insane to the limit of irresponsibility. But it takes long to find out that a man is insane. Dr. Wallace, who, I believe, is the Superintendent of the Hamilton Lunatic Asylum, examined him once and heard the evidence. He could only say that he did not find out—he might be insane. It takes long to find out whether a man is insane. Dr. Jukes, who was a specialist, and was the police surgeon in charge of the prisoner, had never examined or tested him at all. He also says it takes a long time to find out, though he had not found out anything to show his insanity. Now I do not, myself, believe that it can be at all seriously contended that this man was feigning. The old insanity had recurred. They were the same sort of views which he had expressed during the old insanity. He was most anxious to avoid the imputation of insanity, and to this end he restrained himself at the trial, to a considerable extent in his expressions. He was artful in his insanity, as often happens, and what he wanted was to show that he was a genuine prophet. All the symptoms which are stated in cases of feigned insanity are symptoms which indicate that this man's insanity was not feigned. Taylor says :

"Insanity is frequently feigned by persons accused of criminal offences in order to procure an acquittal or discharge. In the first place, when this is suspected, it will be proper to enquire whether the party had any motive for feigning the malady. It is necessary to remember that insanity is never assumed until after the commission of a crime and the actual detention of a criminal. No one feigns insanity merely to avoid suspicion. In general, as in most cases of imposition, the part is over-acted—the person does either too much or too little, and he betrays himself by inconsistencies of conduct and language which are never met with in cases of real insanity. There is commonly some probable cause to which real insanity may be traced, but when the malady is feigned there is no apparent cause; in this case the appearance of the assumed insanity is always sudden; in the real malady the progress of the attack is generally gradual, and when the attack is really sudden, then it will be found to be due to some great moral shock, or other very obvious cause."

"We should observe whether there has been any marked change of character in the individual, or whether his conduct, when he had no interest to feign, was such as it is now observed to be."

The same learned author says :

"I am indebted to a learned judge for the following note on feigned insanity:—'It may be safely held that a person feigning insanity will rarely if ever try to prove himself to be sane—for he runs the great risk of satisfying others that he is sane—the conclusion he desires to avoid. There is no better proof in general that the insanity (supposing other evidence of it to be strong) is real than in the keen and eager attempts by the accused to prove that he is sane, and strong and indignant remonstrances against being held to be insane, though that would protect himself against trial and punishment. In one case, at Edinburgh, some doubt existed whether a party was feigning insanity, and some of those about him, and in charge of him in gaol, from his clearness and coherence, were satisfied that he was quite sane, and that what he exhibited was merely eccentricity, or simulated attempts to act as a mad man. Insane he certainly was beyond all doubt; but he fought the point of his sanity most bravely in court. He made very clear and quick remarks upon the evidence of the medical men, who had no doubt of his entire insanity; and when one physician of great experience with insane persons stated that he thought him quite incapable of giving information to counsel and agents for conducting his defence, he said instantly: 'Then, why did you advise me to apply to see counsel and agents?'"

Now, Sir, my clear conclusion from this evidence is that in the evidence at the trial there was overwhelming proof of great disorder of intellect, of insane delusions on religious and political topics, those very topics out of which the acts grew. Now it is unnecessary to enquire for the purpose of the issue before us whether those disorders were so great as, by our law, to justify a verdict of not guilty on the ground of insanity. On that point minds will differ as to whether it was great enough or not. Assume, if you please—and I think there is great force in the proposition—that, dealing with the verdict of the jury and with the judgment of the court in Manitoba, you may not unfairly argue that it was indicated strongly so far as the evidence at the trial went—that the conclusion was that he was not so irresponsible within the meaning of the law so as to have a verdict of not guilty returned—though that conclusion would not accord with my own individual opinion—but assume that. Give the verdict all its just weight, omit the very strong point to which my hon. friend from East Quebec alluded, the evidence in the case of Jackson which I have read in the imperfect report we got in the newspapers, in which Dr. Jukes seems to have sworn that, with the exception of something said about his not speaking rationally all the while, his delusions were much the same as Riel's and on which evidence he was found insane—I say that assuming, if you please, that the disorder was not so serious as to render the prisoner wholly irresponsible, so deciding you justify the verdict of guilty and having justified the verdict of guilty you by no means rid the Executive from very grave duties. Now, upon this question there are very serious errors largely prevailing in the public mind. It is common talk, and this House has not been wholly free from that common talk, that there should be no interference with the verdict or sentence in capital cases—talk which, if it were acted on, would render it impossible to maintain capital punishment on the Statute-book for twelve months in any civilised country. Now, I shall prove the errors of this view by statistics. By the statistics of the administration of justice in England and Wales, during ten years before 1863, the proportion of convictions to committals for all classes of crimes taken together, was 70 to 71 per cent.; and I may say that there is a curious run of similarity in many years in both England and Canada in that regard. But for murder during those ten years the proportion of convictions to committals was only $23\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., or one-third of the number of convictions and committals for all cases. While thus you find, in the first place, that a much smaller proportion of persons in proportion to those charged were convicted of murder than in the general run, you find the proportion of executions to the convictions for murder was but 60 per cent., and that 40 per cent. were commuted. In the 20 years from 1861 to 1880 there were 512 capital sentences for murder. Out of those there were only 79 executions, or $54\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and 233 not executed, or $45\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. In the 5 years from 1880 to 1884 there were 168 capital sentences. Out of these only 80 executions took place, or 48 per cent., 88 were not executed, or 52 per cent. Thus there are now fewer executions in proportion to sentences than there were. In the first period I gave you there were something more than half, during the second period there were fewer but still a little more than half, but for the last available period less than half those sentenced were executed. Let me give you the individual cases which came before Mr. Justice Stephen in three years. He sentenced ten persons to death; four were executed, six commuted, four because the means by which they caused death were neither intended nor in themselves likely to cause death. In these cases, under an improved definition, the prisoners would have been found guilty of manslaughter; one, because after the conviction it appeared probable that he had received provocation, and to reduce the offence to manslaughter; one because the convict was subject to epileptic fits, which rendered her frequently unconscious and had permanently impaired her powers, though she was probably not insane at the moment. Judge Stephen had not the least doubt when he passed sentence as to the cases in which there would be commutation and execution. In France, by the evidence taken in 1864, the persons found guilty of murder in four years, from 1859 to 1862 were 1,368; of these 1,228, or nine-tenths, were found guilty with extenuating circumstances, leaving only 140 or one-tenth guilty, and liable to death. These were the very worst cases, yet of these about one-half only were executed and the rest were commuted. The English Commission on Capital Punishment state the custom in France as follows:—

“Whether the convict has or has not sued for pardon or commutation of penalty, the case is always examined by a commission at the Ministry of Justice, and by the advice of this commission the execution either takes place or the penalty is commuted, unless the Emperor should take the initiative; his right of pardon has no limit.”

Now take Ontario and Quebec, in the four years, 1880 to 1883, according to the criminal statistics brought down by the hon. gentleman opposite, there were ninety-six persons charged with murder; twenty-six only were convicted or twenty-seven per cent., thirteen only were left for execution; every second sentence was commuted. During the same four years seventy per cent. of those charged with all crimes were convicted; and the commutations (including murder and second commutations in capital cases) were only one in 350, and of these many were due to ill-health. The result is that of 500 charged with all crimes 350 are convicted, and of these 349 or more suffer the sentence of the law, so that practically the sentence is executed in all these cases. But of the 500 charged with murder only 135 are convicted instead of 350, the general average; of the 135 only 67 or 68 suffer the sentence of the law, or one out of two, instead of 349 out of 350 the general average. Of the 500 charged with murder only sixty-seven are convicted and suffer the sentence of the law, or less than twelve per cent. of the committals; while out of 500 charged with all crimes 349 or more are convicted and suffer the sentence of the law, or seventy per cent. of the committals—nearly six times as many as in capital cases. What is the general result? The general result of these statistics is that in England, in France, in Ontario and Quebec there is a more careful sifting in the preliminary process before verdict in the capital cases than there is in the general average of crime. There is a greater reluctance to convict, there is a greater tendency to acquit, and so there is a very much smaller proportion of persons charged with that particular offence, the capital offence, who are convicted, than of those who are charged with other offences. What follows? It is that it is in the residuum, the worst cases, the plainest cases, the most obvious cases alone that conviction takes place, and after that preliminary sifting which results in the most obvious and plainest cases only, leading to conviction in cases of charges of murder, yet, while only one in 350 of all classes of sentences is commuted, in capital cases in Ontario and Quebec one out of every two is commuted or 175 out of 350. Why is it that we do not interfere with other sentences, and yet we interfere to such an enormous extent with these particular sentences, capital sentences? The reason is perfectly obvious. It is because there are various classes and degrees of moral guilt in the same legal offence having the same legal definition, and because in all other cases than cases of capital sentence the judge has a discretion to apportion the punishment to the particular circumstances of the case. He does so. He tempers justice with mercy himself; he considers the palliating circumstances; he considers among other things the state of mind and degree of responsibility; he exercises a wide discretion, he may have a right to commit a man for life or for one hour, for a long term of years or a month. The law gives it to him because the law feels that in all these classes of cases, of larceny, of intent to commit murder, of assault, or of what crime you will, it is impossible to predicate the same degree of moral guilt, and therefore that it is essential to provide some machinery by which, to some extent, the punishment awarded shall be proportionate to the degree of guilt in the specific case. But in capital cases there are not less—there are even more—shades of guilt than there are in other cases. No one will dispute that; no one who has read the interesting but harrowing accounts of murder trials but must agree that there are all sorts and shades of guilt in the commission of that which, according to the law of the land, is yet always murder. And yet, in that particular case, the judge has not any discretion at all. He must pronounce the only sentence, the ultimate sentence, the maximum sentence, the sentence which is the worst and severest sentence now applied, not to all murderers, but to the worst murderers. But there is a discretion notwithstanding. There is no reason why, in this particular case, there should not be somewhere that discretion which exists in other cases—not as the part of mercy, not as a part of the prerogative of mercy, but as part of the administration of criminal justice which in other cases is vested in the judge. It is impossible to say that you should not find in the case of murder the discretion to apportion the punishment to the moral guilt, when you give it by your Statute books in all the other cases in the land. For reasons which I need not discuss, the discretion is not in capital cases vested in the judge. The reasons may be satisfactory or unsatisfactory, it is no matter; but, in fact, that discretion rests in capital cases, not with the judge, but with the Executive, and in this case the Ministers discharge under the law of the land a duty which is part of the administration of criminal justice, and which in all other cases is, under the law of the land, discharged by the judge who tries the case and awards the sentence. They have combined and commingled also the prerogative of mercy strictly so called, as distinguished from this part of the administration of justice, the prerogative which they exercise with reference to all cases. If they think the judge's sentence is too severe, they may—though I am glad to say the power is rarely exercised—commute a severe sentence by the judge. That is a distinct exercise of the prerogative of mercy, and in the capital cases they have, as a matter of course, to consider the two positions, and they are commonly and properly considered together; the whole case and the circumstances are considered together. Now, I think I have shown you perfectly plainly and perfectly clearly that there is the most marked distinction that can be conceived between the capital sentence and its execution and all other sentences and their execution. I might put it to you in another point of view, in this way: the case would be the same in kind, though not in degree, if your law, for all other crimes than the capital crimes, obliged the judge to award the maximum sentence which the law now awards for the particular crime. Then you would immediately have the Executive necessarily invaded with applications, as a branch of the administration of criminal justice. They would say: Your law has made no distinction at all, yet the moral guilt and the degree of responsibility varies, and in this case it is very light, and yet there is a twenty years' sentence; you must mitigate. You accomplish this result by another operation in all cases of capital sentence. You do it by the operation of the Executive in the case of a capital sentence. Thus the capital sentence is not in the sense which has been applied to it, the sentence of the law with reference to the capital crime. It is the extreme sentence of the law. It is not the rule to execute that sentence. In Ontario and Quebec, as many sentences are commuted as are executed, and in England and Wales, more. There it is the exception to execute, and why? Because it is not fitting there any more than in other cases to apply as a rule the extreme, the maximum penalty of the law to this class of crimes. Now, Sir, I have spoken up to this point of the capital offence of murder, because it is in practice—or was in practice until the 16th of November, in modern times—the only capital offence. The old law as to high treason, of course, remains, but milder views have long prevailed with reference to political offences. Since June, 1848, in England, and since a later period here, the same offences precisely, the same character of offences may be, and since that time, as far as I know, have always been in England, tried under the milder Act as treason-felony in respect of which the maximum sentence is imprisonment for life. I do not mean that this observation applies to isolated acts of murder which are generally excluded from amnesties and are tried as such. If, therefore, there be any distinction with reference to the application of the general principles of the administration of criminal justice to which I have adverted and which I have established, if there be any distinction between murder and treason, it is not what has been intimated from the other side. It is not that your law is more severe in the case of treason; it is that your law is milder in the case of treason. It is that while you continue in the case of murder to provide only the machinery under which the sentence must be capital, yet you have provided in the case of treason, and you have used in every case in the North-West except one, a milder procedure, another law in respect to which the maximum penalty is imprisonment for life for the same offence. There is the distinction as it is enshrined in the Statute-book in England and in Canada, and you cannot from that make out this conclusion which hon. gentlemen opposite have made of treason as the highest crime. I know there is a sense in which it may be so regarded. You may talk about the life of the State, the body politic, the corporation, and so on; but I think I shall show before I sit down how much there is in all that. The distinction, then, is that. Now, Sir, I ask what more is to be said, after this statement, of its being a duty on the part of the Executive to carry out the sentence of the law? I maintain that there is no duty on the part of the Executive, to leave the law to take its course, when, in this particular case, it is the maximum punishment which the law obliges the judge to award, and when as I have shown, as often as not, that maximum punishment is not inflicted. In truth and in fact, disguise it how you will, in England, in France, in Canada, it is the Executive that awards the real sentence of the law in capital cases; and in this particular case the duty of the Executive was emphasised and enlarged by the special provision in the North-West Territories Act, which having a due regard, or some regard, to the comparative weakness of the tribunal and the circumstances of the case, made a special provision under which the sentence was not to be executed until the pleasure of the Executive was known; which the learned Chief Justice of Manitoba described as providing, in fact, three trials: First, before the judge and jury; secondly, before the court in Manitoba; and thirdly, before the court in Ottawa—the Executive of the country. Now, Sir, I propose to reinforce the position which I have taken as flowing inevitably from the statistics and the reasoning which I have given you, as to the principles and the practice of the exercise of what is called the prerogative of mercy; and first of all, let me deal with it in capital cases generally. I quote from the same learned authority to which I before referred, Sir James Stephen's work:

"The subject of the discretion exercised by the judges in common cases, and by the Executive Government (practically the Home Secretary) in capital cases appears to me to be little understood. As to this it must be remembered that it is practically impossible to lay down an inflexible rule by which the same punishment must in every case be inflicted in respect of every crime falling within a given definition, because the degrees of moral guilt and public danger involved in offences which bear the same name and fall under the same definition must of necessity vary. There must therefore be a discretion in all cases as to the punishment to be inflicted. This discretion must from the nature of the case be vested either in the judge who tries the case or in the Executive Government or in the two acting together.

"From the earliest period of our history to the present day the discretion in misdemeanor at common law has been vested in the judge. The cases which still continue to be capital—practically murder and treason—supply the only instances worth noticing in which the judge has no discretion. The discretion in such cases is vested in the Secretary of State.

"It was never intended that capital punishment should be inflicted whenever sentence of death was passed. Even when the criminal law was most severe the power of pardon was always regarded as supplementary to it, and as supplying that power of mitigating sentences of death which the words of the law refused.

"The power of pardon, in the exercise of which Her Majesty, advised by the Home Secretary, still remains unaltered, and in respect of capital sentences, it answers the purpose fulfilled in other cases by the discretionary power entrusted to the judges. The fact that the punishment or death is not inflicted in every case in which sentence of death is inflicted, proves nothing more than that murder, as well as other crimes, has its degrees, and that the extreme punishment which the law awards ought not to be carried out in all cases."

He says further:

"I am strongly of opinion that capital punishments should be retained and that they should be extended to some cases in which offenders are at present liable to them; but I am also of opinion that no definition which can ever be formed, will include all murders, for which the offender ought to be put to death and exclude all those for which secondary punishment would be sufficient.

"The most careful definition will cover crimes involving many different degrees, both of moral guilt and of public danger; moreover, those murders which involve the greatest public danger, may involve far less moral guilt than those which involve little public danger."

"The question of the necessary disproportion between gradations of crime and gradations of punishment is brought to the most perplexing issue in the case of the punishment of death. This punishment has the following characteristics as distinguished from all others: It admits in itself of no gradation; it is irrevocable; and it is more different in kind from all other punishments than they are from each other. * * * Murder is the offense to which the punishment of death is now almost universally restricted."

Then the Commission on Capital Punishment declared :

"There is one point upon which the witnesses whom we have examined are almost unanimous, viz., that the power of directing sentence of death to be recorded should be restored to the judges. We think this change desirable."

What was that? There was a power for some time allowed the judge, instead of passing the sentence of death, to permit it to be recorded, which was equivalent to a reprieve, and was invariably followed by a commutation, thus granting to the judge some measure of that judicial discretion, which here is applied wholly by the Executive. Then, if you deal with cases of political offence, as has already been pointed out, the severity of the law has been mitigated in France by the constitution of 1848, which abolished the punishment of death en matière politique. Now, let me come to the mode and extent of the exercise of this prerogative in these cases. The Commission on Capital Punishment examined, among others, Mr. Walpole, the Home Secretary. Mr. Hardy asks him :

"Q. You have the Chancellor and other judges ; in addition to that, I think you will remember that in your own time there was one case in which it became very important to ascertain the facts with regard to the locality?—A. Certainly.

"Q. And do you remember that you there authorised an intelligent person upon the spot to have the distances measured to show whether they were in conformity with the evidence, which was impugned upon that ground?—A. Certainly, I did."

So that you find that examinations of that kind took place where evidence given at the trial was impugned in order to test whether it was really accurate or not. Again, the Royal Commission on Indictable Offences, composed of the learned Judges Blackburn, Barry, Lush, and Stephen, report thus :

"Cases in which, under some peculiar state of facts, a miscarriage of justice takes place, may sometimes though rarely occur; but when they occur it is under circumstances for which fixed rule of procedure cannot provide.

"Experience has shown that the Secretary of State is a better judge of the existence of such circumstances than a court of justice can be. He has every facility for enquiring into the special circumstances; he can and does, if necessary, avail himself of the assistance of the judge who tried the case, and of the law officers. The position which he occupies is a guarantee of his known fitness to form an opinion. He is fettered by no rule, and his decision does not form a precedent for subsequent cases. We do not see how a better means could be provided for inquiry into the circumstances of the exceptional cases in question. The powers of the Secretary of State, however, as to disposing of the cases which come before him are not as satisfactory as his power of inquiring into their circumstances. He can advise Her Majesty to remit or commute a sentence; but, to say nothing of the inconsistency of pardoning a man for an offence on the ground that he did not commit it, such a course may be unsatisfactory. The result of the inquiries of the Secretary of State may be to show, not that the convict is clearly innocent, but that the propriety of the conviction is doubtful; that matters were left out of account which ought to have been considered; or that too little importance was attached to a view of the case, the bearing of which was not sufficiently apprehended at the trial."

Rather extensive powers, Sir. Then, I refer to a series of authorities of the highest character, being the explanations which have been given by successive Home Secretaries in the British Parliament, with reference to the discharge of their functions. In 1835, with regard to the Dorchester laborers, Lord Russell, then Home Secretary, said :

"What I have to say is, that in this case, as in any other that may be brought before me, whether in the House or out of it, I do not hold myself precluded from entering upon the consideration of any facts or circumstances that may come to my knowledge, or from forming a judgment upon them without reserve."

Lord Loughborough, who was at one time Chief Justice, said in the House of Lords :

"That he had tried prisoners who had been capitally convicted, and he had carefully examined and revised all the circumstances of their cases without being able to find a single reason which would justify his recommending mercy to be extended to them, and he had reported to the Government that he did not think himself warranted in saying that they were entitled to favorable consideration, and yet mercy had been extended to them more than once, and, he verily believed, on fair and just principles."

Sir Geo. Grey, Home Secretary, said :

"I cannot accept the doctrine of the hon. member, that the Secretary of State is bound to consider the verdict of a jury in a capital case as absolutely final, and to refuse to investigate any alleged facts which may be stated to him tending to alter the view of the case submitted to the judge and jury. The duty of a Secretary of State would be easy if in all cases he refused to receive any appeal for mercy founded upon facts not stated at the trial. But he cannot shrink from the performance of the duty which is now imposed upon him however painful it may be; if he did his conduct would meet with universal condemnation."

Mr. Home Secretary Walpole said, that a murder referred to was one of aggravated enormity and barbarity; yet the sentence was commuted. Again Mr. Gathorne Hardy, Home Secretary, said :

"After the trial and condemnation facts might come out which it would be desirable to sift; and however long it might be after a man's conviction, if circumstances transpired showing that the conviction was unjust, or throwing such a doubt on it as to make it clear that there ought to be some interference, there must necessarily be some authority to exercise the prerogative of mercy."

Mr. Secretary Walpole, said :

"Do not it be supposed that I think that the Home Secretary has not a very large power vested in him of advising the Crown to exercise its prerogative of mercy. I think there is such a power vested in him, not for the purpose of re-hearing a case which can only be properly reheard before a judge and jury, but for the purpose of taking into consideration not only the facts proved at the trial, but any other facts and circumstances that may be brought to light subsequently, of weighing them, and of determining whether, under all the circumstances, it is his duty to recommend the Crown to exercise its prerogative of mercy, and to mitigate the severity of punishment. In no case, however, should he interfere against the decision both of judge and jury, unless the case is so plain as to leave no reasonable doubt on the mind of any intelligent man that a great injustice had been done."

Mr. Gathorne Hardy, Home Secretary, said :

"Certainly, in this instance, the jury did not neglect their duty, but found a verdict of 'wilful murder' in a case which was undoubtedly one of wilful murder according to the law of this country. As far as I am concerned in this transaction, I have no hesitation in explaining all that has taken place in regard to it. * * * The memorial was sent down to the judge, and by return of post I received an answer in which the judge recommended that the sentence of death should be commuted to penal servitude."

And it was commuted. On the Bill to abolish capital punishment which came up in 1869, Mr. Secretary Bruce, said :

"He would undertake to say that the law (as to capital punishment) could not exist at all were it not for the large discretionary power entrusted to the Home Secretary, which devolved upon him duties, not only of the most difficult, but of the most painful character. * * *

"It was hard, for instance, to justify the continued existence of a law under which it was not merely in the power, but became absolutely the duty of the Secretary of State to remit sentences of death solemnly passed by a judge after verdict found by the jury. In accordance with long tradition in his office, it was the duty of the Home Secretary to remit the extreme sentence in all cases of infanticide. Another custom which had grown to be invariable—at least he had not been able to find a single exception—was that no sentence of death was ever inflicted in a case where, in the opinion of the judge, it ought not to be inflicted. Everybody acquainted with the subject, must be aware that after every assize there were judges who hastened to inform the Home Secretary, that although, according to the definition of law, the jury had been right in finding the prisoner guilty of murder, and although the judge was himself bound to pass sentence of death, yet, in his opinion, that sentence ought not to be carried into execution. Then no inconsiderable number of cases arose where the judge passed sentence of death, himself disagreeing with the jury. In the two latter classes of cases, the Home Secretary, whether he agreed with the opinion of the judge or not, was bound, according to the practice, to abandon his own opinion and act upon that of the judge—morally bound, he meant; of course, for there was no legal obligation resting upon him beyond the precedents invariably recognised by his predecessors."

Mr. Bruce again said :

"A third class of cases, extremely difficult to deal with, and exposing the holder of the office to comments, harsh and very frequently unjust, was when fresh evidence arose after the conviction of the offender, and he must say that, in his opinion, this was the weakest part of our present system, and one deserving the most serious consideration of the Legislature. The case was that of a very poor class of persons, who either were unable to obtain legal assistance, or, from their position or perhaps from their previous character, excited but little sympathy in the neighborhood, and facts which might have told in their favor were not brought out till the consciences of those acquainted with those facts were aroused by the impending death of the convicts. Cases such as these were by no means infrequent. In his short experience he had already had two or three signal instances in which evidence of the most unbounded importance had been kept back, either from want of means on the part of the prisoner to have his case properly investigated, or from want of interest on the part of those by whom the evidence could be given."

Then on the remission of capital punishment Mr. Bruce said :

"It is well that the House and country should understand how in these cases, which so often offend the honest opinion of the public, there is apparent discrepancy between the opinion of judge and jury on the one hand and that of the Home Secretary on the other. It arises from this—that the jury is obliged to find, from the direction of the judge, a verdict of wilful murder, and that the judge is constantly required to pass a sentence of death, when it is quite certain it will not, cannot, ought not, to be executed. Such is the state of the law, and so long as it is the state of the law it is absolutely impossible but that the decision of the Secretary of State must occasionally be in discord with the finding of the jury and the sentence of the judge."

On another occasion, he said :

"I may here mention another case which was brought under my notice more recently. A prisoner was entirely undefended, not a palliative circumstance was adduced on his trial for murder, and he was consequently convicted and sentenced to death; but other evidence was afterwards brought forward which, in the opinion of the judge, would, if laid before the jury, have turned the scale in favor of the prisoner and shown that he was guilty of manslaughter instead of murder."

Mr. Bruce says again :

"While the law respecting murder remains as it is, and while the spectacle is so often seen of judges and juries dissenting—the one from the verdict and the other from the sentence which, in accordance with law, they are obliged to pass—there must be lodged somewhere the power of administering the prerogative of mercy."

Lord Penzance says :

"Now, independently of the cases in which the punishment of death has been commuted, it has, I believe, been the practice for many years of the Home Office to mitigate severe sentences."

Mr. Trevelyan, Irish Secretary, said :

"I am glad to have an opportunity of saying a word about the Kilmartin case. If His Excellency erred at all in that case, he erred on the right side. In the last paragraph of his letter it is stated :

"His Excellency has determined to release Kilmartin. He does so without impeaching the correctness of the original conviction, or the bona fides of Heron; but, subsequent information having created some doubt as to the identification of Kilmartin, His Excellency feels himself enabled to exercise the prerogative of mercy on Kilmartin's behalf."

So late as 1884, Mr. Gladstone, in a great debate to which I shall have occasion subsequently to allude, said this :

"The constitution of this country knows nothing of criminal appeal, properly so called, nothing of the retrial of cases, as was explained by the Home Secretary last night. It knows of the reference to the responsible Minister, who, surrounded by the very best advisers, and acting under the deepest sense of responsibility, is entitled to exercise the prerogative of mercy. That mode of operation you begin by excluding, because what you are asking for is not a further investigation of the question by the responsible officer of the Queen, but it is a full and public enquiry, a description to which his operation could not correspond."

I think I have sufficiently established the accuracy of my statement, and enlarged even my own statement by these proofs of the extensive powers and consequential duties of the Executive in exercising this branch of the administration of criminal justice, particularly in capital cases, but before I pass to the question of what should be done in cases of insanity and the specialties of those cases, I wish to make an allusion, at this point, to the effect of the recommendation to mercy. The hon. member from Ottawa, quoted a portion of a passage, which I deem it my duty to read, from Sir James Stephens' book :

"There is one other point on which the English and French systems are strongly contrasted. This is the French system of circumstances atténuantes and the English system of recommendations to mercy. The finding of circumstances atténuantes by a French jury ties the hands of the court and compels them to pass a lighter sentence than they otherwise would be entitled to pass. It gives a permanent legal effect to the first impressions of seven out of twelve altogether irresponsible persons upon the most delicate of all questions connected with the administration of justice—the amount of punishment which, having regard to its moral enormity and also to its political and social danger, ought to be awarded to a given offence. These are I think matters which require mature and deliberate considerations by the persons best qualified by their position and their previous training to decide upon them. In all cases not capital the discretion is by our law vested in the judges. In capital cases it is practically vested in the Secretary for the Home Department advised by the judge, and inasmuch as such questions always attract great public interest and attention and are often widely discussed by the press, there is little fear that full justice will not be done. To put such a power into the hands of seven jurymen to be exercised irrevocably upon a first impression is not only to place a most important power in most improper hands, but is also to deprive the public of any opportunity to influence a decision in which it is deeply interested.

"Jurymen having given their decision disappear from public notice, their very names being unknown. A Secretary of State or a judge is known to every one, and may be made the mark of the most searching criticism, to say nothing of the political consequences which in the case of a Secretary of State may arise from mistakes in the discharge of his duty. On the other hand one English system allows the jury to exercise at least as much influence on the degree of punishment to be inflicted on those whom they may convict as they ought to have. It is true that the recommendation to mercy of an English jury has no legal effect and is no part of their verdict, but it is invariably considered with attention and is generally effective."

"In cases where the judge has a discretion as to the sentence, he always makes it lighter when the jury recommend the prisoner to mercy. In capital cases, where he has no discretion, he invariably in practice informs the Home Secretary at once of the recommendation, and it is frequently, perhaps generally, followed by a commutation of the sentence. This seems to me infinitely preferable to the system of circumstances atténuantes. Though the impression of a jury ought always to be respectfully considered, it is often founded on mistaken grounds, and is sometimes a compromise. It is usual to ask the reason of the recommendation, and I have known at least one case in which this was followed first by silence and then by withdrawal of the recommendation. I have also known cases in which the judge has said: 'Gentlemen, you would hardly have recommended this man to mercy if you had known as I do that he has been repeatedly convicted of similar offences.' There are also cases in which the recommendation is obviously founded on a doubt of the prisoner's guilt, and in such cases I have known the judge tell the jury that they ought to reconsider the matter, and either acquit or convict simply, the prisoner being entitled to an acquittal if the doubt seems to the jury reasonable. This will often lead to an acquittal."

Then I refer to two cases in which Home Secretaries have expressed their views on the subject. In the case of the convict Wager, Mr. Walpole said :

"His first impression was that it was a case of such barbarity and cruelty that it was proper that the law should take its course. On the other hand, he found that the jury recommended the criminal to mercy. Moreover, he felt that in this, as in all similar cases, it was his duty to appeal to the judge who tried the criminal, and he did so without intimating any opinion one way or the other. The learned judge had twice favored him with his opinion, and he would read a portion of the report. It was as follows :—

"The murder was not premeditated, and I do not think that when he commenced the pursuit after his wife he intended that act of violence which he afterwards made use of. I am, therefore, of opinion that the case is not an unfit one for the exercise of the prerogative of mercy."

"After the recommendation of the jury, expressed not only at the time when the verdict was given, but since conveyed to him in stronger language than the original recommendation was couched in; and after the deliberate opinion of the judge that the case was, in his opinion, not unfit for the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, he did not think that he could have taken any other course than the one he adopted, and the sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life."

In another case, the case of John Toomer, the same Home Secretary said :

"Perhaps, upon this point, I shall not transgress my duty by saying that from the very beginning I thought the punishment to which Toomer was sentenced was so severe that it ought not to stand. I never had the slightest hesitation upon that point, but that question has never been brought before me. The reason why I thought the punishment ought not to stand was, because I felt that the jury's recommendation to mercy, founded probably upon some indiscretion of the prosecutrix, should have been attended to."

Now, I ventured to observe, on the only occasion on which I have spoken in public on this case until to-day, that it was a matter of regret that the jury were not asked to state what their reason was for the recommendation—I do not mean by the Executive, of course, but by the judge at the trial, as it was fitting that he should have done. We had some public information given to us from a source which I suppose hon. gentleman will not challenge as distinctly unfriendly to them or as being biassed in any way against them. At the time of the trial, the Mail correspondent at that trial telegraphed to the Mail newspaper as follows :—

"RÉGINA, N.W.T., 3rd August.—Three of the jurors in Riel's case tell me that the meaning of that recommendation to mercy is that in their opinion Riel should not be hanged, as they think that, while he is not absolutely insane in the ordinary accepted meaning of the word, he is a very decided 'crank.' The other three jurors I have not been able to see, but this is their view also. Most of the witnesses for the Crown admitted on cross-examination that Riel, in their estimation, was 'not all there'; and this, with the testimony of the experts and that of Rev. Father André, of Prince Albert, who fought with might and main against Riel during the agitation which culminated in the rebellion, produced a profound impression upon the minds of the jury. Lastly, the jury saw and heard the prisoner in the box."

That was the only information which, at the time I spoke, I had as to the meaning of the recommendation. A gentleman residing in the North-West, with whom I had no acquaintance, wrote to me, stating that he had seen the statement made that it was not known what the meaning of the recommendation was, and he enclosed to me a letter addressed to himself from one of the jury, which I think it necessary to give to the House as the only information I have had since on the subject, given to me without any solicitation on my part, and simply coming in the way I have stated. That letter is as follows:—

"MY DEAR SIR,—In answer to your enquiries regarding our verdict, &c., in the Riel trial, I would say that as a friend I have no objections whatever to giving you our reasons for recommending the prisoner to the mercy of the Crown, but I would ask you as a favor not to make public my name or residence.

"The judge, in his charge, told us distinctly that we must take into consideration these two points, the prisoner's implication in the rebellion and the state of his mind at the time. He said: 'If you are perfectly satisfied in your own mind that the prisoner was implicated in the rebellion, directly or indirectly, and at the same time able to distinguish between right and wrong, you must bring him in guilty; if, on the other hand, you find him implicated in the rebellion, but of unsound mind, you must bring him in not guilty, and state, on account of his insanity.' This was the purport of the charge, although by no means the whole of it.

"After we had retired to consider the verdict, our foreman asked each and every one of us the following questions:—'Is the prisoner guilty or not guilty? and, is he sane or insane?' We each answered in our turn. Guilty and perfectly sane."

"In recommending him to the mercy of the court, we did so because we considered that while the prisoner was guilty and we could not by any means justify him in his acts of rebellion, at the same time we felt that had the Government done their duty and redressed the grievances of the half-breeds of the Saskatchewan, as they had been requested time and again to do, there never would have been a second Riel rebellion, and consequently no prisoner to try and condemn. We did not but condemn in the strongest terms possible the extraordinary dilatoriness of Sir John Macdonald, Sir David McPherson and Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney, and I firmly believe that had these three been on trial as accessories, very little mercy, if any, would have been shown them by the jury.

"Although I say we, in nearly every case in the above, it may possibly be that not everyone held the same views as myself, but I certainly thought at the time that they did so, and am still of the same opinion.

"You are at perfect liberty to make use of this letter in any way you see fit, provided anything therein relating to myself is not made public."

I have given everything which does not relate to himself, and which bears upon this case at all. I thought it my duty to read that letter particularly, because, having in my hand the statement from one of the jury that the jury thought the prisoner sane, I did not think it would be consistent with the frankness I owe to the House to withhold that, inasmuch as they will see it is not a view which I myself share. I repeat that I do not at all contend that a recommendation to mercy is necessarily to be yielded to. I have never said so or thought so. I think that would be a still more unsatisfactory mode of dealing with the case than the French system. But I do argue that the statement given in the author whom I have quoted is a fair statement of the general results and of the degree of attention which is proper to be given to a recommendation to mercy; and, if the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), who seems to have had special opportunities of investigating the cases of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy for several years past, opportunities not vouchsafed to other hon. gentlemen, had extended his enquiries and had gone into those cases in which the recommendation to mercy was effectual, instead of confining himself to those in which it was ineffectual, I think he would have given us an array of facts more important and more satisfactory than the representation of only one side which he has given us. The question is in what cases, and in what classes of cases the recommendation has been made, and what degree of weight has been given to it. I turn to the question, so far as it may be specially illustrated by authority, of the exercise of mercy in those cases in which the defence of insanity arises, and upon that subject no less a learned judge than Lord Cranworth was examined by the Capital Punishment Commission, in 1865, and the Attorney General for Ireland put to him this statement:

"I happen to know a recent case where a man was tried, and the defence was insanity—incapacity to judge of his actions. The jury convicted this man, not believing that he was insane. The Executive subsequently received information from various doctors which had not been produced, showing that the man really was insane, and in that case the prerogative of mercy was exercised, the man being retained in prison?"

And the answer was:

"That would be the reasonable mode of dealing with him."

So you see that where the question of insanity was raised at the trial, and where the jury decided against it, and where the Executive, upon the evidence given at the trial and before them, did not think they were wrong—and where, of course, the judge was not dissatisfied with the verdict either—yet, where subsequent medical testimony was brought forward, it was acted upon by the Executive, and they commuted upon the score of the subsequent medical testimony, and therefore they received it. Now then, on the Bill to abolish capital punishment in 1869, the Home Secretary, Bruce, said:

"One of the first cases he had to adjudicate upon was that of the convict Siegrove, the circumstances of the murder being such as in themselves to excite suspicion of insanity. No evidence was adduced before the court as to the previous life of this unhappy man; but after sentence had been passed the conscience of the neighborhood was aroused, and information was given which led to the discovery of what the facts really were, viz., that for three years he had been subject to fits of epilepsy, and while quite peaceable at other times, under the influence of these he was dangerous, so much so that he had been dismissed from one employment. With a knowledge of these facts, it was impossible to allow the sentence of death to be carried out, and the result of two medical examinations since instituted at different places, and conducted by most competent persons, established that the prisoner was actually insane."

So you see subsequent evidence of the facts was received by the Executive and upon that subsequent evidence they started separate medical examinations, conducted at different places, to test the condition. Their report was accepted, and upon it the prisoner's sentence was commuted. Then Mr Gilpin said, in the same debate:

"The Home Secretary himself stated, only a few weeks ago, that at the last spring assizes two persons were sentenced to death who were entirely innocent. Mr. Bruce, Home Secretary said, the one was innocent and the other insane."

So that the innocent person had been sentenced to death, but his sentence had been afterwards commuted on the ground that he was insane. Then Mr. Bruce, in 1870, in the case of Jacob Spinassa, said:

"A murder was committed, for which no motive could be assigned, by a person who was apparently laboring under some temporary and violent hallucination. The judge and jury, however, thought there was not sufficient evidence of this state of mind, and therefore they treated the prisoner as a man who had committed a murder, with a full knowledge of what he was doing. After the trial evidence was given upon oath in Switzerland by a surgeon who had repeatedly attended Spinassa while he was in a militia regiment, and who had seen him in a state of hallucination similar to that described at the trial, and accompanied by acts of violence, of which he was unconscious. Then it was proved that persons in a German hospital in London had seen him under similar circumstances."

Thus the sentence was commuted on the score of these subsequent enquiries, in a case in which proof of hallucination had been given at the trial, after which proof both judge and jury agreed that the prisoner was, within the law, responsible and properly convicted. Then, on the motion by Lord Penzance, the Lord Chancellor, speaking of the character of the enquiries which were made by the Home Secretary, said this:

"In particular cases other matters are inquired into, but those cases are extremely few. In some of them the delicate and difficult question of the state of the criminal's mind is raised, in which experience proves there is obviously a large margin for difference of opinion; but this would not be improved by requiring all evidence to be on oath, for on matters of opinion there will always be great variety of opinion, and the oath is no security, because a man giving his opinion may honestly swear that he believes so and so. Certificates, therefore, are just as valuable whether they are on oath or not; and the only other evidence is that occasionally given by friends and relatives, as to the convict's state of mind at former periods—matters which are not of such difficult solution as may at first sight appear. * * * At present the functionary to whom this duty is confided, having ample assistance, is able to consider this subject without delay. He is, moreover, a responsible Minister of the Crown, and is, therefore, accountable to Parliament for the manner in which he discharges his duties."

There you find the responsibility of the Government declared by the Lord Chancellor, the head of the judiciary and the legal official of the Government, who explains what is done in criminal cases where a man has been convicted and sentenced; and a question exists as to the state of his mind. You find that an enquiry is made, that medical opinions are taken, and evidence is taken as to the facts from which conclusions are to be drawn. Then the Royal Commission on Indictable Offences in 1878 composed as I said before, of Judges Blackburn, Barry, Lush and Stephen, said:

"It must be borne in mind, that, although insanity is a defence which is applicable to any criminal charge, it is most frequently put forward in trials for murder, and for this offence the law—and we think wisely—awards upon conviction a fixed punishment which the judge has no power to mitigate. In the case of any other offence, if it should appear that the offender was afflicted with some unsoundness of mind, but not to such a degree as to render him irresponsible—in other words where the criminal element predominates, though mixed in a greater or less degree with the insane element—the judge can apportion the punishment to the degree of criminality, making allowance for the weakened or disordered intellect. But in a case of murder this can only be done by an appeal to the Executive; and we are of opinion that this difficulty cannot be successfully avoided by any definition of insanity which would be both safe and practicable, and that many cases must occur which cannot be satisfactorily dealt with otherwise than by such an appeal."

Now, this is stated at a late day by men of the highest authority, having had the advantage of the evidence of many learned men engaged in the actual administration of the criminal law, declaring the theory and practice of that administration in cases in which there is a weak or disordered intellect, though not so weak or disordered as to justify a verdict of not guilty on the ground of insanity; and in language in which I would only weaken by attempting to restate the argument, they point out, what common sense and common humanity approve, that a weak and disordered intellect, although there may be enough to leave a man responsible, leaves him not responsible to the same degree as to the severity of punishment as if he were of perfectly sound mind; and that which, in all other cases, by the law, the precise sentence proper to be awarded as proportioned to the moral guilt and to the palliative circumstances, is to be fixed by the judge, in the particular case in which the sentence is that of death, that duty is to be discharged by the Executive. Sir James Stephen, in his book to which I have so frequently alluded, alluding to the provision of recording sentence, which, as I have said, had the effect of a reprieve, says:

"I remember a case in which Mr. Justice Wightman ordered sentence of death to be recorded upon a conviction for murder. The prisoner, though not quite mad enough to be acquitted, was obviously too mad to be hanged. I have met with cases in which I wished I had a similar power."

Sir James also says:

"These considerations appear to me to show that murder, however accurately defined, must always admit of degrees of guilt, and it seems to me to follow that some discretion in regard to punishment ought to be provided in this and in nearly every other case. This discretion does in fact exist at present and is exercised by the Home Secretary, though on every conviction of murder sentence of death is passed by the judge."

Then he gives cases affecting the guilt of such an offence:

- (1) Absence of positive intention to kill, &c.
- (2) Provocation, &c.
- (3) There are many cases in which a man's mind is more or less affected by disease, but in which it cannot be said that he is entitled to be altogether acquitted on the ground of insanity."

MR. BLAKE.

And then he gives a long series of other cases, the precise case to which I allude being number 3, and proving demonstratively that this case was recognised by our law, which else would be a barbarous and inhuman law, and that it justifies the principle of dealing with the case according to the circumstances. Then Lord Penzance, during a debate in the House of Lords in 1870, said:

"Well, the Home Secretary does as much as any man can do, under the circumstances. He makes his inquiry. It very often happens that the crime is one which depends on scientific evidence, as in the case of poisoning, and then he has often a very delicate task. In other cases new and additional facts are alleged; but there are no authorised sources of information. I believe, indeed, that he sometimes sends down persons to make inquiries on the spot."

Again, Sir James Stephen in his book, speaking as to the doubts thrown on the justice of a verdict, or the accuracy of the evidence, and the course of the Home Secretary in Smethurst's case, shows that:

"Sir George Lewis, Home Secretary, says: * * * I have come to the conclusion that there is sufficient doubt of the prisoner's guilt to render it my duty to advise the grant to him of a free pardon. * * * The necessity which I have felt for advising Her Majesty to grant a free pardon in this case has not, as it appears to me, arisen from any defect in the constitution or proceedings of our criminal tribunals; it has risen from the imperfections of medical science, and from fallibility of the judgment in an obscure malady, even of skilful and experienced practitioners."

I am unable to deal with some of the cases in our own country as fully as the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), but I observe a report in the Mail newspaper of a trial which took place in October, 1882, at Napanee. One Lee was tried for murder and the defence was insanity. The medical evidence was conflicting. One doctor proved that he had examined the prisoner and in his opinion he was insane, and insanity was not feigned. Another doctor was called and said he had come to the same conclusion. The gaol surgeon thought the examination disclosed delusions, and he saw indications of insanity. Another doctor thought the prisoner was acting a part and knew quite well what he was doing. The judge charged that the evidence showed that his mind was, perhaps, not very strong, although some years ago he had labored under delusions. At and about the date of the crime, persons who were in frequent intercourse with him discovered nothing to lead them to suppose him of unsound mind. A person taking revenge is not acting under delusion; he is doing it with some degree of knowledge of the difference between right and wrong. There was a verdict of guilty rendered, and there is no report of a recommendation for mercy. The judge in passing sentence said that after hearing all the evidence he was quite of opinion that at the time the prisoner committed the crime he knew what he was doing and was perfectly accountable for his action. He was sentenced to death. That sentence was commuted. It was commuted by hon. gentlemen opposite. I am not able to speak with authority as to the circumstances of the commutation; and I state simply that I received a letter on the case this morning, and therefore too late to enable me to apply to the hon. gentleman as I otherwise would have done to bring down the papers, but I now make the application. The letter is written by a respectable person who ought to know and who professes to know as to the circumstances which preceded that commutation. But before I refer further to that letter, I should like to give the reporter's account of the prisoner as published in the Mail:

"The prisoner whose appearance is not such as to give the unprofessional eye much, if any, indication of insanity has watched the case apparently with much interest throughout. He seemed to understand about what evidence each witness called would give, and it could be noticed as some of the more important ones came to the stand that he placed himself in an attitude of close attention as if to catch every word said. He did not at any time display indifference, and toward the close though showing signs of weariness seemed to take, if possible, more interest than at first and to be in a measure impressed with a sense of his peril. In this respect there was a visible change in his countenance after he heard the address of the Crown counsel and the judge's charge, and a very marked one when the verdict was rendered."

The information communicated to me by letter this morning is as follows:—When the trial of Michael Lee for murder took place at Napanee some time ago, Dr. Metcalf, of Rockwood, Dr. Clark, of Toronto, Dr. Lavell, of Kingston, examined him. Drs. Metcalf and Clark pronounced him insane; Dr. Lavell pronounced him perfectly sane. His sentence was commuted and he was sent to the penitentiary, where he was transferred to the criminal insane ward as insanity became marked. Whether he still remains there or not I do not know. I know, having had some reason to learn, that a very great number of those whose minds are disordered are kept, and perhaps not unwisely so, out of the insane ward and mix with the other prisoners. That is the statement given to me; and I think, considering the circumstances and the names I have given, it would have been fortunate if the hon. member for Ottawa had so far perfected his investigation as to be able to state all the facts respecting the case of Lee. I think it is established beyond all contradiction that the practice accords with reason, that a disordered condition of the intellect, which in the view rightly or wrongly of the law is not sufficiently disordered to entitle the prisoner to immunity from crime, is yet to be regarded in dealing with the quantity of punishment awarded; that in all other cases than the capital cases that regard is paid by the judge, and in the capital cases it is to be paid by the Executive, whose duty is, not as a matter of clemency or mercy simply, but as part of the administration of criminal justice, as part of that justice which we declare in our Statute-books we seek to accomplish by the apportionment of the punishment to the moral guilt, to have regard to what surely must be an element of the moral guilt, the degree of the disordered intellect, the degree of the insane impulses, of the insane delusions of the unbalanced mind. Even although this degree may be not enough to entitle him to acquittal, though the verdict may be right and the judge's sentence under the law may be right, there is not a mere discretion but a sacred, solemn and imperative duty to have regard to the circumstances disclosed on the trial, and all other circumstances which may be made known; and if upon the whole of the circumstances, you find, as was said by Mr. Justice Stephen, that the man was not mad enough to be acquitted but too mad to be hanged, you cannot shelter yourself under the proposition that it was your duty to carry out the sentence of the law, and that the verdict of the jury had settled all that matter. The verdict of the jury settled no more than this; the prisoner was not so completely insane as to be entitled to be absolutely acquitted on the ground of insanity. Consistently with that finding, his intellect might be seriously disordered. He might be seriously disordered mentally though not sufficiently disordered to give him immunity. Is not that question to be decided? Was that question settled by the verdict? No, it was left unsettled. It was to be settled by the Executive. Has it been settled? If not, they did not discharge their duty. If they settled it, and decided that it did not apply in this case, then I humbly say that I wholly disagree from them in opinion. Now, Sir, to come to the other branch of this case, the question of political offences, that has also to be considered on the question of the award of punishment, and in this matter I am obliged to differ very much from the spirit of a good deal that has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite. The prerogative of pardon is dealt with by Mr. Amos, as applied to these cases, thus:

"There are other cases in which the faculty of granting a remission or diminution of the penalty may also properly belong to the Executive. Thus in cases of what are sometimes called 'political crimes' in which the perpetrators of them are as often as not persons of virtuous habits and tendencies, and even in some cases of a heroic spirit of self-sacrifice, it must depend entirely upon the danger to the community to be apprehended from a repetition of such particular offences whether any and what penalty should be exacted. It may not be wise to leave to the judge the supreme decision of a question more of political circumspeculation than of simple moral insight. The usual if not necessary rule is to leave a considerable amount of choice of penalties to the judge, but to reserve to the Executive the opportunity of entirely rebutting, or as political sagacity prompts from time to time the penalty exacted by the strict letter of the law. These remarks while justifying the institution of the prerogative of pardon, none the less point to the essential importance of hedging round the exercise of this prerogative with all the safeguards which a vigilant legislature and an active public opinion can devise."

With reference to the exercise of the prerogative in case of political offences, an instructive statement was made on the application in the case of certain Fenian convicts in 1869, when Sir Frederick Heygate said:

"He would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, whether, in the selection of those Fenian convicts now proposed to be released, the course had been adopted usual in the remission of sentences of obtaining the approval of the judge who tried each case.

"Mr. Chichester Fortescue, in reply, said, that in ordinary cases when a memorial was presented from a prisoner for a mitigation of punishment or a free pardon, that memorial was referred to the judge who had tried the case. But in the present instance no such memorial had been received by the Government and the question was not considered as one respecting a mitigation of an ordinary sentence. On the contrary, it was regarded by the Government as a question to be decided by themselves and by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. What they did was to institute a most rigid examination into the case of each prisoner, and in conducting that examination they had the assistance of the law officers of the Crown, and more especially of the Attorney-General. The examination was conducted in every case in reference to the character of the person and the circumstances of the case, and to all that came out of the trial. Having done that, Her Majesty's Government and the Lord Lieutenant were of opinion that it was their duty to decide the question solely on their own responsibility, and without inviting the judges to share that responsibility."

Then, Sir, there is a most interesting and instructive discussion on Mr. O'Connor Power's motion, in 1877, with reference to certain Fenian convicts, notably the Manchester murderers, of whom three suffered the extreme sentence of the law, and the others sentences of imprisonment for considerable terms; and after a period, an agitation took place for a remission of these sentences. Mr. Gathorne Hardy said:

"He would admit that this question came very near the hearts of a great many of the Irish people; but they were not the Irish nation, and the Irish nation was not the whole people of the empire. This was an empire and not an aggregate of separate kingdoms, and the Government had to consider the interests of the whole of this great empire. It was also a free empire. Every man who was wronged had an opportunity of bringing his wrong to light, and there was no man who suffered an injury who had not an opportunity of obtaining redress in a constitutional manner. Therefore, the man who took up arms had to vindicate himself from a charge of the deepest dye. Where there was no necessity—not even an excuse—for shedding blood, the man who raised his arm to shed blood, committed a crime; and for that crime the country had a right to demand, he would not say vengeance, but the utmost punishment the law allowed. Much more when men who had taken upon themselves the character of defenders of the country, violated the oaths they had taken and conspired to destroy the country, no punishment could be inflicted upon them which they did not deserve."

Then the Attorney-General of England, in the same debate, describing the offences, used these words:

"When the van emerged from under a railway arch, about half-a-mile from Bellevue, a large number of persons were seen upon some vacant ground, slightly elevated above the road. They were armed with revolvers, and had evidently been waiting for the approach of the van, determined to all hazards to rescue the prisoners. It was proved afterwards that messages had been sent in order that they might be prepared. They discharged their revolvers at the policemen, stopped and surrounded the van, and some of them got on the roof and attempted to break it in by means of hammers, while others handed up large stones to aid them. Others, again, tried to break open the door. It was the duty of Sergeant Brett to guard the door. He was a brave officer, and he did his duty. He positively refused to admit the assailants. When he was in the act of closing a ventilator—which was something in the shape of a small venetian blind—for the purpose probably of preventing them from getting a hold there, one of the conspirators pointed a revolver at the aperture, and, deliberately discharging it, shot the officer. Sergeant Brett fell in the van, the door was then broken open, and the prisoners were released. Hon. members might, if they liked, call that accidental shooting, but he (Attorney-General) called it deliberate homicide.

"* * * They might call it a technical crime; he called it vulgar murder. They might call it a political offence; he called it deliberate and atrocious assassination. It was a deliberate planned attack, carried out by the prisoners who were afterwards convicted, regardless whether they committed murder or not, but determined to do murder rather than fail in their object."

Mr. Pease, the member, I think, for South Durham, said :

"Well, they had had a real rebellion some years ago in Ireland, headed by a gentleman who sat for many years in that House, and was highly respected by all who knew him—he alluded to Mr. Smith O'Brien. He was taken while in arms, holding a cottage for some hours against the Queen's soldiers; and, in that extreme case, when the offender was actually convicted of treason, and formally sentenced to be hanged, drawn and quartered, the dread sentence was afterwards commuted to 14 years' banishment, and was afterwards again commuted, and Mr. Smith O'Brien was brought home to his country. Had any of the men whose fate was now before the House of Commons been guilty of such a great crime as Mr. Smith O'Brien? He had signed the roll of Parliament, had taken the oath of allegiance, was in the Queen's commission of the peace, and yet it was felt consistent with public safety to commute his punishment twice after he had been sentenced to death, and had been transported to mark the turpitude of his crime."

Mr. Gladstone said :

"The question which we have to determine is, what constitutes a political offence. It is quite clear that an act does not become a political offence because there is a political motive in the mind of the offender. The man who shot Mr. Percival, and the man who intended to shoot Sir Robert Peel did not become political offenders merely on this ground. By a political offence, I, at least, understand an offence committed under circumstances approaching to the character of civil war. Whenever there is a great popular movement, the offences committed in giving effect to the intentions of the people partake of the character of civil war. Reference has been made to the action of the President of the French Republic in pardoning offences committed by communists; but it must not be forgotten that the offences—though darker than the crimes for which the Irish prisoners are under punishment—were committed in the progress of a civil war. But the riot committed at Manchester by a crowd locally gathered together was a proceeding totally of a different character, and must be considered as in the main belonging to the category of ordinary crime, though it is not on the ground that the offence is a political offence, that I think the prisoners in question can be recommended for consideration. But if these offences be not political offences in a strict sense, yet they were undertaken for a political motive, and in so far partake of that character as to affect, in a material degree, the moral guilt of the persons concerned."

That was the observation made by the most eminent of Englishmen as to the ingredients of a political offence, even in a case so obviously gross and, as many of us would regard it so totally alien from the ordinary category of political offences as the case of the Manchester murder. Well, Sir, let us come to our own country. History repeats itself in a wonderful way. I remember when we brought this case first on the tapis last Session, amongst other things, we enquired of the Government what they had done with certain persons who were very active, apparently, in stirring up discontent, in the latter half of the year 1884—Schmidt, Dumas and others; and after a while we found out that the Government had been giving them little offices, contracts, and one thing or another, and that they had been thus either marking their sense of their worthiness, or attempting to isolate them from the popular movement. And that is an old plan. I was looking awhile ago into the earlier history of Lower Canada, and I found an account of what used to go on in the long agitation which culminated in the rebellion of 1837. As long before that time as, I think, a quarter of a century, Governor Craig sent home Mr. Ryland as his secretary, to communicate with the Home Government with reference to the affairs of the colony, which he was endeavoring to carry on with large assertions of prerogative and limited local rights; and Mr. Ryland gives an amusing account of an interview with Lord Liverpool, then Prime Minister, on the subject of agitators :

"Lord Liverpool then adverted to the particular character of the persons who edited the"—

Blank, I will say, for the moment—

"and asked whether they might not be brought over. I observed that, unfortunately, this system had hitherto been acted on in Canada, and that I considered the late proceedings of these individuals as the natural consequence of it, men of desperate fortunes with some talents, but destitute of principle, having been thereby encouraged to oppose Government for the purpose of forcing themselves into place."

Sir, the paper of which that was written was the Quebec Canadian. The Canadian still lives. Now the signatories of the response in 1837 by the committee of the county of

Mr. BLAKE.

Montreal to the Workingmen's Association of London made this representation :

"Our grievances are not of new characters or of recent date. They have been publicly and distinctly stated, and the mode and measures of redress have been plainly defined. Our citizens have at public meetings reiterated them for years past. They have founded upon them humble petitions to your Parliament, which turning a deaf ear, now adds aggression to contempt."

That was signed among others, by Papineau, O'Callaghan, Nelson, Duchesnois and Cartier; and then comes also something which shows us how power generally acts under circumstances like these. We remember the events—so widely differing in many particulars—of the Lower Canadian revolt. But see how power treated it in the proclamation of Sir John Colborne on the 29th of November, 1837 :

"Whereas, in divers counties of the district of Montreal, disaffection with the Government of Her Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, has unequivocally declared itself and divers outrages upon the persons and properties of Her Majesty's loyal subjects have been recently perpetrated therein; and whereas, prisoners arrested on charge of high treason have been rescued from the hands of justice, and the troops of Her Majesty, in the lawful discharge of their duty, which aiding the civil authorities have been assailed and fired on by the hands of an armed peasantry :

"And whereas, it is notorious that the present blind and fatal excitement in that district is to be attributed to the machinations of a few evil minded and designing men, who have imposed upon the credulity of an unsuspecting peasantry, and by plausible misrepresentations and wilful calumny, by practising upon their fears and inflaming their passions, by appealing to national distinctions and exciting political prejudices, which it has been the unabated endeavor of the British Government to extinguish, have at length succeeded in implicating a part of a peaceable and loyal population in the first excess of a reckless and hopeless revolt."

You would almost think I was repeating a speech we heard the other day. Then, we find how power acted again in the proclamation of Lord Gosford :

"Whereas, L. J. Papineau is charged with the crime of high treason, and there is reason to believe he has fled from justice; and whereas, it is expedient and necessary for the due administration of justice, and for the security of Her Majesty's Government in this province, that so great an offence should not escape unpunished :

"I do hereby require and command all subjects to discover, take and apprehend the said L. J. Papineau and carry him before a justice; and for the encouragement of all persons to be diligent, a reward of £1,000."

A similar proclamation was issued against Wolfred Nelson, E. B. O'Callaghan, J. T. Drolet, M.P., W. H. Scott, M.P., A. Girod, T. S. Brown, C. H. O. Côté, M.P., J. J. Girouard, M.P., E. E. Rodier, M.P., and Jean O. Cherrier, offering £500 reward, and others at the lesser price of £400. Then the ordinance of Lord Durham, who assumed to banish Wolfred Nelson, R. S. M. Bouchette, B. Viger, S. Marchessault, H. A. Gauvin, T. Goddu, R. Desrivieres and L. H. Masson, to Bermuda, also provided :

"If any of them, or if L. J. Papineau, O. H. O. Côté, J. Gagnon, R. Nelson, E. B. O'Callaghan, E. E. Rodier, T. S. Brown, L. Duvernay, E. Cartier, G. E. Cartier, J. Ryan, sen., J. Ryan, jun., L. Perrault, P. P. Demaray, Jos. F. Davignon and Louis Gaudier, against whom warrants for high treason have been issued, shall hereafter without permission come into the Province they shall be deemed guilty of high treason and suffer death."

"Nothing in any proclamation shall extend to the cases of certain named persons, or if any other person charged with the murder of Lieut. Weir, or with the murder of the late J. Chartraud, and they shall derive no advantage from such proclamations."

The case of these persons was raised in the English House, and Lord John Russell says :

"The Government has not neglected to let Sir J. Colborne know its opinion of the inexpediency of inflicting capital punishment on occasions of this nature."

Sir Robert Peel argued that an exception should be made in the case of the murderers of Lieut. Wier. As soon after as 1841, the following resolution was passed in the House of Assembly by a vote of 39 to 9 :

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, as representing the Crown in this Province, praying for the exercise of the royal prerogative for granting a free pardon, indemnity and oblivion, of all crimes, offences and misdemeanors, connected with the late unhappy troubles in the late Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, to such of Her Majesty's misguided subjects, in so far as may be compatible with the safety of the Crown and the security of the Province, and of all attainders and outlawries during the period of four years."

In 1842, Mr. Lafontaine proposed to Sir Charles Bagot an amnesty, to which he agreed for all except Papineau. Mr. Lafontaine declined, and threatened to resign. The Government yielded, and a nolle prosequi was ordered as to Papineau whereon he was able to return, as he did in 1845. It is unnecessary, Sir, for me to refer to the Upper Canadian rebellion, in respect of which, one might almost go through a similar history. I have gone so far, in order to show the language which is used in events of this description while they are going on, as contrasted with the language used a few years afterwards, as illustrating the view taken when passions have subsided and the mists of prejudice have disappeared. It is to that view that the Executive should look in their determination of cases of this description; it is not the view of the moment; it is the view of the future they should look to. Then I turn to another case of a more recent date—the case of the Fenian invasions of Canada. These Fenian invasions harassed us for a number of years. On the 9th of March, 1866, Lord Monck reports to the Secretary of the Colonies:

"These reports, taken in connection with the open avowals at their public meetings, held in the United States, of the leaders of a portion of the Fenian Society, that it was their intention to attack this Province, had induced a feeling of great uneasiness and insecurity amongst the people. * * * It will be satisfactory to you to learn that the order calling out the force was issued by telegraph from headquarters to the different stations, late in the afternoon of Wednesday, the 7th instant, and that by noon on Thursday, the 8th, answers had been received showing that at that time about 8,000 men were mustered and prepared to move on any points where they might be required."

Well, the advance did not come at that time. On the 4th June, 1866, Lord Monck says:

"The body of Fenian conspirators who crossed the frontier from Buffalo to Fort Erie, on the morning of Friday, 1st June, proved to be between 800 and 900 men, and seemed to have been well armed. Immediately on the receipt of the intelligence of the invasion, Major-General Napier pushed on by rail to Chippawa, a force consisting of artillery and regular troops, under Col. Pascocke, 16th Regiment. * * * They came upon the Fenians encamped in a bush, and immediately attacked them, but were outnumbered and compelled to retire to Port Colborne. This occurred some time on Saturday, 2nd June. * * * We have 65 prisoners in our possession, who have been, by my direction, committed to the common gaol, at Toronto, to await trial."

On the 8th June, 1866, Lord Monck writes thus:

"Immediately after the first news of the invasion reached me the whole volunteer force of the Province was placed on active duty. * * * I am sure I do not exaggerate when I say that within twenty-four hours after the issue of the order 20,000 men were under arms, and that within forty-eight hours after the same time they, in combination with the regular troops, were disposed, by the Lieutenant General commanding, in positions which rendered the Province secure from attack. * * * With the assistance of the officers and men of the ships of war now in the St. Lawrence, a flotilla of steamers has been chartered by the Provincial Government, and fitted up as temporary gun-boats for service, both on the river St. Lawrence and the lakes. * * * Parliament is to assemble this day, and it is intended at once to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act and to extend to Lower Canada the Act at present in operation in Upper Canada (Consolidated Statutes Upper Canada, chap. 89), providing for the trial by military courts martial of the prisoners."

Then on the 29th May, 1869, Sir George Cartier and Hon. Wm. McDougall, presenting the claims of Canada with regard to the Fenian invasion, made the following report to His Excellency Sir John Young, Governor General:—

"The undersigned * * * deemed it their duty to represent on behalf of the Government of Canada to the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Earl Granville, that the Dominion of Canada; and the Provinces comprised in it had expended several millions of dollars in resisting the attacks of the so-called Fenians. That such invasion did take place, and that several of Her Majesty's subjects lost their lives in repelling their murderous attacks, and a large amount of property was destroyed, and heavy losses and damages were sustained by several of Her Majesty's subjects."

"GEO. E. CARTIER,
"WM. McDOUGALL."

The report of the Privy Council, 2nd June, 1870, calls the Fenian invaders "brigands." The despatch of Lord Granville expressly calls them "a body of conspirators" and declares that "it is not often in the history of civilised nations that a country has suffered from an attack so gratuitous and unjustifiable." The report of the Privy Council on 1st July, 1870, speaks of the Fenians as "the miscreants concerned in these outrages." The report of the Privy Council, 28th July, 1871, states that:

"The Fenian organisation has for nearly seven years been a source of irritation and expense to the people of Canada."

The memorandum of the Privy Council of 1871 declares that one of the principal objects of the organisation created in November, 1863, has been the conquest of Canada against the people of which it is not pretended it has had any cause of complaint. The report of the Privy Council of November, 1871, says of the expedition:

"These plundering and murdering expeditions were promptly repulsed, but not without the loss of valuable lives and great injury to the country."

So much with reference to the view that high political authorities took of the character of those expeditions. Listen also to the language of Judge J. Wilson in passing sentence on R. B. Lynch found guilty without any recommendation to mercy:

"You and those who were with you profess to have come here to redress the grievances of many centuries and to right the wrongs of an oppressed people. You allege that the iron heel of the Saxon was placed on the neck of the Celt hundreds of years ago, and that your object was to free your land from that oppression. If you had reflected you would have seen that you began to do this by attempting to inflict on us the very injuries under which you contemplated your native land as suffering. Why should your iron heel be placed on our necks? In what way did we hurt you that you should endeavor to do this grievous harm, and why should our homes be made desolate, our young men slain, and our farms pillaged by you? Will any man of sense answer these plain questions? Was it anything less than murder, was there any possible excuse for you to come here in the dead of night to kill our people, to ravage our homes, and to lay waste our farms and habitations, in order, as you say, to relieve the conditions of Ireland? What right had you, or who could have authorised any man to commit such a wrong as you perpetrated upon us? It is putting the matter in a very plain and clear light, just such a light as you must have perceived it in, if you had thought for a moment before going with this mad and wicked enterprise. You stand there surrounded by the friends and relations of the men you slew on that occasion."

You cannot be surprised that the law should be enforced, and that you should suffer its dread penalty, as I am very much afraid you will; for how could we permit the young unreflecting men who were brought here by you and others like you, who placed confidence in you, who put faith in what you said; how, I say, could we in justice punish them if we allowed you, the greater criminal, to escape."

And after that sentence and under those circumstances, that sentence was not executed. The prisoner's sentence was commuted, not even for life, but for twenty years' imprisonment, and as far as my knowledge goes he was pardoned not very long after the sentence was given. That was the case of a person who never had any pretension of being a Canadian citizen, who never had a pretence of having a grievance against Canada, and who cost us so much in time, money, anxiety and life. That indicates that the modern doctrine, as applied by ourselves in this case, is a doctrine which practically excludes from almost any conceivable case of a political offence a capital sentence. Now I turn to this case in hand, and I say that some language has been used before and in the course of this debate, which I, for my part, cannot approve of, language which seems to ignore as non-existent the right of resistance. I think here, and I have never disguised my opinion, that the half-breeds should not have risen, and that in that sense the rebellion was not justifiable, but the position which was taken by the Minister of Militia at Winnipeg, and the position he took the other evening, and the position which other hon. gentlemen have taken in this debate upon this general question, seems to me to be at variance with our understood constitutional rights in the larger sense. Always there is legal, but only generally is there moral guilt in a rising; always legally, generally morally, is there guilt, but not always morally. I cannot approve of the spirit of those observations. God forbid that we Canadians should forget for a moment that the corner stone of our liberty is the sacred right of resistance. Some, through their blind zeal, forget this. They forget that the sacred right of resistance was exemplified in the events which preceded the great charter, and is enshrined in that instrument itself; they forget that the pious and immortal memory of William is the memory of an intruder who rose to the throne through the people's resistance to their king; they forget that the battle of the Boyne was the triumph of the insurgents over the monarchy; they forget that the glorious revolution was the consecration of the right to resist, and that the present settlement of the British Crown is the visible embodiment of that right. Let me read you just two passages on that point to show that I am not extreme in those views. Amos says:

"But as non-resisting tests were inconsistent with the resolution which was founded upon resistance, those of the acts of uniformity and militia were abolished at that epoch; and the non-resisting test in the Corporation Act was expunged from the Statute-book at the accession of the House of Brunswick."

"Thus there is no longer any obligation of conscience 'binding our soul in secular chains,' to regard the royal dignity merely as a descendible property, instead of viewing it as a trust for millions, subject to a right of resistance when rendered indispensably necessary by the salus populi."

And take Brougham's Political Philosophy:

"The national resistance was not only in point of historical fact the cause of the revolutionary settlement; it was the main foundation of that settlement. The structure of the Government was made to rest upon the people's right of resistance as upon its corner stone, and it is of incalculable importance that this never should be lost sight of; but it is of equal importance that we should bear in mind how essential to the preservation of the constitution, thus established and secured, this principle of resistance is; how necessary both for the Governors and the governed it ever must be to regard this recourse to that extremity as always possible—an extremity no doubt, and to be cautiously embraced as such, but still an extremity within the people's reach, a protection to which they can and will resort as often as their rulers make such a recourse necessary for self-defence."

I say I cannot, as a Liberal, permit sentiments which appear to me to be sentiments of retrogression to the ages of absolute government, sentiments which from time to time in the best eras of English liberty, have been repudiated, to pass without saying what I feel of the sacred right of resistance; and I think it came with a very ill grace from the hon. the Minister of Militia to throw taunts at this side of the House upon that subject, and to accuse us in effect of having stimulated by our views feelings of this description, when he ought to have remembered that the Minister of the Interior under whose reign this rebellion broke out was the very gentleman who, in 1849, signed the annexation manifesto, declaring that it was the object and intent of the signatories to agitate, peacefully, of course, for—and they set that up as their object—separation from England and annexation to the States. According to the high-flown views of loyalty which hon. gentlemen utter opposite, that would have been a treasonable act. I do not say it was a treasonable act. I shall not enquire into its motives and shall not ask how it was that the high-flying Tories suddenly turned round and advocated annexation. I believe there was a great deal to be said against the action of dismissing those who signed that statement from the militia, but for a gentleman who had for his colleague a Minister of the Interior who signed that declaration and set that great example to the half-breeds, to give us the high-toned notions which he expressed, was, I thought, a little out of place. Now, having said this as to the abstract right of resistance, I think it is important that we should remember also that the more representative and popular is our form of Government, the rarer are the occasions upon which resistance is necessary or justifiable for the redress of grievances; and, if, as stated in our Canadian charter, in that Colonial Secretary's despatch upon which our rights have chiefly depended for so many years, if, and so long as the spirit of our charter is observed, and the Government is administered according to the well-understood wishes of the people, there will be no grievances to redress, and consequently there will be no cause for agitation, moderate or extreme, resistant or otherwise; and, on the other hand, if the Government is not administered according to the wishes of the people, this Parliament is the field of battle and we members of Parliament and representatives of the people are the army, and it is in this peaceful way that our contests are conducted and our grievances are redressed, and that government according to the well understood wishes of the people is eventually obtained. We must remember as well, that whatever the form of government may be, whether you have a parliamentary form of government or not, there are two other conditions which are essential to the moral justification of the exercise of the right of resistance; first, that the grievances must be serious, must have been long endured, patiently represented, all peaceful means used and exhausted, so that there seems no hope of amendment by other means; and, secondly, that there may be some reasonable hope of success by this the last resort, not indeed without loss to those engaged, but of important practical results. Now, in the case before us, unfortunately, so far as the unhappy persons who rose are concerned, our constitution was lame and imperfect. There was no representative in Parliament for them, and therefore we had not that safety-valve, that opportunity, that means of averting difficulties which a representative government, applied to every part of the general body of the people, gives. My own opinion is that, if at an earlier date that representative government had been accorded, that circumstance would have prevented this rising. My opinion is, that if there had been a representative from the North-West, knowing what Mr. McDowell knew, what Mr. Lawrence Clarke knew, what the other persons who have made representations, some of which are before us, knew, a representative here in Parliament, speaking on the floor of this House the sense of this people, telling us what their difficulties were, calling for the papers, showing the grounds of their grievances and pointing out their neglect by the Government, each Session pointing out to the Government and to the House their remissness, and declaring the growing condition of discontent and difficulty, the Government would have been stimulated to action, and that which ought to have been done would have been done, if not as early as it ought to have been done, yet early enough to avoid the frightful results which have given rise to this debate; and the absence of that guide and safety-valve, of course, at once increase the responsibility of an autocratic and paternal Government such as ours was in reference to the North-West; a paternal Government which refused this assistance, and it also operated, more or less, inasmuch as they had not provided for them the representative machinery to diminish the moral guilt of the people. But, with regard to the other aspects and conditions to which I have referred, I have already said that, while I condemn as in the highest degree censurable the conduct of the Government, I myself have not been able to agree that this rising was justified, that the conditions remove, although they may, and in my opinion do, lighten the stain of moral guilt; and therefore the case had to be dealt with on the question of the degree of punishment, and by the Executive under their responsibility to us. Unhappily it was impossible in this case for the Government to judge this question fairly. They had precluded themselves from that possibility. They had made this their issue. They had declared that to admit the existence of grievances as a justification or a palliation for the insurgents, would be their own condemnation, and they, therefore, had declared that that death, which would be the indication that the extreme rigor of the law was the appropriate punishment, that death on the scaffold was needful, in order to avert their own death here, and thus they had become disqualified for sound judgment.

An hon. MEMBER. That is your opinion?

Mr. BLAKE. That is my opinion. In this connection I desire to say a word, and a word only, with reference to a charge highly calculated, if true, to increase the guilt, so far as he was morally responsible, of Riel. I refer to the charge of venality. I have already read that portion of the evidence of Nolin which shows the purpose to which this man stated he would apply the money which he was about to get from the Government—that he would apply it in starting a newspaper and in raising other nationalities in the States, and in effecting the prosecution of his designs. I say that however plainly that may appear to be a violent, a wicked, or a mad sentiment, it is utterly inconsistent with the charge of venality; it shows that this was the mode which, in his disordered mind, he thought would be most efficacious in order to accomplish the design for his people and for himself, as part of his people, which he entertained. But the very circumstance that he made that statement to Nolin to my mind proves that it is impossible that he could have made the proposal for a venal purpose. I know perfectly the prejudices which exist. I know how many men would like to ease their consciences by saying: Oh, this was a base, and venal man. But it would be an act of humiliating cowardice on the part of one who has formed another conclusion on this subject, to bend to such prejudices, and to allow a name which must ever be deeply clouded and stained, to receive another cloud or stain which he, at any rate, in my judgment, does not deserve. But I will add this, that I had expected to hear ere now from an hon. gentleman who was very intimately associated with Louis Riel, who worked together with Louis Riel in the North-West, his appreciation of that portion of the case. I have been told a story—I was told it by one who knew—on this subject. When the first intelligence came, that he had asked the Government for money, that he was going to sell the cause, "Well," I said, "this is a most extraordinary thing; it entirely alters the whole complexion of the case." "Oh, do not believe it," said this gentleman who knew. "Well," I said, "I have every reason to believe that he has asked for the money." "Yes, that is quite possible, he is quite convinced he has a claim, but depend upon it, I know that it is impossible that he can have asked for money to deceive or to betray his people, or that he would betray their cause. I know all the events which occurred when he was in the provisional government. I know that at the time when he was in power there in 1869-70, when he had the resources of the Hudson Bay Company at his command, his own family was in a state of destitution, living down at their place, and he would not allow any portion of what he called public property to be sent to them at all, even to keep them in life, and that same provisional council was obliged secretly to send down a bag of flour or something of that kind to his mother, who had the charge of the family, in order to keep them alive."

An hon. MEMBER. Too thin.

Mr. BLAKE. Somebody says that is too thin. I refer the hon. gentleman to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) on that subject. Now, Sir, with reference to the question of the Indian warfare. I think that if there was one thing above another that nerved us the very instant we heard of this rising, to press on the Administration in every way we could, to take all the steps which they with their greater knowledge of the conditions up there might themselves deem necessary, and not to make a single suggestion that they were doing too much, it was the possibility of an Indian rising, the thought which immediately engaged us all was that there could not be a rising created by Riel and the half-breeds without imminent danger of an Indian rising, and the conviction that we owed it to ourselves and to our humanity, to the isolated settlers all through that country to take very large steps, to make very great preparations that if possible, we might anticipate, at any rate minimise, the terrible results that might flow from that rising. No man felt, no man feels, more strongly than myself, the dangers, the difficulties, and the probabilities of an Indian warfare, and therefore I am quite prepared to agree that if you are dealing with a man of perfectly sound intellect, this would be very important as imputing a very much deeper dye to the crime he was committing. But, Sir, I may say that I do not think that hon. gentlemen are entitled to rest the whole burden of this case upon that fact. In the first place we are to remember that the man himself was a half-breed, that he was partly of Indian blood, that those who were with him were half-breeds, that it was more natural, in fact, in view of so large a part of their, though not of his, training, that that warfare should be adopted. In the second place, we can hardly hold our heads high with reference to this question of Indian warfare. Why, you remember the great fight between Wolfe and Montcalm at Quebec, and you remember the monument which celebrates that event, and in which their names are joined. But Montcalm had amongst his forces a thousand Indian warriors, and an Indian warfare was going on in connection with these events. In the other part of the Province at the very same time the English were using the Indians in warfare; the Americans had used them in warfare. Why, Sir, it is but a few years ago that, at the instance of my hon. friend from Brant, we voted $5,000 towards a monument to Joseph Brant. I suppose we all know something of the history of Joseph Brant, and what a remarkable man he was. But to the end of his life Joseph Brant defended, with his enlightened Christian views, the Indian system of warfare as, for their circumstances and under their circumstances, proper and necessary, barring the question of torture, as to which, I am glad to say, he took an entirely different view, as many remarkable persons among the Indians have done, from the ordinary line. So with reference to Tecumseh, a name, perhaps, hardly inferior to that of Joseph Brant. So, that while we honor and refer to those persons, we cannot altogether forget this past in the present. Nor need we go so very far back. Why, in the Lower Canadian rebellion there is a most interesting account of the feats of the Indians of Caughnawaga, who captured some 60 or 70 insurgents, but they were on the loyal side, and therefore it was a proper act. In the course of 1869-70, when Lieut.-Col. Dennis, as conservator of the peace, went into Manitoba and proposed to raise forces, he raised an Indian force. There were 50 Indians under Chief Prince enrolled as part of his forces, and they were doing garrison duty, which was all, fortunately, they were called upon to do at the time. The Government very properly disapproved of it, and they stopped it. They were thoroughly alive to the dangers and the improprieties of it. But it was not a crime of so deep a dye to engage the Indians and thus to create a great probability of an Indian warfare, as to prevent the late Lieut.-Col. Dennis from being raised immediately afterwards in the public service by those gentlemen, and being promoted in that service, and remaining in it until he was superannuated. Now, Sir, referring to another point, to the question of the old offence. It is said by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and has been said very loudly, that my attitude on that subject entirely precludes me from condemning this execution. Well, with reference to the old offence. We must remember that there was a general amnesty awarded by the Government by proclamation, on their responsibility, covering not that particular offence, but covering all the political offences and disturbances. That amnesty was received with universal approbation. I do not remember a single voice or newspaper ever being raised against it. It was universally thought that the Government had done proper in issuing, and issuing early, that particular amnesty. It did not, however, cover this particular offence; but the rising, the political part of the whole affair, the raising of men in rebellion, the creation of a Government, the organisation of forces, all that was with the unanimous assent of the people of Canada amnestied. There remained, as I have said, the question of this particular offence. As to that, what was my attitude in 1871? It is the same as my attitude to-day. I thought then, I said then, that in my opinion the death of Scott was a cruel murder. There is just one point in respect of which the discussions which have gone on within the last few months have tended to modify my view, and that is the very point to which I have been drawing the attention of the House this evening. It is questionable, in my opinion, and those who read with the light which recent events and evidence have thrown upon these matters, will agree with it, will see in much that has occurred the reason of that question, it is questionable how far the mind of Riel may even at that early day have been thoroughly balanced. I do not intend to discuss it; I allude to it as the only thing in regard to which there is an observation to be made which differs in my attitude to-day from my attitude of 1870 with respect to that event. That being my attitude then and my attitude ever since, an attitude in which I was confirmed by Sir George E. Cartier, who called it a cruel murder, by Sir John A. Macdonald, who also stigmatised it as such and invoked his Maker to testify to his anxiety to catch the criminal—that being my attitude, I was exposed at that time to a storm of indignation, because I expressed the view that those who had been, as I conceived, guilty of cruel murder should be brought to justice.

Mr. HESSON. It was because you wanted to make political capital out of it?

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman, who is always charitable, says it was because I thought to make political capital. The hon. gentleman has been some time in Parliament, and he ought to know it is not parliamentary to impute motives. I wonder what the hon. gentleman thought of it himself? I wonder whether he thought it was a cruel murder, and whether he thought the murderer should be brought to justice or not?

Mr. HESSON. I have not changed my mind.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman thought it then and thinks it now.

Mr. HESSON. You have, I have not.

Mr. BLAKE. We shall see. I have just said I have not changed my mind. I did my best to enforce that view. I am told that I did it without papers and I want papers now. I had papers; the Government had brought down the papers to the House; they had brought down the full account of the murder. I had Mr. Donald A. Smith's account and the account of other dignitaries—all the evidence on which a man might reasonably come to a conclusion in advance of a trial. What did I want? I wanted a trial; I wanted that the man should be brought to trial, and I thought then and I think now that I had quite ample evidence to justify me in stigmatising that event as a murder, and in calling that the perpetrator should be brought to trial. That being so, yet, in the year 1875, I think I was amongst those who—though not of the Government, but in our party councils, and subsequently in my place in Parliament—most strongly supported by voice and vote the proposition that there should be an amnesty in respect of that offence. I believed that the events which were revealed before the special committee on the North-West troubles proved that we were in duty bound to grant that amnesty, that we were in honor bound to grant that amnesty; and so believing I acted upon that belief and sustained, as I have said, by every force in my power the proposition that an amnesty should be granted. That amnesty was a very effectual and complete transaction. It was not granted simply upon the responsibility of the Crown without the approval of the people's representatives. The people's representatives were asked to take the initiative, at the instance, of course, of the responsible Ministers of the Crown, and they did so by an overwhelming majority, in which you are to count, not merely that very large majority that voted for the granting of that amnesty, but also all those who voted for the granting of an unconditional amnesty and may have recorded their votes against this one because it was conditional. There was not absolute unanimity. The Minister of Customs was, I have no doubt, Protestant, as Riel says, upon that subject, as some others were, and the First Minister declined to vote upon that occasion at all, so his opinions were left to be gathered from rather indefinite observations. But take it all round both as to political parties and as to the absolute majority, there was a very close approach to unanimity. The hon. member for Ottawa has made a discovery on the head of this and has found that because Riel was amnestied on the condition that he should absent himself from Canada for five years, and because for some sixteen months of those five years he was confined as a lunatic in a lunatic asylum by the authority of and at the instance of the Local Government of the Province of Quebec in Canada, he thus broke the condition and made himself liable, but for the leniency, kindness and consideration of this Government, to be executed forthwith upon his being found in the country and caught by the constables. Such is the view of the hon. member for Ottawa upon the criminal law. He has supported it by some extracts from a book upon contracts, dealing with civil rights, and with the somewhat complicated question of the voidable character of agreements when made by a person of insane mind. But I will tell the hon. member, without endeavoring to enlighten him upon these subjects, that my opinion is that the presence in this country of Riel in an insane state should not be taken as a breach of that condition in point of law, and that I little regard it, for I believe it would be considered even if it were a nominal, a technical breach, as nothing less in the literal sense of the term than a judicial murder if advantage had been taken of the presence of this lunatic to avert execution against him. I therefore pass from this essay of the hon. member for Ottawa, into the regions of criminal law. I am a little surprised that it should be said that I am not free to exercise my judgment now, and to decide as to the extent of Riel's responsibility, because, in common, I believe, with a very large majority of my fellow-countrymen, I came to a particular conclusion which I still retain, with reference to the events of 1869 and 1870, which had been amnestied in 1875. How of my critics? Was the Minister of Customs free to come to such a conclusion? Was he hampered by the views he held on that topic in the earlier days? Was he hampered by his declination to vote even for the amnesty? Was not he perfectly free to deal with this question in his executive capacity, entirely irrespective, as he was bound to do, of the view that he held that the death of Scott was in fact a cruel murder? How of the Secretary of State? As I have said, I was exposed to a storm of obloquy in certain portions of this Dominion because I had affirmed the proposition I have mentioned with reference to the death of Scott. Different views upon that subject were stated by many hon. gentlemen, and amongst them was the Secretary of State, who was of an entirely different opinion with reference to the question of the execution of Scott. My hon. friend from East Quebec, read the other day the resolutions which the hon. gentleman obtained to be passed by the Legislative Assembly of Quebec upon that subject. I have here in addition an extract from a speech of the hon. gentleman, made in support of those resolutions on the 18th of December, 1874:

(Translation.)

"I now come to a burning point, to an unfortunate event which must have set ablaze the whole of Canada, to the only fault committed by the provisional Government of Manitoba.

"Attempts have been made to throw on a few individuals, the responsibility which ought to fall on the shoulders of all those who had entrusted Riel and his followers to protect and to lead them. This unfortunate act which I condemn and regret was committed by persons who believed in good faith that it was necessary to the safety of the community, and of the Government which they considered as legal because it emanated from the popular suffrage. All that can be said on the execution of Scott, has been often repeated. It is a subject which it is proper to leave in oblivion, in order to avoid arousing national feeling. I ask that it should be forgotten just as I desire that no more should be said about the murder of Goulet and the other half-breeds. Blood calls for blood, and there was enough spilled to satisfy both parties, even if we admit—a thing which I will not admit—that the two nationalities who are contending on this point should require this barbarous reparation."

Of course this statement made by the hon. gentleman, who in the remaining part of his speech pointed out that he knew something of this matter, who himself had been the counsel for Lépine upon his trial for that murder, naturally produced a great impression amongst his compatriots, and would have the effect of causing me to be regarded amongst them as a very cruel, hard-hearted and unjust man, who had proceeded so to deal with transactions which the hon. gentleman, avec connaissance de cause, has so described. I am relieved from those imputations, so far as those imputations may be due to any weight which his compatriots at that time placed in the words and statements of the Secretary of State, by his recent utterances. I am going at this moment to try another mode of arriving at the hon. gentleman's recent statement. I am afraid from the type that it is from the same unhappy paper, but it is a letter I am about to quote, and perhaps by some fortunate accident it may have been correctly copied. The letter of the hon. gentleman to his constituents contains these words:

"Riel was informed of it"—

That is, of the arrival or approaching arrival of Monsigneur Taché.—

"Riel was informed of it, and feeling that his reign was about to close, did not hesitate to throw a corpse between himself and the conciliation which was arriving with the holy missionary. Scott was immolated and his blood thrown as defiance at all efforts at reconciliation. Last winter was not Riel's debut in this course of high treason. His revolt in 1869 will be remembered—the useless murder of Scott, whom he caused to be executed when that poor unfortunate was in a position where it was impossible for him to injure his captor."

I am going to try another plan of being correct this time, and I shall take the Montreal Gazette's report of the Secretary's speech at Terrebonne, in which he said, with reference to his action in 1874, in the case of Lépine:

"I defended my client, and during that defence I had proof, and the best proof too, that the killing of the unfortunate Scott was one of the most atrocious murders ever committed. That atrocious murder was without the connivance and without the approval of Lépine, but it was the result of the selfish vengeance of the then dictator of the North-West—Louis Riel."

Now, Sir, perhaps the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), with that accurate appreciation of motives and that Christian charity which animates him in the exercise of that appreciation, will discern on what principle it was that the Secretary of State in 1875 described, as I have read to you, the event to which I have referred, with the knowledge that he had of that event, as proved by the description of it which we got from the Secretary in the year 1886; and he will tell us how he came to treat it in one way in 1875, and in another way altogether in 1886. I do not occupy that position. I regard it now as I regarded it in 1871 and in 1875. I am fortunate enough not to have required a reversal of my opinion in the interval, though the Secretary of State seems to have required fifteen years to ascertain the facts and arrive at the truth at last.

Now, Sir, whatever was the guilt of 1870, whether the hon. Secretary of State of 1874, or the hon. Secretary of State of 1886, be right upon that subject, there was, as I have said, a solemn amnesty—an act of oblivion. What is the meaning of "amnesty?" It is a blotting out of remembrance. What is the meaning of "oblivion?" It is the same. It is the technical meaning expressing the reality of these transactions; and it is, in my opinion, contrary to the spirit of our law that we should, at this time and under these circumstances, bring up the event which was so solemnly amnestied, as a reason why the extreme penalty of the law should be inflicted if but for that event it should not be inflicted. Will you allow me to read a word or two that Sir Robert Peel used in the House of Commons when, at as early a period as 1825, he proposed a Bill for restoring the credit of criminals:

"By the spirit of the English Constitution, every man who had satisfied the justice of the country, by a pardon, ought to be restored to the same situation as he was in before he committed any offence.

The Bill would also go to place persons whose sentence had been commuted in the full enjoyment of all their rights as free citizens. So when a capital convict had fulfilled his commuted sentence of seven years' transportation, he was to be restored to all his credits and capacities."

In God's name, when parties had expiated their offence by fulfilling the sentence of the law, why should any exclusion remain against them? It was therefore provided by the Bill, that wherever a party had undergone the punishment awarded by the court for any offence, he was then restored to all his rights, credits and capacities, in as full a manner as if no offence had been committed."

Much more solemnly can we apply such language to the case of a parliamentary amnesty such as was granted here. Now, was he hanged for the old offence? If yes—if his sentence would have been commuted but for that, then he was in effect hanged for it; and this would be in effect to adopt the views of those who called for his blood, on the ground of the death of Scott. But, Sir, if his intellect were disordered, how could the old offence be taken into consideration in administering the extreme punishment for the new. Incarceration for life was required; pardon would not have been right. That is one of the observations hon. gentlemen opposite make: "You say he ought to have been pardoned." I have not said so. I say pardon would not have been right. The safety of the State and his punishment, taking the strongest view against him of his mental condition, demanded incarceration; but the amnestied offence should not have hanged him. It is said the execution was needed as a deterrent. Sir Alexander Campbell, in his report, has declared that there never was a rebellion of which it might be so truthfully said, that it was entirely the act of one man—that if he had not come there, or had been removed one day before it took place, the outbreak would not have taken place. Yet, he said that as a deterrent to others against rebelling, it was necessary that he should be executed. I do not think so, I have not so ill an opinion of the people of the North-West. Incarceration would have been quite enough to deter, with all the other results which have followed from their unjustifiable rising. Justice and mercy, redress of grievances, and a proper attention to the rights and interests of the people, are the best deterrents. We asked to-day, Sir, in our prayers, that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety, might be established amongst us through all generations, but I do not believe that it is by this man's blood that a step has been taken to accomplish that result. I do not see how, on the score of necessity to deter, you can justify hanging a man of a disordered intellect. That is a deterrent, it is true, but it is a deterrent to the continued existence of the principle of capital punishment. Now, Sir, one word with reference to the reprieves and the delays. We have not yet heard a satisfactory explanation of the last reprieve. I do not desire to detain you on that subject; but I wish to advert to one authority upon it. In 1869 the Home Secretary, Mr. Bruce, said this:

"In Windsor's case, again, although the enormity of the offence was undoubted, still the sentence having been postponed for six months, in order that important questions of law might be determined, the right hon. gentleman had thought that it would not be right, after that lapse of time, to permit the prisoner to be executed."

I will advert to one other case of which I happened to become personally cognisant when Minister of Justice. In the discharge of my duties I visited the Kingston penitentiary and conversed with the warden in reference to a number of prisoners. Amongst them was one whose sentence had been commuted a great many years ago. I enquired into his case. He was a navy, I think, living a little way out of Hamilton, on the Toronto and Hamilton Railway, perhaps during the time of its construction. He had been convicted of a cruel and brutal murder of his wife with a crowbar. She was found in a terribly mutilated state; he was tried, convicted and sentenced. At the last, the technical legal point was raised that the law required an associate on the bench when the sentence was pronounced, or at some stage of the trial. The associate had as little to do with the case as the magistrate in this case. Yet it was proved that the associate was off the bench. Upon that the man was reprieved until the question should be decided by the judges. The judges decided that the objection was fatal and the trial a mis-trial, and that the man must be tried again. He was tried at the next assizes, and of course convicted again, and upon the score of the time that had passed, though there was not the slightest ground otherwise, his sentence was commuted. Now, the hon. Minister of Militia referred to what he called the evidence with regard to the letter of General Middleton to Riel; yet he did not satisfy me that Riel did not surrender on that letter. The statement of Colonel Boulton was directly to the contrary, and if we remember the whole circumstances of the case—the time General Middleton wrote the letter, and the condition of things stated by the First Minister on one of the discussions last Session as to papers—I do not think that is a fair inference from the evidence. But the hon. Minister said he would prove the purpose for which that letter was given, and he proved it by reading a letter from the Major General, who, he said, had been told by someone that Riel was afraid of being killed in the camp. That was not very good evidence against Riel, as the hon. gentleman knows. The intent with which General Middleton sent the letter is of no consequence. The question is, what does the letter fairly import. The authority of General Middleton is not of any consequence, if that were disputed, though I do not suppose it is. Now, the question, to my mind, on this subject is just this: Is it for the honor and credit of the volunteers of Canada that it should be declared that that paper was sent in order to warrant the prisoner, if he surrendered himself, against lynch law? Is it to the credit and honor of the volunteers to say that it was necessary for a Major General in the British army to give assurance to Riel and his council that they would not be lynched if they surrendered themselves? I should be sorry to come to any such conclusion; and then, the question remains: Was it not reasonable to believe that the result of this statement was, you shall not, in fact, be exposed to the very worst that you can possibly be exposed to if you are caught, that is death. I think the liberal interpretation of that letter, in the sense and spirit in which such letters and assurances have been interpreted in all events of this description, would have led to that conclusion. I turn to the subsequent question, the promise of enquiry and the expectations of commutation. I turn to the very important statement by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) on that subject, and to the language of the ministerial press, and I say that these expectations ought not to have been aroused, that that attitude ought not to have been taken unless they were to be acted upon truly, faithfully and loyally, because if they had not been aroused, other steps might have been taken, other evidence might have been brought forward, other facts might have been presented to the Executive, which naturally would not be brought forward if there was an understanding that there was to be an efficient enquiry. For my part, I always believed there would be in this case a commutation, having regard to the circumstances and the testimony as to the prisoner's mind, and, I believed that if there was doubt in the mind of the Government on the question of the mental condition of the prisoner, that doubt would have been attempted to be solved by an efficient and proper medical enquiry; particularly so when we find that Dr. Howard was not called. Now Dr. Howard said in Montreal he could do Riel no good, because, under the law, although he obviously implied he did not agree with the law, he would have been obliged to prove that Riel was responsible. Of course he would. He thought Riel was irresponsible and that the law was wrong. He could not have disturbed the verdict, but his evidence would have been important as to the state of Riel's mind with a view to the awarding of punishment afterwards. So with Archbishop Taché who, we see, in his letter declared that he had formed the conviction that for twenty years, with all his brilliant gifts, this unfortunate man was the victim of megalomania and theomania. So with reference to Bishop Grandin, whose letter the Minister of Militia read, dated June, in which the bishop characterises Riel as a miserable maniac. So with reference to a number of pieces of evidence I have collected and gathered from newspapers which were accessible to Ministers, but which I will not trouble the House with at this hour. So with reference to the diary which contains indubitable traces of a disordered mind. So with reference to the last effusion I have read, the prophecy of Regina, which no man can read without coming to the conclusion that he who wrote it was disordered in his mind. So with reference to the diaries not brought down. I have been told that of the Orders in Council of the provisional government, which are in the custody of this Government, the very first is an order declaring Riel a prophet, something after the fashion of John the Baptist. I have shown you he called himself Elias and Peter, and this order, I believe, represents him as John the Baptist. The next order was one altering the days of the week and so forth. All these things and many statements that were made, some of them at an earlier period, as to circumstances which had occurred, were worthy of attention. So were the letters written with reference to the trial. At the close of the trial, the correspondent of the Mail reported that Dr. Clark, after having heard the evidence which was called since Riel's examination, and after having heard the prisoner himself speak, was quite convinced he was insane. I say the case was one in which it was incumbent on the Administration, if they felt a doubt as to the propriety of commutation, to have a thorough medical examination and enquiry. The medical examination they caused was limited in scope. Sir John A. Macdonald's letter expressly points that out. We have not the instructions to these gentlemen, but Sir John's letter to the Minister of Militia pointed out that it was limited to the question whether Riel's condition had become so much worse since his trial that he was no longer capable of knowing right from wrong. It was not therefore such an enquiry as has been frequently made in cases infinitely weaker than this; it was not an enquiry which involved the real question: What was the condition of his mind at the time of the offence, which constituted the crime he committed? What was the condition of his mind before that time? So with reference to the very important point of hereditary insanity. I have read in the Mail the statement that his mother went into a state of absolute craziness during the rebellion, and a statement of her falling into the same condition at a subsequent period, when she heard of the conviction—a circumstance, the importance of which, in considering what the real condition of this man's mind was, cannot be overstated, as must be extremely familiar to all those who have made mental alienation a study. These gentlemen were not specialists. Dr. Valade certainly was not; Dr. Lavell had very limited experience, having had, for a short number of years only, the charge of the criminal lunatics in the Kingston penitentiary, because up to a comparatively recent period the criminal lunatics were transferred to Rockwood which was under other orders. Dr. Lavell also, if I be rightly informed as to his views upon a late occasion, that of Lee's examination, was a very improper person to send to find Riel sane or insane, because upon that occasion, if I am rightly informed, his opinion was that the man was sane though the others found him insane. The experts, also, who had been examined at the trial, took no part in the subsequent examination, except, perhaps, Dr. Jukes, who did not take any real part in it. Then we have not the reports of the commission—we have only this edition of their reports which has been laid on the Table—and we do not know what their instructions were or what were the reports on which the Government acted. I say, however, that, for the purpose of a proper discharge of the duties of the Executive in cases of disordered intellect, though not amounting to irresponsibility, those reports, even such as they are, brought down, were of the highest importance. They prove the genuine existence of delusions and hallucinations on the subjects of religion and politics, on the very subjects, on which the delusions and hallucinations were proved, in respect of which the crime was committed. They show that these were persistent; and my conclusion is clear that Riel was so disordered in mind as not, within the accepted rule, to have been a proper subject for the capital sentence. It is impossible, in cases of serious delusion or so called monomania, to be sure how far the flaw has affected the conduct in question. It may not have affected it in some cases, though whether it did or not is very frequently a question beyond the wit of man to determine. But here we know it did, because we know that the flaw had regard to these very two points of religion and politics upon which this rising and these events turned. Criminal responsibility, then, for public security there may and must be, though there may be some mental disorder; but not responsibility unto death; and here again comes in the political nature of the offence, the general rules relating to these offences and the special circumstances of the conduct of the Government in this matter; and my belief, therefore, is, that the maximum sentence for the same crime of which Riel was convicted, had he been tried under the milder procedure of the modern law under which his colleagues were tried, namely imprisonment for life, would have been the proper and adequate disposition of his case. But if the Government doubted this, there was an imperative call for thorough and efficient enquiry, for an enquiry going far beyond what was possible at Regina, and extending to the condition of the criminal not only at that moment, but at other times; there was imperative ground for such an enquiry before a determination should be reached that the sentence should be executed. My own opinion is, then, that a great wrong has been done, and a great blow has been inflicted upon the administration of criminal justice; and for this the Executive is responsible to us. I know the atmosphere of prejudice and passion which surrounds this case; I know how difficult it will be for years to come to penetrate that dense atmosphere; I know how many people of my own race and of my own creed entertain sentiments and feelings hostile to the conclusion to which I have been driven; I know that many whom I esteem and in whose judgment I have confidence, after examination of this case, have been unable to reach my own conclusion. I blame no one. Each has the right and duty to examine and judge for himself. But cries have been raised on both sides which are potent, most potent in preventing the public from coming to a just conclusion; yet we must not, by any such cries, be deterred from doing our duty. I have been threatened more than once by hon. gentlemen opposite during this debate with political annihilation in consequence of the attitude of the Liberal party which they projected on this question; and I so far agree with them as to admit that the vote I am about to give is an inexpedient vote, and that, if politics were a game, I should be making a false move. I should be glad to be able to reach a conclusion different from that which is said by the hon. gentleman to be likely to weaken my influence and imperil my position. But it can be said of none of us, least of all of the humble individual who now addresses you, that his continued possession of a share of public confidence, of the lead of a party, or of a seat in Parliament, is essential or even highly important to the public interest; while for all of us what is needful is not that we should retain but that we should deserve the public confidence; not that we should keep, but that while we do keep we should honestly use, our seats in Parliament. To act otherwise would be to grasp at the shadow and to lose the substance; propter vitam vivendi perdere causas. We may be wrong—we must be true—we should be ready to close, but resolved to keep unstained our public careers. I am unable honestly to differ from the view that it is deeply to be regretted that this execution should have been allowed to take place, and therefore in favor of that view I must record my vote.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12:45 a. m., Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 22nd March, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 44) to incorporate the Bow River Coal Mine and Transportation Company.—(Mr. Robertson, Hastings.)

Bill (No. 50) respecting the Pictou Bank.—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 51) to amend the Act incorporating the Nova Scotia Steamship Company, Limited.—(Mr. Kinney.)

Bill (No. 52) to reduce the Capital Stock of the Union Bank of Halifax.—(Mr. Stairs.)

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Medicine Hat Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Portage la Prairie and Lake of the Woods Railway and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Watson.)

BROOKLYN BREAKWATER, N.S.

Mr. FORBES asked, Is it the intention of the Government to repair the Brooklyn breakwater, Queen's County, N.S. ? If so, when ?

■ Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. After looking into the reports that I have for this work, I find that the damage is very great, that it would cost for the mere repairs a large sum of money, and a much larger one to put the work in such a condition as not to be exposed to the accidents that have occurred lately. Therefore, I am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman an answer immediately; but the matter is being considered by my Department, in order to see whether we shall go on with the ordinary repairs or shall go into a new work altogether.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Was there, before the execution of Riel, any document, report, memorandum or writing laid before the Executive Council, by any of the Ministers, against the execution, or in favor of mercy; and, if there was, 1. By whom? 2. At what date? 3. Will it be laid before the House? 4. And when?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Documents and writings were from time to time laid before the Council, through the usual channel, the Secretary of State. They have been laid before the House.

LIQUOR LICENSE ACT, 1883.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to pay in full the commissioners and inspectors appointed under the Liquor License Act, 1883? If so, when?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Parliament will be asked to vote money to pay all sums actually due to these officers.

FEEs PAID UNDER LIQUOR LICENSE ACT, 1883.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE asked, Whether the Government intend to reimburse parties who paid a fee under Section 16 of the Liquor License Act, 1883?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I beg to state that Parliament will be asked to vote money to meet all such claims for refund as may be properly established.

RAILWAY ROUTES IN CAPE BRETON.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Victoria) asked, When will the Engineers' reports on the different railroad routes surveyed last year through the Island of Cape Breton be laid on the Table of the House of Commons?

Mr. POPE. The reports will be laid before the House as soon as they are received from the different engineers.

EXPLORATION OF HUDSON'S BAY.

Mr. ROSS asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to again send out to Hudson's Bay, during the coming season, a sailing vessel with weak auxiliary power, as last season, or a strong steam vessel; and whom it is proposed to send out in charge of the expedition? Whether, in addition to bringing home the parties now stationed in Hudson's Straits, any attempt is to be made to add to our knowledge of the geography and resources of the northern parts of Hudson's Bay?

Mr. FOSTER. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I would say that it is the intention of the Government to send out to Hudson's Bay during the coming season the steamer Alert, the same that was sent out last year, which is considered one of the best vessels for that purpose in the United States, Great Britain, or Canada. Lieutenant Gordon is still in charge, as last year. Whether another winter's observations will be carried out is a question yet under the consideration of the Government. Lieutenant
Mr. FORBES,

Gordon will be asked to gather all possible knowledge of the geography and resources of all parts of Hudson's Bay, as far as he can, considering the nature of the expedition which he is carrying out.

NATIONAL PARKS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. ROSS asked, Is it the intention of the Government to establish one or more National Parks along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the North-West Territories or British Columbia; and if so, what will be their extent?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is the intention of the Government to do so, but the points at which these parks are to be reserved and laid out, and their extent, have not yet been finally decided upon.

CHURCHILL AND NELSON RIVERS SURVEYS.

Mr. ROSS asked, Is it the intention of the Government to publish a Map showing the surveys of the Churchill and Nelson Rivers described in the report of the Geological Survey for 1879, as well as all that is known of the geography of the adjacent regions? If so, how soon?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). A map of the Nelson River and the boat route between Lake Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay, including an enlarged plan of Hayes River and vicinity of York Factory, was published in the Geological Report for 1877-78. Part of the explorations referred to in Dr. Bell's report of 1879 (Geol. Report, 1878-79) have not yet been published. A manuscript map embracing these surveys is in a state of partial preparation, and it is intended to complete and publish this as soon as the pressure of other work in the office will admit. I may say that, in completing this map for publication, it will now be necessary to take into consideration the instrumental survey of the Nelson River by Mr. Klotz, D.L.S.

EXPLORATION OF THE YUKON.

Mr. ROSS asked, Is it the intention of the Government to make an exploration or a geological survey of the upper waters of the Yukon, in the North-West Territories?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is not at present contemplated to make any exploration or geological survey of the upper waters of the Yukon.

CUSTOMS OFFICE ON THE YUKON.

Mr. ROSS asked, Do the Government intend to establish a Customs Office at Yukon?

Mr. BOWELL. Enquiry will be made as to the necessity of an officer there, and if it is in the interest of the Revenue, one will be placed there.

PETITIONS FOR THE HANGING OF LOUIS RIEL

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether, in addition to the documents asking for the hanging of Riel, found in the Department of the Secretary of State and laid before this House, the Government, or any of its members, received any petitions, letters, telegrams or documents asking that Riel should not be pardoned, or that his sentence should not be commuted, or that he should be hanged, or anything in that sense? If so, will the said documents be laid before the House, and when?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). All the documents of that character, which were laid before the Government, have been brought down.

LAND IMPROVEMENT FUND.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, What is the amount due the Province of Ontario out of the Land Improvement Fund?

What rate of interest has the Government allowed on said money, and when will it be paid to the Province ?

Mr. McLELAN. There are two amounts claimed by the Province of Ontario as due to it on account of the Land Improvement Fund:—1st. One-fourth of receipts from Common School Lands sold during the existence of the Upper Canada Improvement Fund, from the day of the abolition of the Fund to 1st July, 1867, less cost of collection, $124,685.18. This amount was allowed by the arbitrators appointed in accordance with section 142 of the British North America Act, to determine the division and adjustment of the debts, etc., of Upper and Lower Canada, and in accordance with section 7 of their award, the amount will be credited to the Province of Ontario. 2nd. One-fifth of receipts from Crown lands so sold and moneys so received, $101,771.68. This item is in abeyance pending the receipt of communications from the Province of Quebec as to whether that Province will allow the sum to be charged to the Province of Canada and credited to the Province of Ontario. The question of the method of calculating the interest will be taken up when the matter is settled.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Landry (Montmagny): That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution; and the motion of Sir Hector Langevin: That this question be now put.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Although so much has already been said in the course of this debate, as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), on Friday evening, intimated that the time had come when the House should hear from the law officer of the Government, that the time had come when I should rise, if I intended to rise at all, it is becoming that I should accept the hon. member's challenge and make, at this stage of the debate, late though it may appear, and tedious though the debate has already been, such a statement of the facts immediately connected with the part that my Department has had in this transaction as it was proper to make before the debate should close. I regret, Sir, the more because I am a comparative stranger in this House, that my first duty in making such a statement is to express my regret at the manner in which this discussion has been carried on, and the way it has been brought before the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It has been said, Sir, and the cheer that comes from hon. gentlemen opposite means a reaffirmation, I presume, of the statement, that the Government have chosen the mode and the time in which this question should be discussed and, as the hon. member stated, had framed the indictment. Even if that were true—as it is not, Mr. Speaker—I ask the hon. members who have just given that cheer, how they are to escape the responsibility for the manner in which they have carried on the discussion down to this moment? Mr. Speaker, it has been said from time to time in the course of this debate—it was generously admitted by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) the other day—for the purpose of argument only, I presume,—but it was contended by the other side of the House most vehemently, that the right to discuss this matter at every step and every stage rested in Parliament precisely as if Parliament sat as a court of appeal.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I should like the hon. gentleman who says, "hear, hear," and those who follow him, and any hon. gentleman who has engaged in this discussion or takes any interest in it, to point to a precedent which justifies the opposition. I should like them to point to a case in any Parliament in the British Empire, in which any man incurring the responsibility of a member of Parliament would say, "hear, hear," to such a proposition as that. We have had, not only the contention that Parliament is to be the court of appeal before which the whole evidence is to be discussed, and before which the whole evidence is to be sifted by lawyers on both sides of the House, but we have been entertained day after day by speeches for the defence. We have not merely had such a discussion as would take place in a court of appeal, but gentlemen have been speaking with carefully prepared briefs, analyses of evidence, and authorities, upon all of which this House is to be expected to pass an opinion and decision. I have only to state the case as it is to bring the House to the consciousness that this is not a suitable tribunal, that the temper which prevails in a Legislature composed of two actively hostile parties is not a place in which the administration of justice in any particular case can suitably be discussed. We have not only been told that Parliament is a court of appeal to try a question like this, but that, if Parliament comes to a wrong conclusion, the people at the polls are to decide it. If we have heated controversy and partisan feeling in this House which prevent the House coming to a judicial conclusion such as a court of appeal would arrive at, I should like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite how will it be when we go to the polls? Is partisanship, for the first time in the history of the country, to be eradicated there? Is a calm and cool consideration of the merits of a particular case—of the fate of a particular convict, to be made by the people of this country at the polls; and if so, will hon. gentlemen opposite pledge themselves that when the case is submitted for the determination of the electors we shall not have passions and partisan feeling appealed to on other issues, the National Policy, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and all the questions which have divided parties in this country for the last ten years? I need no better confirmation of the protest which I make against such a discussion on a motion of this kind in Parliament, as has taken place, than the attempts which hon. gentlemen opposite have made to prevent our bringing to the case a calm and deliberate judgment. The member for West Durham, himself, in the opening expressions of his speech, on Friday, condemned anything like feeling. He deplored the introduction into the debate of bygone issues and political considerations, and the sound of his voice had hardly died away in the expression of those sentiments, when he declared to the House, in tones that rang from end to end of this Chamber, that he intended to hold the Government responsible for every life that had been lost, for every pang that had been suffered, and for every dollar that had been expended.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I should like the hon. gentleman to state how, after an assertion like that, how after the statement of the hon. member behind him who proclaimed three times in the course of this discussion that the men on the Treasury benches of this House are greater criminals than the man who died on the scaffold at Regina,—I should like to ask him how, after expressions like that have been bandied about in this debate, he expects this House to come to a conclusion in the manner in which a court of appeal would decide on any particular case? Not only has that attempt been made to prejudice the discussion, but hon. gentlemen have complained bitterly at a step which has been taken to preclude the introduction of other issues by which the judgment of the House might be mised. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in addressing himself to an interlocutory resolution the other day, declared that it was contrary to sound policy and to fair play that the previous question should be moved. If this matter is to come before Parliament as before a court of appeal—if this House is to arrive at a just determination on this question, upon what ground should hon. members be allowed to introduce other issues? The hon. gentleman was so candid as to avow, before his speech on that motion was concluded, that he had no hope, even if such amendments were moved, of having them carried, because, he said, we must eventually come down to this resolution. Then he would simply have had the advantage of having the House come to a decision on this question with a clouded judgment and with partisan feelings, raised by the discussion of issues on which hon. gentlemen opposite seek to bring against the Government the charges which have been bandied across the House in this debate, of guilt in connection with other transactions altogether. I said, Sir, that I felt it my first duty to express this opinion to the House, and I am glad to know that some hon. gentlemen opposite feel as I do. The hon. member who addressed the House on Friday evening so long and so ably, has filled the office which I have the honor to hold at present. He is conscious of the great difficulties which beset a Minister of Justice in advising the dispensing of the clemency of the Crown, and within the last three months the hon. gentleman said, in a great public assembly:

"I know how much these difficulties are enhanced by heated partisan and popular discussion, in which distorted views and an imperfect appreciation of the facts are likely to prevail."

After that frank admission I would suppose that if this question was to be argued in this House, as it has been argued by the other side, as a question of confidence, we should at least not have had those "heated partisan and popular" appeals made in order that the judgment of this House might not be taken upon the real question that is before it. Let me turn the attention of the House for a moment to the manner in which, in the country to which this Parliament looks for a model, questions of this kind are considered. I am not venturing to dispute the right of any hon. member, much less of the whole House, to challenge the conduct of any Minister of Justice for the time being as to the way he should have advised the Crown upon the case of any convict; but I am challenging the propriety of exercising that right to such an extent as it has been exercised here. On 20th July, 1877, Mr. Gathorne Hardy, who held the office of Home Secretary, said:

"He hoped the time would not come at which the House would fail to rely on the Executive, either to exercise the prerogative of mercy, or to carry out the law to its fullest extent."

He also said:

"Suppose the records to be produced, were they to re-try the case upon them without seeing the witnesses? That would be a most unusual proceeding, only to be resorted to when there was some suspicion of corruption or partiality at the trial."

Mr. Gladstone, in the course of the same debate, said:

"It appears to me so desirable that in a matter of this kind the prerogative of mercy should be left in the hands of the Crown, to be exercised according to the advice the Crown may receive from those whose duty it is to give it, that only in the extreme cases should I wish to support a motion which strictly interposes the judgment of the House for the purpose of swaying the judgment of the Crown."

And Mr. Gladstone abstained from voting upon the question which was then before the House. In another case, in 1870, in the course of a debate, part of which the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) read to the House, Mr. R. N. Fowler said:

"Such cases ought to be left entirely in the hands of right hon. gentlemen opposite. This House was, in the nature of things, one of the worst places where the question of the comparative guilt of a murderer could be properly considered, for it was a legislative assembly and not an executive body."

On the 3rd of July, 1884, Mr. Trevellyn said:

"I regret very much that that decision is come to"—

That is, the decision of the Executive not to commute the sentence.

"I regret very much that this decision has been come to, but we have felt ourselves bound to arrive at it, and I do not consider that the House of Commons is a place where cases can be tried over again."

Sir William Harcourt, who, we were told the other day, is a great statesman, said:

"It is a very serious thing to reconsider, in a matter of this description, the deliberate decision of a judicial tribunal. Although, of course, I do not deny for a moment the right of any member of Parliament to bring forward a matter of this kind, still I assert that it is most inconvenient and almost impossible for this House, upon ex parte statements, or even upon an argument of the case, to arrive at a proper decision of the matter. We cannot dispose of matters of this kind by a debate, even if it be most calmly and carefully conducted, in a popular assembly."

Mr. Trevellyn said again:

"The discussion has shown how inconvenient it is to try a case of that kind over again in the House of Commons, for the hon. member who has just spoken practically tried the case over again—"

I can repeat those words with emphasis, when I reflect upon the speech that we listened to last Friday.

"not from any new evidence he has brought forward in regard to the case itself, but upon an argument in connection with a case that occurred in Manchester some years ago in which it was shown that there was a case of mistaken identity. I think we should as far as possible recognise the principle that the question of dispensing the mercy of the Crown should not become a matter of debate in this House."

If this is to be done, if a political discussion is to follow the action of the Executive in every case in which clemency is given or refused, one can easily understand what confusion we shall introduce into the administration of criminal justice in this country. The greatest criminal who may be condemned by the tribunals will have some hope that if his case can only be thrown into the vortex of politics, to quote the language of Louis Riel on the day of Batoche, "politics will save me." He will point to the fact that, fifteen years ago, a political party in this country made a desperate effort to gain power by appealing to public passion about a great tragedy which took place, and that having failed in that enterprise, fifteen years afterwards they considered they could climb into power on the feeling provoked by another tragedy—first trying fortune upon the fate of the victim, and then trying it upon the fate of the murderer. It will result, Sir, that the Executive, especially if it be weakly supported in this House and in the country, must seek to do, not what is right merely, not what is justice merely, not what is a fulfilment of the law merely, but that which is most popular in the country, in view of the fact that the case is likely to be tried all over again in the House of Commons as a court of appeal, and in view of the fact that afterwards it will be tried all over again at the polls. More than this, we have had already indicated a still more serious result. It is not merely that the administration of justice is to be brought into disrepute, not merely that its just enforcement is to be endangered, but if the Executive shall attempt to carry out the law, then in relation not merely to the Executive itself, but in relation to the people who support its policy, and all people who believe that it was simply carrying out the law and discharging its duty, a cry of revenge, as my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Laundy) said, is to go up, and be kept up, by one section against the other. We shall have, then, not merely the administration of justice degraded, but we shall have, as indeed we had in the month of November last, the cries of civil war raised in our own streets, when they had died away on the banks of the Saskatchewan. We have heard, at each stage of the debate, the cry for more papers. I do not presume to discuss what was done in the House last Session, although I have had full access to its records, but I have noticed that this Session the cry became more urgent and more emphatic the more papers were brought down. We had first the cry that the record was not complete. We had issued to the public and laid on the Table of the House all that constitutes, technically, the record in criminal cases—all that would go before a court of appeal—all that should be asked for here if this Parliament is to be considered a court of appeal. There was even more than that in the blue book which we printed and circulated; but we had hardly met when we were told that we must have all the arguments upon the controversy about the postponement of the case, although that argument resulted in an agreement between the counsel which withdrew the matter from the consideration of the court altogether. Those papers were brought down, and the cry became louder and more urgent still for more papers. We were told there was a controversy on the trial as to whether Louis Riel should be allowed to defend himself, besides being defended by counsel—"bring that down." We brought that down to this House, and the cry became more urgent still. "We have not the judge's charge here," it was said, and one hon. member told the House that we were not even in a position to tell the House that the judge's charge was before the Court of Appeal in Manitoba, although the blue book which he held in his hand contained the judgment of that court, in which one of the judges said that he had great satisfaction in being able to say that he had read the whole charge and that he endorsed every word of it. Well, we brought down the judge's charge and the cry became more urgent still. One said all the papers that were asked for were not brought down, and another complained that we had brought down more than were asked for—simply for the reason that those which were brought down were not as satisfactory to them as some hon. gentlemen expected. Let me turn the attention of the House again to the practice which prevails in the British Parliament upon that question. I have looked, I think I may say, at every case which has come up for consideration in that Parliament for the last twenty-five years, and I have been unable to find a case in which the papers connected with a criminal case were laid before Parliament at all. The question has arisen there sometimes on a motion to go into Committee of Supply, sometimes on a question which the Home Secretary has to answer, but never upon a motion of want of confidence—never with the request that the papers should be brought down. But, while I have been unable to find a record produced to Parliament, in such a case, I am able to find that it was refused, for, on the 17th of May, 1878, in the discussion of the case of George Bromfield, reports touching the insanity of the prisoner were asked for, and Mr. Asheton Cross, the Home Secretary, said that "all the communications made to the Secretary of State in the matter were of a confidential character, and therefore he did not consent to produce them." I think, Sir, that as soon as the papers which remain to be brought down are laid upon the Table of the House, the desire of some of the hon. members for papers will be more urgent than ever. They will not like the papers which are yet to come down any more than they like those which have been brought already; and when they have seen them all, the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), will say: "These are not the papers at all," and he will ask for the papers which he said were lying 'mouldering unopened' in our offices. As an illustration of the unreasonableness with which some of these demands have been made upon us, let me call the attention of the House to a single instance. On the 17th of March an hon. member moved:

"That an Address to His Excellency the Governor General be presented for a full and complete report of the trial of Thomas Scott, charged with "treason-felony" at Regina; giving the evidence for the Crown and defence, together with addresses of counsel and charge of the Stipendiary Magistrate. Report of the trial and sentence of the half-breed prisoners at Regina for "treason-felony," together with the evidence submitted to the Stipendiary Magistrate's Court in mitigation of sentence, and addresses of counsel for the prisoners."

These papers, connected with the trials that took place afterwards, had a very doubtful relevancy to the case; but the point I am making now is that when the Address of this House was asked for on the 17th of March for these papers, they had already been on the Table 48 hours. We have not the advantage on this side, perhaps, of hearing all that goes on in this House, but we can imagine, in view of that illustration and of some facts we do know, how true and appropriate this comment by a bystander is upon this cry for papers:

"I was amused to-day at Mr. ———. He was tearing the Government to tatters for not having the papers down. 'Where is the diary of Louis Riel?' he cried, and then aside to Laurier, 'Is that down?' 'No,' whispered back Laurier. Then Mr. ——— became furious in his denunciations because it wasn't down."

I think, Sir, that at an earlier stage of this discussion, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) saw the difficulty the House would meet in the discussion of a question of this kind, and in receiving and acting upon the doctrine that this House was to be a court of appeal; for the hon. member declared, almost in so many words, that he and his friends were justified in treating this case as an exceptional case, because it came from the North-West Territories; and the hon. member read to the House a section of the Act which provided that the report of a capital case tried in the North-West Territories should come to the Executive.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I shall read—especially as an hon. member of my own profession on the other side of the House says "hear, hear"—two sections of the law—the section bearing on cases in the North-West Territories, and the section bearing on cases in the various Provinces, and will ask what the difference is. The general law, taken from the Act of 1873, applying to every Province in this Dominion, is:

"The judge before whom such prisoner has been convicted shall forthwith make a report of the case, through the Secretary of State for Canada, for the information of the Governor, and the day to be appointed for carrying the sentence into execution shall be such as in the opinion of the Judge will allow sufficient time for a signification of the Governor's pleasure before such day."

Now, the provision relating to the North-West is this:

"When any person is convicted of a capital offence, and is sentenced to death, the stipendiary magistrate shall forward to the Minister of Justice full notes of the evidence, with his report upon the case, and the execution shall be postponed from time to time by the stipendiary magistrate, if found necessary, until such report is received, and the pleasure of the Governor General thereon is communicated to the Lieutenant-Governor."

Now, the only difference between the two sections is this: First, it is provided that the judge in a North-West case shall furnish full notes of the evidence—and the hon. member laid stress upon that point. I can only say to him that, full as the notes of the evidence are in this and in every capital case coming from the North-West, they are not one iota fuller than the reports of capital cases which we receive from the Provinces; and as regards the postponement of the day of the execution of the sentence, although the power is specifically conferred upon the stipendiary magistrate in the North-West Territories, it is still fully competent to the judges in the other Provinces to respite until the pleasure of the Governor is made known. The provision making it mandatory upon the stipendiary magistrate to postpone in the case of North-West trials was inserted, I believe, in consequence of the remoteness of the country and the difficulties of communication; but in practical working the two provisions are identical, and a case coming from the North-West Territories has no more connection with the functions of this House or the politics of the country than a case coming from the Province of Quebec or the Province of Nova Scotia. Before I refer to the criticisms which were passed upon the trial of the case, and as one of the preliminary observations I wish to make, I desire to reply to a remark which was made by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), the other evening. Replying to a remark of the Minister of Public Works, he asked how the Minister of Inland Revenue, and how the Minister of Justice could reconcile with truth the statement which had been made in this House that there had been a change in public opinion in the Province of Quebec? He referred to the meetings which had taken place at St. Jerome and St. Colombe, at which I had the honor of assisting, and at the latter of which my hon. colleague, the Minister of Inland Revenue, was with me. The hon. gentleman wanted to know what we had to say, after those meetings, of the state of feeling in the Province of Quebec? I answer that if we are to judge from what we saw, there had been a great change of feeling in the Province of Quebec. The people were disposed to listen to reason, to argument, and to truth, and there was no more passion evinced at those meetings than at any meetings of equal size called in any other part of the country, for the discussion of public questions. If I had to judge from the reports we saw in the press, I should have to give the hon. gentleman a different answer; but at present I shall testify from what I saw, not from what I read in the papers afterwards. I should think the hon. gentleman would have hesitated to ask me, in the presence of this House, what I thought of the change of public feeling in the Province of Quebec, when we have so many witnesses to cite on the floor of this House. We know that a few days after the execution, in the city of Montreal a set of resolutions were passed declaring that this execution was a base murder, and that the three Ministers representing that Province in the Cabinet were men who had degraded their race and were traitors to their country. Resolutions were passed declaring that this was a crime which should never be forgiven; and the hon. gentlemen in this House, some of whom have addressed it already and some of whom are to follow me, were the men who, in the presence of fifty thousand of their fellow-countrymen, secured the unanimous adoption of these resolutions. Yet those gentlemen, in the course of this debate, have risen and declared that the information before the House is not sufficient to enable them to vote, not for a resolution that the execution was a murder, not for a resolution that we are traitors, not for a resolution declaring that we shall never be forgiven, but for a resolution expressing in the mildest terms a regret that the law was allowed to take its course. In fact so mildly was the resolution worded that it excited the suspicion of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and he declared that the Government must have drawn this indictment. I wish to make one other preliminary observation, an observation with regard to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) in respect of a matter in which, I think, he did me, unconsciously, an injustice. About ten minutes before this debate began, when the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) was about to take the floor, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), without having given any notice of his question, rose and asked a question involving a number of details, as to whether the medical reports from Regina had been received by telegraph, and if so, at what date, and would they be brought before the House, and involving other particulars as well. I stated that I was unable from memory to answer the question on the spot, presuming the hon. gentleman would, as he subsequently did, put it in writing, and give me an opportunity to furnish the particulars asked for. I thought that it was somewhat ungenerous on the part of the hon. gentleman (but it pro-ably was due to his misunderstanding my answer), when he said that members of the Government were so disposed to trifle with this great question and with the wishes of the House itself, that when they were asked a vital question the answer was that they could not remember. He forgot he was asking a question involving particulars which could not be stated without looking at the documents themselves, or the records of the Department, and of which he had not given any notice, and that therefore he could not expect the information to be at once supplied. The hon. gentleman had been in this House two weeks of the Session; he had already asked for papers of almost every description, and if it had occurred to him to put his question a little earlier than ten minutes before the debate began, I should have been in a position to say something more definite than that I was not able to answer from memory. We have had the point raised and pressed with great earnestness, that the trial was an unfair one, and we have heard it asserted by a member of the legal profession, that although it was a legal trial it was not a fair one. I confess, after having given that observation all the reflection I have since been able to give it, I am unable to understand it; I am unable to understand how the Executive can be condemned for not having given to the prisoner something more than the law gave him, as regards the procedure in this trial. We have generally understood, throughout this Empire, that a synonym for fair play as regards the administration of criminal justice was British law, and yet we are told now, for the first time, in a Parliament existing under British institutions, that the Government are to be condemned because their counsel conducted the trial in such a way, that although strictly in accordance with the law, it was an unfair trial. Now, let me ask the House to bear with me for a few moments while I address it upon those points in respect of which it was said the trial was unfair. We were told by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), that the judges were inferior judges. I presume he meant, technically, that they were judges of an inferior court, and not that he meant to impugn their professional standing or abilities as members of the judicial bench. But that is an entirely irrelevant enquiry. The jurisdiction, whether the courts be superior or inferior, is plainly conferred upon them by law; the law of the country requires that, whether these be superior or inferior judges, they should take cognisance of cases like this. It has been said that the courts there were peculiar in their organisation. That criticism, pointing, as I suppose it did, to the conclusion that the trial was unfair and unsatisfactory, for otherwise it would be what the hon. gentleman distinctly said it was not, a purely theoretical objection, a purely theoretical criticism—his criticism pointing to such a conclusion, induced me to bring to the House the provisions of the law on that subject. In 1875, a case of this kind would not have been tried by the judges who, he says, are inferior. The provision of section 64 of the Act of 1875 gave the trial of capital cases to the Chief Justice or any Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench of the Province of Manitoba, and required the intervention of a jury not exceeding eight in number. In 1867, that Statute was altered; the jurisdiction of the chief justice and of the judges of Manitoba was taken away and given to stipendiary magistrates to be appointed in those territories, and the number of jurors was reduced from eight to six. It is true the hon. member might have pressed upon us one other consideration, and that is, that then there would have been present, even under the Act of 1877, upon the bench, not merely the stipendiary magistrate but two justices of the peace as well. I take it that that is an objection which the hon. gentleman himself and his followers lay very little stress upon; because we have not had, from the beginning to the end of this discussion, the complaint that there have been too few justices of the peace to try this man, but we have had only the complaint that there were too few jurors. The Statute of 1877, creating this court, took away the jurisdiction of the judges who, in the Act of 1875, would have tried the case, and reduced the number of jurors, and that Act was introduced in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite, when the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was himself Minister of Justice. I say this, not for the purpose merely of saying tu quoque, not for the purpose of making a political comparison between the legislation of one party and the legislation of another, but for the purpose of drawing, what I think is a legitimate conclusion from these facts, namely, that if both sides of the House had acquiesced in this legislation, confiding in the great abilities which the hon. member for West Durham was able to bring to the preparation of the Statute, the Government had no occasion to mistrust it, or to believe it was ill considered, and I had no occasion to expect that the hon. member would have raised, as one of the criticisms by which he sought to make this House believe the trial was unsatisfactory, that the trial took place before one of the very men into whose hands, by his own Statute, he had put the issues of life and death. It is said, Sir, that these judges are to some extent political officers, inasmuch as they are, by virtue of their offices, members of the North-West Council. When I turn again to the legislation on that subject, I find that that provision was inserted not by the gentlemen who sit on this side of the House, not by the gentlemen who had in this case to administer the law, but was put by gentlemen opposite into the Act of 1875. It was said that these judges are, to a certain extent, dependent upon the Executive. I fail to see any very broadly marked distinction in these days between judicial officers who hold their office during good behaviour and judicial officers who hold their offices during pleasure, considering that the state of public sentiment in regard to officers of that kind, and the disposition of Parliament, in dealing with a Government that would dare to exercise its pleasure unfairly and without due cause, would be such as to make a judge, even if appointed during pleasure, practically irremovable except for cause. But the tenure of office was established by those gentlemen; those travelling fees, for which it is said they depend upon the Executive, were allowed by these gentlemen themselves, and year after year those travelling fees and those allowances, which it is said made fallible the judgment of the judges there, or might have made their judgment fallible, were introduced and voted by hon. gentlemen opposite, and, after they went out of office, were voted for by them without a murmur or complaint. It was said likewise that a grave mistake had been made in the selection of the judge. It was said that Judge Richardson stands in the position of Attorney-General in the North-West. I think that that is hardly a correct statement of his position there. He acts, it is true, as law clerk to the North-West Council, as legal adviser in reference to the legal business that comes before that Council, and as such he receives a paltry, almost a nominal, emolument, which is likewise voted to him, not by the Executive, but by the Parliament, and can only be paid to him by virtue of an Act of Parliament. The criticism was likewise made that Judge Richardson was a member of that Council when it undertook to pass an expression of opinion upon the conduct of the Executive in this very case. In justice to Mr. Richardson, I must say that, when those resolutions came before the North-West Council for deliberation, he withdrew from the Board. I think that the choice of Judge Richardson was as wise a choice as could have been made. He was no appointee of ours; it could not be said that for any political services he had rendered to this Government or this party in the past he had received his judicial office, because he received his appointment at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite; and I presume he received it, as all judges are supposed to receive it, on account of qualifications for the duties he had to discharge, one of those duties being, by virtue of the very Statute which they passed themselves, the disposition of capital cases. Besides that, he was the senior judge in the North West, and, in that respect, as well as in regard to his professional qualifications—as to which I will say little, because it would be invidious to make a comparison between him and his colleagues—he seemed to be at the head of the list of those who had to be entrusted with the execution of this very serious duty. But when we were told that there is danger of any of these tribunals being corrupted by the circumstance that this Parliament votes them moneys from time to time for their travelling expenses or allowances for the discharge of any other public duties incidental to their office, or otherwise, the hon. gentleman raised, in my mind at least, the recollection that, in the great Province which he represents, a large portion of the judiciary receive a considerable augmentation of their salaries, from the Provincial Government. I should like to ask at what stage in the parliamentary existence of this country partisan strife became so hot that any hon. gentleman degraded himself by aspersing the judiciary of Ontario, even in regard to the questions which arose between the Government of the Dominion and that of Ontario, by suggesting that the minds of the judges were warped by the additions to their salaries which they received from the Provincial Government? I ask then whether the hon. gentleman's criticisms were quite fair to the Government or to the officer more particularly mentioned? If it was not intended to asperse the mode of conducting the trial, as being unfair, on account of these considerations, I ask why these criticisms were introduced at all? I ask why the public confidence in relation to the administration of justice by these tribunals should be weakened by such criticisms, unless to show Parliament that the trial was unfair? The hon. gentleman said that these difficulties ought to have been removed. I understood him to intimate—it was the conclusion, I admit, which I drew from his language more than the language itself—that it would have been better if, last Session, in view of the difficulties which had arisen in the North-West, the Government had created special tribunals there for the trial of these offenders. At any rate, he did express plainly that it was the duty of the Government to have provided some special legislation in regard to those tribunals. I ask the House if, after the crime had been committed, after Louis Kiel had come into this country and had stained his hands with the blood of our citizens, and after the rebellion had been suppressed, the Government had changed the law, had made new tribunals, and had put that criminal in a different position from that in which he stood when he came into the country, there would not have been a feeling from one end of Canada to the other that we had passed an ex post facto law, and had done an injustice which should not have been done to the vilest criminal in the land? That, Sir, is my own opinion on that point, but I am able to cite an authority for it too. Within the last two or three months, a gentleman who discussed public questions very ably, in a portion of this country not very remote from this place, undertook to discuss the various phases of this trial. He was a gentleman able to bring to the discussion of these questions long experience and high abilities, which are known to every section of this country. He had this to commend him too—I shall not say it was the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), I can hardly think it was, when I heard his speech, but it was at least a namesake of his, and that gentleman said in reference to this very trial, in reference to this very criticism which had then gone abroad, in reference to this very suggestion that it would have been better if the Government had taken special legislation in reference to these tribunals;

"But I do not say that the Government is censurable for having tried the prisoner by the tribunal provided by the standing laws, though I may regret that those laws did not provide a more satisfactory tribunal."

Now, Sir, there is another point in which the fairness of the trial has been challenged. It was said that Louis Riel, being of the Roman Catholic faith, it was suspicious that the only Roman Catholic juror called was challenged by the Crown. I have only to say this, Sir—and I say it upon the authority of the counsel who conducted this case on behalf of the Crown—that until that statement was made on the floors of this House the counsel for the Crown were not aware what that man's religion was. I am able to assure the House on their authority, which, I am sure, will not be impugned here, or anywhere else in this country, that there were other good reasons given why he should be challenged, and that the question of religion never entered into their consideration at all. The hon. member for West Durham thinks that that could hardly be so, because, he says, if it were so there would have been a challenge "for cause." Every person practising at the bar—and I appeal to all my professional brethren on both sides of the House to confirm the statement—knows that in the trial of causes there may be doubts as to the qualification, mental or otherwise, of jurors, doubts as to the soundness of the judgment which they may bring to the cause, doubts as to their partiality as jurors, which cannot be verified on a challenge "for cause," because, perhaps, the witnesses are at a distance who could prove the objections, and it is better and safer in the public interest, safer in the interests of justice, to challenge preemptorily. Although there were a number of jurors challenged on that occasion by the defence, this is the single instance in which a juror was challenged on the part of the Crown, and he was challenged, as I said, for reasons which it might be indelicate for me to communicate to this House—reasons, however, which affected the minds of the counsel for the Crown with doubts as to the partiality and wisdom with which he might discharge his duties as a juror, but not in any way in relation to his sect, his creed or his race. Then the criticism was made that the trial was an unfair one because other prisoners were not tried for high treason. They were charged with the offence, equally grave, perhaps, but not so severely punishable, of treason-felony. I fail to see how that could affect the regularity or the fairness of the trial, which took place before it was decided at all what these men should be brought to trial for. If the graver charge of high treason were not withdrawn then, as to these persons, how could any person, in the interest of Louis Riel, or of justice generally, say that the fairness of his trial was affected by something that took place afterwards? Then some criticism was made with regard to the non-trial of the so-called "white settlers" of Prince Albert. An investigation was then going on to ascertain which of the white settlers of Prince Albert, if any, should be brought to trial, and because they were not then brought to trial, I understand it is sought to draw the inference that Louis Riel's trial was an unfair one, or that some invidious distinctions were made with regard to it. Now, Sir, I come to the next point which was pressed, not so much by the hon. member for West Durham as by other hon. members, and I think very sincerely as well as very ardently pressed by some of our friends from the Province of Quebec, that a month's delay was asked to enable this man to prepare for his trial. Let me assure the House upon the authority of the papers which were brought down to this House days ago, that no application for a month's postponement was submitted for the judgment of the court at Regina. This is what took place:—Counsel for the defence, after the disposal of the preliminary question of an objection to the indictment, submitted affidavits asking for a postponement. They intimated that they would ask for a month's postponement. They made application for a month's adjournment. That application, before it could be ruled upon by the judge, was taken into consideration by the counsel for the Crown, and those counsel made to the counsel for the defence this proposition: "You are asking a month's delay; it is unreasonable, because in a week witnesses can be brought here from any part of Canada; we will consent to a week's delay, and as our own side of the case shall takethree days more, you will thus have ten days, beyond all doubt." They said: "That will be enough for you, because you shall not be put to the trouble of summoning witnesses in the ordinary way; we will join you in telegrams, as counsel for the Crown, telegraphing to those witnesses, wherever they are, not only asking them to come, but pledging ourselves for the Department of Justice to pay their expenses." The counsel for the Crown said: "We will do more than that. The practice in the administration of justice in the North-West Territories is to use the mounted police for the purpose of serving the summonses, and we will put our own officers at your disposal for the purpose of summoning your witnesses, as soon as possible." Now, Sir, let me take up the list and see who these witnesses were for whom this month's postponement was demanded, and let me see in what manner this application of the defence was treated. There were three witnesses in the territories of the United States adjoining the North-West Territory. Everybody knows that in the case of witnesses in a foreign country to whom no commission has been sent, and for whose attendance no process would be sufficient, no court of justice would grant an adjournment. But it was not an adjournment that was wanted with regard to those persons. Ten days would have been ample to bring them there. What the counsel for the defence asked in respect of Gabriel Dumont, Michel Dumas and Napoleon Nault, was not simply that they should have their expenses paid, which we would have assented to, not merely that they should have been summoned, which we would have assented to, but that we should pledge ourselves that if they came to testify, no proceedings would be taken against them in connection with the past. That was a pledge which counsel for the Crown were not authorised to give. It would never do, Sir, in the conduct of a trial for a rebellion of that kind, to give an amnesty for the worst actors in the rebellion, under the guise of a subpoena to attend court. There were three other witnesses, clergymen, "whom," said the counsel for the defence, "we require to have here—Father André, Father Fourmond, and Father Touse." The counsel for the prosecution said: "We will summon them for you." Now, as regards the medical witnesses, counsel for the defence asked for Dr. Roy, Dr. Clarke, Dr. Vallée and Dr. Howard, and every man of them was summoned by the Crown; every man of them received the assurance that his expenses would be paid by the Government. Then there were Mr. Vankoughnet and Mr. Burgess, who were wanted to bring the papers from the Department of the Interior. But everybody knows that papers to be produced for the purpose of showing that the half-breeds had grievances, or that there was delay in attending to their grievances, even if such papers were in existence, were absolutely inadmissible at that trial. I need not cite authorities for that. The hon. member for West Durham himself appreciated his position as a lawyer too well to urge that contention, and stated candidly to the House that evidence with regard to the grievances was properly rejected at the trial. No other decision could have been arrived at, and the expression of the law on the point could not have been better put than it was put by Mr. Richardson, who said:

"It is no justification, in the trial of a prisoner charged with an unconstitutional agitation, that he made a constitutional agitation at any other time."

For that reason only the Crown counsel declined to order the attendance of Mr. Vankoughnet and Mr. Burgess, and we have the admission, which it was necessary for any professional man having a sense of honor to make to the House, of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), who stated that evidence like that was inadmissible at the trial. I have shown that, with the exception of the two witnesses from the Departments to prove that which would not have been evidence, and with the exception of the three witnesses for whom an amnesty, and not a subpoena, was asked, Crown counsel pledged themselves to summon all the witnesses for the defence and pledged themselves to pay them. We shall now see how far they carried out that duty. For the purpose of showing the House that this matter, which is urged as an element of unfairness in relation to the trial, was never submitted to the tribunal at all, never came before Judge Richardson to pronounce judgment upon, I will read from the report in the Globe of July 30th what, as I have related, took place after counsel had arrived at that understanding. In regard to the proposed adjournment for a month, counsel for the Crown—Mr. Christopher Robinson, Q.C.—announced to the court the understanding that had been arrived at. He said :

"All those witnesses who are in this country can be got in a week just as well as in a month, or a year. The Crown will do more. The Crown will join with my learned friend in telegraphing to those three gentlemen who are at Quebec, and those three gentlemen who are at Prince Albert. I desire that to come from the Crown as well as from them and the Crown will pay their expenses."

"Mr. Fitzpatrick to the Justice.—I read the Order in Council as conferring very limited powers. However, that difficulty is all obviated by the offer made by the Crown."

The counsel for the defence withdrew this matter from the consideration of the Court, having arrived at an understanding with the counsel for the Crown; and I propose to state to the House what was done in the discharge of that agreement so arrived at, because the case, I admit, is all the worse if, after having withdrawn that application from the consideration of the court, they did not fairly and honorably fulfil the obligation they had undertaken. On 21st July, 1885, the Deputy Minister of Justice sent this telegram from Regina to Drs. Clark and Howard :

"You are required here on Wednesday next as witnesses for the defence on Riel's trial. Expenses will be paid by Crown."

Mr. Lemieux and Mr. Burbidge sent the following telegram to Dr. Roy :

"Yourself, Vallée and Charles Vincelette required here Tuesday, 28th, as witnesses for defence—Riel's trial. Accept this as a warning, and please warn Vallée and Vincelette. Expenses paid by Crown."

Dr. Roy telegraphed back on 22nd July, thus :

"Dr. Vallée sick; unable to go. Dr. Clark, Medical Superintendent of Toronto Asylum, will replace him under same conditions and go if asked. Tell Lemieux and answer immediately."

To which answer was made as follows :—

"Lemieux sorry that Vallée cannot come, but cannot help it. Clark has been summoned. Will expect yourself and Vincelette as warned."

On the same day, 22nd July, Dr. Howard, telegraphed to Sir John A. Macdonald for confirmation of the telegram, and said: "If all right will go up at once." But Dr. Howard, in consequence, as it is stated by the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Curran), of infirmity of health, felt unable to undertake the long journey alone; and requested that a fee of $500 should be paid him. The member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), says he regrets that, in consequence of that, the Crown refused to procure his testimony. The hon. gentleman was not aware, of course, of the explanation which I am about to give him, but I am sure he will withdraw, at least, that condemnation of the Government, after I make him acquainted with what was actually done. Although Dr. Howard declined to go unless he was paid $500, and so notified the Department of Justice, the Minister, instead of declining to pay that fee, placed the matter before the counsel for the defence. This was my predecessor's telegram :

"Dr. Howard declines to go for less than $500 cash down. Will prisoner's counsel be satisfied with anyone else, or shall I pay him the money and start him off."

"ALEXANDER CAMPBELL."

To Sir Alexander's telegram the following telegram was sent to Ottawa for the purpose of giving Dr. Howard his reply. It was sent after consultation with the counsel for the defence and with their full concurrence :

"Defence do not ask Crown to pay any such fee. Please let Howard know that if he will not come for the fees allowed by law he need not come."

So the House now has the information with respect to that demand for $500—that we even offered to pay that fee, and start Dr. Howard off, if the counsel for the defence required him, and the answer was received that they did not desire the Crown to pay the fee. I shall not detain the House by reading a mass of correspondence for the purpose of showing what was done in relation to other witnesses. In regard to the witnesses in the North-West Territories, by a series of telegrams sent all over the country and summonses served by the mounted police, the attendance of all witnesses there, desired by the defence, was secured, and secured at the expense of the Crown; not merely were the expenses of the witnesses paid by the Crown, but the expense of having them summoned and telegraphed for, and every other expense in connection with the matter was defrayed by the Crown. All those witnesses, with the exception of Father Touse, who was unable to leave his parish for some reason, every witness in the North-West Territories desired by the counsel for the defence attended at the trial. If any person's attendance was not secured, it was not due to the slightest hesitation on the part of the Crown as regards expense or anything else. After making this statement I think we are not open to the imputation made by anyone, no matter how blinded he may be by prejudice, that the trial was unfairly conducted. I am glad to be able to say, with respect to the delay which was granted for procuring those witnesses that Mr. Fitzpatrick, in court, after this understanding was arrived at, made this statement :

"May it please your Honor.—I, on behalf of the defence, assume the responsibility of accepting the delay which, as stated by the Crown counsel, the Crown is prepared to offer us."

"Mr. Justice Richardson.—I think it is reasonable."

"Mr. Fitzpatrick—I think it is a reasonable time. I might, perhaps, have stretched a day or so, but not beyond that, because the means of communication are very quick now compared with what they were, and a witness can be got from Quebec, &c."

Yet, Sir, after that statement appeared in the public prints, a motion of censure has been advocated on the ground that it was dishonorable to refuse the prisoner a fair delay for the preparation of his trial, and one member said it was so base an outrage that men like Mr. Robinson, Mr. Osler, Mr. Casgrain and Mr. Burbidge would not have descended to such a cruelty unless they had received special instructions from the Government. I was curious to know what his real estimate of his professional brethren was, for whom he professed so high a respect. He thought they were Christian gentlemen, he thought them professional men of high honor, he thought they would not descend to an act of tyranny, an act of outrage against an unfortunate man struggling for his life, unless, forsooth, they had been told to do it by the Government. If those gentlemen were willing to do at the bidding of the Government, what would be so reprehensible, they could not deserve the high character which the hon. gentleman has given them. He must have entertained the opinion of his professional brethren which an English essayist did some time ago, when he said with regard to the tradition that counsel was bound, if he took a brief and was paid a fee, to do even dishonorable things for the benefit of his client, "it comes to this: that a man may do for a guinea what he would not do without it for the world." The next objection was that there was no sufficient interpretation of the testimony. I have only to say that the report of the trial shows, and the answers which have been given me upon that point by the counsel for the Crown, show, that at every stage of the case there was the best interpretation that could be got in the country. It was not for the Crown to provide an interpreter for the defendant's witnesses; it was enough for the Crown to pay the expenses, and the Crown did so. It was not for the Crown to select the interpreter, the choice was left to the prisoner's counsel. But such interpreters as the counsel produced were used, and when there was a complaint made that the interpretation was not strictly accurate, our counsel said: "There is a gentleman retained on each side who speaks the French language; you interpret the evidence of our witnesses and we will interpret the evidence of yours." There could be no unfairness in the interpretation, because there was on both sides a gentleman speaking the French language, and the slightest inaccuracy of interpretation would have been checked. With the exception of one instance, there was not a complaint made about the interpreter, and then it was removed as well as was possible. Then we were told that it was unfair that the Batoche papers were kept back from the prisoner. Now, those papers were not kept back in the ordinary sense of the word. Any paper which was demanded by the counsel for the defence would have been produced, and none were asked for by either of them. The application which was made was for a mass of papers captured at Batoche—not Riel's papers alone, but papers affecting the interests of eighty prisoners who were then in custody on a charge of high treason, and the demand was: "Give us at the trial of the first of those prisoners, all these papers; let us ransack all the evidence against the eighty others." and I think the House will readily understand that for other reasons than the one which was insinuated—that those papers might have developed something against some Minister of the Crown—they were withheld from an indiscriminate search on the part of gentlemen representing the defence, who were not in a position to call for any particular document or any particular set of documents, but simply wanted to search all through the papers in the possession of the Crown. I would ask those who have had experience in the prosecution of cases for the Crown, whether they ever knew of such an application being granted at the instance of the counsel for the defence, who said to the prosecuting counsel: "Give me before the trial begins an inspection of the whole of your brief, all your documents, every paper of every kind representing your side of all your cases for the term?" Then, Sir, it was said—and I need hardly, after the observations of the hon. member for West Durham, have referred to this point, and will simply dwell on it for a moment—it was said that there was an unfair exclusion of testimony. It was said, when Judge Richardson remarked that the evidence of a constitutional agitation was no justification of an unconstitutional agitation, and when the question was decided in favor of the Government, the passage in the blue book was held up to observation and quoted loudly, that the objection of the counsel for the Crown was: "Why, you are putting the Government on its trial." The hon. member for West Huron, said: "Why should not the Government be put on trial?" Well, Sir, one at a time. The trial then going on was the trial of Louis Riel, and I should be ashamed to say a word or to cite a line of authority to show that evidence relating to the conduct of the Government in relation to the land grievances in the North-West would not be admissible evidence in the prisoner's favor. But the hon. gentleman, when he referred to page 110, and read the expression—(I see it was made by the judge)—"it would be trying the Government," unfortunately forgot to read to the House what followed. It was unfortunate for the confidence which we would feel in his quotations hereafter in regard to this question, for if he had read further he would have shown that the counsel for the Crown disclaimed any mere attempt to shield the Government by that objection. Mr. Osler said:

"It is, as it were, a counter claim against the Government, and that is not open to any person on a trial for high treason. We have no desire to unduly limit my learned friend, but I cannot consent to try such an issue as that here.

"Mr. Lemieux.—I do not want to justify the rebellion; I want to show the state of things in the country so as to show that the prisoner was justified in coming into the country, and to show the circumstances under which he came.

"His Honor Mr. Justice Richardson.—Have you not done that already?"

"Mr. Lemieux.—I have perhaps to the satisfaction of the Court, but perhaps others may not be so well satisfied.

"Mr. Osler.—If you do not go any further we will withdraw our objection.

"Mr. Lemieux.—I want to get further facts, not in justification of the rebellion, but to explain the circumstances under which the accused came into the country. If I had a right to prove what I have already proved a minute ago, I am entitled to prove other facts. If I was right a minute ago, I should be allowed to put similar questions now.

"His Honor Mr. Justice Richardson.—The objection is not urged until you had gone as far as the counsel for the Crown thought you ought to go.

"Mr. Lemieux.—It is rather late now to object.

"Mr. Osler.—I warned my learned friend quietly before.

"Mr. Lemieux.—Well, I will put the question and it can be objected to.

"Q.—Will you say if the state of things in the country, the actual state of things in the country, in 1882, 1883 and 1884, and if to-day the state of things is the same as in 1882, 1883 and 1884, if justice has been done to the claims and just rights of the people?"

"Mr. Osler.—That question must be objected to; it could not have had anything to do with bringing the prisoner here. I object first as a matter of opinion; second, that it is a leading question, and third, that it is irrelevant to the issue.

Mr. Lemieux.—The most important objection is that it is leading. As to the opinion of the witness, I should think his opinion is valuable; it is facts I want from the witness, I suppose he can give his opinion based on the facts. If he says no or yes, I will ask him why, and he will give me his reason why.

"His Honor Mr. Justice Richardson.—That will be a matter of opinion.

"Mr. Lemieux.—I will put the question and you can object to it.

"Q. Do you know if at any time the Dominion Government agreed to accede to the demands made by the half-breeds and clergy, relative to the claims and rights you have spoken of in the preceding answer?"

"Mr. Osler.—I do not object to the question, if confined to a date prior to the 1st July, 1884, the time he was asked to come into the country, although the question is really irregular. I am not going on strict lines, but I do object to his asking as regards the present state of things. I do not object if he confines his questions to the time prior to the prisoner's coming to the country.

"Mr. Lemieux.—My question will show that the prisoner had reason to come. If the people had confidence in him, he had a right to come and help them, to try and persuade the Federal Government to grant what had been refused them so far.

"His Honor Mr. Justice Richardson.—Your question is what, Mr. Lemieux?"

"Mr. Osler.—I am willing that the question should be allowed if limited to the time prior to July, 1884.

"His Honor Mr. Justice Richardson to Mr. Lemieux.—Is that the way you put it?"

"Mr. Lemieux.—Yes.

"Mr. Osler.—Then we withdraw the objection."

In view of the confidence which we may fairly feel in the tribunals of this country until a case is established on the other side against any of them, I am glad to say, for the purpose of answering a charge directed against the fairness of this tribunal and on such slight grounds, that these grounds are totally annihilated by the very page from which the hon. gentleman read. Let me call the attention of the House to one other point with regard to the fairness of the trial, which strikes me as absolutely conclusive. That is, that if there had been an unfair ruling in that trial from beginning to end, either on the application to postpone, or on a question of evidence, or on any part of the judge's charge, it would have been laid open by the prisoner's counsel on their appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench in Manitoba. The prisoner had an advantage which no man has who is tried in the older Provinces. He had a right to appeal to a bench of judges sitting in another Province, far removed from the agitation in his own country, an appeal on every question of law and fact involved. Every lawyer knows that a prisoner in the Provinces has only these chances of appeal:

He has his chance of a writ of error, to bring up defects shown by the record, and as regards any objections to the evidence or to the rulings of the judge, the judge may himself decide whether he shall have an appeal or not. Louis Riel was not in that position. He had the right to bring before the bench in Manitoba every question of law or fact that arose on his trial, and when he took that appeal he was represented by the best counsel, I suppose, that this Dominion could have given him, and yet not a single exception was taken to the fairness of the trial or the rulings of the judge. The prisoner took this additional step, which is a very rare one in connection with criminal justice in this country—he applied to Her Majesty to exercise the prerogative by which Her Majesty, by the advice of Her Privy Council, is able to entertain an appeal in a case connected with criminal jurisprudence from any one of Her subjects in the Empire; and how is it that in the petition that was prepared to enable the prisoner to take the judgment of that high tribunal, which had to make its report to the fountain of justice itself in the British dominions—how is it that neither the prisoner's counsel, nor himself, nor his petition, nor anything said or written in his favor, urged a single objection to the fairness of the trial, the rulings of the judge at that trial, or the way in which the judge had directed the jury? I should suppose, Sir, that that was exceedingly significant. We were told, the other night, that the judgment of the Privy Council said nothing about the procedure of the trial—that it was silent on that point. The significance of that silence is all we want. When a man has a full opportunity to appeal, and takes his appeal, and makes no complaint about the fairness of a ruling, which would have given him his liberty if he could establish its error, I want to know if we need any more than his silence and the silence of the able counsel by whom he was advised and represented, to satisfy us that exceptions were not taken in the highest court of appeal in the Empire for the simple reason that they did not exist. I have another piece of testimony with regard to that, if that were not conclusive, as I should suppose it would be, and that is this: The Regina Leader of August 13, contained this statement of what took place immediately after the trial:

"The counsel for the defence, Messrs. Fitzpatrick, Lemieux and Greenshields, waited on Judge Richardson before they went East, and thanked him for the fairness and consideration which had characterised his rulings."

Notwithstanding the statement which was made by an interviewer of a Montreal paper, and which was read to this House a few evenings ago, I hesitate to believe that Mr. Lemieux actually changed his mind when he got among his friends in the Province of Quebec, and did, either for the purpose of creating sympathy for his client or making capital against the Government, say anything that he would not have said at Regina about the fairness of the trial. Mr. Fitzpatrick has also spoken again. At a public meeting in Montreal, he said:

"It was unfair to arraign before the tribunal of public opinion the judge and jury who tried Riel. They were simply the outcome of the law as it was found in the Statute Book."

And yet, Sir, because we administered, in the case of Louis Riel, the judgment which the law pronounced, the confidence of this House is asked to be withdrawn from the Government. I must read from the Winnipeg Free Press an extract which was read to the House once or twice before, and which I am, therefore, almost ashamed to repeat, but which I must repeat, because it applies directly to the point in hand, and comes from a newspaper as hostile to this Government as any newspaper in the Dominion. It was published on the 17th of December, immediately after the execution. Some papers have been accused of inconsistency in advocating Riel's execution beforehand and taking the opposite ground afterwards; but after his execution the Winnipeg Free Press said:

"Riel was fairly tried, honestly convicted, laudably condemned, and justly executed."

But, Sir, if our confidence in the tribunals themselves be not sufficient, if the fact that the courts of appeal before which the case was taken, ruled that the trial was fair and that justice had been done, be not sufficient, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if, with any sense of candor or fair play they can ask that this Government should be condemned for not changing the sentence on the ground that the trial had been unfair, when there has not been down to this hour a petition or request presented to the Government, either from Louis Riel, from his counsel, from his ecclesiastical superiors, or from any of the advisers and sympathisers he has had throughout this country, for the commutation of the sentence, on the ground that the trial was in any sense unfair. And yet, Sir, after the decision of the jury, after the decision of the judge, after the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Manitoba, where, as I have said, he had an extraordinary advantage; after the disposal of his case before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and without a single utterance from anybody, either himself or any sympathiser, that anything was unfair, this House is asked to carry this resolution on the ground that his trial was unfair, and give what Riel never asked, redress on the ground that he had been unfairly tried. The condemnation of the prisoner having been arrived at, the duty of the Executive commenced. The first question we had to consider was the criminality of the prisoner, and with almost a certainty that I shall be exhausting your patience, I find it absolutely necessary to quote even extracts which have been read to the House before, for the purpose of showing what the criminality of this man was and how the Executive should have dealt with him, not only because it is in the regular course of my argument, but because this condemnation has been commented on by the other side for the purpose of drawing a very different conclusion from it. Dr. Willoughby, at page 12 of the report, referring to the prisoner, gave evidence as to what the latter told him:

"He said they had time and time again petitioned the Government for redress, and the only answer they received each time was an increase of police."

"Q. What next did he say?—A. He said, now I have my police, referring to men at the door."

"Q. Those 60 or 70 men?—A. Yes; he pointed to them and he said, 'You see now I have my police. In one little week that little Government police will be wiped out of existence.'"

This is the man who, we are told, was to be regarded as a loyal subject, because at some time he drank a glass of liquor to the health of the Queen. This is the man who, I understood the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) to say the other night, must have come to this country for the purpose of pressing a constitutional agitation, although one of the first things he said was that the force that supports Her Majesty's Government, and represents there the law of the country and the rights of the settlers, was to be absolutely wiped out of existence:

"Q. That was the reason why he said the settlers of Saskatoon had no right to protection?—A. He said: 'We will now show Saskatoon or the people of Saskatoon who will do the killing.'"

"Q. Anything else?—A. He said that the time had now come when he was to rule this country or perish in the attempt."

Shall it be said he came to this country under any mistake as to his position, under any idea that he was to be treated once again as a political offender, under any notion that he had a right to receive again the clemency of the Crown which, fifteen years before, he had trampled under foot and spat upon? No; he knew well the real issue.

"Q. You say he referred to the previous rebellion of 1870, what did he say in regard to that?—A. He referred to that and he said that that rebellion, the rebellion of fifteen years ago, would not be a patch upon this one."

"Q. Did he say anything further with regard to that?—A. He did; he spoke of the number that had been killed in that rebellion."

"Q. What did he say as to that?—A. I cannot state as to what he said, but it was to the effect that this rebellion was to be of far greater extent than the former."

This rebellion, carried on in the lines, hon. gentlemen opposite say, of a constitutional agitation, was to be of far greater extent than the former, with regard to the number killed. Thomas McKay, on page 18 of the report, gives this evidence:

"Q. Well?—A. He accused me of neglecting them. I told him it was simply a matter of opinion. That I had certainly taken an interest in them, and that my interest in the country was the same as theirs, and that I had advised them time and again, and that I had not neglected them. I also said that he had neglected them a long time, if he took as deep an interest as he professed to. He became very excited, and got up and said, 'You don't know what we are after'."

Constitutional agitation, hon. gentlemen opposite say; petitions, these gentlemen say; a newspaper enterprise, these gentlemen say, but Louis Riel said:

"It is blood! blood! We want blood! It is a war of extermination! Everybody that is against us is to be driven out of the country."

Driven out by a newspaper I suppose.

"Q. He used very violent language to you?—A. Yes; he finally said it was blood, and the first blood they wanted was mine."

Then follows the passage about the witness having so little blood in his miserable body that they could put it in a spoon.

"He also said: This was Crozier's last opportunity of averting bloodshed, that unless he surrendered Fort Carlton, an attack would be made at 12 o'clock."

Now, what was the summons he sent to Fort Carlton? What was the summons he sent to the officer who was in charge of the portion of the forces, which alone protected the lives and property of the settlers, the force which alone protected that Territory for the Queen and Canada. The summons was:

"In the case of non-acceptance, we intend to attack you when tomorrow, the Lord's Day, is over, and to commence without delay a war of extermination upon all those who have shown themselves hostile to our rights."

What was the feeling that went throughout this country then? What was the conviction that forced itself upon every man's mind when that piece of evidence got into print? Why even those papers, and I am willing to assume the Toronto Globe was one of them, which were anxious to keep public judgment in abeyance until the result of the trial was arrived at, came to the conclusion that for Louis Riel all was over. On the 3rd August, 1885, the Globe said:

"The moment Riel's letter was put in evidence it became clear that the prisoner had been not only a participator in but the actual instigator and leading mind of the rebellion. No shadow of a doubt remained that he was guilty as charged in the indictment. The testimony that followed only deepened the certainty of his guilt. There never was made out a clearer case, and the only doubt that remained was as to the extent of the prisoner's responsibility. As to this the medical experts differed, and it would have been natural that the jury too should have differed. But the jury seem to have brushed aside all the medical evidence, and dealing with facts only, they returned a verdict of guilty. They could do no less."

Mr. J. W. Astley said:

"Q. Did he speak to you of his personal safety?—A. He had very little to say about the half-breeds; as far as regards himself he seemed the principal object."

Mr. Tompkins said:

"Q. Can you give us anything of importance he said to you as to his intentions?—A. On one occasion he said that he had three enemies, and enumerated them as the Government, the Hudson Bay Company, and the Police. He also stated to me he would give the police every opportunity to surrender, and if they did not do so there would be bloodshed; on another occasion he told me he had heard the Lieutenant-Governor was on his way up and that he had sent an armed body to capture him.

"Q. Was there anything said as to the length of time he had been considering these matters?—A. Yes, he told me he had been waiting fifteen years and at last his opportunity had come.

"Q. Who was in charge of the church?—A. Rev. Father Moulin.

"Q. Did you see him on that occasion?—A. When the crowd got to the church he came out and he wished to speak to the people. Mr. Riel said: 'No we won't let him speak. Take him away, take him away, we will tie him.'"

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish).

He was to have no constitutional agitation this time. He did not want any message of peace or mercy. He had waited fifteen years; his time had come, and he was to rule or perish in the attempt.

"Q. Did he say anything about taking possession of the church at the same time?—A. Yes, Riel said: 'I will take possession of the church.' Father Moulin said: 'I protest against you touching the church.' Riel said: 'Look at him; he is a Protestant.'"

Our hon. friends opposite say that that allusion to the priest as being a Protestant shows insanity—I say it shows the acuteness of his wit. A Catholic priest, standing on the threshold of his own church, addresses a protest to these men, and Riel brings down the laughter and derision of his people by saying: "He has protested, he is a protestant." Then we come to the evidence which I venture to say hon. gentlemen opposite would give a great deal to obliterate from this case, the evidence of his venality, the evidence that he offered to take $35,000 and make the cause of the half-breeds his own in a special sense, and that he was even willing to come to such moderate terms as to take $10,000. I venture to say that, when the excitement which exists in connection with this question is over, there will be no man, woman or child in this country who will accept the weak excuse that has been set up in this regard, that his object was to start a newspaper in the United States. I ask hon. gentlemen who wish to set up this excuse, how they consider the evidence which is given by Nolin, who says he was willing to take $10,000—he had come down in his terms—but he was willing to do more; he was willing to take that money and go and live anywhere that the Government wanted him to go to. He was not particular about country; he was a cosmopolitan. Siberia was good enough for him if he could have $10,000 of Canadian money in his pockets, and the half-breeds might suffer as long as they had before. It is in conversation with Nolin that he refers to the newspapers. Remark this, that although the same statement is made by Father André and by Jackson, to neither of these men did he set up this absurd pretence that he would use this money to start a newspaper. He knew that Father André, with whom he had a like conversation, and whom he expected to act as agent to procure this money for him, was not a man to be deceived by any humbug like that, and therefore he did not offer to him any such pretext. It was only when talking to a half-breed, a man more ignorant than himself, but a man to whom, for his shameful venality, he had to give some excuse, even if it was only humbug and imposture, that he put over his conduct that thin pretence that he was to set up a newspaper in the American territory. When he undertakes to discuss the question of a bribe, or of selling out the half-breeds, with any man of critical faculties or any man of information, he does not set up that pretence at all, but says boldly: "The cause of the half-breeds will be my cause, if I can get $35,000 or even $10,000, and I will go where you please." They tell us it must have been an indication of his madness when he proposed that we should give him $35,000 and that he was going to the United States territory and start a newspaper. No, Sir, it had not even that excuse; it was a thin disguise put on for the purpose of deceiving the ignorant, and a disguise which he did not attempt to use when he was discussing the same thing with men of greater intelligence, who would have laughed in his face had he propounded such a miserable imposture. This man had come into the country on the assumption that the whole North West was like a barrel of gunpowder which only needed a spark to explode it; he said to the half-breeds: "You have been petitioning long enough, petition no longer;" and, with arms in his hands, and after he had declared that the day of petitioning was at an end, and the time was come for a war of extermination, he was willing to abandon the enterprise, was not only willing to abandon the petitions, because it was, he said, a time for blood and petitions had failed, it was a time to succeed or perish in the attempt, he was willing to start for the United States and set up a newspaper! I envy the charity of the gentlemen who believe that excuse which has been offered. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), could not believe that it was offered as an excuse, as his colleague beside him believed (Mr. Laurier), but he supposed it was evidence of insanity. When he comes to read the evidence again, he will see that it was used for the purpose of deceiving one of his own comrades in arms, a man who would probably have had enough nerve and courage to fell him to the earth if he had not used some such excuse to cover his baseness and venality. At page 94 I find this:

"He said: 'Before the grass is high in that country you will see foreign armies in that country. I will commence by destroying Manitoba, and then I will come and destroy the North-West and take possession of it.'"

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Some hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear" in answer to that. The prospect at that time of foreigners being in arms in this country was not a subject of ridicule. If it was in this quarter of the country, it was regarded more gravely in ours, and I know that, when our own volunteers were leaving for the North-West, and the mind and heart of every man thrilled as he saw them go, there was a sense of pain and horror at the report which was heard that an armed force of Fenians had actually invaded the North-West for the purpose of co-operating against them; and yet, before twelve months are passed, hon. members of this House, who must have been informed of these reports and aware of the sensation they made in this country from end to end, and of the probability that existed of invaders coming again upon the territory of Canada to assist in this enterprise, think that this House and this country have so far forgotten the circumstance that they can say "hear, hear" in derision, and can read this report as simply an evidence of the man's insanity. There is a feature of the case which I shall have to come to now, and which, in my humble opinion, stained this man's character with the deepest dye with which the conduct of any convict in the country was ever stained, and that is the feature of his inciting the Indians of the country, not merely to be allies of his in the sense in which the Indians were allies in some of the cases cited by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), not simply to co-operate with him, and to act under his command, but to rise and to attack peaceful settlements, to attack weak garrisons—"rise, plunder, burn and destroy." We know that they obeyed his command, and we know that the lives not only of peaceful settlers but of Government officers, lives of missionaries precious in the sight of God and man, were laid down upon that prairie as the result of the behest he scattered to the Indians of the North-West. Well might the hon. gentleman have said, not in this Parliament, when surrounded by allies who will vote for them on this motion for the first time perhaps, not in this House where he can get sympathy by sounding another note, but in the great Province of Ontario, surrounded by his own party and his own followers, well might he then say:

"I have always held that both parties might be deeply guilty—Government for neglect, delay, and mismanagement; and the insurgents for rising in rebellion—always a grave offence against the State, and in this case aggravated by the incitement to the Indians to revolt."

But when we come to Parliament what we hear is: "We cannot hold our heads very high about the Indians. There was a time when Wolfe and Montcalm had Indians for allies; there was a time when Brant led our Indian allies, and Tecumseh was a very great man in the opinion of a great many people. Brant showed that Indian allies might be employed and might be very successfully employed—barring the torture, of course."

I have read in times past some speeches of the hon. gentleman on the subject of the effect which the policy of the Government of this country would have upon prospective immigration into the North-West; I have read some speeches in which he made eloquent denunciations of the policy of the Government now in power on the ground that they were placing such burdens upon our people that intending European immigrants would be unwilling to share the fortunes of this country, were unwilling to become partners in the great enterprise which we had undertaken in the settlement of the North-West. If we adopt the hon. gentleman's view of Friday night about the Indians of the North-West Territories, I wonder what the immigrants will say before coming to Canada to enter into a co-partnership with us; I wonder what our agents would have to say in reply to intending immigrants who would tell them: "You in Canada have 20,000 or 30,000 Indians, many of them in a savage state, many of them pagans; let us know what your laws are for the protection of settlers in the North-West, and let us know what the policy of your Government is as to the enforcement of those laws." I think our agents would have to tell them: "Our laws are excellent, our laws make it murder, make it treason, to incite these Indians to revolt, but the policy of the Government, in view of what has been propounded on the floors of Parliament, must be that as regards the Indians we don't hold our heads very high; although we have some objections to torture." I think, Sir, that after a declaration of that kind immigration into the North-West will be very scanty indeed, notwithstanding the strong inducement that we would not permit the Indians to torture. I think, Sir, that the settlers in the North West now, to whom the faith of this country is pledged that we will honestly enforce the laws—would be very much jeopardised if we allowed the idea to go abroad that to incite the Indians to revolt could be treated as any thing but a heinous crime, to be visited by the severest punishment of the law. I think, Sir, that it would be prejudicial to the safety of the people who are there now, with whom, as I have said, we have made a contract, if we do not hold our heads high on this question now. There may have been times in the past, on which differences of opinion existed upon this question. The hon. gentleman knows that when Indian allies were co-operating with the forces of Great Britain over one hundred years ago—not co-operating as these men were, not set on the war path to kill, burn and destroy—the action was defended upon the ground that they were co-operating under command of British officers, and that it would be far safer to have them so employed than to leave them to make war in their own fashion. The hon. gentleman knows that the most eloquent statesman in Great Britain made the hall of Parliament ring with denunciation of such outrageous barbarism. He knows that when a noble Lord rose to defend such a practice in the House of Lords and to contend that it was even excusable, he was told in an eloquent reply that the picture of his ancestor frowned upon him at the disgrace which that night he had brought upon his country. And the hon. gentleman knows that since that time, and since Indian forces were employed even in Canada, the public sentiment of all civilised countries has brought about a change in public law, and that it is now not only against humanity, but against law to have Indian allies, whatever Brant may have thought to the contrary. But I am not speaking of Indian allies, I am speaking of the incitement of Indians in murder; and speaking for myself only, but speaking for myself as the Minister who is charged with the duty of advising, to some extent, in the dispensation of the clemency of the Crown, in such cases, I say that the man who undertakes, in the North-West, in the condition in which the Indians are now, to incite these Indians to rise and to commit war and depredation, either upon the garrisons or upon the white settlers of the North-West, takes his life in his hand, and when he appeals to me for mercy he shall get justice. Now, Sir, turning again to the Winnipeg Free Press of 17th November, 1885, only a day after the execution, we find this passage :

"Riel has expiated his crimes. He was fairly tried, honestly convicted, laudably condemned and justly executed. There is not one law for the French and another for the English in this country."

"Riel was a mercenary, cold-blooded self-seeker, and we cannot understand how his compatriots in Quebec could have been so misguided as to espouse his cause, which was not the cause of the French more than it was the cause of other Canadians."

And the same paper, on 18th November :

"It is evident, therefore, that the sympathy of the people of Quebec has been worked on, not by the wrongs of the half-breeds, but by the French blood which flowed in Riel's veins. They undertook to uphold the criminal because of his nationality, and have been shown that the laws of Canada are no respectors of persons."

I cite that, not for the purpose of reflecting upon the sentiment which prevailed among our friends in Quebec, but for the purpose of showing what the sentiment on the spot or near the spot, so far as we can gather it from the press, was, at the time immediately succeeding the execution, and the utterance comes from a portion of the press deadly hostile to the present Administration. But, Sir, upon this question of criminality we were not left to decide merely upon the evidence, bristling, as it is, with condemnation of the prisoner's conduct from beginning to end. We had remonstrances coming to the Government, representations coming to the Government with regard to the cases of the other State prisoners who were then in our hands. In the consideration of them we found representations with regard to the criminality of Louis Riel which could not be disregarded, representations favorable to the other State prisoners, and made favorable to them on the ground that they were victims in his tyrannical hands, and, Mr. Speaker, although these were not made for the purpose of injuring him, if we had disregarded them, if we had commuted this sentence and we had been obliged to bring these papers down, the Government would have been challenged in this House for having disregarded that evidence proceeding from the most disinterested sources, evidence directly condemnatory of the prisoner, and for having disregarded it under the miserable pretext that it was laid before them in connection with some other men's cases. What did Bishop Grandin say in a petition sent by him to the Government after the trial and condemnation of Riel, and after the sentence had been pronounced? and in reference to what he said, and in reference to what some of the other ecclesiastics in the North-West said, I must differ from a statement made on Friday evening by the hon. member for West Durham, as regards the feeling of those persons towards the convict. He intimated that if there was any chance of their judgment being swerved, it was probably swerved against the prisoner because he had acted in hostility to their faith, he had become an apostate from their religion. But anyone who has read the history of these troubles in the North-West knows that the conduct of these men was influenced by no such consideration. Everyone knows that from the first to the last when he became reconciled to them—I go further and am compelled in stating the mere truth to say that from the time he fell into the hands of the law and before he became reconciled at all to them—the conduct which those gentlemen exhibited towards him, the efforts which were put forward in his behalf, were characterised not merely by generosity, not merely by sympathy, not merely by mercy, but I might almost say, as regards some of them, by active partisanship on his behalf. I have been citing not the testimony of witnesses against Riel but the testimony of men who in spite of every degradation, insult and outrage that could be heaped on them and their religion, struggled to the very last to save him. Bishop Grandin says :

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish).

"It is well known by all who closely studied this movement that a miscreant abusing a certain amount of knowledge, making use of a false and hypocritical piety, and by menaces and threats of inevitable destruction, deceived the half-breeds and forced them to take up arms against the Government. The ascendancy which he had gained over them was such that the greater part could not and dared not resist him."

Father Fourmond, after the trial and before the publication of the statement which was read to the House by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), said in a deposition :

" 'Louis David' Riel in his strange and alarming folly fascinated our poor half-breeds as the snake is said to fascinate its victims, abusing, for his own ends, the great confidence that all the half-breeds reposed in him, a confidence founded upon his influence over their minds through his great and impassioned language and above all by the appearance of his profound religious feeling and devotion, which he displayed in the most glaring and hypocritical manner, which was rendered so convincing to their minds by his public proclamation of his mission as an inspired prophet, which he forced upon their imagination in the most insidious and diabolical manner. * * * To impress the people and keep them within his power this man Riel resorted to all kinds of trickery."

Father Fourmond further states :

"Oh, my poor people, I could not restrain them, they were under the infatuation of this arch traitor and trickster till he got them committed by the effusion of blood, then they were in his power, and he used that power without any feeling of mercy. * * * I also declare that during the trouble I had conversations with several of the persons who were in the rebel camp, and I found a large number of them there against their will, and only remained there because of the fear of being shot down, did they try to escape or desert."

Had we no right, in considering the appeals of this man's friends for clemency, to consider the statements which show that he did not come into this country with any willingness whatever to conduct or allow a constitutional agitation, but that from the very first this "arch-traitor and trickster kept those men in his camp under peril of their lives."

Mr. MILLS. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him one question. Under what circumstances was that paper prepared? We have not seen it.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). These papers were laid before the Government in connection with many others asking for commutation of the sentence on other half-breed prisoners and Indians. They were part of the materials which were before the Government, and which had been laid before them at a time subsequent to Riel's condemnation and before his execution. Father André, in his deposition in the case of Joseph Arcand, says :

"I most solemnly declare from my own personal knowledge, that with the exception of Gabriel Dumont, Napoléon Nault and Damase Carrière, now deceased, not one of the half-breeds had the least idea or suspicion that there was any probability of danger of rebellion until they were so completely involved in the toils of Riel, and he led them on until they were so compromised that there was no escape for them."

"They were made to religiously believe that they had no mercy to expect at the hands of the soldiers, police, or from the Government of Canada—if they were taken prisoners or wounded, they were told nothing but death with un pitying torture awaited them at the hands of the soldiers and police, and their daughters and sisters would be dishonored before their eyes, their children hacked to pieces, and all their earthly property utterly destroyed, and their whole nation exterminated by the brutal soldiery."

Referring to Pierre Parenteau, Father André says :

"This good old man was misled by the wily Riel."

Father André in his testimony referring to Emmanuel Champagne, says :

"By threats and force the old man was kept there" (viz., in Riel's service).

Referring to the case of Philip Garnot, he says :

"Riel ordered him to take up arms. He refused to do so. * * * Day after day for four days Riel ordered him to arm and take part in the movement, and at last Riel ordered him to be dragged to the camp, where, overpowered by terror of his life and fear of loss of his property, he consented to act as secretary."

As to Baptiste Vandal, he says :

"He resisted for a long time before he could be forced to join Riel, and did so only from fear and compulsion."

As to Joseph Delorme, he says :

"It was only by force and threats he was compelled to take part with the rebels."

As to Alexandre Cadieux, he says :

"He was seized by Riel and forced into his service."

As to Joseph Pilon, he says :

"He was ordered by Riel to come into camp or he would force him to come. Pilon, when he was threatened by Riel, came to the priest and cried when telling what was wanted of him. Riel, by force and threats against his life, compelled him to serve his purpose."

Father André thus refers to the case of the Tourond brothers :

"The crafty Riel tried every way to induce the boys to join him but without success. . . . Riel went day after day to their poor widowed mother and with devilish cunning played on her superstition and credulity. He told her of his holy visions, &c., . . . and the poor woman in her simple faith in his divine mission, prayed for her fine young sons to go forth and battle under the banner of Heaven."

Referring to the prisoners generally he says :

"They were misled by one who thoroughly knew their weak minds and their hearts. They were called on in the name of God and of the Holy Saints, by one who declared himself ordained by God to do a great and good work. They were blinded by pretended visions and messages from the Holy Ghost, poor people, in their trusting confidence they were led on to desolation, misery and death."

These were the statements of persons who, as I have said, were not willing to give testimony against Riel, but they are statements which confirmed the evidence, which confirmed everything known as to his conduct; and although the question of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) seems to imply that statements of this kind should not have been used against Riel—for I can understand his interruption in no other way—would not this House have rung with denunciations if the Government, disregarding all these considerations, had exercised clemency to so unworthy an applicant, and had told the House that at the time they had this evidence of his conduct in their possession.

After Recess.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I have still a few observations to make as to the weight of criminality which is disclosed in the evidence in this case and in the documents which were laid before the Government. I desire in the first place in dealing with the remainder of my argument on that question to take up a branch of it upon which I think a very singular doctrine has been propounded. I mean that branch of the argument with relation to this having been a second offence of this convict. The argument was used here that if the fact of his having committed an offence previously in any way affected the commutation of the sentence for the crime for which he eventually suffered, then he was executed for the first offence. I think every person who has had any legal training will admit on a moment's reflection that this is an unsound view to take of the consequences of a previous conviction as to any criminal proceeding. I think that those who have not had the benefit of a legal training will admit, Sir, after the few words of explanation I have to make, that it is an unphilosophical and unreasonable view to take, even if it were not unsound in point of law. The policy of considering, not only when dealing with the subject of the commutation of the sentence, but in imposing sentence upon offenders—the policy of considering what the past history of the convict has been is one which is recognised, not only in the practice of every tribunal administering criminal justice, but is recognised by Parliament as well. We all know, Sir, that there are whole series of enactments intended to provide, in the case of a second or subsequent conviction, not only that the punishment may be heavier than it could have been in the first conviction, but in many of them that it must be heavier, and the discretion of the judge is to a large extent taken away, and he is prevented, in the case of the second and subsequent offences, from dealing out such a punishment as the law allows him to deal out with regard to a first offence. We all know with regard to the criminal legislation of the mother country, that not only are longer sentences imposed and heavier punishments inflicted upon those who have committed an offence the second time, but that a punishment different in kind is very often meted out; and that while a man who has been convicted of a first offence is allowed to go with a fine or an imprisonment or both, that in some cases flogging is provided on the second occasion, notwithstanding that on the first conviction the convict has either suffered the penalty or has been pardoned. It is quite true, as was stated by the hon. member for West Durham, that after a man has suffered a penalty for the first offence he is to be considered a new man, as if he had been pardoned or amnestied. But the moment he commits a second offence whether he has suffered the penalty of the first, or was exonerated by pardon or amnesty, it is not only legitimate but it is incumbent, according to the practice of the courts and according to the practice of the Executive in dealing with the prerogative of mercy, to consider the past history of the offender. So fully has that policy been recognised that, in respect of many offences and crimes, the prosecution is allowed to give in evidence the fact of the offender having been convicted before, with a view to increasing the weight or changing the kind of the punishment, notwithstanding that in relation to that previous offence there may have been a commutation or a pardon, or what has served the same purpose, an expiation of the full penalty for that first offence. On the 31st October, 1882, this question came up in the British House of Commons in relation to a sentence imposed upon a female—a very long sentence of imprisonment for a comparatively slight offence. The Home Secretary had declined to interfere with the sentence and so far from its being successfully contended on that occasion that the Executive was not justified in looking at the previous history of the criminal, Sir William Harcourt said :

"I would venture to submit to those who criticise sentences of this kind that the previous history of offenders should be inquired into, because a false impression is produced when it is supposed that a woman is sentenced to a severe punishment for what appears to be a slight offence, when the fact is that she is an incurable offender with whom it is impossible to deal without keeping her in prison."

Changing the illustration from the kind of case in hand, let us suppose, in the case of a prisoner convicted of ordinary murder, that he has been sentenced to death but has prevailed on the Executive to exercise clemency, and has had his sentence commuted either to life servitude or a long term. Let us suppose that after the expiration of that term he has committed another murder, and again applies to the Executive for clemency. I address myself not only to members of the legal profession in the House, but to laymen as well, and I ask if there would be anything unreasonable or unjust in the Executive considering the fact that on a previous occasion this convict had committed the same offence and that the punishment which the Executive thought sufficient to deter him for all time to come from repeating it had utterly failed of its purpose? Whether the Executive would not be censurable, as we are asked to be censured now, if for the second time they treated that offender precisely as if he had never committed any such offence before? There can be no misunderstanding upon this subject as to the practice in the Department over which I have the honor to preside, because when an application is made, as the hon. member for West Durham knows, for executive clemency, in relation to a prisoner undergoing imprisonment, before advice by the Minister of Justice is tendered to His Excellency, a report is presented, not only in relation to the trial upon which he has been convicted, but in relation to his conduct in prison, and particularly as to whether he has ever suffered conviction before. So that it is not only consistent with the policy of legislation, it is not only consistent with the ordinary practice of the tribunals which administer criminal justice, but it is consistent with the ordinary practice of the Department of Justice to consider in every case the previous history of the criminal, before clemency is exercised or before any advice is offered as to the exercise of Executive clemency. Apart from the evidence we had in this case, there were upon the records of the country, in relation to this offender and his former career in this country, facts which the Executive could not have ignored if it had been necessary to take notice of them. I do not say for a moment that the Executive were influenced by those facts; but now that we are assailed and it is said that in the execution of this man a great wrong has been done to the administration of criminal justice, I have a right to avail myself of everything that may be serviceable to refute the charge. Upon the public records we might have found that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), referring to an act committed by this man 15 years ago—an act which was subsequently covered by the clemency of the Crown—described it as “a cold-blooded murder,” as “that barbarous event,” as “not a mere political offence,” and he desired to put upon record, and did put upon record, in the annals of the Assembly of which he was a distinguished member, “the people’s stern resolve that that death should be avenged.” We might have found upon the public records the statement by Lord Carnarvon, in a despatch from the Colonial Office—one of those despatches which were referred to as helping to make up the constitution—that he mourned over the fact that the Legislature of Canada “had been disgraced by the election to the House of Commons and the presence within its walls of a criminal like Riel.” We might have found upon the public records, if it had been necessary to look any farther, the statement by Lord Lisgar in relation to what that man did 15 years ago, that he had committed “a cruel, wicked and unnecessary crime.” We might have found upon the records of this House, turning back to the 11th of February, 1875, a discussion of this kind which took place when my hon. friend the Minister of Customs was addressing this House:

“The hon. member for South Bruce certainly used this question in more places than one. He designated it in this House as a cold-blooded murder.”

“Hon. Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.”

“Mr. BOWELL. He designated Riel as one guilty of murder.”

“Hon. Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.”

“Mr. BOWELL. The same hon. gentleman in this House remarked that the murder of Scott was an unprovoked and damnable murder.”

“Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.”

These statements, Mr. Speaker, were not the passionate enunciations of Orange lodges inflamed against this man on account of his race, his religion, his animosity towards one of their brethren, and they were evidence which the Executive could not have over-looked if it had been necessary for them to go beyond the evidence in the case, or the documents before them in relation to the recent outbreak, and to enquire what the previous history of this criminal was, as the British Home Secretary does, and as every man who has anything to do with the prerogative of clemency in this country is bound to do before advising the Crown to exercise that clemency. I propose now to pass for a few moments to that branch of the subject relating to General Middleton’s negotiations with regard to Riel. The fact has been developed now, by the speech of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence, that although Louis Riel had been invited to surrender by General Middleton’s letter, that invitation was never accepted. It has been developed now, that Louis Riel was captured, and captured, not because he allowed himself to be captured, but because, the district in which he was, being surrounded with troops, there was no chance of escape except to one mounted and skilled in the country, as Gabriel Dumont was. He did not, then, comply with that invitation; he was captured; and he had the art and cunning, not such as a lunatic would show, but the art and cunning he had exhibited all through his career, of producing the letter and claiming safe conduct under it. But every man who has read the history of this case knows that legal proceedings were not those that Louis Riel feared, and in relation to which he asked the protection of General Middleton. He knew perfectly well that General Middleton had not the power to pledge the Executive to anything, nor was Louis Riel looking so far ahead as that. On the day Mr. Astley procured the letter and invited him to surrender, the condition was that firing should cease. Riel was unable, even if willing, to stop the firing on his own side, and he feared that if he should surrender, the result might be the loss of his life or his being wounded while being brought into camp; and we all know that for that reason, as is shown by the evidence, the surrender was not accomplished; nor was it pretended that when, three days after, he was captured in a field, he was attempting to surrender, or attempting anything but flight. There was also in his mind, evidently, a sense of alarm at what might be the result of his being taken into a camp where the hostile soldiery of this Dominion were. And in relation to that I wish to refer to an observation which was made on Friday evening, and which seemed to cast some aspersion on the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence with regard to his observations. It was suggested that it would be a dreadful thing to have it go abroad; and I suppose it was not intended to be insinuated, but it was almost conveyed by the speech of the hon. member for West Durham that the impression intended to be made by the observation of the Minister of Militia and Defence was that there was danger of Louis Riel being lynched by the volunteers, and that we were putting forth that argument as an explanation of the letter and of his conduct. Everybody who heard the hon. Minister knows that the question in hand is not what was really necessary; everybody knows that the safe conduct of General Middleton was unnecessary to protect any man from the violence of our volunteers; the simple question was, what it was that Louis Riel feared—what the danger was that he asked to be protected against; and if he asked to be protected against the violence of the volunteers there certainly was no imputation against the honor and gallantry of that corps, as was attempted to be represented, in the criticism of what was said by my hon. colleague the other day. I propose to deal as briefly as possible with the contention that this crime should have been mercifully dealt with, in consequence of its being a political offence. It is true that the crime of treason, technically, and in a strictly legal view, may be always said to be a political crime in the same sense as that in which we speak of the “political existence of the sovereign,” and the “political divisions of the country.” But it is equally true that, although technically a political crime, it is not always of necessity such an offence as comes within the recognised rule of civilised countries by which clemency is extended to political offenders. We have in every case to consider, not what technically the crime is called, because, although it may have amounted to treason, the overt acts which constituted the treason may not themselves have been a political offence. If any one assassinated his sovereign from private malice or private revenge, or to gratify some motive of that kind, the offence in one sense would be political, because the crime of high treason had been committed, but nobody would contend that it came within that class of political offences, in respect of which it is said that clemency ought always to be exercised. The class of political offences in respect of which it is said that clemency is always exercised in civilised countries, consists of those offences which are committed by a people while the country is in a state of civil war. After civil war has prevailed, clemency is always extended to those persons who, either by the contagion received from their leaders or from the impulse of the enterprise itself or from the patriotism with which they were inspired by the circumstances of the country, were induced to follow their leaders into acts of rebellion; but, it may be that in the course of the rebellion offences were committed which were very different from political offences in the ordinary sense of the term. We must in all these cases look at each individual case, and ascertain whether the overt acts which constitute the treason or treason-felony are themselves political offences in the ordinary sense of the rule I have mentioned; although, taking a strictly technical or legal view, they might all be classed in that category. To show you that this is no new or finely spun theory, I will refer you to the debate which took place in the British House of Commons, from which the hon. member from West Durham (Mr. Blake) made several quotations—the debate in connection with the Fenian prisoners who were concerned in the murder of constable Brett. In the first place the men were under conviction for treason-felony. In a strictly technical sense, that is as much a political offence as high treason, and if their case had to be looked at simply under the legal classification of the crime, undoubtedly it would be considered simply as a political offence. The prisoners were all members of the Fenian brotherhood, bound, as we all know, by a secret oath to aid one another and to enter upon every enterprise on which they were ordered, which would tend to the advancement of the national cause. In pursuance of that obligation, it became the duty of those men, in so far as the obligation which they had undertaken could be said to impose any duty, to attempt to rescue a prisoner, a member of the same organisation, concerned in the same treasonable enterprise. In the course of a successful attempt to rescue that man, they killed a police constable; they were arrested and tried and all suffered sentence for treason-felony, which, if we take the legal classification of the crime, was as much a political offence as the crime of high treason. Mr. Gladstone said:

“I contended when in an official position, and still contend, that the offence of the principal part of those prisoners does not fall purely within the category of political offences.

“What constitutes a political offence? It is quite clear that an act does not become a political offence because there was a political motive in the mind of the offender. The man who shot Mr. Percival and the man who intended to shoot Sir R. Peel did not become political offenders merely on this ground. By a political offence I at least understand an offence committed under circumstances approaching to the character of civil war.”

On 25th, July 1873, in answer to a question as to amnesty to the Fenian prisoners, Mr. Gladstone said:

“I am sorry to say, Sir, that there is a strong and conclusive reason, one which over-rides every other reason for not extending this amnesty to the men referred to and for leading us to conclude that these men are not political prisoners at all in the sense in which indulgence might be extended to prisoners of that character. It is a sound principle of modern administration that when there has been a convulsion in a country and a contagion of strong feelings has led men to join it—when it is put down by the arm of the law, the individuals who were parties to it should be dealt with very leniently. But, Sir, I know no reason why single individuals who without the apology of contagion have endeavored to bring about bloodshed should be so dealt with.”

We have the fact, in relation to Riel, that there was no influence of contagion in his case, except that he was the man who strove to spread the contagion. We have in his case the fact that he came to the North-West for the purpose of preventing constitutional agitation, for the purpose of explaining to the half-breeds—and the hon. gentleman will find this in one of the exhibits of the trial—that they never should petition the Ottawa Government for anything again; for the purpose of declaring to them, as was detailed in the evidence I read this afternoon, that it was blood they wanted, that it was a war of extermination they should enter upon; and I contend that in the overt acts which this man committed in the course of his treasonable career, he went far beyond the limits of a political offence. I contend that he put himself outside the rule which extends clemency to those who, on account of the excitement of the moment or the contagion which has already spread throughout the country, have been induced to follow leaders into evil courses. But I have an authority nearer home on that question. I have already cited to the House a speech of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) in connection with the outbreak of 1869-70. I have shown that he was then urging that steps should be taken to have Riel extradited from the United States, and the hon. gentleman knew well that extradition could not be asked in relation to a political offender, and he stated, and stated properly, that the conduct of Riel has been something worse than mere political offence, and that we were justified therefore in asking his extradition; and he took this view on precisely the same grounds as those which I have pointed to this evening. But we do not need to go to the records of the Legislature of Ontario to find what the hon. gentleman said there, for in this House, on the 11th April, 1871, speaking of this question, the hon. gentleman said:

“It might be possible that Riel's crime was not an extraditable offence, but he (Mr. Blake) denied that such trouble as that which took place in the North-West should be looked upon as a political movement.”

Mr. Speaker, it would be an exceedingly dangerous doctrine for us to lay down that every offence which can be committed in the course of a political movement is an offence for which executive clemency is to be exercised. The law of this country, the law of the mother country, the law of every country in the world where capital punishment is retained, levels the threat of capital punishment against the heads of those who commit high treason, or what may be equivalent to high treason; and with such a law on the statute book as exists on our statute book and was passed no further back than 1869, is it possible that the Executive or that this House is to declare that we are never to carry it out? That is what it amounts to. If an amnesty is always to be given for what is in one sense a political offence—and it must be always given if it were given in this case—it would be equivalent to saying that the law is plain, but the Executive do not intend to carry that law out. Let us look for a moment to the report of the Commissioners on Capital Punishment from which the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) quoted so largely on Friday evening. Upon that commission were some of the ablest jurists of the mother country, and upon it were some of the ablest theorists of the mother country with regard to the question of capital punishment. Some gentlemen went on that commission because they were the advocates of the abolition of capital punishment and, notwithstanding that, we have the report of that commission plainly expressed; and I cite it with the more emphasis and the more confidence because the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) insisted, in a long and elaborate argument, that the Executive, in dealing with capital offences, ought to be guided by the recommendations of those commissioners. The recommendation of those commissioners with regard to treasonable practices is this:

“We have, then, first to consider whether, assuming capital punishment to be retained, we should recommend any change in its present application to the crime of treason, and upon this point we have come to the conclusion that no alteration is required. The maximum punishment under the Treason-Felony Act is penal servitude for life, which seems sufficiently severe in cases of constructive treason unaccompanied by overt acts of rebellion, assassination or other violence. With respect to treason of the latter character, we are of opinion that the extreme penalty must remain.”

The hon. gentleman told us, as I already intimated, that it was the duty of the Executive to be guided by the humane and enlightened views of this commission. More than that, it was urged in other quarters of the House that every civilised country, in practice, if not in law, had departed from the system of enforcing capital punishment in cases of high treason. I think no one will dispute that the Legislature of the mother country is as enlightened and as advanced in the principles of humanity, relating to the administration of the criminal law, as that of any country in the world, and we have the élite of that Legislature putting upon record that, in cases of treason, accompanied by overt acts of rebellion, assassination or other violence, the extreme penalty of the law must remain. From that decision not one dissented, except three, who wanted capital punishment abolished altogether, even in the worst cases of murder. Lord Cranworth, then ex-Chancellor, stated under examination as follows:—

“Q. Am I to understand your Lordship to confine your view with regard to the application of capital punishment to cases of murder?—A. Yes, and treason. I think that treason certainly ought to be placed in the same category; because, although there may be some cases of treason which, as has been said, if successful, cease to be crimes, yet you must treat treason as the highest crime known to the law; and if people are to be punished capitally for murder, I think that they should be punished capitally for high treason.”

Lord Bramwell was next under examination, and this question was put to him:

“Would you deem it advisable to retain capital punishment in cases of treason and murder?—A. I certainly should think it advisable to retain capital punishment for murder. As to treason, I confess that it has never occurred to me to speculate on it. It perhaps is a worse offence in some respects than even murder, because it involves the taking of life and the alarm of the whole country, but still I can see that it may not be an expedient punishment in that case, because it is not a case in which the public feeling goes with the infliction of capital punishment as it does in cases of murder. It is in vain to have a law in the administration of which the public disposition will not fairly assist. As regards treason, I think that if it were limited to mere conspiracy, without an actual forcible outbreak, it would then not be a desirable thing to inflict capital punishment upon it, but where there is an actual outbreak, it is different.”

The case of Smith O'Brien was alluded to at an early part of this debate, and again on Friday evening, as an instance of clemency on the part of the Executive of Great Britain. This is what Lord Bramwell says about it:

“Take it even in the trumpery case of Smith O'Brien's treason in Ireland. That man was guilty, not merely of treason, but he was guilty of acts which were very likely to take away human life, and he was in that happy situation in which traitors often are, that is to say, he had a great deal of public sympathy with him, instead of having it against him as the common murderer has. If he had succeeded, instead of being tried he might have been king of Ireland, I suppose, or something of that sort, and when the commission of a crime is so profitable and advantageous as that, if you succeed, you get a great advantage, and, if you fail, you have an immense quantity of public sympathy, one would think it would be reasonable that this law should step in and say: We will endeavor to deter you from the commission of so tempting a crime; but still it is to be borne in mind that public opinion would not go with punishing a man for treason when his treason, however foolish, was what others might call honest. Then it is impossible to discriminate between honest and dishonest treason.”

Meaning, of course, by legislation, because that was the proposition before him.

‘and the result is that I should think that in most cases, and perhaps in all cases of treason, capital punishment would be an inexpedient punishment.

“Q. Your opinion is that in every case of treason which is not accompanied with murder, the punishment should not be capital?—A. I think so.”

And nearly all the judges of the three kingdoms who were examined as witnesses before that commission gave it as their opinion, founded on experience and observation, that capital punishment should not be abolished in cases of treason. If we look at the condition of the country in which this crime was committed, we see peculiar reasons why we should hesitate to assert that the crime of high treason should never be punished with capital punishment there. The reason why, in some older countries, the Executive can afford to be liberal in extending clemency to what are called, in the widest acceptation of the term, political offences, is explained by the fact that the country is well settled, that the Government is established on a strong basis and supported by standing armies and by great bodies of police, as well as by tribunals which exist in every section of the country to administer and enforce the law. But the North-West is remote from the seat of Government, the law is weak; it has a population the most easily excited of any population in the world; it has an immense frontier, offering advantages to those who, from the vilest motives, from a desire to inflict a great injury upon Canada, can at any moment cross the border and commit acts of depredation on our territory and incite to rebellion, and go back to comparative immunity. All these reasons are reasons why the Government of that country should be a Government with a strong hand, and why it would be most unwise, in relation to the offence of high treason or any other offence known to the law, for the executive to declare in advance, as it is proposed to be declared now, that political offenders, in the widest acceptation of the term, shall never be refused Executive clemency. A good deal has been said with regard to the conduct of the authorities of the United States during the civil war. It seems to me that no comparison less parallel could possibly have been suggested. There civil war had raged for years; the two sections had large standing armies, and the Federal authorities had from first to last extended the rights of belligerents to the rebels, and enforced their rights against them as belligerents, by the blockade, by the exchange of prisoners, by negotiations for truces, and by nearly everything that went on for a series of years. But, Mr. Speaker, to compare the incendiary outbreak which was committed in the North-West to the civil war in the United States, to compare the man who set fire to that magazine of powder, as it was described when he was asked to come to the North-West, with the patriot who laid down his arms to General Grant at the head of the chivalry of America, is to compare cases as wide apart as the poles. Besides that, Sir, in relation both to General Lee and to Jefferson Davis, there was a great constitutional question behind. It has never yet been decided in the United States that in a State under the federal system a man who, in obedience to the constitution of his own State—and these States had a right to change their constitution from time to time—the man who goes into the field, or by any other act conducts himself in accordance with the constitution of his own State, acts in co-operation with the armies of his own State, and opposes in that way and to that degree the Federal authority—it has never yet been decided, I say, although there are dicta to that effect, that it is high treason, in the sense in which high treason should be punished by the Federal Government of the United States. But, Sir, when we come to deal with other classes of political offences in the United States, when we come to look at offences, not in pursuance of a general outbreak, not with the excuse of enthusiasm inspired by leaders who have fallen into the hands of the law, and have suffered sufficient punishment, we know how those offences have been dealt with in the United States. We know that in the widest sense of the term the offence for which John Brown was executed was as much, and far more, a political offence than that which was committed by Louis Riel, and we know what his fate was; we know the punishment that was meted out to the murderer of President Lincoln, and we know the statements which were made in public by the highest authorities in the United States with regard to the wisdom of enforcing, in relation to those offenders, the penalties of the law against high treason.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON. An hon. gentleman on the other side of the House says: “Hear, hear,” and he will, no doubt, try to turn my argument by referring to the fact that excessive punishment was meted out to some of those offenders, and that in relation to some of them there have been misgivings ever since as to the justice of their condemnation. I am not referring to individual cases, I am referring simply to the fact that in that country, as in every other country in the world, although the crime was committed for a political motive, the offenders were held to be entirely outside the rule which claims Executive clemency for political offenders. The President of the United States stated upon a public occasion in relation to the question :

"The American people must be taught, if they do not already feel, that treason is a crime, and that it must be punished; that the Government will not bear with its enemies, and that it is strong not only to protect but to punish. When we turn to the criminal code and examine the catalogue of crime, we find arson laid down as a crime, with its appropriate penalty; we find there, too, theft, and robbery, and murder given as crimes; and there, too, we find the last and highest of all crimes—treason. With other and inferior offences our people are familiar. But in our peaceful history treason has been almost unknown. * * The people must understand that it is the blackest of crimes, and will surely be punished. I make this allusion, not to excite the already exasperated feelings of the public, but to point out the principle of public justice which should guide our action at this particular juncture, and which accords with sound public morals. Let it be engraved on our every heart that treason is a crime and that traitors shall suffer the penalty."

Whatever feelings of exasperation may have existed in that community in regard to those offenders, I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that these sentiments were just, and might have been uttered in any country and at any time when the head of the state had been stricken down, even for a political purpose, by an assassin. I propose to refer for a few moments to the arguments which have been presented on the question of the insanity of this convict. I was struck, as most hon. members were for the moment, with the argument which fell from the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault), in the course of his exceedingly argumentative speech with reference to the case of Lord George Gordon. There seemed, at first glance, until one recalled the history of the case, to be something parallel in the two cases, only that that case seemed very much stronger than this. A moment's reflection, however, must have convinced the hon. gentleman himself that there was, at least, a slight difference between the two cases—the difference being that Louis Riel was convicted and Lord George Gordon was acquitted. It cannot be said, Sir, that the tribunal took a more merciful view of Lord George Gordon's case than the courts took of the case of Louis Riel with regard to the question of insanity, because there is this difference likewise, Lord George Gordon was not defended upon the plea of insanity at all. Lord George Gordon was defended and acquitted on the ground that the only purpose proved against him was that of presenting, by a monster meeting, a petition to Parliament, and that there was nothing in his conduct, acts and words which would justify his condemnation for the acts of violence committed by that immense meeting after it had assembled. There was therefore no argument as to the doctrine of insanity and of Executive clemency in relation to his case. In 1864, Mr. Gathorne Hardy said, in relation to a particular case and in relation to the appeal for Executive clemency in that case :

"Here was an opportunity before trial, and at the trial, to enquire into the state of his mind. The verdict should, he thought, be conclusive as to the state of his mind up to the period of the verdict, and enquiries should only refer to the state of his mind after the verdict and up to the period of his proposed execution."

Of course it must be conceded that there is a class of cases in which that rule could not hold, a class in relation to which it might be said that the haste of the trial, the poverty of the prisoner, or mischance, or accident at the trial prevented a full enquiry being made. But leaving out of consideration the mere question of mistake, the principle was laid down by the Home Secretary and has not been departed from since, that when a full opportunity has been given for enquiry on the trial into the state of the prisoner's mind, and that enquiry has taken place, the verdict is to be conclusive as to the condition of the prisoner's mind down to that time. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) said we were not in a position to tell the House that the jury were told to acquit the prisoner if the prisoner was insane. The hon. member of course made that statement by inadvertence, because the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Manitoba shows that that was precisely the charge of the judge. But since then the charge of the judge has been laid on the Table of the House, and the hon. gentleman should certainly withdraw the objection when I read to him the words of the judge's charge. Judge Richardson said :

"It must be proved that at the time he committed the act he was laboring under such defective reasoning from a diseased mind as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was committing, or that if he did know it he did not know he was doing wrong. That I propound to you as the law. If the evidence convinces you, and convinces you conclusively, that such was the case, then your duty is to acquit the prisoner."

I must repeat now in connection with this branch of the argument, that the prisoner had a peculiar advantage at Regina which does not apply to a prisoner convicted in the Provinces. He had an appeal on that very question as to whether the jury were right or wrong in their verdict, to the full Queen's Bench of Manitoba. In giving judgment on that subject chief justice Walbridge said :

"It is said the prisoner labored under the insane delusion that he was a prophet, and that he had a mission to fulfil. When did this mania first seize him, or when did it manifest itself? Shortly before he came to Saskatchewan he had been teaching school in Montana. It was not this mania that impelled him to commence the work which ended in the charge at Batoche."

We have heard a great deal said about delusions, delusions tending to the commission of political offences. The chief justice of Manitoba conclusively shows there was no association between delusions about being a prophet and the proceedings which terminated at Batoche.

"He was invited by a deputation, who went for him to Montana. The original idea was not his—did not originate with him. It is argued, however, that his demeanor changed in March, just before the outbreak. Before then he had been holding meetings, addressing audiences, and acting as a sane person. His correspondence with General (now Sir Frederick) Middleton betokens no signs of either weakness of intellect or of delusions, taking the definitions of this disease, as given by the experts. And how does his conduct comport therewith? The maniac imagines his delusions real, they are fixed and determinate, the bare contradiction causes irritability."

And then the chief justice cites a long passage from the evidence of Father André for the purpose of showing that his delusions were not irrepressible ones, but that Riel proposed to resist and control them at the price of $35,000. The Chief Justice said :

"A delusion must be fixed, acted upon, and believed in as real, overcome and dominate in the mind of the insane person. An insanity which can be put on or off at the will of the insane person, according to the medical testimony, is not insanity at all in the sense of mania."

Taylor, J., says :

"After a critical examination of the evidence, I find it impossible to come to any other conclusion than that at which the jury arrived. The appellant is, beyond all doubt, a man of inordinate vanity, excitable, irritable and impatient of contradiction. He seems to have at times acted in an extraordinary manner; to have said many strange things, and to have entertained, or at least professed to entertain, absurd views on religious and political subjects. But it all stops far short of establishing such unsoundness of mind as would render him irresponsible, not accountable for his actions. His course of conduct indeed shows, in many ways, that the whole of his apparently extraordinary conduct, his claims to divine inspiration, and the prophetic character, was only part of a cunningly devised scheme to gain, and hold, influence and power over the simple-minded people around him, and to secure personal immunity in the event of his ever being called to account for his actions."

These were not the judgments of inferior judges. These were not the judgments of judges dependent upon Executive bounty. These were not the judgments of judges appointed at the pleasure of the Crown. These were the judgments of the Court of Appeal in the Province of Manitoba :

"He seems to have had in view by professing to champion the interest of the Metis, the securing of pecuniary advantage for himself. This is evident from among other circumstances by the conversation detailed by the Rev. Mr. André."

He then proceeds to point out what the evidence of the Rev. Mr. André is, and the learned judge, in a passage which is too long for me to weary the House with, shows that the plan of the campaign which Louis Riel prepared, and which he carried out with such adroitness, as far as his force would allow him, are all evidence not only to show that he was responsible in the eye of the law, but that there was no reason for assuming that the delusions under which it was admitted he sometimes labored, prevented the control of his actions. Mr. Justice Killam said:

"Mr. Lemieux laid great stress upon the fact that the jury accompanied their verdict with a recommendation to mercy as showing that they thought the prisoner insane. I cannot see that any importance can be attached to this. I have read very carefully the report of the charge of the magistrate, and it appears to have been so clearly put that the jury could have no doubt of their duty in case they thought the prisoner insane when he committed the acts in question. They could not have listened to that charge without understanding fully that to bring in a verdict of guilty was to declare emphatically their disbelief in the insanity of the prisoner. The recommendation may be accounted for in many ways not connected at all with the question of the sanity of the prisoner."

"The stipendiary magistrate adopts, in his charge to the jury, the test laid down in MacNaghten's case, 10 Cl. and F. 204. Although this rule was laid down by the leading judges of England, at the time, to the House of Lords, it was not so done in any particular case, which was before that tribunal for adjudication, and it could hardly be considered as a decision absolutely binding upon any court. I should consider this court fully justified in departing from it, if good ground were shown therefor, or, if even without argument of counsel, against it, it appeared to the court itself to be improper as applied to the facts of a particular case. In the present instance, counsel for the prisoner do not attempt to impugn the propriety of the rule, and in my opinion they could not successfully do so. It has never, so far as I can find, been overruled, though it may to some extent have been questioned. This rule is, that 'notwithstanding the party did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some public benefit, he is nevertheless punishable according to the nature of the crime committed, if he knew at the time of committing such crime that he acted contrary to law.'"

After some further development of that question, he says:

"I hesitate to add anything to the remarks of my brother Taylor upon the evidence on the question of insanity. I have read over very carefully all the evidence that was laid before the jury, and I could say nothing that would more fully express the opinions I have formed from its perusal than what is expressed by him. I agree with him also in saying that the prisoner has been ably and zealously defended, and that nothing that could assist his case appears to have been left untouched. If I could see any reason to believe that the jury, whether from passion or prejudice, or otherwise, had decided against the weight of the evidence upon the prisoner's insanity, I should desire to find that the court could so interpret the statute as to be justified in causing the case to be laid before another jury for their consideration, as the only feelings we can have towards a fellow creature who has been deprived of the reason which places us above the brutes, are sincere pity and a desire to have some attempt made to restore him to the full enjoyment of a sound mind."

"The prisoner is evidently a man of more than ordinary intelligence, who could have been of great service to those of his race in this country; and if he were insane, the greatest service that could be rendered to the country would be, that he should, if possible, be restored to that condition of mind which would enable him to use his mental powers and his education to assist in promoting the interests of that important class in the community to which he belongs. It is with the deepest regret that I recognise that the acts charged were committed without any such justification, and that this court cannot in any way be justified in interfering."

The case as I have already reminded the House, went to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and their comment upon the rulings of this tribunal was that these points:

"Have been dealt with by the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Manitoba with a patience, learning and ability that leaves very little to be said about them."

After the finding of this tribunal, after that thorough sifting of all the facts and the law bearing on the case, this House has been actually told time and again that there was not evidence enough there to hang a dog. I do not propose to weary the House by going over the series of points which were taken up by our friends opposite —

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on, go on.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I shall, then, with the indulgence of the House, continue a little further on the question of the prisoner's insanity. Father André and other witnesses including the bishop and the clergymen who signed the depositions from which I read extracts a short time ago, showed that the people of that district were so simple, confiding, religious and almost superstitious that there was no way in which he could attain so much control over them as by pretending that he was a prophet and had a divine mission. In a country whose population was differently situated and differently educated, that would be a strong proof of madness. In that country it was a strong proof of design, and the success which the pretension of being a prophet and having a divine mission met with, the effect of inducing these men, who shed tears as they were going away, to take up arms and go into the field, shows that there was anything but insanity in the conception of that scheme. The hon. member for West Durham thinks that when the Orders of the Council are brought down it will appear that Riel was proclaimed by Order in Council to be a prophet. The mastery which he had acquired over these simple half-breeds is shown by that fact. It was not the act of Louis Riel himself alone, but his whole council were willing to declare that he was a prophet. With regard to this pretension of having a divine mission, let me ask hon. members of this House were all the half-breeds insane too? If they were not insane, this was not necessarily an insane act, because it convinced them and induced them to follow him. If they were insane, what becomes of the pretence made by hon. gentlemen opposite that this outbreak was forced upon them by the criminal conduct of the Government and that the rebellion was justified? My hon. friend beside me asks, were all his council insane? The Order in Council, as I said before, which admits his gift of prophecy, bears the signatures of those people, and not Louis Riel's at all; and I think I am justified in asking the House to consider whether the people upon whom he imposed his rule, his leadership, and his tyranny, by the pretence that he was a prophet and had a divine mission, were all insane. If not, then the fact that he adopted a device of that kind, and that it succeeded, was evidence certainly that it was not such an insane thing to do in that country and among that population after all. The statements which were given in evidence by Nolin with regard to his claim to have the gift of prophecy, the bodily symptoms, which exhibited themselves sometimes in his person, were commented on by the hon. member for West Durham. The refutation of all that is contained in Louis Riel's speech at the trial, in which he says there was nothing so insane about that conversation after all, "because," he said, "it is a little saying we have in that country; it is a little popular superstition; and sitting at the fireside in ordinary conversation, a man says, partly in humor and partly in earnest" — I am only paraphrasing his words but stating them in substance — "A man says, now I can prophecy." I shall be told presently, as I was told before, that the fact of his having made such a speech itself indicated insanity. It might have been so if he had not announced and declared that he had another and better hope than that — that he had little reason to believe that those who understood him so well and had such experience of him as the Government of Canada had, would tolerate his plea of insanity if the jury should find against him, as they were likely to do; and he relied on the political harangue he made there, according to the statement he made to Nolin at Batoche, that he looked for his safety to politics rather than to any plea of insanity. Then, we had the singular argument from the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) that he was insane because he appointed Jackson his secretary, and Jackson was a mad man. Yet the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) said he was insane because he shut Jackson up as a madman. These two arguments surely cannot both be good. It cannot be that he was mad to appoint a madman as his secretary, and that he was mad to treat him as a madman afterwards. I think there is considerable evidence against the argument of his insanity as derived from the appointment of Jackson as his secretary. Jackson has proved himself, even if as thoroughly mad, as the hon. member for Quebec East declared him to be, to be a man having occasional lucid intervals, during which he is a man of considerable talent and force, and Jackson may have been appointed secretary when not under the influence of his madness at all. But one of the best proofs that Riel was not a madman was that when Jackson developed insanity, he took very good care to lock him up. It was said likewise that when the papers taken at Batoche were brought down, it would appear that Louis Riel was totally mad because he had a scheme for changing the names of the days of the week. It is true that partly in carrying out the scheme of his new religion, as he called it, he did propose to change the names of the days of the week, and to abjure the heathenish names by which we are pleased to call them. Now, judged by our standard, our civilisation and our time, that would seem to be a very extraordinary act. But all that was transpiring there was in the fervid glow of superstition, cunningly excited at every step to delude and entangle that people, and this was a clumsy imitation of the great revolution which took place a century ago on another continent; but I never heard it imputed to insanity in those who carried out the French revolution, that they changed the names of the months, and I do not see why Louis Riel should be considered mad because he wished to leave his influence and his trace on the North-West in that way. But it is said that his partition of the North-West into different nationalities was evidence of madness. If you believe Louis Riel in his speech at the trial, that argument is dissipated to the winds. He said that for the purpose of securing co-operation in his design to conquer that country or to rule it, he desired to tempt into the country the nationalities living along the border in the United States; and he, who knew that country and its population, knew that the nationalities for whom he promised to sub-divide the North-West, were those who lived across the border and from whom he was expecting assistance when he said: "Before the grass is so high, I shall have foreign forces in this country." Charles Nolin, with reference to the question of insanity says:

"Witness is asked if prisoner had separated from the clergy, and he says completely. He says the half-breeds are a people who need religion. Religion has a great influence on their mind. The witness is asked if without religion the prisoner could have succeeded in bringing the half-breeds with him, and the witness answers no. It would never have succeeded. If the prisoner had not made himself appear as a prophet, he would never have succeeded in bringing the half-breeds with him.

"By Mr. Lemieux, recross-examination.

"The witness is asked if the prisoner did not lose a great deal of his influence in that way by the fact that he lost the influence of the clergy, and he says that at the time he gained influence by working against the clergy and by making himself out as a prophet. The witness is asked if he means that the people did not have confidence in their clergy, and he says no, but he says they were ignorant and he was taking advantage of their ignorance and their simplicity."

This is from Father André's examination:

"Q. Is it not true that religion has a great influence upon them?—

A. Yes.

"Q. Is it not true that a man who tried to govern them by inducing them to completely change their religion or to do away with it, would have no influence with them at all?—A. Exactly, it was just because he was so religious and appeared so devout that he exercised such a great influence upon them. I wish to explain this point, because it is a great point. With half-breeds he never was contradicted, and consequently, he was never excited with them, and he appeared in his natural state with them. He did not admit his strange views at first, it was only after a time that he proclaimed them and especially after the provisional government had been proclaimed."

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antagonish). The hon. gentleman who says "hear, hear," really fancies, I suppose, that this is an explanation why the half-breeds did not observe his insanity, but we are told by the hon. member for West Durham that these half-breeds joined him in an act of insanity when they proclaimed him a prophet. True, the speech at the trial is to be taken to some extent as some slight evidence of derangement of mind because he thought to dispell then the impression that he was insane; but, as I have said, he had definitely formed plans before that with relation to his line of defence and with relation to his appeal to the Executive for clemency. He had conceived the idea in expressing the phrase that "politics would save him," that the term "political offence" was large enough to cover all the crimes he had committed, as well as it did the deliberate and shocking murder he had committed in 1869-70, and would also cover his criminal and openly avowed intention of bringing foreign troops into the country. He thought that the clemency which was large enough to cover the crime of 1869-70, which the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) had declared "a damnable murder," would surely be large enough to cover the criminal offence of exciting half-breeds and tempting foreign forces into the country. It is said that the evidence produced at the trial proves conclusively that this man had delusions. So he had. So have many persons who have committed crimes, and it is the opinion of some medical writers that all persons who commit crimes, against the moral law at any rate, are more or less under the influence of delusions; but we shall have to go further than that before we make up our minds that this man was either irresponsible on the ground of these delusions, or that the moral guilt of his offence was lessened by these delusions. A man may have strong political delusions, but it does not at all follow that the acts he commits, such as incendiarism, murder, or inciting others to commit murder, are at all the consequence of these delusions, or that his delusions have so mastered him that he is unable to resist the impulse to commit crime. Stephens, in his History, from which the hon. member for West Durham cited so largely the other night, and in regard to which I endorse all he said as to the weight of the authority, says:

"Parts of the conduct of mad people are not affected by their madness, and if such parts of their conduct are criminal they ought to be punished for it."

I admit that when a man has political delusions, there may be a connection between his delusions and his crimes, but that is a question to be submitted to the jury. In this case it was submitted to the jury with the most liberal instructions by the judge, and the finding of that jury, sustained by two judgments in appeal, was that he was undoubtedly the subject of political delusions, but that his conduct was not so connected with them as to lessen his culpability. I admit that a jury ought to be careful in such cases to ascertain that there is no connection between the delusion and the crime, but in this case the great patience exercised by the jury in sifting the fact, and the careful scrutiny this case received on appeal, show that the jury discharged their duty carefully and conscientiously. Upon that subject, I might cite at some length, but I refrain from doing so, the celebrated case which was tried in the United States a few years ago, and in relation to which the man who was condemned, if the evidence is to be believed, had a ten-fold stronger case on which to base a plea of insanity than Louis Riel. I refer to the case of Guiteau. The treatment which he received at the hands of the law and of the Executive, notwithstanding his strong political and religious delusions, is well known, and met with very slight, if any condemnation, either in the United States or here. On 24th January, 1882, a journal which exercises a large influence in this country, and speaks, or professes to speak, for a political party in this country—the journal which, I heard an hon. member declare the other night, penetrated to the utmost recesses of the earth, used this language with regard to the case of Guiteau, and I cite it because it is peculiarly applicable to the case of Riel, although the conductors of that journal do not seem to think so now. Speaking of the comments which an observer might make in Guiteau's case they said, and hon. gentlemen will see the parallel as I progress :

“If sufficiently credulous to accept the murderer's asseverations as anything more than a piece of arrant hypocrisy, an artifice of his cunning little mind to save his neck from the gallows; if he could bring himself to credit the wretch with sincerity, he could not resist the inference that the inspiration was from beneath and not from above, and that having done the bidding of the great adversary on earth he had better be sent as speedily as a due regard for the forms of human justice would permit to continue the congenial service in other spheres.”

I presume a great and responsible paper like the Toronto Globe would not make these observations against a man in Guiteau's situation because he was condemned in another country, and treat Riel on a different principle because he lived here, and might be a factor in the politics of this country :

“Men as men and as judges and jurors have no means of determining the motives of other men but by their actions. If such a thing as inspiration were possible, or even of every day occurrence it could never be proved. To admit such a plea for a moment as a palliation for crime, would be to open the door to all kinds of abuse.”

Passing from the question as to Riel's insanity, as established at the trial, I call the attention of the House to the duty which devolved on the Executive in relation to the subsequent investigation. This duty is well laid down in the common law. In Blackstone's Commentary by Stephen's it is thus defined :

“If a man in his sound memory commits a capital offence and, before arraignment for it, becomes mad, he ought not to be arraigned for it because he is not able to plead to it with that advice and caution which he ought, and if, after he has pleaded the prisoner becomes mad, he shall not be tried, for how can he make his defence? If after he be tried and found guilty he loses his senses before judgment, judgment shall not be pronounced, and if, after judgment he becomes of non sane memory, execution shall be stayed, for, peradventure, says the humanity of the English law, had the prisoner been of sound memory he might have alleged something in stay of judgment or execution.”

On the trial of Bateman, 2nd Vol. State Trials, it was said by the Solicitor-General :

“It would be inconsistent with humanity and inconsistent with religion to make examples of such persons as being against Christian charity to send a great offender ‘quick,’ as it is styled, into another world, when he is not of a capacity to fit himself for it.”

These are the two positions the common law takes upon that subject: That a man who develops madness after trial and judgment is not to be executed because he has not the opportunity of moving in arrest of judgment to stay the execution, and because it would be inhuman to send a person into eternity who is too insane to be conscious of his approaching end. Our attention was called by the memorial of Father André to the conviction which appeared to have impressed his mind that since the trial this man was in an absolutely mad condition, a condition such as that described in the two passages I have cited, in which it would be against human charity to send him to another world unconscious of the destiny that awaited him, and in that state of mind in which he could not make an application if any were open to him in relation to his case. The investigation which we made by three doctors, whose reports are on the Table, shows that there was no material change in his condition from the time of the trial down, and as regards the condition in which he was said to have been then, with regard to the political delusions, with regard to the hallucinations, admitting all they said, the jury had passed upon that, after the fullest investigation and the clearest instructions; and they had said that, notwithstanding that he had hallucinations upon the subject of religion and occasionally upon the subject of politics, those hallucinations were not connected with the crimes of which he was convicted. The reports then showed that the condition of the man's mind had not changed, and it was fully apparent, even from the memorials submitted in his behalf, that he knew in what condition his case was and understood that his end was approaching. He received all the preparation for that end which his spiritual ministrant could bestow upon him, he was able to receive the sacraments of the church, and he was in a condition of mind not less sound than that in which he had appeared before the jury. A statement was made by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) the other night which seemed to impugn the reliability of one of the doctors who joined in that report. It is not necessary for me to say anything with regard to the experience of those men. They had extensive experience with regard to this particular case and I think it is most unfair to say that, because one of them was present at the trial, he was prejudiced against the prisoner. But it was said that Dr. Lavell's report must be viewed with great suspicion, because, in the case of Michael Lee, he had testified that he was perfectly sound in mind when he was convicted at Napanee, while Michael Lee had afterwards been found to be undoubtedly insane, and that commutation was granted because Dr. Lavell was entirely wrong. That statement, I observed, created an impression upon the House. The hon. gentleman had not asked for the papers in that case of Michael Lee, excepting to state in his speech: “I ask for them now.” The hon. gentleman can have them and any hon. member can have them if he desires, but I say now that the rebuke which the hon. member passed upon the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), for not stating the case of Michael Lee in the list which he gave, was so far from being a just one that, instead of Dr. Lavell having testified that that man was sane when he was perfectly insane, I find, after having read the case, that Dr. Lavell was never examined at the trial at all.

Mr. BLAKE. I never said so.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It is quite true that at a subsequent stage of the case—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Hon. gentlemen shall have all the satisfaction they can derive from that.

Mr. BLAKE. That is what I said.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The hon. gentleman said, if I remember correctly, that at the trial—

Mr. BLAKE. No, I did not.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish),—that, at the trial, Dr. Lavell pronounced him perfectly sane, and he was found to be perfectly insane.

Mr. BLAKE. No, I did not.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). If he did not—and, of course, I accept the statement of the hon. gentleman—I withdraw the contradiction I made as to what he said of Dr. Lavell's statement at the trial, but I will quote, for the benefit of those hon. gentlemen who cheered so lustily just now, what the report was which Dr. Lavell afterwards made, in order to show that it was no such report as the hon. member for West Durham supposed it to be. Dr. Lavell was called to examine Lee, and was called in conjunction with another physician. The other physician differed from him so far as to think that Lee was insane and irresponsible, and what Dr. Lavell said in his report was not that he was perfectly sane, but :

"In view of his weakness of intellect, moral obtuseness and ignorance, it is not an easy matter to arrive at a positive conclusion. It is a kind of case that I think requires a more lengthened expert observation. The gravity of the case I have considered in all its bearings, and, if pressed for an immediate opinion, my conclusions are that Michael Lee, though a man of low intellect, having no proper moral sense and deplorably ignorant, is nevertheless in a condition to distinguish between right from wrong, and that any peculiarities manifested, leading to the suspicion of insanity, may be attributed to his low habits of life."

Now, hon. gentlemen who cheered me so loudly a few moments ago, will see that Dr. Lavell did not pronounce Michael Lee to be perfectly sane, but declined without further investigation to pronounce upon the question whether he was insane or not, but, if pressed for an immediate opinion, he said he would go so far as to say that he knew right from wrong; and the physician who examined the case with him did not deny that, although he thought his conduct was such as to throw some doubt upon it. I think the House, however, will agree with me that his report, guarded as it was—"I will only report him as knowing right from wrong if pressed for an immediate opinion, and before going further I must have a further investigation"—is not sufficient to justify the imputation passed by the hon. gentleman upon the reliability of Dr. Lavell as one of the officers who made the investigation. The hon. member for West Durham contradicted me a few moments ago, when I said that, in the case of Michael Lee, he intimated that Dr. Lavell reported him at the trial as being perfectly sane. The hon. gentleman will allow me to quote from Hansard the words which I was sure fell from his lips at that time :

"When the trial of Michael Lee for murder took place at Napanee some time ago, Dr. Metcalf, of Rockwood, Dr. Clark, of Toronto, Dr. Lavell, of Kingston, examined him. Drs. Metcalf and Clark pronounced him insane; Dr. Lavell pronounced him perfectly sane."

It may be that the hon. gentleman meant to refer to the subsequent investigation, and not to that which took place at the trial, but I think he will agree with me that these words justified me in forming the impression I did. If the hon. gentleman intimates, as I suppose he desires to intimate, that he did not mean that Dr. Lavell was a witness at the trial, I do not desire to assert that he meant to say, what I supposed from Hansard he did intend to say; but the whole point of my argument is not to show that the hon. gentleman deceived the House, but to show that he was entirely mistaken in casting upon Dr. Lavell an imputation which might affect the judgment of this House upon the report of the doctors who made this investigation. Now, Mr. Speaker, the duty of the Home Secretary was enlarged upon at great length on Friday. It was stated that although a criminal may be pronounced responsible it was the duty of the Executive to interfere if his moral guilt was lessened by the influence of his delusion. Let me read to the House, as a supplement to the passages which the hon. member read—and I shall read principally from the same authorities which he quoted—some further passages in elucidation of the views which I entertain, and which I humbly think are fully recognised as sound rules upon that question. Mr. Walpole, who was twice Home Secretary, says :

"Upon all the materials brought before the Secretary of State he is in a position not in the least degree to rehear the case, but simply to advise the Crown whether there were any circumstances which would justify the exercise of mercy, either in an absolute or in a qualified sense, that is to say, either by pardon or commutation. I do not believe that if a person simply wishes to discharge his duty you can have a better mode of arriving at the truth, not as to whether on appeal you are to decide the question de novo, but as to whether there are any circumstances brought before you to justify you in recommending the Crown to exercise the prerogative of mercy. The Secretary of State assumes that the trial having been conducted before a competent tribunal a right conclusion has been arrived at, unless it can be pointed out to him that there was something on which that tribunal erred."

Now, Sir, as the hon. member said, practically the penalty of capital punishment is only applied in the worst cases, because, in accordance with the report of the Commissioners on Capital Punishment, which I referred to a few moments ago, it was stated that a large number of the crimes which technically came within the description of murder did not involve the full moral culpability of murder; as, for instance, the crime of infanticide, in respect of which it is of late years the rule always to commute the sentence; with respect also to those murders which are committed under strong provocation which does not amount to an excuse in law; and with respect to those murders which are committed without any actual intention to commit murder, but in the attempt to commit some other felony, as in the familiar and often quoted case of the man who shoots a tame fowl for the purpose of stealing it and in so doing kills a human being. In all those cases it is abundantly recognised that the Home Secretary interferes for the purpose of a commutation, and it is because, as Sir Fitzjames Stephen says, in the passage which the hon. gentleman quoted, the crime of murder is one with very many shades and variations, that the statistics referred to by the hon. member show that so many commutations take place. But those statistics do not prove, that report does not prove, the conduct of the Home Secretary from time to time in pursuance of that report, does not sustain, I think, the hon. gentleman's position that it is the Executive which pronounces the capital sentence and not the law. It is simply that in a well recognised class of cases the Executive will interfere, while in all others it will leave the offender to the law which he himself deliberately violates, and it does so in all cases where the crime has been deliberate and wilful in intention, as every step of this crime was. I think the hon. gentleman will be puzzled to find such a case in which the Executive clemency was successfully claimed. Mr. Walpole also said :

"I think it right . . . to state specifically what were the recommendations of the royal commissions, which I have endeavored humbly and faithfully to act upon. Those recommendations were three :—

"(1). That the punishment of death be retained for all murders deliberately committed with express malice aforethought, such malice to be found as a fact by the jury ;

"(2). That the punishment of death be also retained for all murders committed in or with a view to the perpetration, or escape after the perpetration, or attempt at perpetration of any of the following felonies : murder, arson, rape, burglary, robbery or piracy ;

"(3). That in all other cases of murder the punishment be penal servitude for life, or for any period not less than seven years, at the discretion of the court."

These recommendations were unanimously adopted by the committee. Mr. Bruce, Home Secretary, said, on the 28th July, 1869 :

"His hon. friend had referred to the recommendations of the royal commission; but many of those recommendations had been attacked by some of the ablest writers on criminal law, and his own opinion was that, if legislation were possible, as he believed it to be, they must not follow too closely the recommendation of the royal commissioners."

So that instead of a departure from the recommendation of the royal commissions being made a matter which would justify a vote of want of confidence, it was stated on the authority of the Home Secretary, that although he generally followed those recommendations, their wisdom had been disapproved by some of the best writers on criminal law, and that if legislation were invited, it would not do for legislation to follow them very closely. Sir George Campbell, too, speaking as an Indian official said, on 10th May, 1882 :

"Speaking as an Indian official who has had, perhaps, more experience in regard to questions of life and death than any other member of the House, he thought there was a universal concurrence of opinion that nothing could be more objectionable than the present system, under which the Home Secretary could decide on cases of capital punishment out of court, after the verdict and sentence had been passed. . . .

"In India the practice had been to throw on the judges the onus of what should be done in particular cases. He was aware that in England such a system would not be very palatable to the judges; and he was told that the Irish judges had protested in advance against any system of trial in which the responsibility should be thrown on the judges, and not on the jury. * * * That responsibility should not be thrown on the Home Secretary who was appointed to discharge other than judicial functions."

And on 29th April, 1870, in a passage, a part of which was cited on Friday, Mr. Bruce, Home Secretary, said :

"For myself, I may say that in no single case have I ever overruled the decision of the judge without the fullest approbation on the part of the judge himself.

"Attempts are often made to induce me to remit the punishment in cases when evidence has been held back in order that it may afterwards be alleged that if the witnesses had been heard the result of the trial would have been very different. I pay no sort of attention to allegations of that description."

But the hon. gentleman who pressed with such vehemence the argument drawn from those statistics, forgot, I think, for the moment, that one reason why the Executive of Great Britain is called upon in so many cases to exercise the power of commutation, is that in that country there is no court of criminal appeal. When, therefore, there has been error committed in the course of a trial, error in point of fact, error in the finding on a point of fact, error in the charge of a judge, errors in the ruling at a trial, which the judge has not chosen to reserve, from a mistaken view of the law, there is no remedy but an appeal to the Home Secretary. If the verdict is against the weight of evidence, there is no appeal except to the Home Secretary. If the evidence can be shown to be erroneous, if new evidence can be discovered, it is the Home Secretary alone who can exercise the power of review. But there is no reason why the argument drawn from those statistics should apply with the entire force which the hon. gentleman gave to them, to the case in question, or to the cases coming up in the North-West Territory; because, as I said before, there is in that country what there is not in the Provinces, or in the older countries even, a court of criminal appeal, to which the prisoner can go to have every question of fact or law reviewed. As to the rule upon which Executive interferences can take place in cases of insanity, and the rule in which the guilt of the prisoner is held to be diminished by the existence of delusions, I humbly beg to say that in my opinion the hon. gentleman was unsound in the rule which he laid down. It is quite true that in explaining the rule as laid down in MacNaughton's case, Judge Stephen goes so far as to say that the existence of delusions, even though they be not shown to cause irresponsibility, should be allowed to be given in evidence for the purpose of enabling the jury to find yea or nay upon the question whether responsibility existed or not. That is the utmost length to which he goes in stating the law, but in stating how it would be desirable to amend the law he takes a step further and proposes that the law should be so amended that the jurors should be instructed not only to find the prisoner guilty, if they find him to be responsible as far as sanity is concerned, but that they should then be asked whether the delusions under which he was laboring affected his capability of resistance. The hon. gentleman should not, however, press upon the House that suggestion of Mr. Justice Stephen, because it is a suggestion to amend the law, and until the law is amended an Executive surely cannot be charged with violating any principle in not acting upon it. But so far from laying down the principle that until the law is changed in that respect, that rule should be followed out by the Executive, Judge Stephen lays down a very different proposition, which I shall presently read. Even if that rule were in force, the matter was so put to the jury by the course which the evidence took, inasmuch as it was clearly proved that Riel's criminal acts were not the results of his delusions, but that he had abundant self-control over and above the force of those delusions to enable him to govern his own conduct, to carry out the campaign, to entice others into the rebellion and to guide his conduct in a very different way if he should receive a recompense for doing so. In view of the evidence then submitted, in view of the ground on which the Court of Appeal sustained that verdict, we can come to no other conclusion than if that rule which Justice Stephen thinks should be adopted, but has not yet been adopted, should be applied by the Executive, and it was our duty to enquire whether Riel was under such delusions as weakened his self-control, anyone must come to the conclusion, not only that he was responsible, but that he was capable of so controlling himself as to be beyond the reach of his delusions. If we come to that conclusion, the case of Louis Riel is not at all within the hon. gentleman's rule, the rule which he says ought to be followed by the Executive, but which is not recognised as a rule binding the Executive, and the Executive in the case of Louis Riel gave him the full benefit of all the evidence given in his favor and were justified in coming to the conclusion not only that he was responsible, but that his delusions did not affect his criminality and that his self-control was not in any material degree affected by his delusions. But the hon. gentleman himself has supplied me with the strongest evidence on that point. Down to that period of the debate it had been urged by hon. members who had spoken on that side of the question that the jury must have come to the conclusion that Riel's self-control was lessened by his delusions or they would not have recommended him to mercy. But it now transpires out of the mouth of the hon. gentleman himself, and by a piece of testimony which he adduced for the purpose of attacking the Government on a very different question, that the jury entertained no doubt whatever on that subject, and that when they went to their room, every man of them voted not only that the prisoner was guilty of the charge in the indictment, but that he was perfectly sane. The hon. gentleman read that letter because at its close it stated, that the jury made the recommendation to mercy on account of the mismanagement by the Government of the North-West. Very little weight can be attached to that, as there was not a tittle of evidence produced on that subject at the trial; and when the hon. member for West Durham admits it could not have legally been produced, no one will say on the other side of the House, that although it was not proved at the trial, they could act on public rumor, or a public impression which may have prevailed in that country that grievances existed. The man who wrote that letter was sufficiently intelligent, if we can judge by his composition as read to this House, to know that he took an oath that he would try the case according to the evidence, and if he undertakes to state to the hon. gentleman, and through him to this House, that the recommendation of the jury was based upon an impression that the Government had been culpable and that the prisoner should on that ground receive the clemency of the Crown, I take the liberty of declining to believe the statement of a man who declares that he has so little regard for his oath. Stephen, who is regarded as such a high authority by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), deals with this very subject of the treatment of persons under delusions :

"It undoubtedly is, and I think it is equally clear that it ought to be the law that the mere existence of an insane delusion which does not in fact influence particular parts of the conduct of the person affected by it has no effect upon their legal character."

I have already addressed myself to the hon. gentleman's statistics and shown they were not applicable to this case and this country, because we had in the North-West a Court of Appeal for reviewing questions of fact, while in England they have only the Home Secretary for doing that work. But when the hon. gentleman pressed upon us the great weight of authority of Mr. Justice Stephen, for the purpose of convincing this House that a man subject to religious delusions or political delusions ought to be a subject for Executive clemency, it flashed upon my mind at once that there was a passage very near where the hon.

gentleman was reading which his eye could not have caught. I beg to cite now a passage to be found near where the hon. gentleman was reading, but which is printed in a foot note, and perhaps in such fine print it did not catch the hon. gentleman's eye. On page 160 he says :

"My own opinion, however, is that if a special divine order were given to a man to commit murder, I should certainly hang him for it unless I got a special divine order not to hang him. What the effect of getting such an order would be is a question difficult for any one to answer until he gets it."

There is another passage from the same author at page 176 which I shall quote. I use it to show that the doctrines which are laid down by this high authority, and most recent authority, are inconsistent with the doctrines which have been laid down in some works on medical jurisprudence and insanity, and that even some who hold the most advanced views with respect to humanity and philosophy in legislation, are unwilling at this day to go the length which hon. gentlemen say we should be censured for not going :

"Dr. Maudsley's illustration does not come up to his principle, because he supposes the madman to act under a delusion which would weaken his power of self-control. Suppose a case in which there is no delusion at all, and no connection at all between the madness and the crime. For instance, there are two brothers A. and B. A. is the owner of a large estate, B. is heir-at-law. B. suffers to some extent from insanity, and is under care at a private lunatic asylum where his disease is going off and there is every prospect of his cure. A. comes to see him; and B. who knew of his intention to do so, and who apart from his madness is extremely wicked, contrives to poison him with every circumstance of premeditation and deliberation, managing artfully to throw the blame on another person who is hanged. B. completely recovers and inherits the estate. Why, when the truth comes to light, should not B. be hanged? His act, by the supposition, was in every respect a sane one, though he happened to be mad when he did it. The fact that he was mad ought to be allowed to be relevant to his guilt, and to be left to the jury as evidence as far as it went in favor of a verdict of not guilty on the ground of insanity, or (if such a verdict were permitted by law) guilty, but the prisoner's power of self-control was weakened by insanity; but if the jury chose to find such a man guilty simply I think they would be well warranted in doing so, and if they did I think he ought to be hanged."

The hon. gentleman says that the Executive should be turned out of office if they hang him and his authority says: "if they did, I think he ought to be hanged."

"The case which I have suggested is of course so stated as to afford the strongest imaginable illustration of the principle which it illustrates, but in reality it does not go further than Dr. Maudsley's own statement that the inmates of lunatic asylums perpetrate violence of all kinds and degrees under the influence of the ordinary bad passions of human nature. If a lunatic was proved to have committed a rape, and to have accomplished his purpose by an attempt to strangle, would there be any cruelty in sentencing him to a severe flogging? Would the execution of such a sentence have no effect on other lunatics in the asylum? I assume of course a finding by the jury of guilty simply, after a direction that they might qualify their verdict if they thought that in fact the lunatic's power of self-control was diminished by his disease and if evidence on the subject were submitted to them.

"It is to be recollected in connection with this subject that though madness is a disease, it is one which to a great extent and in many cases is the sufferer's own fault. In reading medical works the connection between insanity and every sort of repulsive vice is made so clear, that it seems more natural to ask whether in many cases insanity is not rather a crime in itself than an excuse for the crimes which it causes. A man cannot help an accidental blow on the head; but he can avoid habitual indulgence in disgusting vices, and these are a commoner cause of madness than accidents. He cannot avoid the misfortune of being descended from insane or diseased parents; but even if he has that misfortune, he ought to be aware of it, and to take proper precautions against the effects which it may be expected to produce. We do not recognise the grossest ignorance, the most wretched education, the most constant involuntary association with criminals, as an excuse for crime; though in many cases—I think in a smaller proportion of cases than is commonly supposed—they explain the fact that crimes are committed. This should lead to strictness in admitting insanity as being in doubtful cases any excuse at all for crime, or any reason for mitigating the punishment due to it."

Now, I think the House will agree with me that at any rate the hon. gentleman's own authority does not condemn us. As I said before, the very evidence which was allowed to go to the jury in this case was evidence of his delusions, the evidence that his self-control might have been weakened by these delusions, and when the jury found against that they found against all, and they did find against that when they came to the conclusion to find a verdict of guilty, leaving out of question altogether the evidence produced by the hon. gentleman himself who says they not only believed him to be guilty, but to be perfectly sane as well. A few words before I close with regard to what was pressed upon us with more force in the earlier stages of this debate than in its later stages and that is the contention that the Executive were bound to exercise clemency because the jury recommended it. Now, it is true as the hon. gentleman for West Durham stated that the law of France gives to juries in that country the right to mitigate the sentence themselves, by pronouncing that the criminal is guilty but that there are extenuating circumstances. The hon. gentleman, I think, will remember that it was developed in the investigation of the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment, that some of the best writers on French jurisprudence have insisted that that right should be restricted so far as to compel the jury to find what the extenuating circumstances are, because the mercy which is involved in the verdict of extenuating circumstances is so liberally bestowed, that the force and authority of the law are impaired in that country. For these reasons it has always been recognised by those who have administered criminal law in England that the authorities, the tribunals, the Executive, are not bound, even when a reason is assigned, by the recommendation to mercy. Lord Cranworth said in his testimony before that commission on the 29th of November, 1864 :

"The jury now practically recommend to mercy on the ground of great provocation, or from whatever causes they may think proper to make that recommendation, which, of course, is always conveyed to the Crown, but it still rests with the Crown to act on it or not."

Now, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) the other day made a citation from the English Hansard which impressed the House as being of great force, and which fell upon my ear as somewhat novel doctrine. He cited a passage from a speech of Sir William Harcourt to the effect that when there was a recommendation to mercy, the extreme penalty was never enforced. Now, for the satisfaction of that hon. gentleman I beg that he will refer to the context again, because he will see that the subject of discussion then was the propriety of changing the law with regard to murder, for the purpose of exempting from the extreme penalty those cases in which there is provocation, and it was in relation to those cases that Sir William Harcourt said that the jury had it in their power to extend clemency by recommending mercy, and that when they did recommend mercy the extreme penalty was never carried out—the hon. gentleman will find if he looks up the speech that it is only in relation to those cases of murder in which there has been provocation that any Home Secretary has ever laid down the rule that the recommendation to mercy must be regarded by the Executive. Sir Wm. Harcourt, speaking of the attempt made before the commission of 1866 to distinguish between deliberate murders and those under provocation said :

"The Home Office did distinguish between the murders which were those which ought to be treated as murders with malice aforethought from those which, according to the commission, should be put in the second category."

How?

"The jury had power to recommend mercy in cases where there was provocation, and which did not, in the law of England, convert the crime into manslaughter. In the practice of the Home Office, where the jury recommended mercy the capital sentence was never executed."

These were the words the hon. gentleman relied on, but they were qualified by what went before :

"And in point of fact they had there the second category given effect to."

And he shows that it meant that, and that only, when he goes on to say :

"There was the case of difficulty, however, where the jury recommended mercy, and the judge did not second the recommendation."

The hon. member read this passage, but he did not seem to see the force of it as qualifying what went before, and limiting its meaning :

"And in that case it remained for the Secretary of State to form his own judgment on the subject. He must form it on his own responsibility, and with all the assistance he might receive from the sources he had access to."

Sir George Grey, who had been Home Secretary three times in fifteen years, in his evidence before the commission, said, in reference to the recommendation to mercy:

"I have no means of knowing what passes in a jury-box, but that may possibly be in some cases (we can hardly account for it in any other way than upon that supposition), because there has been some difference of opinion among the jury, and unanimity has been obtained by a verdict of guilty, accompanied by a recommendation to mercy, where there were really no grounds for that recommendation. Judges frequently ask for the grounds of the recommendation, and the jury frequently give some, or some which have no bearing on the case. In those cases I think that that may account for the belief that there has been an indisposition to find a verdict which would necessarily consign the prisoner to execution. I have no doubt that there are numbers of cases in which executions have taken place in this country in which extenuating circumstances would have been found by juries in France, and to allow them to do so would lead to great uncertainty. If it was controlled by the discretion of the judge, it would really amount to nothing but what takes place now in a recommendation to mercy by the jury. If the judge is satisfied that the grounds of their recommendation are reasonable, he reports it to the Secretary of State and the sentence is generally commuted."

But the hon. member will find, if he cares to make sure, that recommendations are not necessarily acted upon. He will find, in the evidence given by Judge Hill and by Mr. Baggs, before the Royal Commission, in 1865, many cases, in which juries made recommendations to mercy, which were not acted upon by the Executive. Now, something was said to the House on Friday last, for the purpose of showing that another claim, for Executive clemency, might be put forward on the ground of the reprieves that took place in this case. The House has been put in possession of the facts which enable it to see why those reprieves were granted. In the first place, an appeal to Manitoba was being prosecuted; in the next place, an appeal to England was being prosecuted; and, in the third place, an application was made by the counsel for the prisoner for a medical examination. The time consumed by these appeals made reprieves necessary; and the time consumed by the medical examination made another reprieve necessary; and if we have to arrive at the conclusion, in relation to capital offences in any part of this country, that because an appeal is being prosecuted, a reprieve becomes necessary, or because a medical examination is asked by counsel for the defence, and a reprieve becomes necessary, therefore, we are not to execute the sentence of the law, then the administration of the law will be in the hands of the criminal and his own counsel; for they have merely to appeal and to ask for a medical examination which no Executive would refuse, and there is an end of the capital penalty. If we exercised the right of reprieve on the ground that a grave error had been committed by the officers of the Crown in a prisoner's first trial, it would be unfair, perhaps, to refuse clemency; if the reprieve is made necessary by any act of the Executive itself, or by any mistake of its officers. In these cases it is considered not expedient to exact the extreme penalty, because it is supposed that the great lapse of time has lessened the deterrent effect of the punishment, and has weakened the effect of the sentence on the prisoner himself. But in this case no such result followed, and I think it is entirely in a different category as regards cases of reprieves. It has been said outside of the House, and repeated in this House, that the Executive, although they had a right to do what they did, although it was just and necessary to do what they did, acted under the dictation of a certain body of gentlemen holding peculiar views in this country. All I have to say, as a member of the Executive, is that if dictation was exercised in regard to that question it was never attempted upon me. It is true that some lodges and some individuals within that organisation did express an opinion as to how our duty should be discharged. We cannot prevent any persons from holding and expressing freely opinions on questions of great public interest. In this country it is recognised that a larger latitude is allowed both to the press and to individuals than is allowed in England; and although it may be a misfortune that the fate of a man condemned, and appealing to the Executive, should be made a matter of public discussion, we can no more prevent such expressions of opinion by that organization than we can prevent the Globe, the Winnipeg Free Press, or any paper which represented their side of the question, from expressing their opinion in the same way. All I can say is, if that dictation existed and was attempted, it had not a feather's weight in the scale in determining what should be done in this case by the Executive. If any body of people in this country choose to demand that the Executive shall exercise justice, that is no reason why we should refuse to exercise justice. We were bound to do justice, no matter what the opinion of the clamors of any section of the country may be; and if the case was so clear that Orange lodges and the Toronto Globe and other papers clamored for the execution of the law, unwise and to be deprecated as that may have been, it was no reason why we should not do our duty or arrive at our decision with that sense of responsibility which was required. With regard to what might have been done in this case, I would like to invite the reflection of the House for a moment as to what must have followed if Executive clemency had been exercised. One section of hon. gentlemen opposite say this man ought to have been condemned to imprisonment as a criminal, a great criminal, although not so great as to be outside the Executive clemency; another class on that side say no, he was totally mad, and he simply should have been put into a lunatic asylum. Had either course been taken, how long would his confinement have lasted? If the Executive ought to have acted on the broad principle that this was only a political offence, and that therefore the Executive clemency should have been extended to it, it would have been inconsistent with that view that Riel should have been long detained in prison. If he were confined in a lunatic asylum, how long, I ask, with the power the evidence showed he had during the outbreak of controlling his own conduct and of getting possession of his senses when he wanted them—with the power of controlling his action and recovering his balance when he wanted it—how long would it have been deemed just by the humane sentiment of the country to keep him in confinement? He would have been set at liberty, under the report that he was cured and no longer mad, and he could have established a cure whenever he chose; and what then would be the security for life and property in the North-West? I think that Louis Riel's next exclamation would have been, not that the rebellion of 1869-70 was not a patch upon that of 1885, but that both together would not be a patch on the rebellion he would raise the next time. I think that to have exercised the Executive clemency in a case like that, would have been, in the words I have quoted from Mr. Justice Stephen, "not benevolence but cowardice." But let me ask attention to another point connected with this branch of the subject. Let me call attention to the fact that the Indians, whom this man incited to rise, perpetrated some very cruel murders at Frog Lake, which called, in every sense of the word, loudly for the execution of the supreme penalty of the law against the Indians concerned in that massacre, not only because they committed great crimes but on other ground on which it is deemed proper to inflict capital punishment, namely, that it is absolutely necessary, by making a great example through the infliction of such punishment, to deter people disposed to crime from committing it. How could the perpetrators of the Frog Lake massacre have been punished, if the man who incited them to rebel—and the massacre was to them the natural result of rebellion—had escaped? How could the punishment of the law have been meted out to them, or any deterrent effect have been achieved, if the "arch conspirator," the "arch traitor," if the "trickster," as he has been called by men who did him their best service, was allowed to go free or kept in a lunatic asylum until he chose to get rid of his temporary delusions? It was absolutely necessary, as I have said, to show to those people, to those Indians, and to every section of the country, and to every class of the population there, that the power of the Government in the North-West was strong, not only to protect but to punish. In the administration of justice with regard to those territories in particular, it was absolutely necessary that the deterrent effect of capital punishment should be called into play. Remote as that territory is, strong as the necessity is for vigorous Government there and for the enforcement of every branch of the law, I am not disposed to be inhumane or unmerciful in the enforcement of the penalties which the law pronounces; but in relation to men of this class, who, time and again, have been candidates for the extreme penalty of the law, who have despised mercy when it was given them before, I would give the answer to appeals for mercy which was given those who proposed to abolish capital punishment in France: "Very well, but let the assassins begin."

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman who has so ably and at such length addressed this House on this important question has spoken rather as an advocate than as a judge, and I regret that the hon. gentleman, in descending from the bench, had not remained in that position a sufficient length of time to enable him to take a judicial rather than an advocate's view of a question such as the one before us. The hon. gentleman has regretted the way in which this debate has been brought before the House. I believe every hon. gentleman on this side agrees with him in that respect. He says it was not the Government who were responsible for this discussion having been brought on at this period. I am not disposed to contest that statement, but I am inclined to state that had the hon. gentleman's leader been present he would not have been able to make so positive a denial of the charge that the Government are responsible. The hon. Minister of Justice complained that Parliament is, by this motion and discussion, made a court of appeal, and he informs the House that Parliament is not the proper tribunal for the discussion of judicial questions; that this is not a question which can be brought before Parliament for consideration. Now the hon. gentleman forgets who is on trial in this case. He argued throughout as though this House were engaged in trying Riel. Why the Government have put it out of our power to enter into a discussion of that question with any hope of success, and we are at present engaged in trying the Government, or taking into consideration the propriety or impropriety, of the fairness or unfairness of the action of the Government, and it does seem to me it would be rather extraordinary doctrine to lay down that no Executive action, for which the officers of the Crown are supposed to be responsible, can be a proper subject to discuss in the House of the representatives of the people. It is quite true that it is not usual to take up in Parliament the consideration of the decision of the courts, and to take into consideration the action of the Executive with reference to these decisions, and the hon. gentleman quoted the words of Mr. Gladstone for the purpose of giving emphasis to his proposition. Now, Mr. Gladstone's words were not that it was improper in every case to bring such a question before Parliament, but that it ought to be done only in extreme cases. Mr. Gladstone's declaration was quite sufficient to show that there might be cases when it would be right and proper to bring the action of the Executive or of the courts themselves before the attention of the representative body of the nation. In fact, a matter of Executive action which has occupied so large a space in public estimation outside of Parliament, which has so seriously attracted public attention, could hardly be an improper question to bring before the consideration of Parliament itself. The hon. gentleman also said that we have been reiterating from this side of the House again and again a cry for more papers. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that that was a most improper proceeding on our part, but I noticed that some of the papers we have asked for, and have been unable to obtain, the hon. gentleman found it necessary to read in order to defend the Government in this particular case. It did seem to me that, when papers are necessary to explain and defend the action of the Government, they are proper papers to bring down to Parliament, and I think it is greatly to be regretted that the Government have failed to place in the hands of Parliament the means of forming a clear and accurate conclusion upon this important question. The hon. gentleman also said that the complaint which had been made was wholly unwarranted, that others were tried for a less serious offence than that for which Riel was tried. The hon. gentleman said that was no reason why Riel or his friends should complain. I do not agree with him. I think all parties guilty of similar offences under similar circumstances ought to be tried in the same way and ought to be liable to the same degree of punishment. I think, in the administration of justice, we ought to apply the same rule and the same degree of punishment to all parties under the same circumstances, and that the Government applying a different rule to Riel's case than that which they applied to any other party connected with the rebellion, to say the least, committed a very serious blunder. Hon. members on this side of the House have from the first expressed their regret that the Government had not seen proper to bring down all necessary papers and to afford the fullest possible information on the subject. It may be true that we have before us the materials for forming a judgment. Every court has that, no matter how imperfect the evidence before it may be, but it is of very great consequence that all the evidence in the possession of the Government which relates to this case and which may go to assist Parliament in coming to a right conclusion should have been placed in the hands of members. Hon. gentlemen have endeavored to stifle discussion. They have moved the previous question. They tell us that it is improper that Parliament should express a judicial opinion on this subject, and yet they have endeavored to prevent Parliament from expressing another opinion. They have endeavored to force Parliament to express an opinion upon that question which the Minister of Justice says Parliament is not qualified to deal with. They have endeavored to close the public mind against the means of forming a correct conclusion on this particular subject. They have endeavored to limit the discussion to a single incident connected with the administration of affairs in the North-West Territories. Now, we ought to be in no hurry to come to a conclusion on this question. The Government have been in no hurry to give the House information on this subject, and I think Parliament would be justified, I think it would be the proper course to pursue, to vote down the proposition of the Minister of Public Works, and to deal with this question ultimately when a larger amount of information is at our disposal. The hon. the leader of the Opposition said, some time ago, at London, that he would be no party to constructing a political platform out of the Regina scaffold. Hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are of a different mind. They have before the House the materials for such a platform. They have moved the previous question for the purpose of making such a platform. They are determined that no other shall be had. If they obtained a vote against them on that question, we should hear nothing of any other question of policy in the party press or before the country, than this particular motion which is made by a friend or supporter of theirs on other questions. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has stated that the members on this side of the House dared not vote against the Ministry upon this question. The hon. member for West Huron and the hon. member for West Durham have already informed the House how they purpose voting. I shall do the same. I dare vote against the Government when I think them in the wrong. Upon this question their action has been indefensible, and the reasons which have led me to this conclusion will, I think, prove equally convincing to the public. It must not be forgotten that the administration of justice does not rest solely with the courts. The criminal law is, in one most important particular, administered by the Executive. Our whole system of criminal jurisprudence is based upon the assumption that the criminal law, is, in itself, imperfect; that if it were allowed to operate without modification it would often prove exceedingly harsh and cruel; that in order to adjust it with perfect fairness, important duties are imposed upon the administration. It cannot be left, in every instance, to take its own course. But to secure a wise and merciful administration, so far as human imperfection will permit, a legal discretion must be exercised; and this discretion, under our constitution, is vested in the responsible advisers of the Crown. The highest form of this discretion is the granting of full pardon. A more modified form is the substitution of a milder form of punishment for that awarded by the courts. This is not an arbitrary discretion, it is judicial; it is a discretion which requires, in those who exercise it, the judicial spirit, and an attention to judicial principles, which are well settled, and which are to be learned from a long series of precedents, which have become a necessary and inseparable part in the administration of justice in criminal cases. On every capital offence, a report is made by the judge who tries the case to the Minister of Justice. It is the duty of the Minister of Justice to consider that report; it is the duty of the Government, upon the report which he makes, to allow the sentence to stand or to mitigate the punishment, and in no case can they increase its severity. The Executive in all capital cases are, under our system of administration, a merciful court of appeal. They may modify a sentence in favor of a prisoner, but they cannot increase its severity. They are not hampered by rigid rules or proceedings. They have a freedom of choice, and they use whatever means may be necessary for obtaining further information upon the subject than that which was disclosed at the trial. They may go beyond and behind the record of the court, and in doing so, they may perform a service to the community of the very highest consequence. In their hands the law is adjusted as the case may require, to the particular circumstances. They are responsible to the understanding and to the conscience of the people for the manner in which they carry into effect the law against those who have been capitally condemned. Now, what is the law as modified and adjusted to Riel's particular case? The hon. Minister of Justice maintained that there was in this case the fullest degree of responsibility, and, that being the case, there was no reason whatever why the Government should intervene on his behalf. My hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron), complained with reference to the time allowed Riel's counsel to prepare for trial. The Minister of Justice has undertaken to defend the course of the Government with reference to that particular matter. Now, I am not complaining of the action of the judge, nor am I complaining of Executive action with reference to the time allowed. There is no doubt whatever that the counsel for the prisoner did agree to a period of time which was ultimately fixed as that within which Riel would have to get ready for trial. It was quite clear that counsel for the Crown were furnished every facility to hasten the trial on, and they did so unduly, while the counsel for the prisoner were obliged to make the best of what they could not prevent. Now, I would like to read to the House a passage from a speech of Lord Brougham, made in the House of Lords while engaged in the discussion of the MacNaghton case. He referred to the very short time that was given to Bellingham's counsel to prepare for trial in that case. He says while condemning the refusal of the judge to give sufficient time for the defence:

"That fact was most deeply to be deplored; and he would go further and say that that learned judge was most profoundly to be blamed. He had never known Lord Erskine with whom he had discussed this subject—he had never seen that illustrious advocate and great criminal lawyer upon any one of those many subjects which they had so often canvassed together, more moved to indignation than he had been upon the case of the refusal, on the part of the learned judge to postpone that trial. Affidavits had been made of the prisoners family having been tainted with insanity. Affidavits had been produced from those who had known him from infancy, of his having been insane. Affidavits were offered showing a prima facie case of mental alienation. But the evidence was two hundred miles off—at Liverpool—and the learned judge thought fit to refuse a fortnight's delay that that evidence might be produced."

Lord Brougham, in that case, seemed to think that a delay of a fortnight was not an unreasonable delay. Yet, Mr. Speaker, in the case of Riel, some of the witnesses were two thousand miles away. It was in a country where lawyers had not the ordinary facilities of counsel for the purpose of reference to the law, and in order to examine the law as well as the facts of the case, and yet we are told that half the time asked by Bellingham's counsel was sufficient time to prepare for the trial of a man who was 2,000 miles from some of the witnesses required in this case. Then the hon. member for West Huron pointed out that the evidence that was sought to be procured at the trial was rejected as irrelevant, and as furnishing no defence before a judicial tribunal to the charge of treason. It was stated the only plea they made was the plea of insanity, and that the evidence was not relevant to that particular plea. Sir, it does seem to me that it would not have been an unreasonable course to have allowed the evidence to be produced for the purpose of showing, not that he was not guilty of crime, but that there was extenuating circumstances connected with that particular offence. How was the judge to be in a position to report extenuating circumstances in favor of the prisoner? Take, for instance, the statement that the half-breeds whom he sought to lead, had sought to redress, that there had been four years of delay, and that they had been threatened with eviction. Now, take the case of homicide. It is quite true that a man may be allowed to prove that he was provoked in committing a crime, that he was in a passion, and that circumstances, though they may not justify the act, yet they will go in mitigation of the act, and in diminishing his responsibility, and unless these circumstances are produced at the trial there will be no opportunity of bringing them forward at any other time or to any other parties than to the Executive itself. Take the case, for instance, of libel. A man who does not plead justification, although he is not allowed to produce evidence to justify, he may produce evidence of the truth of the libel by way of diminishing the amount of damages to which he will be liable. Why should the crime of treason be placed in a wholly different position from that of any other crime of the calendar? Sir, whether this may be regarded as relevant evidence or not, there can be no doubt whatever that it would be relevant evidence to submit to the Executive as a merciful court of appeal for the purpose of diminishing the punishment to which the unfortunate criminal was liable. The Government has certain duties to perform, the servants of the Crown have obligations resting upon them; they owe something to the public. When any portion of the public take up arms against sovereign authority, there is no conclusive presumption of law that they have suffered no wrong at the hands of the servants of the Crown, and that there can be no mitigation of the character of their crime. Riel was charged with treason. His life was put in peril. His offence was political. The provocation received was political, and I submit that the evidence of wrong endured, whether from neglect or from positive acts of injustice, ought to have been received. How is the judge, otherwise, to decide whether the prisoner is a proper subject for royal clemency? How is he, in this respect, going to discharge his whole duty, when he closes the only avenues by which the whole truth can reach his mind? But whether the House does or does not concur in this view, may not be important, but it is important to bear in mind that such evidence was beyond all question relevant before the advisers of the Crown. But how could it be expected that this last court of resort could fairly consider the case of any half-breed put upon his trial? What extenuating circumstance could he offer with any hope of success? Could he expect that those who had wronged him would admit the fact? In ordinary cases Ministers are in a position to hear and to judge fairly of every extenuating circumstance,—but when the circumstances pleaded are the wrongs done by the Administration itself, how can we expect them to receive their due weight? The Government was in this unhappy position that everything which might tend to legally excuse or to morally justify the insurrection of the half-breeds, was a condemnation of the Ministers themselves. The Minister of Justice said that there was really no difference in practice between the cases tried in the North-West Territories and those tried elsewhere under the general law, but it was conceded that in the courts of the North-West Territories the judges are required to send full notes of the evidence. They are not required to do so from any of the other Provinces and if they did, from any of the other Provinces they did more than is required of them by the statute. This provision of the law, which is not to be found in the general statute, shows that the Government intended that Ministers of the Crown should exercise a more careful supervision over the trials that took place in the North-West Territories than elsewhere. Prisoners before the North-West courts have an opportunity of having not only the ordinary treatment of the case considered, as in the other Provinces, but the whole evidence on the trial submitted to the Executive for the purpose of exercising supervision over the proceedings in the courts in the Territories, which is not the case in any of the other Provinces. There is very grave reason why a full and careful enquiry by Parliament should be made into the cases of parties tried in the Territories, especially if the parties are tried for political offences. This was a charge of treason, it was a trial of a man for rebellion growing out of the conduct of the Administration itself, and therefore they were not in a position to deal impartially with his case as with the ordinary criminal offences. For this reason it is the duty of Parliament to exercise a more careful supervision over everything pertaining to this case than to ordinary criminal cases. It is said that Riel was a party who committed a murder fifteen years ago; that he committed a serious offence against the law of the country and had rendered himself odious to a large portion of the population. That is true. There was a strong feeling perhaps among the majority of the people that he ought to be punished. There was a strong disposition not to extend to him the same amount of clemency that would be extended to ordinary offenders, and therefore it was more necessary that the Government should see they did not deal with him in a way different from that extended to ordinary offenders. Let us briefly look at the history of the case, because Riel was not a resident of the country, and it has been sometimes said, on this account, he deserved his fate. If it be so—if this is a sound conclusion it will not be made less strong by full consideration. It must always be borne in mind that the principles of liberty and justice are not likely to suffer in the persons of the powerful and the popular. It is the unpopular man, it is the man who has, on account of his actions or his opinions, become odious to the majority of the community from whom the protection of the law is most likely to be withdrawn. And if the conduct of Riel has been such as to make him hated by a large section of our population, it is all the more necessary to see that he has not been illegally punished, because it is in the person of such a man that a new rule can be most easily set up, and the principles of our law most readily changed. In June, 1884, a half-breed delegation from Batoche walked 700 miles into Montana in search of Riel. They invited him to return and to place himself at their head. They desired him to assist them in securing those rights which, in spite of their exertions, they had, up to that time, been unable to obtain. The delegation consisted of Gabriel Dumont, James Isbester, Moïse Ouellette and Michel Dumas. They presented Riel with the resolutions which had been passed at a public meeting appointing them a delegation to wait upon him, and they obtained from him a reply. It has already been read to the House. I need not read it again. From this reply it will be seen that Riel agreed to go with them with reluctance. He hoped to be able to accomplish for them what they desired, and to return again to Montana before September. Riel was ambitious for public honors, and he hoped to take part in the affairs of the country in which he then resided. The delegation returned and made their report. They expressed their admiration for Riel and their confidence in his success. They say: "We know what he has done for Manitoba and the North-West and the little advantage which he had personally received from the same. And returning from this long journey of nearly 1,400 miles we feel twice as much confidence in the man whom we have been visiting in a foreign land." They say that Riel's speech has inspired them with the greatest confidence, because his instructions are to help them, but while helping them, he does not want in the slightest degree to create any difficulty with the Government. At this time neither Riel nor the half-breeds thought of taking up arms, or of embarrassing the Government in any way. He expected to succeed. He expected to secure for the half-breeds a redress of their grievances and to return in time to Montana to take part in the autumn elections. On the 8th July the Government were informed by Mr. Crozier that Riel had arrived with his family at Duck Lake; that he was to be the leader of the half-breeds and to assist them in obtaining their rights—what they asked for was a survey in accordance with their plan of settlement, a ratification of their holdings, and an extinguishment of their Indian title. On the 27th of July, Captain Crozier wrote to the Government that Riel had held meetings at Prince Albert and Duck Lake, and that he had communicated with the Indians and told them that they had rights as well as the half-breeds, which he wished to have redressed, and that he also expressed a wish to confer with the Indian chiefs. On the 8th August, Sergeant Brooks telegraphed that Riel had several private meetings at the South Branch attended by leading half-breeds. On the 14th of August, he reported that Riel had crossed the river at Batoche's house, and had, they say, addressed a meeting as the people were coming from church, and was greatly excited. He said that the Indians had rights to be protected as well as the half-breeds. Mr. Brooks thinks Riel is in communication with Big Bear; has sent Tomkins the farm instructor, to meet him at Frog Lake. Mr. Brooks says there is a man by the name of Jackson here who came from Prince Albert, he is brother of the druggist and seems to be a right-hand man of Riel's. He is with him at present and has been for some time.—

"He has a great deal to say, and I believe he does more harm than any breed among them. There are a great many people through the country who have what they call grievances, and seem to agree with Riel. Whether they really do or not, it is hard to say. I have been speaking to a number of people at Prince Albert, and men who signed a petition for him to go there and speak, simply did it because they thought it might draw the attention of the Government to the place. There is no doubt that every one is hard up, and they thought they must do something to draw their attention."

From this communication it will be seen that the Government were given information as to the progress of events; that the movement was gradually embracing Indians and whites, as well as half-breeds; that every class of the population were encouraging Riel in the work in which he was engaged. He had the moral support of the people. He was sustained by public opinion in that region, and was thereby encouraged to go forward. Jackson, whom Mr. Brooks calls "Riel's right hand man, who had so much to say, who was doing so much harm, more than Riel himself was unquestionably a lunatic. The fact was established on his trial. I do not propose to discuss his case; but I wish to call attention to the fact that his lunacy is not mentioned by Brooks; that it was not discovered by the people, and I commend his case to those who are disposed to argue that Riel could not have been a lunatic, otherwise the half-breeds would not have followed him. On the 21st August, Mr. Brooks reports that Riel and Lepine had a conference with Big Bear at Jackson's, and that he heard it stated on good authority that Riel had given up the idea of going back to Montana, and intends remaining in the Territory, although he had stated to different parties that he should leave for Montana on the 1st of September. Riel, it will be seen, was becoming more interested in the affairs upon the Saskatchewan. They were proving of absorbing interest to him, and he was gradually giving up his desire to become a leading man in Montana. On the 5th of September, a meeting of the French half-breeds took place at St. Laurent. Bishop Grandin and several clergymen were present. At this meeting Riel presided. He said that the business of the meeting was limited to two questions, why the clergy kept aloof and seemed even hostile to the movement, and, secondly, whether the claims of the half-breeds upon the Government were just and reasonable? The meeting was addressed by Gabriel Dumont and Charles Nolin. The bishop was pressed to speak, but he told them that the mystery in which they shrouded their proceedings left the clergy without sufficient information of their designs and gave rise to suspicions, fears and painful alarms. The bishop told them at this meeting that if they would speak their intentions he would be in a position to advise them. Mr. Nolin stated their claims upon the Government and declared they did not want a rebellion; that it was not seriously in the mind of any one; that it would be a crime, and they desired to keep to legitimate means. Bishop Grandin and the clergy saw clearly, however, that there was danger in the movement, and he stated his intention of abstaining from taking part in political movements of doubtful interest to the population. He stated that with regard to some of their propositions he had himself communicated with the Federal Government, that he had obtained promises which he believed to be official, and which he regretted seemed to have been forgotten: that he himself had felt the same discontent that they had felt, and that he had not failed to complain in the proper quarter. The bishop showed his alarm at the probable result of the agitation. He desired to moderate and control it, but he received no aid from the Government. On the 11th September the hon. Minister of Public Works, in speaking at a banquet given him and his colleague, the present Minister of Finance at Winnipeg, said:

"He had conversed with men both in the towns and country. He had asked if there were any grievances and they said there were none."

The Minister of Public Works had before addressed the Metis at Qu'Appelle. Had he heard nothing of these grievances there? Had these grievances never been brought under his notice? Had he never heard from his colleague, in the Department of the Interior, from Bishop Grandin or others, of grievances unredressed? Had he been kept in profound ignorance of the delegation that brought Riel back; of the meetings that were being held; of the resolutions that were adopted; and of the communications that were made to the Government of which he was a member? Did he know nothing of the grave instances of neglect, delay, and mismanagement, in matters affecting the peace, welfare and good government of the North-West? Was the Minister of Public Works serious or was he speaking ironically when he said that he had asked if there were any grievances, and the people answered there were none. On the 20th of October Major Crozier reported:

"I beg to state that Constable Elliott returned from Carleton on the evening of the 15th, and reported to me that a man named Tomkins, who is employed by the Indian Department of that place as interpreter, has told him that Riel was drilling men at St. Jerome, and that a large meeting had been held there on the 12th at midnight. He further told him that a chief from Muskeg Lake had been sent to see Big Bear to request him to attend a meeting of Riel's to be held at Batoche in two weeks time. I sent a man in plain clothes to the vicinity of St. Jérôme to find out, if possible, the truth of the reports. He returned yesterday and reports all quiet. He states that there is a rumor of a large meeting to be held at Batoche in two or three weeks, as soon as all the crops are in. He could find out nothing about any drill having been performed. I have stationed a man in plain clothes in the vicinity of Batoche, who will keep me informed regarding the movements of Riel. The half-breed population are in a very discontented state, principally attributable to the utter failure of their crops."

So it would seem the Government received accurate information from the police and others, but which they did not utilise. They did nothing to redress the grievances, or otherwise to check the progress of the movement. On the contrary, they continued in the public service those who were actively aiding him, and he boasted of having been offered office himself. One would suppose that they regarded themselves rather as chroniclers of the events that were transpiring than Ministers of the Crown governing the country. In December Mr. Gagnon reports that the half-breeds are pressing Riel to settle amongst them. They have given him a well-furnished house, and, that on the 2nd of January they intended presenting him with a purse. In that report he says:

"These testimonials of good will of the majority would go towards denying certain rumors which say that several are lacking confidence in their leader, that his way of acting and speaking denotes a very hot head, and that he does not now agree with their priest. There is no doubt that a great number are still led by him, and would act upon his dictates. Some time ago I sent several men to South Branch to have horses shod. The river being full of floating ice, they could not cross. Some way or other the report was brought to the east side of the river that these men were sent to arrest Riel, who was then at the crossing. Within half an hour over a hundred men had collected to protect him. There is a certain amount of suffering amongst the half-breeds, but not to the extent it was expected to reach. Large quantities of supplies are required for this part of the country, and all who have horses can make a living by freighting. As far as I can see the chief grievance of the half-breeds is that they are afraid that the Government will not sanction the way they, amongst themselves, have agreed to take their homesteads—ten chains frontage on the river by two miles back."

On the 22nd of January, we are informed that Riel and others were engaged in drafting a petition to the Dominion Government, demanding certain concessions promised to the half-breeds, and that it was the intention of the half-breeds of the Saskatchewan districts if these concessions were not granted, to resort to arms to force a compliance to their demands. We find that a meeting was held among the English and Scotch half-breeds expressing their sympathy with the French half-breeds, but they also say that they did not approve of any resort to arms. It would appear from these statements that when Riel went to the country he expected, at an early day, to succeed in securing to the half-breeds a redress for their grievances, that he expected to do this by constitutional means, and that he hoped to return to Montana not later than the 1st of September, 1884, that in fact he believed that two months would be a sufficient time to collect the necessary information and to communicate with the Government at Ottawa, and to obtain their reply. But Riel's difficulties multiplied, and his labors increased, he became more and more excited, and that aberration of mind which it is now claimed affected him during the first rebellion, in 1870, once more troubled him and characterised his conduct. This is clear from the statement of Father Fourmond, who says :

"Before the rebellion it appeared as if there were two men in the prisoner. In private conversation he was affable, polite, pleasant and a charitable man to me. I noticed that even when he was quietly talked with about the affairs of politics and Government and was not contradicted, he was quite rational, but as soon as he was contradicted on these subjects then he became a different man, and he would be carried away with his feelings. He would go so far as to use violent expressions to those who were even his friends. As soon as the rebellion commenced he became excited; he was carried away; he lost all control of himself and his temper. He went so far that, when a father contradicted him he became quite excited, and he had no respect for him, and even threatened to destroy all the churches. He said: 'There is danger for you, but thanks to the friendship I have for you I will protect you from any harm.' Once I went to St. Antoine, and there I met a number of priests, and Riel said: 'I have been appointed by the Council to be your spiritual adviser.' I said our spiritual adviser was the bishop, and Mr. Riel would not be him. The Rev. Father Fourmond says: 'As to his political ideas, he wanted first to go Winnipeg and Lower Canada and the United States, and even France, and he said we will take your country and then he was to go to Italy and overthrow the Pope, and then he would choose another Pope of his own making.'"

The Rev. Father André gave it as his opinion that Riel was mad. He says.

"In conversing on politics, and on the rebellion, and on religion, he stated things which frightened the priests. I am obliged to visit every month the divisions of the district. Once all the priests met together, and they put the question: 'Is it possible to allow that man to continue in his religious duties?' And they unanimously decided that on this question he was not responsible. That he could not suffer any contradiction. On the questions of religion and politics we considered him completely a fool; in discussing these questions it was like showing a red flag to a bull."

These are the views of two intelligent men who had an opportunity of observing him during the period of the rebellion. During the period that he committed those acts for which he was tried, and for which he was held responsible, and the degree of that responsibility must depend upon his mental condition at the time those acts were committed. The mental condition of Riel during the period of the rebellion is further disclosed by his conduct towards Mr. McKay, which is strikingly like the conduct he exhibited in his interview with Mr. Donald Smith and others at the period of the first rebellion. Mr. McKay says in his evidence :

"I shook hands with Riel, and had a talk with him. I said: 'There appears to be great excitement here, Mr. Riel.' He said 'No; there is no excitement at all. It was simply that the people were trying to redress their grievances, as they had asked repeatedly for their rights, and they had decided to make a demonstration.' I told him it was a very dangerous thing to resort to arms. He said that he had been waiting fifteen long years, and that it was time now, as they had waited patiently, that their rights should be given to them, as the poor half-breeds had been imposed upon. I disputed his wisdom, and advised him to adopt different measures. He then accused me of neglecting my people. He said that if it was not for men like me, their grievances would have been redressed long ago; that as no one took any notice of this people, he had decided to take the lead in the matter. He accused me of having neglected them. I told him it was simply a matter of opinion, that I certainly had taken an interest in them; and that my interest in the country was the same as theirs. I had advised them time and again, and I had not neglected them. I also said that he had neglected them a long time if he took as deep an interest in them as he professed to. He became very excited, and got up and said: 'You do not know what we are after; it is blood—blood we want. It is a war of extermination. Every one that is against us is to be driven out of the country.' He said there were two curses in the country—the Government and the Hudson Bay Company. He turned to me and said I was a traitor to his government, and a robber and a scoundrel, a liar and a thief, and I do not know what all."

"Q. He used very violent language to you?—A. Yes; he finally said it was blood and the first blood they wanted was mine. There was some little dishes on the table, and he got hold of a spoon, and said 'You have no blood, you are a traitor to the country so it is frozen, and the little blood you have will be there in five minutes (putting the spoon up to my face, and pointing to it.) I said 'If you think you are benefiting your cause by taking my blood, you are quite welcome to it.' He called his people and a committee, and wanted to put me on trial for my life, and Garnet got up and went to the table with a sheet of paper, and Gabriel Dumont took a seat on a syrup keg, and Riel called up the witnesses against me. He said that I was a liar, and he told them I had said all the people in that section of the country were rising against them. I said it was not so, it was only the people in this town. He said that he could prove that I was a liar by Thomas Scott.' Mr. McKay spoke in his own defence, while he was speaking Riel went up stairs, he said he had a committee meeting of importance there to attend, and when he came down again Mr. McKay says: 'Riel apologised to me for what he had said. He said that he did not address himself to me personally, that he had the greatest respect for me: that it was my cause he was speaking against.' He wished to show that he entertained great respect for me. He also apologised to the people there in French, and he said as I was going out that he was very sorry I was against him. That he would be glad to have me with them; and that it would not be too late for me to join them yet. He also said that this was Crozier's last opportunity of avoiding bloodshed. That unless he surrendered Fort Carleton an attack would be made at twelve o'clock."

Can any one doubt that this describes the language and conduct of an insane man? The suddenness of his passion, the suddenness with which it subsided, the cruelty and the capriciousness, are all indicative of insanity. We have exactly the same characteristics exhibited by Riel at the time he took the life of Scott that he exhibited when he threatened to take the life of McKay and when he probably would have taken his life had not other parties remonstrated with him against the course he was about to pursue. I refer to the report of Hon. Donald Smith, who refers in the first place to the case of Capt. Bolton. Riel proposed to put to death Capt. Bolton, and was with difficulty persuaded from carrying out this notion. Mr. Smith goes on to report :

"He was captured on the 17th. tried by court martial, and condemned to be shot at noon on the following day, but at the intercession of the Lord Bishop of Rupert's Land, Archdeacon McLean, and, in short, every influential man among the English, and I have been told also, at the earnest entreaty of the Catholic clergy, the execution was delayed till midnight of Saturday, the 19th. Further than this, Riel declared he could not, would not, yield, except, indeed, Dr. Schultz should be captured in the meantime, in which case he would be shot instead of Bolton. Archdeacon McLean had been in close attendance on Capt. Bolton for twenty-four hours, had administered to him the sacrament, received his last commands, and had promised to be present with him at the last moment, and when I met the Archdeacon on my way to see Riel, about 8 o'clock on the evening of the 19th, he was deeply affected, and had given up all hope. I found with Riel Mr. H. N. Robinson, of The Nation newspaper, and shortly afterwards Mr. James Ross, Chief Justice, entered, followed in a few minutes by Mr. Bannatyne, Postmaster, who had been ordered to bring the key of the mail bag, which Riel had opened, and examining the letters perused and retained one or more. Mr. Ross pleaded for Bolton, but was repulsed in the most contemptuous manner. I had already been speaking to Riel on the subject when interrupted by Mr. Ross's entrance, and now resumed the conversation. Riel was obdurate, and said that the English settlers and Canadians, but more especially the latter, had laughed at and despised the French half-breeds, believing that they would not dare to take the life of anyone, and that, under these circumstances, it would be impossible to have peace and establish order in the country; an example must therefore be made, and he had firmly resolved that Bolton's execution should be carried out, bitterly as he deplored the necessity for doing so. I reasoned with him long and earnestly, until at length, about 10 o'clock, he yielded, and addressing me, apparently with much feeling, said: 'Hitherto I have been deaf to all entreaties, and in now granting you this man's life, or words to that effect, 'may I ask you a favor?' 'Anything,' I replied, 'that in honor I can do.' He continued: 'Canada has disunited us; will you use your influence to re-unite us? You can do so, and without this it must be war—bloody civil war.' I answered, that as I had said on first coming to the country I would now repeat, that 'I would give my whole heart to effect a peaceable union of the country with Canada.' 'We want only our just rights as British subjects,' he said, 'and we want the English to join us simply to obtain these.' 'Then,' I remarked, 'I shall at once see them and induce them to go on with the election of delegates for that purpose;' and he replied: 'If you can do this war will be avoided, and not only the lives but the liberty of all the prisoners will be secured, for on your success depend the lives of all the Canadians in the country.' He immediately proceeded to the prison and intimated to Archdeacon McLean that he had been induced by me to spare Capt. Bolton's life, and had further promised to me that immediately on the meeting of the Council shortly to be elected, the whole of the prisoners would be released, requesting the Archdeacon at the same time to explain these circumstances to Capt. Bolton and the other prisoners."

Shortly after this he made up his mind, it would seem, without communicating with any of these parties, that he would execute Thomas Scott, although he had promised to release all the prisoners, which would have included Scott, who was then in confinement.—

"He then said that the conduct of the prisoners was very unsatisfactory, that they were very unruly, insolent to the soldiers, and their behavior altogether so very bad, that he was afraid the guards might be forced to retaliate in self-defence. I expressed much surprise at the information he gave, as the prisoners, without exception, had promised to Archdeacon McLean and myself, that seeing their helpless condition, they would endeavor to act so as to avoid giving offence to their guards, and we encouraged them to look forward to being speedily released in fulfilment of the promise made by Mr. Riel. One man, Parker, was mentioned as having made himself particularly obnoxious by his violent conduct, but not one word was said on this occasion regarding Scott, or the slightest intimation given, that he or any other person had been condemned to be shot."

And so we find afterwards that Riel decided on taking Scott's life; we find that efforts were put forward to prevent the execution of Scott, but he was nevertheless tried by mock court martial, condemned to death, and shot the next day. Now, we have, Mr. Speaker, the same mental characteristics, the same caprice, the same violence exhibited here that we find exhibited in his interview with the two clergymen whose evidence we have before us, and before Mr. Mackay, whose testimony was also given at the trial. I think it is scarcely possible to come to any other conclusion than that Riel was insane during the period of the last rebellion, and that the offence which has excited the great hostility against him, which, if he had been in the full possession of his senses, would have deserved the severest punishment the law could have inflicted, was committed when he was in the same mental condition as that in which he was when he led the half-breeds into rebellion on the Saskatchewan. It is said that this is the second time that Riel was guilty of treason. Well, I notice that before the Committee of Inquiry into the causes of the first outbreak in the North-West the First Minister said :

"The armed resistance was a very aggravated breach of the peace, but we were anxious to hold and did hold, that under the circumstances of the case it did not amount to treason. We were informed that the insurgents did not desire to throw off allegiance to the Queen, or sever their country from the Empire, but that their action was in the nature of an armed resistance to the entry into the country of an officer, or officers, sent by the Dominion Government. We desired, therefore, that it should be considered in the light of an unlawful assembly, although it might technically be held to come under the statute of treason, and it was intended that that continuous act, whatever it might be called, should come under the proclamation and be condoned by it.

When the Minister of Justice refers to this as being a second offence, I confess I hardly know what offence he alluded to as the first—whether he referred to the insurrection which the First Minister in 1875 described as "a grave breach of peace" or whether he referred to the murder of Thomas Scott. I have no hesitation in saying that I look upon the killing of Scott, if Riel were in the full possession of his faculties, as a cold-blooded, heartless, cruel murder. It is impossible to speak of it as a political offence, the rebellion had not made such progress as to make the counsel of its leaders a de facto government, and if it was a de facto government, it would have had no more right to commit murder in the exercise of authority than a regular constituted government, and that could give no authority to its chief officer to take the life of an individual in a wanton, cruel manner. For that offence I have no apology to offer. I regard it in precisely the same light as that in which it has been regarded by the great majority of the people, if it had been committed by a man in the full possession of his faculties. But I think his subsequent confinement in the asylums of Lower Canada, the testimony of the physicians who had him in charge in those asylums, the testimony of the experts who examined him before his trial, and the testimony of those men who saw him in the North-West, show that both in the first insurrection and in the second, both when he took the life of Scott and when he was seeking to incite the Indians to rebellion, he was partially insane; that upon the subject of religion and politics he was what is called a megalomaniac, and that being the case, although it might not be such a degree of insanity as to justify a jury in finding him not guilty, it was such a degree of insanity as to throw upon the Government the duty to mitigate the penalty to which he would be subjected by the sentence. It is said that Riel exhibited control of his reason in the steps he took to bring about a rebellion; that he adopted appropriate plans to produce certain results; that his memory was retentive; that he was vindictive; that he was what is popularly called a "crank," but not an insane man. These observations only go to show how erroneous are the notions that are generally received with regard to insanity, especially with regard to partial insanity. Doctor Ray, an alienist of great ability, and with great opportunities of observation, says :

"The common reluctance to attribute insanity to such persons, arises principally from the fact that they act from a rational motive, from that prolific parent of crime—revenge. That this should be considered incompatible with insanity only indicates how imperfect are the prevalent notions with respect to this disease. It needs but little observation of the insane to see that they often act from rational motives. Strike an insane man, and he will be very likely to strike back. Promise him a reward for good behavior, and he will probably endeavor to earn it. Put him upon his honor, and he will be likely to keep his word. Do him a grievous wrong, and he will remember it and retaliate at some distant day. And when a man has been made insane, ostensibly by insult and abuse, the disease is not calculated to soften his feelings towards the offender, unless it crushes them altogether, or to deter him from inflicting punishment. It may be disproportionate and cruel, and therein consists the manifestation of disease. Insanity may lead a man to regard his friends as no better than his enemies; but it seldom leads him to consider his enemies as friends, and treat them accordingly."

We have but to apply these observations to Riel's conduct to Captain Boulton, to Mr. Scott and to Mr. McKay, and we shall see in it the exhibition of revenge, cruelty and caprice, such as is here described as a manifestation of cerebral disease. It is said that Riel planned a rebellion, and that in carrying out his plan he exhibited a great deal of acuteness and ability; but this is not extraordinary, insane men frequently do so. I need but refer to the well known case of George III. There are many incidents in his life, during the periods of his insanity, totally irreconcilable with popular notions. I will just call the attention of the House to a passage from the life of Lord Eldon, with reference to an interview he had on one important occasion with the king, during the period of his mental aberration. He says :

"On applying to the king to obtain his sign manual to several Bills, he began to read an abstract of the Bills with more of detail than usual, when the King said, 'My Lord, you are cautious.' Eldon begged it might be so under existing circumstances. 'Oh,' said the king, 'you are certainly right in that; but you should be correct as well as cautious.' Eldon replied that he was not conscious that he was incorrect. 'No,' said he, 'you are not; for if you will look into the commission you have brought me to sign you will see that I there state that I have fully considered the Bills proposed to receive my sign manual; to be correct, therefore, I should have the Bills to peruse and consider.' I stated to him that he had never had the Bills whilst I had been Chancellor, and that I did not know that he had ever had the Bills. He said that 'during part of his reign he had always had them, until Lord Thurlow had ceased to bring them;' and the expression His Majesty used was 'Lord Thurlow said it was nonsense his giving himself the trouble to read them.'"

This is a conversation represented as taking place between the Lord Chancellor and the king during the period that the king was insane. Then, further, we are told that at this time the king professed to be carrying on conversations with men who had been dead for a long period of years, and, when questioned, he insisted that he could carry on such conversations. Lord Eldon says :

"It was agreed on one occasion that if this malady exhibited itself during Council, Sir Henry Hallford should endeavor to recall him from his aberrations. The king began addressing two persons, whom he favored in early life, long dead. Sir Henry observed that His Majesty had forgotten they had both died many years ago. True, said the king, dead to you and the world, but not to me. You forget that I have the power of holding intercourse with those whom you call dead. It is vain for you, so far as I am concerned, to kill your patients."

So we find that the king, although he was so far insane as to believe that he was carrying on conversations with persons who had been dead for many years, was capable, when spoken to rationally, of carrying on a rational conversation. We find, also, a story told of him by Francis Horner, during the period of his insanity. At a concert, the king made the selection of the music :

"This consisted of all the finest passages to be found in Handel, descriptive of madness and blindness, particularly those in the Opera of Samson; there was one also upon Madness from Love, and the lamentation of Jephtha upon the loss of his daughter, and it closed with God save the King, to make sure the application of all that went before."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hallucinations exhibited by Riel in his diary, are sufficient to show the unsound mental state of this man. Let me read for the information of the House a few extracts from that diary :

"The spirit of God shows me a measure of merchandise. On the bottom of the measure are written the following words:—'The bowels of the North.' Oh, my God, grant me for the love of Jesus, of Mary, of Joseph, and of St. John the Baptist, the grace to conquer the North, and to be master of all its possessions; give me the bowels of the North."

Another extract from his diary says :

"I have seen a flock of dark colored geese. They appeared to be flying, but in reality were motionless in the sky. I saw them disperse as into two groups. The leader in front, which, with the others appeared to be flying towards the west, turned suddenly towards the left and took an easterly direction. Those geese which turned in the light did not reflect anything luminous. They were covered with darkness. Oh, warriors who fight for bad principles you are like black geese. God will stop you in your flight. In spite of all, you will be obliged to turn and retrace your course. Hear, listen and obey, and you will come out of the misfortunes, the reverses, and the dishonors which threaten to overwhelm you."

Again :

"The spirit of God has showed me the place where I shall be wounded in the highest joint of the ring finger. He pointed out to me which joint it was on his own finger. The Spirit said to me: 'I think that you will be wounded.'"

Then again, Sir:—

"While I was praying, the Spirit of God showed me, on the south branch of the Saskatchewan, a small vessel in which there were two or three men, one of whom had a red tongue. They went down the river, keeping the left bank. At the same time, or a little after, it appeared to me that the cable at the crossing was broken in two. It appeared also to me that the police were arriving from Troy."

And so I might read a number of other passages, equally indicative of the absence of the rational faculties. He says again :

"I have seen the giant. He comes. He is hideous. He is Goliath. He has not got to the place he meant to occupy. I see him. He loses his own body and all his people. There is left to him nothing but the head. He is not willing to humble himself. He has his head cut off."

An hon. MEMBER. That is your fool.

Mr. MILLS. No; it is the fool that the hon. gentleman insists the Government did right in hanging. Now, Sir, the law with regard to this class of cases is very simple. The difficulty does not arise with reference to the want of certainty as to the law, but it arises from obscurity as to the facts. Let me refer to a few cases for the purpose of showing precisely what the law is as administered by the court, and how far that law is modified by the action of the Home Secretary, because in the class of criminal cases that are punished capitally we cannot learn the law precisely from courts of justice. Courts of justice give that law as it should be applied in extreme cases, in cases of capital punishment, but we look to the action of the Home Department for the purpose of seeing how far that law is modified by executive authority. Now, I will read from the charge of Mr. Justice Leblanc to the jury in the case of Burrows. He was tried for the act of shooting a man, and Mr. Warburton, the keeper of a lunatic asylum, was examined and gave it as his opinion that the prisoner was insane. The judge, in charging the jury, said :

"It is for you to determine whether the prisoner when he committed the offence with which he stands charged was or was not capable of distinguishing right from wrong, or whether he was under the influence of any delusion with respect to the prosecutor which rendered his mind at the moment insensible of the nature of the act he was about to commit, since in that case he would not be legally responsible for his conduct. On the other hand, provided you should be of opinion that when he committed the offence he was capable of distinguishing right from wrong and was not under the influence of such a delusion as disabled him from distinguishing that he was doing a wrong act, in that case he is answerable to the justice of his country, and is guilty in the eye of the law."

A similar charge was made to the jury in the case of Bellingham by Chief Justice Mansfield. But there is an earlier case—that of Hatfield, who shot at the king in 1800. In that case Mr. Erskine defended the prisoner, and he laid down the law in these words :

"When a man is laboring under a delusion, if you are satisfied that the delusion existed at the time of the committal of the offence—that the act was done under its influence, then he cannot be considered as guilty of any crime."

This trial took place at Bar, in the Court of King's Bench. All the judges of that court were in attendance. Lord Kenyon, before the defence was closed, said :

"Mr. Attorney-General, can you call any witnesses to contradict these facts with regard to the law, as it is laid down there can be no doubt upon earth; to be sure, if a man is in a deranged state of mind at the time he is not criminally answerable for his acts; but the material part of this case is whether at the very time when the act was committed the man's mind was sane."

Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst in discussing this subject in the House of Lords said :

"Lord Kenyon, and through him, all the other judges of the Court of King's Bench were of opinion that the law as laid down by Mr. Erskine was correct, and that if the man who committed a crime was insane at the time he committed it, that is to say, was laboring under such disease of the mind as not to know whether he was doing right or wrong, in that case he was not a subject for a criminal prosecution. No departure has been made from the rule of law thus laid down at the three trials. The rule of law so laid down by them was not laid down when those learned judges were sitting alone, but when they were sitting in connection with the other judges of their respective courts, whose opinions, of course, must be taken as having corresponded with theirs."

In Oxford's case Lord Chief Justice Denman laid down the law in precisely the same terms. He consulted Justices Patteson and Alderson who were sitting with him and they concurred with him in a written note as to what was the law upon the subject, and the note so agreed upon was read by the chief justice to the jury. Lord Lyndhurst further says :

"I take it that the law is distinctly settled upon the subject. If it be so the next question for your Lordships' consideration is whether there is any reason to alter, or I should say any possibility of altering the law. Can your Lordship say that, if a man, when he commits a crime, is under the influence of a delusion, and insanity, so as not to know right from wrong, so as not to know what he is doing—is it possible that your lordships can by any legislative provision say, that such a man shall be responsible for his act, and liable to lose his life for the wrong he has unknowingly committed? It is impossible. Your Lordships might pass such a law; you have the power to do so; but when you come for the first time to put it into execution, the sense of all, the feeling of all reasonable men would revolt against it, and your Lordships would be obliged to retrace your steps and to repeal the law which you had passed in a moment of excited feeling, in consequence of recent painful impressions, but which you could not have passed under the influence of sober and steady reason."

The hon. gentleman said that the law as laid down in MacNaghton's case, modified the law as it was interpreted by the courts, but that it was more strictly applied, and that the rule as mentioned by Mr. Erskine in Hatfield's case, and by Lord Chief Justice Denman, in that of Oxford, was repudiated. It is very difficult to say from the mere examination of an abstract opinion what the law precisely is, but if we look at the construction put upon the law after the opinions expressed by the judges in MacNaghton's case, I think we will find that it is exactly the same as before, that the opinions then delivered did not modify the law, and did not alter it, that the law as there expressed remains unchanged, and that where a person is insane and the insanity causes the act with which he is charged, though that insanity is not persistent and only partial, in such case the party is not held responsible. In the case of the Queen vs. Law, a married woman killed her husband after an apparent recovery from a disease which tended to produce insane delusions of the senses, and which, according to her own account existed at the time of the homicide. Mr. Justice Erie said these facts were evidence from which a jury might properly find she was not in such a state of mind at the time as to know the nature of or to be accountable for the act. The difficulty which the judges felt in laying down rules of law in cases of partial insanity arises from the nature of the disease, and the views of many scientists upon the subject. Lord Campbell observed, in the discussion by the law lords, that some doctors earnestly maintained that there was no one altogether sane, and if every one partially insane was to be exempt from responsibility, they might find themselves establishing a rule which would grant immunity to the most atrocious criminals. Lord Hale in his Pleas of the Crown says :

"Partial insanity is no excuse; this is the condition of very many, especially melancholy persons, who, for the most part, discover their defect in excessive fears and griefs, and yet, are not wholly destitute of the use of reason; and this partial insanity seems not to excuse them in the committing of any offence, for it is a matter capital."

Stopping at this point, let me ask who are embraced in this definition? Lord C. J. Kenyon was all his life haunted by the dread of poverty. The same is true of Lord Stowell. Lord Erskine refused to sit down as one of thirteen at table. They all fall within this definition of partial insanity. I had a farm laborer once seized with a severe attack of colic, he declared that another of the men had put a spell upon him. He wrote a prayer and put it in his boot to dissipate the malign influence of the other man, and he threatened the other for the wrong done him. He falls within Lord Hales definition of partial insanity. But Lord Hale goes on to say :

"It is very difficult to determine the indivisible line that divides perfect and imperfect insanity; but it must rest upon circumstances duly to be weighed and considered both by judge and jury lest upon the one side there be a kind of inhumanity towards the defects of human nature, or on the other side too great an indulgence given to great crimes."

The House will see that difficulty arises in consequence of the obscurity of the facts—on account of the difficulty of classifying and defining them. You might as well try to mark the line which separates day from night as to draw the line which separates sanity from insanity. There is a broad field in which the light of reason and the darkness of insanity combine. They are strangely and mysteriously mingled. When a partially insane man commits a crime for which he is put upon his trial, the court and the jury have often a most difficult task to perform. It is not easy for them to draw the line by which responsibility is to be measured. Lord Lyndhurst in the trial of Offord told the jury that they might acquit the prisoner on the ground of insanity if he did not know when he committed the act, what the effect of it was with reference to the crime of murder. The examination of this case shows that the point Lord Lyndhurst decided was that a man who, under an insane delusion, shoots another is not responsible when the shooting is the product of the delusion. This principle is practically recognised in the acquittal of Offord. The parties who, according to the decision of the courts and the Home Officer are exempt from responsibility, are those who are generally insane; those who are partially insane, and act under an insane delusion, so that the crime emanates from the delusion; and those, too, who act from some irresistible impulse arising from insanity although they may know the act is forbidden by the law of the land; as to this last proposition, however, there may be some doubt. This is the law as laid down by the courts in the cases which I have mentioned. There are a large class of cases in which insanity does not wholly relieve from responsibility. As long as an insane person may be influenced by the fear of punishment society may, as a measure of self-protection, subject the partially insane to punishment. The rule to be inferred from the cases and from the practice of the home office is this: Where the prisoner's reasoning powers are so depraved as to make the commission of the particular offence the necessary and natural consequence of the delusion the party he is relieved from responsibility, but where the act lies outside of the delusion and its relation to the insanity cannot be clearly traced, the responsibility continues though it is diminished by the mental unsoundness of the offender. Lord Brougham mentions the fact that when defending Martin, a lunatic, for setting fire to York minster, he learned of a conversation that took place in a neighboring asylum. There was a general discussion on the case in the lunatic asylum, and the lunatics came generally to the conclusion that a man in such a condition could not be held responsible. There is, no doubt, a certain sense of responsibility, and in many cases lunatics can be controlled by fear. There are such institutions as Government lunatic asylums, and it is evident that lunatics are not wholly beyond the control and influence of the law. But you do not apply to the man whose reason is affected the same degree of responsibility you do to one who is in full possession of all his faculties. That is the precise point in this case. I am not arguing that this man ought to have been acquitted. I say that, in all probability, I would not have agreed with the jury and would have been disposed to find that the act grew so far out of the insane delusions that the prisoner ought to be acquitted. The whole evidence showed there was an insane element in the man's mind. Assuming that conviction was right, that the jury found the proper verdict, I contend that he was not a proper party against whom to apply the extreme penalty of the law as in the case of a man without any such delusions or insane impressions. That is a well-recognised rule which has been laid down and followed in English cases. Now, we admit that the law should exercise this control over such parties that the interests of society require that there should be restraint, but we deny altogether that this gives to the Government the right to enforce the extreme penalty of the law against a person in such a mental condition. I quote a passage from Wharton's work :

"It has already been abundantly shown that there are conditions of mind in which actual insanity cannot be said to have set in but in which there are insane predispositions tending to either undue mental exaltation or undue mental depression. A psychical condition, inherited, it may be, or the result of some physical cause, makes the patient incapable when excited of due deliberation renders it difficult for him to cool, or disturbs his mind when it comes to act on the question of intent. Such a man, for instance, in an excitement which this psychical state makes far more intense and protracted than it would be among persons of ordinary mental health, kills another. Is he to be acquitted? Certainly not; for he cannot, on any sound principles, psychological or legal, be declared insane. Is he to be convicted of murder in the first degree, and hung? This, were the defendant a person of healthy and normal temperament, would be perhaps the natural sequence of the trial, should it appear that the homicide was deliberately executed. But, suppose the case of a man who, from insane predisposition, instead of cooling down after the first flush of hot blood, falls into a state of morbid excitement, continuing and perhaps growing for weeks. Is such a man to be judged, as to a homicide committed during such excitement, by the same rules as apply to a person whose passions have had time to subside? In other words, are cooling time, and intent and premeditation, to be gauged by the capacity of the ideal rational man, or that of a person under trial? That the latter view should be taken—that we should determine these questions according to the capacity the defendant himself, has been already been incidentally argued and may be confirmed by many analogies of penal jurisprudence. In this way do we judge those conceptions of danger which justify a party in resorting to violent means of self defence, &c."

Now, we recognise that rule in ordinary cases. A man who has received great provocation, and who in a towering passion strikes another or takes his life, is not judged guilty morally in the same degree as the man who lies in wait for another and with malice aforethought takes his life. The law mitigates the punishment. We do not always in our Acts of Parliament, classify offences and guard against extreme penalties that the law awards, and make these distinctions which are well settled and recognised, but in the administration of the law the Executive Government does modify and apply the law as it is intended it should be applied in such cases. Now, the very same reason which makes a distinction such as I have described, makes a distinction between the man who is in full possession of his faculties and the man who is partially insane. The question is, was Riel in the full possession of his faculties, or partially insane. Let us look at the evidence, look at the fact that he believed he was inspired; look at his diary, his communication with the parties, the acts which he did, the testimony of the experts and of the clergymen who had every opportunity of judging his mental condition, and it is impossible to come to the conclusion that he was in full possession of his faculties. Are you then going to apply to him a rule of law which can only justly be applied to the man whose mind is healthy and vigorous and not subject to the morbid illusions and the hallucinations which were manifested in his case? This rule has been well settled in England by the practice in the Home Office. We do not look simply at the decisions of the courts. We look to see what the Secretary of State for the Home Department does in giving effect to the decisions of the courts. The exercise of the power of pardon whether exercised to its fullest extent or only partially, is exercised according to certain judicial principles which have become part of the settled administration of justice, and they should be applied in every case. There is no reason for applying one rule to one criminal and a wholly different rule to another criminal under exactly the same circumstances. Let me refer to the case of Christina Edmunds, who was tried in 1872 before Baron Martin, for the murder of a little boy named Barker. The uncle of the boy had bought some chocolate drops from a confectioner named Maynard, which the boy ate and died a few hours afterward. Upon a post mortem strychnine enough was found in the boy's stomach to have killed an adult. It appeared that the prisoner had bought from a chemist on various pleas, and once under a false name, a considerable quantity of strychnine. She sent a boy whom she met in the streets to buy chocolate drops at Maynard's, she said they were too large, and returned them. The court held that she introduced into the shop the poisoned sweets by which young Barker was killed. It appeared that she had frequently sent boys to other shops for candies, that the children who had eaten them had been taken sick, that the symptoms were like those produced by strychnine. It appeared that she had fallen violently in love with Dr. Beard; that she had given Mrs. Beard chocolate creams which caused sickness; that to divert attention from herself, she sought to fasten suspicion on Maynard, by introducing poisoned candies into his shop. The plea of insanity was advanced, it was proven on the trial that her father died a maniac in an asylum; that her brother was an epileptic idiot; that her sister labored under hysteria and attempted to commit suicide; that her mother's father died an imbecile from paralysis at forty-three; that she herself had many years before suffered from hysteria and paralysis. Dr. Maudsley gave as his opinion that she was quite incapable of judging between right and wrong in the same sense that other people would. Dr. Robertson said that her intellect seemed clear from any delusion, but that her moral sense was deficient, as in the descendants of insane persons. Baron Martin said that if the defendant was under a delusion which made the poisoning seem right to her, she was entitled to acquittal on the ground of insanity; if not, she should be convicted. She poisoned, it is said, when she could do so with impunity. She controlled herself when she could not. The experts examined admitted that they had not a sufficient opportunity to judge of her case, and Baron Martin united with the jury in recommending the reconsideration of the question by the Home Secretary. The London Lancet said that her crime had a motive, that her conduct was directed with infernal cunning towards her end, but that is not in the least inconsistent with the worst forms of madness. The Lancet continues:

"We do not hesitate to say that had Christina Edmunds been hanged, a judicial murder would have been committed."

Sir William Gull and Dr. Orange were appointed to examine into her case. They reported her insane, and her sentence was commuted to imprisonment at Broadmoor Asylum as a criminal lunatic. Another case that I may mention is that of Townley. He was tried before Baron Martin in 1868. Townley was engaged to a young lady. Both were respectable. Twice the engagement was broken off. She became engaged to another. He solicited an interview, at the close of which he killed her with a pen-knife. He gave notice of what he had done, assisted in rendering the necessary attentions, and made no effort to escape. It was shown that he was of an amiable disposition, though excitable and peculiar; that many of his relatives were insane. His own account of the transaction was that he had endeavored to obtain from her the name of his rival; that she refused to give it; that he kept down his feelings as well as he could, and that he did not remember anything at the last. He admitted the act was murder, and that he would be hanged, but he maintained he was happier for having done it. He said she had deceived him, and that the woman who deceives him must die—that having been engaged to him, she was his property. His statements seemed free from delusion, but his expressions were full of that peculiar extravagance of sentiment that is sometimes marked in the insane. He seemed quite insensible as to moral distinctions. Sir George Grey was Home Secretary, and Baron Martin solicited his attention to the case. Three members of the Board of Lunacy were appointed to examine him, and they reported that his notions were extravagant; that his moral sense was perverted, and that the hereditary taint of insanity proved at the trial, induced them to hold that he could not be considered of sound mind. He was sent to Bethlehem Hospital. A protest signed by forty magistrates, was sent to the Secretary of State, who immediately appointed another commission consisting of four physicians, two of whom were superintendents of hospitals for the insane, and the other two had previously been physicians to chancery lunatics. They reported him to be of sound mind, and upon this report he was taken from the hospital, and sentenced to penal servitude for life in Australia. Townley decided the question himself; he destroyed his own life by leaping from one of the galleries of the prison to the floor below. I may refer to an American case, the case of John Bilman, who had been sent to the Eastern Penitentiary at Pennsylvania for horse-stealing, who murdered his keeper under circumstances of very great brutality, and who was so cunning as to avert all suspicion as to his intention and almost to conceal his flight. He hung a noose on the outside of a small window in the door of the cell. He induced his keeper to look in at something on the floor close to the door; to do this the keeper had to put his head entirely through, the noose was then drawn and but for an accident, he would have been suffocated by Bilman. A few days after he inveigled the keeper into his cell under the pretence that he was sick, and then killed him by striking him on the head with a piece of wash-board. He undressed the keeper and put on his clothes, put the keeper in his bed, traversed the corridor with an unconcerned air, addressed the gatekeeper carelessly, and sauntered out into the street. He was soon caught, but his insanity was so indisputable that the prosecuting authorities after a careful and skilful examination, concurred in an acquittal on the ground of insanity. He was returned to confinement, and afterwards in a communicative mood admitted that he had several years before, murdered his own father, under circumstances which he detailed with great minuteness. Inquiries were instituted, and it was found that he had told the truth. The father had been found strangled in his bed. The son had been arrested, but he had fled for many miles on horseback, and climbed into a chamber window, so that he succeeded in proving an alibi. He had a keen sense of guilt, a keen appreciation of the consequence of exposure, and took all the necessary steps to avoid conviction that could have been taken by one in full possession of his senses. It is a well settled rule in law that predisposition to insanity—much more where there is actual insanity—lowers the grade of guilt, although it may not entirely relieve from responsibility it does mitigate the enormity of the offence. I may mention one case that may not be without interest in this discussion. Three years ago one Rowlands was tried in the county of Kent, and sentenced to death for the murder of his wife. He had, I believe, threatened her life. One day he seized his gun and shot her. He had usually been peaceable. He was sober, industrious, and apart from this act, bore a good character. He talked rationally. Attended to his business properly. I am not aware whether the plea of insanity was raised upon his trial or not; my impression is that it was. He was, however, found guilty, and sentenced to be executed. The Rev. Mr. Williams interceded on his behalf; but I am informed without success. The member for Kent was pressed to use his influence with the Government. He did so, and was successful in securing the commutation of the sentence into imprisonment for life. The impression prevailed that Rowlands was insane; but this impression was due, so far as the public were concerned, on account of the man's good character. I don't know that the Government issued a commission. I don't know whether any experts were directed to visit the prisoner and report. I don't know upon what ground the order for commutation was based, or whether there was anything beyond this mere recommendation to mercy, but I know no rule that could be applied to that case that would not apply to this. The hon. member for Provencher, the old friend and associate of Louis Riel, has, during this discussion, pronounced an eulogy upon some other members of the Riel family. Why I do not very well know. It may be that he thinks it will be some satisfaction to them, while he quite approves of the execution of his old friend. Whatever else he may find fault with, he heartily approves of this. Like Tom Moore's Public Man, he is resolved not to allow himself to be influenced by the memory of old friendship. Mr. Moore's Statesman says:

"I am proud to declare I have no predilections.
My heart is a sieve where some scattered affections
Are just danced about for a moment or two,
And the finer they are, the more sure to go through"

It may be well not to allow private friendships to weigh against the interests of the State. Mr. Tims, in his Anecdotes of the Bench and Bar of Scotland, tells the story of a Scotch judge who played chess all night with a man whom he, the next day, sentenced to death, with the observation: Well, friend Peter, I have checkmated you this time. I am sure, however, that many of those who listened to the speech of the hon. member for Provencher on both sides of the House, would have preferred that it had not been made. There are many in this House who think Riel was in the full possession of his faculties and was fully responsible for his actions, and they may very properly come to the defence of the Government; but is the hon. member for Provencher one of these? Does he say that Riel was not insane? Does he think him the base mercenary man that he has been depicted? Perhaps the hon. member may be of opinion that the gallows of Regina has its advantages. Charles Dickens once observed to a friend "that there was no position in life, however disagreeable, that is without its compensating advantages." "What advantage," asked his friend, "had the gallows at the old Bailey to the two men who were hanged there yesterday?" "Let me," said Dickens, "relate to you an incident of what there happened. The prisoners were standing on the platform. The execution was about to take place when a great commotion was observed in the vast crowd of spectators. An enraged bullock had broken away from some butchers' boys, and madly rushed in among the people, when one of the culprits exclaimed to the other: 'I say Jack what lucky dogs we are not to be in that crowd.'" If the ghost of Riel could re-visit the glimpses of the moon it might fittingly say to the hon. member: "If it had been an enemy that reproached me then I could have borne it, but it is through my companion, my protégé and friend." The Ministry have a power much broader than pertains to any court. It can consider and make allowance for all those acts and circumstances, which, in the judgment of mankind, excuse acts which the bald propositions of law condemn. Ministers have admitted of no mitigating circumstances arising from negligence, delay or abuse of authority. Lunacy ought to have had some weight. It is the law that it should have weight. It did not. In voting for the motion I am voting to uphold the law and to affirm as applicable to this case, the same rule that governs in others of a like character.

Mr. ORTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I move the adjournment of the House, but before doing so, I would ask hon. gentlemen on the other side whether we can come to some understanding about closing this debate to-morrow or the next day?

Mr. BLAKE. As far as I am concerned, I would be glad to see it closed the next day and still more glad to-morrow. In the peculiar position in which the debate stands, I cannot make any promise, but will do anything in my power to facilitate the early closing of the debate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is only fair on both sides that we should know about the time when the debate will close, so that our friends may be in their places. By what has been told me on both sides, we must expect a few more speeches, and perhaps hon. gentleman will be satisfied if we come to an agreement to close the debate Wednesday night.

Mr. BLAKE. You think it impossible to get through to-morrow.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not think we can, but we might finish up on Wednesday night.

Mr. HESSON. I would suggest that as the debate will in all probability close on Wednesday night, and Thursday being a holiday, we should adjourn on Wednesday night until the following Monday. It seems unfortunate to keep so many members here when we might adjourn over from Wednesday until Monday. If the debate was closed on Wednesday night or Thursday morning, members might go home and come back on Monday.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to give an opinion on the part of the Government this evening, but perhaps to-morrow, when the House meets, we may be able to take the sense of the House on the subject.

Mr. BLAKE. I think, if there is any notion of that kind, it should be communicated not later than 3 o'clock to-morrow so that members might be notified. The question is what attendance we would be likely to have on the single Friday, and what business we would have before us. I do not know whether Notices would come up on that day.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is a Government day.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12:45 a.m. (Tuesday).

PRIVILEGE—EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. CURRAN. Mr. Speaker: As a question of privilege, I beg to be allowed to draw the attention of this honorable House to an item in the Evening Journal of yesterday, the 22nd instant, to the following effect:—

"It appears," says the Ottawa correspondent of the Globe, "that Mgr. Taché wrote to Mr. Curran, M.P., regarding the accusations brought against him in the House by the latter. The words alleged to have been made use of were to the effect that the Archbishop had written things that he would not dare utter under oath. His Grace, so the story goes, exacted a retraction from the member for Montreal Centre."

My reference to His Grace the Archbishop is thus reported in Hansard, which must have been easy of access to the Globe correspondent. Speaking of Riel's insanity I said:

"Now the next question comes—was he insane? And, in reading an interview with the leading counsel for the defence from the Province of Quebec, we have found it stated here that His Grace Archbishop Taché refused to go and give evidence on that occasion. Well, it is not for one in my humble position to speak of one so exalted as His Grace, but I will say that throughout this country, wherever his name is known, it is revered and respected, and that not only for his qualities of intellect but for his nobleness and generosity of heart. He is as widely known as any man in Canada, and when we know that fact, when we know the interest he took in this unfortunate man, when we know that unfortunate man owed everything to him, is it to be supposed that His Grace would not have gone to Regina, or even to the furthest extremity of the earth, if he could have given the testimony that this man did not know right from wrong, that he was insane, that he knew him to be so? We all know that His Grace would have gone, not only to Regina, but to the furthest extremity of the earth, to give evidence for his bitterest enemy if that evidence could have been of any benefit to him."

Sir, I brought no accusation at all. I did not say what the Globe correspondent says it is alleged I did, and the allegation about a retraction is, therefore, without foundation. I was discussing the insanity phase of the question under consideration. The name of the Archbishop had been mentioned by a former speaker in connection with the refusal of His Grace to go to the trial at Regina. The thought never entered my mind, much less did I say, as is falsely alleged, "that the Archbishop had written things that he would not dare to utter under oath." My idea of the law of insanity was, and is, that even if His Grace had gone to Regina and stated on oath there exactly what he subsequently published in his admirable letter on the late troubles in the North-West, it could not have benefited Riel in law; that is what I meant to convey in the paragraph quoted and that His Grace had not gone to give evidence which he considered could not avail. I was mistaken in that respect. His Grace informed me that I had attributed to him the wrong motive for his refusal to go to Regina. I requested the honor of an interview with the Archbishop in the Library of Parliament, and having explained my meaning he very kindly declared himself perfectly satisfied. I proposed then and there to make a statement at the opening of this House on the afternoon of Tuesday last. His Grace thought it better that I should not do so, saying that he desired to keep his name out of the discussion and the newspapers on the question. Subsequently I received from His Grace the following letter:—

"MONTREAL, 17th March.

"DEAR MR. CURRAN,—I should regret very much that the incident of Monday last should cause you annoyance. No doubt it pained me when I heard the appreciation you made of my refusal to go to Regina, but after the explanations you have given me I am convinced you had no intention to say anything whatsoever that might be disagreeable to me. I have no hesitation in affirming that I am satisfied with your explanation, and I authorise you to say so to whom you please.

"I remain with consideration,

"Your very devoted servant,

"† ALEX., O.M.I., ARCH. DE ST BONIFACE.

"J. J. CURRAN, Esq., M.P."

I shall never forget this act of kindness and condescension on the part of His Grace, which is only another added to the many he has extended to me during the past thirty years. I solemnly declare that I would rather quit this Parliament instantly than utter a syllable that could be construed into the faintest reflection on the acts or motives of a prelate so distinguished by every virtue, so deservedly admired, esteemed and beloved.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say, in answer to the question which was put last evening, whether the intention of the Government was to move the adjournment of the House from to-morrow evening till Monday of next week, my answer to that question is, that, after considering the matter, the Government beg to state that they have no objection, should the vote on the question before the House be taken to-morrow night, to have an adjournment until Monday at three o'clock.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Landry (Montmagny): "That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution;" and the motion of Sir Hector Langevin: "That this question be now put."

Mr. ORTON. Mr. Speaker: It is not my intention to ask the attention of the House at any length on the present occasion. The question under discussion has been so thoroughly argued that I feel it would be useless to attempt to give my views at any length. The speech we had last night by the Minister of Justice so thoroughly disposed of the arguments advanced by the Opposition against the course pursued by the Government in carrying out the sentence passed on that unfortunate man Riel, that I feel there is little left for any member on this side of the House to say. The question of insanity has been thoroughly discussed. It had been my intention to have dealt at some length with the argument used in the early part of the debate by the Opposition, namely, that the mismanagement, the misrule of the present Government in the North-West was a reason, an excuse why the sentence of death should not have been passed on Louis Riel. But the leader of the Opposition has virtually disposed of that part of the argument by stating that it could not properly be brought either under the consideration of the jury or into the discussion before the House, and that hon. gentleman also intimated that this question would in a short time receive further attention from him, that he would ask the attention of the House to a further consideration of the question at a future period. Therefore, I shall not deal with that part of the question, but confine my remarks chiefly to a medical view of the question, as to whether Louis Riel was so insane as to render him irresponsible, and that his mental condition should have constituted a reason why the Government, instead of carrying out the death sentence, should have commuted his sentence either to imprisonment for life or confinement in a lunatic asylum. In discussing this question from a medical point of view, it will be necessary for me to give a sort of synopsis of what medical men usually consider to be insanity—what is conveyed by the term insanity from a medical standpoint. Insanity is a disease of the material substance of the brain or the nerve centres of the brain, producing a disordered mind. In other words, the medium through which the mind acts is out of gear, the machinery through which it thinks, calculates and forms conclusions and judgments is not in a healthy condition, and, therefore, those judgments and conclusions cannot be those of a sane man. Insanity, in short, is a disease of a material part of our nature, symptoms of which are often visible to the eye of a medical man, although not visible to those who have not received a medical education. The other symptoms which are commonly recognised as insanity are delusions, hallucinations and illusions. A delusion is a false perception of a fact, a false belief in a fact; an hallucination is a false perception of some one of the various senses, the sense of hearing, taste, smell or feeling, or any other of the senses. An illusion is a false perception with respect to sight, a false idea of what an individual may see. He may see, instead of a cloud passing by, a regiment of soldiers on the march, and it is a false conveyance of the sense of sight to the brain. There are other symptoms of marked insanity which are dwelt upon very strongly by some authorities. Dr. Abercrombie says that the loss of the faculty of attention is one of the strongest evidences of insanity. Dr. Moore says that the loss of the faculty of volition should be looked upon as one of the most important symptoms of insanity. Sir, it is very apparent that in a disease of such an organ as the brain insanity should vary in form and in degree. The sufferer from insanity may be totally insane—he may, in fact, be so insane as to come under that degree of insanity which was described by Lord Hale as the form of insanity, and the only form of insanity, which should excuse a criminal from punishment on the ground of insanity. In the trial of Arnold, an undoubted lunatic, Mr. Justice Tracy said: "It is not any kind of frantic humor, or something unaccountable in a man's actions, that points him out to be such a madman as is exempted from punishment; it must be a man that is totally deprived of his understanding and memory, and does not know what he is doing more than an infant or wild beast." That, Sir, is complete insanity; and so far as Louis Riel is concerned, we may dismiss from all consideration the question of his being totally insane, because it is evident to all who have read a report of the trial, to all who have read of his actions during the recent rebellion, that he could not be considered totally insane and, therefore, he can be only partially insane. The field of partial insanity is a very wide one. When we come to consider it we approach to that field which is described by some authorities as the border land between the sane and the insane, and by others as the twilight between the light of perfect sanity and the darkness of total insanity. When we come to the consideration of insanity under that head, we find that disputes have arisen between lawyers and doctors. The profession to which I have the honor to belong, take a wider view of what should be considered partial insanity than do the legal fraternity. But, Sir, there is not so wide a distinction when we consider that medical authorities, and even such an authority as Dr. Maudsley, who is one of the most liberal writers on the subject of insanity, believes it is right that certain forms of insanity should, in the interests of society, and for the protection of society, be punished more or less, and therefore the old question arises, at what stage should a criminal be punished for the protection of society, and at what stage should he not be punished because he is a criminal not perhaps altogether responsible for his actions? I shall endeavor, Sir, to examine Louis Riel as a medical man, and try in my way to lay before you the result of the observations I have made in reference to the trial of Louis Riel and what I have seen of him, and to give to the House what I consider is the only conclusion that can be arrived at. Sir, with regard to the different tests of insanity, we will come first to the fact that not one of the medical men who have examined Louis Riel have been able to see any symptoms of insanity either in his countenance, his actions, his movements, or in the physical condition of his body. But, Sir, when we come to delusions, we find that this is the only point at which there is evidence of insanity. Delusion is an undoubted evidence of insanity, but it is not always so considered. I will read what Dr. Maudsley states upon that subject:

"I do not forget that the lawyers have declared delusions to be the test of insanity but that is a doctrine which, in common with other physicians who know anything of insanity, I do not hesitate to pronounce erroneous. In the first place, there may be insanity without delusion, as I have already said; and in the second place, when delusion is present its value as a symptom of insanity may vary much. Some delusions appear to be little more than unfounded and extreme suspicions; jealousy on the part of husband or wife, religious apprehensions, the delusions that friends or children are unkind or actually conspiring to injure the individual, are certainly not by themselves proofs of insanity, although they may become weighty evidence when associated with other symptoms of disease which give them their true interpretation. The absence of delusion will not disprove, nor will the presence of delusion always prove insanity."

Now, I shall endeavor to show that though Louis Riel appeared to labor under delusions, there were no other symptoms of insanity accompanying those delusions, and that those delusions were of a character that an intelligent man might utilise for intelligent purposes. When we come to consider the delusions under which he is supposed to have suffered, what do we find? We find that they are chiefly delusions of a religious character. And under what circumstances do those delusions first become apparent? We well know that the first evidence we have of Louis Riel's delusions on the question of religion was after he came from the other side at the request of the Metis on the Saskatchewan, and after he had made it appear to the people of that neighborhood that he was a devout Catholic, an observer of all the rights of the Church, that he had come from the American side with the blessing of his priest, that he showed every sign of reverence and respect to the religion in which he had been reared, and that as long as he could secure the influence of his clergy, and utilise that influence, along with the impression that he could make on the half-breeds and to carry out his purposes, he had no insane delusions. It was not until after he had concluded in his own mind that he could take up arms to rebel against the authorities in this Dominion, that he became attacked with religious delusions. It was then, Sir, that he ignored the authority of his Church, that he professed to be a prophet and to have visions, and professed to be able to foretell what was about to occur day after day. But, Sir, those delusions were assumed for an intelligent purpose. he tried to impress on his followers that he had supernatural powers—that he was a great leader and a great prophet; and he knew well that if he could not have the assistance of his clergy to impress the minds of his followers, they would soon desert him, unless he substituted something for the authority of the clergy; therefore he set up to be a great prophet. He did that with an intelligent design, which is one strong reason why we should suspect his delusions to be assumed by him for a purpose. We must remember the character of the people with whom he was acting; we must remember that they are descended from the Indians, and that one of their characteristics is to believe in all sorts of supernatural agencies. We have all read of their medicine men, who act as prophets and performers of miracles; and this is one of the most powerful means which an able and intelligent man can use to impress the half-breeds and Indians of the North-West with a sense of his greatness as a leader and a prophet. We must recollect also that these people were induced to desert their allegiance to their clergy, and, with the Indian population, were attracted to Louis Riel, under circumstances which were certainly most marvellous, and which must force us to the conviction that they at any rate believed thoroughly in him as a prophet. He virtually succeeded in his design of inducing those people to become his faithful followers, by his assumption of religious delusions. I think, Sir, it would be much easier to believe that there are hon. members of this House who are subject to delusions, if we believed all, and we are bound to believe all, that we have heard during this discussion. Why, Sir, an hon. member of this House, not many evenings ago, got up here and made the statement that there was not enough evidence at the trial of Louis Riel to convict a dog. Now, Sir, he must have made that statement believing it to be true; he must have been laboring under a delusion; and if he did not state that for some other purpose—and we must believe he did not—we must believe he had an honorable intention; we must not believe that he made that statement in order to create a false impression on this House, but that he believed that actually to be the case. Now, after reading that evidence, and the judgment delivered, not only by Judge Richardson, but by the Judges of the Court of Appeal of Manitoba, how is it possible that a lawyer, thoroughly acquainted with the law, could make such a statement, if he really did believe it, as we must believe he did, and be a sane man? I maintain that we can show that Louis Riel had a design. We cannot show that the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) had a design, because it would not be a design such as would be parliamentary; and if we recollect the many statements the hon. gentleman has made, not only in this House, but outside in the country, after it has been demonstrated beyond the possibility of doubt that what he has stated for facts are not facts, we must believe that they were delusions on the part of the hon. gentleman, or he must take the other horn of the dilemma, that he makes those statements for a design and a purpose. I maintain that Louis Riel's delusions were assumed for a purpose and an object, and that he succeeded in that object gives the greater force to that argument; because we must assume that those who followed him and took up arms were all insane, or we must conclude that it was a very wise and sane movement on his part, and not at all the act of a madman or one who had lost the balance of his mind. Now, Sir, I will ask you to consider the testimony of the various medical men who attended the trial at Regina. Two medical men were called by the defence—Dr. Clark, of Toronto, and Dr. Roy, from Beauport Asylum. The evidence of Dr. Roy, it has been stated in this House, as well as by the Judges of the Court of Appeal in Manitoba, was such as was not calculated to impress either the jury or the judge with the belief that he was stating his views in an intelligent manner—at any rate, doubts were felt as to his desire to state all he even believed. Therefore, I do not think it necessary to refer much to what he stated, but I shall probably refer briefly to his claim that the prisoner labored under a form of megalomania. I wish to call the attention of this House particularly to Dr. Clark's evidence, because it appears to be very strongly in favor of the insanity of Louis Riel. The first important question put to him was this:

"Q. From what you heard from the witnesses here in court, and also from the examination which you have made of the accused, are you in a position to form any opinion as to the soundness or unsoundness of his mind?—A. Well, assuming the fact that the witnesses told the truth, I have to assume that . . . and assuming also that the prisoner at the bar was not a malingerer (that is English, I believe), then of course there is no other conclusion that any reasonable man could come to, from my standpoint, of course, that that man who held these views and did these things must certainly be of insane mind."

In the answer, Dr. Clark has assumed that a prisoner at the bar was not a malingerer,—that is, he was not a man who could designedly act untruthfully. The next question is:

"Do you consider, Doctor, that a person suffering from such unsoundness of mind as you say that this man is suffering from, is capable of knowing the nature of the acts which they do?—A. Why, the insane understand, many of them, the nature of the acts which they do, except in dementia cases, and melancholia, and cases of mania even, they often know what they do, and can tell me what they did, tell all about it afterwards. It is all nonsense to talk about a man not knowing what he is doing, simply because he is insane."

That is very strong evidence, but upon going further we come to some weak points:

"Q. Do you think that man was, in the circumstances detailed by the different witnesses, in a position to be able to say or to be able to judge of what he was doing, as either wrong or contrary to law?—A. Well, that is one of the legal metaphysical distinctions in regard to right and wrong, and it is a dangerous one, simply because it covers only part of the truth. I could convince any lawyer, if they will come to Toronto Asylum, in half an hour, that dozens in that institution know right and wrong, both in abstract and in concrete, and yet are undoubtedly insane. The distinction of right and wrong covers part of the truth. It covers the largest part of the truth, but the large minority of insane do know right from wrong; it is one of these metaphysical subtleties that practical men in asylums know to be false."

It is well known that the English law to-day is very clear upon that point, and that a prisoner, in order to escape on the plea of insanity, must be proved not to be able to distinguish between right and wrong. It is very true that in some cases an enlargement of that rule has been urged by the judge, and the juries have decided contrary to that definition. But all these cases have been those in which there was other very strong and conclusive evidence of insanity:

"Q. Was he in a position to be able to say at that time, and to act at that time, as an ordinary sane man would have done?—A. Assuming the evidence given by the witnesses, he did not act as a sane man would have done, for this reason, that no sane man would have imagined that he could come into the Saskatchewan, and that he could gather around him such a force as would enable him to become monarch of this country; that it could be divided up into seven divisions, giving each to a different nationality. He was not an ignorant man. He was not like an Indian, who never read a newspaper, and knew nothing of the country around him. He had travelled; he had been in Ottawa; he had been in the United States, and he knew all about the power of Britain and the Dominion. And for him to imagine that he could come here and raise a few half-breeds in the Saskatchewan and keep up a successful warfare, and divide the country into seven divisions, and with different nationalities, was certainly not a thing that a man with an ordinary understanding would ever think he could succeed in."

Well, in reference to this statement, Riel disposed of it in his conversation with Captain Young, which has been referred to before in this House, in which he said to Captain Young that he never had any idea of entering into a contest, that he was not so foolish as to imagine he could wage war against Canada and Great Britain, but he hoped by the first success to compel the Canadian Government to consider the situation or accede to his demands; and coupled with this we have the evidence that he told Father André he wanted $100,000 in money or $35,000 in cash, or if not that much, as much as he could get. I think Dr. Clark's evidence is entirely disposed of on that point, and that is one of the strongest pieces of evidence urged by medical experts in favor of his insanity. Let us turn to the evidence of other medical men, and what do we find? We find no hesitation on their part. Dr. Wallace, Superintendent of the Asylum of the Insane at Hamilton, was examined. He gave evidence as follows:—

"Q. What would you say, then, in view of the evidence and your examination; is he of sound mind or is he not?—A. I think he is of sound mind.

"Q. And know the nature and quality of any offence he would commit?—A. Very acutely."

On cross-examination afterwards Dr. Wallace somewhat modified his answer:

"Q. So that what you now say, Doctor, is purely and simply this, not that he is not insane, but that you have not been able to discover any symptoms of insanity?—A. That is what I say, I say that I have not discovered it. It would be presumption for me to say that he is not insane, from the opportunities I have had; but, at the same time, my opinion is pretty fairly fixed in my mind, that he is not insane."

Then we come to the evidence of Dr. Jukes:

"Q. How long have you known him?—A. I don't remember the exact date he was brought to Regina; but, I think, it must have been between the 20th and 24th May.

"Q. Since that time how often have you seen him?—A. I have seen him almost every day. There have been one or two, or, perhaps, three days that I have missed seeing him, owing to pressure of other business, other work at that time, but I have seen him uniformly every day.

"Q. Then you had an opportunity, I suppose, of observing his mental condition?—I would speak to him on every occasion in passing him, and he has generally acquainted me with what he conceived to be his wants and necessities. And I would examine into the condition of his physical and general health, and ascertain how his diet was agreeing with him and things of that kind such as come under my special duty. And occasionally he would speak to me on other matters, occasionally he would delay me and speak to me on other subjects.

"Q. Then, have you formed an opinion as to his mental state? I am speaking now of his insanity, sanity or insanity?—A. I have never seen anything during my intercourse with Mr. Riel, to leave an impression on my mind that he was insane.

"Q. I suppose you have had your attention directed to that part of his character, more or less; I mean to his mental condition, more or less?—A. No, I have never seen anything to make me question his mental condition, and therefore I have never led the conversation, under any circumstances, to draw out any possible insane notion."

Now, I wish to direct the attention of the House to the importance of this evidence of Dr. Jukes, who was in daily communication with Riel from the time of his imprisonment at Regina, about the 24th May, I think, to the time of his execution. At the time of his trial and for many months afterwards he saw Louis Riel daily. Now, I venture to say as a medical man, that it is almost impossible for an acute medical observer such as Dr. Jukes to miss observing some symptoms of insanity during that length of time. I say it is almost an utter impossibility for an insane man to conceal for such a length of time his insanity—four months, I think, or very nearly, we see Dr. Jukes reiterating his opinion after the trial and after the prisoner was sentenced. I think too much importance cannot be attached to his evidence, because it shows that the prisoner was at every time in thorough possession of his intellect, that he had never at any time given the slightest evidence to Dr. Jukes that he was of unsound mind, and therefore the conclusion is, at any rate the tendency to that conclusion is very strong, that he was not of unsound mind. In addition to the evidence of this medical man, I myself had an opportunity of conversation for some twenty minutes with Louis Riel, and I expected to find at least that he was an undoubted crank; I expected to find, by his conversation with me, that he would demonstrate that he had some weak point in his mind, and that if not insane would show he was a crank, but to my surprise I found he was acutely intelligent, as described by Dr. Wallace; I found him a man of wonderful self-possession, of wonderful intellect, capable of discussing any question you brought up before him in an able and intelligent manner, and I came to the conclusion, from what I saw of Louis Riel during that twenty minutes, that, instead of being an insane man, he was a man of remarkable ability and strength of will; so I am constrained, after reading the evidence of the various medical men, after reading the whole of the evidence given at the trial, to give it as my opinion as a medical man—not an expert in the disease of insanity, but one who has had a practice of twenty-five years, during which I have had to examine a great many insane people—that Louis Riel was not insane, but was a man possessed of great ability, capable of carrying out large schemes, and capable of designing and successfully carrying out big undertakings under anything like favorable circumstances. There is one other point to which I wish to refer in order to show that the action, the conduct of Louis Riel is easily explained, and that what appears to be insane delusions are nothing but part and parcel of his hereditary inclinations. It is true that the insane tendency may to some extent be hereditary; it is said by some, indeed, that there is a destiny made for every man more or less, by his ancestors. On this point Mr. Chesterton says:

"The sad realities which I have contemplated compel me to aver that nine-tenths of habitual deprecators have no desire to forsake their guilty course. They love the vices in which they have revelled. 'Lord! how I do love thieving! If I had thousands, I would still be a thief,' exclaimed a youthful thief."

It is said by many pathological observers that the convolutions of the brain run into one another, and other remarkable pathological conditions exist in the brains of noted criminals. Dr. Osler, formerly of Montreal, made some very interesting observations relative to this point, upon the examination of the brains of criminals which he managed to obtain for dissection. But, Mr. Speaker, because thieving, murdering and other vices are the inclination of the physical natures of those who indulge in such wickedness, which makes the evil good and the good evil to them, are we, therefore, to abandon the punishment of those vices? Would it not be a perilous thing to society? Every murderer might with much force be proved insane, in the sense that he was impelled to the crime by the inclination of his nature and could not help it. But could society permit every murderer to go unpunished? Plato, Hippocrates, and other eminent philosophers and medical scientists, from their day to the present, have maintained that there was no vice but was the fruit of madness. Maudsley, who is the most liberal of all medical writers on insanity, who widens the field of insanity to a greater extent, perhaps, than almost any other medical jurist, says:

"If we are satisfied that our prison system is the best that can be devised for crime, we may rest satisfied that it is the best treatment for that sort of insanity from which criminals of that sort suffer."

It is not, Sir, in any spirit of angry retaliation that penal measures are enacted and judicial punishment inflicted, but for the protection of society; and I wish, after reading those views and a synopsis taken from high medical authorities on the subject, to ask what else could we expect from Louis Riel? When we remember that he is descended from the Indian race, we must conclude that all the peculiarities and weaknesses of the Indian race are, more or less, part and parcel of his constitution; but is that any reason why, when he commits a crime against society, he should not be punished? The object of punishment is to deter people from crime, and I would like to know what effect the allowing of Louis Riel to go unpunished would have had upon the Indian population? I wish also to point out another fact, that by hereditary predisposition Louis Riel was inclined to disregard all legalised authority. Why, Sir, we know for a fact that the father of Louis Riel, in 1849, headed the Metis in defying the authority of the Hudson Bay Company, and released a prisoner out of jail by force. We find that Louis Riel, by his very nature, was calculated to carry on the sort of struggle which he entered into, apparently with recklessness. Then we have to remember that the Metis population in the North-West had, for years and years, opposed the constituted authority. They had always a desire to roam on the prairies, and to be engaged in all sorts of enterprises of such a character as the Indian population indulged in. They were opposed to anything like civilisation, to anything like order; and in these circumstances we could not expect anything else but that Louis Riel, though he was an educated man, should, to a greater or less extent, have, in his very constitution, a tendency to that class of life which resulted in his rising in rebellion against the constituted authority of this Dominion. When we read his speech we find that his arguments are clear and logical, and he gives reasons that, to his mind, appear very strong that he had a right to fight against the authority of this Dominion. He referred in his speech, which I consider is a very able speech, to the fact of his having had a provisional government in 1870, that delegates waited from that government upon this Government, and that certain conditions had not been carried out. He claimed that the granting of 1,400,000 acres of land, one-seventh of all the land in the Province of Manitoba, was in fulfilment of an engagement on the part of the Government of Canada; that the half-breed population were entitled to one-seventh of the land, and that they also had a right to one-seventh of the land in the North-West Territories. He was not satisfied with the 240 acres of land for each half-breed man, woman and child, but he wanted a larger portion of the territory, and fought to gain it, but failing in that he expected to get a sum of money. Sir, it is true that he did not seriously expect to succeed, but he did seriously expect to succeed in obtaining a large sum of money; and as soon as a telegram was sent from the Department of the Interior to Father André, before the rebellion broke out, stating that the half-breed claims would be immediately settled—it was not until then that Louis Riel took up arms. And why did he take up arms? Was it from some sudden, unseen impulse? No, Mr. Speaker, but from the fact that he knew that a settlement would not enrich Louis Riel, and that he would not be able, in a very short time, to induce the half-breeds to follow him, and that he would fail in obtaining the sum of money for which he was struggling. Therefore, I say that his taking up arms, and his assumption of insanity, were all with a distinct design, with a distinct object. Fortunately he failed, but he deserves the punishment that has been meted out to him for his base conduct in connection with the rebellion. Sir, I shall refer for a few moments to the suffering which was entailed upon the half-breed population of that country, and to what came under my own observation in reference to the condition of the half-breeds on the Saskatchewan. There was no appearance of anything like distress among the half-breeds of the Saskatchewan. They all lived in comfortable homes, as good homes as the ordinary farmer in the Province of Quebec have, good-looking houses with gardens, and fences around them, having in many of their houses the evidence not only of the ordinary comforts, but luxury—sewing machines and other acquisitions of that kind—showing that the half-breeds had comfortable homes, and had nothing to complain of. There was nobody disturbing them in the possession of their lands; there was never an attempt to disturb a half-breed settler in that district from his lands. Sir, not only do I say that, but I have it from the mouths of half-breeds who were engaged in the rebellion, that they felt no grievance whatever on that ground. After the capture of Batoche, an old half-breed who was wounded came under my care. He died during the night, and on the day but one after that, when we were on the march to Prince Albert, his two sons and daughters came out from a thicket of poplars and drove down, first to see the general, and then they asked for the doctor. They had heard that their father was wounded and was in the hands of the surgeon of General Middleton's camp. They first enquired how he was. Unfortunately I had to tell them that the poor old man died that night. Then, Sir, those young men at once broke into tears and exclaimed: "That wicked man, Louis Riel, brought us to this. He has killed our poor father. We would never have taken up arms had it not been for his false teachings and his false advice—his treacherous advice." They were bitter in their expressions of animosity towards Louis Riel and his base conduct. And, Sir, on several other occasions I had a little conversation with the half-breeds, and when I asked the question: "Had you really any grievances, any reason to take up arms against the Government?" they said: "None whatever that we are aware of, nothing of any importance." "Did ever anybody attempt to put you off your land?" "No, nobody ever attempted to disturb us in the possession of our land. We never had any reason to complain of that, but we were induced by the cunningly-devised arguments of Louis Riel to take up arms because we thought we could get something better." There is also any amount of evidence to show that a large number of half-breeds up there were not half-breeds that were entitled, under the Manitoba Act, passed in 1879, to receive the 240 acres. One of the wounded men was named Jobin, and was also under my care, and was sent down to Saskatoon. I noticed in a letter written by C. T. Hubbell, the hospital attendant of the 90th Battalion, the battalion over which I was surgeon, writes as follows:—

"I have resided in Manitoba and the North-West for the past ten years, and, with 'C' Company of the 90th, was in the heat of the engagement at the battle of Fish Creek, where I was rendered unfit for further active service, and subsequently removed to the hospital at Saskatoon. After the battle of Batoche amongst the wounded brought there were two half-breeds, dangerously so: one, M. Jobin, one of Riel's council, and another Manitoba half-breed whose name I have forgotten. In my capacity as hospital sergeant and night nurse, for six weeks it devolved upon me, by orders from the Surgeon-Major Roddick, to visit these men during the night, and I conversed freely with them upon their conduct in taking up arms against the Government. I said to Jobin, whom I had known for years: 'What in the world brought you here? Surely you have no grievances? You got your river lot near Winnipeg and sold it for a large sum, and afterwards the Government gave you a homestead and pre-emption in southern Manitoba.'"

That shows the liberality of the Government to the half-breeds.

"What more do you want? 'He replied: 'Riel sent for me last fall, and when I got here he put me on his council, and at last forced me to fight, as he did most of us, and I feel very sorry I was led away by Riel. He has ruined us all, and I am going to die through him.' Amputation was deemed necessary, and he subsequently died from exhaustion. This is only one out of forty I know personally who took up arms that had no grievances whatever, for, after disposing of their scrip or selling their lands granted to them in Manitoba, they went up to the Saskatchewan to reside there. Now, I would like to ask if this man Riel deserved any clemency from the Crown after concocting this unholy rebellion? Let anyone who could have seen the sad sufferings of our wounded and dying volunteers, writhing in their agony, moaning and calling for help to relieve them from their sufferings, day after day and night after night, and ask themselves whether the author of all this deserved mercy. Let any of them, as I did, look upon the dead bodies, wrapped in their own gore, of ten of Canada's noble sons who shed the last drop of blood (which flowed so freely a few hours before in their veins) in defence of their Queen and country and for the preservation of law and order in our midst, and say that the villain who was the cause of all this did not richly deserve his fate, had they witnessed all this. I do not think there would be now two opinions on the subject, but what will not some people who call themselves politicians do to satisfy that everlasting appetite for place and honor."

I can produce other evidence to show that the half-breeds had no real grievances of which to complain. The Rev. Father Moulin was wounded and under my care, and in various conversations with him I said: "I wonder why in the world the people rose up in arms. They appear to be very comfortable." He said: "Yes, very comfortable and very contented until Riel came here and forced them to take up arms." He said there were only nine men in the first instance who with Riel undertook to raise the rebellion, but they went from house to house with revolvers and rifles and forced the poor Metis to take up arms and join them in that unholy rebellion. Let me say a few words in reference to the Guiteau trial so far as it may have a bearing on the insanity of Riel. One of the leading newspapers, the New York Herald, stated in reference to Guiteau that when he was not in conversation his countenance assumed all the appearance of a man whose mind was totally destroyed, and we know well that Guiteau during his trial and previously exhibited more signs of insanity than ever did Riel. But he was not considered to be insane, but merely a crank, and I had intended to refer to the distinction drawn by the medical witnesses at the Riel trial between a crank and an insane man, but I will refrain at this late stage. It is certainly my opinion, after comparing the two cases and reading the evidence, as I said, during the trials of Guiteau and of Riel, that, at least, Guiteau displayed far more evidences of insanity than ever Riel did, and yet Guiteau was considered to be only a crank, and not a man who was irresponsible for his actions. If it had been admitted that Riel was a crank there might possibly have been some ground for the admission; but when we find a man possessing such an amazing amount of intelligence, such quick perception, such grasp of mind in connection with only one form of delusion, we must come to the conclusion that the sentence of death was properly passed upon him. I desire to call the attention of the House to the effect the non-execution of Riel would have had in the North-West. I know myself what the feelings of the people are, and those who felt strongest on the point were not the Orangemen or the people of Ontario, but the Englishmen who had come from Great Britain and settled in that territory. I say that amongst the English population of the North-West the feeling was more intense than among any other class that Riel ought, in justice to society, to be hanged. I listened to the leader of the Opposition when he addressed the House on this question, and though, during a labored argument of several hours, he attempted to prove that Riel was insane, so as to give himself an excuse for supporting the motion before the House, yet I never heard him rise to the consideration of the duty of the Government towards society and towards the people at large. I never heard him define what the duty of the Government is to the people of this country. But I can assure him that the people of the North-West, the English and other settlers, thought it was the duty of the Government to protect them, and if Riel had not been hanged they would be subject to constant risings by Indians and other dissatisfied people, and the North-West would become a very undesirable country to live in. I have no doubt that had Riel not received the punishment he deserved, those settlers from the old country would have written to their friends and sought to deter others from coming and settling in the North-West. Many would doubtless feel that they could not leave because they had made investments and settled there; but I firmly believe that a large number already settled would have left the North-West had the sentence on Riel not been carried out. It is little over twelve months since the people of this country were disturbed in their quiet dream of repose. They believed we were living in peace and harmony and there was no possibility, much less probability, of any serious disturbance amongst any class of the people. English, Irish, Scotch, French and German live there together in peace, each admiring the good and amiable qualities of the other, allowing each other to enjoy their sentiments, whether of a religious or national character, with the fullest freedom; and it was a startling surprise, I am sure, to every man in the Dominion, when the news first arrived that a rebellion had broken out in the North-West. I well remember the attitude assumed by hon. gentleman opposite. Man after man followed the leader of the Opposition in urging on the Government to lose no time and to spare no money in stamping out that rebellion. The horrors of Indian war were felt, as was eloquently described by the leader of the Opposition the other day to be of such a terrible character that no effort or expense should be spared to stamp it out without delay. And, Sir, we all know that from ocean to ocean our young men arose and tendered their services to put down that rebellion. We all know that they undertook to endure hardships that it was presumed would be equal to any hardships which were endured even by Napoleon in his campaign in Russia. They had to traverse over 2,000 miles to reach the seat of this rebellion, but their bravery never failed them. They undertook the task, and the only difficulty that the Government had was to decide and choose who amongst those who offered should be selected for the honorable task of defending their country. You are all familiar with the hardships they endured during that inclement season of the year, when the thermometer was 20 degrees below zero—the hardships they endured during the breaking-up of the spring, when the cold rains prevailed, and they had to lie down, night after night, in their wet clothes, and after marching from early morning to late at night, wet through, they had to get up again at 5 o'clock at the bugle sound next morning. You are familiar with the gallant way in which that rebellion was put down. Sir, are they to be told to-day that all their bravery, all their efforts, were ill-timed; that they were fighting against a just cause, fighting against a man who the hon. member for Quebec East tried to make out was a great hero. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. Well, Sir, that was certainly my interpretation of his remarks—that he would lead us to believe that this man was at least the equal of William Lyon Mackenzie, the equal of others who were fighting for constitutional liberty in this country, and that his cause was a right one. Are they to be told that instead of going to fight the rebels they should have come here and fought those who occupy the Treasury benches? I think when hon. gentlemen go before the electors of this country they will find that their views are not endorsed by the people throughout the length and breadth of this land. Are the people of Canada, who welcomed back the volunteers, who gave all honor to them and paid every respect to the honored dead who were left on the plains of the far West, who did everything they possibly could in a generous manner to show their appreciation of the services of Canada's sons, who had by their bravery shown that in this land of ours, on this side of the Atlantic, the old prowess and bravery of the British race are perpetuated—are they to be told that their cause was a wrong one, and that they were not fighting in a good and proper cause; that the fact of it is that Louis Riel, who rose there and headed the Metis was fighting for constitutional liberty? Why, Sir, we well know that, so far as this Government was concerned, they did everything a Government could do to give all the liberty to the people of that country that was desirable. The Government that preceded the present Administration refused to give any rights to the Metis of the North-West; and one of the first acts of the present Government, when they came into office, was to enact a law which gave completely and thoroughly their rights to the Metis of the North-West Territories. Sir, they had not only done so, but on every occasion they displayed a most tender desire to do everything to advance the best interests of the half-breeds and other people of the North-West. Correspondence after correspondence had taken place with the clergy and other influential men in reference to the best way of giving to the Metis the rights they had accorded to them by Act of Parliament. It was well known that the half-breeds of the Province of Manitoba lost their lands—lost in a very foolish manner the benefit of the 240 acres which was given to every man, woman and child. They bartered it away for trifling sums, and were left poorer than before;

and it was in the interests of the Metis that the Government desired to consider the matter carefully and give every possible attention to having the distribution of land made in such way as would do the Metis the greatest amount of good. I shall not weary the House any longer on the present occasion, but shall conclude in stating it is my intention to vote against the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry).

Mr. CASGRAIN. I shall trespass upon the indulgence of the House for only a very few moments. I understand that the House is getting weary of this long discussion, and I promise that my speech shall not be a long one. First of all, I may remark that we were taken a little by surprise on finding the hon member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) presenting this motion to the House as coming from himself. We thought very naturally that, after consulting with that side of the House, he made this motion with the connivance of the Government, but we have the assurance of the Minister of Justice yesterday that such was not the case, and of course we have to take his word. But at the same time, I do not hesitate to say that I always maintained a certain suspicion as to the sincerity of the hon. member for Montmagny, as to the purport and effect of his motion, because, after the event of the 16th November, he took a strong and active part against the Government in this matter. But it happened that sometime afterwards he changed his mind, and if he is sincere in the motion which he is now making, it is most likely he will have to continue in the same course afterwards and carry the war into Africa. But since he has changed his opinion once already, it may be that he will change in it again afterwards. In order that what I say may be credited, I may state that I received the day before yesterday a statement in the form of a declaration from a person named Eugène Bernier, in the county of Montmagny, who says the hon. gentleman entertained views entirely different from those he presented to the House. This declaration is as follows:—

"I, Eugène Bernier, trader, of the township of Montminy, in the county of Montmagny, do solemnly declare that on Sunday, the seventh day of February last, immediately after grand mass, Mr. Philippe Landry, member of Parliament for this county of Montmagny, addressed the electors of this parish and among other things said: That Louis Riel had a fair trial; that the said Louis Riel was a mean man; that he defied the curé of the parish and all the clergy to say the contrary; that Riel had deserved his fate, and that the Government did right in hanging him; that he (Landry) would support the Government, and that only a few individuals, through ambition or otherwise, would oppose the Government; that the half-breeds had no reason to rebel. Not approving the words of Mr. Landry, and knowing that he had stated the contrary, or nearly the contrary, in a speech which he had delivered in the town of Montmagny, I left the meeting through disgust, and I did not hear the rest of his speech, but I have been told that he spoke about the new electoral bill. I may also add that Mr. Landry also declared that the Government was not an Orange Government, that the Orangemen had had nothing to do with the execution of Riel. And I make this solemn declaration, by virtue of the Act 37 Victoria, intituled: 'An Act for the suppression of voluntary and extra-judicial oaths,' and I have signed.

"EUGÈNE BERNIER.

"Taken and acknowledged before me, at Montmagny, this 19th day of March, 1886. }
"F. X. GENDREAU, J.P."

I suppose the hon. gentleman, if he is sincere in his motion, will hereafter persevere in the position he has taken. Now, to come to the motion itself, I shall in a very few words endeavor to express my opinion. First of all, as to the rebellion, I will not say that it would be at all justifiable in law. I will not say that the Metis could be justified in taking up arms to redress their grievances under the circumstances, though their grievances were certainly numerous and very heavy. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Kent, N. B. (Mr. Landry), say, the other day, that these Metis had no grievances at all. It is hardly to be supposed that they would have taken up arms for nothing. It is hardly to be supposed, after having had restored the titles of their lands, and after some 2,000 grants had been conceded to them, that they had no grievances whatever. The press at large has admitted that these Metis had grievances, and serious grievances. I am far from saying that they were justified in taking up arms; but I may say this, that if the least care or attention had been paid to their demands, the country and the House would not be occupied to-day in discussing the question now before us. Did this Government, at the beginning, when Riel entered this country and began holding meetings, with a strong hand stop the rebellion at the outset? No; on the contrary, they let it ripen until it burst forth, with the shedding of blood and all the other evil effects which followed. When the rebellion began, the Government took the most active and stringent measures to suppress it, and we, on our side gave them all possible support in suppressing it. We followed the march of the troops with great anxiety; and I can say for myself that I had a very deep interest in the troops engaged in the field. At the same time I can give credit to the Minister of Militia for the activity with which the campaign was conducted; but if he had taken one tithe of the means to prevent the rebellion which he took to suppress it, we should not have had to deplore the loss of life and property over which the country is mourning to-day. But, far from doing that, the Government was itself the original cause of the rebellion, and therefore the country at large cannot but see that they have put themselves in a very straitened position with regard to the carrying out of the sentence passed on Louis Riel and the others. Now, let me say one word as to the policy of the execution. I followed with considerable attention the able speech of the Minister of Justice, who has put the case in as plausible a manner as he could, and with that ability which I am pleased to acknowledge; but he has failed to convince me that the decision with regard to Riel, to which, not he, but the Government came before his entry into the Ministry, was a wise decision. There was another policy which might have been adopted, and I cannot concede to the hon. Minister of Justice that if Louis Riel had been put in prison, or even in a lunatic asylum, he would not have been put out of the possibility of disturbing the country again. That was not a very forcible argument on his part any more than was his statement that Louis Riel had a fair trial, because the tribunal before whom he was tried had been created while the Liberal party was in power. Well, that is the tu quoque argument, which the public at large would not receive. Whether the tribunal had been created by the Liberals or the Conservatives would be no reason why the tribunal was not a proper tribunal, nor take away from the fact that the judge presiding, however upright he might be, was not, being removable at pleasure, the most competent to judge. During these last two or three months, an immense agitation has been excited all over the country over Riel's case. It cannot be denied that there was a very strong public feeling in the Province of Quebec, and a feeling quite as strong in other parts of the Dominion for and against the execution of Riel. What was the cause of the excitement? It came from the former offence of Louis Riel, so that though that offence had been amnestied, though it might be considered a blank, still there remained in one part of the population of the Dominion a desire of vengeance against Riel, and the cry for vengeance became louder every day. Not only did that agitation extend in this country, but it passed over the borders to the press of the United States, and even in England and France people talked of the matter and followed the case of Louis Riel. In order to find the opinions of writers who are not at all biassed by partisanship, and to whose opinions I therefore attach great importance, I consulted their press, and in one article from one of the ablest papers published in the United States, the Courrier des Etats-Unis, the position is exactly defined. The Courrier des Etats-

" Louis Riel, the leader of the insurrection in the Canadian North-West, was executed Monday morning at Regina, by virtue of an express order from Sir John Macdonald. The circumstances which surround this political drama have no precedent in history. We do not believe that a sentence of death was ever executed in presence of so many or such powerful reasons, of so many and such energetic efforts, to have it commuted. This inflexible persistency would be inconceivable were it not sustained by motives which are found outside of the ordinary run of events. The execution of Riel, it goes without saying, is not the punishment of a crime—justice is no longer inexorable for offences of this kind—it was a political speculation. But if we are to believe the revelations of the last hour, an act of submission to an irresistible hidden power; Sir John Macdonald, who is a grand master of the Orange order, was bound by his oath to carry out the supreme will of that society."

I think this is a very strong pronouncement of opinion, and one very much in accordance with the facts. Whether or not, to any extent, and if so to what extent, the Ministry have been influenced by the preceding crime of Riel, I am not able to judge; but I can go so far as to say that it was an element in awarding the sentence, because the Minister of Public Works said so the other day. In Quebec there is a fixed idea that if it had not been for the former murder of Scott, Riel would never have lost his life on the scaffold, and it will take a very long time to cause that opinion to disappear. The existence of this feeling, every one will understand, is a great sore to the Province of Quebec, and to people in the other Provinces which take the same view. I do not say anything in order to palliate the former offence of Louis Riel, but I say that that former offence ought not, under the present circumstances, to have been added to the offence for which Riel suffered the last penalty of the law. As the opinion that it was added prevails in Quebec, I am bound to take notice of it, and I say I share in that opinion. I do not justify in any way the criminal offence of the execution of Scott. On the contrary. I always believed that it was a perfectly useless act and served no purpose. It was more than useless, because at that time Riel, who was the strongest, might have relegated his prisoner to some quarters and have saved himself very easily from being troubled further by him. That I am willing to admit. But since the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) has been kind enough to honor me by quoting some of my remarks with regard to the execution of Thomas Scott in the book "Letellier de Saint-Just et son temps," I think he might have given all the quotation instead of only a part. In the work from which that quotation was taken, he ought to have added a paragraph which goes to say that at that time Riel was supposed to be crazy or mad, and that a short time afterwards he became an inmate of the lunatic asylum at Beauport. This is what has been omitted :

" * * * troubled by remorse, by the threats and by the proceedings taken against him, he afterwards became insane and was confined for some time in the Beauport Asylum near Quebec."

I desire to rectify this, because that is the only way in which we can account for the murder of Thomas Scott. Now, let me say one word as to Riel's surrender to General Middleton. I cannot understand why General Middleton should have written to Riel to surrender. It is a fact that General Middleton was in constant and direct communication with the authorities in Ottawa; therefore he must have communicated to them this document or letter of surrender which he had sent to Riel, because it was only two or three days afterwards that Riel surrendered. This letter has not been disavowed by the authorities or by General Middleton himself, and yet the other day the Minister of Militia said Riel had not surrendered at all, but had been taken prisoner. If the hon. Minister says Riel did not surrender, he admits that, if he had surrendered under that letter, he would have been entitled to the ordinary usages of war, that is, to have his life spared. Riel surrendered and was taken to the quarters of General Middleton, entered his tent, was received there, and was lodged in the tent adjoining that of General

Mr. CASGRAIN.

Middleton. As we say in French, il à été reçu à quartier. He was given quarter, and by the usages of war the moment he was admitted to quarter his life ought to have been spared—that is to say, he was then under the usual regulations of war, since he had been treated in that way by his communications with General Middleton when they exchanged communications as to the putting aside of women and children. Under these circumstances, why did General Middleton tempt that man to surrender; why should he write to him at all, if he had not the intention of having him surrender? The fact is that, if he had not written that letter at all, most likely Riel would not have surrendered, but would have fought and lost his life on the battle-field, or escaped. There is no doubt at all that Riel could have escaped then. He was as good a horseman as any on the prairies. He could have followed Dumont or Dumais across the border at the same time, but he did not. He remained here; and a proof that, if he wanted to escape, he was astute and cunning enough to do it, was shown by him in Ottawa when he was here in 1874, when he had all the police on his heels, when he had spies and constables watching for him, and he was about a month here, came and signed the roll as a member of Parliament, and nobody could lay his hand upon him. If he wanted to escape, there is no doubt Riel could have escaped and could have been over the border, but he relied upon the parole of General Middleton, and for that reason he surrendered, and surrendered with that letter in his hand. Why did General Middleton ask him to surrender? Why did he not run the chance of war with him? I know, if I had been in the place of General Middleton, I would not have offered Riel any surrender; I would have said: You must run for your life, or, if you are taken on the field of battle, you must abide by the fortune of war. Certainly, if Riel could have foreseen that his life would have ended on the gallows, he would have fought to the last and would have sold his life dearly; and to-day, if General Middleton understands perfectly the purport of that letter which induced the surrender, he is the man who should have said: I am responsible for the head of that man; he has surrendered to me, and I must protect him against the last punishment of the law as far as his life is concerned. Now, it is very strange how events of the past will come hereafter and fall upon the head of those who have been guilty of some dereliction of duty. The leader of the Government of this Dominion had said one day at a public meeting, and had said it, I believe, knowing that he was deceiving himself, and deceiving the public, and deceiving the audience he was addressing at the time—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes, "hear, hear"—he said: "if I could catch him, I would hang him;" but now, afterwards, he had the man in his own hand, and he was obliged by the circumstances to carry out the sentence he had pronounced fourteen years before. The best proof that the sentiment had not been lost among the people of the country was this, which took place not far from Ottawa, and not long ago: The hon. gentleman was told on one public occasion by one of the leaders of the party in this neighborhood: "Now that you have Riel, are you going to hang him?" "Well," said the leader of the Government, "I am not the hangman."

I may say one word as to the sanity or insanity of Louis Riel. I may have my own views; because I had frequent intercourse with Dr. Roy, of Quebec, who is one of my particular friends, and I have frequently visited the Beauport Asylum; and during the time that Riel was confined in that asylum, he was on particular occasions subject to crises under which he became furious. He was there for the space of nineteen months, and, when he left, he was supposed to have recovered. While he was there, at different times he was a raving maniac. He had been previously at the asylum at Long Point for nine months, and for a short time at an asylum near Washington. Having that knowledge of the state of his mind, though I may be travelling out of the evidence on record, when the evidence before us is added to that which I had already before me, I could not come to the conclusion that Riel was of sound mind, and in the particular line of insanity from which he was suffering, he had no sound judgment and he could not distinguish right from wrong. It was easy for the Minister of Justice to say that Riel could play the fool when he liked, but when, during nineteen months, he was in the lunatic asylum at Beauport he did not play the fool. When he was under the care of Dr. Howard, at the Long Point Asylum, during nine months, he could not play the fool. Although the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) read a letter wherein Dr. Howard stated that his testimony would have been of no avail to Louis Riel if he had been summoned, I say the mere fact that Louis Riel was confined under his care for nine months is peremptory proof that he would not have kept him there at the expense of the Government if the man had not been insane. The Minister of Militia said the other day that the case of Louis Riel was not our own—speaking of the French Canadians. I do not pretend to say that in all its particulars the case of Riel is not our own, but I do pretend to say that, so far as the grievances of the Metis, and of Louis Riel among them, are concerned, the case of Louis Riel is our own. But, perhaps, the Minister of Militia—I do not know why he is not present in the House at this moment—would not have said that if he had remembered a former statement of his leader about Louis Riel, on his first offence, when he had written directly to Bishop Taché, “I will make the case of Louis Riel my own.” It was very different language from that used the other day by the Minister of Militia. Now, Sir, it is said that a commission of three medical men were appointed and sent up to examine that poor unfortunate man before he was going to be hanged. Well, Sir, for my part, if that commission had been composed of three medical men who were specialists, or what we call alienists, if they had made a special study of that branch of medical treatment, if they had been sworn, if they had consulted with each other and made a joint report, I could understand that the value of their report would have been such as to authorise the Government in carrying out the sentence. But we saw the contrary. They were not sworn; they did not examine this unfortunate man jointly but separately, and each made a separate report, without consulting each other, as is usual in such cases. Upon this point I do not consider this commission of any legal value. But taking it as it is, enough has already been proved of the insanity of Riel to induce me to believe that he was not then, and had not been for a long time, of a sound mind, of a mind sound enough to be able to distinguish right from wrong in religious and political matters, the very line in which he committed the act of rebellion, and the very line in which he was still then suffering. Now, Sir, I do not know why the Minister of Militia, the other day, criticised me because I had, on one particular occasion, in this book which I have in my hand just now, thrown some aspersions on the character of the late Sir George E. Cartier. I do not know what that has to do with the case at all; but I may repeat here what I have said and written about him, that it was true, and the best way to shield the memory of Cartier from that aspersion would be to prove that the facts which are related of him are not true. But, unfortunately for him, they are true, and that is the reason why the Conservatives, especially in the Province of Quebec, whose idol he was, burn so much incense to his memory. I am not ashamed of having written what I have written, and I say again that if Sir George E. Cartier had died one year sooner than he did, his reputation would not have suffered from the Pacific scandal affair. Now, Sir, I will conclude my remarks by putting them in as concise a manner as possible. The blood of Louis Riel and the blood of other poor unfortunates, has been shed, and somebody is responsible for the blood of Louis Riel, for he is not alone responsible for his own death. I say this in conclusion, and I believe the opinion I express will be endorsed by a great many of my compatriots, if not the most of them, in the Province of Quebec, and also by a great many others in the Dominion. If the Ministers were not their own judges, vindicating their own case in the trial of Louis Riel, then let not the blood of Louis Riel fall upon them. I say further, if they did not hang a crazy lunatic, let not the blood of Louis Riel fall upon them. If they are free from any blame as to the causes of the rebellion, let not the blood of Louis Riel fall upon their shoulders. I say, also, that if they did not weigh the head of Louis Riel in the balance of their own interests, let not his blood fall upon their heads. If the determining cause of his death was not the murder of Scott, then let not the blood of Louis Riel fall upon them. If the surrender of Louis Riel was no reason to spare his life, then I say again, let not his blood be upon them. If they could not have prevented the rebellion at all, then also let not the blood of Louis Riel fall upon them. If no other milder policy could have been adopted, if they could not have given to him even the benefit of a doubt, let not the blood of Louis Riel fall upon them. Because I say that whatever the evidence may be, however strong it may be on either side, when that evidence is weighed, I find that there are certainly very few unprejudiced men who would not say that there was a very strong doubt of the sanity of Louis Riel; and in the mild temper of the criminal law under which we live, that law always gives the benefit of the doubt to the prisoner. But if all these propositions are undeniable, as I believe they are, since the Ministers have assumed the responsibility of the hanging, then I pray Almighty God to forgive them and to show them more mercy than they have showed that unfortunate man. As I am called to give, upon the floor of the House, my vote and to express my opinion, I must pronounce my condemnation of the course of the Government, because they have placed themselves, of their own accord and from the beginning, under the dire necessity of carrying that execution into effect. Of course, holding these sentiments, I shall vote for the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry).

Mr. COSTIGAN. Before this debate closes I would like to ask permission of the House to say a few words without pretending at all to enter very fully into the discussion that has taken place. I am sure I may claim the indulgence of the House on the ground of being an old member, and one who does not often trespass upon its patience. I think the House will be willing to admit that I have some right to make a few observations here touching on the question now under discussion, as well as in my own defence. It is true I have not been burned in effigy in any portion of this country, as some of my colleagues have been, and I am forced to admit that the newspapers in discussing this question, especially the French newspapers, have made no personal attack upon myself, for which I feel very thankful, under the great excitement which existed, and that that duty was left to be discharged by a newspaper pretending to speak for the whole Irish Catholic element of this Dominion. Mr. Speaker, I shall be able, I think, in the few remarks I have to offer to say something that will meet reasonably the charges made by that paper to which I have just alluded. It is true that hon. gentlemen may think this is not directly dealing with the question; but I have not been able to change since this discussion commenced the opinion I entertained before the question was brought before this House. The question is not, purely and simply, whether the Government did right in allowing the sentence of the law to be carried out in the execution of Louis Riel; but coupled with that, forming the great reason for the discussion of it, is the further question, whether hon. gentlemen opposite who have failed to enunciate a policy before this country, can by this means cross the floor and assume the Treasury benches. That is the whole secret. How have they endeavored to utilise this question before the country? I will refer to hon. members on both sides of this House, and I am confident they will not deny that from the first time this question became a question before the people it has not been discussed as a legal question, as a question whether justice was done from the Canadian standpoint and from the view of the subjects of the Dominion, but it has been discussed with a view to excite the prejudice of every different section in this country. In the first place, hon. gentlemen and their organs have dwelt with great force upon the fact that this unfortunate man would not have been executed had he not been a French Canadian. They tried to excite the prejudices of the French people and to lead them to believe that this was a grievance, and, as one of the hon. gentlemen said the other day in his speech, "we, of the Province of Quebec, felt deeply humbled by reason of the execution." There is no argument in that. The leader of the Opposition, in a speech he delivered a few nights ago, deplored the fact that the rebels in the North-West were not represented in this House, and he said that great consideration should have been given to the case on that account. I consider they were ably, if not wisely represented in this House during the whole of last Session. During the whole of the troubles that took place during last Session they had every reason to believe that all the sympathy they could expect, even more than they could expect in the best interests of the country, was afforded them by hon. members on that side of the House. Then we are told in the country as well as in this House that the Government yielded in a cowardly manner—and that is the reason why the Government are designated as hangmen—to the pressure brought to bear on them by the Orangemen. That was a cowardly charge, as cowardly as it was false and unfounded. The Cabinet is composed of men not to be influenced and dictated to by any particular section in this country. They have the interests of the whole people at heart. They are fair and impartial enough to deal with all elements and to give all justice; and they are not cowards, to be dictated to by any particular element. I am quite satisfied the good sense of the people will set that question right. It was also said by the leader of the Opposition that besides the misfortune of not being represented in this House—and that was a cause for sympathy—if the grievances had been remedied a month sooner, the rebellion would not have taken place. That is no justification of the rebellion; and, moreover, that ground was abandoned even by the hon. gentleman himself later on in his speech. Let me say in addition that, perhaps, if the half-breeds had not received so much and such strong sympathy on the floor of Parliament and in the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite, they would not have had the courage to resist the authority of this country. Great fault has been found with the Government, and the Conservative party, and the leader of the House for the time for moving the previous question, it being stated that it was a gag and that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House had not dared to discuss this question. What was it they wished to discuss? Why were the Ministers burned in effigy in the Province of Quebec? Why were all the indignation meetings called throughout the Province, and what was it they denounced? Did they not denounce particularly the execution of Riel? That was the crime that the Government had committed, and they demanded the punishment of the Government for that particular crime. The moving of the previous question confines the discussion to that question. It is unfortunate for hon. gentlemen who have tried to make a strong case against the Government; it is a great disadvantage to them that the case of the half-breeds has been by that motion disassociated from the case of Riel. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen and many people in the country, on it appearing that there were grievances on the part of the half-breeds, would feel sympathy with those people. Hon. gentlemen opposite know well the disadvantage under which they are laboring in that, even if it were established that the half-breeds had just cause to complain and had been badly treated, still they could not drag this fact in to benefit the case of Riel. Even if you admit that the half-breeds had cause to complain, and even if you go to the extent of seeking to justify the rebellion—as hon. gentlemen opposite do—they had not the right to rebel against the constitutional authority of the country, and this excuse could not be pleaded for a citizen of the United States. What justification had that unfortunate man, who had been once pardoned, for having excited rebellion in this country, who had left it indebted to the mercy of its rulers for his life then, who had left it and gone to the United States where he had taken the oath of allegiance and become a citizen—what justification can hon. gentlemen opposite plead in favor of that man who returned to excite a second rebellion after being once forgiven? It is quite patent that it is a source of annoyance to hon. gentlemen opposite that the previous question has been moved, and they cannot drag in issues beyond that as to whether the Government did right or wrong in permitting the execution of Riel. Then again we heard one of those eloquent speeches, one of those fiery efforts of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). We all know the eloquence of that hon. member, and the free exercise he makes of it in this House, but more especially out of it. We had from him a speech which indicated very plainly, if the organs outside of this House do not indicate it more plainly, what the policy of that party is to be. Hon. gentlemen feel now that they have failed in their first attempt. But this does not end the question. They have allowed the question to be raised here, but it is to be settled at the polls, with the new converts they have made, with the assistance of that very respectable and influential paper, called the Montreal Post, which rejoices that the Irish party now have the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) to follow, and the Post says: "What more do the Irish people of this country want than to be represented by those gentlemen?" Sir, the hon. gentlemen know that their platform is laid down for next election, that their political canvass is ready, and they feel that for the vote they are going to give they are going to lose a portion of their old supporters—that all through their own Province they are going to lose a portion of their own supporters on the ground of their support of a policy of justifying a rebellion in this country, and they expect that the Montreal Post is going to carry out the contract which was declared at the commencement of this agitation, and that the whole Irish Catholic vote is to be united in their favor at the bidding of that newspaper. This, Sir, is a contract which I am sure will never be carried out. Then again we were told that the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) sported shamrocks on their breasts on St. Patrick's Day. I am glad of it. It is better late than never—better that they should at last remember the country which they boast of as the land of their forefathers or the place of their birth. But, Sir, I remember the day when the hon. the leader of the Opposition did not wear the shamrock. I never knew him to wear it when he was sitting on this side of the House, as a Minister of the Crown, but the

hon. gentleman wears it now, and the whole Irish vote is to be handed over to him at the bidding of those who are mere demagogues in this country, and not of those who form the independent Irish Catholic element of Canada. I feel that I have the right, after these attacks have been made, to ask the patience of the House in replying to some of them. I say to you, Sir, I say to the House, and I wish to convey that assurance outside, that the Montreal Post does not represent in that line the honest sentiments and feelings of the Irish people of this country. I know their sympathies and their feelings as well as any one connected with the Montreal Post, and I say that as a body the masses of them have little to do with offices, or with contracts, or with anything of that nature. I say that though a small portion of them may seek promotions, may seek contracts, may seek favors, if you will, the masses of the Irish people have nothing in particular to gain or lose by a change of ministries or by a change of representatives; that they vote on principle, honesty and right doing when their principles are appealed to. I have no fear but that when the efforts of these demagogues are made to hand over the Irish people to the leader of the Opposition, in conjunction with the hon. member for Elgin, these efforts will be fruitless, these appeals will be made in vain. That same paper stated that it was my duty to resign my seat in the Cabinet upon the question now before the House, and that if I did not resign I would be repudiated by every Irish Catholic in the Dominion of Canada. I have already said enough to show the reasons why I declined the invitation of that paper at that time. The same paper also stated as a reason why I should take that course, that it was in the interests of the Irish people that we should maintain that bond of union which the Post claims always existed between the Irish and the French people of this country. Well, Sir, my sympathies with the French people of this country date further back than the sympathies of either the editor of the Post or any of those who write for that journal. I have always been known to express my sympathies, and to act in accordance with them when the interest of that portion of our population were at stake; and the Post or any other newspaper cannot misrepresent me on that point. But I may be pardoned if I should not go as far as I was asked to go in yielding to my honest sympathy for the French Canadian people. If I believed that anything I could do would promote the welfare of the element alluded to, I would be willing to do my share and make personal sacrifices in that direction at any time; but I am not willing, even for the French element of this country, I am not willing even for the Irish element of this country, to sacrifice the interests of the country in which we live. I want it fairly understood that while I represent a portion of the Irish people of this country, or, at least, that I presume to speak for a portion of the Irish people of this country, I hold it a common duty on the part of that and every other element in this country to maintain the dignity and integrity of the country in which we live; and, at the same time, I will not force my views on any other element in this country whether it be French, or Scotch, or Dutch, or any other nationality. Then I have been accused in the press of having been the most anxious, the most hurried of the members of the Cabinet to secure the execution of that unfortunate man. That charge has been answered already; but still, no matter how often it may be answered, you cannot satisfy these hon. gentlemen or their organs in the press. You may demolish their charges, but they advance them again with the same assurance as before; they come back and reiterate their old slanders. With regard to my position in the Cabinet, every one knows that that question must have engaged the serious attention of every Minister in the Cabinet. I remember that the leader of the Opposition, when he was on this side of the House, once appealed to the House when a question was raised as to the exercise of the clemency of the Crown, to consider the position he held as Minister of Justice, the responsibility which was involved, and the serious consideration that he must give when dealing with a life of a human being. I wonder if, since he has crossed over to that side of the House, he cannot afford to be a little generous, if he cannot afford to admit that other men, with hearts like himself, might feel the same responsibility and be actuated by as high and worthy motives as he was in discharging the duties of his office. But he will not credit his opponents with any good motives. Sir, if there is one thing more than another which must shake the confidence of the people of the country in the party opposite, it is the extreme stand they take that there is no single redeeming quality, no good motive or act in anything connected with the Conservative party. Surely the whole Conservative party are not so bad, so corrupt, so rotten, so unworthy of confidence, especially in the face of the fact that they sit here by their constitutional rights representing an overwhelming majority of the people. When the question of the execution did come up, I felt, for my own part, that it was a serious question, and a question of great responsibility; and though I deny the imputation that I was anxious or hurried to procure the execution of that unfortunate man, I must say that I arrived at a conclusion in this way. I was not listening—I had no reason to listen, because I never heard of this Orange pressure which, it is said, was brought to bear on the Cabinet—I heard of no such pressure; I had no knowledge of it. No member of the Orange Order, no other man indicated to me a desire on the part of that body that this man should be executed from any feeling of revenge on their part. The whole question came before my mind simply as a matter of duty devolving on me; and, with my colleagues, when I saw the agitation, when I considered that we are building up a great people in that North-West country, which we expected and believed would become a prosperous community, I felt that the future of that country depended very largely on the question of whether the Government—not this Government merely, but the Government of the country—should maintain law and order there, and protect the lives and property of the people of that country, and that, therefore, that question was an important one. I felt that this man had come over without the slightest provocation, without having any rights on the soil, as an American subject, for when he came back disrobed of his Canadian citizenship, he had divested himself of any claims to sympathy he might have attracted in his former rebellion when he was a citizen of this country. I felt that the effect of allowing that man to go free must be that the policy of gentlemen opposite must be taken in preference to the policy here; that this man, or any other man, finding that he went clear, might cross the boundaries between the United States and Canada and say, I will again raise the standard of rebellion in that country, and I know there is a party that will sustain me and prevent me receiving extreme punishment." Sir, what plainer evidence could we have if a manifesto were sent, say to Dumont, who is on the other side of the line. We all know, from the discussion that took place last Session in this House, that the weight of sympathy was not in favor of Louis Riel, but it was in favor of Dumont, as being the more courageous man of the two. At least, it was felt that he had the courage of his convictions. What plainer manifesto could be sent to that man who is now on the other side of the line? It might be said to him, "if you feel a little irritated, you may cross the line to-morrow and raise again the standard of rebellion; you may have more settlers and priests murdered and their property destroyed, but there is a party in this country who will hold you free, especially if, by holding you free, they can promote the political interests of that party in this country." I do not profess to be a prophet or to know as much of the future as any one of the hon. gentleman's followers on the other side; but my firm conviction is that no greater mistake was made by any political party in this country, than to strengthen themselves for political purposes by so unholy and unrighteous a cause as that of trampling on the best rights of the people of the country and exciting their worst passions. There is no redeeming feature about the whole agitation. Every ingenuity is being exercised to excite the hostility of the French people, who have been living at peace with, and enjoying the confidence of, every other element in the country. A desperate effort is being made to excite the Irish people. "Oh," it is said, "the Irish people will sympathise with every man who raises his voice against the execution of Riel; they have been so much accustomed to persecution and to having their leading men hanged that for very sympathy they will go that way." No, Sir. Whatever may be the opinions of Irishmen in the old country or in the United States, we in this country have our own opinions. I claim that we occupy a very different position from the Irishmen in the United States, and I do not say this because the Montreal Post or any other hostile paper may hang a cause of complaint on my words, or from any want of sympathy with Irishmen on the other side of the line; but I want to point out the difference between us. While Irishmen in the United States have severed their connection with anything British, we occupy a different position under the constitution under which we live. We are building up homes here in Canada as a portion of that Empire; and while we sympathise warmly—and I believe every Irishman in this country does sympathise with the land of our forefathers, and hope that the day will come when the people of Ireland will enjoy the same rights and liberties as we do in this country—yet we are willing to fight for the defence not only of those rights, but the rights of all other elements in this country. If I had an advice to give—and I believe there is some portion of the Irish people in Canada who are not indoctrinated with the ideas of the Montreal Post, and who would listen—I would warn them under any circumstances to beware of those demagogues and their false teachings, to beware of any policy of division; because the very fact of their enunciating a policy of division between the different elements of this country shows it to be an unholy policy. They talk about our political rights. These men are trying to pull down what has been built up in the interests of the Irish people in Canada. I remember a few years ago, if I went into the smoking-room and listened to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House talking of their election, one of the themes of their conversation was how they managed to get the support of the "Dogans." Well, Sir, the day has changed and to-day every intelligent Irishman in Canada must feel that a great change has come over the country. Such great progress has been made in this direction that Irish Catholics stand on the same footing as other elements of the population, and receive equal recognition and equal rights. There may be some cause of grievance. Take any minority in this country and you find that the minority always has some causes of complaint, and these are subjects for legitimate agitation and for constitutional remedy, but not for agitation, for the setting of Protestant against Catholic and Catholic against Protestant. I say this in order to call the attention of the House to the advanced position that our people hold in this country. It is true that lately not only has my attention been called to the extreme advance made by some hon. gentlemen wearing the shamrock here, but I find the hon. gentlemen pitching into the leader of the Government and asking how it is that the Hon. John O'Donohoe is not in the Cabinet to-day. Why, Sir, he is not going to allow the Government to neglect the rights and privileges of the class to which I belong; no, Sir, he will hold the Government to strict account. What a pity it was, when Sir John resigned in 1873, and when the leader of the party opposite was called on to form a Government out of very scarce material, that the Hon. Timothy Anglin, who had contributed so much to their success by his personal influence and the influence of his paper, which was then the accepted organ of the Irish Catholics in the Lower Provinces, was left out? What a favorable opportunity that would have been to recognise those rights and privileges which he holds so dear now, but which were not held to be so important at that time. He cannot, I am sure, plead that the difficulty was that there were so many able aspirants claiming positions that some had to be set aside. No, Sir; because he had really to go outside of his own party and take two deserters from our party to form his Government. Even they were considered preferable to the most faithful supporters if they happened to be Irish Catholics. We also hear about Orange influence in this country; and I believe I have received a new appellation—I am an Orange Catholic or a Catholic Orangeman, I do not know which, and thinking men are asked to believe that every member of this Cabinet, who is a Catholic, is a traitor to that religion and is under the influence of the Orange institution. Well, it is a pity that those gentlemen who use this argument do not show a little more prudence and judgment. One time in this House I was attacked by Mr. Anglin because I was invited to speak on one occasion in the constituency of my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. White); and because he happened to be an Orangeman, that hon. gentleman, to whom I alluded before, thought it was a great crime, and so characterised it in his newspaper, but it lost all its force when I showed that he had gone to Pisarinco, and stood upon an Orange platform there, and appealed to the Orange vote to support him in his election. I can also recall to hon. gentlemen opposite that when the screws were put on the Government of the day to keep Anglin out, they did not think there was anything unholy in the alliance between themselves and Mr. Piekard, a gentleman whose name I mention with great respect, for whom personally I had high regard as a worthy man.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. COSTIGAN. What am I to understand by the hon. gentleman's "hear, hear?" Does he doubt the sincerity of the allusion I make?

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Or is he astounded that I can say a generous word of an opponent.

Mr. MILLS. We heard the hon. gentleman's extreme generosity declared some years ago.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman perhaps will hear it again. As I have said before, it shows the want of sincerity in the party. I make no allusion to hon. gentlemen of the House, because it would be unparliamentary to say they lacked sincerity; but taking the party as a whole, the arguments they used before the people are not defensible at all, and I have just shown a strong instance of their want of sincerity when the whole cry of these papers, the Toronto Globe, Montreal Post, and others, was that this Government is being ruled with a rod of iron by the Orange element, and that therefore the Government must be replaced by these hon. gentlemen opposite. If we were to change sides, Sir, to-morrow, these gentlemen would be just as different from what they are, according to their professions, as they were when they came back before, with their fine promises of reform, integrity, purity of elections, and raising the political standard.

After Recess.

Mr. COSTIGAN. When you left the Chair, Sir, at six o'clock, I was endeavoring to point out the inconsistency of the policy pursued by the opposite party in trying to shake the confidence of the people in the Administration of the day. I found fault particularly with the means employed in order to arrive at that end, and I was dwelling on the fact that there was no appeal to the intelligence of the people in order to withdraw their confidence in the Government, but that, on the contrary, all the appeals made were appeals to the prejudices of different sections. I had referred to the fact that to-day Opposition newspapers and orators all over the country were denouncing what they called the unholy alliance between the Orange element and the Roman Catholics, and I claimed that that policy should not be pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite. I gave some reasons, and I propose to give others, for this contention. I propose to show that they have no right to make such appeals to the prejudices of the people, or to charge any element with such an alliance as is consistent with the rights of any individual in the country. When these gentlemen were in power in years gone by, they were very well pleased to accept the support of that body which they now characterise as inimical to Catholic interests and productive of sectional discord. If the majority of the Orange body in Ontario are Conservatives, I suppose they are so from conviction; but, on the other hand, hon. gentlemen opposite have got the almost unanimous support of those of that body who live in the Maritime Provinces, and they do not look upon that support as an unholy alliance. I am sure if the Orangemen were to tender their unanimous support to the leader of the Opposition he would not reject it. Having spoken on platforms in Ontario during some political discussions, I have reason to know what the impressions of hon. gentlemen opposite were with regard to the alliance between the Ontario Conservatives and the Quebec Bleus. On every platform where the name of French Conservative was mentioned, it was only mentioned to be coupled with epithets of abuse and slander. The Province of Quebec and its majority were held up as an element of discord in this country, which was feeding and living at our expense, and was destructive to the best interests of the country. The Quebec Bleus were considered as an element fostered by the leader of this Government, and ruling this Government, and through the Government the country with an unscrupulous hand—not only that, but that they were even filling the Province of Ontario, which would soon be overrun by them. To-day, however, I am sure, if anyone could authoritatively state to the leader of the Opposition that the French Bleus were willing to tender their support to him, he would not fail to receive them with open arms. That is why I say there is no justification for these appeals to prejudice, for this exciting one nationality against another, one creed against another, one Province against another. Every hon. member in this House will, if he goes back, find that such policy has been the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite since they first took seats in this Parliament after Confederation. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) in his speech the other day, made allusion to the position of the Orange element and that of the Catholic element as a plain indication of what we might have to expect in the future. He tried to establish that the Orange element was ruling the Government of the day, that they were inimical, not only to the Catholic but also to the best interests of the country. I have heard this repeated before, but I may say to these hon. gentlemen that while they use such arguments they will have to go further before they commence to convince the people of their sincerity; they will have to establish, not that there are political defects in this party, but that they are prepared to initiate a better policy themselves, and to do this they will have to go beyond their past record in connection with every public question ever discussed in this country; on the Separate Schools of New Brunswick question, the record of these hon. gentlemen will not bear scrutiny at all. Take the question of disallowance in this Parliament. What did we hear from the whole of Ontario? This Government has been through the platforms and the press abused without measure for having disallowed measures which had been passed by the Local Legislature. But the hon. the leader of the Opposition will pursue any policy, so long as it is calculated to serve his political purposes. For instance, what did they do on the motion in connection with the New Brunswick school laws? While they were sitting on the other side, longing for the Treasury benches, looking out eagerly for any means of crossing the chasm which separated them from office, the only means they thought likely to defeat the Government was to vote for my motion on the New Brunswick school question, and they did so almost to a man. What was the tenor of that motion? It was that the duty of the Government was to advise His Excellency to disallow the legislation of New Brunswick. These are the gentlemen into whose keeping the Montreal Post and such organs advise the Catholics to place their interests in the future. What did these hon. gentlemen do when they crossed to this side? The very gentlemen who recorded their votes in favor of disallowance turned round and voted against the motion to give separate schools to New Brunswick. Talk about the subserviency of French Conservatives to their leaders. Is it not known that when this question was up before Parliament the French Conservatives voted to a man, with the exception of four, to give to the minority of New Brunswick the same rights as those enjoyed by the minority of Quebec and Ontario? And what did the hon. gentlemen on the other side do? When the day had been fixed for discussing this question and bringing it to a close, when the leader of the Government of the day found that the sympathy of the House was with the resolution I had moved, an adjournment was moved, a caucus was held, and these gentlemen were whipped into submission, and came back tamely to vote against their former proposition, to vote against doing justice to the people of New Brunswick; and this included the French Liberal members from the Province of Quebec, these gentlemen who have such uncomplimentary remarks to apply to the Irish people of that Province. Take the old school question as it was discussed in the old Province of Canada, before I had the pleasure of a seat in this House. They did the same thing then, and, yet, to-day we have gentlemen on that side of the House claiming that the Catholics are under everlasting obligations to the Liberal party in Ontario for obtaining separate schools. That is not the case, and to-day there are Catholics supporting those gentlemen, who believe that these gentlemen contributed to obtain for them separate schools in the Province of Ontario. There is no foundation for that. The party was then as hostile to separate schools as any party has ever been in Canada. It was against their principles, it was against their platform, it was against the principles laid down by the principal organ at that time, the Toronto Globe. In this debate, great stress has been laid upon an article or two which appeared in a certain newspaper, one to be used among the Irish element and the other among the French element. I refer to the one specially which was to be used among the Irish. I dare say some capital will be sought to be made out of that. All I have to say about that article, or about other articles which have appeared in the Mail newspaper, or in other newspapers, is that I do not feel responsible for such articles. I recognise the fact that the Toronto Mail is known to be an organ in sympathy with the general policy of the Government of the day, that it is ably conducted, is, I believe, a very intelligent newspaper, and that it is widely circulated; but, even though going that far, no one will say that every member of the Government must be committed to every article that appears in a newspaper. The different newspapers supporting the Government, agreeing with its general policy, may publish an article as their opinion which does not bind the Government. If the Government acts upon that, and endorses that, it makes itself responsible for it. The Toronto Globe could not by its publications of former days have committed the Liberal party to the violent attacks upon our people if the Liberal party had not acted upon that ground on every platform throughout the country, so that they accepted that policy and acted upon it. But in order to show that I do not think that any one should be frightened or driven away from the Conservative rank by any remarks that may be construed as uncomplimentary to the Irish race, let us see what the Globe might say if the Irish people incurred its displeasure, what it did say when its displeasure was incurred and when it was determined to override the influence of that element in this country. The charge is that the Mail has insinuated that the Irish element in this country is ignorant, when compared with other elements. For my part, I think that is an overdrawn conclusion from that article, having read it; but I think this article from the Globe will leave less doubt as to its meaning, and I do not think it will require much discussion to find what the opinion of the Globe was of the Irish people of that day:

"The ignorance and degradation of the priests, form the gloomer aspect of the picture. Springing from the lowest class of poverty they are notoriously illiterate and immoral. So deeply rooted has this notion of their debasement become in the popular mind, that when a boy is unruly and his parents have failed in persuading him to learn some honest trade, they frequently consider the Church their last and only resource. Their idea is embodied in a current proverb which may be rendered in English to the complete:

'Vicious and ignorant, gluttinous beast,
Nothing remains but to make him a priest.'

This is some of the Globe literature. I think it will leave very little doubt as to the opinion of the Globe and of its followers in regard to the Irish of that day.

Mr. HOLTON. When was that written?

Mr. COSTIGAN. In 1856.

An hon. MEMBER. Before the flood.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It was before the flood that occurred when these gentlemen were turned out, before the flood of indignation which they caused in this country when they drove the support of that intelligent element in the country from their ranks.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Give us something later.

Mr. COSTIGAN. One of the hon. gentlemen who interrupts me, and laughs, thinks it is a good joke. He forgets that he lives in a glass house himself. He went into the Province of Quebec trying to excite the passions of the people, but he dare not show his nose again in the constituency he represents.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The member for Megantic. It would take in the other counties, but not in his own. With regard to the question of separate schools itself, I will quote the observation from the same newspaper in order to meet the arguments that the separate school system was due to the liberality of the Reform party, and, having quoted that, I think nothing further will be necessary to settle that question. I might go on to quote articles from that paper which were written to excite the animosity of the majority against the minority in the Province of Ontario, but, as I desire to finish very quickly, I will not. I will only give one quotation, which I think is quite sufficient. At the time of the discussion in regard to the settlement of the terms upon which these Provinces should be united, I read from an extract from a speech delivered by the Hon. George Brown, when they were discussing that clause in the terms of Confederation which guarantees to the minority their rights regarding separate schools. He said:

"I need hardly remind the House that I have always opposed, and continue to oppose the system of sectarian education. I admit that from my point of view this is a blot on the scheme before the House; it is, confessedly, one of the concessions from outside that had to be made in order to secure this great measure of reform, but assuredly I, for one, have not the slightest hesitation in accepting it as a necessary condition of the scheme of union, and doubly acceptable must it be in the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite (the Conservative party), who were the authors of the Bill of 1863."

I think that proves conclusively that the Reform party or their friends have no right, in any part of Ontario, in any part of this country, to hold themselves up as the champions of the separate school system, which the people of the Province of Ontario happily enjoy at present. Now, I will refer to what I thought was the inconsistency of the hon. leader of the Opposition, in calling this Government to account for not having gone further than it did in the direction of recognising the claims of the Irish Catholics of this country. We all know that he took a deep interest in ascertaining why the Hon. John O'Donohoe was not to-day in the Cabinet. I sympathised with the hon. gentleman in the interest he expressed, and I have no doubt he feels greatly disappointed that the interests of our people have been so far neglected. In alluding to the hon. Senator O'Donohoe, whose name has already been introduced here, I may say that I have a great regard for him, and I think if he were in the Cabinet, he would discharge the duties of Minister well; but though his position in the Senate to-day is not what his talents and ability might entitle him to, yet I do say this, that unless the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite had changed very rapidly and materially, he would have continued a long time in their ranks before he would have been appointed a Senator. Now, the hon. gentleman opposite made it a great crime and tried to excite the prejudices of the Irish Catholic Conservatives by crying out against us that we are bought up, that we are traitors. Well, Sir, I do not want to interfere with the opinions of any Irish Catholics, or Protestants, or any other man who thinks he is discharging his public duties in giving his confidence to that party, and I claim no right to interfere, but I claim the right for myself and those who support the Conservative party, to be credited with as worthy motives in giving our support to this side, as hon. gentlemen may claim for giving theirs to the other side. But I say, as a result of this unholy alliance, as they pronounce it, between the Orange element and the Green, that we can at any rate say that we are making some progress toward a fair recognition of our race and creed in this country, a much greater progress than has ever been made by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. Let them ask an Irish Catholic in this House to rise up and defend their policy and justify it. Let them not trust to newspapers, who to-day turn round and laud them to the skies for qualities they do not possess. No, Sir, their policy has not resulted in granting to our people any fair representation in this hall, and when they try to vindicate their policy so far as our interests are concerned they will have to do it with their own organs if they have any legitimate ones who claim to speak for our people. Now, I say that the policy of the Conservative party has resulted in giving us representation in Parliament, representation in Cabinet, representation in the Senate, and a liberal share—and I trust that share will still grow larger—a liberal share of the more important offices in the disposition of the Government of the day, and a very liberal share of the minor offices. I say boldly, and without fear of contradiction, that the right and interest of our element have been recognised to a greater extent within the last five years than ever before since Confederation; I say there has been more important positions given to our people within these few years than at any time since Confederation. Therefore I say our policy is a wise one, is a proof that there is nothing unholy about the alliance between Irish Catholics and the Orange or the Presbyterian or the Baptist or any other element. Our policy is for every public man in this country to meet every man and every element upon the same platform to discuss the affairs of the nation in the interests of the country, and if we can cultivate a friendly feeling; if we can make harmony reign instead of confusion, jealousy and bickerings between the different elements, surely we are right and those gentlemen are wrong. Therefore, I have no reason to feel ashamed if I am branded with being a traitor to my people and having betrayed their interest and turned Orangeman. I differ with Protestants conscientiously, but I agree to differ with them, and I am willing, as every intelligent man in this country ought to be willing, to give to them what I ask for myself—the right of acting conscientiously according to my honest convictions. Now, Sir, another remark and I have done. An appeal was made to me that I ought to be the last man to resist this movement, this popular wave that went through the country in favor of Louis Riel; that I myself had raised my voice in this Parliament for mercy, and that I should not forget that. I do not forget it, Mr. Speaker, I do not forget that I raised my voice for an Irishman in this Parliament; but I would ask any hon. gentleman who was in this House at that time if, in raising my voice for an Irishman as I did, I asked if he should be specially treated. Did I ask that the French prisoners who had been sentenced should suffer a certain penalty, and that my protégé because he was an Irishman should be let off with a slight punishment, or go scot free? No, Sir, I raised my voice because I was deeply moved upon the subject, and because the same punishment had not been meted out to this Irishman that had been meted out to the others; and because hon. gentlemen on the other side, sitting on the Treasury Benches at that time, and controlling the Government of the country refused to do justice—those who, not long before, had raised a cry through Ontario—not that law and order should be maintained, not that Canadian justice should be satisfied, but that the people of Ontario must be avenged for the murder of Scott in the the North-West. That was his platform—not broad enough to take in all the country, but confined to that Province, and for a political purpose. I say that when those gentlemen came upon the Treasury benches, they proposed to carry a measure of amnesty in this Parliament. That amnesty provided for the expatriation of the most guilty of the rebels at that time excepting the unfortunate O'Donohue, and what was his sentence? The others were expatriated for five years, at the end of which time they could return, but this man was banished for all time. And yet these hon. gentlemen opposite who refused to show mercy then, are now crying out for mercy. That is the reason I raised my voice at the time in favor of this man—it was because those hon. gentlemen excluded that man from the amnesty that was given to others. It was in those days when we were referred to as Dogans in this Parliament. It was then thought that no man would dare raise his voice in favor of that unfortunate man O'Donohue, and when I made a motion in favor of extending equal justice to Prof. O'Donohue, the hon. gentleman called upon his supporters to vote my motion down, and he pointed across the House to me, who was then standing on the other side, and after painting this man in the darkest colors, he said: "This is the man"—alluding to O'Donohue—"for whom the hon. member for Victoria is not ashamed to rise in this place and speak for." No, Mr. Speaker, I never was ashamed of having risen in my place and having spoken for Prof. O'Donohue on that occasion, and if I ever had any doubts that my cause was a strong one, I would have been justified within a few months afterwards when the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), I think it was, sought his election—the hon. gentleman who made an able speech the other night, and because I complimented his friends on that clever speech it was taken as an approval of his opinion. I said, no, you misunderstand me. I give the hon. gentleman credit for having delivered a speech that indicates great study, and a great amount of labor in its preparation, and for having delivered it in a gentlemanly and courteous manner, but if you want to draw any advantage from that, my meaning is that it was a most clever misrepresentation of the whole case. On the former occasion when that hon. gentleman had to go to Quebec for his election, it was found necessary to make extraordinary efforts for his return. Every paper in our interest in the country pointed out the glaring injustice that had been done to Mr. O'Donohue, and so it turned out that what had been refused in the name of justice to the people was granted for a political object and that amnesty was granted then. And those hon. gentlemen are the men who go before the country and traduce and vilify the Government of the day, and tell the people the Government is formed of creatures who can be bullied, cajoled and driven to do anything. Before we are accused and condemned by the country the accusation will have to be made by gentlemen who have given better proof of their own integrity and independence than that which has been given by gentlemen opposite. I do not wish to trespass longer on the time of the House. Some hon. gentlemen may think I have gone aside from the issue; but I think I need only say in response to that objection, that I know it is not only the question of the execution we are discussing here, but that the foundation for a future struggle is being made by hon. gentleman opposite, and as I have been obliged to endure quietly the misrepresentations and calumnies of their organs for twelve months I was satisfied the House would pardon me if I spoke a few words to night.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think it is a very amusing thing to see one Irishman following another; I think it is one of the most natural sight in the world. When one Irishman trails his coat on the path of another and challenges him to come on, the matter for surprise would be if the other Irishman had not something to say on the subject. The Minister of Inland Revenue who has just taken his seat fears he wandered a little from the issue, and I think the fear was perfectly justified by the facts. Instead of dealing with the question before the House, he has led us away into the maze of what, in spite of the protest at the end of his speech, is a totally different question. He evidently, from the tone of his speech, fears more than he would like to admit, the attacks made by the Montreal Post and other Irish papers upon himself, or he would not take so much trouble to interject a speech directed only to the Irish Catholic vote of Canada. I say the hon. gentleman's speech was directed entirely to that vote, and had no bearing whatever on the execution of Riel. I do not think the hon. gentleman has made any strong points in this connection, and if he had not, as I have said, trailed his coat across my path by mentioning my name, I would perhaps have omitted all reference to this incidental Irish row which has sprung during a debate on another subject. He says the leader of the Opposition and myself, for he has done me the honor to couple my name with that of the hon. and distinguished gentleman, used never to have shamrocks in our buttonholes, while now we have developed a strong partiality for shamrocks. I think we have as good a right to wear shamrocks as the hon. member himself. I do not know whether he was born in Ireland; I am told he was not.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No.

Mr. CASEY. Then I think we have as good a right to wear shamrocks as the hon. gentleman, for if we are not Irishmen our fathers and mothers were Irish, and we are Irish too, as the old song says, and are duly qualified to wear shamrocks. For my part I have always worn a shamrock on St. Patrick's Day when I have been able to get one, which has not always been the case in this severe climate. Apart from this question, to which I have alluded as a joke, I will refer to the allegations made by the hon. Minister. He says we are making an unholy and unrighteous alliance with the Bleus of Quebec and with Irish Catholics.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No.

Mr. CASEY. I took the words down, unholy and unrighteous alliance; that we had made it, or were trying to make it—I think the hon. Minister said we were trying to make it. He went on to enlarge at great length on the impropriety of the Opposition doing what he said they were doing, forming an alliance with a portion of the Conservative party. Without discussing the existence of any such alliance I intend to quote other remarks made by the hon. gentleman. In the latter portion of his remarks he said there was nothing unholy about an alliance between Irish Catholics and Orangemen, but that it was perfectly legitimate and patriotic to ally themselves with anybody whose alliance was necessary for the good of the country and to carry on the government of the country. That sounds like a very fine sentiment, and it is, I believe, a sound sentiment; but it is in very marked contrast with the sentiment expressed in the earlier part of the hon. gentleman's speech. His position reminded me very much of an hotel-keeper I heard of in one of the Western States, where there was a large Irish settlement and an extremely patriotic settlement of native-born Americans. The tavern-keeper, wishing to stand equally well with both sections of the community, put up a sign-board with the elaborate motto: "Erin go unum, e pluribus bragh." By this ingenious blending of the American national motto with that of Ireland, the hotel-keeper managed to secure very considerable custom, and I am really afraid the Minister's speech to-night will be viewed by the people as an attempt to blend the Orange and Green mottoes in something the same fashion. I do not know exactly how it can be worked out; how the "immortal memory" and other mottoes could be got together, to work together on the same sign-board; but I am afraid the Minister has tried to make a sign-board of that sort, one equally in favor of the Orange and the Green. Again, the hon. gentleman told us that the Irish Catholics had been very ill-treated by us and that they, the Conservatives, on the other hand, had done everything right and good for them. If my memory does not fail me, a couple of years ago, when the hon. gentleman resigned, or stepped out, or was pushed out, or started to climb out, or whatever it was—I refer to the time when he was supposed to have one foot in the Cabinet and the other out of it, I cannot define his position, for it has not been defined to this House—his sentiment was not quite the same as it is now. I think we were given to understand that he complained that the Government, of which he still remains a member, was not so favorable as it should be to the claims of Irish Roman Catholics. But the hon. gentleman endeavors to make a great point in regard to the New Brunswick School Bill, and charges inconsistency against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, because, as he says, we seemed to have voted in two opposite directions. But he has not put the case fairly to the House. It will be remembered that the first motion was a motion to ask the Government to disallow the Act passed by the New Brunswick Legislature, and for particular reasons existing at the time, this case being under the consideration of the Privy Council as to the constitutionality of the Act, the House did strongly support that motion. But on the other occasion to which he refers his motion was not a motion of the same sort, a motion asking for disallowance; it was a motion praying "That Her Majesty will be pleased to cause an Act to be passed amending the British North America Act by providing that the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick shall have the same rights and privileges, &c., as the people of the other Provinces." It was in fact a motion to ask the Imperial Parliament to amend the British North America Act for the sake of arriving at a certain object in a certain Province, an object which a majority of the people of that Province, whether rightly or wrongly—wrongly as I believe—had declared they did not wish to have attained. It was moved in amendment by Mr. Cauchon, seconded by the present leader of the Opposition, to the following effect:

"That on the 29th May, 1872, the House of Commons adopted the following resolution: 'This House regrets that the School Act recently passed in New Brunswick is unsatisfactory to a portion of the inhabitants of that Province, and hopes that it may be so modified during the next Session of Legislature of New Brunswick as to remove any just grounds of dissatisfaction that now exists.' That this House regrets that the hope expressed in the said resolution has not been realised. And that an humble Address be presented to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen embodying this resolution and praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to use Her influence with the Legislature of New Brunswick to procure such a modification of the said Act as shall remove such grounds of complaint."

That motion was carried by a very large majority of the House, composed of Protestants and Catholics, without regard to religion. The resolution proposed to ask the Imperial Government to exercise any legitimate influence they might have with the New Brunswick Government to secure what was desired rather than to ask the Queen to break up the Confederation Act for the sake of attaining a particular object in a particular Province, and it was supported by a large majority. I think the hon. gentleman cannot charge us with inconsistency with regard to this question. Now, as to what the hon. Minister says about O'Donohue, it is a dead issue. The man has long ago been pardoned, and as an hon. friend beside me says, he has left this world entirely, but the issue was dead long before the man was. The question never had anything in it but an attempt to get up a little local race sympathy for political purposes. The attempt to stir up political prejudice was all on the side of those who made a special point about O'Donohue, and when it was found that the case was not as special as it was supposed to be in the first instance, the man received his pardon at a subsequent period. Now, I come to what the hon. Minister said about the question before the House—but I find I have not any notes on that subject, as he said nothing about it. I will pass, therefore, to what some other hon. gentlemen have said in regard to this question, and I shall not spend a great deal of time on it either. The Minister of Justice regretted in opening his speech that it should be his first duty, in his first speech in this House, to express disapproval of the manner in which the debate was being conducted, and the case presented to the House. Now, as has been pointed out already, by these remarks of his, he expresses disapproval of the course of the Government. He assures us that the Government did not fix a day for the discussion, or fix the form in which the resolution should be presented. We may take his word as to what passed before the resolution was laid on the Table, but we know from our own records that after the resolution was proposed the Government, by the mouth of the Premier himself, did fix a day for the discussion. Afterwards the Government, by the mouth of the Minister of Public Works, fixed the form in which the House should decide this question, by moving a resolution, which compelled the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny, (Mr. Landry) to be voted upon in the form in which it actually stood. The Government said in effect this is the shape in which it suits us to have the discussion on this question and have a vote upon it, and we will stereotype it in that shape and not allow it to be voted upon in any other. The Government did then fix the day for the discussion and did fix the form of the motion. I quite agree with the Minister in objecting to the course which his colleagues pursued in this matter. He no doubt still entertains the same opinion, and if he feels that the case is presented to the House in an improper form, and that the discussion has not been such as it should be, he will no doubt join with us on this side of the House in voting against the previous question, and that the question shall not now be put to the House, and shall not be put to the House until it is put in such a shape as to satisfy the Minister of Justice himself. But with all this protesting he proceeded, Sir, somewhat in the manner of a lady celebrated in poetry, for he, "while vowing we should not discuss, discussed it." He went on and discussed the question at greater length and with greater clearness and with greater thoroughness than any hon. gentleman on that side of the House. As to the propriety of discussing such a question here, there is room for argument on general principles as I think the House have discovered already. It seems undoubtedly the right of the House to criticise any act performed by the Cabinet as a Cabinet. But we need not go into these general principles to prove that it is proper to discuss this question here, to prove that the Government expected the discussion of it because we have in the Government's pamphlet, published by Sir Alexander Campbell before the House met, a challenge in these words: Referring to the charge of having excited the rebellion, Sir Alexander says:

"Upon such a charge, when made in a constitutional manner, the Government will be responsible to the representatives of the people, and before them they will be prepared to meet and disprove it.

"Appeals to the animosities of race have been made in one of the Provinces with momentary success. Should those prevail, the future of the country must suffer. Parliament will not meet for some time, and in the interval, unless some action is taken to remove these animosities, they will gain ground, and it will become more difficult to dispel belief in the grounds which are used to provoke them.

"It is thought right, therefore, that the true facts of the case, and the considerations which have influenced the Government, should be known, so that those who desire to judge of their conduct impartially, may have the information which is essential for that purpose."

And then, the ex-Minister of Justice goes on to discuss the question of the case of Louis Riel, convicted of treason, at the length of a great many pages. Still more; the hon. Minister of Public Works accepted the challenge, and appeared to approve of the discussion. If a House divided against itself it is on very shaky foundations. I fear the House in which hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches now live must be considered shaky, when we find two such prominent members of the Cabinet disagreeing on a question of this kind. Then, Sir, he told us we were unreasonable in asking for all the papers we did ask for; he told us we had papers enough; then he said there were a number of papers that should not be brought down at all; and then he proceeded to show that we had not all the papers—that we had not even all the papers necessary to form a correct opinion on the question—by reading papers, which were then for the first time presented to the House, and which he evidently considered necessary to a decision, or he would not have read them to the House on that occasion. He has, therefore, established our position completely in regard to the papers. But, as the hon. leader of the Opposition has pointed out, it is not that they have refused these papers hitherto, but that they have promised to give them and have not done so. They promised them in this pamphlet from which I have quoted, before the House met; they have promised them ever since the House met; but they have failed to keep their promises; they have not even kept them "to-morrow." But, Sir, the hon. Minister of Justice said: "Why, I have laid such and such papers on the Table of the House—the judge's charge and some others;" but when did he lay them on the Table of the House? Before the discussion began? Not at all. Some of them just before the discussion commenced, some of them during the discussion, and some no doubt will be laid on the Table the moment the discussion is over; and yet we are asked to consider this a submission of the papers to the House. It may sound very well in the country to say that papers were laid on the Table, and hon. gentlemen opposite may count on sufficient ignorance among some people to lead them to believe that we had the papers; but every member of this House knows, and everyone in the country should know, that no paper is fairly before this House until it is printed and distributed to members, and until they have some days to consider it if it is of any importance. Papers laid on the Table may perhaps be seen by one or two members on each side; but it is impossible for those who have to decide by their votes on those papers, to see them until they are printed and distributed. Then, Sir, the argument has been used by the hon. gentleman which is very commonly used also by the Conservative newspapers, that we should not complain of the lack of papers when we form opinions and express them in the vigorous manner in which we do in and out of the House.—

Mr. HESSON.—What papers?

Mr. CASEY.—The Montreal Gazette, for instance, expressed this opinion on the very day on which the hon. Minister of Justice expressed it in the House. The arguments were identical, and were equally weak, with all due deference to the hon. Minister of Justice and the Montreal Gazette. The argument is extremely weak. It amounts to saying, unless you have all the evidence you want in order to form a correct opinion, you must have no opinion at all. That is absurd; we cannot help having an opinion. If we are not supplied with all the evidence necessary to form a correct opinion, we must form an opinion on the information we have. It may possibly be an erroneous opinion; if so, it will be the fault of those who refuse to give us the papers. It may possibly be a correct opinion, but we are deprived of the material necessary to prove it to be such. The hon. gentleman laid a great deal of stress on the legality of the trial, and on the fact that the law, under which that trial was held, was passed by the Government of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie). He said all that could be asked of the Government was that it should administer British law and British fair play. He could not understand how the Government could be condemned if the trial was legal according to the statutes in force. Well, Sir, in the first place, it was not British law. Will any man in this House say that a trial conducted by a stipendiary magistrate, and an assistant Justice of the Peace, with six jurors, is British law?

Mr. RYKERT. It is your own law.

Mr. CASEY. Will even the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) say that is British law? Can he show me any statute permitting a trial for life and death before such a tribunal? Can he show it in any British colony outside of the North-West Territories? And the hon. gentleman evidently considers it a sufficient answer to say, you passed the law.

An hon. MEMBER. You voted for it.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think there was any division about it, and hon. gentlemen opposite were quite as responsible for not objecting to that law as we were. But admitting that we were solely responsible for the law at that time, the circumstances of the country were so extremely different from what they are now that the comparison falls to the ground. At that time there were scarcely any white settlers in the North-West Territories outside of the Province of Manitoba; there was scarcely anybody in the country but half-breeds, Indians and Hudson Bay Company employees; there was no railway within hundreds of miles; there were no means of getting a jury of twelve persons together on short notice, and no certainty that any jury of twelve persons could be got together. Now what is the case? Of course the people are not so numerous as the late Minister of Agriculture led us to expect; but there are 20,000 or 30,000 white people in the Territories, and they are scattered along the lines of railway and pretty contiguous to them. This has been the case for three or four years back; and yet did these hon. gentlemen, who now say that we are responsible for that law, take any means to change it or to procure for the British subject in the North-West Territories that fair play which he gets everywhere else under the flag of Britain? No, Sir; they rearranged and adopted the law as it was, and took no means to adapt it to the altered conditions of the country. They and they only are responsible for the existence of that law in its present state at the time Louis Riel was tried. If it were only last Session, why did they not change it last Session? The hon. the Minister of Justice began a quotation from the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, at London, in which the latter expressed a partial exoneration of the Government from any grave scandal in regard to this law, except for the fact that they might have changed the law even since the commission of the crime. The Minister of Justice appeared to think that the leader of the Opposition had exonerated the Government from blame in the matter, whereas he had instead simply made the point which is evident that the Government could have changed the law even after the crime had been committed. The Minister of Justice said that would be making post facto legislation. Could any statement be more absurd, when it is considered that the crime committed, that of treason, was one which had never been committed before in the Territories, and which, it was never contemplated would be tried before such a tribunal when the present law was made? What then more rational than to adapt, even at the last moment, the legal machinery of the country to suit the trial of this new crime? Could not the Government have provided a judge in the same way as other judges are provided? Could they not have provided for the attendance of twelve jurymen and for the administration of the ordinary British justice which is administered every where else in the empire? Now that this case has been tried and considerable agitation and discussion created concerning it, the law in the Territories will probably be changed, and the Government will probably bring down some new provision which they should have made before the trial occurred. I am not implying that necessarily the man was wrongly condemned, but it is quite evident the public cannot regard the sentence of that court with the same confidence as they would that of an ordinary court. Had the Government desired to strengthen their position, they would have taken pains to see that this criminal had a trial like other criminals.

Mr. HESSON. Was the trial unfair?

Mr. CASEY. I am not discussing whether the trial was unfair or not, because that point has been fully discussed by my hon. friends. I leave the country to decide on the argument already advanced; my point is that the people, as laymen, have not the confidence they ought to have as to the fairness of the trial which took place. It may have been fair or not, but nobody can be sure it was as fair as if Riel had been tried before an ordinary British court of justice. I shall not take up any more points of the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice, because his speech has been very fully dealt with by others; but in regard to this whole discussion I must say that I approached the consideration of the question when I came down here with those prejudices which, I fear, are natural to most English speaking people in this matter. From the first, I had very grave doubts as to the sanity of Riel, doubts which I think would have probably moved me, if I had a voice in deciding the matter, to vote against his execution, but my doubts were not so strong as to allow me to go the length of condemning the Government for their action if it had been taken in good faith. I am sorry to have to state my conviction now that the Government did not act in good faith; at all events that good faith on their part is so very far from being proven, that the presumption of it is not admissible. I am convinced that they acted from other motives than those of justice; I am convinced they acted from political motives, and therefore are not to be excused on the ground of error in judgment or of having acted in good faith to the best of their ability. I have also, since this debate began, listened to a good many arguments which were not known to me before, and those arguments and the facts stated have had the effect of changing my opinion on the case almost entirely from what it was when I first approached it. As I say, I had doubts as to the sanity of the man, but no doubts as to the propriety of his execution on other grounds. At present, with the evidence we have before us, with the precedents quoted by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), and by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), with the arguments based on those precedents before us, with such evidence as the Government has allowed us to see—with all these, I am compelled to come to the conclusion not only that Riel was insane, but that the policy of executing him was a mistaken one; that it is an action not warranted by modern precedent to hang the leader of an insurrection after the insurrection has been successfully put down, unless there are such very special circumstances as to make the execution necessary to public safety. I will not go into details of my reasons for coming to this conviction, because you have all listened to the speeches, and will know to what I refer, when I say the facts and speeches quoted by them, caused me to form this opinion. It results from those precedents relating to British practice in modern years, which prove, as I have said, an insurgent is prima facie not to be hanged, and, as a matter of fact, is not hanged in English practice; that, therefore, the burden of proof lies on the Government to show why they did hang this insurgent leader. There was no attempt made to show this until the Minister of Justice made his speech, and although it was an extremely able and exhaustive speech, I confess it had not the effect of destroying in my mind the conviction created by the other speeches to which I referred. It is somewhat unusual on the floor of this House to talk of opinions being changed during a debate; we generally approach a question with our opinions made up, and only debate it for the sake of its effect on the country, but this is undoubtedly a remarkable debate which affects the opinions and votes of members of the House. It has affected my opinion and will affect my vote, and I have not the slightest doubt it has affected the opinions and will affect the votes of many hon. members. No doubt I will be charged with giving this vote for a political purpose, no doubt I will be charged with giving my vote for the sake of political effect, but I have a constituency which the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government was kind enough to form into what is called a hive in which he was kind enough to put a tremendous Reform majority, not necessarily for me, but for some candidate, and I think the member representing such a county as that need hardly be accused of trying to make political capital by his vote. In fact, the vote would be likely to make political capital for me the wrong way. If any prejudice would be excited in the minds of my constituents by this vote, it would, at all events on the first thought, be a prejudice against me. But I believe that the people of Ontario at large are as open to conviction as members of this House, that the opinions as to the advisability of this deed will be as various throughout the country as they are here, that they will not be confined to party lines, that many of both parties will condemn and many of both parties will defend the execution of Riel, and that, when the debate is over here, and when we have time to look at the matter in a serious, thoughtful mood, apart from the mist of political excitement, it will be regarded by the people in the country, as it is coming to be regarded in this House, not as a party question, but as a judicial one, on which we are asked to express our opinion in a calm, judicial mood, without regard to race feeling or party leanings. I said a little while ago that the assumption of good faith on the part of the Government could scarcely be sustained by the facts. I think my assertion is backed up, not only by their conduct since the sentence and since the execution of Riel, but by their past record during and after the first insurrection which was headed by that unfortunate man. We have to look for a moment at that record to see whether they can be acting in good faith now. It is a very marked feature in this debate that it seems to be the opinion of all the gentlemen sitting behind hon. Ministers who have spoken on this question that the death of Thomas Scott had a great deal to do with the question whether Riel should be hanged now or not. That is really the crucial question in this case, that he might have been let off if he had not killed Thomas Scott. What is the record of those hon. gentlemen in regard to the death of Thomas Scott? When Riel was alleged to be guilty of a causeless murder of that kind, when he was sought to be put upon his trial in order to see whether he was guilty or not of that, the present leader of the Government sent money to aid in the escape of that fugitive from justice from the Province of Manitoba. The Premier, whose friends now—for he has not spoken on the subject himself—urge that Riel was properly hanged because he then killed Thomas Scott, at that time assisted him to escape from the country, when he was, as those hon. gentlemen allege, a red-handed murderer, when he was, as everybody believes, in a position to more richly deserve hanging than on the present occasion.

An. hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member says "no." He does not think he was more guilty when he killed Scott than on the present occasion. I am astonished to hear that: I should have thought that the unprovoked murder of an unoffending citizen would appear to the mind of the hon. gentleman a crime richly deserving hanging, and it is in that light that hon. gentlemen on that side of the House invariably regard the killing of Scott. When I say that the Minister of Justice, at the time the predecessor many years ago of the hon. gentleman who addressed the House yesterday, then and now the Premier, gave money to assist in the escape of a man who was alleged to be a murderer, and was afterwards proved to be a murderer in the legal sense, what opinion can we have of the good faith of that gentleman when he defends the recent execution?

Mr. HESSON. Your party amnestied him.

Mr. CASEY. If a private person, who assists a man charged with murder to escape from the country, is regarded as an accomplice, in what light can the Minister of Justice be regarded when he assists a murderer to escape? Can we regard him in any other light than that of an accomplice after the fact?

Mr. HESSON. Who amnestied the murderer?

Mr. CASEY. We are coming to that in good time.

Mr. HESSON. Come to it now.

Mr. CASEY. I say that the Ministry then, through the Premier, made themselves the accomplices of Riel in the acts of which he was guilty at that time. Still more, when Archbishop Taché was sent to negotiate this exodus of Riel from Manitoba, Riel told him he would not take this money or go out of this country unless he was to be regarded as a public servant, that he was leaving in the service of the Dominion of Canada, and that the money he was to receive was a salary as a public servant and not a bribe to leave the country. The condition was agreed to; Riel accepted the money, not as a bribe, but as a salary, as he called it; he was escorted out of Manitoba by a squad of police, and he remained in the United States in the pay of the Government of this country. After a time he returned to Manitoba, and made arrangements to run for the county of Provencher. A seat being required for the late Sir George Cartier, arrangements were made by Lieutenant Governor Archibald, at the request of the Premier, to secure his retirement from the contest.

An hon. MEMBER. He was running in the interests of the Grit party then.

Mr. CASEY. At that time he was running in intimate association with the present member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), who can hardly be looked upon as a member of the Grit party, and to him, as well as to Riel himself, were the thanks of the Government telegraphed when Riel had retired, and had done the Government the great service of abandoning the seat in favor of one of its members. A Government that can make this man a public servant when he is lying under a charge of murder, a Government that can accept a favor at his hands when he is lying under a charge of murder, in the year 1871 or 1872, is not in a position to say now that Riel's past record, that the killing of Scott in the spring of 1870 is a reason for considering his offences of last summer more aggravated than they otherwise would have been considered, that his past record was so bad as to justify his execution now. My hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Hesson) wanted to know who amnestied him. Well, Sir, it was distinctly proven before a committee of this House in 1874 that an amnesty full and complete to all concerned in that rebellion was promised by the leader of the Government, by Sir George E. Cartier, and other members of that Government.

Mr. BOWELL. No, nothing of the kind.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister of Customs says "no." It is true I have no testimony to put against him, except that of an archbishop, a priest or two, and a few delegates from Manitoba. If the hon. Minister does not think the testimony of those gentlemen, given under oath, is trustworthy I leave him to fight it out with them. But I know these facts were sworn to by these parties. I will quote a letter from Sir George Cartier, giving the facts in regard to the election. In writing to His Grace Archbishop Taché, he said:

"I presume your Grace is one of the friends who got me elected in Provencher; accept my sincere thanks. Give thanks for me to all friends, and especially to those who were more instrumental in securing election. I am leaving for England for brief visit for my health; will send letters of thanks before leaving.

His Grace goes on to say:

"In reference to communications with members of the Government I forgot to mention one thing that occurred on the 15th August, 1873. In an interview with Sir John A. Macdonald in Ottawa, he told me there were some communications received from England to the effect that they were allowed to publish an amnesty to all excepting those concerned in the execution of Thomas Scott. 'This,' he added, 'is not what you wish. I will go to England immediately after the Session, and I am sure they will settle the question of the amnesty."

Those are the words of Sir John A. Macdonald, sworn to by Archbishop Taché. He afterwards wrote a letter to Mr. Langevin, which he quotes.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not deny that.

Mr. CASEY—

"Mr. Taché told me that Mr. Langevin had requested him to telegraph me. Sir John and Mr. Langevin went to the Palace, but I was already gone to the departmental buildings to see them."

The Archbishop was staying at the Bishop's Palace here.

"Mr. Langevin came to me there and told me Sir John was in his office waiting for me. I accompanied Mr. Langevin to Sir John. The conversation began on the election of Riel for the vacant seat in Provencher. They both insisted on the propriety of Riel not running for that election, but being replaced by one of his friends. I answered that I would not interfere any more, that I had been deceived too often. They insisted, and Sir John A. Macdonald said again that he would go to England after the Session and secure the amnesty. There was a long talk, and at last I told Sir John that I would not, and could not, do anything in the matter unless he would give me a written guarantee of what he was saying. He said he could not give anything in writing, and he left the place."

It was very like the hon. Premier, very like his characteristic caution, not to put anything in writing. I have also here a note of what the hon. Minister of Public Works said at that time to Archbishop Taché. In this case I can give you the words, not merely of a bystander, but of the hon. gentleman himself. Mr. Langevin himself was examined before the committee in regard to the granting of the amnesty, and he said:

"I knew also that Sir John A. Macdonald, the First Minister, intended to go to England after the Session, and that he intended to represent to the Imperial authorities that the North-West question was an Imperial one, which was causing trouble and disquietude in a portion of the Dominion, and that certainly the best interests of the Dominion required that the Imperial Government should take up the matter. Knowing as much, I thought that the Imperial Government, having received the documents and representations above mentioned, would certainly feel it their duty to act in the matter, and therefore the question would come to an early solution. Of course, I knew full well there were obstacles, and great obstacles, connected with their granting of that amnesty, but so convinced was I that the best interests of Canada required that this matter should be settled without delay, I was determined, as was also my colleague, Mr. Robitaille, that by handing in our resignations we could bring about a decision."

In another place he said:

"Sir John knew perfectly well that I was to make that statement."

The statement which I have just read:—

"I wanted to show my friends that I had reasons for making that statement to them, and that I was acting in good faith towards them and the cause which we were advocating, and so I said 'my portfolio is there, with that of my colleague, Mr. Robitaille.'"

In the year following the appointment of this commission, when the question of amnesty was brought up in the House, not only all the French members of the Government voted against the expulsion of Riel from the House and in favor of a full and complete amnesty to Riel, but the present Minister of Railways voted and spoke in favor of it; and I am sure he holds the same sentiment still, and if he were to vote according to his convictions upon this occasion he would say that it was improper that Riel was executed. Now, Sir, I need not quote you the words in full, for there is no dispute about the fact.

Mr. BOWELL. Is that all the evidence you have?

Mr. CASEY. It is not. There are some couple of hundred pages of evidence, but I think it would be too much to read to satisfy even the hon. gentleman's appetite for evidence. The evidence I have read is only a sample of what was sworn to. Archbishop Taché swore that when he first came to Ottawa, in the spring of 1870, he was told by the Cabinet that he might promise, when he got to Winnipeg, a complete amnesty for all that had been done up to the time he got there, without any exception as to Riel or anybody else. It was before the killing of Scott, and he was told that whatever happened until he got there—

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. BOWELL. Oh, no.

Mr. CASEY. Well, if the hon. gentleman will force me to turn up the documents in every case—

Mr. BOWELL. Whatever promise was made there, was for anything that was done up to the time the promise was made.

Mr. CASEY. No, but up to the time he should arrive in Winnipeg. The Archbishop says:

"Any conversation I had with Sir John Macdonald, who again impressed me with the necessity of informing the people of the good intentions of the Government towards them. I said to him then: 'This is all very well, but there have been acts committed which are blameworthy, and there may be some others before my arrival there. May I promise them an amnesty?' He answered me: 'Yes, you may promise it to them.' I subsequently asked him to give me in writing the substance of the conversation that had passed between us."

But the Premier in that case, as in the other, was very chary of what he committed to writing. Here is the positive oath of the venerable Archbishop Taché that he had authority to promise an amnesty for whatever might occur till he reached Winnipeg.

Mr. McCALLUM. Was that not before the murder of Scott?

Mr. CASEY. Yes. The murder of Scott occurred while Archbishop Taché was on his way to Winnipeg.

Mr. McCALLUM. After that conversation?

Mr. CASEY. Yes. The hon. gentleman does not seem to see that that is just the point we are making. The point I wish to make is that Archbishop Taché swore he was authorised to promise an amnesty for whatever might occur while he was on his way to Winnipeg, that the murder of Scott occurred while he was making the journey, and therefore it was exactly one of the cases to which the amnesty applied.

Mr. McCALLUM. Did you vote for the amnesty?

Mr. CASEY. I was citing the facts developed before the committee in 1874. It was clear, although some members of the Government did not remember the conversations exactly in the same way the Archbishop remembered them, and even denied some of his statements, the Archbishop and priests and witnesses maintained their views of the question, and that they had taken accurate notes; and the committee were satisfied that their recollections and statements were more correct than the recollections and statements of those who formed the Government at the time, and who had the strongest possible reasons for having bad memories in regard to the question. It was the clear conviction of the committee and of the witnesses to whom I have referred that this amnesty had been promised time after time, and that the Government were afraid to carry out their promise. We have strong subsequent evidence of that fear, in the fact that when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), as Premier, proposed the amnesty resolutions in the House, the present Premier, who was then leader of the Opposition, declared that this was very bold, that he would never have dared to make such a proposition. He did not dare to make the proposition; he did dare to make the promise, and to repeat it year after year, until the Archbishop (Taché) told him he did not want promises any more, but he did not dare to perform it. The hon. gentleman did not dare to risk the existence of his Government by making such a proposal in the House. More than that, he did not dare to pay his debts.

Part of the money which was divided between Riel and Lépine—£600 sterling—was borrowed from Mr. Donald A. Smith, in Winnipeg, on the endorsement of Mr. Archibald, then Lieutenant-Governor. The Premier was informed of that loan. He admitted on oath before the committee that he accepted the responsibility for that loan; that he accepted responsibility for repayment of the money. But did he pay it? No; it was borrowed in December, 1871, or January, 1872, and the hon. gentleman went out of power in November, 1873, and, although he repeatedly promised to pay the amount, he had never paid this paltry $3,000 and interest. He is the prodigal son of Canada, we often have to pay these little debts. We had to pay this one. Two years after an item was put in the Estimates for the payment of that money. My friend beside me reminds me that he did not pay Archbishop Taché his expenses in coming over from Rome and acting as Government agent in quelling the rebellion. There are indeed many things he has left unpaid. Although amounts were voted for secret service, and although an amount was transferred to the ex-Premier's private account after his defeat, he did not pay the $3,000 out of that sum so transferred. That is sufficient in regard to the amnesty. The amnesty was forced upon us in pursuance of the pledges made by our predecessors. It was just like the case of the immense public works which had been undertaken by hon. gentlemen when in office before the Pacific scandal, and which had to be carried out by the succeeding Government; in fact, we had to carry out a great many pledges made by those hon. gentlemen and amongst them was the amnesty. Almost immediately, the country at large was satisfied that it was the only thing that could be done under the circumstances. If there is any hon. gentleman opposite who says he thinks Riel should not have been amnestied, let him speak out. Will the hon. member for Perth, the hon. member for East Huron, or the hon. member for West York, say Riel should not have been pardoned on that occasion? They are very silent and judiciously silent. They will not say that Riel should not have been pardoned on that occasion. They know if they were to say so they would be condemning their own leaders who made themselves the accomplices and friends of that man.

Mr. HESSON. As one I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion Riel should have been hanged in 1875 or before.

Mr. CASEY. And yet it was to this man that $4,000 was sent to get him out of the country; it was at this man's hands the present Premier accepted a seat for his colleague in the Cabinet.

Mr. HESSON. No.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman has been asleep since modern history began.

Mr. HESSON. Who brought Riel into this House? The Reform party brought him here.

Mr. CASEY. I have no objection to state who introduced him into this House. It was Dr. Fiset. He was never ashamed of Riel; he believed him to be an innocent man, the hon. gentleman who believes he was a guilty man has not the courage to blame his own leaders for the intimacy that existed between them and Riel, the intimacy that existed between the Orange Premier and Riel.

Mr. HESSON. The Conservatives moved that he should be expelled.

Mr. CASEY. This shows that the Government were not acting in good faith in the policy they adopted, a policy adopted for the purpose of maintaining themselves in office. There can be little doubt that the conduct of the Government since the condemnation of Riel, the frequent reprieves, the appointment of a medical commission, the sending up of Government employees act as to medical experts on that commission, was designed merely to gain time so as to enable the Government to decide as a matter of policy which course would pay them best in a political sense. Finally Riel was hanged not from any belief as to the necessity of hanging him for the purpose of preserving the public peace—you cannot imagine such a feeling in the minds of men who had treated him as they did on a former occasion—but because they believed it would pay them best. They would have found it to pay better to have done the other thing. They were, afraid of losing a large part of the Orange vote and the Protestant vote. They need not have been afraid of losing the Orange vote. When the proceedings took place in 1871 they did not lose the Orange vote. When the item for the payment of that money to Donald A. Smith was up in the Estimates the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White), moved that the House should not agree to the payment of that item because they did not approve of the purpose to which the money had been applied. So far the Orange feeling was expressed. They put on record by a solid vote that they did not approve of the purpose for which the money was applied, but they had not the courage to turn around and blame the Government, blame the man who had been their leader for the course he had taken, or cease from supporting that gentleman as leader. They are supporting him still. Where is the hon. member for East Hastings still? Is he acting in opposition to the leader whom he censured by his motion in 1875? I do not think he is. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) was not there at the time, but I have not heard that his admiration for his leader was at all lessened by the misuse he made of the public funds in 1871. The Government need not have been afraid of losing the Orange vote after such an expression of Orange fidelity on that occasion. As to losing the Protestant vote of Ontario, I think the Government need not have been so much afraid of that either. I think it is an insult to the people of Ontario to take it for granted, without a trial, that these men are so anxious for revenge, so anxious for blood, so anxious to have the leader of the insurrection punished, after the insurrection has been put down, that the mere fact of commuting the sentence of that leader would have turned any considerable number against the Government. It might have done so for a moment. Prejudice is strong for a moment, but I have that confidence in the people of Ontario that leads me to believe that when they look at the question as carefully as we have looked at it in this House, the opinion throughout Ontario will be divided evenly and fairly on that question. I do not know whether the majority will disapprove of the execution or not, but I do not believe that there will be much change in party alliances in Ontario, in consequence of differences of opinion with regard to this execution, I refer, of course, to the Protestant English speaking portion of the Province. But, Sir, I shall be told that we are disloyal. The old cry of disloyalty will be applied to those of us who happen to form the opinion which I have expressed. This cry too will be a failure. The cry of loyalty has been raised before by the Mail and other Government organs, as well as by Government speakers, and it has had small effect. It is recognised by the people at large that loyalty does not demand any particular view of this question, and that the man who thinks Riel should not have been hanged may be as loyal as the man who thinks he should have been.

Mr. ORTON. No, no.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for the Rocky Mountains says "no"—I mean the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton). He denies the possible loyalty of those who think that Riel should not have been executed. Let us draw a comparison. If Riel was such a criminal that no loyal man would wish to see him reprieved, what sort of people were the Fenians who invaded Ontario in 1866? Were they people who had grievances against Canada? Had they suffered any wrongs at the hands of our Government? Had they any land question to settle? Had they any reason at all for invading a peaceful Province and killing its sons? No, Sir, they came as part of an agitation going on in the United States of America; they came here apparently for fun or for plunder; they could not have come for the good of Ireland, because there could be no reason in their doing that. They were caught with arms in their hands, they were caught red-handed, they were found guilty, their sentences were passed and their sentences were commuted. I do not remember that there was even a recommendation to mercy, but the sentences being commuted, they did not serve even the full term of the commuted sentence, but were let out after a few years; and the hon. gentleman who is Premier now was Premier and Minister of Justice at the time these men had their sentences commuted and they were released from prison, even before the commuted sentence had expired. He advised that commutation, he advised that release from prison, and if a man is not loyal who believes Riel should not have been hanged, what shall we say of the man who released these Fenian prisoners? Can the man be loyal who did that? I leave it to the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) to compare the two cases and to say whether his condemnation of my disloyalty, and the disloyalty of those who think as I do, does not hit his own leader also. Why, Sir, it hits every statesman who has ever advised the commutation or reprieve of a political prisoner. We are told that we should have one law for all. That was the favorite cry of the Mail newspaper for many days. I am willing to apply that law in both cases. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and if it was right to commute the sentence of and to release those Fenian prisoners in 1866, it would be equally consistent with loyalty and with public peace to have commuted the sentence of Louis Riel. I do not suggest—nobody suggests—that he should be released. It is evident that he was a dangerous character to be at large, and he certainly should have been kept out of mischief. With regard to that point, I think I cannot do better than give the opinion of Father McWilliams who was with him all the time, who was with him at his death on the scaffold, and who had been his old school mate, and this letter will serve a further purpose. Riel has been charged with bitter hostility to the church, with being a sacrilegious wretch, whom no good Catholic should have anything to do with, or say a good word for. He has been spoken of in that way by both Protestants and Catholics in this House. Here is a letter from a priest in the church who saw him in his last moments, and had the best opportunities for finding out his mental condition, and instead of calling him a wretch, he calls him a lunatic. This is a copy of a letter addressed by Father McWilliams to the Governor General:

"In taking a trip to the Rocky Mountains, I stopped off at Regina to see my old class-mate Louis Riel. * * * I am not surprised to find him insane, but surprised to find him as sane as he is on some subjects. If Your Excellency allows the sentence of death to be carried out, upon your head and that of your advisers will rest the blood of an insane man. I believe him to be a dangerous character, unfitted to be allowed at large, or even to be free; but at once, and for all, let him be closely confined in a secure insane asylum. In behalf of justice, I write you and the Government."

In the original letter, Father McWilliams included, in the blank shown in this copy, the reasons he gave to the Governor General for believing Riel was insane. He left those out in giving a copy to the newspapers for publication, stating that he did not think it proper to give them. It would be interesting to have that letter on the Table of the House with those reasons in it.

An hon. MEMBER. By whom was it written?
Mr. CASEY.

Mr. CASEY. I omitted to state that it was signed C. A. McWilliams, P.P.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is that all from him?

Mr. CASEY. No, it is not. When Father McWilliams came down to Ottawa he published a letter which I did see also, but of which I have not a copy, stating that he withdrew the expressions he had used with regard to the blood of an insane man being on the heads of the Governor and his Ministers, because he thought them improper expressions to be used to the persons to whom they were addressed. I certainly understood from the Rev. Father's letter that he simply withdrew those expressions for that reason; and I have not yet seen over his hand any retraction of the opinion that Louis Riel was insane. Even if he had retracted that opinion afterwards, I should give much less weight to the second opinion than to the one he formed on the spot where he had every opportunity for observation. Now, Sir, we were accused by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, and we have been accused time and again by hon. gentlemen opposite, of stirring up feelings of race and revenge on this question. When I say we, I do not refer to the party to which I belong, but to those who hold the views on this question which I hold. The party has been accused too; but since the party as a whole does not hold these views, it cannot be accused as a whole of stirring up such feelings. The accusation should be turned round; it is a boomerang. Everybody who reads the Mail, as every good Conservative does, knows who is stirring up feelings of race and revenge; everybody who has read the speeches delivered in this House knows who is stirring up those feelings; and I must pay to our French friends of both parties who have discussed the matter, the compliment of saying that I scarcely believed, before hearing them, that a subject so vital to them and one which so nearly touched their feelings, their hearts and their passions, could be discussed by any body of men with the coolness, the calmness, and the candor with which they discussed it. I do not think the accusation of stirring up feelings of race and revenge lies at our door or at the door of our French friends who take the same view of the case. We have heard something of a new party in Lower Canada called the Parti National, limited to the French race. If such a party were formed, I should consider it a mistake. I think we have an opportunity now of forming a truly national party, composed of all nationalities and creeds and parties—a party who shall not accept the shibboleth of any political party, but which shall be inspired with true loyalty to Canada—that loyalty which leads us to watch the conduct of the public servants of Canada, those who rule the affairs of the country, and hurl them from power when they do anything contrary to the country's interest, no matter to what party they belong.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. I am sure such sentiments must seem very absurd to some gentlemen on the opposite side who interrupt me with ironical "hear, hear." But I think certain individual members on both sides of the House have given evidence of their being able to take that view of the case. Our French friends who have spoken on this question had certainly no motives of self-interest in adopting the course they have taken. They have not only left old friends and old associations, but they have left a powerful Government which has the patronage in its hand and is in a position to give good things to its friends. In leaving that Government on this question they have shown manliness and independence of action. Are there any Ontario Conservatives who have equal manliness and independence of action—I do not mean on this question merely, but on any question? If any hon. gentleman can say that there are, my opinion of that party will have vastly improved. I do not intend to detain the House any longer than simply to reiterate my hope that this unfortunate event, instead of being the means of disunion between races and creeds and parties in Canada, as it appeared likely at one time to be, may prove to be a means of better understanding between all creeds and races and parties—the hope that, instead of taking up the bones of Louis Riel and holding a mock inquest over them, we shall bury in the grave all bitter feelings which have hitherto existed between races and parties, and that this event will really be the beginning of a better state of feeling among all the peoples and races of Canada.

Mr. KAULBACH. After the able and eloquent speeches delivered on this side the House in support of the position the Government assumed on the disposal of Louis Riel on the charge of high treason, I feel great reluctance in coming forward to offer any further remarks, but after listening to the unfair epithets dealt out to the hon. members of the Government by gentlemen opposite I feel constrained to crave the indulgence of the House for a few moments. Gentlemen opposite were not satisfied with denouncing this honorable Government as a body, for the action they had taken in connection with Louis Riel, but have thought proper to denounce the French members of the Cabinet, as traitors to their race, traitors to their nationality and traitors to their country—a most unjust charge and one the Government and its admirers have a right to resent. Does not every member of this House and the country know, that as Ministers of the Crown under their oaths of office they are responsible as a Cabinet, responsible as advisers of the Queen's representative, and as such in that capacity they performed their duty to their Queen and country faithfully and well, and to-day throughout the length and breadth of Canada, nay by every person interested in Canada, excepting disloyal Grits, they are receiving the commendations to which they are justly entitled. I feel it my duty to stand up in my place in Parliament and defend a Government so just, wise, and prudent as they have proved themselves to be in dealing with this arch-rebel and murderer, irrespective of creed or nationality, and meting out punishment to him, to which he was so justly deserving. The objections made by gentlemen opposite as respects Riel's trial at Regina were, first, that the constitution of the court before which Riel was tried and condemned should be established beyond a possibility of doubt; second, that a commission should be appointed to enquire into the mental condition of the prisoner. The first point was definitely settled by the Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba, and of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. But even if this court, as referred to, had not been properly constituted, hon. gentlemen opposite should be the last to complain, as it was a court of their own creation when they were in power. I was rather surprised at the utterance of the hon. gentleman from West Elgin who has just taken his seat, in reference to the constitution of that court, when he, as a prominent supporter of the Government of the party opposite at that time, supported the measure of the Bill. In 1875 that Bill provided for a jury of eight men—with the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate before whom charges of this nature were to be tried. In 1877, when the Opposition were still in power, they thought proper to reduce the number of jurors to six. To say the least of it I contend that it is very unfair to complain of that court now. With respect to the second objection that was set at rest by the report of the medical experts who made an examination of Riel, Dr. Jukes, senior medical officer, states that Riel was a “Clear-headed, accountable being, responsible for his actions against God and man.”

Dr. Valade, of Ottawa, reports that:

“While Riel suffered under hallucinations on political and religious questions, on other points he was quite sensible, and could distinguish right from wrong.”

Dr. Lavell, of Kingston, reports that:

“After a careful consideration of the case, and fully appreciating the consequences involved, he was of opinion that, although Riel held and expressed peculiar views as to religion and general government, he was an accountable being, and capable of distinguishing right from wrong.”

The medical experts, as you see, were of one opinion as respects his sanity, and we can reasonably conclude, without a doubt, that he was sane when he organised the rebellion, sane in his attempt to exterminate the English settlers, and disposing forever of British rule and authority in that country, and perfectly sane when he was called upon to pay the penalty of his crimes upon the scaffold. Hon. gentlemen opposite charge the Government with cruelty toward Riel, in allowing him to suffer the death penalty when the jury, impanelled to try the case, by their verdict recommended him to mercy. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, how much clemency was there shown by this malefactor Riel toward poor Thomas Scott, in 1870? Any? No; not a particle, but on the contrary, the most heart-rending torture and cruelty that possibly could have been offered. When poor Scott, seeing the sufferings of the innocent women and children, and desiring their release, went with a flag of truce, without arms and offering no offence, and approached Riel, how was he received? He was captured by Riel and his gang, manacled, imprisoned, tried by a court of his own creation, on the 3rd day of March, in a language not understood by him, Riel being the accuser and judge, and sentenced to be shot, at noon, the next day. When asked the reason for this treatment, his answer was:

“I must make an example of one or more of these men in order to bring these Canadians to terms, and I shall do so one after another so long as necessary.”

The missionary, realising the terribleness of the position, asked Riel to give Scott another day to prepare for eternity. His answer was: “Go tell him he must die.” After the poor fellow was shot, Riel was asked for the body, that it might be placed in a sepulchre, that his poor aged mother might have one grain of comfort to allay her bitter grief, and a place she could visit to mourn over the loss of a loved one, and to know that it had a Christian burial. He refused even this. The body, it is said, was placed in a box, whilst struggling in the agonies of death, and the voice of the poor fellow heard in prayer calling on Riel to either take him out or kill him at once. This is the patriot, the martyr and the saint whom hon. gentlemen opposite are endeavoring to have this House and the country believe has been cruelly treated. Instead of a martyr he is justly entitled to the appellation, a monster of the darkest cast, and had he got his deserts he would have been shot last winter the moment he was seen within rifle range. Was he a patriot? A patriot is supposed to be one willing to make self-sacrifices for the cause of country; one whom neither gold nor yet any other inducements could purchase. In this instance we find that Riel was willing to take $35,000, and even less, and abandon the country, and those whom he had undertaken to lead, as will appear from the following extract taken from the report of Father André's evidence given at Riel's trial at Regina. As it was quoted by the hon. member for Montreal Centre in his speech, I will not repeat it, but, as it is worthy of being noted, will ask that it may appear in Hansard:

“Q. Will you please state what the prisoner asked of the Federal Government?—A. I had two interviews with the prisoner on that subject.

“Q. The prisoner claimed a certain indemnity from the Federal Government, did he not?—A. When the prisoner made his claim I was there with another gentleman, and he asked from the Government $100,000. We thought that was exorbitant, and the prisoner said: ‘Wait a little, I will take, at once, $35,000 cash.’

“Q. And on that condition the prisoner was to leave the country if the Government gave him $35,000?—A. Yes, that was the condition he put.

“Q. When was this?—A. This was on the 23rd December, 1884.

“Q. There was also another interview between you and the prisoner?—A. There has been about twenty interviews between us.

"Q. He was always after you to ask you to use your influence with the Federal Government to obtain an indemnity?—A. The first time he spoke of it was on the 12th of December; he had never spoken a word of it before.

"Q. He talked about it very frequently?—A. On these two occasions only.

"Q. That was his great occupation?—A. Yes, at those times.

"Q. Is it not true that the prisoner told you that he himself was the half-breed question?—A. He did not say so in express terms, but he conveyed that idea. He said: "If I am satisfied the half-breeds will be." I must explain this. This objection was made to him that even if the Government granted him $35,000, the half-breed question would remain the same, and he said in answer to that: "If I am satisfied the half-breeds will be."

"Q. Is it not a fact he told you he would even accept a less sum than $35,000?—A. Yes, he said: "Use all the influence you can, you may not get all that, but get all you can, and if you get less we will see."

This evidence is verified by other witnesses at the trial. This is the man whom hon. gentlemen opposite are endeavoring to place on the temple of fame as a saint and martyr. The man who stated "he wanted blood, and he would not be satisfied till he had blood." Or, as given in the evidence of Thomas McKay at the trial: "You don't know what we are after—it is blood! blood! We want blood! It is a war of extermination." Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the North-West, all must know that the Government had been, and still is doing all in its power to promote peace in that quarter, and from the Minister of War down to the lowest official in the Militia Department, much credit is due for the prompt and satisfactory manner in which they responded to the sudden and unexpected demand upon their resources; and gratifying indeed was it to see the martial spirit and military ardor that was displayed when the word "To arms" was given. All appeared to be actuated with the one prevailing sentiment and feeling that the rebellion against constituted authority must be crushed out promptly and effectually, the offenders punished, Riel—the leader—receive the just tribute of his reward, and order restored. It is greatly to be deplored that there should be found politicians who would as it were utilise the blood of Canada's sons to make political capital, when they must know that the Government is placed in sacred trust of the rights and property of the people of Canada, and that they could not surrender such rights to the hordes of half-breeds and Indians, not content with their proper allotment of territory, but determined if possible to get it the second time by open revolt. To encourage the Indians, and at the same time avoid the immense expense of the Government each year to which they hitherto had been subjected, the Government very prudently set off large areas of land in the fertile districts of the North-West as Indian reserves, for the exclusive use of the Indians, on which they were to farm and gain their own livelihood, and even supplied them with farm implements to till the soil, seed to sow, and farm instructors to give them a knowledge of farming. All this was rejected by the Indians and half-breeds, led on by Riel, and some of the instructors murdered. Members on both sides of the House should be a unit with regard to this trouble, and cast aside all political and personal considerations, and with one purpose and object in view, stand by the Government in meeting all emergencies such as had to be encountered last winter, face to face. Had this feeling been exhibited last year by gentlemen opposite when the rebellion broke out in the North-West? No, Mr. Speaker, but on the contrary discouragement to every one desirous of being a veteran in the service of his country, as was shown by their unworthy utterances in their Grit organs. I would instance their reference to the 66th Regiment, known as the Halifax Regiment, and the 75th Regiment, which I have the honor to command. As I gave expression to the House then with reference to it on a question of privilege, I will not refer to it again, suffice it to say, that you would naturally have supposed that they would have had some kind feeling for the loved mother, the fond wife, and the loving sister, left behind at that time anxious and lonely, by the absence of a son, husband or brother then to the front in defence of their country. But no; the same feeling that actuated them then, appears still to have possession of them now. I would say that had hon. gentlemen opposite been present at the Canadian Pacific Railway station in this city at this time last year, when the 66th Regiment arrived en route for the North-West, and when the flag was presented by a fair lady from the land of the "May Flower," they would have felt satisfied that the officers and men of that regiment were true-hearted and brave, and would prize the standard of Canada as highly and float it as proudly, without stain, as an Englishman would "the flag that braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze." If there had been any spirit of disloyalty in the ranks of the 66th, I would ask, by whom was it inspired? Simply by some few of the hot-headed partisans and followers of the party opposite who amnestied Louis Riel, made him a member of the House of Commons of Canada, and neglected or studiously avoided between 1873 and 1878, when they had the power and the privilege, to settle the half-breed claims in the section of country where the rebellion had been raging. Frequently we find the rapacious and fanatical politicians followers of the party opposite, who, previous to the execution of Riel, anticipating a commutation of sentence, denounced Riel as a cold blooded murderer, and charged the Government as accountable for not carrying the sentence of the court, without delay, into execution. Now that he has paid the penalty on the scaffold, elevate this murderer to the position of a demi-god, and in order to denounce the Government and carry political effect, ask questions like the following: "Why did not Sir John A. Macdonald and his Government hang Riel when he murdered Thomas Scott, in 1870?" "Why did he pay him a certain sum of money to get him out of the country?" The answers are easily given and very reasonable. At that time, we had no Canadian Pacific Railway such as we happily have at present. The only access in summer over Canadian territory to that section of the Dominion was by using the water stretches of Georgian Bay and Lake Huron, via Sault-Ste. Marie, and across Lake Superior to Port Arthur, and thence by trail to Winnipeg; but as the murder of poor Scott took place in winter, when that route was impracticable, Riel having chosen that time purposely to offer trouble, on account of the isolated position of the country, all communication was cut off, except by American railways, over American territory via Chicago, and that not for the transport of troops nor ammunition of war, consequently the Government were compelled to do the best they could under the circumstances, or suffer further outrages upon the honest and innocent settlers of the country. Archbishop Taché, the ecclesiastical head of that country, advised that a certain amount of money be given to Louis Riel in order that he might be removed from the country. At that time, mark you, he had taken flight across the border to the United States, fearing arrest for the crime he had committed. The suggestion seemed to be a reasonable one, and was apparently acceptable to gentlemen on both sides of this House. Riel remained away till the Reform party (gentlemen opposite) came into power, when, as I previously stated, he was amnestied or pardoned, and brought back to the country. Hence the cause of all this cruelty and bloodshed. I have listened to the unreasonable and inconsistent utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite but fail to find by any word that they have offered a justification for the crimes this merciless rebel and blood-thirsty leader has committed; the blood he has shed, the many homes he has rendered desolate, and the many hearts made sad and lonely by a cherished husband, son, or innocent mother or sister, sacrificed at his hands. If it is simply opposition hon. gentlemen opposite are offering for the sake of government and power, sad will be the time, when it is obtained by hands embued in brother's blood. My prayer is that it may never be my lot to see it. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I would state, occupying the onerous position that I do, not merely as a member of Parliament, but in the dual capacity as one of the judges in a court of review, if this body may be so called, that in my opinion, and I believe it is the opinion of a very large majority of the members of this House, and more if their party prejudice did not prevent them expressing it, and decidedly the sentiment of the people of Canada, that the Government dealt with this arch rebel Riel according to his deserts, and extended to him just punishment for the atrocious deeds he had committed upon his fellow man, or in other words as the Winnipeg Free Press (an organ of hon. gentlemen opposite) expressed it the day after the execution of Riel that he was fairly tried, honorably convicted, laudably condemned and justly executed. And with this as a warning it is to be hoped that those who are left in that lately disturbed district, will forever be content, and disposed to "beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks," and use them in the development of the great North-West, so boundless in its extent and so inexhaustible in its richness, and which is looked upon by all Canadians, as the country of great promise. And it is to be hoped that all those who are intending to settle in that country and make it their home will be content that all internal strife in that quarter has forever ceased and will be followed by a succession of years of national growth, development, and prosperity.

Mr. SPROULE. In rising to occupy the time of the House in this debate, I do so with considerable reluctance and trepidation, reluctance because I feel that the patience of the members of the House is already exhausted with this long and tedious debate, and with trepidation, because I feel my inability to discharge the important duty which I believe devolves upon me as a representative of the people. I think to-day we are passing through a very important epoch in the history of our country. We are passing through a crucial test as to what is understood by British liberty, British protection and British rights. We are to-day dealing with a question that, if it is adopted, will be an attack upon the bulwark of British liberty, because if we destroy that confidence that the people have in the courts, and that which the people have always enjoyed wherever the British flag floats, they will no longer feel the security of their lives and property which is necessary to secure to them the fruits of their labor, peace and prosperity. Should the motion which is now before this House be carried, it means, at least to my mind, that there will be a destruction of the confidence in the courts of the country, because we have been taught from childhood that every man in the country, if he commits a crime, is punished for that crime, and when he is in the hands of the law we feel a confidence that he will meet with that punishment that his crime deserves. It is well known that in this respect there is a vast difference between the feeling in our country and that in the United States. Why is it that every man who goes to Texas or Colorado, or many other States, has to take with him a bowie knife or a revolver to protect his person and property. It is because the confidence of the people in the integrity of their courts has been destroyed, and men have taken it into their own hands to protect themselves. If this motion was carried in the affirmative, I think the outcome would be to establish the same condition of things on this side of the border. For this reason I say it becomes a very important question, and we should approach its consideration with solemnity rather than levity. It is a very unusual thing for us to criticise the acts of the court. Occasionally it happens, when political excitement runs high, when political bias is strong, that the judges' decisions in reference to political trials may be properly criticised, but this is the exception and not the rule. When we come to deal with graver crimes, it is not the custom in this country to criticise the actions of the court, the fairness of the trial, or the result of the trial, whatever it may be. However, that might apply to one court. When we remember that this case has passed through three important courts, we will appreciate with greater force the awkwardness of the position we occupy when we attempt to criticise the action of those courts. The present debate has taken a very wide range. At the commencement hon. members of the Opposition appeared to become very much annoyed and excited because they were asked to deal directly with this question and give an expression of opinion either yes or no as to whether the Government were or were not censurable in allowing the verdict of the court to be carried into execution. I can say from my knowledge of the people in regard to the solution of this very important question that if there is one thing more than another desired it is that there should be a direct vote on this question. Why? Because since it got into the arena of politics, both political parties have used it perhaps a little unfairly. One political party is making use of it for political purposes, it is contended the other is doing the same, and if for nothing else than to establish the sincerity of hon. members who are representing both sides of this question and to satisfy the public mind that there is integrity in public men, it is important that the question should be decided directly on the question as to whether the Government are censurable or not. We remember a very important debate in another Legislature in 1871 in regard to the late criminal Riel, and the very strong language made use of then for the purpose of convincing the people of Ontario of the abhorrence and detestability of the crime committed and the necessity of visiting condign punishment upon that very great criminal. At that time it made a deep impression on the public mind, and that impression was pressed by the intelligence and ability of a great legal mind. But to-day we have another feature in that political drama. We have the same great mind arrayed on the other side of the question and endeavoring to impugn the motives of the Government because they dared to ask a direct verdict on the question. Why? Because he and his supporters are not allowed to drag in side issues, to change the question, to take it away from the basis on which it should rest, and if not able to convince the people at least they hoped to persuade them that there were other influences at work in causing the Government to carry out the verdict. The people of the country do not want these side issues raised, but they want a direct vote on the question; and I feel sure that hon. gentlemen opposite when they go back to the country will find that the Government will be supported in having this question put directly and compelling hon. members, who by their acts are not accepted as being too sincere, to face the question directly and say whether or not the Government was justified in carrying out the execution of Riel. We have a great many theories and speculations as to what the motive of the Government was in carrying out that verdict. It appears to me that the ingenuity of the great minds of the Opposition has been engaged in devising means to satisfy the country that every other conceivable motive was influencing the Government, except that of justice and a desire to carry out the judgment of the court. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) in giving a few of them proceeded to say that Riel was hanged, first, to avenge the murder of a man who had been killed several years ago, what he is pleased to call the murder of Brother Thomas Scott. Second, he was hanged to vindicate the action of the Government in the management of the North-West affairs, because if he was not hanged, it might be accepted as a confession of mismanagement. Third, to satisfy the lust for blood of the Orange fraternity? He does not put it directly—the Orange fraternity; but he says an influence was at work, and he implies the Orange fraternity. He adds: That he was hanged because the pressure was so great by a certain body that it could not be resisted by the Government. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) says Riel was hanged because he was a Frenchman, because he was insane and a fool, because he had dared to assert his rights and the rights of the Metis in that country. Those hon. gentlemen in their intelligence seem to forget the only reason for which he was hanged, and that was because in the eye of the law he was a criminal, and after a fair trial the jury said he was guilty; the judge pronounced the verdict, and two successive courts declared that verdict correct and that it should be carried into execution. Does this not show a disposition on the part of the Opposition to assign improper motives to the actions of those charged with the responsible duty of carrying out the law in this case? If they cannot see it, I predict that the common mind of the people will have no difficulty in seeing it and understanding the object of the members composing the Opposition in attributing such unworthy motives to men who were endeavoring fairly to discharge an important and responsible duty. Hon. members of the Opposition complain because they have not light enough on the subject. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) started out by saying that they had been endeavoring to get the papers so as to obtain sufficient light on the subject to enable them to judge of the trial, and discharge the important duty as it should be discharged. A few minutes afterwards he went on to say, that it was as clear as the light at noon-day that the Government had hanged an insane prisoner. He said:

“I charge the Government and I hold them responsible for every drop of blood spilled in the rebellion, for every dollar of money spent in enforcing the authority of law, and I charge them with criminally and judicially murdering a man who must be held in the eyes of the law as not responsible for his acts.”

The hon. gentleman was able to come to this conclusion, although not five minutes before he had proclaimed himself unable to deal fairly with the question for want of proper light on the subject. The hon. member for West Huron took somewhat the same ground. I am surprised that the hon. member for West Durham was able at London to keep himself so truly balanced on the fence that it was like the balancing of a feather which it was impossible to tell where it would fall, and although he had important evidence in his possession he was unable to come to any conclusion as to whether the Government did right or not; but now when alliances have been matured and important light has been brought to bear on the matter, not light in regard to the acts of the Government with respect to carrying out the death penalty, not light in regard to lack of duty in carrying out the North-West policy, but light as to what the political results which may accrue from adopting a certain policy; the scales have fallen from his eyes and he is now crying “dark, dark,” as he did a short time ago. He has sufficient light to make up his mind intelligently and come to the conclusion, no doubt after a great moral and mental struggle, that this man who was so guilty in the eyes of the law years ago was in his opinion not guilty and should not have been hanged because he was an insane prisoner. That they have furnished no argument upon which he could hang his case and that he had a greater opportunity of displaying his great ability and misleading the public mind. We know that the question of insanity is a very difficult one to settle. The shades between sane and insane, between man's normal reason and what might be called the exaltation or depression of that reason, are so slight that it is an easy matter to found strong argument on one side or on the other. It is an easy matter for a man of his ability and possessing his legal mind to cite precedents and so construe them as to make them do duty under such circumstances as we have before us. But I apprehend that the common mind takes very little stock in this part of the argument. We have three questions presenting themselves to the public mind, and once they are settled, the people will be fully satisfied as to whether the Government is right or wrong. The three questions for the fair solution of this subject, are, was the prisoner guilty? if guilty did he get a fair trial? was the prisoner insane? It is not necessary, I believe, to press into service the one hundred and one different issues that have been dealt with by hon. gentlemen in this House in order to come to a fair conclusion. It is not necessary to so warp the evidence and the letters which have been written on one side of this question to such an extent that those who hold them, if they saw them commented on, would scarcely recognise their own handwriting. It is not necessary to resort to the unfairness which has been resorted to by some hon. gentlemen in this debate to establish the correctness or the incorrectness of what the Government has done. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) was pleased to give us the history of a letter from Rev. Father McWilliams which he believed in some way condemned the Government. When questioned by an hon. member on the Government side he replied that Father McWilliams had written another letter withdrawing one or two words which appeared in the other, but he concealed the most important part of that letter, which stated that he was misled in the previous letter and felt that he was justified in making an explanation. I have that letter before me, and I think if the hon. gentleman had been as desirous of dealing fairly with this question as he professes to be, he would have read the portion which he kept from the House. That letter is as follows:—

“I have seen published a letter addressed by me to His Excellency the Governor General in reference to the insanity and irresponsibility of the unhappy Louis Riel. I feel it to be a duty to myself as a priest and to His Excellency as the representative of Her Majesty that I should publicly revoke one sentence in that letter, which my mind, now relieved from the excitement of feeling which swayed me in writing it, has already condemned. It is this:—‘If Your Excellency allows the sentence of death to be carried out, upon your head and that of your advisers will rest the blood of an insane man.’ Most certainly I did then believe that Riel was not of sound mind, and ought not to have been put to death as though he were responsible for his acts; but I confess to have been carried away by my sympathy for his misfortunes and by the intensely agitating surroundings of my position whilst I was in communication with him.”

Now, I think that is a reasonable explanation of the fact that he was entirely wrong in his conception of the circumstances in his previous letter:—

“This explains how it was that I hurriedly penned the foregoing sentence, which should not have been addressed to the representative of the Queen's Majesty, especially in reference to the exercise of the royal prerogative, nor to his advisers, who I am perfectly sure have been governed in their decision by no other considerations than those of public duty and fidelity to their oath of office.”

If the hon. member for West Elgin had read that letter, it would have destroyed entirely the inference which he attempted to draw from it, and which was not warranted by the balance of the letter. The hon. member for West Huron made the most incendiary, unreasonable, and unwarranted speech that I have listened to in this House for the last seven years. I say so, because it was a speech eminently calculated to arouse prejudices in the minds of men who had shown the greatest consideration during the exciting times when this question was agitating a large portion of the people of the Dominion. He endeavored to prove, by resolutions which he read, that the Orange body were actively insisting on the Government carrying out the death penalty. He endeavored to prove that there was an illegitimate power behind the Throne, which never should have been used, and that the Government were not exercising their judgment or acting from a sense of duty, but simply acting because there was political influence to be gained, and a power behind them over which they had no control. He said, with reference to one of the resolutions moved by the Orange body :

"This resolution was no doubt sent to Bro. Sir John Macdonald, who adds to his other dignities that of Knight of the Royal Scarlet. The command had to be obeyed, it was obeyed, and Riel was hanged in obedience thereto."

He goes on to say that no doubt all these other resolutions found their way into the hands of the Ministry, and he says that petitions and memorials were sent to the Government by the Orange body as a body, pressing upon the Government to carry out the execution; and yet, Sir, when the papers are asked for, we find that there is not a single memorial or petition addressed to the Government by that large and respectable body on that question. The only one is a memorial which I hold in my hand and which was addressed to Mr. Beatty, the member for West Toronto, asking him to use his influence in persuading the Government to carry out what they believed to be the sentence of the law. One clause of that resolution will be sufficient to show the fairness of mind and the moderation of tone of those gentlemen in dealing with this question, and to show that that memorial was not at all such a document as it was characterised as being by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). The memorial is as follows:—

"WESTERN DISTRICT ORANGE HALL,
TORONTO, 2nd November, 1885.

"TO JAMES BEATTY, Esq., M.P., West Toronto.

"DEAR SIR—The Orangemen of this district would respectfully approach you, as our representative in Parliament, concerning the case of Riel, now under sentence of death for his recent acts of violence, bloodshed and treason. We regret that in so clear a case it should be necessary to remind the Government of their duty in the premises, and express our unanimous feelings on this question, but the fact that public meetings have been called in favor of Riel"—

But I say, if there was a justification for these men in the expression of their opinion, it was the fact that the excitement ran so high in Quebec that one section of the people seemed bound to bring revenge on the heads of the Government because they carried out the sentence,—

"and in defence of his conduct in the lower Province, and especially by Roman Catholics, and that the most strenuous efforts are being put forth by these parties and by Riel's friends to secure commutation of his sentence, renders it imperative upon us as a loyal and Protestant association that we should express to the Government our views and deep convictions on this subject. The pardon of Riel was resorted to before. The exile of Riel from Canada was tried before. The honor of Riel was tried before, when he promised to never set foot in Canada again. And all have miserably failed. His murderous intentions have only been intensifying. Pardon but emboldened him to treat British laws and British clemency with contempt and the slaughter of loyal and law-abiding British subjects has been tenfold more appalling than on the former occasions. Men lie buried there of whom even that country (grand as it is) is not worthy—some of the best, noblest and truest of Canada's noble and loyal sons.

"We would, therefore, most urgently request you to use all your influence with the Government to have the sentence passed upon Riel by his countrymen confirmed by the Supreme Court of the Province and sustained by the Privy Council of England carried into effect."

Now, is there one word in that which might be construed as being very strong or very factious—one word more than we might expect from any class of British subjects in the country who believed that an undue influence was being brought to bear on the Government that might deter them from discharging a very important duty? I think I may say on behalf of that large and respectable body, representing as it does 250,000 people, that there is no class of people in the Dominion of Canada that had more confidence in British courts and British justice, or that rested more satisfied that after Riel had got a fair trial, the verdict would be carried out, or that displayed less feeling and less disposition to change the mind of the Government, than the Orangemen of Ontario, or of the Dominion of Canada; and I think it ill becomes the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) to endeavor to introduce into this debate an element which can only be calculated to raise strife among two classes of people; endeavor to mislead people and to create sympathy in a quarter where no sympathy can be extended; to try to draw a veil over the eyes of the people and prevent them from viewing this case in that judicial manner in which we should view it. Only a year or so ago we had a very important debate in this House in reference to the legality or illegality of an hon. member taking his seat in it. I think the leader of the Opposition at that time said it was wrong in principle that we should elect ourselves judges for the interpretation or carrying out of the law. If that was so in civil cases, how much more strongly will it apply to a case of this kind, with regard to which we are not supposed to be able to interpret the law with the ability of learned counsel or judges? We are here surrounded with influences of political party bias and a hundred and one other influences tending to warp our judgment in a case like this. But when we are called on to perform that important duty I think we can solve the question in a very short time. If we can satisfy our own minds that the prisoner was guilty, that he received a fair trial, and that he was sane during that trial and afterwards, I think we may discharge our duty fairly. I may say a few words in reference to his guilt. I need not review his actions from the time he came into the North-West Territories in July, 1884; I need not remind this House of the agitation he carried on amongst the Metis of that country; I need not refer to the various letters he wrote to the Indians to induce them to rise and commit crimes of rapine and murder; I need not refer to his public utterances on platforms. I will only refer to one or two which are connecting links in the chain of arguments I am endeavoring to present. In his letter to Major Crozier, calling for the surrender of the fort, he says:

"If you will not surrender, we intend to attack you when, to-morrow, the Lord's day is over,"—

He did not say the Metis intend to attack, but he uses the word "we," representing himself as the head of the band—"and to commence without delay a war of extermination upon all those who have shown themselves hostile to our rights."

This is signed by Louis David Riel and his council. It is plainly proven in that letter that he alone was responsible for the acts of that council, because he accepts the responsibility in his letter. It was contended by some that he was not responsible for the acts of that council, because it was a provisional government, and he was only carrying out the behests of that government. But in his letter to Major-General Middleton, he says:

"I have received only to-day yours of the 13th inst. My council are dispersed"—

He does not say the council of the Metis, but "my council," showing that he was instrumental in having it formed, and that he was its leader. This letter is also signed "Louis David Riel." Again, I take the report of the appeal before the Court of Queen's Bench, in Manitoba. One of the judges, in speaking of the trial, said that the counsel for the defence rested their case on two grounds. He said they did not endeavor to prove that the prisoner was not guilty of the crime charged against him—that they could not prove that he was not guilty; but they rested their case on the pleas of insanity and the unconstitutionality of the court. He goes on to say:

"Upon the argument before this court, no attempt was, or could be made, to show that the prisoner was innocent of the crime charged. In fact, the evidence as to the guilt is all one way. The witnesses called upon the defence were so called upon the plea of insanity. The whole evidence was laid before us, and upon examining that evidence I think counsel very properly declined to argue the question of the guilt or innocence of the prisoner."

These are the words of Chief Justice Walbridge, who is a very eminent legal man. Now, I think, this is all I need say of his crime, because the very fact that his learned counsel did not attempt to defend him, on the ground that he did not commit the crime, and did not call a witness to prove that he did not, is sufficient evidence to convince every rational mind that he stood guilty of the crime with which he was charged. As to the evidence and the fairness of his trial, the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) argued that the counsel for the defence had not fairly discharged their duty, because they had not asked whether Riel, when taken captive, had given himself up, or whether he was taken prisoner. Well, I apprehend that the learned counsel, who defended that case, stand as high among the legal minds of this country as the hon. member for West Huron. I apprehend that they are possessed of as much integrity and intelligence, and that they felt as fully the responsibility of fairly discharging their duties, and observing their oath in defending that prisoner, as the hon. member for West Huron would have done. It is claimed by the same parties, in reference to his insanity, that insanity is shown by the evidence, and that the jury recommended him to mercy on account of their belief that he was not altogether responsible for his acts. But this was the only question before the jury to decide; they had not to decide whether he had committed the acts or not, because that was admitted; they had not to decide as to the constitutionality of the court, because that could only come up before a higher court; so that the only question was whether or not the prisoner was insane. If they thought he was, they had the right to say he was not guilty; if they had a doubt as to his sanity, I have no doubt they were instructed to give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt, and were therefore in that case fairly entitled to say he was not guilty. But the very fact that their verdict was guilty, is the strongest evidence that the jury believed him to be perfectly sane and guilty of the crime he was charged with, and that they made no mental reservation whatever when they gave their verdict. We can go further. In the review of that case, the Chief Justice of Manitoba said:

"The counsel very properly declined to argue the question of the guilt or innocence of the prisoner."

And further:

"The prisoner was defended by able counsel and all evidence called which he desired."

The hon. member for Bellechasse said he was not able to get such evidence as he needed, yet Judge Walbridge says:

"He got all the evidence he desired. No complaint is now made as to the unfairness, haste, or want of opportunity of having all the evidence heard which he desired to have heard. The jury returned a verdict of guilty and recommended the prisoner to mercy."

It must be as plain as day that Judge Walbridge was satisfied in his own mind that the counsel for the defence had done all that could be done to defend the prisoner, that he had received a fair trial, and that the Court of Appeal was justified in sustaining the verdict.

"Upon this state of circumstances, the case came before the Court of Queen's Bench for Manitoba, by way of appeal, under section 77 of the North-West Territories Act, hereinbefore mentioned. It will be observed that the power of this court upon appeal is limited to the disposition of the case in two ways, viz., either in the words of the statute, to confirm the conviction, or to order a new trial."

If Judge Walbridge or his brother judges had thought there was any evidence of haste or unfairness, or that the prisoner could not obtain evidence which he was entitled to, the court had the right and power to order a new trial, and the fact that they did not was the very strongest argument that they were satisfied that the prisoner had got all the aid he could expect to get from the defence in that court. Judge Taylor says, in reference to the same case, that he confirms what was said by his brother judges, that Riel got a fair trial, that his witnesses were paid their expenses in attendance at the court, and that every evidence that could be advanced in his behalf was advanced. Yet the judgment of the court was that the jury was justified in their finding, and would not have been justified in giving another verdict. In reference to his insanity, I may perhaps be permitted to say a few words. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) in criticising the ability of the medical men who were called to examine the prisoner as to his insanity or sanity, made some very sweeping charges. He asked what did these medical men know? They were not experts, they had no opportunity of being skilled in the nature of the disease, of which they were called upon to give a verdict. The hon. gentleman must have forgotten that every medical man who takes a course must study this disease with others; but over and above that fact, the hon. gentleman seemed to forget that the medical men, called to give evidence in this case, were gentlemen who had been engaged in attending patients for a number of years afflicted with the disease this man is claimed to be afflicted with. Who were they? Take the first witness, Dr. Jukes. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) asked, in reference to one medical man, what did he know about the case, since he had only examined it for half an hour. He knew nothing at all about it. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) condemned Dr. Jukes' evidence because he was there month after month attending to the case, and because Riel was not made aware of the fact that the medical men were brought for the purpose of examining him as to his insanity. If there was one argument stronger than another, it is that Dr. Jukes ought to be able, from his long attendance on the prisoner, to give fair evidence in this case. He says himself he examined the prisoner every day. He is asked:

"Q. And how long have you been in medical practice?—A. Thirty-five years.

"Q. Have you devoted your attention to insanity at all specially, or not?—A. Never specially, there are cases of course which occasionally will come under the notice of every general practitioner, but as a special study I have never done so."

He goes on to say he had watched this man closely for over three months, had seen him every day, and was quite satisfied that the prisoner was sane. We ought to attach a great deal of force to this evidence on account of the fact, that Dr. Jukes had been attending the prisoner so long; that if Riel was endeavoring to convince the people he was insane, he would at times be off his guard, and the medical attendant would make a note of it. The next medical gentleman examined was Dr. James Wallace. He is asked:

"Q. What is your position?—A. I am Medical Superintendent of the Asylum for the Insane, Hamilton, Ontario."

Now, the evidence of Dr. Wallace is discredited on the ground that he knew nothing of insanity. Is it to be said that a man who has taken his regular degrees, who has been faithfully practising his profession for years, and, in addition, was medical superintendent of an insane asylum for over nine years, knows nothing about insanity? It is a slur upon the intelligence of these medical men, and upon the medical profession of the country, to say, that after such experience they can know nothing about the cases they are sent to examine. I think, on the contrary, we are fairly entitled to attach a great deal of weight to their evidence, and that evidence goes directly to prove that the prisoner was sane.—

"Q. An institution having how many patients on the average?—A. Somewhere over 600.

That shows Dr. Wallace had large experience in this line, and ought to know a great deal about insanity.—

"Q. How long have you been making this branch, a speciality of the insane, of the study of the insane?—A. I have been in charge of that asylum nearly 9 years, but I have been studying insanity for a few years more than that.

"Q. For more than 9 years?—A. Yes.

"Q. And you see every variety of it I suppose?—A. All shades and varieties.

"Q. Now, did you devote yourself to the medical branch of it?—A. Entirely."

Then he is asked the question:

"Q. And capable of distinguishing right from wrong?—A. I think so.
"Q. And know the nature and quality of any act which he would commit?—A. Very acutely."

I say this evidence is entitled to very great weight, because it is the evidence of a man who may fairly be called a specialist, who had devoted nine years to cases of insanity, and who had been studying insanity during other years. Next we have the evidence of Dr. Clark, and I may say that Dr. Clark's evidence was of a very peculiar kind, that it was an evidence susceptible of various interpretations; but this is the only evidence upon which the member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) places any weight at all. How much more is Dr. Clark entitled to be an authority than Dr. Wallace, the man of whom I have been speaking? Dr. Clark states that he has been attending a lunatic asylum for nine years, the same time as the other witness. The hon. member for Huron shows his unfairness in this matter because he is willing to accept the evidence of Dr. Clark while he rejects the evidence of the other man who has spent an equal length of time in attending a lunatic asylum simply because it happens to suit his purpose. Dr. Clark is asked:

"Q. Do you consider, from the knowledge which you have of this individual, that at the time the events detailed by the witnesses here took place, that is to say, in March, April and May last, that he was laboring under such a defect of reason from disease of the mind, that he did not know that what he was doing was wrong?—A. I think he did know. I think he was quite capable of distinguishing right from wrong."

Now, I do not know that there could be anything more conclusive than that. Then, we go on and take the re-examination of this case by the judges. One of them says: "

"Counsel then rest the prisoner's case upon the ground of insanity, and it is upon this latter point only that the prisoner called witnesses. The jury, by their finding, have negated this ground, and the prisoner can only ask, before us, for a new trial. We have no other power of which he can avail himself. The rule at law in civil cases is, that the evidence against the verdict must greatly preponderate before a verdict will be set aside; and in criminal cases in Ontario, whilst the law (now repealed) allowed applications for new trials, the rule was more stringent—a verdict in a criminal case would not be set aside if there was evidence to go to the jury, and the judge would not express any opinion upon it if there was evidence to go to the jury, if their verdict could not be declared wrong. I have carefully read the evidence, and it appears to me that the jury could not reasonably have come to any other conclusion than the verdict of guilty; there is not only evidence to support the verdict, but it vastly preponderates. It is said the prisoner labored under the insane delusion that he was a prophet, and that he had a mission to fulfill. When did this mania first seize him, or when did it manifest itself? Shortly before he came to Saskatchewan he had been teaching school in Montana. It was not this mania that impelled him to commence the work which ended in the charge at Batouche. He was invited by a deputation, who went for him to Montana. The original idea was not his—did not originate with him. It is argued, however, that his demeanor changed in March, just before the outbreak. Before then he had been holding meetings, addressing audiences, and acting as a sane person. His correspondence with General (now Sir Frederick) Middleton betokens no signs of either weakness of intellect or delusions, taking the definitions of this disease, as given by the experts. And how does his conduct comport therewith? The maniac imagines his delusions real, they are fixed and determinate, the bare contradiction causes irritability."

Now it was proved in evidence that the bare contradiction did not cause irritability in him, because, when he asked $100,000, and the party to whom he spoke said it was unreasonable, he was willing to take less. If the delusion had been fixed and determinate, it could not have been changed by the party who talked to him. Still, further, he was not only willing to change his mind and take $5,000, but afterwards he was willing again to change his mind and take $10,000, and let them do the best they could. Judge Walbridge further says:

"In my opinion, the evidence against his insanity very greatly preponderates. Besides, it is not every degree of insanity or mania that will justify his being acquitted on that ground. The rule in that respect is most satisfactorily laid down in the McNaghten case 10 Cl. & Fin. 200. Notwithstanding the party accused did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing some supposed grievances or injury, or of producing some public benefit, he is nevertheless punishable according to the nature of the crime committed, if he knew at the time of committing such crime that he was acting contrary to law.

"I think the evidence upon the question of insanity shows that the prisoner did know that he was acting illegally, that he was responsible for his acts.

"In my opinion, a new trial should be refused, and the conviction confirmed."

I need not state, after that, the decision of Judge Taylor, which is very much in the same direction; but I may refer for a moment to the new commission which was appointed to examine into this matter, composed of Dr. Jukes, Dr. Valade, and Dr. Lavell; and in regard to this I need only say, because this has been quoted several times in this debate, that every one of these doctors agree that, although Riel had a peculiar disposition in reference to questions of religion and politics, he ought to be held accountable for his acts because he knew right from wrong, and because he knew, when he was committing those acts, that he was violating the law. I will only further add a few words in reference to the contradictory positions which have been taken by various members of the party in reference to this case. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) in the outset of his speech announced that this was not a political question, that the members of his party were not to be bound by party ties but could vote as they pleased. It suggested to my mind that this party had had a caucus, that they had taken into consideration the influence this vote would have in every one of their different constituencies, whether they voted for or against the motion, and that they determined to act according to the complexion of their respective constituencies, and in that way to shape their views for or against this motion. They are not a unit in regard to it. Some of them who profess to be intelligent members of the party do not agree with even the leader of the party himself, who, though he is the leader cannot control his party, notwithstanding his great legal mind and all the argument he has brought to bear upon the question, and we are inclined to believe that he is unable to convince the majority of his friends that he is right in the contention he makes? What position must these hon. gentlemen occupy in the eyes of the people of the country? What feeling must be experienced by the supporters of the leader of the Opposition in the country when that leader is unable to convince even his own friends in the House, and yet he says he is convinced that he is right in taking up the ground he has taken and contending that this man was insane. What position will they be in when they go back to the country? They will appeal to their constituents to support their gifted leader on the ground that he is entitled to occupy the high position which he does occupy because his general policy is right. Now, if they support his general policy, and if they ask the people to support that policy they will condemn their own acts here; and, if they ask the people to endorse their acts, they will condemn their leader. I can only say like the press who support them, the members of this party are of the most heterogeneous kind, holding the most diverse views, arguing from various standpoints, and there is no unanimity of feeling or of opinion amongst them. Now I will take the expression of one of their papers with reference to this subject. When it was announced that Riel was captured on the 16th May last, the Globe said:

"This morning at a late hour the glorious news was flashed over the wires that Riel had been captured. There is no loyal heart in the Dominion that will not throb with joy at the announcement. It is much better that he should have been taken alive. A soldier's death, such as has befallen too many of our gallant troops, would have been far too good for the traitor-agitator."

Is that the position that it takes to-day? Is that the position the leader of the Opposition takes to-day? No, we find that it is the very reverse, that they are endeavoring to prove that his was not a crime that ought to be punishable by death, but rather a political offence that ought to be condoned; that while, perhaps, in the eyes of the law, he was guilty legally speaking, still there were other considerations on which he deserved a reprieve. I believe, Sir, that when the vote is taken on this question, we will see a spectacle that we occasionally find in the arena of politics. We will find hon. members in this House who have been cheering every point that has been made in favor of the motion, who have been supporting the contention that Riel was insane and cannot be held guilty of the crime—we will find, I believe, some of those men who will vote against that resolution, thereby saying that they believe the Government did right. I noticed the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and one of the hon. members for Huron, and various other members, who from night to night have been cheering the arguments made against the Government, and I shall look with some interest to see how these men will vote, because I am satisfied that some of those who have been cheering most lustily the arguments against the Government will be found supporting the Government when they have to vote. Then I believe that when we appeal to the country it will be found that the great mass of the people support the Government and will show that they have confidence in the integrity, the ability, and the intelligence of the men who discharge the high functions of their office here; I believe that the great majority of the people of this country will, at the next election, condemn the vacillating policy of the Opposition, and will condemn the course that has been adopted here, and will condemn the proposition that because the people in the North-West had some political grievances, the man who incited them to rebellion should not be hanged. I have one word to say with reference to a remark dropped by the hon. member for West Elgin when he was on his feet, namely, that the hon. Premier had agreed to give an amnesty to Riel in 1870 long before the offence was committed. Now does it not look very extraordinary that he should expect intelligent people to accept that statement? He asserts that an agreement had been entered into and an assurance given by the present Premier to Archbishop Taché, that an amnesty should be granted to Riel—for what? For offences that had not been committed. Now if he had given an assurance that the instigators of the rebellion in the North-West would be amnestied on account of political offences, knowing that there had been no crime of murder committed, then I could readily understand how it was explainable. But the hon. gentleman endeavors to bind the Government to the position that the Premier had agreed to grant an amnesty for all offences to be committed, which is absurd on the face of it. No person would suppose for a moment that any man possessing ordinary intelligence or judicial ability, would think of carrying out a promise that had not been made, as circumstances show that it was utterly impossible that it could have been made, to cover a crime of this kind even before it had been committed. I can only say that when the amnesty was given to Riel in 1875 by the Mackenzie Government, I believe they did it, not because they thought themselves bound to do it on account of any agreement that had been made by their predecessors, but because they believed they could make political capital out of it and make a good stroke of policy. I say, Sir, that taking the whole question in consideration, I believe the Government did right, and I believe the people of the country will approve of their action when they have an opportunity of pronouncing upon it. I believe also it is my duty, in the interest of law and order, and of the country at large, to vote against the motion now before the House.

Mr. GIROUARD moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If there was another hon. member who desired to speak this evening, it would be better to do so to-night, in order to shorten the sitting to-morrow. I know that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) is not well enough to speak this evening, and if there was another hon. member to speak in his place I think he would withdraw his motion.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET DEBATE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have been in session nearly a month, and I suppose that nobody is desirous of protracting it unnecessarily; and I would suggest to the hon. gentleman who is leading the House to consult with the Minister of Finance to see whether, if the debate is completed to-morrow night, the hon. gentleman could not lay his Estimates on the Table after the vote is taken. That would enable the hon. gentleman, if he is ready, to proceed at once, on the House reassembling, with his Budget on Tuesday; whereas, otherwise, if he is not able to lay the Estimates on the Table until Monday, the House would have but one of two days to peruse them before proceeding with the Budget discussion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I spoke to the hon. Minister of Finance to-day about this matter. Of course everything depends on the vote on this motion. If the Government are sustained, as I believe they will be, the Estimates will be laid before the House, and then, most likely, the Minister of Finance will proceed with his Budget speech on Tuesday.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11:45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 24th March, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

COLONISATION COMPANIES.

Mr. FARROW asked, Is it true that any person lost his land and home through the existence of any colonisation company? If true, the person or persons, and what the name or names of the company or companies?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is not true that any person lost his land or home through the existence of any colonization company; and, further, by the terms of the contract with the colonisation companies, no person could have lost his land or home, except by consent of the Minister, who would never give it.

RAILWAY FROM BUCTOUCHE TO THE INTER-COLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. COCKBURN asked, Has any application been made to the Government for a subsidy in aid of the construction of a railway from Buctouche, in the Province of New Brunswick, to Moncton, Richibucto, or any point on the Intercolonial Railway? If so, by whom has such application been made, and at what date?

Mr. POPE. Yes. An application has been made by Mr. Murray, Mr. Hutchinson and Mr. Leblanc, delegates. It was made on the 19th of February, 1884.

RIVIÈRE DU LOUP AND EDMONSTONE.

Mr. COCKBURN asked, Whether any application has been made by Mr. Grandbois, M.P., or any other person or persons, for an additional subsidy in aid of the Rivière du Loup and Edmonstone Railway? If so, what is the date of such application?

Mr. POPE. No such application has been made by Dr. Grandbois or any one else.

QUEBEC AND ST. JOHN RAILWAY.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth) asked, Whether any application has been made to the Government by Senator J. G. Ross, Mr. E. Beaudet, or any other party or parties, for an increase in the subsidies already granted towards the construction of the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway? If so, what is the date of such application, and what is the amount of additional subsidy asked?

Mr. POPE. An application was made on the 2nd of March, 1886. The amount asked was $2,800 per mile.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. AMYOT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to rise on a personal question. On the 18th instant, the hon. Minister of Militia, pretending to answer my opening speech on the Riel question, introduced parts of letters and telegrams exchanged between him and myself during the North-West campaign. Those extracts now go round the press, and are calculated to injure my character as a soldier. The Mail of the 23rd instant, after having quoted these extracts, goes on to say:

"But now comes the Calgary Herald with a chapter of rebellion history which casts some degree of doubt upon Mr. Amyot's courage and capacity, even as a defender of forts and provisions. The Herald says that one Sunday night a report reached Calgary that Big Bear was within a few miles of the town. At that time Middleton, Strange and Steele were after Big Bear, whose whereabouts was a mystery. The Calgary home-guards at once carried the rumor to Colonel Amyot, who was in supreme command. The home-guard intended to put a picket at Shaganappi ford that night, and, relying on the Ninth, they requested him to detail a company of his men to share that duty. What does the reader think was the warrior's answer? He refused, says the Herald, to let any of his men go on picket, on the broad ground that 'it was too—d dangerous!' And our Calgary contemporary adds that the veterans of the home-guard believe to this day that if Big Bear had swept down upon the town that night Colonel Amyot would have called them out to protect, not the women and children, but Colonel Amyot!

"This story may or may not be true. These wild western newspapers are much given to exaggeration, and it is easily possible that the Herald may be slandering the hon. and gallant member for Bellechasse. But it is quite certain that if he is to be Minister of Militia in the Race and Revenge Cabinet, it behoves him to vindicate his military renown without delay, so that, in the future as in the past, the country may confidently 'rely on the Ninth.'"

To prevent the Mail from undertaking too soon the conquest of Lower Canada, with which he has threatened us, I beg to state as follows: I deny entirely that accusation contained in the Calgary Herald, and of which I never heard before. I know there was, in that place, a so called home-guard, composed of its Captain, as far as I could learn. I did not care to have much to do with that chief for reasons that people visiting Calgary will learn easily on the spot. His personal home-guard did not seem to satisfy the rest of the population, and a volunteer company was formed by the citizens independently of his home-guard. In those local dissensions I did not interfere, but I acted all the time in harmony with the parties designated to me by General Strange. The town of Calgary begins at the buildings of the police, which are no more of a fort than the town itself. No enemy could have reached Calgary without passing by the crossing on the Bow and Elbow River, which we commanded by our situation, and nobody could have reached those crossings without our knowing it at once. My sentinels protected as well the town as the camp. One could not go without the other. I never heard a complaint whilst I was there, and I am surprised that the Calgary Herald, which has always been so friendly to us and paid us so high compliments, eight months afterwards produces such attacks. As to the telegrams read before this House, I beg to state that they are only extracts, conveying a wrong idea of their meaning and bearing, and that their production at this state of the proceedings, when I have no reply, when they will be, perhaps, for a month before the country, injuring my reputation, before I am at liberty to complete them, is an unjust and most unfair dealing, more especially when their production comes from a gentleman to whose friendship they had been privately entrusted, according to his desire formally expressed of his being appraised of my views on the manner in which the war was conducted. I do not intend to delay the discussion on the actual debate, but considering the delay that will take place before I can answer the charges made against me, I hope I will be allowed to refer to one of the telegrams quoted. The hon. Minister said:

"Now, here is another telegram dated at Calgary, 14th May, 1885: 'I add and persist in saying that this war should be made by men fighting in the same way as rebels.'"

In the copy I have of the telegram, immediately preceding the words "I add" are the words "for your private information I add." I think it would be better to read the whole of it:

"Necessity for scouts more evident every day. Wanted to prevent raid on railways. Will you authorize Major Dowling here or anyone else to engage at least twenty for here? Langden, Crowfoot and Gleiche. I warn Government because I am responsible here as senior and commanding. For your private information I will add that I persist in saying that this war should be made by men fighting in the same way as rebels."

In my imperfect English, I mean, that to meet without delay and expenses, an army of mounted men, it requires other mounted men. I was, and I am still of opinion, that the plan of employing infantry, more specially at that season of the year, was a great mistake; and the length of the campaign, the bill we will have to foot, are evident proofs of plausibility of my pretention.

"Volunteers (meaning infantry) more specially adapted for protection of forts and provisions."

That means that mounted rebels, moving with great rapidity, should be met by mounted troops moving equally fast, and that infantry, being rendered on the spot, could have been used to protect towns, provisions and ammunition located at divers stations, on lines of hundreds of miles. That is the meaning of that telegram. Its wording is not perfect; but when all the circumstances will be known, when the questions and the answers will be given, when all the facts will be known, nobody will be able to construe them otherwise. Besides, when we comply with the wish of a friend to communicate him our impressions, we are not so cautious as in writing an official diplomatic correspondence. I added: "Our volunteers are being slaughtered" (which was too true). "Five hundred scouts are worth two thousand volunteers," in other words, five hundred mounted men are worth two thousand infantry men "for actual fighting of that kind; men cheerful." I am not, I suppose, presumed to desire diminishing the value of the troops, of which I formed part. A braver set of men does not exist under the sun. Still, I believe that I was right in thinking, with many experienced and old officers, that the best infantryman is not able to meet a mounted man, in the open prairie, as fast as another mounted man would do. That is the meaning of my private telegrams to the hon. Minister; as I will further explain later on; and they were not altogether volunteered. On the 2nd of the same month, amongst others, I had received from the hon. Minister a telegram, saying:

"I was glad to hear from you; sorry to hear of ——'s illness. You are doing well. Keep me posted.—A. P. CARON."

The hon. Minister seems to desire now to change his telegrams. I will prove to him, when the time arrives for discussing those documents, that I do not change; that I do not alter one word of my letters, telegrams and addresses to him; that I still acknowledge his goodwill and doings towards the troops, and he will see then how wrong he is in the personal war he has undertaken against me for obvious political reasons, to defend what I honestly believe to be a bad cause. Awaiting that, and in spite of the explanations I will then give, some of the papers belonging to the Ministerial press will doubtless go on accusing and insulting me. I cannot prevent it; all I can say is that I resent it, and that that gives my friends and myself the true measure of friendship to be relied upon from those parties, and of their false pretensions, when they say that they desire peace, harmony and mutual respect in the divers parts of the Confederation.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Landry (Montmagny): "That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution;" and the motion of Sir Hector Langevin: "That this question be now put."

Mr. GIROUARD. After this protracted debate and the expression of the desire which has been made that the vote should be taken this evening, I do not intend to make a long speech. I wish only to offer a few remarks to explain the vote I am going to give against the Government. I made up my mind to cast that vote on the 13th of November last, when I joined with sixteen friends and supporters of the Government in the Province of Quebec, in transmitting to the hon. Premier the following telegram:—

"Under the present circumstances the execution of Louis Riel will be an act of cruelty, the responsibility of which we refuse to take."

Having been elected as a Conservative, and a Conservative in principle, I thought I could not come to that conclusion without consulting my constituents. I did so at the first opportunity, on the 15th of November, the day before the execution. I told them that under the circumstances there was no party tie strong enough to hold me in face of the execution of Louis Riel, and I offered them my seat. The answer was not only their unanimous approbation of the course I had taken, but the immediate transmission of a telegram to the hon. Premier in Ottawa informing him that the course I had followed was unanimously approved by my constituents. While voting against the Government and thus obeying the express desire of my constituents, I do not intend to change my political opinions. I am a believer in the National Policy and in the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway. To quiet the mind of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), I may even tell him that I do not intend to take back one proposition of the six hours' speech of last Session. Were I of the opinion that the Government of the day were primarily responsible for the rebellion in the North-West, as the Liberals of the Province of Quebec stated at meetings before the execution, I would blame the Government, not only for having executed Riel, but for not having granted him a full pardon; but I never held that opinion. I never contended that Riel was a hero; I always looked on him as a lunatic; and I blame the Government for not having treated him as such. That is the reason why I took part in the agitation in the Province of Quebec—an agitation which was condemned the other day in such strong language by the hon. member for Kent, New Brunswick (Mr. Landry), because he had no accurate idea of its true character and tendency. If he had been at those meetings, as I was, although I was not at many of them, he would be in a position to say before the House and the country that there were never any meetings in the Dominion of Canada more orderly, more constitutional and more loyal. The hon. member for Kent has referred us to the example of the good people of Acadia. Everybody knows that the poor Acadians, from the time they were dispersed like slaves all over this continent to a very recent period, if not to the present time, had been a long-suffering people. The hon. gentleman told us that these Acadians suffered quietly the dispossession of their land after seventy years of possession. He could also have told us that to-day they are suffering in silence the closing of a college—if I mistake not, the St. Louis College—because the French language was taught in it. The Acadian people have been, and, no doubt, are yet very patient; but I am very much afraid that under those circumstances their patience is not a virtue but a necessity. I will tell the hon. gentleman that whenever the rights of the French population of the Province of Quebec are assailed; whenever their nationality, their language, their religion, their institutions or their laws are attacked, he will find protests from the Province of Quebec; he will find agitation and resistance by all legal and constitutional means. We had an agitation, one perhaps more important than that which has brought about the present crisis, in the years 1872 and 1873. At that time the members from the Province of Quebec had the humiliation of standing alone. The hon. member for Victoria, New Brunswick (Mr. Costigan) asked the censure of this House on the Government for not having disallowed the New Brunswick school law. The French, I may say the Catholic members from the Province of Quebec, stood alone, except that they had the support of the hon. member for the county of Ottawa (Mr. Wright); but I say now, since the speech of the leader of the Opposition and the other speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen representing English constituencies, I can no longer say that this crisis is one of race or religion. In 1872, we were agitating for religious liberty for the French Acadians and the Catholic minority of New Brunswick. To-day, as far as I, at least, am concerned, I am protesting on behalf of personal liberty; I am urging the importance of showing respect for those laws which have been enacted in this country for the protection of life. To-day the man who is the occasion of this debate may be a poor, miserable lunatic, to-morrow he may be any other member of the community. If I had been called upon to draft the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), I would have worded it differently; I would not have put the question whether the sentence of Louis Riel should have been allowed to have been carried out; but I would have asked the House to censure the Government, not for having allowed the sentence to be carried out, but for having ordered the execution. If Riel had been convicted under the laws of the Provinces, the question would have been properly put as it is; but as he was convicted under the special constitution of the North-West, as he was convicted under a law which says that no sentence of death shall be carried out unless an order be given by the Executive. I say the question is whether the Government was right or wrong in ordering the execution of Louis Riel. The mode of administering criminal justice in the North-West is very different from the mode which prevails in the rest of the Dominion. In all the Provinces the presiding judge is independent of the Crown, and has nothing to expect from the Crown; the jury is composed of twelve members, and if it is the wish of the accused he may have, in the Provinces of Quebec and Manitoba, six of his own language or nationality on the jury. In all the old Provinces, there is a regular mode provided by law of summoning jurors; but what do we see in the North-West? In the first place, the magistrate who is called upon to preside is only a stipendiary magistrate, and holds his office during the pleasure of the Government; in the second place, we have only six jurors; in the third place, the accused is not entitled, as a matter of right, to a mixed jury; and fourthly, the judge is entrusted with the summoning of the jury. It is perfectly evident that the trial which took place under these laws, although a legal one, was not a fair one, was not British, as we understand the principles of British criminal justice. But, Sir, the constitution of the North-West, special as it is, has provided for certain guarantees against a miscarriage of justice. In the first place, there is an appeal given to the Court of Appeals of Manitoba, an appeal which does not exist in the old Provinces; in the second place, there is a final appeal to the Executive. Section 76 of the North-West Act of 1880 said:

"When any person has been convicted of a capital offence and is sentenced to death, the Stipendiary Magistrate shall forward to the Minister of Justice full notes of the evidence, with his report upon the case; and the execution shall be postponed from time to time by the Stipendiary Magistrate, if found necessary, until such report is received and the pleasure of the Governor thereon is communicated to the Lieutenant-Governor."

It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the review made by the Executive of Louis Riel's case, was a matter of right defined by the constitution of the North-West. The accused, when brought before the Regina tribunal, only raised two issues: the first one was the jurisdiction of the court, and the second the plea of insanity. The Manitoba Court of Appeals has pronounced upon both pleas and dismissed them. The Privy Council disposed only of the question of jurisdiction, but their Lordships took very good care to state that no argument had been offered on the plea of insanity. The case being thus disposed of in the courts, it then came, in the regular order of things, to the Executive. What was the duty of the Executive? I say that the verdict was wrong. If there was a doubt as to the justice of the verdict, if there was a doubt that the verdict was against the evidence, it was the duty of the Government to commute the sentence. In the examination of the case, the functions of the Executive are judicial, but after having arrived at the decision that the verdict was wrong, then the functions became administrative; that is to say, in finding out the means of preventing a miscarriage of justice. The Executive, in examining the case, is not a court of appeals in the sense that it can order a new trial as can the court of Manitoba; but in the sense that the duty of the Executive is to examine every part of the evidence, and see whether the verdict be correct or not. This proposition, I contend, Mr. Speaker, is the necessary consequence of the constitution of the North-West. If, as laid down by the hon. the Minister of Justice the other evening, the Government should not go beyond the verdict, if the Government has no right to examine the evidence and see whether the verdict is correct or not, then where was the wisdom, where was the reason of the law which says that all the notes of the evidence should be transmitted to the Executive, and, more than that, that the execution cannot take place unless the good pleasure of the Governor General has been transmitted to the Lieutenant Governor? But, even if the Government viewed this case as an ordinary case of clemency, even if the case had come from the old Provinces, my contention is that the Government were wrong in taking the view that they had no right to examine the evidence and go beyond the verdict. What is the practice of the Home Office in these cases? Lord Garnarvon said, before the House of Lords, in 1864:

"At present the prerogative of mercy was vested in the Crown, and administered under the advice of the Secretary of State. In the exercise of that prerogative the Secretary of State was called upon to pay regard to the moral aspect of the case, as contrasted with the legal. He had to deal with the representations made to him with respect to undue influence having been allowed to particular facts—that some particular facts had been withheld—that fresh evidence had been discovered, and that, in short, there had been a failure of justice. As matters at present stood, the Secretary of State was in the position of a court of criminal appeal."

I know that some high authorities have objected to the words "Court of Appeal" being used when speaking of the jurisdiction of the Home Secretary, because the Home Secretary can order no new trial; but it is admitted all round, by all those who are more familiar with the matter, that, if not in name, the jurisdiction of the Home Secretary is virtually a court of review. Sir S. H. Walpole, several times Secretary of State, and who was quoted by the Minister of Justice, said before the Capital Punishment Commission that the practice of the Home Office was:

"To examine the memorial which was sent with reference to the case; to consult the judge who had tried the case; to have a report from the judge of the evidence; to lay before the judge any new facts or any facts which had been brought under the notice of the Secretary of State, and to request from the judge a report as to his opinion upon that new evidence or upon the matter. Upon all these materials being brought before the Secretary of State, he was then in a position, not in the least degree to re-hear the case, but simply to advise the Crown whether there were any circumstances which would justify the exercise of mercy, either in an absolute or a qualified sense—that is to say, either pardon or commutation.

"Q. When you say that it is not the practice of the Secretary of State to re-hear a case, does not the Secretary of State go into the evidence?—A. Every atom of it. The Secretary assumes that, the trial having been conducted before a competent tribunal (that is, a tribunal constituted according to British principle), a right conclusion has been arrived at, unless it can be pointed to him that there is something upon which that tribunal has erred. But in the majority of cases even that point does not arise, because in the majority of cases the question submitted to the Secretary of State is whether there are not certain circumstances which have not been sufficiently brought before the jury which palliate the matter considerably, and which ought to induce the Secretary of State to recommend to the Crown an alteration or mitigation of the sentence.

"Q. And do you remember," continued the Commission to Sir S. H. Walpole, "that you there authorised an intelligent person upon the spot to have the distances measured, to show whether they were in conformity with the evidence which was impugned upon that ground?"—A. Certainly I did.

Sir S. H. Walpole continues his evidence:

"Dr. Lushington.—Q. But sometimes it operates as a court of appeal; take Smethurst's case?—A. It may operate as a court of appeal.

"Dr. Lushington.—Q. In a few cases where the question is one of guilt or innocence, it must act as a court of appeal?—A. Yes; not judicially, but of necessity.

Q. It must advise the Crown whether the case is sufficiently clear to justify the sentence being carried out?—A. Quite so.

Mr. Neave.—Q. In your experience is it not very unusual for the Home Secretary to act at variance with the recommendation of the judge who tried the case?—A. I do not think it is usual to do so in one sense, because I really believe, from my experience at the Home Office, that there is no necessity to differ from the judge who tried the case. Now and then there is such a necessity, and then the Secretary of State does take upon himself the responsibility of differing.

Q. There is no settled rule at the Home Office that you will not act at variance with the recommendation of the judge after you have put the case before him?—A. Certainly not.

"The Duke of Richmond.—Q. The judgment of the Secretary of State is entirely unfettered?—A. Absolutely unfettered."

Sir George Grey, who was Secretary of State at that time, in 1864, was also examined before the same commission, and he said:

"I see that there is an impression, from what is written upon this matter, that the duty of the Secretary of State is to sit as a court of review, and to re-try cases and set aside verdicts. The cases of that kind are extremely few. There was Smethurst's case, which was not decided by me. There the facts of the trial were re-opened; and one case occurred certainly to myself, which was a case of medical evidence, in which I had a great deal of communication with the judge. I did not think it altogether satisfactory, and I think that the judge was of the same opinion."

Since 1864 the practice of the Home Office has not become more rigid. In fact, if we judge from the statement of Sir William Harcourt, quoted by my friend the honorable member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) in his very able speech to the House, it has become still more liberal and indulgent, following, no doubt, the influence of the age, which is more and more against capital punishment:

"In the practice of the Home Office, where the jury recommended to mercy the capital sentence was never executed. There was the case of difficulty, however, where the jury recommended mercy and the judge did not second the recommendation, and in that case it remained for the Secretary of State to form his own judgment on the subject."

Speaking of the jurisdiction of the Home Office, when having to deal with a case just like the present one—a case of insanity—Sir William Harcourt says:

"There were cases in his experience where the evidence of insanity was not brought before the judge and the jury. * * * The Secretary of State had power to send medical men of experience and examine into the condition of the prisoner, and when these medical men reported, as they had done occasionally, that they did not regard the prisoner as responsible for his actions, either at the time of the commission of the offence or subsequently, the capital sentence was not carried out."

And Sir R. Assheton Cross, also once a Secretary of State, said on the same occasion, while discussing, in 1881, the Capital Punishment Abolition Bill:

"The right hon. and learned gentleman (Sir Wm. Harcourt), in his (Sir R. Assheton Cross's) opinion, most correctly stated what were the true functions of a Secretary of State in this matter."

Such were the duties of the Government under the Canadian Statute concerning the North-West, or at common law, as dispensators of the prerogative of mercy. Have they complied with these regulations? The first mistake I notice is the misapprehension they have made of their duty. I was surprised yesterday to hear it stated by the hon. Minister of Justice, who is certainly an able lawyer, that in dealing with this case the Government had no power to go beyond the verdict. Then what was the good of that Canadian Statute which says that the execution of a man sentenced to death shall not take place without an order of the Executive? Then, Mr. Speaker, what is the meaning of all the rules laid down by the Home Office, which say that the Crown shall examine into a case like this, regarding the insanity of the prisoner, either at the time of the commission of the offence or subsequently? It is the duty of the Executive to examine every particle of the evidence, to weigh it, and even to afford a chance to bring fresh evidence in order that there may be no miscarriage of justice. I blame the Government for not having complied with these rules. I blame the Government, in the first place, for having no report from the judge. I have read all the proceedings in this case, and have looked in vain for a report of the judge to see whether he was in a position to agree with the jury, in order that mercy might have been exercised by the Government; and I am surprised the Government has ordered the execution of the man without asking whether the judge who presided at the trial agreed with the jury. I blame the Government for having ordered the execution of Louis Riel because fresh evidence was adduced, the evidence of the three medical men, after sentence had been pronounced, and had not been referred to Judge Richardson for his report thereon, contrary to the practice prevailing in the Home Office in England. It was the duty of the Government to ask the opinion of Judge Richardson upon the value of this fresh evidence, to see whether, in view of it, he was in a position to recommend the prisoner to mercy. Mr. Speaker, we find another ground for clemency in the undue influence which was allowed to prevail during the trial in some particular facts. All the witnesses who were examined on the part of the Crown, or a great many of them, attributed the insanity plea to a purpose. They stated that Riel was not really insane, but that he was feigning and simulating insanity for the purpose of succeeding in his rebellion. This opinion, which was expressed by so many witnesses, was due to the great influence which prevailed in that portion of the country against Louis Riel; the witnesses had no reason to suppose that the insanity plea was only put up by counsel, and that the prisoner was feigning insanity for a purpose. When we consider that this trial took place under military guard, to protect the prisoner against public indignation, we can easily imagine the great undue influence that was allowed to prevail against the accused; when we examine the petitions which were sent to the Government asking for the execution of Louis Riel, we are surprised to see that not a single petition came from the whole Dominion except from Regina, where the man was being tried and convicted, and another from Moosomin, a short distance away—all coming from the very district whence the jurors were taken, where the judge was sitting, and where, within a short distance from the place, even the judges in appeal were sitting. I also blame the Government for not having exercised clemency, because the judge refused to allow some particular facts to be proved. I do not agree with the leader of the Opposition that the State papers which were asked for had no bearing upon the case, because they could not justify rebellion. I do not pretend that these papers would justify rebellion; I know they would not justify rebellion, but at the same time I think they might have gone a long way with the court in mitigating the sentence, if not in altering it. I blame the Government for the execution, because they were aware that important witnesses could be summoned, but that they did not summon them. The name of Dr. Howard has been mentioned during this debate. I am sorry, indeed, that the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), sitting here, as he does, as a judge, went to a man, whom he considered to be an important witness, and asked him his opinion on the case. He knows very well that is not the way cases are conducted by judges, or even by lawyers. I would have been very glad indeed if the Government, in issuing the medical commission, had given instructions to examine Dr. Howard, to have him cross-examined, and also to examine Dr. Vallée, of the Beauport Lunatic Asylum, who had Louis Riel under his treatment for two years, and who was unable to attend the trial because he was sick at the time. Sir, I blame the Government for not having heard those witnesses who were specially aware of the facts concerning the plea of insanity. There has been a diversity of opinion expressed on the floor of this House as to the value of the evidence adduced during the trial concerning the mental condition of the prisoner. I do not intend wearying the House by making quotations from that evidence. Every portion of it has already been quoted, pro and con, and is familiar to all the members. But, Mr. Speaker, the way I read the evidence I am convinced that the verdict was against that evidence, so far as the plea of insanity was concerned. It is said that the Court of Appeals in Manitoba was more competent to express an opinion as to whether that verdict was well founded or not than is this House. It is even said we have no jurisdiction in the matter; but I believe I have disposed of the latter point, that it is our duty to examine whether the verdict was supported by the evidence. Let us see whether there is any expression of opinion, either from the jury, the judge, or from the Court of Appeals of Manitoba, or from the Privy Council in England, so far as the plea of insanity is concerned. It is true the jury brought in a verdict of guilty; it is true we should take that verdict as it is—that it means that Riel was not so insane as to escape conviction. But the jury undoubtedly considered the question of insanity when they recommended him to mercy. Are we to be told that the jury really meant nothing by it? What were the pleas of the defence? They were: first, want of jurisdiction by the court; and second, the plea of insanity. I do not agree with the leader of the Opposition that a juror should explain the intentions of the jury. That is not the way a verdict should be attacked. I am more inclined to believe that the recommendation of the jury to mercy was based on what was before the court. What was before the court? Were the grievances of the half-breeds brought to the notice of the jurors? Not at all. Evidence on that point was not allowed by the judge. The only point brought to the notice of the jury was the plea of insanity, and whatever may have been the views of that particular juror who wrote to the leader of the Opposition, my conviction is that the recommendation to mercy can have no other legal meaning except that the jury had doubts as to the sanity of Riel, not strong enough to acquit him, but strong enough to cause them to recommend him to mercy and save him from the gallows. What has been the position of Judge Richardson? We know the feeling of the jury, that it was a feeling of mercy. Did the judge refuse to agree with the jury? I have already mentioned that the Government did not even trouble themselves by asking his opinion. The Statute says he shall forward the evidence with a report thereon. There is no such report. The practice of the Home Office of England is that the judge shall be consulted upon the evidence. He should have been consulted in this case as to whether he agreed with the position of the jury in their recommendation to mercy. He was not consulted, and it cannot be said to-day that the judge was against the opinion of the jury. I will not say anything as to the Privy Council because they were not called on to examine this question—was the Court of Appeals in Manitoba called upon to give a decision as to the propriety of exercising mercy? That court was called on to express an opinion as to whether a correct verdict had been found; but certainly they never expressed any opinion that there was not sufficient ground for the Government to exercise the prerogative of clemency. I hope the House will pardon me if I offer one or two more remarks upon this plea of insanity, which I believe is the great question in the case, in fact it is the only point at issue, so far as I am concerned. Was Riel really insane? As I have said, I do not intend to trouble the House by reading extracts from the evidence; but I find in that evidence an important fact, which is most important in helping us to decide the case. I find the fact established beyond doubt that Riel was confined in a lunatic asylum in the Province of Quebec by order of the Quebec Government. That he was insane at one time, there is no doubt; he was suffering from monomania on religion and politics. This fact is established beyond a shadow of doubt. He was in the Beauport Lunatic Asylum for nearly nineteen months, and was there when no reason existed for simulating insanity. What could he expect to gain by making such a pretension? He could have lived in liberty if he were sane. I am going to read from medical as well as legal authorities bearing on this case. Dr. Winslow says:

"In cases of murder, when insanity is urged as an extenuating plea, it is necessary to enquire whether the person has on any previous period of his life manifested any signs of mental derangement. If such be the fact, it ought to constitute a prima facie case in his favor."

Taylor on Evidence, vol. 1, p. 204, says:

"If any derangement or imbecility is proved or admitted at any particular period, it is presumed to continue, till disproved."

Best on Evidence, p. 372, ed. 1883, says:

"Although the law in general presumes against insanity, yet where the fact of insanity has been shown, its continuance will be presumed."

Let me quote specially from a recent authority. In the case of Close vs. Dickson et al, Superior Court of Montreal, 1872, Mr. Justice Johnson said:

"The law generally presumes all persons to be sane, and that presumption only disappears upon conclusive proof to the contrary; but when a person is once plainly proved to be insane, as this man was, the existence of a lucid interval requires the most conclusive testimony to establish it. I have followed the rule laid down in Taylor's Medical Jurisprudence and also in Wharton and Stille's work: 'Testimony to establish lucid intervals or partial or general insanity must possess two characteristics—first, it should come from persons of general capacity, skill and experience in regard to those subjects in all its bearings and relations; second, it should come as far as practicable from those persons who have had extensive opportunities to observe the conduct, habits and mental peculiarities of the person whose capacity is brought in question, extending over a considerable period of time, and reaching back to a period anterior to the date of the malady.'"

Then what becomes of the proposition laid down by the Government, that the onus of proof fell upon the prisoner? This fact being established beyond doubt, that Riel was a lunatic at one time, the onus of proof fell upon the Crown, and I say the presumption of insanity has not been rebutted by the evidence produced in the case. We have, on the contrary, sufficient corroboration of that presumption, at least so far as the state of his mind is concerned, as to leave no doubt that the verdict was rendered against the evidence. I refer especially to the evidence of Father André, Garnot, Father Fourmond, Drs. Roy and Clark. Where is the evidence of the Crown to destroy that presumption? Dr. Wallace is, no doubt, an able man, and a man in a position to judge of a case like this, but he is forced to admit that he had not the necessary time to give it justice. We have also the evidence of Dr. Jukes, who became acquainted with the accused only after the rebellion was over—after the excitement which brought his partial mania into operation was over. More than that, we have the admission by Dr. Jukes, that he is not a competent man. What does the rest of the evidence for the Crown consist of? We have the testimony of Capt. Young, Rev. Mr. Pitblado, Capt. Deane and Capt. Pigott. Many of those men never had any conversation with Riel, as far as those particular subjects are concerned, on which his mind was diseased, and there is a remarkable fact that all these witnesses never had any acquaintance with Riel before the rebellion was over. I think the Crown must have been very hard pressed to prove the sanity of Riel when they felt forced to examine General Middleton. Could they expect that General Middleton, just coming from a victory, was going to say that he had been fighting a fool? Certainly not; he was not going to hurt his own reputation in that way. You may judge of the character of the evidence by the additional fact that went to fight Riel and his followers, were among the witnesses. By this you may judge of the character of the evidence that the Crown brought forward in order to destroy the legal presumption that when a man is once a lunatic, once crazy, once a maniac, he is always a lunatic, always crazy, always a maniac, in the eyes of the law. Under these circumstances, I consider it was the duty of the Government to appoint a medical commission. This duty was so clear—I am not going to refer to private conversations—that we were led to understand by members of the Cabinet themselves that a medical commission would be appointed, and, in fact, the promise was made publicly and reported in all the ministerial organs in our Province. Under the circumstances, the least we could expect in view of—to use a very mild expression—the doubts which the evidence left on the public mind, as regards Riel's mental state, in face of the numerous precedents in England, it was the duty of the Government to appoint not a few medical men to examine the mental state of Riel since the sentence had been passed according to the rules stated by Blackstone, but to examine his state of mind in accordance with the practice of the Home Office. Blackstone, quoted by the Minister of Justice the other evening, did not mention a case where the Executive of the day had to consider whether there had been a miscarriage of justice, where the insanity of the prisoner before the sentence is at stake, but several Home Secretaries of State have provided for that case, and they consider it to be their duty in such case to appoint medical men of experience to examine the mental state of the prisoner not only since the sentence, but also at the time of the commission of the offence. The Government was strengthened in that position, not only as a sense of duty, but also by the numerous petitions which had been sent from the Province of Quebec and other parts of the Dominion asking for a medical commission. Sir, that commission was never appointed; and I blame the Government for not having done so, for not having fulfilled the promises publicly made that one would be appointed. What did they appoint instead? They appointed three medical men to ascertain the mental state of Louis Riel since the sentence. The jurisdiction of these men should have been larger; and, defective as these men were as far as their competency is concerned, they should not have been limited to an examination of the mental state of Louis Riel only since the sentence was pronounced. The first objection I have to the appointment of these men was, that they were servants of the Government. I feel certain that if these men had been independent of the Government, caring more for their reputation as practitioners than as servants of the Government, the original telegrams which have disappeared would never have disappeared. I also object that some members of that commission at least were incompetent. Dr. Lavell may have had some experience, but there is not a shadow of doubt—it was never pretended that Drs. Jukes and Valade had any. I also complain that this so-called commission—because they are not properly called a commission—were not allowed sufficient time to enable them to pronounce an opinion on the case. The eminent physician, Esquirol, says:

“There are some insane persons so reasonable that it is necessary to live with them and to follow them in every action of their life before pronouncing them mad.”

Dr. Hood says:

“How impossible then is it for casual visitors in passing through the wards of a lunatic asylum, to form a correct judgment of the real mental state of any of the inmates around them.”

Beck, in his Medical Jurisprudence, says:

“It is his (physician's) duty, and should be his privilege, to spend several days in the examination of a lunatic before he pronounces a decided opinion. If this be allowed to him, and also if he be enabled to obtain a complete history of the antecedent circumstances, much may be effected towards forming a correct opinion.”

This is also the opinion of Mr. Justice Johnson in the case that I have alluded to, and I believe that no authority can be quoted in support of the contrary view. Take, for instance, the celebrated case of John Trith, decided in 1790. He was charged with attempting an assault on His Majesty the King. His friends pretended that he was insane. He was brought before all the Ministers of State, and was examined and cross-examined by the Attorney-General. There were so many doubts as to his mental state that he was sent to Newgate, and there remained under the immediate surveillance of two eminent medical men—not for two or three days, not for one month or several months, but for two years, and it was only at the end of those two years that those eminent medical men were able to come before a court of justice where the man was tried for high treason, and to swear that, knowing the habits of the man so well as they did from such long observation, they had no doubt he was insane, and the result was he was acquitted of the crime and sent to a place of confinement. That is the way that the laws relating to personal liberty and the protection of life are understood in the old country. Is it only on this continent of America, in this Dominion of Canada, where our institutions are supposed to be modelled after the institutions of the Mother Country, that we may see the example of a man alleged by his friends to be insane, having his fate decided in a very few days—in fact, in a very few hours—and being sent to the gallows? In this Parliament, where there is a good deal of legal talent and as much impartiality as you will find in any court, we find the opinion freely expressed by hon. gentlemen of different races and religions, that that man was insane. Sir, it is a disgrace to this Government and to this country that an injustice of that kind could be even suspected. Another objection I have with regard to the appointment of those medical men, is, that their appointment and all their proceedings were kept secret. The reason given is that it was the only way to arrive at the truth, as Riel would be more clever than the doctors, and might make them find him insane although he would be sane. This contention is altogether unfounded. Dr. Winslow—and his remarks apply to the witnesses who contended that Riel's insanity was simulated—says:

“Is the insanity simulated? Persons conversant with the peculiarities of disordered minds, who have been in the habit of observing the manner of the insane, will have but little difficulty in detecting real from feigned derangement. Georget maintains that it is impossible for a person who has not made the insane a subject of study, to simulate madness so as to deceive a physician well acquainted with the disease.”

Now, the proceeding of the medical commission is contrary to the experience of our laws. A year or two ago we had a celebrated case of insanity in Montreal. I refer to the case of Mrs. Lynam. The judge, after having examined many witnesses, had doubts as to whether she was sane or insane, and he referred the case to a man of experience, Dr. Vallée, one of the superintendents of the Beauport Lunatic Asylum. How did Dr. Vallée proceed? Witnesses were heard; he examined the evidence that had been adduced; counsel, I believe, were also heard; the proceedings were open, because, as Dr. Winslow and all the great medical authorities say, it is impossible for a man to deceive experienced medical men in this matter; and on a certain day Dr. Vallée came before the court with his report, which was immediately read. It was not kept back for some weeks by the parties interested, but it was at once opened and delivered to the public in order that the public mind might be satisfied whether justice had been done in the case or not. What did we see in the case of Riel? Not only the proceedings of the medical men were kept secret, but even the report of that so-called commission was kept secret for a long time after by the Government. If the report of the medical men had been in favor of the Government, as is contended to-day, why was it not delivered to the public, in order that the public might be satisfied that justice had been done in this case? I cannot conclude my remarks without offering my view of what is insanity. There is a great deal of diversity of opinion, it is said, on this subject between lawyers and doctors. A long time ago Lord Mansfield, in the celebrated Bellingham case, laid down the law to be that, no matter how a man may be suffering under delusion, he should not escape responsibility unless it could be proved that he could not tell the difference between right and wrong. The doctors went just as far in the other direction. They held that if a man was suffering under mania, no matter whether the matter complained of had any connection with the mania or not, he was not responsible. Between these two extreme opinions public opinion accepted the principle that a man suffering from a disease known as monomania, or is deluded on one or two subjects, is not guilty, if any connection can be shown between the crime complained of and the mania under which he suffers. It will not, perhaps, be uninteresting to show how far the medical profession goes in this respect. I will simply read a resolution unanimously adopted at a meeting of the Association of Medical Officers of Asylums for the Insane in the year 1865. It was as follows:—

“That so much of the legal test of the mental condition of an alleged criminal lunatic has rendered him a responsible agent because he knows the difference between right and wrong, is inconsistent with the fact well known to every member of this meeting, that the power of distinguishing between right and wrong exists frequently among those who are undoubtedly insane, and is often associated with dangers and uncontrollable delusion.”

The case of MacNaghten, which was the occasion of the expression of opinion from the English judges in 1843, will not support the contention of this Government that it is sufficient for the criminal to know the difference between right and wrong. Their Lordships, although giving no opinion upon any case before them, but upon abstract questions of law, always a dangerous thing to do, stated that a man suffering from monomania to be held irresponsible, must not know the nature of his act, or if he does, must not know that that act is wrong. Such was the opinion of the English judges in the Mac-Naghten case, but even their opinion in that case has not been considered as settling the question in England. Chief Justice Cockburn, in a letter, sent in the year 1879, on the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill, said :

"The language of the judges in the House of Lords has no doubt been repeated as of general application, but erroneously. Their answers had reference to the specific questions put them by the House."

And immediately after, he goes on to say :

"The point has not come under judicial decision in a case which really raised the question."

This was said in 1879. The answers given by two learned Judges of the Exchequer Court in England, before the Capital Punishment Commission, in 1864, shows that really the lawyers and doctors are not so very far apart on this question of insanity. Lord Cranworth, a long time Baron of the Exchequer Court, answered :

"Is there not a variation between the medical opinions and the legal definitions upon the subject? I am not able to answer that question; very likely it is so."

Take the opinion of Baron Bramwell, another Baron of the Exchequer Court, on the same question, which is to be found on pages 23 and 24 of the report of that commission :

"Mr. Neate.—I observe that in your last letter to the commissioners, as the result of your experience, you use these words: 'Six prisoners in six cases were acquitted on the ground of insanity, and rightly. I do not mean that the prisoners were insane as the law requires.' I observe that you say that they were rightly acquitted, although they hardly came within the limits of legal insanity. Have you alterations to suggest in the legal definition of insanity?—A. No; I think that the legal definition is perfectly right.

"Q. But you say that they were rightly acquitted, although their insanity was not to the extent which the law requires?—A. I will explain that observation, which is, no doubt, an apparent contradiction. What I mean is, that according to the practice of juries, which has met with the sanction of judges, or which has been without any reprobation from the judges, and which is in accordance with public feeling, these prisoners were rightly acquitted."

So much for the doctrine of insanity, and I believe that the law upon that point was rightly laid down by Lord Erskine as early as the trial of James Hadfield for firing at George the Third. He said :

"To deliver a lunatic from responsibility to criminal justice, the relation between the disease and the act should be apparent. When the connection is doubtful, the judgment should certainly be most indulgent, from the great difficulty of diving into the secret sources of a disordered mind."

This is what the Government should have done, and what they have not done, for there is a doubt, and there is more than a doubt—there is, in my mind, ample proof—that this man was insane; but if some hon. members are not willing to go that far, I claim there is more than a legitimate doubt in their minds that the man was insane, and the proposition of Lord Erskine, as to the difficulty of diving into the secret sources of a disordered mind, should be acted upon. I will not trouble the House with citing more authorities.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. GIROUARD. I hear an hon. gentleman say "hear, hear." I think he deserves to be afflicted with a six hours' speech, but I have too much consideration for the rest of the House, though I may not have much for him, to indulge in a speech of that length. I am not going to trouble the House with reading the report of the medical men, Dr. Lavell, Dr. Valade and Dr. Jukes. In my mind their conclusions are that this man was insane. Drs. Lavell and Valade said he was suffering from monomania on religion and politics. Does it require long comment to show there was connection between the rebellion and the monomania on politics and religion. I look upon another portion of the conclusion of these gentlemen as mere sophistry, namely, that with the exception of these two points, monomania on religion and politics, this man knew the difference between right and wrong. It is not within the province of medical men to testify to that fact. Their province is only to state the nature of the disease under which the man was suffering, and let the jurors, court or Government draw from that statement whether the prisoner knew the difference between right and wrong. Dr. Haslam, on that point, says :

"It is not the province of the medical witness to pronounce an opinion as to the prisoner's capability of distinguishing right from wrong. It is the duty of the medical man, when called upon to give evidence in a court of law, to state whether he considers insanity to be present in any given case, not to ascertain the quantity of reason the person imputed to be insane, may or may not possess. It is sufficient," continues Dr. Haslam, "for the medical practitioner to know that the person's mind is deranged, and that such a state of insanity will be sufficient to account for the irregularity of his actions."

I will conclude these remarks, in order to give more time to other hon. gentlemen who wish to explain their position. I heard, the other day, the Minister of the Interior say that it was a matter of very little importance whether petitions were sent from the country or not to the Government, on the question of the proper exercise of the prerogative of mercy. I was never so much surprised as to hear that the Government are not in duty bound to consider such petitions. In most cases they are the only mode that can be adopted to show the Government what public feeling is on a particular case, in order to induce the Government to exercise the prerogative of mercy. Was the public feeling which prevailed throughout the whole Dominion with regard to the fate of this unfortunate man in favor of his execution? It was thought at one time that strong influence was brought from an influential body of men asking for Riel's blood. When the papers were brought down, we found only three petitions from the whole Dominion calling for his execution; one from the Orangemen of the western district of Toronto, and two from the citizens of the Dominion living in Regina and Moosomin. No one else asked for the life of this man; but, on the other hand, we find, at the last page of the report, that there were 75 to 100 petitions asking that his life should be spared, if he were not altogether pardoned. As far as I am concerned, my constituents sent petitions to the Government, not asking for pardon, because, like myself, they were not in favor of giving liberty to this dangerous lunatic, but asking for commutation. Where was the clamor asking that this man should be executed? It is not to be found anywhere, except, perhaps, in the articles of the Globe and the Grits of Ontario, but since when has it happened that the Government of this country are to be dictated to by the Globe and the Grits of Ontario? Why did they not take public opinion as represented by the Mail and by their own friends, and by the Conservatives of Quebec, as well as the Liberals of that Province? Why did they take the view of the Grit party? I cannot understand it. I say that, in view of the exhibition of public opinion to-day in this House, when we see that an important portion, the Grit party at least, has changed its mind, when we see that the Globe shows that it was not serious in making representations asking for the blood of that man, it is perfectly clear that the whole public opinion of the Dominion was in favor of the commutation of that sentence, and I blame the Government for not having understood that public opinion. Now, before taking my seat, I wish to refer to a statement made at the opening of the Session by the right hon. the Premier of this Dominion. He stated that, when he was banquetted by the St. George's Club in London, he was forced to testify in favor of the loyalty of the French Canadians. I am sure that more than one of us last December was surprised to see that the Premier was placed in that inexplicable position. As to a man having a language different from the language of the English people, having a religion different from the majority of the English people, having a veneration for institutions which may not be the institutions of Great Britain—are the people of England not aware that such a man can be a loyal man? Look at France; look at Alsace and Lorraine—German Lorraine; has France ever found within its dominions men more loyal, although they were Germans, although they spoke the German language, and although most of them professed a religion different from that of the French people, than the inhabitants of those Provinces? Look at Great Britain herself, look at the French population of the Islands of the British Channel; are they not faithful to their language? Do they not love their language, their laws, and their institutions; and has Great Britain any more loyal subjects than the French inhabitants of those islands? Taking the Scotch, the Irish, and the English people, do we not see different nationalities and sometimes different local laws; and who can pretend that these different nationalities are not devoted to the British Empire and to the British Crown? Are we going to be told that, in England, they do not know the history of the French Canadians? That might be said, perhaps, somewhere on the continent, but it cannot be said in Great Britain. They know there as well as we know in this country that in 1776 the French Canadians of that day had to fight General Lafayette and officers under him who had been in the Canadian army a few years before. These French Canadians fought for the glorious British flag, which was then deserted by many of England's own sons. Look at 1812. Was it not a French Canadian—Colonel De Salaberry—and his three hundred braves who repulsed the invasion of the Americans at Chateauguay? Look even at 1837, which, perhaps, will be quoted to us as a sample of disloyalty. We were not then disloyal to the Crown or to the British Empire. It was only an uprising for the redress of grievances and against a tyrannical Canadian Government. We were then fighting for the privileges of responsible government, and without that fighting I doubt very much whether the privileges of responsible government would have been given so soon to the Canadian people. Look, later on, to the year 1865 or 1866, when we were threatened with a Fenian invasion. Were the French Canadians behind their fellow-countrymen of other origins. No, they were to the front; and I recollect well my hon. friend from Montreal East (Mr. Coursol) taking the musket in his hand in defence of the Canadian flag and British institutions. Look, later on yet, to 1869 and 1870. There was then a rebellion in the North-West, which has been brought under the notice of hon. members so often during this debate. Then, as in 1837, the French half-breeds were fighting for liberty, they were fighting for the privileges of responsible government, and against the tyranny of the Canadian Government. I said so last year during that six hours' speech, and the facts cannot be controverted, and they were not contradicted during that debate, that when the rebellion took place the Government had not a particle of title to the lands in the North-West. These men, in the absence of any local authority, took the law in their own hands in order to secure for their people political liberty, and we have to-day the testimony of even the enemies of the half-breeds of that time—the testimony of a man like Mr. McArthur, an officer of the Hudson Bay Company, who was himself a prisoner of Louis Riel in those days, in a statement which he made at a public lecture in Winnipeg, that to the firmness of the half-breeds in 1870 the people of Manitoba were indebted for the privileges of responsible government. And, last year, did our countrymen remain behind? Notwithstanding anything which may have been said, I do not think it can be pretended that our men did not go to the North-West for the purpose of defending the Dominion flag and the Dominion authority; and if all the French Canadians did not see fire, there were at least two companies who went in pursuit of Big Bear under Colonel Strange, and Colonel Strange was the first man to admit that he never wished to see better soldiers. Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of all these facts we believe that Sir E. P. Taché was right when he said that the last shot fired for British connection on the American continent would be fired by a French Canadian. Why is it, then, that the hon. Premier, in discussing Canadian affairs at a banquet given by the St. George's Club, had to defend French Canadians against the imputations which were then made upon their loyalty? It was in consequence of the utterances of the organ of the Conservative party in the Province of Ontario, the Toronto Mail, who should have known the French people better. That leading paper was not satisfied with denouncing us as bad party men—I would have allowed him to do so in face, perhaps, of some provocation which the Mail received from papers in the Province of Quebec—but when the Mail branded us as rebels, and threatened us with a second conquest, saying that at that time there would be no Treaty of Paris, I say then there should have been a protest, not only from the hon. Premier, but from every member of his Cabinet, to show that the Mail was not expressing the opinion of the Conservative party of the Province of Ontario. Why threaten us with no second Treaty of Paris? I ask the English minority of the Province of Quebec if they ever suffered from any bad treatment or injustice at our hands? Have they not received fair play from the French Canadians? If there is one who can say so, I would like him to rise and say so. No, Mr. Speaker; we have respected the feelings of the English minority of the Province of Quebec—not only their feelings but their prejudices; and, Sir, occupying in this Dominion the position that the English minority occupy in the Province of Quebec, we expect, we have a right to expect, that they will respect our feelings and even our prejudices.

Mr. DESAULNIERS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker: At this advanced stage of the debate, I understand that this House is anxious to get through with this question, and I shall ask the House to be lenient towards me while I shall explain in a very few words the vote which I am called upon to give on this important question. In assuming the responsibility of the execution of Louis Riel, the Government have placed themselves towards us in a position which is beyond the limits assigned to party discipline. The Government cannot, on the present occasion, rely on that strength of organisation which is necessary to all constitutional and parliamentary Governments. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask this House to be allowed to address it for a few moments, in order to explain the vote which I am about to give on that question. The question, to my mind, is of the highest importance. The Government and those who support it on this occasion are trying to diminish the importance of this question. According to the Government and their friends, it is simply the execution of a murderer, it is simply the carrying out of a very ordinary law. For my part I do not look upon it in that light. The execution of Louis Riel is certainly not the carrying out of an ordinary law with regard to an ordinary crime. Louis Riel was charged before the courts in the North-West with the crime of high treason. In order to fully understand and thoroughly consider this question, and to judge it as we ought to do, it is necessary for us to know what were the grievances of the half-breeds, what was their situation in 1869, what it was in 1885, what were the faults of which the Ottawa Government had been guilty of towards them; and we should also know whether, for all these reasons, the half-breeds were not justifiable to a certain extent, or whether, at least, their rebellion of 1885 was not excusable. In the Province of Quebec when the people learned the execution of Riel, they rose as one man. There was in the Province of Quebec an agitation which was reported throughout the world. Not only was there an agitation among the people of the Province of Quebec, but the whole press of the Province, including Le Monde, La Minerve and Le Canadien protested against this execution. On the next day after the 16th of November there was not a single dissenting voice in the Province of Quebec. The Ontario press, and also the press in the United States, in England and in France took an active part in the discussion. And since this debate has been going on in this House we have seen the inhabitants of our capital thronging into our galleries in order to hear the discussion. Numberless citizens came from all parts of the Dominion to hear the debate. Well, Mr. Speaker, would all this have taken place if this was simply an ordinary question? Would all this agitation have taken place with regard to the just punishment of a crime? No, Mr. Speaker: Riel, alive, was the leader of the French half-breeds; Riel, dead, is to day the emblem of their cause. The Province of Quebec being a French Province sympathised with the half-breeds, and understood and felt that it had been humiliated when Louis Riel was executed. The Province of Quebec had, time and again, during the last fifteen years, forgiven numberless faults which had been committed in the North-West. The representatives of the people in this House, during the last fifteen years, may have forgiven to their friends in power the extortions which have been committed by the Government employees in the North-West; they may have forgiven to their friends numberless other faults which deserved censure, they did not wish to be too severe on them, and this was the case under the Conservative Administration as well as under the Liberal Administration. But in presence of the Regina scaffold, I do not believe that we would be justifiable in showing party spirit, and I think it is our duty to vote, one and all, without regard to party ties, and without flinching, against our friends in power. Not that I wish to say that those who will vote in favor of the Government will commit a fault against themselves and against the country. I do not view the question from that standpoint. I will bow with respect before the opinion of each one, and each one will vote as he shall deem proper. As for myself, I hope that while I am bound to dissent from my friends on this question, it will be believed that I do it in the interest of the country, as I understand it, and to satisfy my conscience. In this country the best way to preserve peace, and to maintain that harmony which is necessary to our prosperity, is to give equal justice to all. The people of the Province of Quebec believe—and I am one of those who think that they are right—that on this occasion the Government did not give equal justice to all. What makes me think so is that I have heard, at the beginning of this debate, the hon. Minister of Public Works making a comparison between the execution of Riel and that of Thomas Scott. Well, Mr. Speaker, certain rumors, certain reports lead us to think that, to a certain extent, the Government have in part acceded to the demands of the Orangemen of Ontario, who insisted that Riel should be executed as a punishment for the murder of Scott. I have heard the hon. Minister of Public Works making such a statement, and it is not the only occasion on which I have heard Ministers speaking in that sense. Neither was this the only occasion on which I took cognizance of the fact—either through newspapers or otherwise—that the execution of Scott had actually exerted a strong influence on the decision arrived at by the Government. However, it seems to me that this question of the execution of Scott should have been sufficiently understood before the 16th of November last to make it impossible for the Government to order the execution of Riel on the ground that he was guilty of the execution of

Scott. What are the facts with regard to this unfortunate Scott case? We must go back to a period which is anterior to 1869, when the Dominion Government sent their employees in the North-West Territory, and even before the transfer of the territory by the Hudson Bay Company to the Government had been finally settled. It is well known that these employees committed extortions against the half-breeds and created great dissatisfaction among them. After the beginning of the negotiations and the various transactions which took place between the Dominion Government and the Hudson Bay Company, in order to effect the final transfer of the Territories, it will be remembered that Governor McTavish deemed it proper one day to resign the authority which he held as Governor of these Territories. It was then that Riel, in concert with the half-breed population of the North-West, formed a provisional Government. This provisional Government was established with the consent of the people, since forty delegates were duly elected by the people of the North-West. When these forty delegates, forming the Council of the nation, were assembled in a meeting, they formed a certain organisation and elected Louis Riel as President. This organisation had within it a council called "Council of War." Thomas Scott who was opposed to the establishment of the provisional Government, and who refused to submit to that Government, was then brought before that Council, and that, independently from Louis Riel. It will be remembered that, according to records which we have seen on that question, and the evidence heard when the investigation took place in 1874, Louis Riel had no power whatever on the Military Council of the provisional Government. Consequently, Thomas Scott was executed independently of the personal desire of Louis Riel. Now, to hold him responsible to-day, and to have held him responsible on the 16th of November, 1885, of the murder of Thomas Scott, was, and is still, an injustice which is contrary to the history of the North-West; and consequently the Government could not, in any way, take their decision on the ground that Riel was more or less guilty of the execution of Thomas Scott. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, even if Louis Riel had been guilty of that crime in 1870, it may be asked, why should a man be punished twice for the same crime, and under what law can a man suffer two punishments for the same offence? Had not Riel been sufficiently punished when, after his trial, he was exiled from the country? Lepine was also tried and imprisoned for a year; Goulet was drowned in the Red River, in atonement for the murder of Scott. Were not all these punishments sufficient to satisfy those who desired to avenge the death of Thomas Scott? I am of opinion that the case of Thomas Scott should in no way whatever have influenced the decision of the Government in ordering the execution of Louis Riel. Still less should it influence the proceedings of this House to justify this execution. The only ground on which the Government should have based their decision, was the fact that Louis Riel had instigated the rebellion in the North-West. Well, Mr. Speaker, when fomenting that rebellion, had not Louis Riel some causes for dissatisfaction and some reasons for rebelling against the authorities in the North-West? Did the grievances of the half-breeds amount to absolutely nothing? Was not the fact that the Government of Canada had taken possession of the North-West Territories, in 1869 and 1870, without in any way consulting the half-breed population of the Red River and the half-breed population of the Saskatchewan and of the Territories, a grievance in their opinion? Was not the fact of sending there a swarm of officials who spoke only one language, which language was unknown to the whole half-breed population; was not the fact of having sent their leaders sent to penitentiary in 1874 and at various times after their legitimate defence against the Government of Canada in 1869 and in 1870,—were not all these facts causes for dissatisfaction among them? Was not the fact that laws were made without consulting them, a cause of dissatisfaction for the half-breeds? Was not the fact that they had to make such frequent claims for the rights which they pretended to have on lands in the North West, which they had always considered as their property, that they had to travel hundreds of leagues and to send thousands of petitions without ever receiving a satisfactory answer, a sufficient grievance to explain the rebellion if not to justify it? If the half-breed rebellion in the North-West, if the fact that Riel became the leader of his countrymen to claim their rights, are not justifiable, they are at least excusable; and if the cause is due to the fault of the Governments of both parties in this House, should not the present Government have taken all these facts into consideration before the 16th of November and before the execution of the sentence pronounced against Louis Riel? Mr. Speaker, have we not had from the present Government the admission that the half-breeds in the North-West have suffered for the last fifteen years; have we not the avowal from the Government that at least for the last fifteen years the half-breeds have been ill-treated by the Canadian Government? Have we not repeatedly heard the hon. Minister stating that when the Liberals were in power from 1873 to 1878 the half-breeds had been ill-treated? What have the Half-Breeds to do with our politics? What difference do they make between the Tories and Grits, between the Rouges and Bleus? They know nothing about them, the Government is always the same thing for them. Therefore, we have at least, out of the last fifteen years, at least five years, while the Liberals were in power, during which the half-breeds had been ill-treated by the Canadian Government. And since that time, since the rebellion of 1885, did not the Government put Mr. Macpherson out of the Cabinet? Was not the dismissal of Mr. Macpherson an avowal that the half-breeds had been unfairly used with regard to their claims for land? Have not the Government, by settling about 2,000 claims during the last seven or eight months, admitted that the half-breeds had been ill-treated? Now, if the Government, when it was a question of ordering the execution of Riel, had considered that they had committed wrong themselves, when the life or death of Riel was in their hands; if they had considered that they had not done their duty towards the half-breeds, would they not have felt that it was just and reasonable at least to show mercy towards the half-breeds and towards Riel? Now, what kind of a trial did Riel have? Did the trial of Louis Riel offer all the guarantees which are necessary in a trial of that kind? The laws and procedure in a criminal case in the North West are laws and procedure of an exceptional kind. When the Act of 1880 was passed, so well did the Legislature understand that the provisions of the Act of 1880 were exceptional provisions, that it enacted that in the case where there would be a sentence of death, the execution would not take place without the interference of the Government. The Government were obliged to interfere to have Riel hung. I have often heard the hon. Ministers saying since the execution of Riel, that they had not deemed it their duty to interfere, and that the law had to follow its own course. Was the trial conducted with all the cautiousness which was required? A Protestant judge, six Protestant jurymen; an English judge, six English jurymen. The very fact that the accused, Louis Riel, was arraigned before a jury of six instead of twelve, the very fact that Louis Riel was arraigned before a wholly Protestant jury, should have militated in his favor when his case came before the Government. And why? Because the Act of 1880 seems to carry the impression that when the Legislature passed that law, it was well understood the right of putting a convict to death ought not to be left with a magistrate and six jurymen of a nationality and creed different from that of the accused. The Legislature having understood that it could not avoid passing exceptional laws for the North-West enacted at the same time that the life of a convict would not be left within the hands of a court organised in that way. When Riel's counsel asked for a month's delay to enable them to prepare their defence, to come in the Province of Quebec after their witnesses, the stipendiary magistrate refused to grant them such a reasonable request, he granted them the derisive delay of eight days. Was it possible for the counsel for the defence to go to Quebec in eight days, or even to write and secure the necessary witnesses to prove the only defence of the accused, that is that he was unsound in mind. This delay of eight days, I repeat it, was simply derisive; Riel's counsel could not within these eight days secure their witnesses and prepare their case in a proper manner. What was the consequence? My hon. cousin, the member for St. Maurice (Mr. Desaulniers) wrote a letter in which he informed the country that as a medical expert, that as a specialist in the employ of the Government of the Province of Quebec, as inspector of the asylums, he could state that Louis Riel had been confined for several months in the asylum of St. Jean de Dieu, and in that of Beauport; that on several occasions he had seen Riel during his madness and had ascertained that he was really insane. Well, the member for St. Maurice, in spite of his good desire to help the cause of Louis Riel, did not know, and could not know, that Riel's counsel at Regina wanted his deposition. On the other hand, Louis Riel's counsel at Regina did not know what information the member for St. Maurice had on this point. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is fully certain that if the deposition of the member for St. Maurice had been heard at Regina, that deposition would have had a great weight. In face of the fact that the trial did not seem to have been conducted with all the necessary care, were there no reason to use clemency towards the prisoner when the question came before the Government? Now, when the jury returned their verdict, so little did they seem to be convinced themselves of the true moral guilt of Louis Riel, that after having fulfilled what is technically called the formalities of the law, they appointed one of their members to tell the court that it was their intention to recommend the prisoner to mercy. Why did not the Government follow that recommendation? What reasons were given by the Government? What reasons were given to the public on which they could base their refusal to follow the verdict as a whole? I have heard no plausible reason on their part. I have seen nowhere any reason given to uphold the pretension that the Government should not have accepted in its entirety the verdict of the jury. The Government have stated through the Minister of Justice that the trial of Louis Riel had been perfectly legal. On that point, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is any doubt that Riel's trial was conducted in a perfectly legal manner. Others before me have had doubts on the legality of the trial, and they have taken the responsibility of dispelling those doubts. It is with that object in view that Riel's counsel took the cause of their client before the Court of Appeal in Manitoba, and before the Privy Council in England. The judgment of these two courts was that the trial of Louis Riel had been perfectly legal. But it is not especially for that reason that we protested against the execution of Riel, because we have no more doubts on the legal technicalities of the trial, and even if we had, we should say nothing about them, because the courts in Manitoba and England have decided on the legality of the trial; but what we complain of is the fact that the Government have not used clemency towards Riel, under the circumstances. Besides that, it was proven that Louis Riel at the time of the trial was not sound in mind, and consequently was not responsible for his acts nor for the part he had taken in the rebellion of the North-West. This question of insanity is extremely difficult to solve. If we are to take the evidence of the medical experts who have been sent by the Government, I believe that it is difficult to say whether Riel was really responsible or not for his acts during the rebellion, and whether or not he was responsible for his acts when he was executed. There are so many contradictions in the different reports that the conclusion to be drawn from them is, at least, that there was a doubt as to the mental state of Riel. And, Mr. Speaker, I have myself asked the Government to be pleased to let the House know whether they had taken the necessary steps to obtain information on the intention of the jury at Regina when they recommended the prisoner to the mercy of the court. Even more, I have asked the Government whether they had received information or communications on this subject from any of the jurymen, and the Minister of Justice has answered that none had been received to his knowledge, and that, at all events, if there were any they would be laid on the Table of the House. Well, Mr. Speaker, the jury of Regina themselves had conceived a doubt as to the moral responsibility of Louis Riel, and it is for that reason that they recommended the prisoner to the mercy of the court, or rather to the mercy of the Government, because, as regards the jurymen, the word court was delusive, for they knew perfectly well that they were appealing to the mercy of the Government, since the court could not help giving the sentence which was given. Can it be supposed that a jury composed of six Englishmen who had been victims of the rebellion of 1885, could, at that moment, show enough of goodwill and leniency towards Louis Riel to recommend him to mercy out of friendliness towards the prisoner. This is not plausible. Now, if the jury at Regina have recommended the prisoner to mercy, it was because there was at least a doubt in their mind, as to Riel's responsibility for his acts. The Government, by carrying out that part of the verdict as they carried out the other part, would have done absolutely nothing contrary to the interest of the public; they would have done nothing contrary to the interest and future quietness of the people of the North-West, by giving the prisoner the benefit of the doubt which the Government could not help conceiving, having before them the returns of the trial such as they were brought down before the House. I shall now quote a short extract from Guizot, whose authority as a writer is already established before this House, which makes it useless for me to insist upon it. Here is what he says:

"It is especially for political crimes that the right of pardon seems to be reserved, for those crimes whose character is sometimes doubtful, with which may be allied errors in good faith, sentiments worthy of sympathy, when society is not evidently or entirely threatened, when danger, the chief element of the offence, is dispelled; finally, when the example of utter failure is more efficacious than punishment would be."

And further on:

"It may even be presumed that in this sphere the customary use of clemency, instead of discouraging the severity of the judges and jurymen, gives it more freedom and makes it less timid. So, natural is this idea, that the public have, at times, seemed to think that a given political sentence was only pronounced in view of the prospect of a pardon which would palliate its severity. Thus, apart from the economy of blood there might be the advantage of the facilities for examples; the power would have all the benefit of moderation, and the citizens who often hesitate before the courts, and with great reason, when a man must be sent to the scaffold, would manifest with less anguish their disapprobation of his attempts or designs."

Thus, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that, according to Guizot, the Government could have taken it upon themselves to have followed this last part of the verdict without at all running the risk of exposing the North-West to new troubles. It is a matter of regret that this House has not in its possession what I believe to have existed, to wit: the documents which must have informed the Government that the intention of the jury, in recommending the prisoner to mercy, was that he should not be executed, on account of a doubt as to the moral responsibility of Louis Riel. Here is what I have read in a newspaper, and what, besides, I have learned personally from persons who came from the North-West some few weeks ago. That is what gave me the idea of asking the Government whether they had received information from the jury explaining their intention in recommending Riel to mercy. Here is what Le Progrès de l'Est says:

"The following are new details of the highest interest with regard to the intention of the jury in recommending Riel to mercy. Young Brooks, mentioned here below, is a nephew of Mr. Justice Brooks, of our city. He is very favorably known, and noted for his intelligence, uprightness and love for justice. The details are furnished to the press by a friend of Mr. Blondin, a settler at Qu'Appelle—where Mr. J. Z. O. Miquelon resides—who is now on a visit at Three Rivers:

"A settler from Qu'Appelle, Mr. Pierre Blondin, is now on a visit in this city. Mr. Blondin has for a neighbor at Qu'Appelle a Mr. Brooks, formerly of Sherbrooke, who went to the North-West some time ago, and who was one of the jurymen at the trial of Louis Riel. Mr. Blondin states that his neighbor has repeatedly declared to him that the unanimous desire of the jury, in recommending the accused to the mercy of the Crown, was that he should not be executed. The jury certainly found him guilty of rebellion, but, owing to the peculiar circumstances which were established during the trial, they were unanimously of the opinion that he did not deserve the extreme penalty of the law.

"Another very extraordinary circumstance is the fact that, according to Mr. Brooks, the jury, after the trial, informed the Government of the exact sense of their verdict of recommendation, in order to prevent any error."

Well, here are facts which, of course, are not proved before this House, so as to dispel every doubt; far from it; but they are facts which, with a great many others, have created, and are still creating, in the Province of Quebec, a dissatisfaction which has been, and is still being, manifested in a manner which has been noticed by everybody. Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my remarks, and I believe that the conclusion which we ought to draw from the present situation is that the 16th of November, 1885, is and will ever be a fatal day for our country. The execution of Louis Riel is a dark spot in the history of the Conservative party. History will tell in one of its bloody pages that civilisation, at the beginning of its work in the vast regions of the North-West, has stained its flag with the blood of a political martyr.

Mr. MASSUE. At this stage of the debate I do not intend to make a speech upon the question so fully and ably discussed on the floors of Parliament. I simply rise to explain the vote I am about to give, and to say why, upon this question, I am not in accordance with the political friends with whom I have acted since I have had the honor of a seat in this House. When, in November last, along with others, I signed a telegram to the right hon. leader of this Government, informing him that, under the circumstances, it was a cruelty to hang Riel, and that I would not be responsible for it, I was under the impression, as I am now, that he was insane. I was assured, after the trial at Regina, that a medical commission would be named to enquire into the mental condition of Louis Riel, and the commission was named. I took no part in any of the public meetings that were held all around me, but waited calmly and patiently for the opening of Parliament where all the reasons required should be given. I listened very carefully and very attentively to what has been said, and when the medical report was laid on the Table I read it very carefully. In reading the report of Dr. Jukes I thought there was something wrong in the mind of Riel. Reading that of Dr. Lavell, I find that he says that Riel suffered from religious and political monomania, and Dr. Valade says that he was under religious and political hallucinations. As it was a political trial, why should not the Government have given him the benefit of the doubt and sent him either to prison or a lunatic asylum for the remainder of his days? For these reasons I shall vote in favor of the motion of my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Landry).

Mr. BURNS. I rise, not for the purpose of making a speech on the question before the House, but for the purpose of correcting a statement made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). I think it is very much to be regretted that matters totally irrelevant to the subject under discussion should be introduced here; but, having been introduced, it is well that when an hon. member makes what I consider a misstatement he should be put right. The hon. gentleman, in his allusion to New Brunswick and the Acadians, stated that the College of St. Louis was closed because the French language was taught there. To that statement I wish to give a denial. I am satisfied that if the College of St. Louis is closed at all, it was not because the French language is taught there. That statement implies a charge against the ecclesiastical dignitary under whose particular care that institution is, or was. I think it can be said of that ecclesiastical dignitary that to him is due, in a very great measure, all the advancement made by the Acadians in his diocese since he has been at the head of it, and that is over twenty-five years. I am safe in saying that the Acadians in New Brunswick—at all events in that diocese—advanced more within the last 25 years than they did in the 50 years preceding. I need only instance the fact that all over that diocese are established institutions in which that language is taught, institutions presided over by ladies and gentlemen of French origin. I need only refer to the fact that in the town in which I reside there are two institutions, and in the neighboring parish there is one institution. In Chatbam there is a large educational establishment for both males and females, and in the neighboring town of Newcastle there is also one. All these institutions are taught by ladies and are presided over by Sisters of the Congregation of Notre Dame, and the great majority of those ladies are French. Therefore I think it is not correct to say that the College of St. Louis was closed because the French language was taught there.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Mr. Speaker: A newspaper having announced last evening, which announcement I read the first thing this morning, that I had become suddenly a penitent, that I was very near abjuring the errors which, with my colleagues in the Government, I had been suffering under of late, and that I was, in the near future, going to bid adieu to political life—I only wish that could be true—and that I would retire repenting; and as the paper wished I should employ the last days of my life in prayer, so as to be forgiven by God and man, I thought I would take this first opportunity of making my last confession of the great crime of which I have been accused during several months past, and I hope I shall make it as plain, as complete, as full as possible, so as to satisfy both friends and foes. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether I can do justice to this debate. I know it is, perhaps, out of place for me to apologise for not speaking in the language which is my mother tongue; but every time I rise in this House, every time I have to express what I feel deeply and vividly in my heart, and have to express it in a language which is not my own, I think it is necessary for me to apologise, for the English language, that has taught the world the great lessons of liberty, does not give me that full freedom of expression which I would have in my own language. What a change a year can make in the ideas of men, in the feelings of men! What differences do we remark when we look over the proceedings of last Session, as I did yesterday! Read over Hansard and compare dates with this year. The 19th of March last year, St. Joseph's Day, the day named after that great saint, whose name is synonymous with fidelity and loyalty, was chosen by Louis Riel as the first official day of his rebellion in the North-West. On the 9th of March Louis Riel inaugurated the rebellion, in acts, in his official declaration, in his open opposition to both civil and spiritual power in the North-West. On the following days, the rebellion was in full blast, and the day after to-morrow will be the anniversary of one of the sad events of our history—the anniversary of the Duck Lake fight—when some of our bravest soldiers, some of the good men of the North-West, fell under the bullets of traitors and rebels, led by Louis Riel, fell victims to the treachery of a criminal band, who, after destroying Government property, after ransacking and plundering the stores of industrious citizens, after having seized and taken prisoners the men who were doing their duty under the laws of their country, in the protection of the Canadian and the British flag, had torn down the flag of Her Majesty and had begun that rebellion of which I hope we will have to-day the last recollection. I hope that the memories of men will not recollect it, after we have done our duty to-day and said that the country cannot countenance those who would like this House—representing the interests, the desires, and the wishes of the people,—to say that that event was one which would be excusable and justifiable in the eyes of true Canadians. We all remember the feeling that pervaded this House when, on the 22nd, 23rd and 24th of March, the news arrived that really a rebellion was existing in the North-West, and that the agitation which had begun many months before had taken the form of an open revolt. We remember the feeling that existed in this House. It is true that then, as since the beginning of this Session, some gentlemen on the other side, exercising their rights as members of Parliament, had been asking for information, had been clamoring for papers, but still the House went on with the performance of its duties until the day we heard the sound of rebellion, and learned that the sons of Canada, at the call of the Government, had to go up and fight that revolt. Sir, when the news of the Duck Lake fight arrived, there was not one man to be found here who would not have said frankly and openly that those who had commenced that rebellion, those men who were ignoring the laws of the country and rebelling against them, were deserving the severest punishment of the law. I remember a few days later, when a newspaper in Ontario had had the audacity, as it was then styled, to say that my hon. friend sitting on your left had been actually giving countenance to the rebellion, that he had been aiding the conspirators against the peace and integrity of the country, that the hon. members sitting on that side of the House were accomplices of those in the North-West who were trying to take those large Territories away from their allegiance to our Sovereign, I remember what took place in this House. I remember seeing the hon. leader of the Opposition rising in his seat, his features altered, trembling with emotion and saying, with tears in his voice, that there never was such a slanderous insinuation cast upon him and his party as to say that he and they might be called accomplices or even sym-pathisers with the rebellion in the North-West. We all remember the hon. member for West Durham stating that he had a relation whose blood had already stained the snow of the prairies, that he had a nephew whose life was in danger, that his son and his brother's son were ready to shoulder their muskets and go to the Saskatchewan and fight against those who wanted to commit that attempt against the liberties of the empire, and the good name of the people of Canada. At that time we responded to the expression of those feelings; and I remember the right hon. Premier in this House getting up in his seat and saying that whatever differences of opinion there might be between him and hon. gentlemen opposite, he thought the article in question was an ill-advised one—that we all here in this House sympathised together in supporting the laws of our Dominion, and keeping in its integrity the fine country which we are now administering to the glory of those who acquired it, and the glory of the Sovereign who rules over us. Who would have said then a word of justification of that criminal band that was beginning a rebellion on the shores of the Saskatchewan? Who would have thought, when the hon. gentlemen who left this House to take upon themselves the arduous and dangerous task of leading their men to the field of battle—who would have thought when we were all shaking hands with them,—who would have thought when we said good-bye and farewell to the late lamented and regretted member for East Durham, whose name has been revered and cherished, and loved amongst us, since he lost his life in the defence of his country—who would have thought then that in this House, twelve months afterwards, we would have been asked to vote regret for the lawful execution of the leader of that rebellion? When Colonel Williams left us here, shaking hands with us, and telling us: "Yes, gentlemen, I am going, and I am proud and happy to perform my duty to my Queen and country, proud to leave you whilst you are doing your duty here," who would have said to him, "Oh, yes, you are going there to risk your life, but twelve months after this, from his seat in Parliament, a member will rise and say: "I want to declare by my vote that those who killed you and your brothers deserve the sympathies of Canada, and that we regret their punishment!" Mr. Speaker, I regret the execution of the late rebel leader, Louis Riel, because I cannot find in my heart a place for a feeling of pleasure or rejoicing at the ignominious death of a fellow-being. I regret the execution of Louis Riel as I regret those painful occasions when a sacrifice of human life has to be made for the vindication of the law or for the protection of society. I regret, Sir, the execution of Louis Riel because of the unhappy trouble he has caused in one of the finest Provinces of this Dominion. I regret the execution of Louis Riel because of the occasion it has given for discussion in this House, in which, to use the expression of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), "words have been said that should not have been said, things have been uttered that should not have been uttered, and sentiments have had room for expression which should not have been expressed in this House." I regret the execution of Louis Riel for those reasons; but I cannot condemn the punishment of his crime. Providence, Sir, suffers the mysterious agencies of human passions and the free will of men, to mark dark hours in the history of nations. Louis Riel has written with his own hand and with his own deeds the darkest pages in the history of the North-West of this Dominion; he has signed those bloody pages, and sealed them with his blood on the scaffold of Regina on the 16th of November last. The scaffold has spread its hideous shadow over the newly christened town of Regina—christened after the name of our beloved Sovereign; and the virgin soil of the Province of Assiniboia was torn open to receive the dead body of a man who had sown the seeds of discontent, of revolt, and of war and death in a land which should have been reserved for peace, unity, happy tranquility and industry. The solemn sanction which was then given to the law should deter all other men, and deter, I hope, all other evil-disposed and evil-thinking men from imitating his example. Unfortunately, Sir, from the cell of the doomed agitator, from the scaffold, and the grave of the executed criminal, there came the wind of revolt and the poison of national animosity, which pervaded one of the great Provinces of this Dominion, and which threaten even now, perhaps to a larger extent than we believe, the future tranquility and destinies of the Dominion. Mr. Speaker, if I bring to your recollection these sad events, it is only to show you the unfortunate position in which are placed those who in the Province of Quebec have espoused—some with sincerity and good faith, others with schemes for political supremacy—the cause of rebellion, which, it cannot be denied, has produced in this country one of the most unfortunate periods in our political history. Mr. Speaker, it is the deep feeling of the danger arising from the present crisis which has animated me during the whole of that period, and which has often driven away from my lips and from my pen words of anger and words of violent rebuke, which would have been justified by the treatment to which I and my hon. colleagues in the Government have been subjected for over three months past. During that time, Sir, we have seen an infuriated and maddened mob tearing to pieces our likenesses, and hanging and burning us in effigy; but this has had upon me no other effect than to make me feel more pity than anger towards the crowd who had been excited against us. In the city of Montreal my portrait has been for days exposed in windows, bearing on the forehead a large stain of blood, to convey the idea that I was the murderer of one of my fellow-countrymen. Sir, I forgave that villany. As one of my friends in Montreal remarked: "The poor individual who did that has himself on his brow a stain which neither rubbing nor washing will ever take away," and calls back to my memory the following lines:—

Car le gouffre est immense et la tache est au fond."*

I forget easily those attacks prompted by the public excitement, but there is one thing from which I have suffered—it is this: These demonstrations were called by men who had been associated with me in friendship, and knew me better than with sincerity to call me a traitor and a coward. I, a traitor! Mr. Speaker, I have been now over 27 years in active public life, and I think I could ask from friends and foes this testimony, that I have been true to my Sovereign, true to my country, true to my party, true to my friends. Sir, if there is one reproach which I do not deserve from either side of the House, it is the reproach of treachery. I have been at times accused, and accused by the press of my hon. friends opposite, of having perhaps too much political loyalty. They have also called me a coward. Well, it is hard to speak of oneself, but I might say of those who have uttered this charge, that their hearts would, perhaps, have faltered if they had had to go through the ordeal through which I have passed since the 13th November last. To have retained the courage I have retained, to have faced what I have faced, to have refused what I have refused, to have done what I have done—does not, I ask those who have called me a coward, merit for me that epithet! But, as I have said, feeling that the occasion was one which seldom presents itself in the life of a man, feeling deeply the danger which, I thought, was menacing our country and our nationality, I kept away from my lips and my pen any words of anger against those who abused me. I might also say here, there was another reason that prevented me from resenting those insults. I am frank, and I must say that, whatever might be the cause, the movement that spread through the Province of Quebec did not surprise me, and if I have not reproached, in bitter terms, my friends for what they have done, it is because I thought that, although we, the Ministers of the Crown, had not failed in our duty towards the Crown, towards our oath of office, towards our country generally, perhaps we were in fault to a certain degree in not having taken more care in the direction of public opinion in the Province of Quebec. The cause, the main cause of the trouble in that Province has been the exaggerations of the Conservative press. I have stated to my friends that the trouble we have had, the dangers we have run, the consequences from which we may probably suffer, would not have been occasioned if the press, and especially the Conservative press, had been better directed. It is true that, as people say, it was in the wind, it was everywhere, the atmosphere was full of it, and nobody could escape; but I am surprised to see that men, such as some of our friends in this House, should have been caught with the disease—let me call it that name—yielding to that movement, forgetting their old associations, and becoming parties to what I consider to be one of the greatest mistakes that our population in the Province of Quebec has ever made. I know that they have yielded to what they considered a good feeling, a national sentiment. I am not one of those who believe that that natural national feeling is not one which deserves praise. The population in our country, being divided, as it is, in different nationalities, the affirmation of the rights of one fraction of the people is not bad in itself. That pride in one's nationality is a thing that might be productive of good results; but, as all strong passions, it is dangerous; like all powerful motives, it must be regulated, otherwise disorder will result; like all those strong agents on the human organism, taken in a moderate dose it is a splendid remedy, but taken in an immoderate dose it becomes a poison. In this instance our friends have exaggerated that feeling, and hence we have seen in the Province of Quebec that outburst of sectional animosity which we all deplore, and which, I trust, will end after this House has taken its determination and has given the vote which moderate, deliberate men are asked to give. But, Sir, we have not here to deal with those demonstrations; we have to deal with the question which is proposed to us, and that question is this: Was the execution of Louis Riel one which we, the House of Parliament—we, the House representing the views, feelings and ideas of the country, should condemn or approve? My hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Landry) has put his motion in a particular way, and in his opening remarks he said: "I have not qualified the expression of regret for the execution of Louis Riel; I have left to everyone the right to choose the reason why they should regret that execution." I must say this was perhaps in the idea of the mover a skilful arrangement with a view to draw as many votes as possible for his motion, but I understand that he wanted to say that everyone might express his reason why the execution should be blamed or should be approved. As I have said before, I would be ready to unite my sympathies with his if he only wanted an expression of regret, if there was not coupled with that an expression of blame for the action of the Government in asking that the law should be carried out. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), who has taken upon himself the defence of the rebellion in the North-West, was very careful, in the beginning of his remarks and during the whole of his speech, to say that the movement which had been carried on in the Province of Quebec was not a political movement; secondly, that it was not a national movement; and further, that the House had not to decide upon those questions. My hon. friend said it was not a political movement. Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask everyone of those who saw the beginning of that agitation to say whether it was so or not? I ask those who saw the press, before this Session opened and during this Session, whether there was nothing in that movement of a political character, whether there was nothing but a sincere desire to see if the law had been justly administered or if a great injustice had not been done in the execution of the law? My hon. friend will allow me to ask him, how did the agitation begin in Montreal? It did not begin with the meeting of the Champ de Mars; it did not begin with the outburst of the Conservative press which made it a general question in the country; it began when two of the friends of the hon. member for Quebec East started the movement. I must give credit to those to whom it is due. Mr. L. O. David, of Montreal, was the originator and initiator of that movement. He was assisted, it is true, in his effort by a man whose name and profession are more modest, by a bailiff of the name of Phaneuf, one of the agents of the Liberal party in Montreal. They began to create an agitation in Montreal, and everyone knows how easily that is done in a large city. Then, in regard to the delays in the execution of the sentence, there were the reporters who had been sent by the press to report the proceedings of the trial at Regina, and who, instead of reporting truly and boldly the proceedings of the court, were sending to the press in Montreal fantastical reports having more the color and shape of novels than of true reports from a court of justice. These were the beginnings of the movement in Montreal. After a while, when it had taken shape, everybody was expecting—what? I must say it, Mr. Speaker—on one side, among the Conservative friends in Montreal, some were expecting that the Government would take the side of mercy, would treat that question with the view of trying to preserve peace by the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy, and the Liberals were only speculating upon the Government carrying out the law to its fullest extent and to its direct execution, so as to have a lever upon public opinion for political designs. I do not dissimulate what was public opinion in the city of Montreal. What was the state of things in that city in the month of October? I arrived in Montreal in the beginning of October, and I was met by friends who said: "Well, there is a great movement pervading the country, and it is for you to be at the head of it; it is for you to see that justice is done, but at the same time that mercy is given by the Government; we must lead public opinion; we must not allow the Liberals to take the lead; we must not allow them to gain the confidence of the electors, to arouse a national feeling in the country." This was the state of things in Montreal in October. One party was looking for political aggrandisement and triumph. The other party was looking truly, sincerely, earnestly for something which they thought was due to the national services that have been rendered by the Conservatives and the French Canadian nationality. One party was looking for power; the other party was looking for mercy. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), said: "No, we have been careful to abstain from any political declaration on that subject." Yes, Sir, and that is true in words; that is true like that loyalty on the lips of which my hon. friend from Quebec East spoke, and to which I will allude in the course of this debate. My hon. friends were saying: "No, let us cast aside all political differences, let us all be united as one man to ask the Government to do justice." But, Mr. Speaker, I who knew what was going on, I who was made the confidant of many indiscreet confidences, knew one thing, after petitions had been sent, after all influence had been exercised to try to obtain the result of what was then asked by, I might say, the whole population of the Province of Quebec, I heard this, and I shall quote the words from a letter which was sent to me, after it was announced in Montreal that the Government had taken a decision, from one of the hotels in Montreal where a little conclave of Liberals had been held waiting for the news from Ottawa; and, learning that the Government had decided that the law should be carried out, one of them said:

" Eh bien ! tant mieux.

" Nous avions bien peur que le vieux Sir John n'eût arrangé cela pendant qu'il était en Angleterre pour en laisser la responsabilité au gouvernement Impérial, comme dans l'affaire Letellier. Mais cela nous vaut vingt comtés dans le Bas-Canada."

This declaration, Mr. Speaker, cannot be denied. It has been sent to me quite warm from the lips of the man who said it, and it is a secret to nobody in Montreal that all the Liberals openly said: "We have got them now; we have taken the Conservatives with us, and now that the Government is obliged to see that the law is carried out, twenty counties will come to us in the Province of Quebec. We thought that the great schemer, Sir John, would have arranged it in England." I received a letter to that effect whilst I was in Paris, in which one of my friends, not belonging to my own political party, said: "I know very well how it will be done. You will be a partner in that scheme, and you will arrange it so that the Imperial Government will take the responsibility, and then you will go flying along, sails to the wind, and again you will carry your elections." Sir, that has not been done, and the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government had no such design when he was in England. But that was said, and it is an indication that the movement had not that character which the hon. member for Quebec East gave it, that is non-political and non-national, but having only for its object the fair and just administration of the law to all, and mercy to who deserves it. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) has said that those who were asking for the head of Riel were not, friends of the Government. Those who were asking for the head of Riel were the organs representing the Liberal party in Ontario. They were clamoring for his death, believing, as the Liberals of Montreal had said, that the Government would be unable to settle that question without appealing to the Imperial authorities. But I will not take up the time of the House to show the insincerity of those who pretend now that they are working in the cause of humanity, and who were then asking for the head of the man whose fate they now pretend to deplore. They did not want—what shall I say? to save Louis Riel from death? No. The moment they knew that his fate was sealed, the moment they knew that the grave would soon be closed over him, they began the agitation. Their sympathy is only for the corpse of the man, but it was not for the body and soul of the living man. It is true, Mr. Speaker, our Province got excited over it, and it is one of the traits of my nationality to have that chivalrous spirit for which due credit is not given to us. It is not the first time that spirit has shown itself in favor of others—I hope it will be the last. We saw the same thing in 1872 in reference to the New Brunswick school question to which my hon. friend for Jacques Cartier has alluded. The whole Province of Quebec was aroused. The Conservative party was split in two; more than that, I think the majority of the Conservative party in that Province left the ranks for the moment. What did the leader of the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec say then? Sir George E. Cartier said: "Gentlemen, you are taking a course which you ought not to follow; you are the minority in the Dominion, and you are setting a precedent which will be turned against you." That lesson, Sir, was one which should have been remembered. As soon as our friends opposite came into power, the sympathies which they had shown us previously, soon vanished, and even those for whom the Conservative party had fought came up and said that they expected to find the Province of Quebec satisfied with the law against which it had nearly revolted. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Quebec East; in his speech, has tried to make the House and country forget his speech on the Champ de Mars—not by repudiating it, but by making, in this House, even bolder assertions than those he made on that occasion. What do we find in his speech? First, a plea in justification of the insurrection; second, the cruel treatment which the Government meted out to a defeated man in his struggle for liberty against a despotic Government; and at last—I was surprised to hear the last part of his speech, which actually pulled down the fine edifice he had built up; after having crowned his hero with the halo of a martyr—he finished his portrait of Riel by saying that the Government had not taken sufficient pains to prove that his idol had nothing more than feet of clay and legs of sand, but that even his head was not in the right place, and that his hero was an insane, forgetting that Riel or any other man could not be both a hero and an insane. Well, my hon. friend has said the Government had acted badly towards the half-breeds, and that the insurrection on the Saskatchewan was justifiable—not only excusable, but justifiable, he said. And how, and why? He said the legislation of 1879 concerning the half-breeds of the North-West was nothing but the completion of the legislation of 1870. But he added: You have taken from 1879 to 1885, the whole of that time, to give justice to those people who were entitled to what you gave them in 1885, under the Act of 1870. I admit, for argument's sake, the delays of the Government have been faulty. But they were only delays. And has the hon. gentleman considered that the responsibility for those delays bears much more heavily on the Government to which he belonged than it does on this Government? No, he forgot that circumstance. If his own Government had not given as an answer to the half-breeds that they would not be treated otherwise than as white settlers, those delays might perhaps have been avoided and the revolt of 1885 averted. In that great display of eloquence we had from the hon. gentleman, he declared that the Government had only moved when bullets were coming upon them. But the hon. gentleman was obliged to admit that on 26th January the Government had decided to grant those rights, and to send a commission to see that those rights were granted to the parties entitled to them. He has stated that the Government did not want to give the half-breeds their rights and do justice to them, and that they only intended to take a census of the half-breeds who might have been entitled, under treaty rights, according to the Acts of 1870 and 1879. He thereby dealt the heaviest blow at the Government, of which he has been a member, and at those who have taken up arms against this Government, in stating that we had had the prudence to think as to who were entitled to the rights according to the Act of 1879. The hon. gentleman was forgetting, that of all those who rebelled and fought on the Saskatchewan, not more than 21 had really a right to claim land under that title. The other half-breeds, who were acting with Riel, had already obtained land by virtue of the Act of 1870, after the transfer of Manitoba and the North-West Territories to the Government. In that list, it is true, a few names were given among the rebels, but those were probably the greatest proportion of those who had reasons to urge their claims before the Government. If that hon. gentleman had occupied a seat on the Treasury benches, he would have said what we have said, and he would have said more than the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said, when he refused the whole of the rights demanded by the half-breeds. I was surprised when I heard the hon. member for Quebec East say that what is hateful is not rebellion but the despotism that induces rebellion; what are hateful are not rebels but the men who having the possession of power did not discharge its duties. The sentiment expressed by the hon. member might be very good for a rhetorical display, a very happy answer to the remark of the Minister of Militia, who said that in his heart he hated rebellion and hated rebels; that might be a very fine answer in a debating club, but in the mouth of a Privy Councillor the statement that what he hated was not rebellion and not rebels was an expression which should not be heard in any deliberative assembly. The hon. gentleman thought he could answer the declaration of the Minister of Militia by saying that if Sir George Cartier, the great leader of the French Canadian Conservative party for years, had been here and had heard the statement of the Minister of Militia, holding the same portfolio that Sir George Cartier held, he would have reproached him for his words, for he, in 1837, had been a rebel. I wish Sir George Cartier could have been here to have heard the words of the hon. member. He might have said perhaps that in his youth, carried away by ideas of liberty, he joined a movement which was much more justifiable than the North-West rebellion, and he might have been found in the ranks of the rebels. But that distinguished statesman would probably have said to the hon. gentleman what I heard him say one day, that if he had been taken with arms in his hand and been executed he would have received nothing but what he deserved. The hon. gentleman cannot quote words from Sir George Cartier that he was right in rebelling against the authority of his sovereign; he never heard him mention a word to that effect. But if Sir George Cartier had done so he would have been speaking of an occasion, not at all identical with the insurrection of 1885 on the Saskatchewan; and although the hon. gentleman may be able to show that rebellion and rebels, when viewed through the magic lantern of his eloquence, were justifiable, he would never convince good Canadian subjects that the recent rebellion in the North-West could be properly compared with the movement of 1837. I have to thank the hon. member and his friends for not having repeated in this House what they have stated all over the country, that those martyrs of the North-West should be honored and applauded equally with the victims of 1837-38, to have the veneration, and the admiration, and the respect of our fellow-citizens as those heroes have. My friend from Quebec East could not have repeated these words in this assembly. He knows that his old friends in Lower Canada, who were associated with the agitation of 1837 and 1838, would have repudiated him. I have a letter here from one of those men of 1837, who says it would be a mockery to think of it—and this man is a true Liberal, a Liberal in heart and not a mere political schemer—he says: "I told my friends: Do not be guilty of putting the mockery of a martyr for liberty among those who have been real martyrs to the cause of freedom? Do not desecrate that tomb in the cemetery in Mount Royal, at Montreal, and do not class those who sleep in that tomb with this man. They would blush to see his name associated with theirs, and would ask him what he has done with the money which his ambition and his cupidity wanted to have, while they gave their blood for their principles when treachery was offering thousands of pounds for their surrender." My hon. friend did not make a happy allusion when he wanted to assimilate those two cases, or when he said that Sir George Cartier, if he had been here and had been the leader of the Conservative party, would never have allowed the execution of Riel. I can recall one case which occurred when Sir George Cartier was Attorney-General, and when he had the sad duty to perform of reporting in favor of an execution. In that occurrence, Cartier stated himself that he had gone so far as to consider that he could not remain in the Government if his opinion as Attorney-General was not adopted in a case where the judge had refused to concur in the recommendation to the mercy of the Crown. My hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), in a great outburst of Liberalism, said that he knew what Tory loyalty was, and he went on to state what it was in his estimation.

Mr. CHAPLEAU.

I do not want to follow him in that line, but I will only refer to one point. He has spoken of Tory loyalty, and I might perhaps on this occasion speak to him of Grit and Rouge political honesty, and I will not look for many past occasions in which that honesty shone with great brilliancy, but will confine myself to the one now before us. I ask, Mr. Speaker, is it honesty to take up this question, which has already been decided by the hon. gentlemen, for they have decided what Riel was, as far back as 1871. They said what they had to say of him in 1874. Every one of their organs, after the insurrection of 1870, had given their opinion about him, and when, the other day, I heard the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) rising in his seat and speaking as he has spoken—the gentleman who is represented to be the very essence of Gritism in the Province of Ontario, I was astounded to hear him and to see what he was doing, and I asked myself, where is Liberal honesty in politics when they champion Riel as a martyr now that he is dead, and have never done anything to save him before the 16th of November? Why it looks like a put up job, and lower party politics to mere trickery. I think, Sir, that against Tory loyalty we might fairly set up in comparison the Liberal-Rouge-Grit honesty on this question. I do not believe that there is one man in the Dominion, I do not believe that there is one man on that side of the House, who honestly and truly and sincerely thinks that the issue which has been raised on this question is one which they do truly in their souls and hearts approve of.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, Oh.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friends need not get up and tell me I am not speaking parliamentary language. I have as much right to say that I do not believe in their sincerity upon this question, as my hon. friend had to say that we were traitors, that we were the men who should have been punished. But my hon. friend from Quebec East thought he could bring to the House recollections of the past, that he could quote to the House all those instances where insurrections had been decided by history to have been not only justifiable, but to have been the steps by which, one after another, the great nations of the world have reached the height of liberty. My hon. friend has given a list of them all. He said he had admired, and he still admired, and felt a sympathy for, the French people who had tried to win their liberties in the insurrection of 1870; misguided though he says they were, they are still worthy of admiration. He said that his sympathies had been with the Italians when they were endeavoring to liberate themselves from the yoke of their oppressors; and with the Americans when they were fighting in the great cause of national unity. It is true my hon. friend made a great rhetorical spread, but he forgot that the great fight for freedom, for state rights, if it had any application to his case at all, would have been the fight in the South for their liberty against the despotism of the North. However, that was a splendid occasion to deliver some magnificent rhetorical periods, and that was all the hon. gentleman cared for. After enumerating the revolutions which he glories in, my hon. friend said:

"And when at last—at last—a section of our own countrymen rose in arms to claim rights long denied them, rights which were immediately acknowledged to be just, as soon as they were asked with bullets, are we to have no sympathy with them?"

There are three great errors in that sentence. First, those rights which he says were not acknowledged to them, he has said in another part of his speech they were acknowledged to them, but that delays had occurred in the execution of that acknowledgment. Next, it is not true, that their demands were only answered when bullets were sent. They were acknowledged, and the execution of that acknowledgment took place before the bullets came; and, as I shall prove in a moment, the bullets came from Riel's partisans only because justice had preceded him, and he was afraid of the effect of justice on his deluded partisans. The last heresy of the hon. gentleman is in asking our sympathy with them in their rebellion? But, Sir, let us see another sentence which I find in my hon. friend's speech:

"Though these men were in the wrong, though the rebellion had to be put down, though it was the duty of the Government to assert its authority and vindicate the law, still I ask any friend of liberty if there is not a feeling rising in his heart stronger than all reasoning to the contrary, that these men were excusable."

Mr. Speaker, I cannot reconcile those two ideas. Since those men were wrong, since the Government was right and did well to put down the rebellion, what is the conclusion from my hon. friend's premises to his vote? If the Government was right, if the rebels were wrong, should we regret the punishment of the man who took up arms against the Government of Her Majesty, and who has been the cause of the death of hundreds of good citizens? Should we regret the execution, because they were wrong and the Government was right, or should we regret it because a feeling of generous sympathy comes into our hearts because those men, as my hon. friend said, took their lives and their liberty in their hands to put them in place of petitions and protests and demands which they should have sent to the Government? Had my hon. friend gone one step further he would have fallen into the anarchical doctrines of Jean Jacques Rousseau who speaking in his "Contrat Social," says:

"Les clauses du "Contrat Social" sont tellement déterminées par la nature de l'acte que la moindre modification les rendrait vaines et de nul effet..... en sorte que chacun rentre alors dans les premiers droits et reprend sa liberté naturelle."

This is another endeavor to adapt a social theory to the unfortunate rebellion of which an apology has been attempted. My hon. friends have recalled the memory of great agitations which in the past century have changed dynasties, have inaugurated new charters of liberty, and have moulded new destinies for some of the nations of Europe. The revolution of 1870 was recalled by my hon. friend—that revolution which gave the régime of the Commune and the reign of that liberty rouge with the blood of General Lecomte and of Mgr. D'Arbois, rouge with the incendiary lights of the Tuileries and the Hôtel de Ville, which the petroleuses had ignited as fitting torches for the altar of triumphant demagogism, rouge with the atrocities that all the world has deplored—that last revolution of France my hon. friend has taken as a model.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend shall not say that he has not cited it. He said:

"I appeal to every friend of liberty, to all those who during twenty-five years past, have felt their hearts thrill whenever a struggle for freedom was going on in any corner of the world—

And when he comes to the French revolution.—

"with the French themselves, in their generous though misguided efforts to establish amongst themselves the blessings of freedom and parliamentary and responsible government."

My hon. friend could not have left aside the word "misguided"; but his thrill of generous impulse for the friends of liberty was for that régime of 1871, as I have stated. My hon. friend also cited the revolution of Italy. It is true, that revolution is worthy of his sympathy. It was the revolution that wrested from the Papacy, with the temporal power, an independence that for ages had been the safeguard of the thrones of Europe, and which at the present moment the greatest statesmen of Europe are thinking of restoring, in the hope to save the Old World from the anarchical wave which socialism and nihilism are bringing over it. My hon. friend also referred to the French revolution of 1789 which invented the guillotine and deified the sans-culottes. That also was one of the great impulses of human liberty. If my hon. friend and his colleague sitting beside him have chosen those events as examples to us of the right of resistance and revolution, I decline to accept their conclusions. My hon. friend from Quebec East has attempted to draw a parallel between the conduct of this Government towards the half-breeds, and that of the United States towards the South. He tried to be particularly eloquent on this point, but his comparison lacked of justice, and if he had carried it out to its proper terms, he would have found himself in the painful necessity for him to praise this Government. Let us briefly recall a few facts connected with the American rebellion and that of Riel. The South, after having been tyrannized by the Federal Government for years, saw his enemies pressed by the rabid Abolitionists, ready to wipe out slavery, a course I should approve with all the friends of Liberty, but which meant ruin for the South if the slaves were to be set free without compensation for their owners. The South took up arms and waged, for four years, one of the most terrible wars of modern times. There was unanimity in the course of the Southerners? The whole nation went to war; they were not particular persons against whom alone could be charged the crime of rebellion. The whole South was guilty in the same degree, and it would have been ridiculous to bring Jeff. Davis before courts of justice, charged with high treason. He was simply elected chief and did assume command on the authority imposed to him. Besides, as the South had suffered wholesale slaughters, it would have been absurd and useless to shoot or hang one individual after the war. But these were not the only reasons why Jeff. Davis was not tried. Had the hon. gentleman forgotten that the South were recognised as belligerents; that all through the war constant exchanges of prisoners had taken place between the contending armies, and that the articles of capitulation quoted by the hon. member accepted to some extent their standing as belligerents. Now, if we turn to Canada we find quite another state of things. Did we deny the rights of the Métis? Did we not recognise them from the first, and that, after the previous Government had distinctly declared that it did not see any reason why the half-breeds should be treated otherwise than white settlers? Delays were the cause of the troubles, but if the Government, of which my hon. friend was a member, had recognised, as we did, the rights of the Métis these delays would have been less, and the war might have been averted. The Government, I am ready to concede, may be responsible for some delays; but the Métis, by their demands which could not be granted on account of their in practicability, must also be responsible, as those who had no claim at all on the Saskatchewan, their claims having been settled in 1870. But, Mr. Speaker, people do not go to war for questions of details, for a question of delay; when the principle is admitted, the main point is settled; and they would not have rushed to arms, at the very moment when the announcement came that justice was coming to them, if Riel, rebelling in one breath against Church and State, had not blinded them altogether, in his desire to achieve his own objects. And here, Sir, I cannot refrain from remarking that the hon. gentlemen who have magnified Riel's claims so as to justify his rebellion, have forgotten to tell us what claim he had against the church, against the missionaries; they have prudently omitted to justify his rebellion against spiritual power. I hope they will attempt it before this debate is over. But now, to revert to our comparison, how have we dealt with the rebels after the war, and how the Government which my hon. friend points out as a model in its dealings with defeated rebellion? We have taken the poor Métis, crushed, ruined by their faith; we have fed them; we have repaired the evil brought on them by the folly of their leader, we have saved them from starvation; we have opened the doors of the prisons where the most compromised had been interned after trial. And our great models, what have they done? Let history answer. Not satisfied with having laid the South waste, they robbed the slave owners by setting free, without compensation or preparation, a most dangerous class, not fit for liberty; and to crown their horrible conduct, they threw the South into the hands of a new Egyptian plague, the carpet-baggers who, for almost twenty years, have persecuted and tyrannized the unfortunate down-trodden Southerners as no nation in the present age has been!—Such has been the glorious conduct of our models towards a defeated enemy. But perhaps my hon. friend has taken those examples to prove that after a revolutionary movement or a great political commotion no blood should be shed for political crimes and that mercy should be exercised, for he said that during the last century nothing of the kind was done except in the despotic countries of Europe. My hon. friend has forgotten his history on the shores of the Saskatchewan; his historical reminiscences are as rusty as the musket he wanted to shoulder. It was a very unfortunate recollection that took him back to the revolution of 1870, in France. We know that hundreds and thousands of men were sacrificed as political offenders after that terrible war. I cannot compliment him on the fitness of his choice. It was indeed a most unfortunate precedent for one who contended that political offences are no more visited with capital punishment, since the French revolution of 1870. With the record of the post of Satory, with the hecatombs of victims sentenced and executed after the defeat of the Commune that page of history hardly bears testimony in favor of the cause of my hon. friends. It is true that all governments have not acted as we have, and in recommending us to follow the example of other governments, no doubt hon. gentlemen opposite believed that, in our paternal care of the North-West and the poor deluded people who were carried away by the rebellion, we should have done what we did not choose to do, namely, proclaim martial law. Hon. gentlemen opposite would no doubt have done this, and all those rebels would have been executed, their families deprived of their support, and my hon. friends would have claimed that was right because it was the effect of martial law and not the revenge of society against political offenders. But the Government did not do that; the General in command showed that sympathy and humanity which should not be made a reproach against him. He is a good general and he is also a good-hearted man, and he tried to save the lives of those who fought against him as he did throughout the whole campaign the lives of our best youth in arms for their country. It is an insult to history, it is an insult to logic to pretend that there is any point of similarity between the great social perturbations which were cited and the events of the North-West. My hon. friend from Quebec East may show the treasonable revolt of Riel through the magic lantern of his eloquence as often as he pleases, he will never succeed in magnifying it to the dimensions of the rising of nations, breaking the shackles of servitude and shattering the walls of the social edifice to breathe the refreshing air of liberty. Hon. gentlemen have been speaking about papers being wanted, petitions sent in connection with the North-West grievances. I ask the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) if he has quoted a single instance in which those appeals would indicate a refusal of justice by the Government, that would justify the insurrection. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) says that since last year they had been asking papers. Why, there is not a scrap of paper written in the North-West which has not been published in the press all over the country. There are papers in condemnation of the rebellion, in condemnation of the arch traitor, and in condemnation of the theories of hon. gentlemen opposite,—and what papers are they? They are the letters of Riel to the Indians, the Proclamation sent to the half-breeds calling on them to rebel, the Memoirs of Riel written by himself, his letter to Dr. Fiset, the confessions he has made—all these are papers you know of, and which condemn not only those who have rebelled, but those who are upholding the rebellion. There are the letters of the missionaries and the bishops, who have said the leader of the insurrection was wicked in intention and treacherous in conduct, both to the Government and the interests of the people; there are above all, to condemn those who plead for the rebellion, the Statutes of the land. These are the papers which hon. gentlemen should have read; these are the papers the people will read, and in which they will read the condemnation of hon. gentlemen opposite. But when I heard the theory advanced by my hon. friend in favor of the right, as he called it, the sacred right of resistance, and I could not help looking into those books which we studied and were taught in our youth to respect. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) called it the sacred right of resistance; the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) called it the right of rebellion and insurrection. I maintain that my hon. friend has laid out a doctrine which is repudiated by the authority to which he must submit, in those matters. What is the true doctrine in relation to legitimate resistance to the established powers? The rules, if rules they may be called, which have been expounded on that subject, in the most liberal as well as the most prudent formula, are those which we find in the works of Thomas Aquinas. I quote the illustrious doctor without fear of being accused of bigotry. Protestant writers have agreed to say that his definition of the law is the boldest and noblest which could be devised. The law, says the great Catholic philosopher, is "Rationis ordinatio, ad bonum commune, ab eo qui curam habet communitatis promulgata," a decree founded on reason, and for the common good, published by him who has charge of the community. On reading to-day the definition of law by Blackstone and Chitty, and the comments of Chitty on Blackstone's definitions of law, I remembered having read somewhere in the works of a Protestant author that Thomas Aquinas' definition of law was really the noblest that had been written by man. That author, who defines the law to be a decree founded upon reason for the common good, and proclaimed by the ruler of the community, adds: "In certain cases resistance to that power might be legitimate." But when is the right of resistance legitimate? When the prince has decreed laws which are against the principles of justice, of honor, of morality; when he has put aside the care which is entrusted to him of keeping the community for the good of the people, and when he has taken it for the sole satisfaction of his appetites, of his passions, or of his caprice; and then even the right of resistance can only be exercised when long and personal suffering has been sustained, when prayers, petitions, protests, summonses have been sent—

Some hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes, I hear my hon. friends say "hear, hear," and I tell them that their "hear, hears" are of no account—when prayers, petitions, summonses, protests have been presented, when those who are most qualified to advise the people, who are most qualified to know the common good of the community, have decided that the rule of the ruler is intolerable and is producing more harm than would a revolution, which is always productive of harm, and when those who are in a position to judge of the wants of the people and to advise the ruler, and who have advised him, agree with the nation that a rising is legitimate. That is a doctrine which the Church has not proclaimed, but which she has tolerated as being the doctrine founded on real and true Christian principle. Are those the conditions which my hon. friend from Quebec East has found for his eulogy? Are those the conditions which the rebel leader in the North-West Territory had in view? No, Mr. Speaker, I assert here what I have said before when I wrote on the 9th June last year—not to Mr. Dubuc, as the Liberal press has been always saying, not even taking the trouble to inquire the names of those to whom I wrote—but to Mr. Plante and Mr. Charland in Fall River, that, since the entry of Riel into the Dominion of Canada in 1884, no petition had been presented to the Government by him or by his government or council, and that I—his former friend, I, the friend of the half-breeds, I, the man who had shown my friendship and my sympathy for them in a substantial manner—I had received nothing from them, not even a letter; and that no protest or summons had been sent to this Government since the beginning of the agitation of Louis Riel. No; Louis Riel, when he arrived in the North-West, commenced his work, as the evidence which has been brought before the House shows, by trying to captivate the sympathy of the people. He was a master in that art. After having succeeded in that, what did he do? When he saw that the people were not ready to accept all his views, he began a political agitation. He did not address himself to the Government, but went on with his agitation; and, when, as in one instance, a venerable bishop, Bishop Grandin, had him at a meeting, and said: "Perhaps this is not the course you should follow," immediately you see Louis Riel not only trying to captivate the sympathies of the people and alienating from them the Government and the officials, but even alienating those who, according to the words of the great writer, whose authority I have cited, "are in the best position to know the wants of the people and to advise the rulers of the country." He alienated them from his cause, he created a new religion, he was a renegade and an apostate. Then, Mr. Speaker, Riel did nothing of what is considered to be the necessary conditions in order to justify the rising of a nation. He is inexcusable, if he is judged according to the rules accepted by the Church. But there is another rule by which he, perhaps, wanted to be judged; that is the political rule which is this—the man who rises against the Government, if he succeeds, might be a hero; if he succumbs he is a traitor and he is executed. Riel has chosen what he wanted to have—not the rule of a justifiable rising, but the human political rule, to be applied to him; to be considered a hero if he succeeded, or a felon and a traitor if he failed, and to be acted upon as such; as he was treated and as the law acted upon him. Mr. Speaker, I will ask permission of the House at this moment to refer to a point taken in this debate, that Riel, who had been arrested and tried for high treason, was considered by the courts, by the Government, and by public opinion, as not being entitled to any special kindness at the hands of the Government because he was a rebel for the second time, and that, though not convicted, he had been already accused of and outlawed for another criminal offence. I shall not take up the time of the House to expound the jurisprudence upon this question. The Minister of Justice has said that a conviction, on a previous occasion, of the same offence, is a real and just consideration for a judge to take into account in sentencing an offender. But my hon. friend from Quebec East, and the hon. member for West Durham, have tried to put me into contradiction with myself for having been a defender of Lépine in 1874; and I only allude to it because the press throughout the country has been harping upon it. I did say in my letter to my constituents that I knew that Riel had been guilty of a previous murder, had been guilty of rebellion before 1885. I do not see my hon. friend for West Durham in his seat at this moment, but I must say that he was not generous on that occasion, he, a member of the profession of which I am proud to be a member; and I was sorry to hear him speak as he did. In 1874 Ambroise Lépine and Louis Riel were indicted for the murder of Thomas Scott. It is well known that at that time there was a great deal of excitement in the country, especially in the Province of Quebec. Many considered that the transfer of the North-West by the Imperial Government to Canada not having been completed when the Canadian authorities took possession of the territory, the Government then instituted by Louis Riel was a de facto government, and that the crime of which Riel and Lépine were charged, might be defended upon the same grounds as the then insurrection. I must say that that ground was taken in this House by hon. members sitting on both sides of the Speaker. I was asked then to go and defend Lépine. I remember, as if it were but yesterday, the letter which I received from my esteemed friend the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal). He had volunteered to be the counsel of the accused. Riel had fled from the country, Riel, the principal guilty party, if there ever was a guilty party in the country, had not surrendered to justice, but Ambroise Lépine came up for his trial. My hon. friend from Provencher wrote to me, as near as I can remember, to this effect: "My dear friend, I am charged with the defence of one of the most important cases that ever presented themselves, and certainly the most important case which I shall probably ever have. I ask you—you having such a reputation as a criminal lawyer—to come and assist me in that work, which I consider as the duty of a fellowman to a fellowman." I think my hon. friend added in his letter: "I shall share with you my fees in the case—I plead in forma paup'ris—all I can offer you is a hearty hospitality." Sir, I left Montreal at the first bidding. I did not myself take, nor did I ask my friends to take the hat around for subscriptions. I knew that a man of warm sympathies was waiting for me. I knew that the trip, long as it was, was one that a brave man could undertake, and I left Montreal with my clerk and secretary, Mr. Forget, who is now the much esteemed secretary of the North-West Council. We found in Manitoba the kind hospitality of an old friend the hon. member for Provencher, and I acted with him as counsel for Lépine. We fought that case. The judge who presided, and who is no more of this world, had no more sympathy for the rebel than have my hon. friends opposite, in their hearts, for Riel. The case was a hard one to fight. We lost our case, but on that occasion, Mr. Speaker, the trial was not only a legal trial, but it was a British trial such as my hon. friend for Jacques Cartier wants to have. On the jury we had six French Canadian half-breeds, five English half-breeds and only one white man; and the verdict went against our half breed client, whom I then thought and whom I still think, was innocent of the crime of which he was accused. He was tried, because Louis Riel had not had the manliness to surrender himself, an act which would have saved Lépine. He was accused of murder. I do not want to plead the case over again, but I say that, that being a case of murder, we proved that he had nothing to do with causing the death of the man who was shot. We proved that Lépine had not even voted for the death of Thomas Scott, that he was opposed to it; that he had not been a party to the execution, that he was absent from the execution, and that Riel had himself been supervising the execution as a corporal of a guard would have done. The jury, however, found Lépine guilty. I bowed to the decision, although I believed in my heart that my client was not guilty. I went to Quebec, the Legislature was sitting. In the Quebec Legislature I proposed a resolution which was read the other day by my hon. friend from West Durham, who tried to find fault with my actions on that matter. The resolution had reference to the murder of Thomas Scott, but in a greater degree concerned the demand which we were making for a commutation of the sentence in the case I had defended, and our request was couched in respectful words. For whom were we then petitioning? For Ambrose Lépine; the document was not prepared for anybody else. It set forth particulars with respect to the insurrection, and stated that one of the most deplorable incidents was the death of Thomas Scott. We stated that we deplored that murder, yet we thought the event was so much interwoven with political events that it had not for my client the significance of an ordinary murder. I wish hon. gentlemen opposite would fairly consider the resolution and the speech I made at that time. I was warm with the feeling that the verdict of the jury was not what it should have been, that the judge's charge had been given against the prisoner in a manner not warranted by the rules which should conduct judges in addressing juries; and still what did I say? The hon. gentleman quoted my words in French only the other day. I wish he had done me the justice of giving also a translation. My speech, as reported in the newspaper, was as follows, when translated:—

"I now come to the burning question, to a most unfortunate event which has set fire to public opinion over the whole of Canada, the great fault which has marked the conduct of the provisional government of Manitoba."

Remember that was in 1874 when everybody was clamoring for an amnesty, and I then said it was "a most unfortunate event" a "great fault." I continued:

"It has been attempted to cast upon a few individuals the responsibility which must lie upon all those who had charged Riel and his companions to protect them and lead them. This unfortunate event, which I condemn, has been committed by persons who believed it in good faith to be necessary for the safety of the society and the Government which they judged was legal because it was issued of popular will. All that can be said on the execution of Scott has often been repeated. It is a subject which it will be well to allow to fall into oblivion, in order not to arouse national susceptibilities. I ask that it be forgotten in the same way that I desire that the murder of Goulet and other Half-breeds be no longer spoken of. Blood calls for blood, and there has been enough shed to satisfy both sides, admitting, what I will not admit, that the two nationalities in conflict upon that point required that barbarous reparation."

I ask all men who are not prejudiced if I, as the lawyer of Lépine, speaking in his name, was using any language which entitles me to condemnation to-day. I then said that the execution of Thomas Scott was the most unfortunate event that had happened in that unfortunate movement of 1870. I said it was to be deplored that such a thing had happened. I said I condemned it. Is that any contradiction of what I have said to-day—that in adjudicating the fate of Riel, the Government had a right to enquire into his antecedents, into his previous convictions, and although punishment had not to be inflicted for an act for which he obtained pardon, though he had not performed the conditions of his pardon, yet, we had a right to say that he had been once guilty of rebellion and once guilty of murder, and we could not give him our sympathy to-day as we might have been ready to have given him our sympathy at a previous time? I wish I was allowed to read here the testimony of the witnesses in the case of Thomas Scott. I heard the other day an hon. member read a letter that had been written by the Rev. Mr. Young about the murder of Scott. I desire to refer to a witness who before the court gave testimony with respect to that unfortunate event. The evidence was given by a French half-breed, Joseph Nolin, and what did it establish to the court? He stated that Thomas Scott had been accused before the so-called council of Louis Riel in 1870, that his trial had taken place, if it can be called a trial, that sentence had been passed, that he had been condemned to die, and that during the whole of that mock trial the prisoner himself had not even been brought face to face with his accusers, those who judged and condemned him. He stated that Thomas Scott was brought and informed by Riel that he was to be shot the next day at 12 o'clock, and when the witness, a friend of the rebel leader, was asked whether any questions were allowed to be put by the prisoner, he replied: "No"; he was told that he had been found guilty that he had to be shot the next day and that he might write to his minister to come and comfort him in the few hours that were left to him. These were facts which I knew, and if in 1874 I said that pardon should be given to my client, Ambrose Lépine, it was because I knew then that he had nothing to do with the murder, as he was one of the members of the tribunal who had refused to vote for the death of Scott, and were opposed to the death sentence. Lépine was at the time the lieutenant general, as he was called. It was he who was charged with the execution of the orders of the president, and it was proved that when the sentence was put in force, he was not even guilty of being present under orders at the execution. Then I referred to the to be regretted murder which I deplored, which I thought everybody should forget. But, I must not keep the House much longer, and I will summarise the points which have been raised by my hon. friends opposite. The first was a justification of the rebellion, and this was the task imposed on my hon. friend from Quebec East. Then it was argued that it was a political offence; that a reprieve had been granted which should imply the commutation of the sentence; that insanity had been pleaded, and that the Government had not given the necessary care to an inquiry into the sanity of Louis Riel; that the recommendation of the jury to the mercy of the Crown had not been heard; and lastly, that the prayer of the whole nation asking for pardon had not been listened to by the Government. Mention has been made of the fairness of the trial which has been given to Riel. I shall not discuss that question, but shall content myself with quoting the words of the hon. leader of the Opposition, as I think they will dispose of the whole of that accusation. The hon. member for West Durham has said:

"From what I know of their leading counsels, I should think it impossible that in their management of the case there was anything unfair to the prisoner or derogatory to the high character they deservedly enjoy, and the responsible duties they undertook to perform."

No better testimony than this, Mr. Speaker, could have been given to the fairness of the trial. Then, Sir, Mr. Fitzpatrick, the leading counsel for Riel, has stated on different occasions, as this House knows, that the trial was a fair one and that his client could not complain of the legality of the verdict which had been rendered against him. Insanity has been pleaded, but how was it pleaded? It is a fact well known to everybody that no special plea of insanity was put in at the trial of Louis Riel on his behalf. I shall be answered that a general plea of not guilty would include the plea of insanity. But, Sir, the authorities which have been read in this House will show that if insanity is to be pleaded only as an insane impulse at the time of the commission of the crime, then, the general plea of not guilty including the plea of insanity, to excuse the act of which the prisoner is accused, is the proper plea, and why? Because at the time of the trial, the prisoner is not supposed to be insane; because it is only intended to prove that under a certain disease of the mind, at a certain time, the prisoner might have been then insane, and the general plea covers that plea of insanity if it is intended to be proved at the trial. But is that the theory of my hon. friends? Is that the plea of those members who are saying as the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Massue) said in his remarks: "I do not agree with what has been said on the other side, but I think that during the insurrection, before the execution, and at the time of the execution, there were doubts as to the mental sanity of the prisoner, and I think the Government should have given him the benefit of the doubt." The law is that in cases of insanity the benefit of the doubt must not be given to the pretended insane, but in favor of the reason and responsibility of the man who has committed the act. But let us take the declaration of my hon. friends, when they say that the man during the insurrection, before the trial, at the trial, and after the trial, and up to the time that he expiated his crime was insane. My friends will believe me when I tell them that, in such a case, the plea of insanity should have been a special plea. The plea of insanity should have brought all those medical men, whose duty it would have been to examine the prisoner with care; and I am sure the tribunal would with pleasure have allowed that examination. But they chose to raise the general plea of not guilty. Every member of the legal profession knows how difficult it is, when it is not a special plea, to prove that insanity was the ruling disease of a man at an anterior date. No, Mr. Speaker, insanity was not pleaded as being the actual state of the prisoner at the time of his trial, and why? Because the prisoner did not want it; because his counsel did not want it; because they knew that if the prisoner had been examined at the time of the trial the plea of insanity would not have been a good plea, then, any more than it is a good plea now. What is legal insanity? We have heard of it here, and we might be kept for months listening to the opinions of doctors. It is true, doctors are called as witnesses to give their opinions in cases where insanity is pleaded; but the proof of insanity is not the opinion of a doctor. We must take the law as it exists for the protection of society, and when it is said that insanity should be declared so as to prevent the execution of an offender after the sentence is pronounced, or to prevent the finding of the jury when the case is before the jury, legal insanity is not what a doctor says, it is what the verdict of the jury declares it to be. If we took the medical books as authorities of what insanity is, we should have to believe that three-fourths of the world's brains are not exempt from mental disease. Therefore we must accept the decision of a jury selected according to law. I was surprised when I heard my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) quoting from Sir William Harcourt to the effect that the Home Secretary had the right to make an enquiry as to the mental state of an offender, at the time of the commission of the offence, as well as at the time he was about to be executed. That is not what Sir William Harcourt said, and it is not what the law says. The quotation made by my hon. friend was to the effect that in certain cases in which the judges had not enquired into the sanity or insanity of the prisoner, owing, perhaps, to the prisoner being too poor to bring witnesses, the Home Secretary had taken upon himself, after having been duly advised that insanity existed, to hold an enquiry which the court had not made; but in England when the plea of insanity is raised, and the verdict of the jury is found upon that plea, it is not true that the Home Secretary orders an enquiry, to take up again the work that the court and the jury have done, or takes new evidence to prove that insanity existed at the time of the commission of the offence contrary to the evidence taken at the trial. It could not be so, because if that were done the Home Secretary would have the right to take up the case again and institute another court in order to try the prisoner anew. This would be subversive of the administration of justice, and I am sure the practice is not so understood by hon. members on the other side of the House who belong to our profession, and it should not be asserted in the House as being the true principle which should guide the action of the Executive here.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I know that the whole of the evidence has to be scrutinised by the Minister of Justice and by the Privy Council, and if that evidence is found to be defective, then it is the duty of the Executive to say so. But to hold another investigation and try the case anew I say is heresy in law and would be a subversion of the administration of justice. Now, I come to another point—the recommendation to mercy by the jury; and I must say that with the people this feature of the case has had great influence. I do not agree with my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) that in every case in England where a recommendation to mercy has been given by the jury no execution has taken place. That was not the real meaning of the authority my hon. friend quoted. That authority said that if the judge did not agree with the recommendation to mercy, then the Home Secretary had to judge by himself upon the evidence and the record brought under his consideration. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) felt the weakness of that argument, when he said: "I have looked over the records and I have not seen anything to prove to me that the judge did not coincide with the recommendation to mercy by the jury." Mr. Speaker, I need not take any more than what the judge said in passing sentence. He said:

"I cannot give you any expectation or hope that the recommendation to mercy will be taken into consideration by the Executive."

Would it be possible for the magistrate to say in plainer terms that he could not agree with the recommendation of the jury that the clemency of the Crown should be exercised? What would be the result if the theory of my hon. friend from Rouville were put into practice? I have had some experience in courts of criminal jurisdiction for over fifteen years; I have been practising in those courts, and I know the danger of a recommendation of mercy by the jury. That danger is on both sides. There is a danger for the administration of justice, because the lawyer, who has a bad case to plead, can, almost in every case, save the life of his client by asking the jury to recommend him to mercy. It would be danger to the prisoner also, when the prosecutor of the Crown, unmindful of his duty, would tell the jury to find a verdict of guilty and couple it with a recommendation to mercy, which would save the life of the prisoner. The law has enacted that the administration of justice should be set apart from all political prejudice or passion; the judiciary should be above partisanship, and yet if we are to believe the advocates of Riel, we should put the Minister of Justice—who should be, with respect to those cases on the same level as the judiciary since he is exercising the same functions—at the mercy of political opinion, political bias or passion, or any excitement in the country. And hon. gentlemen ask that we should take no account of the delicate functions he has to exercise, but subject him to the influence of every wave of public opinion. On that point I will give the opinion of the hon. member for West Durham:

"As Minister of Justice, I have had to advise in many capital cases, and I do not forget the heavy responsibility which rests on those in whose hands are the issues of life and death, and whose task is rendered all the more difficult by reason of the large measure of discretion vested in them, and expressed in the word 'clemency.' I know how much these difficulties are enhanced by a heated partisan and popular discussion."

And the hon. gentleman added:

"And I declare the occasion must be grave which renders discussion opportune and the case must be clear which renders censure expedient."

This should have been the rule in appreciating the delicate position of the hon. Minister of Justice and of the Executive in the question. I now return to the main point raised in this discussion, that is: the question of the insanity of Louis Riel. I have explained what insanity is, in a legal point of view and how insanity should be considered in the administration of justice. It has been said that Louis Riel was insane; first, because he had been confined in an insane asylum as an insane man; next, because he had religious mania, and then the new argument is advanced that he must have been insane because his secretary, Jackson, was insane, as otherwise he would not have employed Jackson. On this subject, I may perhaps be allowed to allude to an incident in the debate. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) accused me of having stated in my county, at St. Jérôme, that Jackson, Riel's secretary, was a frenchified Anglo-Saxon. I do not know what conclusion the hon. gentleman was trying to come to from that, but at all events he said the secretary should not have been set at liberty when his master had been condemned to death. I told the hon. gentleman at the time that I blamed him for not taking the word of his colleague when I said I had not used those words on the occasion referred to. I must tell him now what I did say. I said that newspapers had mentioned that Jackson was not more English than French, and might have been one of those frenchified English, and that there was no reason why he should have been set at liberty; and in reply to the newspapers, I stated that Jackson might be a Frenchman, but whatever his nationality he was one of Riel's secretaries and Régnier was the other; I stated that the counsel for the prosecution had decided that neither should be subjected to a trial, but they be set at large, that Régnier was set at large; and if Jackson was put on his trial, it was because his friends and family urged the Government not to let him loose, because he was insane and should be put in the asylum, as an insane man and cured if possible as they believed his insanity was only temporary. I had had that information from one of the counsel for the defence and I repeated it then. This disposes of the little aspersion of my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) in that respect. But let us come to the main issue. Was Riel insane at the time of the insurrection, and is that insanity a reason against the verdict obtained against him, and against the sentence rendered against him? Riel had been put into an asylum, it is true. I was the Minister in the Government at Quebec who signed the papers for his entrance into the asylum at Longue Pointe. I am at a loss to know, even at this moment, whether the man was insane then or not. I shall state in a few moments why my doubts exist. Previous insanity is not a proof of insanity at a subsequent period. Where shall we take then the evidence of the insanity of Riel if we do not take it at the trial from the verdict of the jury? The insanity of Riel is proven by whom? By the missionaries who were at that time in that region? If they had believed that Riel was really insane, as insane as a man is legally, would they not have taken the means, during that time, to have him arrested as a lunatic, and interned as a lunatic? I take the testimony of his fellow-countrymen. The first man who said that the Government had hanged an insane man in hanging Riel, was slandering the Métis nation. We have the testimony of those who were with him, and we are told by one member of this House that he might have been insane and yet might have led sane men, that we have seen on some occasions an insane man creating a riot. That might be the case for a few hours in a sudden rising, but have we ever seen, and can we say as sensible men, that a lunatic, that a demented man, from the month of July, 1884, to the month of April or May, 1885, could have acted as he did without anyone protesting against him, where men were placing in his hands their liberties and their lives, and could not perceive, by their daily and nightly communication with him, that he was not in possession of his senses? We might go further. Take the plan of his campaign. I do not speak of the plan for the organisation of the party of Louis Riel, but the plan of his campaign. We are supposed to be sane men; we might be acting under delusions, as my hon. friends have been acting under delusions since November last that this Government would see its last days in consequence of this crisis, but we are supposed to be sane men, and yet did we not last year suppose, and do we not now think, that his plan of campaign was not only the work of a sane man but of a very cunning man? The season when the outbreak took place, the 19th March, at the beginning of spring, is a time when the roads are almost impassable, and when in that country even vehicles can hardly be used on those prairies, and when the use of cannons and batteries, which Riel probably thought would be brought into the field, would be impossible on the prairie in that wet season. Take the plan of his campaign. The Canadian Pacific Railway was not then finished, and Riel knew it as well as we did. He knew it better than the leader of the Opposition did, who was asking at that time what gaps of the railway remained uncompleted, how many miles remained to be constructed, and what were the difficulties to be encountered in building that road? The railway was not completed. Was it not the work of a sane man to choose that time for an insurrection, when that road would have been impossible to use for the entrance of troops into the North-West? We did not think ourselves that it would be possible. We doubted it, and we were asking ourselves whether the American Government would permit the transportation of men, ammunition and arms through American territory. We knew that international laws might have prevented it. We knew that on a certain occasion, the transportation of troops had been prohibited by the American Government, across the St. Clair Flats, where only a few miles had to be traversed in a neutral part of the country, and we thought that the Government of the United States might have prevented this, especially on such an occasion, and Louis Riel knew it also. He knew that, at a time when a political campaign was just over in the United States, when the two parties were fighting, it was probable that the Canadian Government would not have the authorisation to transport troops through the American territory. Was that an evidence that he was an insane man? Louis Riel knew all that, he knew the difficulties we had to encounter. He knew that, just in the beginning of spring, before the grass would grow, as he said, we would have a rebellion such as we had never witnessed in the North-West. He knew that the Indians might have risen, and at that season, though the food might be sufficient for the horses of the prairies, food for horses coming with troops from this country would be difficult to be found or to be transported there. He knew that thousands of Indians might have taken part in that uprising. If the rising had been a successful one, if the Indian warfare had been a successful one, who knows what would have become of the half-breed population who remained faithful and loyal to the Government and to their Sovereign—and I hope they were then, as now, really loyal—who knows what might have been the consequences of that uprising; who knows what might have been the consequences in the Province of Manitoba; who knows if the success would not have brought to him thousands of arms to aid him; who knows if he had not planned that the rising of the Indians, scaring the settlers from our North-West, would give cause to the thousands of Indians in the United States to join in that rising and flood the North-West, so that he might, in his own prophetic words, have taken possession of Manitoba and of the North-West; who says that we did not believe that ourselves last year, and that, in the feeling we had that that country was to be submerged by rebellion, warfare and bloodshed, we did not believe that that man was the sanest man who ever planned a rebellion, selecting that particular time of the year, with the means at his disposal, and knowing the small means which were at the disposal of the Government? His design has been frustrated, it is true, but who can say that he had not the free use of his mental faculties when he planned that campaign? We expressed those fears last year. Hon. gentleman opposite expressed those fears, and we then heard the hon. leader of the Opposition telling the Minister of Militia: "Sir, you shall be held responsible for the lives of the sons of this country who are going to the North-West if you do not supply them with the best of arms, because we have been told that the Indians and the Half-breeds have been supplied with the best of weapons for the warfare they are undertaking." This was our conviction. How has it changed since that time? How has it come that my hon. friends opposite believe the whole of that was nothing but the phantasy of a deranged mind? That there was no danger, that the people should have known the man was crazy, and that every one of his words, that every one of his actions, every one of his plans would have been frustrated on account of his insanity? It is true that he had not collected the means necessary for the insurrection; it is true that his scheme was not such as would have been planned by a man accustomed to campaigns; but the wickedness of a man who contemplates a crime has always some weak point. A great criminalist said once to a lawyer who argued that his client could not be guilty because his utterances and actions were those of an insane man, and if he had been really a criminal he would not have spoken as he did—the celebrated judge answered: "Sir, this is no proof; fortunately, the insanity of criminals is the protection of life and of society." Mr. Speaker, there is one point to which I am surprised that my hon. friends on this side of the House have paid so little attention. I refer to a piece of evidence which was received in this House—I would be disposed to say providentially—and that evidence the hon. leader of the Opposition himself has brought before us. I would not apply the words of the judge that I quoted a moment ago that there is always some degree of insanity in wickedness; but the wicked idea which presided at the origin of that letter from a jurymen on the trial at Regina, which was given before the House, is a most extraordinary thing. I do not want to qualify the act, but I was surprised to hear a counsel learned in the law, a man accustomed to the dignity of courts of justice, coming up in such a solemn debate as this, and reading a letter from a jurymen, who gives under his own signature, though no name was disclosed, the secret deliberations of the jury and the motives and reasons for their verdict. But, Mr. Speaker, inopportune as this might have been, improper as this has been, a great point, the real point, lay at the bottom of it. The pleasure of reading it was only the pleasure of seeing the conclusion of that most extraordinary letter, in which it was stated that if the Prime Minister, the Minister of the Interior, and the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West, had been tried as accomplices before the courts, they might have been adjudged guilty with the criminal, and they recommended one to the mercy of the court, because the others had not been indicted with him in the accusation. I do not want to comment upon the impropriety, upon the indecency of the act of the man who wrote that letter, and who had the audacity of saying that he would have found a verdict of guilty against persons when not a word of evidence had been given against them at the trial. And yet the jurymen who knew that, came and gave his declaration that though no evidence had been given against those members of the Government and the administration in the North-West, though they had not even been charged with any offence, this jurymen, who was sworn to give a verdict according to the evidence, declares that he would have found them guilty. We cannot doubt the document nor suspect the intentions of the writer. In that document it is stated that not one of the jury for a moment thought that the prisoner was insane. This man says: "We do not declare to you that each and every one of us, when he answered the roll call, said: 'He is guilty and perfectly sane.'" The question had been put frankly and in a judicial manner by the judge "Do you find him guilty of the rebellion? And if so, say guilty. Do you find him guilty of the rebellion, but if you think that his mind was deranged at the time, that he was not responsible for his acts, say that he is guilty but insane." And he said: "We answered that he was guilty and perfectly sane." Mr. Speaker, if there was a corner in my conscience where the shadow of a doubt had existed, that shadow of a doubt was cleared away, and I must say that I felt as if a heavy weight was taken off me when I heard the hon. gentleman disclosing the secret deliberation of that jury, and telling me: "You were right in surmising that there was no evidence of insanity, and if the whole jury had recommended him to the mercy of the court, that would have been no reason for granting it." My hon. friends opposite have contended that a recommendation for mercy was justified only on the ground that there was a disease in his brain, but that is cleared away by the letter which the hon. member read to this House. What documents could prove more than that? I have other documents which I hesitate to place before this House, though that would not be improper as the production of a letter from a jurymen disclosing the deliberations of the jury; the documents are before me, and if I am asked why were not the men who gave those documents examined before the court at Regina? I shall answer that they did not volunteer to be witnesses because men are not obliged to be informers against their fellow men and to give evidence to secure their conviction and send them to the gallows. I have the evidence; I have not asked for it. I have not enquired about it although I knew it; I did not want to ask for it, it was sent to me. I will ask the permission of the House to read these documents. I did not need them to influence my own feeling about the case, my own conviction as to the case and the conclusion at which I arrived; but they may assist the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) as being confirmatory of the evidence of his friendly juror at Regina. Here is a letter dated 19th March, 1886, from Longue Pointe. It is given by the attending physician of the asylum since the opening of the institution—Dr. Perrault, a man against whose character, honesty and integrity no man in the Dominion can have a word to say. Here is his certificate. As I have told the House, I knew it before; I knew it from authorities that I would not like to disclose. I will translate the paper:

"I, the undersigned physician of the asylum of St. Jean de Dieu, certify that a few days after the entrance of Louis Riel into this asylum I perceived that with him insanity was simulated. The exaggeration of his acts was such and so much beyond what we generally remark in subjects affected with real insanity that with a physician accustomed to treat such cases there would be no room for doubt. Upon making the observation to him that I was not to be taken for his dupe, he confessed to me in effect that he was shamming the insanity. And the evidence that I was right in my surmise and that his confession was really sincere is that on all occasions, and they were many, I have been along conversing with him, he has always talked in a manner absolutely lucid and sane upon all and every subject with which he has entertained me.

"F. X. PERRAULT, M.D.,
"Asylum of Longue Pointe."

As I said before, this information was given to me a good while ago. I knew it, I must say, even before this House sat. I knew it even, but not in a satisfactory manner, some time after the so-called insane man was admitted in the asylum. I knew it from some of the guards, but I would not have taken their authority. Hon. gentlemen may say: "How is it that a man who has been visiting doctor of an institution and knew a patient was not insane and yet allowed him to remain in the institution where he was shamming insanity?" I ask hon. members, and all those who know the circumstances under which the man was detained in the asylum, whether it would have been prudent even in the public interest to have at that time revealed that secret and set that man at large. It was in 1877. The amnesty had been proclaimed, but the crime of the murder of Scott had not been forgotten, and it would not have been in the interest of anyone that this poor man should have been made a target for a bullet which would have been sent in revenge for the murder of Scott.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I hear some hon. members laugh. I wish they had been in the Province of Quebec, in the counsels of their own friends, some of whom came to me as Provincial Secretary and told me in effect that the man was Louis Riel, but his name had not been made public for the reason I have mentioned. They said that his retention in the asylum would not be made a reproach to me. I do not reproach myself for having admitted in the asylum Louis David, whom the hon. gentleman's friends told me afterwards was Louis Riel. No good could have been obtained by not doing so. The evidence put before me was the evidence to which as a member of the Government I had to submit. The other document which I bring here in support of the letter of the juror at Regina is the certificate of a man whose name I would hesitate to place before the House. It might subject him to difficulty, to persecution; but I have the document in my hands, and the person to whom it has been given said I could place it before the House and the writer would not object. I do it upon my responsibility. It is the certificate of a man who stands high in the medical profession, a man who can be vouched for by some of the best men in the medical profession. It is the certificate of Dr. Brunelle, house-surgeon of the Hotel-Dieu, of Montreal, a professor of the medical faculty of Victoria University. Dr. Brunelle was an intimate friend of Riel. He knew him both in Montreal, at Beauport Asylum, and afterwards in the United States where he lived for several weeks and months with Riel. The certificate reads:

"I, the undersigned, certify that during the time Louis Riel was confined at Beauport and afterwards, that I had known him particularly both in Montreal and the United States, and during the time he was confined at Beauport and afterwards I have been able to ascertain on divers occasions that outside the eccentricities in his manner which were little to be noticed, he was perfectly lucid in his mind and sane in his intellect, and spoke absolutely well on all subjects when he was not observed. I attest, moreover, that in my presence the said Louis Riel has been simulating insanity in such a manner as to leave no doubt in my mind as to the character of his pretended insanity."

And then I may add that the writer of the last certificate has stated that he had on several occasions conversed with Louis Riel, and had from him the whole secret of his sham insanity. Although I have given to this House the evidence which I have received, I do not intend to make use of it to ask for the decision of the House upon the question before us. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is laughing. I do not know whether he is laughing at the sanity or the insanity of Louis Riel, whether he is laughing because these certificates are overwhelmingly against the poor unfortunate man, but I say that I think what I have given to the House is nothing but a corroboration of what I have stated and what I believe, that when Louis Riel was found by the jury at Regina to be a sane man, the finding was one which every man in this House would have found if he had been on that jury, after the evidence which was brought against him. Outside of the insurrection, one of the reasons that prevented clemency being exercised in his case, was his inciting the Indians to warfare. Upon that I might also claim the authority of my hon. friend from West Durham, who said that there was a most aggravating character to the rebellion in the fact that Riel had incited the Indians to warfare. I say that that aggravating feature, the greatest of all the crimes that Riel has committed in the North-West, has not been answered by anyone in this House except the leader of the Opposition. He said that we should not hold our heads very high with regard to that accusation of inciting the Indians to warfare, because the Indians had been pressed into war centuries ago to assist brave soldiers and humane men in wars against other nations. I do not want to dwell upon this. The Minister of Justice has done justice to that pretension. I would remind the House, however, of the letters which Riel wrote to the Indians telling them to come and plunder, as was stated in the case of the Indians who were put on trial before Judge Rouleau, and that before the 1st of June the order was given to the Indians to rise, and the whole of the white race was to be exterminated in the North-West. I would ask if there is any similarity between the case of soldiers fighting in the citadel of Quebec, the walls of Montreal, or of the forts of the old Province of Upper Canada, having Indian allies in their struggles, and the case of Louis Riel? No, Sir, there is not, and we have proof of it. What is the answer of the Indians to the messenger that Louis Riel sent to them? Their answer proves the demand, and proves the intent of the man who sent these messengers with presents to the Indians. Crowfoot, in proof of his loyalty, refused these presents, because if he accepted them he would have been obliged to go on the war path with him. Here is a letter which was written by a number of Indians to Louis Riel:

"Mr. LOUIS RIEL:

"I want to hear news of the progress of God's work. If any event has occurred since your messengers came away let me know of it. Tell me the date when the Americans will reach the Canadian Pacific Railway. Tell me all the news that you have heard from all places where your work is in progress. Big Bear has finished his work; he has taken Fort Pitt. 'If you want me to come to you let me know at once,' he said, and I sent for him at once. I will be four days on the road. Those who have gone to see him will sleep twice on the road. They took twenty prisoners, including the master of Fort Pitt. They killed eleven men, including the agent, two priests and six white men. We are camped on the creek just below Cut Knife Hill, waiting for Big Bear. The Blackfeet have killed sixty police at the Elbow. A half-breed who interpreted for the police, having survived the fight, though wounded, brought this news. Here we have killed six white men. We have not taken the barracks yet, but that is the only entire building in Battleford. All the cattle and horses in the vicinity we have taken. We have lost one man, a Nez-Percé, killed, he being alone, and one wounded. Some soldiers have come from Swift Current, but I don't know their number. We have here guns and rifles of all sorts, but ammunition for them is short. If it be possible, send us ammunition of various kinds. We are weak only for the want of that. You sent word that you would come to Battleford when you had finished your work at Duck Lake. We wait still for you, as we are unable to take the fort without help. If you send us news, send only one messenger. We are impatient to reach you. It would encourage us much to see you, and make us work more heartily."

There is the demand and the answer. It is a proof that the Indians were asked to rise, and that all the white settlements should be defaced from the prairie and the white men exterminated. The laws of nations have declared within the last century that alliance with Indians was not only unwise and imprudent but inhuman and outside the pale of international law. The United States Government, which has been quoted as a model for us, have decided it very quickly because of the risings in their North-West, risings near Mexico, and the risings during the building of their railways. There they have given them no kind of trial except the trial of bringing them before the authorities, shooting them, or hanging them by the dozen or the four dozens, as was done after the Custer massacre. The Government of the United States, that model Government, do not allow any scruple to interfere; but when an Indian war is raised, the law of the land is enforced and executed by the military authorities. It is useless for my hon. friends on the other side to try to make of this rising, as my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) has been trying to make it, an insurrection that might be justified and excused. It is of no use for them to try to make of Riel a martyr, as my hon. friend from Maskinongé (Mr. Desaulniers) said he did, or a hero, as my hon. friends opposite have tried to prove him, or even an insane man, as some of my friends on this side have been disposed to think him, giving the benefit of any doubt they had, not to the law, but to that humane tenderness which exists for a man who is condemned to the gallows. No, Sir, history, in its impartiality, shall not decree him a hero. The bonum commune, the interest of the nation was not the motive of his actions. He had dreamed of being a Napoleon, but he was ready and willing to be the chief of a guerilla band, ruling by violence and terror over the region of his exploits, living on plunder and waiting for the accident of a fortunate encounter to secure a heavy ransom with the safety of his own life. Here is, in my opinion, and I speak with the sincerity of my heart and of my conscience, such is my opinion of Louis Riel's campaign, surrender and death: Riel was not an ordinary criminal, who, under the impulse of strong ruling passions, and for lucre, lust and revenge, committed murder, arson and pillage, with "malice aforethought." Riel has been an unscrupulous agitator, getting up a rebellion against the Sovereign for the sake of personal ambition and profit under the color of redressing public grievances. Riel was a born conspirator, a dreamer of power and wealth, frustrated in his designs but not subdued by his former defeat, which had shaken his brains without eradicating the germ of his morbid ambition, he had been patiently watching his opportunity to come to the surface, until that opportunity came to him; fully cognizant of the nature of the insurrection he was planning and preaching; fully aware of the grave consequences of that movement, ready to accept the full responsibility of the loss of his life in the prosecution of his design. He considered the alleged grievances of the half-breeds more in the light of the opportunities it would give him to resume power in the North-West, than with the view of redressing those wrongs. He had always advocated that the Hudson Bay Company's privileges and Government were an usurpation, and as a consequence that the Canadian Government, who had acquired from the Hudson Bay Company, were not the legitimate rulers of the North-West and the half-breeds. He was a convinced, although an extravagant, pretender. He believed in his mission, and to accomplish it, he willfully agreed, with his conscience, to kill or to be killed. He measured the distance between his ambition and the success that could crown it, and he deliberately consented to fill the gap, if necessary, with the corpses of his enemies or even of his friends. Devoid of the courage of a soldier, he believed in his own shrewdness as a plotter. He expected success by a surprise, not from a regular battle. He was a wilful and dangerous rebel. If rebellion, with the sacrifice of human life, with the aggravating circumstance of having incited to an Indian war, deserves the penalty of death, Riel deserved it as a political offender in the highest degree. It has been pretended that in his extravagant career, Riel was not sound in his mind and could not reason, although he accepted, the responsibility of his actions. After the most careful examination of all the evidence which came before us, I cannot help saying that Riel, from the moment he left his home in the United States for the avowed purpose of assisting the half-breeds in their demands for redress of alleged grievances, until the end of the North-West insurrection, has deliberately pursued the object he had in view, namely, to obtain full control of the North-West half-breeds and Indians. To obtain his object, he aroused in himself, and communicated to others, to an intense degree, a sort of national and religious fever. This was a comparatively easy work with an excitable and credulous people. Having thus subdued the half-breeds, his next effort was directed towards alienating them from the Government and from their clergy. When he had succeeded in doing this, he sought the alliance of the Indians and of American sympathisers. All that, he planned with a great amount of sagacity and with great pain. But the extravagant confidence he showed in his success, the smallness of the means he collected, his absolute impassiveness when reverse came, the unfeigned faith he had in what he called his mission, all point out to the conclusion that he was the prey to exaltation, to hallucination. Though not insane, in the legal sense of the word, he was, to use a common expression, a "crank," but a crank of the worst kind, knowing well what was good and what was bad, what was wicked and what was kind, what was the value of life and what was death; but his notions of what was right and what was wrong had been distorted and altered by the determination and fixity of his purpose, by an ardent and selfish ambition, leading to injustice and cruelty. He was certainly, and without affectation, convinced that what he did was permitted by divine and moral laws, and that his treason was justifiable. Up to the last moment he supported himself with the fixed expectation that the heroism of his struggle, the stoicism he had displayed when arraigned by the law, would bring him a timely deliverance. The death knell alone, that supreme shock which usually increases the nervous irritability of the maniac, when not subdued by illness, had the effect to bring him back from the exalted atmosphere which he had purposely selected for himself. He then seems to have carefully put aside his fantastic character, and resumed the collected and solemn demeanor of a Christian at the threshold of eternity. That kind of delusion is natural to political fanatics and to religious maniacs. It is the paroxysm of a prejudiced mind, which has wilfully distorted in itself the true notions of law and of right. It cannot excuse a criminal act. The perversity of the intelligence is as much punishable as the perversity of the heart in its wrongful direction of the will for the performance of criminal acts. The ruling passion has for its origin the criminal purpose which the perverted intellect has consecrated and transformed into a sense of duty. In this case the purpose was supreme power, both civil and religious. The redress of grievances on one part, and the desire of personal pecuniary advantages on the other, do not seem to me to have been the principal motors of Riel's actions, though they certainly were important factors in his conduct. But that object, supreme power, was criminal and could not qualify, could not excuse him. It is a wrong theory, and it would be a dangerous doctrine to excuse and leave without punishment crimes committed with the conviction that the act accomplished is one calculated to redress a wrong or to bring good results to the community. I am not a free thinker. I believe that free thinking is the most pernicious evil of this country. It has engendered the worst utopias against moral, social and religious order. But those who claim the right to the most absolute liberty for human thought, will restrict that liberty to the theoretical regions, and they are ready to punish it when it comes in conflict with existing laws. They will punish the manifestation of the idea after having given to that idea the freedom of the world. I agree with their conclusions, but I am logical, and I believe in the right, nay in the obligation, of punishing the perversity of the doctrine. I believe that a man is guilty when he does not preserve his intelligence from the contagion of false doctrines; in the words of one of the most eminent Catholic writers of this age, in speaking of those whose guilty leniency towards the errors of the mind, gives an excuse to revolution and socialism:

"They go so far as to say that error is no guilt, that man is not bound to search the inmost of his soul to see whether there are not some secret causes that lead him away from the path of truth. They declare that in the spheres of human ideas, all human and divine laws are useless and out of place. What insanity! As if it was possible to exempt from any rule the highest and the most noble portion of human nature! As if the essential element, which makes of man the being of creation could be dispensed from the rules of that divine harmony of the various part of the universe together and of that universe with its divine maker; as if that sublime harmony could exist or even be conceived with man, unless the first of human obligations be the constant accord with truth, that eternal attribute of divinity!"

This is the solid and only logical foundation for the legitimate punishment of a number of crimes which otherwise would find their excuse in the erroneous but firm convictions of their perpetrators. In such cases the law is at liberty to admit that the criminal was actuated by a wrong ful notion of his intelligence, but it declares guilty the idea which has brought that erroneous conviction in them; and if the accused invokes the testimony of his own conscience, the law reminds him that it was his duty to keep his conscience right or to rectify it. I am often pointed out to my countrymen and coreligionists as an unmitigated catholic liberal, and I presume that my theological searches, in this case, will be found fault with as usual. I console myself, in advance, as I did before, in the idea that my detractors will be harmless, if not charitable in their denunciations. The crime of Louis Riel had been committed, the criminal had been taken and tried. The trial had been an impartial, a fair trial. A verdict had been rendered against Riel, the only verdict that could be found according to the evidence. Sentence of death had been passed against him. The sentence was a just punishment of the crime committed. It would serve as an example, a warning, a terror to all future criminal impostors; as a remedy against the increasing contagion of cranks. Riel had been pardoned once for the commission of a great crime; a second exercise of the prerogative of royal mercy would have looked as an inducement to treason and homicide. A commutation into life imprisonment would have been a danger to society. The people whom he had deluded, those whose prejudices had been aroused, and those who would have found an interest in working up a continuous excitement in the country, would have found themselves greatly assisted by the prolonged existence of Louis Riel. The clamor outside was loud, asking for pardon, for commutation of the sentence, but no protest against the correctness of the verdict was made since the decision of Her Majesty's Privy Council. The time fixed for the execution was nearing, when a last appeal was made on behalf of the convict, stating that he was, at that moment, so unsound in mind, so diseased in his brain, that to punish him would be useless cruelty, and a request was made that medical men be appointed to go and examine Riel and report upon his sanity or insanity, that is whether he could rightly understand the nature of his crime and the measure of his punishment. That demand was supported by the almost unanimous prayer of the people of one of the Provinces. The Government yielded to that demand, and the enquiry took place. Medical men whose character and respectability are above suspicion, made the examination of the prisoner and agreed in their conclusions that Riel was an accountable being for his actions and that therefore he could discern right from wrong, he could understand the verdict found against him and measure the severity of the punishment inflicted upon him. And after that report the Executive agreed that the sentence should be carried out against the unfortunate man. A great deal has been said about the personnel of that medical commission, as it is called; I am ready to admit that the selection of more prominent men in the profession, men more specially prepared by their particular studies, for the examination of such cases, might have given more satisfaction to those who had asked for that commission. At the same time I affirm that a more correct conclusion would not have been arrived at, and I am sure that the clamoring multitude would not have been satisfied. The verdict was a correct one. The zealous ministers who administered the last rites of the Church to Louis Riel had themselves, and more than all others they were in a position to know the word of the mysterious enigma, they had adjudged upon that point to a large extent, in receiving the abjuration of his past errors, in being made the confidant of his last recommendations and his last will, in admitting him to the most august Sacrament of the Church, on repeated occasions. He had consoled their hearts in searching into the inmost of his own for the humble confession and the sincere repentance of his faults against God and man. He had proved to all that he was enjoying the full usage of his mental faculties, the full force of the good impulse of his heart and soul by the letters he had written to his friends, to his mother, to his family, by the memoirs full of dates, of names, of figures, which he wrote from memory and without the assistance of persons or books or of notes, by his last will and by his whole demeanor in the face of death. He died as he had lived, a strong willed man, he died a sane man. Such is what the missionaries had said in the beginning, what the half-breeds who followed him said, what the witnesses said who were produced against him, what the doctors said, what the courts said in rendering the verdict; and it is for having ourselves said the same thing that we have been censured, that we have been accused, that we have been branded, as I said before, as traitors to our nationality, as traitors to the law, as murderers, as we have been accused in this House by hon. members sitting on the opposite side. I have been very often asked how I could forgive the malignant aspersions which have been thrown against me by those who have initiated the agitation of the 16th November. I have put to myself very often the same question, and I have had only one answer. I could not believe in their insincerity; I could not believe that such an outburst of passion, that such a violent disruption of social and friendly associations, that such a rupture of party political ties could have been nothing but the unprincipled result of political apostacy; I could not believe that our friends who left us on the 16th of November on this question were not sincere; and it is because I believed in their sincerity that I appealed to them, without threats of violence, without promises of favor; it is because I believed in their sincerity that I have resented the insult contained in the insinuation which was cast in their faces by the member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), and the member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard). It was because I believed in the sincerity of my friends, that I was appealing to their better informed judgment, that I hoped that their better judgment would come at last to their rescue, that I was not willing to distrust their honesty of purpose. I know that my hon. friends can have no political sympathy with hon. gentlemen opposite. After this question is disposed of, none of the numerous matters which remain, as the programme of the party, can reconcile their views and their convictions with those of members sitting on the other side of the House. I have appealed to them, and if my appeal is in vain, I hope I shall not be found fault with for having believed in them. I cannot, I must say, give the same testimony of sincerity to the hon. gentlemen whom I see in the immediate following of the hon. member who leads the Opposition. I should not be telling the truth if I were to say that I can reconcile sincerity with the action which the hon. the leader himself has taken upon this question; but I must hasten to say, at the same time, that I cannot blame him, knowing, as I think I do, the motive of his action on this occasion. The hon. member for Quebec East, carried like so many others by the popular cyclone which over-ran the Province of Quebec, on the 16th November, on the Champ de Mars, in Montreal, had committed one of those mistakes which outlive the political existence of a man. He had made then the declaration, that if he had been living on the shores of the Saskatchewan, he would have been ready to shoulder his musket against the Government of Her Majesty. His declaration had resounded throughout the Dominion like a bugle call to arms for a civil war, and had been resented by the whole of the volunteer force of Canada as a condemnation and insult. The English Liberal party in the Province of Quebec—and I must give them that testimony that their loyalty is above suspicion—had risen in a solemn protest, and the Reformers of Ontario had joined in the repudiation of a declaration bordering on treason in the mouth of a Privy Councillor. It is a secret to no one that an excuse had to be found to prevent the hon. ex-Minister from having an unpleasant reception in Toronto, and his former popularity, his much admired eloquence, would not have saved him from popular reprobation had he ventured to go before an English audience even in Montreal at the time. His star was waning. Son étoile pâlissait, as was said at the time, and for a moment his downfall was eminent. None of the meetings which followed the Champ de Mars gathering had the benefit of his eloquence. In the meantime the leader of the Reform party had landed in New York, a mysterious conclave took place there, we are told, in the house of an ex-Minister living in that city. The tidings which were brought from that mysterious interview were not of a consoling character to the agitators of the Province of Quebec. The leader went to Toronto and a few days afterwards the speech of London came. But then the word uttered there was the word of a sphinx. The press say that a still more mysterious interview took place here, in the capital, between the leader of the Reform party and the young chief of the Liberals in the Province of Quebec. Since that day the attitude of the hon. member for West Durham was an enigma for the public. We have had the explanation of that enigma by his speech the other night. What was it? The young and impetuous leader of the Quebec Liberal party was not to be dethroned; on the contrary he was to be supported, and he was to be applauded, a great blow was to be struck to arouse the sympathies of the party in his favor. His declaration of the Champ de Mars had been a bold one. His declaration in the House of Commons was to be an audacious one, and he had to be supported and applauded here. Hence the speech of last Wednesday. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman has done it bravely, to say the least. Audacious in its affirmations, polished in its diction, brilliant in its delivery, the speech of the hon. member for Quebec East, if it was not a model of sound logic, was, at least, a splendid effort to rally around his banner the wavering sympathies of his friends in Lower Canada. But that was not sufficient to restore confidence in him, to bring back the former sympathy, and the hon. leader of the Opposition chivalrously came to his rescue. He lent to the fervid eloquence of his neighbor the assistance of his vast erudition, his powerful dialectics, his most ingenious argumentation, for five hours. The leader has risked his own popularity to save his first lieutenant. There are officers for the sake of whom a general will defy danger. It may not be according to the art of war, but it shows courage, and courage challenges admiration. However Mr. Speaker, we saw, everyone in this House could see, the laborious effort, the most ungrateful labor, which the hon. member for West Durham was performing. That great master of the language was uneasy in the work of propping with carefully shaped arguments, of covering with his most elaborate periods what he felt his great talent could not force into the minds of his followers. Overwhelmed by the weight he was carrying, at one moment he was obliged to confess that the vote he would give in this case was "an inexpedient vote." Yes, Mr. Speaker, it will be an inexpedient vote, not only an inexpedient, but a useless vote, inexplicable and indefensible. In Ontario, in the Maritime Provinces, it will be received with hostility; in the Province of Quebec it will be received with suspicion."

An hon. MEMBER. Hear hear.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If the hon. gentleman opposite, who says "hear, hear," listened to his own intimate feelings, he would say that it is preposterous to think that the loyalty of the Dominion will accept, however eloquent it may have been, a plea in favor of that revolt such as was claimed by the hon. member for Quebec East. That plea will not be accepted. The Dominion of Canada cannot accept it. I regret to be forced to say that the hon. gentleman by the course he has taken has not "caused the House of Commons to speak with a voice and in a sense which posterity, after these heats have cooled and these mists have cleared, shall ratify and confirm." If the vote of the hon. member for West Durham, if his voice, if the sympathy he has been attempting to raise, received, even in the Province of Quebec, the answer he has invited, I would say that the, contrary to his own protestations, he would have the sad glory of having built a political platform on the scaffold of Regina, that he had cemented party ties with the blood of the condemned man, and he would be one of those who had dared "To attempt the Future's portals with the Past's blood-rusted key." That would be his success. But I hold that this design will be frustrated by the desire in the Province from which I come to combine—using the word of the hon. gentleman—the affirmation of one's rights with forbearance in favor of other people's rights, to secure that common citizenship to all which will make of Canada a great and glorious country, inhabited by a united and happy people. I hope that what the hon. gentleman himself has said will prove true, and that the people of Quebec will believe that to create the harmony which is necessary for the good of the country, we must not act in the way which those who have begun this agitation would like us to act. It is with that desire of unity and peace that I have followed my course with the people of our Province; it is with that desire that I appeal to my hon. friends whose sympathies have been surprised and whose scrupulous sense of honor has been unduly stimulated for fear of their old party fidelity. To them I appeal, with confidence, not to be carried away by a mere popular cry, not to give countenance to a movement, the final issues of which might be disastrous to the party, to the nationality, to the country. Mr. Speaker, a last word and I address it to those in this House who belong to the same nationality as myself: Let them beware. This hour is one of the greatest importance. Upon them a vast responsibility rests in respect to the vote which they will give to-night upon this question. The future condition of the Province of Quebec will largely depend on the vote which hon. members are about to give. I have already warned hon. members of the inexpedient attempt which was made to create a so-called political union of all French Canadians throughout the Dominion, and I have said that this was a most unpatriotic step to be taken, that it was one fraught with danger to the Dominion, and fraught with special danger to those who, being a minority in the Dominion, are asked to work together as a unit without considering questions of opinion. I have often repeated that opinion to my fellow-countrymen. I have often said it, though never so appropriately or so feelingly as I do today. In the whole of this agitation I have tried to be true to my country as well as to my duty. I have not followed the dictates of anyone, I have not been biassed in my appreciation of facts and things; I have not perhaps followed the path which would be in my own private interest. I have been offered - I would not say it if it had not been stated by the leader of the French Canadian party in the Province of Quebec himself, that he had charged one of the hon. members of this House to come and give me his message about it—I was offered the leadership of all my fellow countrymen in that unpatriotic mission of collecting together all French-Canadians in the Dominion, to make of them a kind of political association. I refused the offer. I refused it because I thought the proposal was fraught with danger to my own fellow-countrymen. A Canadian writer who understands this question has said that the structure of the French Canadian nationality in this Dominion had been laid, stone by stone, by the hands of men in whom were concentrated the most consummate wisdom, allied with the greatest prudence. That writer also stated that the only danger to the French nationality was the hour in which the people allowed themselves to be carried away by faction and by passion, and ally themselves together as a faction. It is true, if we look at the history of this country, that the French Canadians have achieved what has not been achieved in almost any other country. We know from the lessons of history how difficult it is for a minority, in a conquered country especially, to escape encroachments, to escape absorption by the majority; however well disposed the majority may be. In this country, we have prospered, we have grown, we have increased our wealth without any sacrifice of our liberty. We, the minority, have achieved something more. We have, even when the cry of race and religion was raised by a part of our population, succeeded in impressing on the majority a system of laws peculiar to ourselves—I speak of the introduction of the civil laws of Lower Canada into the Eastern Townships with the concurrence of the majority. We have achieved more than that. We the minority have secured the good will, the esteem, the respect, the sympathy of the majority in the work of protecting our own peculiar institutions. We have done this, and it is true what the writer I have quoted has said that the structure of the French Canadian nationality in Canada must have been the work of consummate wisdom allied to the greatest prudence. But at the same time his words were prophetic: "Do not allow yourselves to be led away by faction and passion. Do not become a faction in the country because although you are strong with your allies you will be weak as a faction, however strong a faction it might be." It has been stated in public meetings by men who have been led away by their passions, that the French Canadian should become a party similar to the Irish party in the Imperial Parliament under the guidance of Mr. Parnell. I have not to judge the issues of that Parliament. I say if the Irish people in their struggles for liberty have been obliged to do what they are doing and to unite themselves under one leader, it is a course they have been obliged to take because they do not enjoy the freedom, respect and sympathy we possess in this country. Ask Mr. Parnell if he would not resign the leadership of his faction in the Parliament of England if he could have the leadership of the French Canadians where they enjoy the freedom and liberty such as we enjoy in this Canada of ours. No; the great danger with us is that we shall make a faction of the minority in this country, that we shall make what is called a good political alliance amongst ourselves, but in reality one which would be most unpatriotic and disastrous to the French Canadians. I ask hon. members, therefore, to look at this question as it should be viewed, to look at the laws as they exist, to look at the difficulty of the position in which the Minister of Justice and the Government were placed, to judge not from feeling nor from the relations of blood or creed or nationality. It is natural with men of one Province or of one blood to feel more warmly in regard to the case of men of their own Province, of their own blood and religion. But we must not judge of this matter in that light. These have been my sentiments during the last four months. I have not changed my mind to suit men and circumstances; I have relied upon the reward given to men who do not flinch before the cries of the multitude, and who do not seek their political fortune in the success of the moment. I have walked straight before me in what I thought was the right path as a citizen of Canada. I have followed that conduct, I have not been biassed, and in the whole of what I have done, in the whole of what I have said through that painful crisis, I trust I have not lost the sympathies of my friends, the respect of my enemies, nor the confidence of the country.

Mr. BERGERON. It may seem somewhat presumptuous on my part to rise in my seat at this stage of the discussion, and I am sorry to be obliged to do so at this late hour. But I have taken too active a part in the movement which has taken place in Quebec last fall not to explain the vote which I intend to give. I believe, Sir, that I owe it to the Parliament of this country, I owe it to my colleagues, to my county, and to myself. We have been assisting for a fortnight back in a great trial which has taken place within these walls. Standing here in the independent portion of this House, I may say that I have listened with a great deal of attention to the charge brought against the Government by my friends and by the Opposition, and I have listened to the defence which has been made by members sitting opposite to me, and I have found out, Sir, that the answer to the charge has not been complete. It is true that on the Government side the best lawyers have been called upon to defend them, and we have to-night, Sir, an example of the strength of the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. Secretary of State, who has the reputation of being one of the most eloquent men in this country, has done his best to keep up his reputation as a great criminal lawyer in defending his client of to-day. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I am bound to speak on the motion of my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Landry), and I may say that a great deal of what has been said by speakers on both sides has relation to that point, as I will show. If the hon. gentleman when he made his motion, had wanted to censure the Government in the way in which we in the Province of Quebec understood it, he would not have brought a motion forward simply stating that we regretted that the Government has brought about the execution of Louis Riel, meaning that we are sorry that that man was executed, because probably he was a French Canadian. Then the hon. Minister of Public Works stands up and moves the previous question, so as to prevent any man in this House from rising and saying we want to add something to that motion, we want to say that we are not opposed to the Government for hanging Riel because Riel was a French Canadian, but we are opposed to the Government for having so badly administered the affairs of the North-West that this state of things was brought about. I would have been glad if the hon. gentleman in making his motion had spoken to us, and united with us in harmony with the object which he must have had in view, when he wanted to censure the Government, and Sir, that is a reason why we have heard as much about the murder of Scott as about the rebellion of 1835; and I felt sorry when I saw my hon. friend—I beg his pardon; I may not call him that, since he does not bow to me—I was sorry to see the Minister of Public Works stating to his supporters that since the murder of Scott had been committed in the North-West under a Government of which Riel was president, the people of this country should be satisfied that when he hanged Riel they were only doing an act of justice. That is the way they want to impress the House and the people of the country—that the execution of Riel was to punish him for the execution of Scott fifteen years ago, and they give to the people of this country and the world at large an example of what fanaticism may do in a country like ours. Why, Sir, even if it was true—which I deny—that Riel was the cause of the death of Scott, he was pardoned for that. Like every man in this country, I regretted that deed, and though I was a child at that time I remember that I heard everybody in my Province declaring that it was a calamity that the death of that man should have occurred, because Quebec is a place where regret is felt for anything that deserves sympathy. We were told then that Riel was premier or president of a council legally constituted, a council which has been recognised by England afterwards when the British Secretary of State for the Colonies dealt with Louis Riel, as chief of the provisional government, to give to Canada those immense possessions of the North-West. Even if it were true that Riel had something to do with that act, which I deny, because it was done by a council, and he could not of himself order the death of Scott or prevent it; but admitting it was true, for the sake of argument, I say he was punished when he was expelled from this country, when he was sent from lunatic asylum to lunatic asylum in our Province, when he led for about six or seven years the most miserable life that a man can lead on earth; and it was an act of cruelty, if it were true, to hang Riel, in 1885, to avenge the murder of Scott in 1870. But, Sir, it is not like that, and I am sorry the Minister of Public Works had to resort to such means to make the House and the people of this country understand the act which took place on the 16th of November last. We have had just now a very eloquent speech. We have had a very bad figure of Riel, and we have heard from those who support the Government, the history of the North-West in one way. If I may be allowed to—since the hon. gentlemen are good enough to listen to me—I shall say also what I think of the history of the North-West. This country has belonged to us for about fifteen years. It has been, according to what Archbishop Taché—whom I believe as well, and perhaps better than a good many members of this House, because he is not interested in telling anything but the truth—he tells us that the country has been badly administered since it belonged to Canada. In saying that, of course, I am blaming the Liberal Government as well as the Conservative Government, but I am bound to say what did happen. Hon. gentlemen will understand immediately that with regard to that, the greater blame falls on those who used to be my friends, because the other party were only in power four years, whilst my old friends were in power from 1867 to 1874, and from 1879 to the present time, and the two rebellions which have taken place in the North-West have taken place under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, had the half-breeds grievances? I wanted to read through the papers which I have before me—but I do not want to inflict them on the House—I could show that Archbishop Taché has said that the half-breeds have had grievances for many years. More than that, if I wanted to impress hon. gentlemen opposite, I would say that the Toronto Mail, on the 8th of July last, said that the half-breeds had grievances, and that the Government had neglected them. If I wanted to go further to convince my friends on the other side who, through what they call their loyalty to their party are perhaps sacrificing their country, I could state that the Government acknowledged last year that the Metis had grievances, for they appointed a commission to grant them what they were asking. But when they appointed that commission it was too late. It is true that last year I voted confidence in the Government on that question and against the motion of the hon. chief of the Opposition; I had confidence in the Government. On that occasion I remember the hon. Secretary of State told this House that there were no grievances in the North-West, that there were no claims from the Metis at that date; and yet it was found, a few days afterwards, that at the very time the vote was taken over 2,000 claims were lying on the table of the Hon. Sir David Macpherson, then Minister of the Interior. When the commission was issued it was too late; the cannons were firing at Duck Lake. Riel did not come into Canada of his own notion; he was sent for in Montana, where Archbishop Taché said he was teaching little children and earning an honest living. He did not want to come to this country when the Metis sent a delegation to ask him for God's sake to come and help them to get their rights from the Dominion Government. As Archbishop Taché says, the Metis had sent delegation after delegation to Ottawa; they had sent their priests in whom they had confidence, and they had sent their bishops who came and told the Government that if the grievances were not redressed, the half-breeds would rebel, and that it would cost millions to this country to put down that rebellion, whilst it would cost very little to render justice to the half-breeds if it were done in time. Yet these demands were not listened to, or rather they were not attended to. The delegations were well received, and well treated, and promises were made to them. But nothing at all was done; just as promises were made to Archbishop Taché when he came from Rome on purpose to settle the difficulties of the North-West in 1870, and nothing was done afterwards. So the delegations were invited to dinners and receptions, but they went back to the North-West and nothing was done to redress the grievances of the half-breeds; and having in Parliament no representative to defend them or present their case, they sent to Montana and brought Riel, a man who fifteen years before had fought for the redress of the grievances of the half-breeds of Manitoba. At that time he had been king of the North-West, and had been able to control millions of dollars, and yet we are told to-day that he was ready to sell himself for $35,000 or $40,000. The half-breeds do not believe that, Sir, and I will prove that that insinuation is false. The Metis had confidence in him, and they sent for him and begged him to help them; and if Louis Riel had been anxious to become a great leader and a great man, would he not have accepted their invitation at once? But he did not do so. He had possession of his mental faculties at that time. Living quietly in that little village in Montana, he was not excited, and like a sane man he took time to reflect; he asked the delegation for a night to think over the matter. He was not free, as he had been in 1870; he was a married man, and he had a family whom he did not wish to neglect; but the next morning, I am sorry to say, he showed more heart than brains, for he accepted to go with them to the neglected district. Did he go there to levy war or to raise a rebellion against the flag of England? If he did, all the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite amount to nothing. If he was not a crank and a fool, how could he hope with 300 poor men, who were made poorer by the neglect of the Government, to raise a rebellion against the flag of Britain? No, Sir; but he wanted to help the Metis by holding meetings and passing resolutions to be sent down to Ottawa. Some of these resolutions wanted representation in this House and the Senate. This was the kind of agitation Louis Riel wanted to have; but who prevented him from carrying out his plans? Let us ask Major Crozier. When he met the Metis, of course they had arms, some of them. Did he speak to them in the way that he should under such circumstances, and ask them to be quiet and lay down their arms? No, they were addressed with bullets; they were fired at; and like men of heart they defended themselves. That was the commencement of the rebellion which brought that unfortunate man to the scaffold. It has been proved that at times Riel had not the complete control of his mental faculties. Being there in the midst of the agitation, surrounded by men talking and declaring that it was time for the half-breeds to vindicate their rights, his mind became affected; and the testimony which was read by the hon. Minister of Justice to the effect that Riel said that when the grass grew he would have foreign armies in the country and light fires all over the country, that he wanted to conquer England and that he would go to Rome and be a pope—all shows him to have been insane. He had no interest at that time to pretend to be a fool; all his interest was in the contrary direction. The proof that he was insane is that he took Jackson, who was tried and found to be an insane man, and made him his secretary. Would he have done that if he had been sane? The hon. Minister of Public Works said in his speech that Riel acted as a coward—that there was no heart in the man. Let me tell the hon. Minister that last summer in the St. Lawrence Hall, in Montreal, I met Captain Howard, of the Gatling gun, and I asked him in the presence of the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol) what he thought of Riel. He said that he saw Riel at Batoche fighting all day. "Was he a brave man?" I asked. "Yes," he said, "he fought like a hero, and I remember him because he had a peculiar rifle." I said: "I am glad to hear that." I would rather know that that man acted and died as a hero than that he acted as a coward, and I would be glad if anyone would challenge Captain Howard—though, of course, if asked, he would have to say the same thing—and ask him to repeat it. At Batoche, after 2,000 of our troops, as the Minister of Public Works said, had been besieging that place for four days, which was defended by but thirty-two Metis, they entered it. I have great respect for our volunteers, but it is probable they had not been well commanded in that expedition, otherwise thirty-two men, who were half-starved, would not have been able for four days to hold the place and then abandon it because their provisions had run out, not one of them being caught except Riel who surrendered. If Riel had been sane and intelligent, as Dumont was, is it likely he would have put himself into the hands of Mr. Middleton? No, but he had this idea, that he would give himself up to the general, who would take great care of him, that he would be brought to Ontario or Quebec, and stand in either Province his trial before twelve of his countrymen, that the trial would be a cause célèbre and he would have an opportunity of making the people know all the grievances under which the Metis had suffered. Just as when he was asking money he did not ask it for himself but to establish a paper, and was willing to seize the opportunity of his trial to publish to the world the grievances of the Metis, which otherwise would not be made known. He pretended that money was due to him, his object being to establish a newspaper through which he would publish to the whole world how the half-breeds had been treated for 15 years by the Canadian Government. But if he had any such ideas when he put himself in the hands of General Middleton, they soon vanished from his mind. He was brought to Regina, and his trial took place. We have been told it was a legal and constitutional trial. No one had denied that. In every meeting which took place in the Province of Quebec, not one orator has said the trial was not legal or constitutional. The people of our Province are too intelligent to know that, so long as anything is done by Parliament, it is legal, because Parliament can do anything, even something that is bad; and I think it did so in that case. The tribunal was a legal and constitutional one, but not British. Last year, on the 16th July, when the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) asked the Government to only put on trial the chiefs, and not the other half-breeds who had been arrested, I asked the Government if they could not go a little further and change the law as it existed in the North-West, so as to put it on the same footing as the law in the rest of the Dominion, and give to that man twelve jurymen before whom he would have a trial and a judge of the Superior Court or Court of Appeal, as any British subject has a right to ask for in the older Provinces. I will, with the permission of the House, read the answer of the Minister of Public Works:

"With respect to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), it would be hardly the thing just now to change the law of the country for the purpose of trying these men or any other men. The law is on the Statute-book."

Everybody knew that.—

"If there was a change it might be for better or for worse. Why should there be a change made in the law?"

Why? To give a fair trial to that man; because it would have given him twelve jurymen, six of whom would have been of his own nationality and creed; and surely I will be allowed here in the House of Commons, where we are all united to discuss the best interests of the country, to say frankly I would have more confidence in a jury of twelve men, six of whom would have understood his sentiments and intentions, men of his own creed, than in a jury of six men all of a different creed and nationality.

Mr. BERGERON.

"The law will be exercised with justice, and although there are only six jurors, those jurors are to be selected in the same way as we select them in other parts of the country."

This is not correct. In other Provinces the sheriff calls a great panel of them; they are called into court, and there are sixty, at least, on the list. The prisoner on trial has the right to challenge some of them, has the right to choose his jury, but there were only thirty-six men called at Regina, called by Mr. Richardson, and they were chosen before they came into court; and if Riel had been able to challenge six of them there would have been thirty more to choose from.

"There is to be the right to challenge on the part of the prisoner as well as on the part of the Crown—[I said this would not amount to much]—therefore, we need not be uneasy or afraid that there will be a packed jury. There will be nothing of the kind; there will be justice and a fair trial, and I hope when the affair is over, hon. gentlemen will be able to say that though we have to see that the law is executed, whenever we have been in a position to recommend mercy, mercy has been granted."

At that time, when my hon. friend and myself were asking that, we were very far from entertaining the idea that the jury at Regina would recommend the prisoner to the mercy of the court. The hon. Minister of Public Works said that the recommendation to mercy did not amount to anything. Why did they say so? Why did the jury, having heard the evidence and being convinced that Riel was a crank and a fool and did not deserve to go on the scaffold—though he was sane enough to be found guilty—recommend him to mercy, except that they were of opinion that the Executive had enough knowledge of the law to declare that he was properly found guilty but did not deserve to be hanged? When the people of our Province heard of such recommendation, and after seeing the Ministers themselves and talking to them, they did not say he would not be hanged, but left us under the impression that he would not be executed. At that time, in our Province, there was a sentiment appealing for mercy which started from every county. They remembered that their sons had been called upon to go to the North-West, and defend the British flag; they remembered that the 9th and the 65th Battalions, and other French battalions of Quebec, would have been proud to go there and defend the authority of the law; and they thought, when Riel was arrested and found guilty, it was a decided thing he could not be put again at liberty, but they asked that the scaffold be not erected in those distant possessions. They said that that country had cost us a great deal too much. Punish that man, they said, if you wish, but do not erect a scaffold; do not show to the whole world that a man who was once the leader of that immense country is going to dance at the end of a rope, to the admiration of the new settlers. That demand was put aside, and the Ministers, the leaders of the French Canadians and of the Province of Quebec, forgot that in 1775 French Canadians were fighting under the walls of the city of Quebec against American invasion under General Montgomery; they forgot that in 1812 French Canadians fought like heroes in defence of the British flag on the shores of the river Chateauguay, and rolled back an American army; they forgot that last year even our battalions had all offered to go and defend the authority in the North-West. They forgot that in 1874 this same man, Louis Riel, whom they were sending to the scaffold, gave his seat for Provencher to Sir George Etienne Cartier, and so enabled him to conduct this country into the state of prosperity in which he left it. They forgot that in 1871 Louis Riel offered his sword and his life to defend the North-West against the Fenians who were coming from the United States; they forgot all that, and yielded—to what? I leave the inference to be drawn by the members of this House and the people of this country. The Minister of Public Works has said that they received petitions in favor of the hanging and petitions against the hanging. It was a matter of weight, Mr. Speaker, and we had less weight than the others, and we lost our case. The people of our Province, believing that, very sincerely, have held meetings in different counties. We were called to address them, and sometimes the member for the county would be there and would help us, and share in our opinion, but most of the time the member was not there, but he would send a letter and say that he did not want to blame the Government at that time, but that when Parliament opened, explanations would be given by the Government.

Mr. DUGAS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGERON. I am surprised to hear my hon. friend from Montcalm say "hear, hear." When some members called for more explanation and more information, these very men voted no, and said: "We have had enough information, and we have had enough explanation." I leave that to be attended to by their own electors when the time comes. I said a moment ago that Mr. Jackson, the private secretary of Riel, was sent away. A little trial of about twenty minutes was granted to him, and the lawyers were fighting among themselves who should say first that he was a fool, and should be sent away. After being kept in gaol pro forma until Riel was hanged, he was set free. Where is he now? I see in the Chicago Inter-Ocean something which it may be good to know before we render our judgment:

"William H. Jackson, private secretary of Louis Riel, lately hanged by the Canadian Government as a rebel, lectured to a small audience last evening at Central Music Hall. The lecture was a very full statement of the trouble between Canada and the half-breeds of the North-West, but for a popular lecture it was at least four times too long. The speaker began at 8 o'clock. He was still talking at 11.30, when the reporter left. The whole history of the territory north of the United States was given, and if the statements made concerning its early history be true, the North-West Territory certainly would seem to have the same right to a local provisional government as the remainder of Canada. To verify the statements made would involve much labor, for not only were the charters of the Hudson Bay and North-Western Companies discussed from a legal as well as historical standpoint, but the character of the claims of England and other European nations to the territory was given in full. The speaker evinced the most minute knowledge of every phase of the question. According to his statement the North-Western Territory has the same right to an independent provisional government as has Canada, and Riel was a lawful president, and not a traitor or rebel."

That is what Mr. Jackson is doing in the States to-day, going from one city to the other and saying the North-West has been badly administered by the Government and that Louis Riel was not a rebel, but was the president of a people deserving to be better treated by this Government. We were given a medical commission. The hon. the Minister of Public Works promised, I believe, in a speech delivered at Rimouski, in answer to an address presented to him, that a medical commission would be instituted in order to see whether Louis Riel was sane enough to be hanged or not. It seems that that promise was made without the authorisation of the Premier, because, if I remember well, I saw in the papers that it was decided, before the Minister of Militia started for the North-West, to hang Louis Riel. A letter was published in the newspapers to that effect—a letter addressed from Sir John to Sir Adolphe. It was decided to hang Riel in spite of our Ministers, who, I have no doubt, endeavored to prevent the hanging of that fool on the 16th November, and to prevent an act of injustice being done. But they were told they had to abide by it; it had to be done. Now suppose a conversation took place, and one of them said: "For God's sake, give us a medical commission, so that we may say to the people of our Province that the man was examined to prove that he was not a sane man." That is why it was appointed. It was a farce. No one could believe that it could possibly do any good. The three men who were appointed on that commission were honest men, I am sure, but they did not know any more of insanity than I or any member of this House. The Government should have chosen scientists who knew altogether how to deal with cases of the kind, but they did not, and the telegrams in ciphers came back to Ottawa, and we are told now that the man was sane enough to be hanged; that he was crazy on religious and political points, but that, as the offence was not a political one, necessarily he was sane enough to be hanged, and he was hanged. There was in our Province a sentiment of indignation which arose from everybody, even from our English speaking compatriots of Montreal. In the city council of Montreal, some of the English speaking Protestants spoke in favor of adjourning the council on account of the act which had been committed that morning. And I am sure that our Ministers felt as we did, but they were not ready to leave the Government. I am not imputing to them any bad motives. I was under the idea at one time that they had sacrificed themselves in order to prevent a war of races in this country. I was not sure but that I ought to praise instead of blaming them. But, a few days afterwards, when the wise men who were concerned in the movement, who were working with me to prevent the people from hanging them in effigy and making processions, which I thought would do more harm than good—and in my own county I told the people who had acted in this way that they should not have done such a bad act—when we were doing as much as we could to put down the clamor, the Ministers' organs commenced to say that the Ministers were right. There was no doubt about it. Louis Riel was a bad man and the Government was a good Government, and if we lost that Government we would never get another one like it. Of course, articles like that went through the Province, and members of Parliament, wise men, no doubt, waited until they came here to say whether the Government did right or wrong on that occasion. Sir, if I remember right, I read in the papers that Bishop Grandin, a few days before the execution, was asked by the Ministers his opinion on the fate of Louis Riel. The venerable old bishop said, if the papers told the truth, that it would be better to leave that man in gaol, or put him into a lunatic asylum, and then the people would forget him in six months, than to send him to the scaffold and make a martyr of him, in which case the people would talk of him for ten years afterwards. And Sir, Bishop Taché says, in his letter published a few weeks ago: "If you think you have diminished the trouble in the North-West by hanging that man, you have made a mistake." And what did we see a few days afterwards? Why our Ministers were running away, some across the Atlantic, some down to Quebec, surrounded by a posse of police, and others to New York. At that time Louis Riel was being buried in the cathedral of St. Boniface, carried upon the shoulders of sixty men, and followed by 2,000 Metis who were proud to follow the man who had been their chief and obtained for them in Manitoba the liberties they are enjoying to-day, and who obtained for the half-breeds on the Saskatchewan the justice which has been granted to them in settling over 2,000 claims since last fall. Now, Sir, I remember my hon. friend for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) making a very fine speech, as he always does, and reading extracts from the Globe. Why, it is most amusing, Mr. Speaker, to hear hon. gentlemen in this House spend hours in reading extracts from the Globe, or from the Mail, or some other newspapers. Notwithstanding, I would not say that the Liberal party is more responsible for what the Globe writes than is the Conservative party for what the Mail writes. I am sorry to say that the press of our country have gone too far. I have often heard the right hon. Premier rise in this place and say that he was not responsible for what appeared in the Mail, and I have heard the chief of the Opposition say the same thing with regard to the Globe. Now, how have we been treated by the Mail since last fall? I will not tire the House by reading its articles, but I believe that if to-morrow morning I were to vote for the Government, they would praise me and say I never did anything wrong. I do not care what the newspapers say. What we have to do here is our duty to our electors and our duty to our country. My hon. friend for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), made a speech. He is a very good lawyer, and a criminal lawyer. It seems queer that in this circumstance they are all criminal lawyers who defend the Government. I suppose that it is because they are the most eloquent legal gentlemen. My hon. friend for Montreal Centre made a great speech, a fine speech, and I congratulate him. He is my deputy, and I voted for him, and I do not know but if he behaves well I may vote for him again at the next election, but when he was speaking it struck me that if Louis Riel had not been hanged, and the leader of the Opposition had made a motion blaming the Government for not having hanged that man, the hon. member for Montreal Centre would have made just as fine a speech to prove that the Government were right in not hanging him. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) also said one thing which I want to answer. He meant to say that the people of the Province of Quebec ought to be glad that we have English laws in this country, that we have English liberty; that in France, out of twelve jurors, seven could send a man to the gallows, whilst in this country twelve jurymen must be unanimous in their verdict. Why, Mr. Speaker, we know that, we knew it before. We are glad to have British laws in this country. We are not French. Why, I am less French, perhaps than my hon. friend opposite. We have been here for over 200 hundred years, and we are not French, and do not want to be French. We respect the French, we admire France, we love France, but we do not want to be French. We want to be British, and we are British subjects until we can be something else—independent if possible.

Mr. HESSON. British subjects are always independent.

Mr. BERGERON. Now, going over to the other side of the House I come across the Minister of Justice. Allow me to say that I was very favorably impressed with the speech he delivered, and although he did not convince me, I thought he deserved the position he holds, and that he is the best lawyer, at least, on the other side of the House. I remember he said, in his speech, he had been at St. Columban and St. Jérôme—at the latter place with the Secretary of State, and at St. Columban with the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Minister of War. He said that at St. Columban they had had a fine reception. I was not there. The papers did not say so, but I should rather believe the hon. member than the papers. But he did not say that they had a fine reception at St. Jérôme. I was there, and the reception was not at all fine. Knowing the popularity of my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, I was surprised to find, in his own county, that the public sentiment was so strong against him, that in a meeting called by him, he had to leave it before it was finished, and go off to another place with one or two hundred of his friends. The Minister of Justice did not mention that. I arrived too late to speak, but soon enough to see that the meeting divided, and that the great majority were hostile to the Secretary of State. The Minister of Justice said, this was not the place to discuss the Riel question, that it was a question for the courts. There have been a great many cases tried in this country since last fall, and I never heard an hon. member wish to bring them into Parliament. That is only done in regard to the Riel question. Why? Because this is a political question; it is not at all a judicial question. The Ministers in their counsels were called upon as a court of review or court of appeal to decide whether that man should die or not; and they had not to do, as the law exists, in the other Provinces and say "No," in order to prevent the hanging, but they had to say "Yes" to get the man executed on the scaffold. While they had to do that the Ministers are responsible to Parliament as we are responsible to the people; and do they not know that before many weeks are over may be we shall, every one of us be, before our electors and that this will be one of the greatest points of discussion on the hustings. So if we have to bring this question before the people it had to be brought before Parliament; and if they were judges in the Privy Council we are judges to-day, as the electors will be judges in the near future. The Minister of Militia and Defence did just what we expected of him—he made a good defence, but it was not a defence of the Government but his own defence. The hon. gentleman read letters and telegrams. There was one thing he did which I regretted from one in the position he occupies. He might in a short speech have defended the Administration; I do not think he can justify himself for attacking the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) who was in the North-West last spring, and who to-day happens to differ in opinion with the Government, and who has since that time been attacked in the press and even in the House by the Minister of Militia for actions connected with his mission in the North-West. I was glad when I heard to-day that hon. gentleman vindicating from his seat the position he took in the North-West, and his conduct there; and I am sorry to see Ministers of the Crown who knew perfectly well the sacrifices which that hon. member had to make in leaving his family and his people without knowing whether he would ever return, attribute improper motives to him because he found when he came back that as a member of Parliament he could not approve the acts of the Administration and support the Government. The charge which has been made against the Government, in my opinion, has not been answered, and to-day the Government stands indicted for having hanged a madman. The Government also stands indicted for having so badly administered the North-West as to have brought that state of things upon it, and they were the cause of all the trouble that happened in the North-West before the last rebellion. If I had time I would read the letter of Archbishop Taché, which has been published in English and French, wherein he finds fault with the Government for administering the country so badly, and the Archbishop states that the grievances were only remedied when cannons were firing and soldiers were fighting, and he warns the Government that before long there may be another rebellion if they do not take upon themselves the administration of the North-West, and the Archbishop begs them to arrive at the conclusion to set at liberty all those prisoners who are to-day languishing in the gaol at Regina. I was sorry this evening when I heard some remarks made by the Secretary of State against the leader of the Opposition. I am not here to defend him, he can do it himself; but I am here representing a portion of the Province of Quebec, and as such I am not to attribute bad motives, to express opinions, but believing, as I do, I think the hon. gentleman's statements were sincere. When I heard the other day the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in spite of incurring the danger of losing his popularity in Ontario, coming down boldly and for the sake of doing his duty, saying to this Government: "You have done a bad act; although it may look in a different light before certain people of the Dominion, I am bound to act here as an honorable man and I will give an honest vote in favor of the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny." Sir, I do not suppose that the hon. gentleman expected any compliment when he made that statement; but let me tell him that the people of our Province will not forget it, for they have always heart enough to know where their friends stand. Let hon. members learn the sentiment of our Province; let them go to the county of Drummond and Athabaska. In that county Mr. Prefontaine presented himself as a Conservative with the chances ten to one that he would be elected.

A few days before the election Mr. Girouard came out as a Liberal. We wrote and said that the candidates must pledge themselves to censure the Federal Government, or else we would go down and fight them; and both candidates could not face the people without pledging themselves to censure the Ottawa Government. They did more. They signed the resolutions passed at the Champ de Mars meeting, and in spite of this the sentiment was so strong that Mr. Girouard was elected. A telegram has been received by an hon. member of this House as follows:—

"Girouard returned by a large majority. Even in Athabaska he has a majority which has never happened."

This is the sentiment of our Province. When the member for West Durham spoke in the way he did, you may be sure of one thing, hoping he has not made enemies in any other Province, he has made lots of friends in the Province of Quebec. Before I close these remarks I desire to call attention to one point which is of more importance than most of the points which have been brought forward during the present discussion. The North-West has cost the Dominion a good deal of money. It was bought cheaply, but since then a great many millions have been paid by the people of the older Provinces or will be paid by them, money which has been expended in the North-West. When the North-West was acquired it was looked upon as an act of great public policy, and those who made that bargain were complimented, I believe, by both parties in this Dominion. Sir, we want to keep that country. We have been begging the nations of the world to come here and establish themselves in our North-West. We have been paying large sums of money every year to bring immigration into that country. I do not see why we should have prevented the French speaking immigrants from coming there. I do not see why we should have tried by every means to send away from the North-West those French speaking immigrants who are there now, and let me tell you why I think so. If the North-West some years hence is composed entirely of English speaking people, their interests will be just as much with the United States as they will be with Canada. These people being far away from us, having nothing in common with us, speaking the language of the American people, finding that they are just as much their compatriots as we, will do what? Just what some of them are trying to do to-day—they are asking to have lines of railway from the Canadian Pacific Railway to the States. That is the easier way to carry their products, it is more advantageous for them, it is better for them to pass that way than to come down by the St. Lawrence route. Suppose that the Government of this country some day should say to them you shall not go to the States; you have to pass over the Canadian Pacific Railway; you have to travel through the older Provinces; we will not allow you to take to the United States your products and the money which you make in our North-West. Sir, what would those people answer? They would say if you are not satisfied we will secede from Canada; we would rather belong to the United States, we would rather have dealings with the United States, than the Dominion of Canada. But, Sir, if you have a French speaking population in the midst of that country, although the Anglo-Saxon element will always rule, it is the act of the Almighty; it is not our fault, but in matters of business the English speaking people will always have the advantage over the French speaking people, at least in this country—then I say, if you encourage French speaking immigration into that country and protect those who are there already, you will keep for England this country which has cost us so much and of which we expect so much, and the men or the party which will not adopt such policy should not have the confidence of those who want to make of Canada a great country. I have said that the Government in my opinion was guilty of maladministration in the North-West. I have said and I have proved that our Ministers were the cause of the movement in our Province, that they provoked it by their organs throughout the whole Province; and but for the fact that I do not wish to abuse the indulgence of the House I could read some articles in Le Monde, a paper which I believe is under the direction of the Minister of Public Works. But I will not do it; they have been read before, and I am sure they will not be forgotten. Sir, we felt in our Province that we had been put by our Ministers in a most humiliating position. We thought that they had not a right to treat the people of that Province in that way. Sir, I really believe that if public opinion had been prepared for anything that might happen, although the man did not deserve his fate, although a scaffold should not have been erected in Regina, still if public opinion had been prepared for it, nobody would have said anything. The people would have said that it had to be done, that we had to yield to the majority, and after all that we may take it up on some other question. But, no, Sir, we were prepared for the belief that such a thing would not and could not happen, and when some people found out that we were yielding to the demands of those who wanted the hanging, we said: "no;" and to-day we are blamed for standing by what we considered to be our duty. I saw the other day two newspapers, one paper accusing the other one of defending one of the Ministers from Quebec, whilst the other paper accused the first of defending two of our Ministers. In my opinion the three of them are guilty in the same degree—I see no difference. We cannot say who in the Cabinet defended the cause of justice one more than another, but I believe they stand together before the people guilty in the same degree, and I hope that the same fate which happened to Riel will not happen to them, but that they will have mercy somewhere. I am sorry I have kept the House so long in addressing them in my broken language, but I wanted to speak English, so that I might be understood by my old friends from Ontario in explaining why I have taken the position I now occupy, and I think I have given all the reasons why I find myself in such a position. I have been told by some friends of mine on the other side—because I hope still to be personal friends with them—that I should have gone to my people before taking away my allegiance to the Government, and should have sought another election. I would have been perfectly ready to do that had I known that the writs would have been issued before the opening of Parliament, and I know that the people of my county would have sent me here again by an overwhelming majority if anybody had opposed me, as was not done in 1882, when I was elected by acclamation. When I came here, at the opening of the Session, I was not surprised at not seeing the Ministers in good humor, but I felt badly at seeing the conduct of some of the Ministers who had known me and knew that I was perfectly sincere in the position I had taken.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. gentleman who says that may not be so sincere as I am, and perhaps he is waiting for some explanation. The Ministers knew that, but they acted towards me as if I had been an outcast. Let me say one thing to hon. gentlemen opposite: I have supported the Government since I have been in Parliament. When I came here I was perfectly independent; I was elected by the support of both parties, and I might have voted on one side or the other, and probably would have been elected again. I thought the policy of the Government was good; I thought their National Policy and their railway policy were good; I believe that still, and I supported them, but at the same time I was perfectly independent of the Cabinet. I liked the Ministers; I was sorry when this happened, and that I had to separate from them, but if they were kind to me I would remind them that I have rendered them in many instances affection and services for services. I believe there may be twenty-five members in this House whom I have helped to get seats in Parliament, and they knew that I was never behind time when I was asked to go on the hustings in the Province of Quebec and defend the action of the Government and help candidates to come here and support them. As far as that is concerned, I am on the same footing as they are, and I am as much independent of them as they are of me. But since I took upon myself to contest their right of forcing me to support them I am sorry that some of them found it to be their duty to look upon me as a stranger; for even to-day, on the eve of giving my vote, I say that I was sorry to hear when the news came first that the right hon. Premier was sick in his room and could not be present in the House, for though I am going to vote against the Government I have a deep respect and admiration for the Premier. I have always thought he was a great statesman, I think so still. I do not think he was the most guilty man, for I blame the Ministers from Quebec more than I do him, because he did not owe so much to our Province as they who were more particularly charged to represent it. The motion which is now before us is not according to my idea, and is not in the way in which I would have liked it to be put. Still, Sir, I shall vote for it. Now, it seems to me that we were destined to build on the shores of the St. Lawrence a great nation. When we remember those 60,000 Frenchmen who had been left on the shores of the St. Lawrence, abandoned by France, in 1759, after fighting like heroes under the great Montcalm, were defeated by number and the valor of Wolfe, and afterwards united with the sons of England, I think it must have been decided by Providence that the children of the two greatest nations of the world should build here in the northern part of America a great nation. The French Canadians have been allowed, through the magnanimity of England, to retain their language, to practice their religion, and to enjoy the free use of their laws; and, Sir, any man listening to me or reading my speech to-morrow will know that French Canadian loyalty to England is greatly due to the fact that we recognise that with England we are better than we would have been had we remained with France under its Government of that day. Sir, are we going now to put a stop to the destinies of our country? Are we going to say that we should hang a French Canadian because an English Canadian was killed fifteen years before? No, Sir; let us sink our divisions in religion and language. Let us follow the example of our volunteers, who responded so bravely last year to the call of the Government. Although speaking different languages and belonging to different Provinces, they went to the North-West shoulder to shoulder and blade by blade to defend the British flag and to restore order. Let us do that, and if we do we shall see before long a united people, speaking different languages, it is true, but all the more enlightened for that; we shall see a great nation which will be the admiration of the world, and will attract immigration to its shores. Now, I hope we shall cast the vote we are about to give conscientiously; I hope hon. members will cast it just as if they were in the presence of their electors; and let me ask them in doing so to remember the words of a great English General before a great war: "Gentlemen, Canada expects that in this instance every man here will do his duty."

Mr. TASSÉ. I do not intend to delay the House. I had prepared, I confess, an argument on this burning and important question; but as both parties are desirous of coming to a vote, I will not detain the House any longer than merely to make a few remarks on the eloquent speech which has just been delivered by my hon. friend, the member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron). My hon. friend has spoken with the warmth of a convert, and he has thought proper to criticise very severely the administration of affairs by the present Government. In these remarks my hon. friend has forgotten his own past of yesterday, he has forgotten the vote he gave last Session, and he has forgotten a speech which he delivered in his own county since last Session. On that occasion my hon. friend spoke as follows of the policy of the present Government and the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite:

"While the Grits of Ontario are shouting: 'Hang Riel,' the Quebec Liberals are shouting: 'Do not hang Riel; give Riel his pardon.' When people intend to be honest and sincere in politics they only ask one thing, and their only object should not be to clog the wheels of Administration by setting Province against Province. It is not by these condemnable means that the Conservatives came back to power in 1878, and were again continued in power in 1882. We have gained and deserved the confidence of the people by accomplishing improvements of all kinds, by encouraging agriculture, industry, the building of railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway and protection. When the Riel question came before Parliament we were at our post and we did our duty; nobody will believe that the Conservative members have not as much intelligence and patriotism as the Liberals. After having cheered with enthusiasm our soldiers who went to restore order in the North-West, are we to unite with those who would have us believe that the soldiers of the 65th were fools, who did an unpatriotic act when they left to go and fight their brethren? No; the Government wanted the services of their soldiers, and we have seen with pleasure 700 of our countrymen answering at roll-call. If Mr. Laflamme would only speak honestly, he would tell us that when he was a Minister, his colleague, Mr. Mills, in 1875 or 1876 told the half-breeds, in answer to their petitions, that they had no more rights than the white settlers. At that time there was only one French Canadian in the North-West Commission. It was also that same Government who appointed Richardson as magistrate, because he was noted for his hatred against French Canadians. While Sir John was giving $5,000 to Riel to allow him to escape, Mr. Blake was offering $5,000 for Riel's head. This fact alone makes it easy to establish the difference between both parties and to see on which side our friends are."

My hon. friend has also referred to His Lordship the Archbishop of St. Boniface. He has said that the policy of this Government has been most severely condemned by that prelate. It is true, in a memorial published lately, His Lordship said that mistakes had been committed by both parties; and if my hon. friend remembers a memorial that was published at the beginning of the year 1879, he will find that in that document that great apostle of the North-West, who understands so well the administration of public affairs in that great and important portion of the Dominion, said that during the five years previous, during the whole period of the Mackenzie Administration, nothing had been done for the half-breeds of the North-West. My hon. friend said that Riel, while on the other side of the line, was a peaceful subject. This afternoon, I received a few notes on the conduct of Riel while on the other side of the line and an American subject, which shows he was a born agitator, as even there he was a source of trouble and disorder among his own people. Here is a short memorandum which was communicated to me this afternoon:

"In 1878, Riel, who had been living a St. Ives, in Dakota, moved out to Sun River, in Montana, where there was a large settlement of half-breeds, many of whom came to this settlement from Manitoba after the troubles in 1869 and 1870.

"Riel opened a school at Sun River, and immediately began to take a prominent part in all the actions of these half-breeds, assuming, as he has done on all occasions, the leadership.

"The first trouble among these half-breeds, after Riel's arrival, was in consequence of their refusing to pay duty on goods imported by them from the North-West. The sheriff, Mr. Jno. Healy and two deputies were sent from Fort Benton to confiscate the goods and furs of the half-breeds, but they were captured and imprisoned by the half-breeds, and were only released upon arrival of a body of American troops who destroyed the goods and furs in question.

"The next trouble with which Riel dragged these Sun River half-breeds was in connection with the territorial elections. Riel claimed that his followers were entitled to vote and upon being refused by the authorities, he established a polling place in the settlement and recorded the half-breed votes. For this offence he was arrested and imprisoned at Fort Benton, Montana, and the writer has been told by the authorities at Fort Benton that he was a constant element of trouble during his residence among these half-breeds, and further, that up to the time of Riel's arrival in the settlement they had not had any trouble with these people."

This document demonstrates fully that at all times, not only in Canada but on the other side, Riel was a source of trouble and disorder among the half-breeds. My hon. friend referred to the case of Jackson, making the very same argument which was advanced the other day by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), in order to try to make the people believe that while on the one hand Riel was hanged because he had taken a prominent part in the troubles of the North-West, Jackson, on the other hand, who was one of the chief rebels, was discharged on the ground of lunacy, because he was not a French Canadian :

"We have it now as a fact of history that while Riel was inducing that rebellion, he chose as his chief adviser and secretary, a man notoriously insane, William Joseph Jackson, who signed his letters and Orders in Council. Will it be pretended by any man that if Riel had been in his senses, if he had a sane and discerning mind, he would have accepted an insane man as his chief adviser? Why did this not strike hon. gentlemen opposite? One of the things which we in Lower Canada have felt as deeply as we have ever felt anything is that we have believed that the measure of justice which was extended to William Joseph Jackson was not the same measure of justice which was extended to Louis Riel."

Further, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), quoted the testimony of Dr. Jukes, given at Regina at the trial of Jackson, but the hon. gentleman stopped at a very interesting point. If he had continued, he would have informed the House that Dr. Jukes had said in his testimony, in addition to the portion quoted by the hon. gentleman, "that he understood from Riel that Jackson was put in confinement for insanity." That disposes of the contention that Jackson had always been chief adviser and secretary for Louis Riel. He acted as such as long as he was not insane, but as soon as he was discovered to be insane, he was put in custody. This fact, which is an important one, has been fully established by the brother of Jackson, in the evidence he gave during the trial of Riel at Regina. But the hon. member for Quebec East had taken the trouble to read that portion, he would not have lead us to believe that Jackson was chosen by Riel and kept by him whilst insane. That inference is contradicted by his brother :

"Q. Had you any conversation with him?—A. I had.

"Q. This was where?—A. On the south side of the river.

"Q. You had a talk with him about your brother?—A. Yes.

"Q. Did he say what was the matter with your brother?—A. He said he was sick, he said his mind was affected, he said it was a judgment on him for opposing him.

"Q. He seemed to know his mind was affected?—A. Yes.

"Q. Did you find his mind affected?—A. I did.

"Q. How are they considering him, as a sane or insane man?—A. Allowing him his own way, but they have a guard over him.

"Q. Did Riel speak as to what was best to do with him, of what they were doing with him?—A. Yes, he thought he would improve there, but I applied for permission to get him away. Riel said he was getting along very nicely there and that he would recover.

"Q. He did not let you take him away?—A. No, he refused to do so.

"Q. Then did you make any formal application to get him away?—A. I did to the council.

"Q. And it was refused I believe?—A. Yes, it was refused.

"Q. What kept you in the camp?—A. They refused to let me go or my brother either."

That disposes of the contention of the hon. gentlemen opposite about Jackson. Now we have been told that Riel, in asking $35,000 from the Government, wanted to establish a newspaper. That has been stated by only one witness, Charles Nolin, whilst the other witnesses have not at all mentioned it. The hon. member for Beauharnois has strongly contended that the Government have executed a mad man, and referred to the speech delivered by the leader of the Opposition, the other day as convincing on this point; but it is difficult to understand why the leader of the Opposition, after contending, during five hours, that Riel was insane, should produce a letter from one of the jurors stating that in rendering the verdict they considered him insane and perfectly responsible for his acts. That letter destroyed entirely the conviction that Riel was insane; and, besides, we may fairly ask that if Riel ever becomes insane, is not the leader of the Opposition greatly responsible for his insanity? Is he not the same hon. gentleman who, in Toronto, fought as a member of the Opposition and tried to destroy the Sandfield Macdonald Administration because they were not prepared to offer a bounty for the blood of Riel? Is he not the same hon. gentleman who, when in power, offered the prize of $5,000 for the head of Riel? And it was when he was chased by the detectives of the hon. gentleman's Government, tempted by the prize offered to them, when he was chased from one place to the other, from one locality to the other, from one hospitable home to the other, that he became insane, according to some, though, if I believe the evidence which has been produced to-night, he never became insane at all. My hon. friend, the member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), has spoken of the judge who tried Riel at Regina, but he has forgotten that that judge was appointed by the present leader of the Opposition in 1877; and, when that appointment was discussed by the House in 1878, the hon. member for Bothwell said that Mr. Richardson was a member of the bar and had occupied a prominent position in the office of the Minister of Justice before he was appointed stipendiary magistrate, and Mr. Blake, then Minister of Justice, made some remarks to the same effect. The hon. member for Beauharnois has also referred to the agitation which was going on in the Province of Quebec for some time about Riel. In that connection, perhaps the House would like to know what was then the opinion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) who is one of the stars on the other side of the House. That gentleman said :

"The position of the Province of Quebec on the subject of the trial and conviction of Louis Riel is a puzzle to the great majority of the people of this Province. They cannot understand how it is that the whole people of a Province like the Province of Quebec should come to the rescue of Riel, and should put forward such extreme efforts to save him from the fate to which he has been condemned. Neither the constitution of the court nor those superintending can explain the matter. There was no complaint as to the constitution of any court when Riel was charged with the murder of Thomas Scott, and yet the people of the Province of Quebec were quite as much interested in reference to Riel then as they are now. It was not for one moment then supposed that Riel was insane, and yet his pardon was quite as fiercely demanded then as it is at this moment. We do not think the question of responsibility or irresponsibility has anything whatever to do with the phenomenon that public opinion presents at this time in our sister Province. It would be a singularly unfortunate condition of things if in the administration of justice it should become the rule in Quebec that no one of French blood should suffer capitally for any wrong done to one of another race, and yet we have something very much like this peculiarity laid down in the neighboring Province. But what we would desire to have clearly seen is that the question of insanity or irregularity of the trial does not move the Province of Quebec; what is determined upon is, that he be sane or insane, whether his trial be regular or irregular, he shall not be held accountable, because his white ancestors were of French origin."

The hon. member for Beauharnois had also referred to a meeting held a few weeks ago in the town of St. Jérôme, in the county of Terrebonne, which is so well and ably represented by the hon. the Secretary of State. He stated that the Secretary of State and the Minister of Justice received on that occasion such a cold reception from the citizens of the county of Terrebonne that the Secretary of State was obliged to leave the meeting before its close. Well, I was myself present at that meeting, and I wish to give the most complete denial to the assertion of the hon. member for Beauharnois. I was an eye witness, while my hon. friend was not even at the meeting. He arrived there, but a little too late; the proceedings were almost over. Far from being a fiasco, as contended by my hon. friend from Beauharnois, I have no hesitation in saying that that meeting, at which 4,000 or 5,000 people were present, was one of the most enthusiastic meetings ever held in the county of Terrebonne, where the Secretary of State is deservedly so popular; and I have no hesitation in predicting, that if my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, is a candidate next time there is an election in that county, he will be returned by a majority of at least 500 or 600. My hon. friend from Beauharnois has also referred to the election which has just taken place in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska.

With all the zeal of a convert, he is delighted at the result of that election, he is cheered because a Liberal has been elected there. Well, after all, that victory is not such a great victory. Who was the member for that county during the last Session of the Provincial Legislature of Quebec? Was it not Mr. Watts, a Liberal, and why did Mr. Watts give up his seat? It was because he could not endorse the so called national agitation in the Province of Quebec, it was because he refused to endorse the policy and the conduct of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), and the other gentlemen who lead that party in the Province of Quebec, and so he resigned, and another Liberal has been elected to day to take his place. It is true that the county of Lotbinière was carried the other day by the Liberal party by a majority of 56. Well, that county has always been one of the strongest counties of the Liberal party since Confederation. They used to carry the elections in that county by majorities varying from 200 to 500. At the last election, it was carried by a very reduced majority—a little over 50—and I feel confident that, at the next election, that county will be represented by a Conservative in the Local Legislature.

Mr. COOK. What was the majority in Drummond and Arthabaska?

Mr. TASSÉ. I confess it is a great majority. I do not know exactly what the numbers are. Perhaps my hon. friend is better informed and can give me the figures. I have no sympathy with the parti national. I believe in the maintenance of the present parties. I know that the member for Quebec East has been desirous to suppress the Conservatives and the Liberals in the Province of Quebec in order to build up a great party to be called the parti national. But, Sir, I have not the slightest sympathy for the establishment of such a party as the parti national. I believe in the Conservative party; I believe in the leadership of Sir John A. Macdonald. I have the fullest confidence in the ability, in the honesty, statesmanship of all the members of the Administration, and to-night I am prepared to vote for the continuation of that Government that have done so much good for the country.

Mr. MITCHELL. I appreciate too well how I feel myself, and how all the hon. gentlemen around me feel, to think of inflicting upon them a speech at this late hour of the evening. I understand that an agreement has been come to, if a vote is reached on this question to-night, to adjourn the House until Monday next. I shall not discuss this question at present, but I will take an opportunity at an early day, on another question which I see upon the notice paper, to give my reasons for the vote I shall give upon this occasion. But I have too much consideration for the House to give my reasons to-night, and I could scarcely do so with justice to myself without taking up too much time. I will merely say this, that I have paired with the leader of the Government upon this question, and therefore the House will understand that if I had voted, I should vote against the previous question and in favor of the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry). I make this statement in order that I may not be misunderstood in the country. I shall give my reasons for it when the question comes up upon the motion in relation to North-West affairs. The feelings I entertain about this whole question of the Administration of the North-West are not feelings of to-day. I have entertained them for the last three years, and when the hon. member for West Durham made his motion last year for the appointment of a committee to enquire into the administration of affairs in the North West, the House will recollect that I followed Sir John A. Macdonald, who replied to the leader of the Opposition, and stated that while I opposed the motion, I did it upon the ground that while insurrection was ripe in that land, it was no time to put the Government upon its trial, but that if the hon. gentleman would bring up his motion next Session, I would give my hearty support to have the fullest investigation into the management of affairs in the North-West; and when that motion comes up, which is now on the paper, I will give my reason for this vote.

Mr. LABROSSE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker: I have seconded the motion of my hon. friend the member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), and I deem it my duty to state in a few words what are my reasons for taking that position. At this advanced stage of the debate I shall not detain the House very long. I will simply give a brief account of the reasons which have induced me to give the vote which I shall record on the question about to be submitted to the House. As soon as the execution of Riel became known, I protested against this act of useless cruelty. It appeared to me that Riel's trial had been more severe than that of the other prisoners; that the means and delay necessary to bring his witnesses were not granted to him after having promised to protect him and after having asked him to surrender; that the magistrate who presided over the trial was not qualified to act, being a Government officer and dependent on the Administration; that the jury had been packed; that Riel was charged with crime which is no longer punished by death in civilised countries; that the jury had recommended him to mercy, although Riel did not belong to the same race or creed as the jurymen; that the respites granted to Riel could only increase the tortures of his agony; that his madness was evident; that a commutation would have been more just and more satisfactory to the public than appeals on points of law. Riel only came to this country at the request of his friends to help his countrymen to obtain justice. Once in the country the excitement brought back to him these derangements of the brain which made him commit absurdities, lamentable acts, in the name of divine inspiration, in the name of spirits with whom he believed he was in communication. The fact that we threatened to give the half-breeds bullets for an answer precipitated the outbreak, and our troops fired first instead of trying to pacify the people with a knowledge of these facts. The press of the whole civilised world was moved into asking an act of clemency. The Government chose to listen to those who wished to punish the murder of Scott for the second time. After having promised a medical commission to enquire into the present and previous madness of Louis Riel, the Government decided to hang him, and then appointed doctors who were public officers, dependent on the Government, and not specialists. Nevertheless, their report virtually comes to the conclusion that Riel was insane as regards religious and political questions, but the Government took no notice of that fact. During that time, as though it was meant to prevent Riel's friends from giving further proof of his madness, the people were deceived by all sorts of promises in the official press, by statements to the effect that he would not be hung. Finally, and in spite of all, Riel was hung, and the organs of the Ministers, after having predicted the national agitation, have created it, fomented it, and guided it as though their object had been to incriminate the Government as much as possible. Therefore the Government have only themselves to thank if, after supporting it for thirty years I find myself in the painful duty to condemn them as regards the North-West rebellion, which has caused the loss of more than two hundred lives, I do not know how many millions of dollars, and which has brought with it the doleful event which took place on the scaffold at Regina. Mr. Speaker, the discussion which took place here has only confirmed me in my opinion, and although I regret to do so I shall dissent from the Ministers on the question now submitted to the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the lucid and able addresses of the leader of the Opposition, as well as to those on the other side of the House, and I cannot satisfy my mind as to whether Riel was insane or not. The Government have assumed the responsibility of carrying out the execution, but I am not willing either to share that responsibility or to condemn it. If they were actuated by pure and patriotic motives, I have nothing to say; but if they were actuated by other motives, it was wrong. I can say with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, that when we reach the discussion of North-West affairs, I shall give my views fully on the whole question.

Mr. LISTER. I ask the indulgence of the House for a moment while I give my reason for the vote I am about to give. The hon. Minister of Public Works declared to this House that the motion was one of non-confidence, and that it would be so accepted by the Government. I desire to say to this House that I have no confidence in this Administration, I never had any confidence in it, and for that reason I feel it my duty, representing the county I do, to vote in favor of the resolution of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry). I desire to state that the Government in pursuing the course they have done, have proclaimed themselves cowards. They have gagged this discussion by preventing any amendment to the motion of censure, and they will be so judged by the country when they come to appeal to the country. Apart altogether from the execution of Louis Riel, I feel it my duty to vote want of confidence in this Government, and I am going to do it to-night.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I desire to say that I accept the challenge that has been thrown down by the Minister of Public Works. I have determined, Sir, that the Government does not deserve the confidence of this House, and so I shall record my vote. I believe that we cannot dissociate the general administration of affairs in the North West from the vote that is now to be taken; and much as we may endeavor to confine it to the particular language that is used in the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), I still consider that the whole administration of the Government is upon trial, and believing, as I sincerely do, that the Administration has been in the highest degree inimical to the best interest of this country, I shall so record my vote.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny.) I rise to make a personal explanation. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) read yesterday to the House a declaration that was sent to him by a political opponent of mine in the county I represent. I would ask the hon. member for L'Islet if he believes the statement he made yesterday.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I do, Sir.

Mr. LANDRY. Well, if the hon. member for L'Islet is willing, I will play my seat against his, and if I am not able to prove that since the 16th September I have always followed the same line of conduct that I have assumed here, I will resign my seat, and if the hon. member for L'Islet can prove what he stated yesterday by that solemn declaration, which is untrue—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. LANDRY. The declaration is an untruth.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is better for the hon. gentleman to avoid any personal insinuations.

Mr. LANDRY. Perhaps I did not express myself very well. The hon. member for L'Islet read a declaration to this House, and I say that declaration is an untruth. He read a solemn declaration from a man who is supposed to have assisted at a meeting, and he declares that he assisted only part of the time. He gave his declaration of what I said there. Sir, I pronounced there the same speech that I pronounced here, the same speech as I pronounced on the 22nd November last, blaming the action of the Government for the reasons alleged in my speech delivered in this House at the opening of this debate. This is the only explanation I desire to offer to the House, and I offer it in order that it may be well understood that I have not changed my opinions at all and that I have always followed the same line of conduct, and I will challenge the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) if he is willing, to place my seat against his.

House divided on amendment of Sir Hector Langevin, that the question be now put.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY!

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN presented a Message from His Excellency.

Mr. SPEAKER read the message as follows:—

LANSDOWNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons copies of certain letters of a confidential character respecting the rebellion in the North-West Territories, during the year 1885.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

OTTAWA, 29th March, 1886.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—LEASED LINES.

Mr. GLEN asked, What amounts have to be paid by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company annually, as rent or interest, on the several lines owned or leased by them and covered by the mortgage given by them to the Dominion of Canada? How much of the said amounts are entitled to be paid out of the earnings of the said leased or purchased lines before the surplus earnings can be applied in payment of interest due to the Government?

Mr. POPE. It is quite impossible for me to answer that question, as I have no information from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the subject.

THE NORTH-WEST DISTURBANCE—BATTLE OF BATOCHÉ.

Mr. TROW for Mr. CASEY, asked, Has any report been received by the Government from the officer second in command at Batoché? If so, will the Government lay it before the House, and when? If not, why has the usage of the service, requiring such report, not been observed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No such report has been made, it being an unheard-of proceeding, and contrary to all military usage.

PRICE OF PRE-EMPTIONS IN MANITOBA.

Mr. WATSON asked, Is it the intention of the Government to reduce the price of pre-emptions in Manitoba to one dollar per acre?

Mr. WHITE. It is not the intention of the Government to reduce the price of pre-emptions in Manitoba to one dollar per acre, but the question of pre-emptions is at the moment engaging the attention of the Government.

NAVIGATION OF LAKE MANITOBA.

Mr. WATSON asked, Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the dredging of White Mud River, and in other ways improving the navigation of Lake Manitoba, during the coming season?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is one of those matters which are considered in connection with the Supplementary Estimates; but I am not in a position to tell the hon. gentleman just now whether this work will be done or not.

NAVIGATION OF JEMSEG CREEK, N.B.

Mr. KING asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to improve the navigation of the Jemseg Creek, outlet of Grand Lake, N.B., by dredging this year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am obliged to give the same answer to the hon. gentleman.

RAILWAY LANDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. GORDON asked, Has the Provincial Government of British Columbia, while acting as the agent of this Government, been authorised or instructed to withhold pre-emption records from squatters or settlers on the Vancouver Island Railway Reserve; such lands not being part of a naval reserve, a military reserve, an Indian reserve, or an Indian settlement? If so, under which clause of 47 Victoria, chapter 6, commonly known as the Settlement Act, has such authority or instructions been given? If no such authority has been given, will this Government immediately direct their agent (the Provincial Government) to issue, or cause to be issued, pre-emption records to Samuel Waddington, a squatter on said lands since 1870; also to James Harvey, executor to the late M. H. Jenkins, also a squatter for eight or ten years before his death; also to David Hoggan, a squatter since 1882; also to Thomas E. Peck, a squatter since 1870; also to others in their order of application and occupation who have applied for pre-emption records for land near Nanaimo, said lands not being covered by a naval, military, or Indian reserve or Indian settlement?

Mr. WHITE. The Provincial Government of British Columbia has not been authorised or instructed to withhold pre-emption records from squatters or settlers on the Vancouver Island Railway Reserve. As to the persons mentioned, the question is before the Department of Justice at this moment, whether they have a right to pre-emption records.

Mr. GORDON asked, What is the amount paid to the credit of the Receiver-General up to the 31st of December last, by the Provincial Government, under the provisions of 47 Victoria, chapter 6, section 7, sub-section 1? What amount has been retained by the Provincial Government for expenses (if any) for administering said lands for purposes of settlement? Has any sum or sums of money been retained by them for covering the costs of surveys; if so, what amount? When will the surveys of the unsurveyed portion of said railway belt, now held by pre-emption, or that may up to the 19th day of December, 1887, be required for settlement for agricultural purposes, be commenced by the authority of this Government? When will belts of timber (fit for milling purposes), as provided under section 7, sub-section 4, of the before-recited Act, be defined, and by whom? Has any price been fixed, either by the Dominion Government or by the railway company, for timber or timber lands on the said railway belt; if so, what are the rates and conditions?

Mr. WHITE. No amount has, up to date, been paid to the credit of the Receiver-General by the Government of British Columbia on this account. Mr. E. W. Wilmot, an employee of the Department of the Interior, has been detailed by the Government to commence these surveys, and the Department is at this moment in correspondence with Mr. Trutch, the Agent of the Government in the Province, with a view to pressing the work as rapidly as possible. These timber belts have not been defined up to this date, and by whom they are to be defined is a matter of communication with the Provincial authorities. No price has been fixed by the Dominion Government for timber or timber lands in the Vancouver Island Railway belt.

ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY.

Mr. GORDON asked, Whether any portion of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway has been inspected by an Engineer acting for and on behalf of the Dominion Government? If so, whether any section or sections of said railway have been accepted, and if any, whether the subsidy earned thereby has been paid to the company in accordance with 47 Victoria, chapter 5, section 4? If not, why not?

Mr. POPE. It has been inspected, but no portion has been accepted. No portion of the subsidy has been paid to the company for the reason that by the Act of last Session a certain curvature was provided for, and when the railway was inspected it was found that the curvature was much sharper than the law required. Therefore, nothing could be paid until the Act was amended, for which a Bill is now before the House. When it has passed this House, the money will be paid.

REPRESENTATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA IN THE DOMINION CABINET.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to respect the claims of British Columbia for representation in the Cabinet of the Dominion?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must request my hon. friend to postpone this question until the First Minister is in his seat.

THE DUTY ON RICE.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to increase the duty on rice?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am afraid I cannot give that information. Perhaps the hon. gentleman had better wait until the Minister of Finance states his views on matters of this kind.

IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What number of immigrants are supposed to have settled in Canada during the year 1885?

Mr. CARLING. A similar question was asked a few days ago, and the answer was given, I suppose during the absence of the hon. gentleman. The supposed number is 79,169.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What number of emigrants are supposed to have gone from Canada and settled in the United States in the year 1885?

Mr. CARLING. No records are kept.

POPULATION OF KEEWATIN, MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What was the estimated population of Keewatin, Manitoba and the North-West Territories at the close of the year 1885, and upon what data is the estimate given?

Mr. CARLING. The estimated population of Manitoba was 125,000, arrived at for the purpose of the recent financial arrangements with that Province. No estimate was made by the Government of the population of Keewatin and the North-West Territories; but a census of the population of the North-West Territories has been taken, and the result is before Parliament.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. LISTER) asked, 1. Whether the Government permitted the importation into Canada by the Niagara White Grape Company of Lockport, N.Y., of grape vines known as "The Niagara" at a valuation of 15 cents per vine? And whether the Government is aware that such vines are worth $1.50 each, according to the price list of the company? 2. Whether the Government is aware that the Customs authorities, after the sale by the company of the vines to farmers and others, seized the same for undervaluation? If so, by whose authority were such seizures made? What action has been taken by the Department with reference to such seizures?

Mr. BOWELL. The Government has not permitted the importation of the vines at the price named, but large quantities were alleged to have been fraudulently undervalued and entered at that price; on discovery of which they were seized. The Government is not aware that they are worth $1.50 each; the present actual value has not been established, though it is claimed by seizing officers that they are worth that figure or more. The Government is aware of the seizure for undervaluation. Such seizures have been made by or under authority of the officers who had discovered the under-valuations, and the Department has notified the company of the seizure, and called upon it for evidence in rebuttal of the charge, if such can be given. The delay allowed by the Customs Act within which to furnish evidence not having expired, no further action can at present be taken.

IMPORTATIONS OF FISH.

Mr. KIRK moved for:

Return showing the quantity and value of fish of all kinds imported from the United States and Newfoundland respectively, and the duty paid thereon, during the six months ending December 31st, 1885.

He said: The fishing industry is one of the largest in this country, exceeded only by the farming and lumber industry. The exports of fish during the last year, notwithstanding the low price of that article abroad, amounted to $7,976,332, of which Nova Scotia exported more than one-half, thus showing the importance of this industry to that Province. When the fishing industry is in a depressed condition, the depression is felt by every other industry in the Province. That industry has been in a depressed condition for the last year and is still in the same condition. This is not due to a short catch of fish, but to low prices abroad. The Government undertook, in 1879, to enact a law by which they were to retain the markets of Canada for Canadian products, on the cry raised in 1878 of "Canada for the Canadians." In order to carry out this policy, very high protective duties were imposed on many industries, and our markets in that way were kept exclusively for the products of this country, especially in manufacturing industries. This has not been the case as regards fish. No efforts have been made to retain the markets of this country for fish caught by Canadian fishermen. I do not believe in the policy of protection; I believe it has done a vast amount of injury to this country; I believe it is not the true policy to teach the people to lean upon the Government for support, but the true policy is for the Government to teach the people to lean upon their own enterprise and individual effort. The National Policy has a tendency to cause the people to lean upon the Government for prosperity. In fact, hon. gentlemen opposite have taught the people that if Parliament was good for anything it was good to make the people prosperous by Act of Parliament. We do not hear so much in these days of the cry "Canada for the Canadians," simply because hon. gentlemen opposite have seen the failure of their policy. Last year, when Parliament was in Session, a Bill was introduced for the purpose of imposing a duty on fish imported from the United States and also on fish coming from Newfoundland. I remember that when this resolution was announced by the Finance Minister, hon. gentlemen opposite cheered; but I find that the Government, in deference to the influences brought to bear upon them by merchants from Montreal, suspended that portion of the law which applied to Newfoundland, and Newfoundland fish has been allowed to come in free of duty since the first of July. I maintain that if the National Policy, if protection is good for one industry, it ought to be good for another, and, while this is to be the policy of this country, the fishing industry should have the benefit of it as well as other industries. The people of this country pay millions of dollars annually to protect their manufacturing industries, and the people interested in fishing pay a great deal of that; but, notwithstanding the large amount which is paid to protect the manufacturing industries, the total exports of manufactures amounted to only $3,794,226 last year, while the export of fish amounted to about eight million dollars, which shows of how much greater importance the fishing industry is to the people of this country than the manufacturing industry. Yet the manufacturing industry receives a high protection, and the markets of the country are kept for it, while the fishermen must look where they can find it for a market. This is unfair to the fishing industry, and the Government should not sacrifice the interests of the Maritime Provinces to the merchants of Montreal as they have done in this case; and if we believe the representations from Halifax, they have done the same thing in regard to the sugar interest of that city, which they have sacrificed to the interest of the merchants of Montreal.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to the motion.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think that, in a matter of this importance, we ought to hear from the Treasury benches. It is, I believe, in the position stated by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), at least what I could hear of his remarks were in accordance with the facts, but I do not know that the Government are to blame; I am not here to defend them; but I should like to hear them defend themselves, and I believe they have a good defence. I believe the Government did try to draw a distinction between the fish from Newfoundland and that coming from the lower ports—I think in the way of inspection—I do not think there was any duty; but there was a correspondence, and I will not say a very angry correspondence, in reference to the subject, but I hope some gentleman will move for that correspondence and will get it. There was some correspondence in which the Government of Newfoundland informed the Government of Canada—

Mr. BOWELL. They passed an Act.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that they passed an Act by which they discriminated, or intended to discriminate, against the productions of Canada, against those of this country and other countries which had any restrictions placed upon fishing within their waters. I do not recollect the ipsisima verba of this Act, but it is of such importance that the whole matter should be brought before this House. I saw the other day that the Board of Trade of Montreal either waited upon the Government or communicated with the Government by means of resolutions, in order to ascertain in what position the trade and commerce of Canada stood with reference to the export to Newfoundland. The Government of Newfoundland passed an Act which was to go into operation, I think, on the 1st July, the effect of which was to be such on the trade and commerce of Canada that the Government of Canada had to take back-water, and to allow the disputed points to remain in suspense during that season. The Board of Trade of Montreal asked the Government whether that state of things still continued; and I think it is important to the trade and commerce of this country to find out what are the relations between this Government and the Government of Newfoundland, especially in relation to the importing and the inspecting of their fish coming into Canada; because, if those relations are the same as last year, it amounts simply to an armed neutrality—they have each suspended their laws until something is arrived at, and it is time that some means should be found to set these difficulties at rest, and to allow gentlemen who are engaged in commerce between the two countries to know what the state of the case is between them.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has stated the case very nearly as it exists. Had he not risen as he did, I intended simply to reply to the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) that the statistics he has asked for would be brought down. The state of affairs between Newfoundland and the Dominion remain precisely as they have done since the 1st of July last. The Act passed by the Newfoundland Legislature was of such a character as to destroy comparatively, by its discriminating clauses, the intercourse and trade between Canada and that Province. The Government, after mature deliberation, came to the conclusion that it was better to hold in suspense that portion of the tariff which applied to Newfoundland, until some mutual arrangement could be come to between the Government of Newfoundland and the Government of the Dominion. But, owing to the elections which were going on, and the change of Government, and various other causes in Newfoundland, it was found impossible to have that personal intercourse which was necessary in order to come to some definite conclusion. It is true that the President of the Board of Trade of Montreal waited upon the Government, or upon myself, as representing the Government, in order to ascertain what course we intended to pursue during the present season. I informed him that matters would remain as they are, and that arrangements could be made by them for a continuance of their trade until a better arrangement was arrived at between the Government of Newfoundland and the Government of the Dominion. We are in hopes that we can establish those mutual arrangements which formerly existed between us. The hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) is wrong in imagining that the arrangements made were altogether in the interests of the merchants of Montreal. The shipping trade of that city and of his own Province (Nova Scotia) is very important and should not be lost sight of; and that the exports are also very important to all the fishing interests of Canada, to those of the west as well as to those of the east, and for that reason we believed it to be better to allow the tariff to remain in abeyance until reciprocal arrangements could be established such as existed in the past. I think the House will concur in the policy of the Government, that in all cases where you can open trade relations either with a colony of Her Majesty or with a foreign State, where you can receive equal privileges, by being allowed to send to their markets either the products of the soil or the products of the manufactory, it is to our advantage to obtain those markets, and that if we can do so by securing privileges equal to those given by us, it is our duty to obtain them in every part of the world.

Mr. MILLS. That is protection.

Mr. BOWELL. That is protection.

Motion agreed to.

THE MATTER OF ROBERT STATHER.

Mr. WELDON moved for:

Copy of the papers used before the Supreme Court of New Brunswick in the matter of Robert Stather, a prisoner confined in the Dorchester Penitentiary, on an application for his discharge, and the judgments of the judges given in the matter on the 5th of March instant.

He said: This is a matter of some importance to the judiciary of this country, and more particularly to that of the Province of New Brunswick, who have been reflected upon, and the due administration of justice has been interfered with. The prisoner in this case was indicted in the Court of Oyer and Terminer in Halifax, Nova Scotia, for falsifying entries. The indictment was framed at common law, and also upon the Statute of 1878. The party was tried at the March sitting in 1884, and subsequently sentenced to the penitentiary in Dorchester for a term of four years. The certificate under which he was imprisoned reads as follows:—

“SUPREME COURT, 1884.

“Province of Nova Scotia, Halifax, S. S.

“To the Warden or Governor of the Penitentiary at Dorchester, in the Province of New Brunswick.

“Whereas Robert Stather, of Halifax, was, during the March sittings of the Supreme Court, indicted for making fraudulent entries and fraudulent returns, and was found guilty upon said indictment, and thereupon sentenced by the Court to be imprisoned at hard labor in the penitentiary at Dorchester for the space of four years.

“Now, therefore, these are to require and command you to receive the said Robert Stather into your custody and him to detain in the said penitentiary for the said period of four years, in conformity with the terms of his said sentence, and for which this shall be your sufficient warrant.

“(L.S.) Dated at Halifax, this fourteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four.

“Clerk of the Court.”

Upon that warrant he was conveyed to the penitentiary in Dorchester. I may state that the Act of 1878 is confined entirely to persons in the employ of the Government, and if they make false entries and returns they are liable to a punishment of $500 fine or twelve months imprisonment. Whether that is a crime at common law or not is a matter which it is not necessary for me to discuss now, although I have a strong opinion on that subject. The prisoner remained in the Dorchester Penitentiary, which is within the bounds of New Brunswick, and sometime during the past winter application was made to a judge of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, for a writ of habeas corpus, or, rather, under the Statute of New Brunswick, an order in the nature of a writ of habeas corpus. Now, I say that the judge had a right to issue that writ, and it has always been the duty of a judge to do so, more particularly under the Statute of Charles II. This, we believe, applies to every part of the British Empire, and under it any man who is restrained of his liberty shall have a right to appeal to a court that his case may be enquired into. Under that Statute a severe penalty is imposed upon a judge who refuses to issue a writ. Mr. Justice Wetmore, in accordance with his duty, issued that writ, and the return was made. His Honor then, feeling the importance of the question, referred this matter to the full Supreme Court of New Brunswick. It was argued in that court on the 3rd of February last, by counsel on behalf of the party, and an agent of the Minister of Justice also appeared and undertook to sustain the return of the warden of the penitentiary. Now, Mr. Speaker, reflections have been made upon the course adopted by the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, as if they had constituted themselves a court of appeals from the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. That I deny. I say no intention of that nature was expressed by the court, nor was it for the purpose of criticising the decision of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, but it considered the sentence—not the decision of the full bench of Nova Scotia, as I understand it, but simply the decision of the judge at the Court of Oyer and Terminer. The question simply was whether on the return produced by the warden of the penitentiary a proper cause of detention had been made out by the Penitentiary Act:

"Sheriff or deputy sheriff may convey to the penitentiary named in the sentence any convict sentenced or liable to be imprisoned therein, and shall deliver him to the warden thereof without any further warrant than a copy of the sentence taken from the minutes of the court before which the convict has been tried, and certified by a judge or by the clerk or acting clerk of such court."

"40. Warden to receive into the penitentiary every convict legally certified to him as sentenced to imprisonment therein, and shall there detain until the term be completed, or until he is otherwise discharged in due course of law."

Now there is another point which I wish to mention. When a convict is removed from one penitentiary to another under a warrant of the Secretary of State, the warden of the penitentiary in which the party is confined shall, upon the production of the warrant, hand over the convict to the officer producing the warrant, and a copy of the original conviction and sentence must also be handed to him, showing that it was the object of the law that whether a party be confined in a penitentiary or elsewhere, there should be a warrant and properly certified documents by which the warden of the penitentiary, as well as any other person, shall show why and wherefore the prisoner named is restrained of his liberty. Such was the position of this case. The question before the Supreme Court of New Brunswick was, whether there was sufficient justification in the return of the warden of the penitentiary to detain him. But, Mr. Speaker, they have been attacked; and I feel it my duty to say, in justice to the judges of the Supreme Court, before whom I have had the honor to practice for a number of years, that they do not repudiate any action of theirs but they simply did what they believed to be their duty—not, as I said before, for the purpose of criticising the action of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. In the Halifax Herald I find that serious charges are made against the New Brunswick courts, which I say are unfounded. You will find when you come to the decision of the court that the judges expressly declared that they had no intention of interfering with the judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. I find in the Halifax Herald of March 3rd, the following:—

"The Supreme Court of New Brunswick, that by law has no pre-eminence or authority whatever over Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, was attempting to do what was equivalent to reversing the sentence of the latter. It is apparent the Minister of Justice is not prepared to concede this. Indeed, we judge that it is his intention to resist it, but until legislation is passed it might be difficult to curb the ambitious assumptions of Chief Justice Allan and his associates of the New Brunswick bench. It is probable, to obviate this difficulty, that the Minister of Justice has done what he has, intending, doubtless, to guard against future attempts of the same kind by explicit enactment at the present Session of Parliament."

Now, Sir, the Chief Justice who has presided over that court for twenty years, is a gentleman whose character, and position as a lawyer and as a man, stand equal to those of any judge in the Dominion of Canada. And so I say with regard to the other judges who were associated with him in this case. After they had discussed this matter brought before them, they took time to consider, and on the 5th of March a majority of the judges, four out of six, decided that the return was not sufficient, and ordered the discharge of the prisoner. Those judges were Chief Justice Allan, Justice Wetmore, Justice Fraser and Justice Palmer, Justice King being of a contrary opinion, and Justice Tuck holding that it was not within the jurisdiction of the court. This occurred while the matter was before the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, a court which alone had jurisdiction with respect to it, because there is no other court in the Dominion, save and except the Supreme Court of Canada, which has the right to issue such a writ within the Province of New Brunswick. It is the bounden duty of every judge of that court, when applied to by any person in the territory of New Brunswick, whose liberty is restrained, to have the question investigated as to whether he was rightfully detained or not, or whether the writ on which he was detained had a sufficient warranty of law to deprive him of liberty and detain him in custody. What do we find? We find that while this matter was being fairly discussed by the judges of that court the Government adopted a certain course. On the 19th February an order was made by which this prisoner was removed from the Dorchester Penitentiary to the Kingston Penitentiary, and about 24th February the party was removed from New Brunswick, out of the jurisdiction of the Province, into the Province of Ontario, and beyond the jurisdiction and control of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick. Had it been taken under the old writ of habeas corpus, issued under the Statute of Charles, under which it was provided that for the safety of the person whose liberty was restrained the court should require not only that the writ should be returned, but that the party should bring the person into court, so as to place him under the control of the judges trying the case, that this would not have happened which did happen before the days of Charles II, for in the reign of Charles I—and it is the only instance I can find—when a writ of habeas corpus was issued respecting Sir John Elliott, the King had him removed from custody; and I repeat that that is the only instance in history where a party has been so removed when the case was pending before the court. So, when the decision of the New Brunswick Court was given on 5th March, we find that, by the power given by the Secretary of State's warrant, the party was removed. The section under which he was removed is section 4 of the Penitentiaries Act, which provides that the Government, on the warrant of the Secretary of State, may direct the removal of a convict from one penitentiary to another; and the warden shall deliver him into the custody of the officer producing the warrant, with a copy of the date of conviction. The convict was thus removed while the matter was pending before the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, while it was before the only tribunal which had a right to decide it, the only court in which a writ of habeas corpus could issue to persons confined in New Brunswick, as, I believe, some difficulty has arisen as to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada in regard to issuing writs of habeas corpus. Whether that power is vested in the Supreme Court of Canada, it is certain that the Supreme Court of New Brunswick possessed the right. In the United States the State Courts have no doubt as to their power in this regard, although there was some conflict of opinion as to their power, and they have exercised that power when the question as to the jurisdiction of the Federal Courts has been raised. So our Supreme Court of New Brunswick had claimed that under the law as it stood they had the right to which I have referred. I contend that the court did not exceed its jurisdiction and it was a just exercise of its power when they issued the writ on the application of the individual in question, no matter who he was or what he was. I have nothing to do with the merits of the case; but this is a case of importance with respect to the liberty of the subject. The Statute under which the party was tried provided a penalty of £500 and imprisonment for twelve months, under which the prisoner could not be sent to penitentiary at Dorchester, because it is provided by the Act that no one shall be admitted there for less than two years; if so, this party had no right to be there. Whether he was guilty of the crime or not and whether the imprisonment was warranted, no interference should have been made with the court. As to the question whether by common law it is a crime to make false entries in official books, it is not necessary to discuss. It is a question which may be of considerable importance in the investigation before the judges, but the question is simply as to whether it was right or wrong to interfere with the person when before the recognised tribunal of the country, the only tribunal which had a right to issue the writ, and because under the wording of the provisions of the New Brunswick Act it was not necessary to produce the party with the return of the writ. Had the old practice been followed, the individual would have been in the custody of the court, and not in that of the officer in charge. I felt it my duty to bring this matter forward, not only in regard to what I consider was an undue reflection made on the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, which has not the slightest justification, but also because I consider this is a matter of some importance, because there is no greater safeguard for the liberties of the people than that by which every man has a right to be brought before a tribunal and have his case thoroughly investigated by the court, to ascertain, not only that there is justification for his retention, but that he is detained on the proper documents prescribed by law.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). There can be no objection whatever to the papers which my hon. friend desires to have laid on the Table being brought down as soon as possible. In fact, when the hon. gentleman put the notice on the paper I caused application to be made for copies of the judgments of the Supreme Court of his Province, which form a very important part of the set of documents which the hon. gentleman requires. I not only acquiesce, therefore, in the motion which the hon. gentleman has made, but I feel somewhat grateful to him for having spoken to it, inasmuch as he seems up to this moment to have labored under an entirely erroneous impression as to what was really involved in the action of the Department of Justice. If the hon. gentleman has supposed—as I have no doubt he has—that any reflection whatever upon the judiciary of his Province was involved in the action which was taken with regard to this convict, I am glad he has brought the matter to the notice of the House, because I shall not only be able to explain to the satisfaction of the House that such is not the case, but I think I shall be able to remove any such impression from his mind. In the first place, he has discussed two or three matters which, of course, he thought were involved in these proceedings, but which are not involved in them to the slightest extent. My hon. friend has discussed this matter as if the question of conflict between two jurisdictions, that of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick and that of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, was involved. He discussed it from that point of view, and he presented to the House an argument of this kind—that even if such conflict were involved, it would not be improper to sustain the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, because it was only reviewing the decision of a single judge in the Province of Nova Scotia sitting at Oyer and Terminer and not exercising the full powers of the court. I beg to say as regards that point, that, although it is not involved in this case at all, a judge holding a criminal court in the Province of Nova Scotia, expressly and by Statute, exercises the powers of the full court, and his ruling, his sentence, his judgment and sentence, are as much the rulings and judgments of the court, as if all the seven judges were present. However, there was not the slightest intention in this case of testing the question of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, in adjudicating on an application made to it by a prisoner in a penitentiary within the limits of that Province, although at some day it may become a serious question how far the jurisdiction may extend of a court of one Province to release those persons committed to the penitentiary in that Province by the supreme tribunals of other Provinces. In this case, however, by the judgment of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, it was decided that the court had no such jurisdiction, and the court expressly declined, according to the reports which I have read of the judgments delivered by the several judges, to affirm the principle that they had any right to look into or review the proceedings before the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. Then, as to what those proceedings were, my hon. friend was slightly in error. The common law offence was not as he stated it for irregular or fraudulent entries, but it is what is technically known as fraud and breach of trust in office, and involved something more than the mere making of fraudulent entries or returns. However, that is not material. It is true, as my hon. friend says, that at a subsequent stage the regularity of the sentence, trial, &c., was attacked on the ground that the sentence was excessive, and should only have been the sentence involved in the statutory offence. I beg, however, to call attention to the fact that the Supreme Court of New Brunswick practically decided that the proceedings at the trial, the sentence, and everything else, were perfectly regular and not excessive; and that, therefore, as regards all the proceedings which took place before the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, everything was either perfectly correct or unassailable, or, if they were supposed to be otherwise, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick did not extend so far as to warrant that court in enquiring into the proceedings which took place before the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. I make the explanation especially because some who have bestowed some pains on the matter have published statements that the removal of the convict was made in order to cover up some defect connected with the trial, conviction and sentence of the prisoner. I, therefore, repeat that those proceedings, as far as they were reviewed by the Supreme Court of the Province of New Brunswick, were pronounced by several of the judges to be correct and regular, and by others it was decided that the Supreme Court of New Brunswick could not make any review of them, even if they were irregular. The hon. gentleman has intimated that in some of the journals which have taken up this question in the Lower Provinces, reflections were made on the right of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick to enquire at all into the imprisonment at any stage. However that may be, I do not intend to enter upon any controversy in which I would at all dispute their right to review what took place with regard to any convict within their territorial jurisdiction, and I do not propose to enter upon that matter for the reason I have already stated—that it is not properly involved in this question. My hon. friend need not have been very sensitive about the remarks which he considers were reflections made against the judiciary of his Province, or have been at any trouble to cite precedents from the reign of King Charles, because if he had been prepared to go a little more deeply into the subject he would have found that the reflections from the other side of the press were still more vigorous, and he would have found far more recent precedents were cited with regard to the infringement of the liberty of the subject than any from the reign of King Charles. I have been compared to a number of the Czars and to other very objectionable monarchs of later times; and I think, if the hon. gentleman will correct his brief and will cite some precedents from the administration of criminal justice in Russia, he will find that his brief will contain far more vigorous precedents than those which he has cited, and better gratify the tastes of those who have so warmly criticised my conduct. The real point involved is this: That after this person had been tried, convicted and sentenced, it became the duty of the clerk of the court in Halifax to send with the constable who took the prisoner to Dorchester Penitentiary a copy of the sentence. It transpired that the clerk of that court did not send what could strictly be considered a copy of the sentence. When the counsel for this convict made his application, under the Act relating to the liberty of the subject, to the court of New Brunswick, a report was made on his case by the counsel who looked into the matter, and it was then discovered that, perhaps owing to the unskilfulness of the particular officer who had, from time to time, sent the copies of the sentences of the prisoners, it was customary to send what was perhaps a statement of the sentence in a very rough way, but not at all a copy of the sentence—stated in such a way that it would appear from the face of the documents that the offence for which he was sent to the penitentiary was an indictable offence at all. In this particular instance instead of the return of commitment being a copy of the sentence, it stated merely that it was a sentence for fraud, or something of that kind. So the only objection which was taken and decided upon in New Brunswick, and in respect of which the New Brunswick Court proposed to entertain any powers of review at all, was the document from the clerk of the court at Halifax, after the sentence, in transmitting the prisoner to the penitentiary. If we had acquiesced in the principle which the hon. gentleman seems to lay down, the moment these irregularities were discovered, all the convicts from Halifax should have been set at large, but that, I think, would have been a very blameable proceeding. What I did was to take proceedings to have proper warrants of commitment lodged with the warden at Dorchester, in order that proper copies of sentences might be recorded against those prisoners. It was doubtful, considering the stage of these proceedings, whether the documents could be sent so as to reach Dorchester in time to prevent Stather's liberation, and in time to present the new warrant to the court. In order to obtain time to remedy this purely clerical error of the office, it was deemed necessary, and I took the responsibility, to remove him from Dorchester to another penitentiary. My hon. friend will see, therefore, that the only irregularity involved was the irregularity in connection with the warrant of commitment, and not, as I presume he inadvertently stated, of the certificate under which he was sentenced. My hon. friend knows that when a conviction is wrong or a warrant is defective, it is the daily practice, under a writ of certiorari or habeas corpus or other such writ, to substitute a correct conviction or warrant as the case may be; and that is precisely what was done in this case and in the case of other prisoners in the Dorchester Penitentiary in which the warrants were found defective. There was not necessarily involved, although it was raised in the press, any question as to the jurisdiction of the two courts, nor as to the regularity of anything connected with the proceedings; and I can assure my hon. friend at once, for the purpose of removing from his mind any suspicion that there was any disposition to interfere with or reflect on the judiciary of his Province, that, whether this prisoner or any other happens to be at any time within the territorial jurisdiction of the court or not, if the judgment of a competent tribunal pronounces that he has been improperly convicted, or that any defect exists with regard to his case, which cannot and should not be corrected, after review on appeal, if an appeal be open to us, would not make me hesitate for a moment as to the propriety of giving him his discharge. But if the error was, as I still believe it was, a purely clerical one, which we had a right to correct by the substitution of a warrant correct in point of form, then I think we were bound to take all proper steps, not to interfere with the administration of criminal justice, but to forward criminal justice by preventing the escape of the convict.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I must say that the statement made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon) is a startling statement, and I am bound to say that the justification of the Minister of Justice is still more startling. I did not understand my hon. friend to complain that it was stated in the public press or elsewhere that there was a conflict of opinion between the judges of Nova Scotia and the judges of New Brunswick. That was a matter of really no consequence, and did not form an important element in the statement of my hon. friend. I understand my hon. friend to complain that a British subject was indicted in one of the Courts of Oyer and Terminer in the Province of Nova Scotia for an indictable offence, and that he was convicted and sentenced by the court that tried him; and it is said the sentence of the court was improper, because it was in excess of the powers conferred upon it by Statute. After he was sentenced and transferred to a penitentiary in an adjacent Province, his lawyer discovered that the sentence was in excess of the powers of the court, and that the warrant of commitment was illegal, and the latter point was so decided by the court.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I may inform my hon. friend that such was not discovered, and such was not decided by the Supreme Court of New Brunswick.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I understand that the counsel for the prisoner discovered that the warrant under which this prisoner was held in duration in the penitentiary of New Brunswick was a void warrant, and he made the application that every British subject has a right to make. He applied to the Court within whose jurisdiction the prisoner was confined—not to a single judge, but to the full court of the Province of New Brunswick. The case was argued by the counsel for the prisoner, and I suppose counsel represented the Crown; and the full court gave a judgment in favor of the prisoner, holding, as I understand, that the warrant under which he was committed to the penitentiary of New Brunswick did not justify his retention in that prison, the warrant being wholly illegal. The Minister of Justice, he himself admits, took steps to remove that prisoner from the jurisdiction of the court within whose power he then was and which had given the judgment. Now, what was the object of removing the prisoner? The hon. gentleman openly and candidly tells us the object was actually to defeat the judgment of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick. It does appear to me most extraordinary that for the purpose of defeating the judgment of a court, a British subject who is a prisoner should be removed surreptitiously and secretly beyond the jurisdiction of that court and sent to the penitentiary of another Province. The hon. gentleman says it is a technical objection. It is of no consequence whether it is technical or not. In my opinion it is not technical; it is an objection of substance. What was the man there for? He must have been there under some process, and if the process was illegal, if it was not justified by the practice of the courts, he should not have been kept there, and the court of New Brunswick so decided. To evade that, and to get this man beyond the judgment of the court, the Minister of Justice chose to remove him to Kingston Penitentiary. I say it is an unheard-of thing. I think I can challenge the Minister of Justice to point to another instance, in the history of this or any other country in the past 50 years, of such a thing having been done. It is true that in cases of conviction where a man's property may be imperilled, the convicting justice has, under the Statute, the right to send in an amended conviction; but will the hon. gentleman point out a case where a man entitled to a discharge from the penitentiary has a new warrant or commitment made out against him, and he is thereunder retained in the penitentiary at the instance of the Minister, who, above all others, ought to protect the liberty of the subject. It is an extraordinary thing. I shall wait until the papers are brought down, and until we are able to discuss the case upon proper principles, and with all the information before us, before I further express my opinion as to the course the Government has seen fit to pursue in this case. Upon the Minister's own statement, it is a proceeding wholly unjustifiable and unwarranted.

Mr. TUPPER. I have been somewhat amused on previous occasions to notice that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Cameron, Huron) assumed a similar appearance of indignation under a certain misapprehension of the facts, and then, when corrected, would not alter in the slightest the indignation under which he appeared to labor. He has risen again under another misapprehension of the facts of a case which he has never studied, to which he has given no attention, judging from the remarks he has made. Yet he rises under the supposition that an erroneous and illegal sentence has been passed on a man, and that the Minister of Justice had undertaken wantonly and in a high-handed manner to rectify the defects due to the judge—

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I did not say so.

Mr. TUPPER. And expresses his indignation. The hon. gentleman was corrected on that point, the strongest ground upon which he could have addressed the House in the manner he did, and having been corrected, instead of sitting down and showing his good sense and judgment, he went on to say it made no difference whether the objection was a technical one or whether the defect was technical or not. I was not surprised at this because I have noticed that, unfortunately, the hon. gentleman is in the habit of allowing his better judgment to be carried away even upon legal questions, when started on his side of the House. There is a curious spectacle afforded by the Opposition on this point taken in connection with their action on a matter previously under discussion. We have here, on the opposite side of the House, the champions of felons and convicts. There is not, it seems, to be a case in which a man is sentenced to death or penitentiary, on whose sentence this House is not to be constituted at once a court of appeal. Now hon. gentlemen come forward to champion the case of this convict on a point somewhat similar to the omission of dotting an "i" or crossing a "t," and seek to invoke the sympathy of this House for their protégé, under the guise of being defenders of the "liberty of the subject." That expression covers a great deal, but I think there never was a weaker case than this where it could be called into service. The hon. gentleman must be very ignorant—for I will not say it was intentional—of the manner in which this matter has been dealt with by the Supreme Court of New Brunswick. Had the hon. gentleman who followed the mover of the resolution listened to the remarks of the latter he would have known that this very mistake, this clerical omission on the part of the clerk at Halifax in the drawing out of the warrant of committal or certificate, was discussed at great length in the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, and that court did not come to an unanimous judgment on the point raised. This is where my hon. friend fell into error; had he known the circumstances he would not have given vent to the excitement he exhibited. Any hon. gentleman who understands the case will see, as a lawyer, that if it was illegal for the Minister of Justice to take the course he did, it cannot be denied that, if that man had been illegally dealt with or illegally transferred from Dorchester, he is not beyond the reach of the law. The court of New Brunswick is not the only legal tribunal where redress can be had, and the liberty of the subject vindicated. Kingston, Ont., is, I suppose, as safe a place as Dorchester, N.B., for any of Her Majesty's subjects to reside in; and I think my hon. friend will find there are tribunals out of New Brunswick which will take care, if necessary, of his friend the convict who has been sent from Dorchester to Kingston. When hon. gentlemen opposite do take up the cases of convicts, they ought, at least, to be gallant. In this case, the convict happens to be a male, and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) must be aware that last year, no less than seven female prisoners were transferred from Dorchester to Kingston. If he will enquire into their cases, I have no doubt he will find some "i's" not dotted or "t's" not crossed in the certificates or warrants; and if their cases were brought up here, the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) could show that gross outrages were perpetrated on the "liberty of the subject." This House to which the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) has appealed, will do well to reserve judgment until the papers are brought down.

Mr. MILLS. The position taken by the hon. gentleman is an extraordinary one. He said this House is erecting itself into a court of review, into, in fact, the ultimate court of appeal, for the purpose of considering judgments passed in the various courts. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The question raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Weldon) and discussed by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) is not the action of a court, not the propriety of the decision of a court, either in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, but the propriety of the action of the Minister of Justice acting as such. What did he do in this matter? He interfered with the prisoner who had sued out a writ of habeas corpus, and whose case was before the court. The hon. gentleman knows that if the court of New Brunswick had acted on this, the prisoner would have been in the custody of the court, and the Minister of Justice would not have had the power to do what he did. What did the Minister of Justice do in anticipation of the action of the court? He took the prisoner out of the jurisdiction of the court; he put him where he could not avail himself of its jurisdiction. What the Minister of Justice has done in that case he might do in the case of any other prisoner. This prisoner may not be guilty. The question is whether, on the decision of that court, he would be entitled to be discharged. The Minister of Justice says he would; but says: I will frustrate the decision of the court; I will see that it is inoperative by putting the prisoner in another penitentiary where the decision cannot have any effect. Suppose the case had happened in British Columbia, how would the prisoner there have been kept in custody by this action on the part of the Minister? Suppose we had but one penitentiary, how would the Minister have been able to avail himself of the power which he finds in the Statute, of removing the prisoner from the jurisdiction of the court where he was tried and placing him in another penitentiary. No doubt this power was not given to the Minister of Justice for any such purpose; no doubt it was not given for the purpose of frustrating the decision of a court or for rendering it inoperative. But that is precisely what the Minister of Justice has done. Instead of using his position to uphold and maintain the authority of the courts, he has used it for the purpose of rendering that authority nugatory. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), talked about hon. gentlemen on this side coming to the rescue of felons; we are not coming to the rescue of any felon, but we are seeking to uphold the authority of the courts, and to see that the Government, which ought to use its power for the purpose of maintaining the authority of the courts, should not use it for the purpose of frustrating the decisions and determinations of the courts. This prisoner may or may not be a meritorious person; he may be escaping on a mere technicality; he may be richly deserving of a greater punishment than the decision of the court would have carried into effect. That is altogether beside the question. What the hon. gentleman has done to-day, in the case of a prisoner who he says is guilty, and who was about to escape in consequence of a mistake on the part of an officer of the court in the Province of Nova Scotia, may be done to-morrow to anyone else. My hon. friend has referred to the case of Sir John Eliot. In that case the power of the Executive was used for the purpose of impairing the administration of justice, and in order to deprive an innocent man of his liberty. The power entrusted to the hon. gentleman is not to be used for the purpose of frustrating the ends of justice, but if it is used in this case to-day it may be used against an innocent man to-morrow. Supposing that this man had been wrongly accused, that he was not the party who had committed the offence; supposing that had been established before the court of New Brunswick, the hon. Minister of Justice would have had the same power to order his transportation from one penitentiary to another as he has exercised. It is clear, then, that he has not used this power in accordance with the purpose for which it was conferred upon the Department of Justice, but for another purpose, and one which must lead to its exercise in other cases in which it should not be allowed.

Mr. WELDON. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice put forward certainly a different statement as to what constituted the judgment of the court from that which I have generally understood, but I do not think that is the question now before us. I quite agree with the Minister of Justice that that question is not now to be decided, but I think the question is whether the Government has the right to interfere with the jurisdiction of a court. While the hon. Minister of Justice rejects the case which I cited from Charles I, he says that the only case which applies is one in which he was compared with the Czar of Russia. I am glad that he admits that nothing can be found in the history of England of a similar character, and that he has to go to despotic Russia to find a parallel. I am glad that, notwithstanding the unsettled state of the country from Charles down, we have never in England found this writ refused by the Government.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). It is an every-day practice, as the hon. gentleman knows.

Mr. WELDON. I wish my hon. friend would point out where this writ has been refused. It certainly was not in the case of the Canadian prisoners, those men whom Lord Durham pardoned. In their case neither the Court of Queen's Bench nor the Court of Exchequer refused the writ of habeas corpus. They did not refuse even to send it across the Atlantic, because they had the right to issue it. The writ of habeas corpus is the right of every British subject, and the hon. Minister of Justice knows that under the Statute of Charles not only the writs but the party himself had to be produced, and it would be a contempt of court for anyone to take him out of the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. MILLS.

Under the statute of New Brunswick that was not necessary. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Tupper) speaks of this as if it was an omission to dot an "i" or a mere clerical error. It was not. It was a serious defect in the warrant. We know that the period when the sentence commenced to run was the date upon which the man was convicted. Mr. Justice Palmer said, in reference to this matter:

"The prisoner was indicted for making fraudulent entries and fraudulent returns, and was found guilty and therefore sentenced. This is equivalent to saying that he was sentenced to imprisonment for four years for making fraudulent entries and fraudulent returns. If this is all he was convicted of, it is apparent that he is convicted of no crime at all, unless it can be shown that the making of fraudulent entries and returns is made a crime either at common law or by some statute. The mere doing this was no crime at common law, for it is not a crime to make an entry in one's own books even if fraud was intended, so long as no cheating or fraud was committed, and it is difficult to know what fraudulent returns the prisoner made without a more definite description than is contained in the certificate; and, if the offence of which the prisoner was intended to be convicted was for making false entries as a public officer, under 41 Victoria, chapter 7, the certificate does not say so, nor does it state that the prisoner was acting in an office or employment connected with the collection or management of the revenue, nor does it show that the fraudulent entries were made in any book, or that the entries were made in any case in which by law or regulation he was required to make any entry, nor that the returns or the entries were false, without all of which he committed no offence under 41 Victoria, chapter 7, section 67, sub-section 4, and even if he had, and had been sentenced for such offence, the punishment could only have been one year, and not four, and, therefore, was not warranted by law."

So you see, Mr. Speaker, that is a substantial defect in the warrant. My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, has referred to convictions being amended, but those are not convictions under the Statute, as has been stated by my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron).

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I was not referring to an amendment of the conviction in such a case, but to an amendment of an improper, invalid and illegal conviction, and I pointed out that it is the every-day practice to call upon the officers to return a proper instead of irregular conviction.

Mr. WELDON. I have referred to a case in Upper Canada where the court, on a writ of error, sent the conviction back to the court below to return a proper sentence. I admit that the conviction may be amended, but I do not think the Minister of Justice can find a case in which the warrant has been amended, and that is what has been done. Even if it were done, it could only be done by the tribunal which has cognisance of the case. I claim that we have nothing to do with the merits of the case. This man may have rightly deserved his punishment, but this is an infringement on the rights of the courts, and it is our incumbent duty, as the Legislature of the Dominion of Canada, to see that the administration of justice is pure and is preserved from the action of the Government.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think it is a pity that this matter should be discussed before the papers are brought down. I think that, on both sides of the House, there is an admitted ignorance, except in the case of the Minister of Justice, as to the facts, and in such a case I think the matter, which may or may not be important, should not be discussed. As I understand the statement which has been made, it is that a man who was properly and righteously convicted was sent to the penitentiary on an informal warrant. That the justice of the sentence and the righteousness of the condemnation are not at all in dispute or in doubt, but through some informality in the warrant, by the misprision of the clerk, it was sent to the warden of the penitentiary, and thereupon a document was made for the discharge of the prisoner, merely on this informality. Now, if I understand the argument of the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House, it must be an awful state of things if there is any means whatever by which this man can be detained in custody until a proper warrant is lodged by which he will be detained so as to undergo the punishment that has been pronounced against him. Now, I wholly differ from the line laid down by my hon. friend. The very case he refers to, that of the Canadian prisoners, is a case directly in point. It would be the duty of the court, I take it, if satisfied the conviction was good on the mere technical defect existing in the warrant, which enabled the party to be discharged, to suspend their judgment until a proper warrant should be lodged, and that was what was done in case of the Canadian prisoners.

Mr. WELDON. The Supreme Court of New Brunswick was not asked to do it.

Mr. McCARTHY. We are really groping in the dark in talking of that matter without the papers being before us. But I say it would have been the duty of the court to withhold their judgment so that the convict should not be set at large simply upon a mere technical error. The case of the Canadian prisoners is precisely in point. There undoubtedly, upon the warrant upon which the prisoners were held at the time of their arrest, or rather the document upon which the habeas corpus was sued out, they were not properly in custody. But did any of the courts discharge them? Did they act, as my hon. friend thinks they ought to have done in this case? No, they withheld judgment until a proper warrant was lodged. In a case recently before the courts of Ontario this very matter came up with regard to the discharge of a prisoner, and that was the course which the court followed. I think it is unfortunate that this question—although I admit the propriety of the hon. gentleman's course—should be discussed in the absence of that information upon which it must necessarily turn; because, if it were merely an informality, I think we will all agree that the course pursued by the Minister of Justice was right, to have the prisoner detained until a proper warrant can be lodged; and as my hon. friend from Picton (Mr. Tupper) pointed out to the House, the prisoner cannot be detained unless a proper warrant is lodged, and he can apply for a habeas corpus here just as the prisoner could have applied for it there; and if there is no proper order for the detention of the prisoner, no doubt the discharge can be obtained. True, the question is, whether this man was properly convicted or not, not whether the warrant was technically right or wrong, but was he properly convicted, and if so, he ought certainly to undergo his punishment.

Motion agreed to.

LAWS RELATING TO COPYRIGHT.

Mr. EDGAR moved :

That a Select Committee be appointed to take into consideration the condition of the laws relating to copyright in force in Canada, and to consider whether legislation or other action is desirable on that subject, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report by Bill, or otherwise; the said Committee to be composed of Messrs. Colby, Davies, Desjardins, Hall, Cameron (Middlesex), Macmillan (Middlesex), Casgrain, Tassé, and the mover.

He said : I may mention that before placing the names of those hon. members on the Committee I obtained their assent to serve on such a Committee if it were appointed by the House. I propose to give briefly some of the reasons why I have brought this motion forward and why the House should without hesitation grant the Committee. It will be remembered that last Session I had the honor to bring the matter before the House in a different shape. In order that hon. members may see the position the question occupies to-day I will read the motion I then moved. It is as follows :—

"1. That the present position of the copyright law in Canada is anomalous and unfair to the public, to the printing and publishing trades and to the authors of this country.

"2. That without further legislation in the Imperial Parliament the Parliament of Canada is powerless to make laws to deal with the whole question of copyright in Canada, because it has been authoritatively decided that any person who obtains a British copyright possesses the sole and exclusive right of reprinting the work in Canada, and that no legislation of the Dominion can effect such right.

"3. That in order to place Canadian publishers upon the same footing as American publishers, in regard to the reprinting of British copyright works, a Bill was unanimously passed by the Dominion Parliament, in the Session of 1872, and reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure thereon.

"4. That Her Majesty's assent was not given to the said Bill, and by the correspondence on the subject which was laid before the House the reason for the refusal was alleged to be that the provisions of the Canadian Bill were in conflict with Imperial legislation.

"5. That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to invite Her Imperial Parliament to except Canada from the operation of the Statute of the United Kingdom, respecting copyright, so far as is necessary to give the Parliament of Canada a clear authority to legislate upon all matters respecting copyright in Canada."

That proposition was discussed by the House, and the First Minister moved the adjournment of the debate, and at that stage of the Session the adjourned debate was never reached. I sincerely hope there will be no adjournment of this debate moved to-day, but that we will have an opportunity of thoroughly discussing the matter and ascertaining how the House feels upon it. The question is one undoubtedly of very great importance, and is just as certain that most of the members of this House are not very familiar with it; and if there is one subject that can come before the House upon which information is required by hon. members, such information as could be given by witnesses called before a committee, it is this question of copyright. Although I have not changed my individual opinion as to the only effective way of dealing with this question, and I still think that a request to the Imperial Parliament is necessary and we should ask them to enlarge the powers of Canada to legislate upon this subject, still other members may have different views, and for this reason I should be very glad to see the whole question dealt with by a committee of the House, and let them try to arrive at some conclusion on the subject and report to the House, so that the House, and the Government, I hope, too, will be able to decide what would be the best action to take in the matter. For the reason that I happened to take some little interest in the question of last Session, I have since then had a great many reasons to know the large interest taken in this question by very material interests in this country. The publishers are deeply interested in it, and they feel they are placed at a very great disadvantage by the present state of the law. I have been told also by paper makers that they are very anxious to see it changed, so that Canadian publishers will have an opportunity of publishing tons of books now published in the United States; and the paper makers will, of course, supply the Canadian publishers with the paper required. The trades and labor council of Ontario felt, in the interests of the printers, bookbinders and mechanics generally who are engaged in those trades, that the subject is so important that they have memorialised the Government on the question since last Session, and I know from communications with them that they are very anxious to have something done in the matter. The reading public of Canada are also largely interested in obtaining the advantage of Canadian competition with Americans, who alone can reprint British copyrighted books for Canada now. So I think that in order to satisfy all these interests and to inform the House on this very important and somewhat abstruse question, the only course open is to appoint a committee to consider the matter. Last Session I pointed out a good many of the practical grievances in detail which are suffered under the law as it at present stands; but now I shall only refer to one or two of them. Let us take the case of a British author who obtains a British copyright. His copyright, when taken out in London, covers Canada, of course; whether he prints or publishes in Canada or not, he has the copyright covering Canada, and thus prevents any Canadian from printing or publishing his books here. Now foreign reprints of British copyrighted books are allowed, under certain circumstances, to be imported and sold in Canada. That was under the operation of the British Act of 1847, and an Order in Council passed by Canada under that Act. That Act provided that where any colony chose to make provision that the British author should receive a royalty or author's tax upon the reprints of his copyrighted books that might be brought into the colony, then the liberty shall be given, for the benefit of the reading community in that colony, to foreigners to send into that country reprints of British copyrighted books on paying the royalty—which, in the case of Canada, was fixed at 12½ per cent. Now, that is all right as far as it goes; there is no cause of complaint in that case. It is for the benefit of the Canadian public. If the 12½ per cent. royalty at the frontier were collected as a matter of fact, if it were properly collected, it would also be to that extent for the benefit of the English author, and the Canadian Government would also receive some revenue from importations. But what the Canadian publishers find fault with is this, that while the Americans are able to supply the Canadian reading public with reprints of British copyright works, the Canadian publisher is absolutely debarred and prevented from reprinting one of those works for his own fellow-countrymen, even although he is perfectly willing to pay 12½ per cent. royalty to the British author, if he were allowed that privilege. It seems to me it is perfectly clear that the Canadian publisher is at a great and an unfair disadvantage in that respect, and that the Canadian public would benefit if that state of the law were changed and the Canadian publisher were allowed to reprint British copyrighted works and pay the duty, because the Canadian public would then get the benefit of the competition between the Canadian and the American publisher. The Canadian publisher would also then have the chance not only of supplying his own fellow-countrymen with these books, but he would have the opportunity of going into the United States and selling his edition there. And there is no doubt about it that the British author would be very much benefited, because, as it is to-day, the hon. Minister of Customs must know perfectly well that the amount which is collected at the frontier, representing the 12½ per cent. authors' tax, is exceedingly trifling. It is almost impossible to collect it. In one large supply of books there may be one or two of these authors, but it is almost impossible to supply an army of men at the public expense to make these collections, especially when the money does not go to the public revenue but to the author. If the tax for the benefit of the English copyright author were levied more in the nature of an excise—levied in the Provinces through Canadian publishers—there would be something substantial for the author and he would benefit by the change. I allude now, of course to the British author, having British copyright. But let us take the case of an American author having British copyright, because the British copyright law is so liberal that a Canadian or an American, or anyone else, can get a book copyrighted in London without even printing or publishing it there, without being a British subject, without any international copyright treaty with England. An American sends over half-a-dozen books to England, he gets then nominally published there, though they are really published on this side, and yet he can get copyright, and his copyright covers Canada just as completely as the British copyright does, and a Canadian cannot publish his works without infringing upon his rights. When the British author copyrights in England he cannot get copyright in America, and reprints of his books come into Canada and the public gets the benefit to a certain extent; but when an American author takes copyright in England and takes his own American copyright too, there can be no reprinting for Canada; he has us in the hollow of his hand, he can do as he likes with the Canadian publisher and with the Canadian public. Take the case, for instance, of Marion Crawford who has published some recent popular novels, such as "Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," and "Zoroaster." He is an American, but he copyrights in England. The result is that we can get no cheap editions of his works here. If you buy one of his books you have to pay $1 for it, and he does as he likes in Canada, although he is an American. Take the case of Mark Twain. He has copyrighted the "Prince and Pauper" in England, and what is the result? Prior to British copyright being obtained, I am informed that a publishing house in Canada offered $500 for advance sheets from which to print a Canadian edition for Canadians. This offer was refused. Then two Canadian publishing houses at their own risk went and printed in the United States—of course they took the chances of his American copyright there—but they printed in the United States two editions in all, of something like 25,000 copies, and brought them into Canada as reprints, although he had then taken out British copyright. These they imported into Canada, and in order to do that they had to pay 15 per cent. duty on the books and 12½ per cent. royalty to the Custom house. When they had sold all those—because they did sell them—one of the firms proposed to the author to print another edition this time in Canada, and they were willing to pay the author the 15 per cent. they would have to pay at the Customs, if they printed in the United States and brought them over, and also the 12½ per cent. royalty—in all 27½ per cent., but their offer was not accepted. The reason apparently was that he did not want to injure the monopoly he had in the United States, because if his books were published here even if he got the royalty on them they would be sold on the trains and smuggled into the United States, competing there with his American edition, or very likely he had sold the right of Canada to some English or American publisher. That was one of the results of an American author getting our copyright by going to England. Sometimes, however, Mark Twain takes out a Canadian copyright. He can do that if he domiciles himself in Canada and is willing to take rather a stiff oath on the subject, and one book he had copyrighted here in addition to his English and American copyrights. The result was that to punish us I suppose, for having had cheap copies of his edition before, the only sales that are now made in Canada are at $2.50 per volume, so he has not only got us in the corner, but he is making everybody who wishes to read his "Huckleberry Finn," bleed for it. Although he has done that, I am told there is a firm in Canada who offered him $1,000 to print an edition here at popular prices, that is, 30 cents, 50 cents and $1 retail, but he refused. I do not think, therefore, that we can feel any surprise that a wide interest is taken in this subject. The House will remember that the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto presented to this House last Session a memorial on the subject, in which a very clear and strong view of the grievances that exist under the present state of the law was set forth. With your permission I shall read a few paragraphs from that memorial:—

"That the Imperial Copyright Law, which has jurisdiction in Canada, presents many anomalies in its operation in the colonies; is prejudicial to the interests of British authors and publishers, whom it is designed to benefit; limits the operations and retards the development of the Canadian book trade, and has an injurious effect on all the industries connected with native publishing.

"That the proximity of Canada to the neighboring Republic, where there is unrestrained license in reprinting English copyrights, and every freedom in sending them into this country, makes the position of Canada an exceptional one in calling for relief from these anomalies, and in asking the Home Government to concede to Canada the privilege of legislating on copyright in accordance with our special needs, and for the protection of such interests as it is desirable to make provision for, and with the same freedom we now possess in legislating on patents.

"That while the present copyright law prohibits the Canadian publisher from reprinting English copyrights in Canada, and places him under penalties for violating the Act, it suffers American reprints (which, in the main, pay no royalty to the author or copyright owner) to enter the country, and practically gives the supplying of the entire book market of Canada to a foreign people.

"That common sense as well as policy dictates that the privileges we give to the foreign manufacturer should be given to the native publisher, while the effect of this would speedily be seen in the development of our own publishing industries, and would enable the English author to derive some benefit from the sale of his works in Canada.

"That were the Canadian publishing trade free to reprint English copyrights, with due recognition of the author's rights, he would not only be in a position to supply the wants of our own people (now supplied by the foreigner), but it would be within his power to extend the area of his operations into the United States, and there endeavor to compete with the piratical American reprint."

Surely it would be very valuable if the country could obtain on this important question the views of such men as those who penned this petition. I said a little while ago that the mechanics in the country were deeply interested in this question. To show that this is the case, I will read from a memorial which was adopted by the Trades and Labor Council of Ontario last year, after the subject had been discussed in this House:

"Under existing circumstances the American publishers could flood the Canadian market with works of English authors, while the hands of Canadian publishers were tied. A 15 per cent. duty only was imposed on such books brought into this country, and a 12½ per cent. royalty paid by the American publisher to the English author. If the Canadian publisher were placed on the same footing as the American publisher by the payment of this 12½ per cent. royalty, a great grievance, which the Canadian publishers have been laboring under for many years, would be removed, and hundreds of idle printers, throughout the Dominion, would receive employment. As the law now stands, it confers privileges in Canada on the American publishers which are denied Canadian publishers."

I received a letter the other day from a large Canadian publisher, who is at present abroad, and I will read an extract to the House. He says:

"I see by the New York papers just arrived that the authors and publishers of the United States are at the international copyright business again, and that the chances are that we will be left out in the cold. I know that the New York men calculate, in any bargain or act made, to get the Canadian market thrown in by the British publisher. I do hope that you will try and get something done this Session. Surely you can get a committee to hear evidence, or an Address passed to the Queen asking for the power to pass our own law irrespective of the English Act. I have figured up that in my own office I would pay out about $10,000 per year more wages to mechanics if we had only the same privileges as Americans, and that scores of offices that are now doing nothing would be able to make a printer's profit, at least, on steady work. We are all relying on you to get daylight for us. At present the publishing business is dead."

Mr. MITCHELL. What do you propose?

Mr. EDGAR. I propose a committee at present. Last Session I suggested a different remedy, but now I propose that the House should appoint a committee to report upon the whole subject, so that any difference of opinion that existed as to how the present evils could be remedied, might be considered and discussed. The hon. Minister of Militia, who spoke for the Government last Session, gave as one reason why we should not carry the Address to the Imperial Government which I then proposed, that there was a prospect of our obtaining reciprocity with England in the matter of copyright. I have not heard any more of that; it may be we are going to get it; but supposing we do get it, I cannot see that it will change the position of affairs very much. I know that a Canadian may now get the benefit of the English copyright. Mr. Mair, who recently published that admirable Canadian work, "Tecumseh," waited for several days in Toronto before putting it on the market. I asked him what he was waiting for. He said he was waiting for the English copyright of his book. He had sent half a dozen books to England, which had to be exposed for sale there before any could be sold here; and as soon as he got a cable despatch from England, he had the full benefit of the English copyright, just as an American author has. Therefore, when the law is so open and liberal as it is, I do not think that reciprocity will make any difference one way or the other, and will not remove in the slightest degree the grievances under which the public as well as printers and publishers in Canada are laboring under. The American Congress are now considering a couple of Bills on this subject—one by Mr. Hawley and the other by Mr. Chace; and they have taken considerable evidence, amounting to over 100 pages of printed matter, so that they are evidently seriously considering the passage of some international copyright law. Now, I think it is very important that we should have a committee to consider the fairness of that law to Canada, for fear that we should be, as the gentleman whose letter I have read says, "left out in the cold." It is quite possible that the British Minister at Washington may have represented the matter to the Canadian Government. At any rate, I am sure the Government will gladly have the assistance of a committee to see how Canada will be affected by that legislation, which is in the nature of a treaty now on the tapis at Washington. That is another reason why this committee should be appointed. Now, in ordinary cases this House could meet the difficulty by introducing a Bill and passing an Act, but in this case we cannot. Our hands are tied, though anybody who reads the British North America Act would suppose we had the right to legislate on the subject of copyright, just as we have on the subject of patents and other subjects mentioned in the 91st clause as being within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. We all thought, and no doubt the framers of the constitution thought, that the subject of copyright was also within our Jurisdiction, but the question was brought before the English law officers in 1872, and before our own Court of Appeal, in the case of Smiles vs. Belford, and it was positively decided that although the Act declares we can legislate on copyrights in this Parliament, it does not mean that we can do so to the fullest extent; it was decided that the Acts of 1814 and 1842, although passed before the British North America Act, take precedence and override it, and include the colonies, Canada, among others, in the copyright laws of Great Britain; so that every British copyright taken out by an American or other foreigner, covers Canada absolutely and completely. The grievance of Canadians not being able to reprint the British copyright books, while the Americans do so, is not a new one, or new to this House. I find, in 1872, when the present leader of this Government also led this House, an Act was passed, unanimously, to remedy that grievance, by giving the Canadian publisher the right to reprint British copyright works on the payment of a royalty, thus placing our publishers in the same position as American publishers. That Act was reserved for Imperial assent. The assent was not given in 1873 or in 1874; and in 1874, when my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was leading this House, we unanimously passed an Address to the Queen, drawing the attention of the British Government to the fact. The law officers of the Crown advised the British Government that they should not allow the Act, because it was beyond the jurisdiction of the Canadian Parliament, and because the old English copyright laws covered Canada. Certainly, since then the Act of 1875 has been passed by Canada, which gives this Government the right to grant copyrights of a domestic character within Canada itself, under certain restrictions, but does not interfere, in the slightest degree, with British copyrights. Now, I believe there is no little sentiment involved in this question. It is not a matter only affecting the material interests of Canada, and I really think that our Parliament should ask the British Government to make such change as may be necessary in the English law, in order to give Canada the right to legislate in this matter. We are not a self-governing country if we cannot; and I have no doubt the moment this House shall communicate its wish to the British Government, the latter will take means to allow us to legislate, so as to make it quite clear that we will have the right to make our laws on the subject, just as we make them on the subject of Patents, and on almost every other conceivable subject. I cannot very often agree with the hon. the First Minister, but in reference to this question I think I can quote with approval some words of his which have recently been referred to here. He said on an important occasion :

" I am, as far as this question goes, up to the handle a Home Ruler. We will govern our own country. If we choose to misgovern ourselves we will do so, and we do not desire England, Ireland or Scotland to tell us we are fools. We will say: If we are fools we will keep our folly to ourselves; you will not be the worse for it, and we will not be the worse of any folly of yours."

After that expression of opinion of the First Minister, I am sure the Government, in this matter, will only be too glad to consent to the appointment of a committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman, as he said a moment ago, brought last year a motion before this House asking for the appointment of a committee to consider certain resolutions, which ended thus :

" That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to invite her Imperial Parliament to except Canada from the operation of the Statute of the United Kingdom, respecting copyright, so far as it is necessary to give the Parliament of Canada a clear authority to legislate upon all matters respecting copyright in Canada."

The House will remember that on this motion a very interesting debate took place, and on both sides it was said that this was an important matter, which deserved the consideration of the House. On the other hand, however, the House, on the motion of the right hon. the First Minister, thought that it was a matter which might be deferred, and therefore the debate was adjourned. The hon. gentleman is no doubt right in saying that it is very important for our publishers that the copyright of authors in England should not be imposed on Canada without our Parliament having the right to legislate on the matter. But the hon. gentleman does not, I have no doubt, wish to have a law for us and a different law for the other nations; he wants, no doubt, reciprocity, provided it is based on proper principles. I do not know whether he is aware that a convention has been sitting in Switzerland on international copyright, the convention at Berne. The object of that convention is the adoption of a copyright union amongst all civilised nations and the prospect which it affords of alterations in the present legislation of England and the United States and other countries, which indicate that this matter might be allowed to stand over until we know exactly what is the result of its deliberations. The Government has only received communications of the labors of that convention, and, therefore, I think it would not be proper for us, just at this moment, when the convention has just been coming to a decision, to take any action, but that we should wait until we have its resolutions before us. I think that, under those circumstances, we should not try to have an amendment to the law, but should wait another year, and see what will be the consequences of that convention. I think, therefore, it would be better for the hon. gentleman to withdraw his motion. If the hon. gentleman will consent to withdraw his motion, under the circumstances, I will not go further.

Mr. EDGAR. No, I do not.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As I said, the Government has received communication of the resolutions at that international convention, and it would not be proper to act now, but we should wait for the full communication of those matters, and perhaps, after dropping his motion, the hon. gentleman might give notice to have these communications from that convention laid before the House. Do I understand from the hon. gentleman that he will withdraw his motion ?

Mr. EDGAR,

Mr. EDGAR. I do not see any reason for doing so.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. EDGAR. I can scarcely believe that the Minister of Public Works has read the resolution I have placed in your hands. He has read for the benefit of the House, a resolution which I suggested last year, but which stood over, and I can see that objections might have been taken to going on with a proposal for positive action in this matter, but I cannot see that the proposal to appoint a committee, not to lead to any Bill being introduced or to any particular form of dealing with the question being accepted, but to take into consideration the condition of the laws relating to copyright in force in Canada, could do anything but help the Government in considering proposals which might be communicated to them through the action of the British Ministers from the convention which sat at Berne. My motion goes on to say, that the committee are to see whether any legislation or other action is desirable on that subject, and I am sure that a committee composed of the gentlemen who have been named, will be able to furnish information of an interesting character upon that very important and somewhat abstruse question to this House and even to the Government. Surely the Government cannot be possessed of all the information necessary which might be obtained in the remaining month or two of this Session. I ask the Government not to press the motion to adjourn the debate, because it is no answer to this question, and, as to negotiations for an international treaty, I think it is all the more important that, when that is under consideration, the Government should have the information which a committee can obtain. The Government should be very glad to have this committee to consider what benefit we could derive from such an international convention, and I cannot believe that it is possible that, because a member of the Opposition has asked for this committee, the Government should desire not to grant it; I cannot believe that, on a question like this, which is utterly out of the scope of party politics, and is only brought forward in the interests of the general community, the Government will refuse to grant the committee which the trade interests, and all the interests concerned, will be anxious to have appointed, simply because it is asked for by a member on this side of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the leader of the House is mistaken in reference to the Berne conference. I am under the impression that the Berne conference have reported on the question, and that the result of their report has been the subject of discussion and of critiques in the various reviews. If that is the case, there is no reason for delay, and there can be no possible reason for refusing to have a committee of this House informing themselves of the interests of the publishers and of the people of Canada. I hope the Minister will take time to reconsider his determination, as I think it is not a wise or prudent thing to prevent us from enquiring into what are the rights and interests of the people of Canada in the view of legislation.

Mr. CHARLTON. I believe the Berne conference has reported. In fact, I have the report of the Berne conference in my hand. I can see no reason whatever why this committee should be denied. It is a simple proposition on the part of the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) to refer this copyright question to a committee to examine into the matter in a more detailed manner than this House is capable of doing. In granting that committee the House takes no action which commits it in any way. No more proper action could be taken than to refer this matter to a committee. I think the acting leader of the House has not taken a position which he is warranted in doing, and I hope he will reconsider the matter. If not, those who desire to see a committee appointed will test the sense of the House on the matter.

Mr. HALL. This subject is a very interesting and important one, but, while I consented to act upon the committee (as I should have been glad to do had it been the pleasure of the House to appoint one), still I think there are many reasons for the action of the Government in declining it. It may be true that action has been taken by the representatives of the different Governments at the Berne conference, but the recommendations there agreed upon have not yet been taken into consideration by the Governments represented. There are many complications to be taken into account in a consideration of this subject, but possibly before the committee, only one portion of the interests involved would be presented—viz., the publishers' interest—and this question involves also, and as of first importance, the authors' rights, and, in addition, the interests of the reading public. Now, it is almost certain that it is the publishers only who would feel it necessary to present their views before the committee, which would thus have only an ex parte presentation of the case, and that interest would acquire a prominence which it did not deserve. The hon. member who has brought forward the motion has mentioned certain disabilities under which publishers in Canada rest, and has compared them with the publishers in the United States. They do rest under certain disabilities, Mr. Speaker; but I think it is important that the reason for the difference between their position and the position of the American publishers, should be mentioned. It is a reason which grows out of the piracy of American publishers. It is because American publishers, with unblushing effrontery, steal the products of English authors and publish them without any recognition. It is true that our Canadian publishers, living alongside and seeing the privileges which the American publishers have—not as a matter of right, but because they take them—feel they should have a similar provision extended to them, and that could not be extended to Canadian publishers without carrying out that principle of piracy which, I am sure, Canadian publishers would be ashamed to adopt. I observed an article from the New York Herald recognising the position of American publishers, which I think would be interesting to this House. The article was published on 1st February of this year:

"The United States stands before the world as the only nation that has persistently refused to do common justice to foreign authors, the only nation whose laws sanction and encourage piracy of all books not written by its own citizens.

"The injustice becomes all the more conspicuous and flagrant in view of the fact that the discrimination made against authors is not made against any other class of foreigners. Literary property is the only kind of personal property not protected by our law when the owner is not a citizen of the United States. Even to the foreign owners of patents and trade marks, which are so analogous to copyright, protection is accorded."

A determination to terminate that dishonorable practice is becoming a recognised principle in the United States, and there is a Bill before Congress at present, by Senator Hawley, to accomplish that result or secure international copyright. Pending that, it does seem to me that it would be unwise for this House to take out of the hands of the Government the responsibility of acting in this matter. It should not be inferred that Government is not acting. Members of this House must be aware that there was a committee of the Imperial Parliament appointed to investigate and report upon this question two or three years ago, the Canadian Government taking pains to have a representative of this Government, Sir John Rose, on that committee, to take care of Canadian interests, and therefore it should not be considered that the Government have been inactive with reference to this matter. Their refusal to concede a committee, I think, is one which will receive the confirmation of this House for the reason I have mentioned, and on account of the complication of the question both from a national and an international point of view. Only two or three days ago, the present Imperial Government in Great Britain, upon a question which is very analogous to this, that is, the silver question, refused a similar committee for the reason that it involved trade relations, being a question in which the interests of the banking public and the commercial public were totally dissimilar, and also on account of its international relations. The Gladstone Government thus assumed the position that it would not grant a committee on one of those questions involving obligations of a kind which made it necessary and important for the Government to take the responsibility of acting. It seems to me this question is of very similar purport, and that a similar decision on the part of this House would meet with popular approval.

After Recess.

Mr. MILLS. I think it is to be regretted that the hon. Minister of Public Works did not comply with the proposition made by the hon. member who moved this motion. It seems to me that it was a reasonable proposition. It is a proposition asking the House to appoint a select committee to take into consideration the condition of the law relating to copyright in this Dominion. I think, looking at the present state of the law, that is a reasonable proposition. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) stated there were other interests than those of the publishers to be considered. There were the interests of the public, and there were the interests of authors in their literary property. Now that is perfectly true, and it is important that all these matters should be taken into consideration by a committee appointed to consider this question. It does seem to me that the appointment of this committee does not necessarily preclude their taking into consideration the rights of authors and the general interests of the public. In fact, it would be a part of their duty to do that, and the course proposed by the Government is one which cannot prove satisfactory to the community. If the Government had come down to the House and stated that this was a subject for negotiation with the Imperial authorities, that it was at the present time a subject of discussion between the Imperial Government and the Government of Canada, that might have been a reason for not appointing a committee to take into consideration this, but the Minister of Public Works has made no such statement. He has not given the House to understand that this subject has been discussed with the Imperial authorities at all. He has not intimated that the Government have pressed this question upon the consideration of the Imperial Government. In fact, we are in exactly the same position we were in twelve months ago when the hon. member for East Ontario (Mr. Edgar) brought this subject under the attention of the House. Now, whose interest is it that the Minister is considering? On whose behalf is the Government at this moment acting? Whose interests is my hon. friend assailing, that the Government is going to protect? Certainly not the interests of any person in the country; and when we take into consideration the question of literary property, we will see that any literary property that a party may have, in anything that is property in a foreign country—and this is practically a foreign country so far as British authors are concerned—is of the very vaguest kind. Take for instance the law relating to succession. It is not many years since our law was that an alien could not hold property in this country. Supposing a British subject had been holding property here, that he removed to the United States, that his children became naturalised, and that he died there without having parted with his property, under the law as it once stood in this country, these parties could not set up any claim to the property. What makes property in anything at all? Why, it is the law of the land. Our law declares what literary property shall be, sets its limits and its bounds. The amount of the interest any party may have in what is denominated literary property, is that which is set out in the law and is so defined. Now take, for instance, the right relating to literary property at this moment. We say a man shall have a copy-right in a work of which he is the author for a certain number of years. Why do we limit the number of years? Why do we deal with him in a way different from what we deal with the interest which any man may have in his horse or in his land? We say, that is your property, because the work is the product of your own thought; it shall continue fourteen years, and at the end of that period your property in it shall cease, and it then shall become the common property of the public. We decide the question of property on grounds of political and public expediency. We take into consideration public interest, and we seek to give the party such an interest in the work which he has produced as will not be an impediment against labor of that sort. We give him all the encouragement we think is necessary, and we tell him that at the end of a certain period the interest in the work which he has produced belongs to the public. Here is a man in England who writes a book on a particular subject. He publishes it there. Under the law at present he has a property in that work, and is capable of protecting it in every British colony; but should he have a right to injure any possible interest in that production in a colony? I do not think so. That being the case, it ought not to be the business of the Imperial Parliament to step in and interfere with our right of legislation and limit our authority in that particular. That has been done. There is no doubt about it. We stand in a position of inferiority in comparison with parties in the neighboring Republic or in the United Kingdom. If the Hon. Minister of Public Works had come down with a proposition to discuss the matter with the Imperial authorities, and said: "We were ready to provide a law that authors in the United Kingdom shall enjoy a certain royalty on works published in Canada, that they shall have a certain percentage of the value of their works sold, but they shall not interfere with the right of publication," I could understand his opposition to this proposition. But the hon. gentleman has yet done nothing; the first step has not been taken. We propose a step shall be taken and this matter considered by Parliament, and a report made so that the hands of the Government, if they are disposed to act, shall so far be strengthened by the investigation and consideration of the question. And what do hon. gentlemen opposite do? They do nothing; they refuse to permit that anything shall be done. I say it is an interference with the rights of the people of this country and with the authority of this Parliament for the Imperial Government to interfere and say they will undertake to limit our right of legislating, and to declare that our legislation shall be nugatory so far as any party is concerned who is a resident of the United Kingdom. I remember years ago when it was no uncommon thing for the Imperial Government to declare that the rights of persons residing in the United Kingdom could not be left to our courts, that our provincial courts were good enough to decide disputes between residents, but they could not safely be entrusted with the decision of questions in which residents of the United Kingdom were concerned. I trust the day has gone by when a proposition so offensive to our people can be made, one so incompatible with our notions of self-government. I do not think the Government ought to strengthen the hands of parties who are seeking to fight the publishers and the public of this country by refusing the motion of the hon. member for East Ontario. I think that proposition is a reasonable one. If the Government has any suggestion to make, any person to recommend as a member of the committee, any suggestions to make to assist in controlling the conclusions at which the committee might arrive, although reasonable conclusions, any evidence to offer, they ought to have every opportunity for doing so; but they should not resist the appointment of a committee, for it is in their interest and in the interests of the public generally that a committee should be appointed and that our right to legislate on this matter should be secured. In fact the rights given to us by the British North America Act have been invaded and limited by Imperial policy, and it seems to me the Government ought to avail itself of this committee to strengthen its own hands and thus be in a better position to maintain the rights and interests of the people of this country than they will be if such a committee were not granted.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. With the permission of the House I will say a few words additional. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) rose I was about to rise to state that this matter is now one of communication between this Government and the Government of Great Britain; that now we are in conference with the British authorities on this subject, and it would be inconvenient to have a committee just now on the matter. The hon. gentleman, I am afraid, thought that I objected to the motion because it came from his side of the House. He may dispel that impression from his mind, because such is not the case. I admit that the hon. member for East Ontario (Mr. Edgar) brought up the matter last year and again this year, and of course he must have the credit of having brought the matter before the attention of this House, and that credit cannot be taken from him. But, on the other hand, it would be inconvenient that, while negotiations are going on, this matter should be the subject of investigation here, and under these circumstances I hope the hon. gentleman will withdraw the motion and I will withdraw mine. I have already informed him that if he wishes to put a notice on the paper in order to obtain papers about the proceedings of the conference at Berne, in Switzerland, the Government would grant the papers. Therefore I hope the hon. gentleman will feel it is the proper course to follow to withdraw his motion and allow the matter to remain as it is, in the hands of the Government. When negotiations or communications with the British Government have gone sufficiently far to allow the papers or communications to be laid before the House, of course they will be brought down.

Mr. EDGAR. With the permission of the House and after what the Minister has said and his explanation that the Government is at present in communication with the Imperial Government and that it will be injurious to the public interest that the matter should be gone on with in the shape of a committee, and with the Government assuming the responsibility of any injury done to the public interest by reason of the committee not going on, I will withdraw the motion.

Motion and amendment severally withdrawn.

CHINESE IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. GORDON moved for a return giving:

1. The number of Chinese immigrants that have arrived in Canada from the 20th day of August, 1885, to the 31st day of January, 1886, specifying the ports at which such immigrants have arrived.
2. The number that have arrived direct from China.
3. The number that have arrived from other countries, specifying the countries.
4. The total amount of duty collected from such immigrants.
5. The number of Chinese that have entered as tourists, merchants, men of science or students.
6. Whether in either case (if any) certificates were presented from the Chinese Government endorsed by the Chargé d'Affaires, Consul or Consular Agent, or other representative of Her Majesty, at the place where the same was granted, or at the port or place of departure.
7. The cost to the Department of Customs, in consequence of the administration by that Department of the Act restricting and regulating Chinese immigration into Canada.
8. Copies of all the correspondence (if any) between Trades Unions or other Societies, corporate or incorporate, or persons and the Department of Customs, urging more strict supervision over Chinese immigration, together with complaints (if any) against any officer of Customs in connection with the administration of said Chinese Restriction Act 9. The total number of Chinese persons that have left Canada, during the same period.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to bringing down all the information in the possession of the Department, asked for in this return. I may say, however, that there is certain information asked for which we have not got, the Act only coming into force, so far as certain provisions are concerned, on the first of January last. All the information we have we will bring down at as early a day as possible.

Motion agreed to.

DISALLOWANCE OF MANITOBA RAILWAY CHARTERS.

On the Order, Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions on which to found an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that he will be graciously pleased not to exercise the power of disallowance as to the Act passed by the Local Legislature of Manitoba, on the 3rd June, 1884, entitled, "An Act to amend an Act to incorporate the Manitoba Central Railway Company and amending Acts," and so to leave the said Act in operation, being called,

Mr. BLAKE. I understand that pending this notice His Excellency has been advised to exercise this power and the Act has been disallowed; consequently I do not proceed with the motion.

Motion dropped.

BAYFIELD HARBOR.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved for:

Correspondence between the Municipal Council of Bayfield or other persons and the Department of Public Works in reference to the repairs of the Harbor of Bayfield.

He said: In making this motion, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the state of the repairs of Bayfield Harbor. A couple of years ago a grant was made and some repairs were done with a view of putting that harbor in something like a useful condition for the service of the inhabitants of that region, but I regret to say that not only was the first expenditure there practically useless, but that the recent expenditure, which, I believe, was made last year, has proved equally useless. I had occasion to visit this section a few months ago, and I found then that the work done by the Department had for the second time, I believe, proved entirely useless. I saw myself large masses of the palisade—it appeared to be nothing else—which had been erected under the supervision of the parties employed, torn up and washed ashore. I do not pretend to be an engineer, but as I have always resided on the sea coast I do understand a little of the nature of breakwaters such as are to resist the waves of a great lake like Lake Huron, and I must say with all deference to the officers employed that I do not believe it would be possible for them to construct a palisade such as they appear to have been constructing which would have any chance whatever of resisting the surf which rolls in there. I can assure the Minister of Public Works that visible to the eyes of myself and some friends who were inspecting it, there were large masses of these palisades torn up by the waves and washed ashore, the consequence being that the sand in the vicinity again completely choked up the harbor and the money that was spent there was completely wasted. I mention the matter in order that the attention of the Minister may be drawn to it, and if possible that this harbor may be put in a proper state so as to answer the purpose for which it was originally intended, and enable the inhabitants to obtain some use not merely of the sums which Government has expended there, but of the considerable sums which the municipality have themselves expended at different times.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am glad the hon. gentleman has called my attention to this work. I am, of course, always thankful to hon. gentlemen if they call my attention to any work which may be forgotten, or may not be properly attended to, as may happen in a large department like mine, which extends from one ocean to the other. I may say that the hon. gentleman may be perfectly right in what he says, though the work may be only in process of being executed. The chief engineer of my department, to whom I sent the notice of the hon. gentleman, wrote me as follows on the 11th of March:—

"I have not reported on these requests of the council, but I may state that the work undertaken consists of sheet piling on both sides of the old crib work, which, when completed, will make the work as strong as when first built. The old crib work, stripped by storms to low water, is too rotten to build on."

Therefore, the old crib work will be considered as only piling. I must say that I have so much confidence in my chief engineer that I think the hon. gentleman may rely that as soon as the season allows, the work will be proceeded with and we will take care that it is a substantial one. That is the intention, because we do not wish that the money expended should be wasted, but that the work may be a proper one. If the money voted is not sufficient I will have to ask for some more to complete the work in proper form.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad to hear the statement of the Minister of Public Works. I think I may venture to inform him that the money has been expended, and that the state of the harbor at present is such that unless the report of the engineer is promptly acted upon, beyond all question the harbor will be completely filled up within a short time, if it is not filled now. However, if the hon. gentleman is going to take the matter in hand, that is all I can expect.

Motion agreed to.

WORK FOR PRIVATE PARTIES BY PUBLIC OFFICERS.

On the motion:

For a return showing the names of all employes of the Department of Public Works who have acted as architects in connection with the construction of buildings for private parties in Ottawa or elsewhere; also copies of all letters received by the Minister, Deputy Minister, or other officials of the Public Works Department, and of all correspondence between the said Minister or officials and any parties in reference to such conduct on the part of such employe.—(Mr. Ossey.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I may say that I am aware of no such architect or any officer in my Department acting in such a way. I think the motion should be dropped.

Motion dropped.

PRINTING ACCOUNTS.

Mr. CHARLTON moved:

That the various items for printing contained in the Public Accounts and the Auditor General's Report for 1884, be referred to the Public Accounts Committee.

Motion agreed to.

THE MARINE POLICE.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for:

A Return of names, tonnage, number of men and armament of steamers or sailing vessels forming the present Marine Police Force of Canada, the extension of which is referred to in the Speech from the Throne.

He said: So far as I can trace in the reports of the Department, the Marine Police was disbanded in 1873, and was restored by a single vessel, the schooner La Canadienne. That vessel was wrecked, and was replaced by the steamer Glendon and the screw steamer Lady Head. The latter vessel was wrecked in 1878, and a new screw steamer, La Canadienne, took her place. The recent reports of the Department shows that this vessel has been doing double duty on fisheries and light service, reducing the existing service to half one of one vessel. Now, I have been watching, with some little interest, the statements made with reference to the Marine Police, and I find in one of the papers of the Lower Provinces, a description of one vessel, as follows:—

"The steamer Lansdowne, which has been turned into the flagship of the Canadian fishery fleet, by Capt. Scott, and which sailed at 5.30 o'clock Saturday morning, is a wooden vessel of 700 tons. She has a very unpretentious appearance, and although her model can scarcely be called graceful, it is by no means ugly. She was built by Mr. Jotham O'Brien, of Maccan, N.S., in 1884."

Somewhere in the vicinity of where the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries belongs to—

"and was designed to fill the place for which the ill-fated Princess Louise was constructed. Her dimensions are: length over all, 180 feet; breadth of beam, 32 feet; depth of hold, 16 feet. The stem and stern posts are oak and the bow and stern are ironplated, the rudder post being also made of iron. She is supplied with patent steering apparatus. A water tight compartment has been constructed forward in case of accident, and might prove useful if she should collide with any of the American fishermen. The engines are 100 horse-power, and were constructed in Greenock, Scotland. They were never a very great success. She has been used since her construction in lighthouse and buoy service, and was an ordinary vessel, but now that she is 'bristling with cannon' she presents quite a warlike appearance. The deck armament of the Lansdowne consists of two brass six-pounders, which were brought over from Halifax, and are of a very ancient pattern. New carriages have been built for them and they have been burnished until their surface is polished like a mirror. They are placed, one on either side, just forward of the foremast. In addition to these weapons of war, each officer is supplied with a sword and a navy revolver, and the men with cutlasses and revolvers. One essential which a vessel, designed for the purpose the Lansdowne is, should possess, and which she probably would have possessed had our own mechanics constructed her engines, is speed. This she is deficient in to a marked degree. Her highest speed attainable is not more than nine knots, so that an American fisherman, with any kind of a start, could very readily escape from her clutches. She carries six boats, and on this trip will have on board thirty-three souls in all, including Captain Scott. The Lansdowne has taken on board provisions for a month's cruise, but she will probably be absent for a fortnight. She will cruise about Grand Manan, Campo Bello, Welchpool and other fishing resorts, and if she encounters any American fishermen in Canadian harbors she will order them to depart. Should they refuse to leave in a reasonable time, Captain Scott will seize their vessels."

It goes on to describe Captain Scott, and then gives the notice that he publishes as follows:—

"Therefore be it known that by virtue of the treaty, provisions and Acts of Parliaments (which are quoted), all foreign vessels or boats are forbidden from fishing or taking fish by any means whatever within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks and harbors in Canada, or to enter such bays, harbors and creeks except for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever."

Now, as far as I can gather, the whole force for the protection of the fisheries at present, is the Lansdowne, a vessel which, from her description, is not very well fitted for the service, and is not likely to accomplish much. The Government papers have, within the last few days, announced that she is to be put on the service, and that she has actually sailed and is now within the borders of Charlotte County, protecting the fisheries. It is a great pity, when the Government knew that there would be no renewal of the fishery clauses of the treaty, and when they determined to put on a vessel for the protection of the fisheries, that they did not take some measure such as I counselled them from this place last year to take, and such as they pledged themselves to take when they obtained the vote of $50,000. I say it is a great pity that the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries—for I entirely exonerate the present Minister—did not take some effective steps to protect the interests of Canada, whether we got a fishery treaty or not. The vessel which is described in the terms in which I have read is, I believe, properly described, and she is utterly unfitted for the work for which she is sent. She is so slow, that I venture to say there is not an American fishing vessel on the coast that would not be able to run away from her, even with a light breeze. She may frighten them if they are willing to be frightened, but as for actual service in protecting the fisheries, I am satisfied that she is entirely useless. What addition is to be made to this nucleus of a fleet I can only judge from what notices I see in some of the Government organs. I notice that they are asking for six swift sailing schooners. That is a step in the right direction. I do not know whether any advice I may give will be received with much attention; but I say it is quite useless to get steamers whose smoke can be seen miles away. The Department should get exact copies of the American fishing vessels, made in the same way in every respect, fore and aft, so that they cannot be distinguished from the American fishing boats, until within a very short distance. That is the course which was adopted some years ago successfully, and I trust that the Minister will not consider me presumptuous in suggesting it as the right one to follow now. If carried out, it will result in stopping any infringement on our fisheries as it did formerly. While on my feet, I would like to ask a question bearing on this subject. Last year the British war vessels Tenedos and Fantome were employed in protecting the Newfoundland fisheries. I would like to ask whether any arrangement has been made with the British Government as to what portion of the North American fleet will be used in protecting the fisheries on the Canadian coast? I do not expect any material effect from it, but the fact that some of the vessels of the North American fleet were detailed for the protection of the Canadian coasts would give moral tone to the position which I trust Canada will assume with regard to the protection of her fisheries. I regret that steps were not taken earlier than the time of the sending of the Lansdowne, which is perfectly useless. The object of going to Grand Manan is to catch fish for the purchase of bait. The season is over for catching fish for this purpose, and no protection will practically be needed until the month of June. I trust, whatever steps may be taken, the Government will not be as slow about putting on vessels for the protection of the mackerel fisheries, as they have been for the protection of the bait fisheries. I therefore make this motion.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no objection at all to the bringing down of the information the hon. gentleman asks for and I hope when it does come down it will satisfy him. I have no doubt he was lacking in information in reference to that steamer, of which he read to us so full and accurate description, saying, after he had read it, he had no doubt it was a fair and proper description of the vessel. I am glad to have the advice of my hon. friend, who, I think, some fifteen years ago had something to do with fitting out a fleet for the protection of our fisheries, when difficulties something like the present were encountered. I think my hon. friend will find that the Government are not lacking in their care for our fisheries and the interests of our fishermen, and will not be lacking in the efforts which they may put forth for the full protection of our fishing interests. I agree with my hon. friend that swift sailing vessels, such as he has described, are, taken all in all, the better class of vessels for the purpose. There is something, however, in what he has said as to having the steamer which was most available at the present, and which will probably be continued, as it will give added force to the fleet, and, being kept cruising on these waters, will have a very large share in protecting our fishing grounds. My hon. friend finds fault a little, not with me I am happy to say, but with my predecessor and the Government, that they had not taken these steps earlier. I think that question was pretty thoroughly debated last year, when an agreement was entered into between this Government and the Cabinet of the United States, by which mutual fishing privileges were given from 1st July, 1885, until the end of the year. As a result of this instance of good, steps were taken, as far as the United States Cabinet could take them, towards having a commission appointed to take into consideration the whole question as well as the question of reciprocal trade. During the debate last year, I think the sense of the House was overwhelmingly in favor of the proposition then made, and I think my hon. friend was in favor of that proposition as well; and it would not probably have been the best or the wisest or the most consequent thing for the Government to have done, at the very moment it assented to that proposition, to put on a fleet for the protection of the fisheries. If it was worth while giving that instance of good-will and attempting to do, as far as Canada could, all in our power for the proper settlement of the difficulties, it was worth while to wait until the result of the negotiations were fully apparent before taking any strong step towards the protection of our fisheries. As my hon. friend has stated, the main reason for the protection of the fisheries has not yet commenced. The Lansdowne will cruise over our waters around the Maritime Provinces from now until the fishing season properly commences; and when that season commences, we will be in a position to show the country that the steps taken were adequate for the purpose which my hon. friend, the Government, and this House, strongly desire should be carried out.

Mr. VAIL. I am very glad that the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has brought this important question under the notice of the House, but there is one thing on which he omitted to ask information, and that is the important matter of what steps have been taken to prevent the Americans being furnished with bait and ice.

Mr. MITCHELL. That comes later on, in one of the other notices.

Mr. VAIL. That is a very important matter, and I should like to hear from the Minister of Marine what steps he has taken to prevent Americans being furnished with what is so necessary as bait and ice. With regard to the description of the Lansdowne, I do not think it is overstated by the paper read by the hon. member for Northumberland. In fact, I called the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine last year to the fact that the engines with which this vessel had been supplied were, according to the reports of people who seemed to be very well informed, not nearly of the power required to drive a steamer of that size. The Minister then acknowledged that eight knots was about her best speed under any circumstances, and I doubt if she could ever attain the nine knots given in the report read by the hon. gentleman. A steamer, to do the work, ought to have a speed of at least twelve to thirteen knots an hour. As the hon. member for Northumberland says, a fast American schooner will go two miles to the Lansdowne's one, if the schooner had the right kind of wind. Another thing the hon. Minister overlooks is the reference made by my hon. friend to what has been done in regard to getting the assistance of some of the Imperial ships of war on our coast. As he properly said, one British war ship would be worth half a dozen of our fleet. It is important that we should at least have one British vessel to assist in the protection of our fisheries and give a moral tone to the whole thing. I do not know there is anything else that has been omitted. The Minister of Marine referred to the agreement come to between the Government of the United States and this Government with regard to the probabilities of the settlement of the fishery question. I must say I think the Government did not take steps as early this spring as they should, in order to convince the Americans that we were determined to protect our fisheries. The fact that we expected Congress to ratify the arrangement for the appointment of a commission was no reason why this Government should have hesitated to make the necessary preparation early; so that the very moment they had reason to suppose Congress did not intend to grant the authority to appoint a commission, they should then have been ready to do what is necessary to show our intention to protect our fisheries. I hope the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will not lose sight of this, and, if the number of vessels already engaged is not sufficient, that he will ask Parliament for a sufficient sum of money to enable him to fully protect the fisheries from this time until some satisfactory arrangement is come to with the American Government.

Mr. WELDON. I trust that every effort will be made on the part of the Government to carry out the views of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). I was surprised to hear the Minister of Marine talk about the mutual privileges obtained by that agreement. The Americans gave nothing at all for what was given up on that occasion by this Government extending the time from the 1st July, and I do not think that was received in the spirit in which it was given by us. We certainly have not got credit for the spirit which the Minister says animated the Canadian Government in giving those privileges. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that the Lansdowne is unfit for the service. I recollect, when I was on the north shore as a boy, that, as soon as the smoke of the steamers which were employed was seen the American vessels would get out of the way immediately; and I think some swift schooners, like the American schooners themselves, would be more efficient. The Lansdowne, as far as speed and so forth are concerned, is a failure, and in the protection of the fisheries she would be of very little use. My hon. friend spoke of her cruise down to Grand Manan. I may inform him that she has returned from that cruise, and that she was in St. John harbor not long ago when this took place:

"It was the witching hour of midnight, and all nature should have been hushed in repose, but it wasn't. On board several vessels in the harbor there was considerable activity, and preparations were being made in anticipation of a change of wind. The American schooner Fanny Flint, Captain Warren, just as the clock was striking the hour, was coming in stays and was almost round, when 'slap bang' her stern went crashing into the fishery flag-ship Lansdowne, which was moored alongside the Government wharf. The officers and crew of the steamer came crowding on deck, thinking, no doubt, that a Yankee steamram had stolen a march on them, and forgetting in their haste their swords and cutlasses. On examining their wounds, it was found that the gangway of the steamer on the port side had been carried away, and some other trifling damage sustained. A boat was sent off from the warship to interview the audacious strangers, who had thus, as it were, bearded 'the Douglas in his hall.' It was ascertained that the whole affair was an accident, and that the schooner had had her boat smashed in the encounter. The explanation was satisfactory to Capt. Scott, and it is hardly likely that any grave international complications will result from the affair."

But the following, I suppose, is the result:—

"The Lansdowne is awaiting further orders. During her stay in port, the men are engaged in gun drill."

Mr. MITCHELL. It puts you somewhat in mind of the Charybdis.

Mr. GILLMOR. Admitting that the steamer Lansdowne cannot be said to have great speed, I think it has sufficient speed for all that is required to coast round the shores of Charlottetown, at least, and Grand Manan and the islands around the coast. For my part, I do not think the Government would be justified in expending a large sum of money in fitting out a steamer to perform the duty which the Lansdowne is supposed to perform. I agree with the action the Government has taken to protect the fisheries, but that is a vexed question, and experience only can show us how to deal with it. I would advise the Government to be careful, and not to provoke difficulties which might be hard to rectify. I do not believe in making a declaration of war just now. This question of the fisheries is a difficult one, and not easily settled. The Lansdowne is not intended to hunt after the fast sailing schooners at all, but, if any encroachments are made on our fisheries at all in that neighborhood, it is by small boats, as a rule. There are none of these fast sailing schooners that we hear of there. These questions are very difficult to decide now. There is a difference of opinion about the whole thing. I do not think it would be in the interests of our fishermen to prevent their selling bait if they can get their money for it. I think the Government are doing right in trying to protect the fisheries, but I do not think they would be justified in spending a large amount of money in buying new steamers when they can utilise those they have. My opinion is that the Lansdowne is quite sufficient to protect the coast where she is now sailing. I would have objected to any large expenditure of money to fit out an expensive steamer for the duties the Lansdowne has to perform on the coast in that region. That sort of thing may be required on other parts of our coast with which I am not acquainted, but I hope the Government will deal, of course, thoroughly but cautiously, with this whole matter, until they see what is in the best interest of our fishermen. They are now altogether in confusion. Fish is very low, and they are much depressed, and I hope the Government will consider what is in their interest.

Mr. FOSTER. If the House will allow me, I desire to say a word in answer to a question asked by my hon. friend as to the assistance probably to be given us by the British Government. Negotiations are in progress, and I hope, by the time the fishing season commences, we shall have that moral support to which he refers. I do not think my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon) acted quite fairly in leading the House to imagine that the Lansdowne had gone down on a slight pleasure trip and had come back again, and, for all he gave the House to understand, was in St. John until this day. She came into St. John for further orders, then went out again, and is on her cruise until this present time. My hon. friend will see that he quite upset his own theory when he stated that a steamer was no good because the fishing schooners would see her smoke a long distance off and would get out of the way. That is what we want. We want them to get out of the way.

Mr. WELDON. They will come back again very quickly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I confess that I am surprised at my hon. friend the Minister having used the argument which he has just used. I rise to correct two false impressions which have been conveyed, the one by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) and the other by the Minister (Mr. Foster), and I will give the Minister the precedence. He says that one of the objects to be obtained is that the Americans may see the steamboat a long way off and get out of the way. It is rather amusing to learn that that is the way to protect the fisheries. It is not the system I should advise him to adopt for their protection. That is the system the British Government adopted for thirty years, when they sent out their fleets upon our coasts, and, instead of trying to protect our fisheries and capture foreigners who were interfering with our treaty rights, they appeared like a bugaboo and frightened them away, and they never captured a single vessel in all that time, until at last we took the matter into our own hands, and taught the Americans that, having our rights, we would endeavor to maintain them. My hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), says I advocated a large outlay of money for new steamers. I advocated nothing of the kind, and never suggested such a thing. What I have said, is that the course taken by the Ministers and the Government to-day, as I see by advertisements in some of the Government papers, is one I cannot sanction; and, by the way, they do not give a very extensive circulation to their advertisements; I notice that they confine them strictly to party organs whose proprietors support them through thick and thin, and the only real independent organ in the country they cut off from patronage. I have no doubt that is purely an oversight on the part of the Minister, and now that his attention is called to it, he will deal a little more fairly with the independent press. Now my hon. friend referred to what took place here last year, when a suggestion was made and information was given to this House that the arrangement had been come to between the Dominion Government and the Government of the United States, that they should continue to exercise, during the remainder of the year, those common rights of fishing on the coast of the United States and of Canada that they had exercised for the previous twelve years. He says he believes that his hon. friend, the mover of the resolution, approved of that. Sir, who could do any thing else? There was no provision made for the protection of the fisheries. We had nothing to do but to approve of it. We could not refuse to permit them to come, because, we had no means to protect our fishermen and the Americans could come and fish in spite of us. But Sir, I did not approve of it. I suggested that measures ought to have been taken the previous year; finding that the treaty was going to terminate by the act of the American Government, our Government should have taken a vote the previous year, as I suggested, and as Hansard will show, for the purpose of putting these fast sailing schooners a year ago to protect our fisheries. We had nothing else to do but to approve of it, and if my hon. friend thinks that because I gave my assent to a matter of necessity, I would therefore approve of the previous negligence on the part of the then Minister, he is quite mistaken.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to correct my hon. friend. I am sorry to see that he does not read his own paper, for if I do not mistake I think in that independent paper, the Herald, there already appeared one day an advertisement with reference to this same Government steamer.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, Sir, and it was put in in spite of the Department. I am going to do with the Government the same as I did with the City Council of Montreal, when they boycotted the Herald—let them know that we would publish information for the public whether we were paid for it or not, and that is what we are doing with this advertisement.

Motion agreed to.

EXPENSE OF BRINGING DOWN RETURNS.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent) (for Mr. VALIN) moved for:

Return of expense of bringing down papers to this House, and for printing the same, during the Sessions of 1884, 1885, on the motion—1. Of the Hon. Edward Blake; 2. of the Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright; 3. of the Hon. Mr. Mills; 4. of M. O. Cameron, M.P. for W. Huron; 5. of Geo. E. Casey, M.P. for W. Elgin; 6. of John Charlton, M.P. for N. Norfolk; 7. of Wm. Paterson, M.P. for S. Brant; 8. of Hon. Wilfred Laurier; 9. of C. W. Weldon, M.P. for St. John; 10. of P. B. Casgrain, M.P. for L'Islet.

He said: It is right that I should say, on behalf of the hon. gentleman who has given this notice, that I had not read the resolution, so he will have the full credit of it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will give the hon. member, who has moved this resolution, the credit of the disclaimer he makes of being responsible for it. As I am one of the parties mentioned in that motion, and as I presume, when the return is answered, it will be found to have cost the country some money, perhaps I may be permitted to say a few words in explanation of the motives that prompted me to ask for these returns, and also something as to the reason why the returns were a subject of expense to the country. The timber limits returns were voluminous. That they were voluminous is not my fault. The fact that numerous applications were made, and that numerous Orders in Council granting timber limits were passed, accounts for the bulk of those returns, and then that bulk is due to the policy of the Government in permitting its favorites to secure, by application, vast areas of timber lands. That policy, Sir, was protested against by the leader of the Opposition, who made a motion with regard to that policy in the year 1882, warning the Government that the policy it had then adopted and was pursuing with reference to the granting of timber limits, would result in serious abuses and in great loss to the public revenue. The prediction contained in that resolution has been more than realised. Thousands of square miles of land have been granted upon private application to partisans of the Government for a nominal sum. From year to year this abuse has continued. I presume, although I have not the statistics compiled, that not less than 20,000 square miles of timber land have been granted by this Government by Orders in Council to its favorites—granted upon private application—granted without competition having been invited—granted at a loss to the public revenue of this country of millions of dollars, and granted at the expense of the independence of this Parliament—for no graver abuse can be pointed out in parliamentary history than the abuse connected with the granting of timber limits in this House of Commons. Sir, the abuses that existed in the British Parliament which led to the passage of the Independence of Parliament Act, were not as great as those that exist in the Canadian House of Commons to-day. These returns are three in number, the first one comprising some 3,000 foolscap pages, the second one some 4,000 foolscap pages, and the one recently brought down between 8,000 and 9,000 foolscap pages. Now, of course, the expense of bringing down these returns is very great, but it was necessary the country should know what this Government was doing. It was necessary that the country should know that a great rush for favors on the part of the favorites of this Government has been continuing for three years past; it was necessary that the country should know the state of rottenness that exists here, and has existed here for years. Why, Sir, the very gentleman who makes this motion, I find upon reference to the papers, has had some of these favors, and I would not have found this out if these returns had not been moved for. I find that Mr. P. Valin, M. P., made an application for timber limits for Ferdinand Sampson, on the 25th April, 1882; an application for timber limits for Didace Dean, on the 25th April, 1882; an application for Frank Ross, on the 25th April, 1882; an application for timber limits for D. C. Thomson, on the 25th April, 1882; an application for timber limits for James D. Ross, on the 25th April, 1882; an application for timber limits for William Sharples, brother-in-law of the Minister of Militia of this Dominion, on the 1st May, 1882; and the application of William Sharples was backed up by a letter from the Minister of Militia. I do not propose to enter very fully into this matter to-night. It will be a subject for further remarks. There was a little episode occurred last Session. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) caused one of these returns to be piled upon my chair and seat, and spread all over the premises, calling the attention of the House to the fact that the member for North Norfolk was guilty of great extravagance in calling for a return of that bulk. Well, I found something in reference to the hon. gentleman for North Perth in these returns. I am sorry he is not here to-night; however, I think it will be pertinent to the case to read one or two of his letters. I find an application from that gentleman for Mr. James Robb, of Stratford, who had been editor of the Tory paper in that town, and the application was duly honored by the issuing of an Order in Council in favor of the said James Robb. I find here a letter from Mr. Hesson, under date Ottawa, 12th May, 1882, addressed to the Minister of the Interior, Hon. D. L. Macpherson:

"MY DEAR SIR.—In re application of Mr. James Robb, of Stratford for a small timber license on the Birdtail Creek, I am informed he is now unable to obtain the grant as at first admitted and reported. He has a mill and apparatus now on his hands and don't know what to do with them. I enclose his letter to me. Kindly look into the matter at your earliest convenience and do the best you can to assist him out of difficulty by permitting him time to look around for some other available spot. I feel confident he will not be ungrateful. Mr. Robb is one of our most energetic and best working men.

"Believe me, yours truly,
"S. R. HESSON."

There are other letters to the same purport, followed by an Order in Council granting to the said James Robb a timber limit. Then there are other communications from Mr. Hesson. Mr. Hesson, it seems, had a friend living at Toronto by the name of H. Symons. He writes on behalf of this individual on 23rd June, 1882.

"Some time ago I wrote in behalf of H. Symons, Esq., of Toronto, for timber limits on the Saskatchewan. Your reply was that a previous application was in for the same. Will you now do me the favor"—

Favor underlined—

"of changing that application to Cedar Lake as Mr. Symons is the only applicant for that place. I hope you will enter his name at once, and he will complete the application forthwith. As Mr. Symons is a particular friend of mine, I hope you will see to this at once."

I believe, Mr. Speaker, he was a particular friend, being married to a daughter of the hon. gentleman. Then we have an application from Mr. Hesson in favor of two individuals, Hugh Waterman and John Stewart. There is another application from Mr. Hesson in favor of S. S. Fuller, of Stratford, backed up by a letter from Hon. T. N. Gibbs. I do not propose to detain the House at this time as a full discussion of this question will come up subsequently. I state these instances in the case of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) and in the case of the hon. gentleman who moved this motion. They are simply specimens of a great number of other cases, and they show the condition of things that has existed and does at present exist with respect to the granting of applications for timber licenses in the North-West. I have to repeat what I said a moment ago that this corrupt system of granting timber licenses has resulted in the loss of millions of dollars of revenue to this country. The Government of Ontario since 1870 have licensed something less than 7,000 square miles of timber lands. For those licenses, granted subject to the conditions of the Government, that Province has received in bonuses something over $1,600,000. In the year ending 1st February, 1884, the Government of the Dominion of Canada issued Orders in Council granting licenses covering 7,600 square miles, more than the area licensed by Ontario since 1870, and for that vast area they received in bonuses not one dollar, and for that vast area they never invited competition. The public were not invited; they never have been invited to compete for those licenses granted to the favorites of the Government. There has been, it is true, a sort of public-private competition when two or more friends of the Government applied for the same limit. They were required to compete among themselves in a hole and corner fashion, and the one who offered the most bonus received it. The public were never invited to compete, and those business principles that should always actuate the conduct of such matters have never guided the granting of timber licenses by this Government. They never made an attempt to get revenue from them. They have used them as a corruption fund to influence and control the votes of members in this House and secure the influence of influential men belonging to their party out of this House. This is not an independent Parliament. The Government have used influences in this Parliament that make it the reverse of independent, and the abuses that exist under the system of granting timber licenses are infinitely worse than the crimes, if I may call them so, the infractions of the law that the Independence of Parliament Act provides shall be punished with a fine of no less than $2,000 a day for every day the member sits. A member may be liable to penalties under that Act, of $2,000 a day as I have said, and his fault may be a trivial one compared with the faults that scores of members of this House have committed and are laboring under at this moment. For that reason, believing that such a state of things exists, these returns have been called for. They have come down. They, no doubt, have cost this country thousands of dollars. The money has been richly earned. The corruption of this Government cannot be unearthed, except by the expenditure of money for the purpose of securing the records.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman has informed the House that this subject is to be further discussed at a later period of the Session, and I do not therefore propose to enter into any elaborate defence of the policy of the Government in regard to the granting of timber licenses in the North-West Territories. I desire simply to call attention to what I think will be regarded on both sides of the House as a most unfair use which has been made of letters addressed by members of Parliament to the Department, asking that timber limits may be granted to particular individuals. Sir, every member of Parliament knows that he is called upon in the very nature of things frequently to write letters to the Government in relation to matters which may be of interest to his constituents or to his friends. We do not require to go very far for an example, a rather noted example, of the necessity which sometimes is imposed on members of Parliament to do this kind of thing. I can remember a very remarkable letter written by a very prominent politician, a gentleman who occupies the position of leader of hon. gentlemen opposite, to the First Minister of the late Government asking that a particular contract might be given to his friend Moore—

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell),—and urging.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell),—urging that consideration be given to his friend Moore in connection with that matter.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman says no.

Mr. BLAKE. I say no.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I can tell this House exactly what the letter was. It was a letter declaring that "my friend Moore" had tendered for a particular contract, and suggesting that "my friend Moore" would probably do the work well if he got the contract. And the result was, that he did get the contract at something between $20,000 and $30,000 over the next lowest tenderer, which lower tenderer had been certified to as a good contractor by no less a person than Mr. Stirton, a prominent friend of the party, who knew the other tenderer and testified by letter that he believed he would be perfectly competent to do the work. I do not refer to that for the purpose of making an attack upon the leader of the Opposition or for the purpose of reviving an old question, but simply for the purpose of pointing out what every member of Parliament knows, that letters of that kind may be written with the most perfect innocence of intention, without the slightest thought of there being any corrupt motive; and there is no hon. gentleman on that side of the House who does not, in his heart, know that what I say is true; there is not one of them who, when he was on this side of the House, so far as they were, when their friends were in office, was not in the habit of writing letters, perfectly honest and perfectly proper, recommending particular friends for particular patronage and particular favor to the Government of the day. The question is not whether a member of Parliament writes the letter; the question is whether the Government corruptly yields to that letter. That is the point where the importance attaches, and in that case I am prepared to show when the discussion comes up in its fuller aspect—as the hon. gentleman tells us it is coming—that this Government stands in the position of meeting its assailants, its accusers, without the slightest suggestion of wrong-doing on its part. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman is good enough here, as he has been good enough outside, to refer to the number of applications which have been made for timber licenses, and he suggests that in those applications there necessarily has been something corrupt. What has been the practical result? In connection with the disputed territory, we had rather a noted speech made by an hon. gentleman outside of the House, in which he declared that the disputed territory had practically been apportioned among timber limit holders, and he cited applications and Orders in Council, as evidences of that fact. Now, it is quite true that there were no less than 308 applications. Surely there is nothing corrupt in applying for timber licenses; surely there is nothing corrupt in the Government receiving an application for a timber license. But what was the fact? The fact was, that in connection with those 308 applications, only 115 Orders in Council were passed, so, as to 193 of them, the thing began and ended in an application to the Government, in the filing of an application in the Department of the Interior, and no other step of any kind was taken. Where was the corruption, where was the injury done to anybody in that? But that is not all. After the Orders in Council had been passed; after, in a large number of instances, the first amount required to be paid by way of rental, had been paid to the Department—$250, being $5 a square mile of annual rental paid to the Government—after that was done, what was the fact? Why, that only twenty-seven licenses were granted. So that I think the hon. gentleman will admit, and the country will admit, that whether there be corruption in the granting of timber licenses per se, where there were 308 applications, and in answer to them but twenty-seven licenses granted, it will not be pretended that all those letters addressed to the Minister or to the Department by members of Parliament had any serious effect on the action of the Minister of the Interior. Now, Sir, what is the policy with regard to this matter? The hon. gentleman speaks of the giving of these timber licenses as if there was something necessarily corrupt in it. He knows as well as any one can know that it is simply childish, it is worse than childish, to talk about a comparison of the timber limits of the North-West with the great timber limits of Ontario and Quebec; he knows there is no possible relation between the two. Now, what was done? This was done: Under the policy of this Government, or of the Conservative party, before hon. gentlemen opposite occupied seats on this side of the House, the policy was to let these licenses by public competition. When they came in, they changed that policy, and the policy which the hon. gentleman denounces so strongly was the policy adopted by themselves, acted upon by themselves when they were in office, and the last Order in Council which they passed—passed one day before they left office—passed after they were defeated at the polls—was an Order in Council granting 200 square miles of timber limits to political friends to be selected, not in a particular block wherever they would survey it and hand in the survey to the Department, but to be selected by them in blocks of 20 square miles wherever they might choose, over the North-West from one end to the other. That was the last act of hon. gentlemen opposite when they sat upon this side of the House—an act performed as I have said after they had been defeated at the polls, and as the last gift they had to give to men who had acted well for them, as strong partisans while sitting here on the Treasury benches. The first act, or among the earlier acts of this Government was to cancel that Order in Council; and I venture to think that if the statement made by that hon. gentleman be justified by the facts, that the mere granting of a timber license without competition is evidence of corruption on the part of the Government that gave it, then the party which changed the policy, which made it possible to give timber licenses without competition, are the party who are responsible for the corruption and the party who are the last who should undertake to charge corruption against this Government because they have adopted that policy. Now, that was the policy we adopted? It was this: The hon. gentleman talks of timber limits at $5, as if that were the price. What we did was this: Applicants applied for timber limits; they paid, after the Order in Council was passed, the first year's rental, $250, and as the records show, in the overwhelming majority of cases they never went any further, and the corruption of the Government consisted in accepting $250 from people who got nothing for it except a blank piece of paper, and the applicants spent a large sum of money outside without ever getting any more. But if they chose to go on they had to make a survey of the territory; they had to send in that survey to the Department; that survey had to be accepted; they had to build a mill within a certain time, and that mill had to cut a certain quantity—10,000 feet, I think, per diem for every fifty square miles. They had then to pay the Government a royalty of 5 per cent. on the produce of their mill, and the result has been that the people of the North-West have had their timber given to them at greatly reduced prices, and that most important consideration to the settlement of that country, the supplying of timber at reasonable prices, was secured by the policy which the Government adopted. If two persons applied for the same limit they had to compete for it, and latterly the policy has been still further changed, so that no timber limits are now given, except by public competition and after public advertisement. And what has been the result? In three or four cases where the advertisement has been published and where no competition has taken place, the bonus has not been sufficient to pay for the advertisements. That has been the result, and it is the best possible test of the public estimation—the business estimation—of the value of these timber limits, in relation to which so much has been said. I thought it right, Sir, to make this brief statement of the case. The hon. gentleman promises us a further discussion, and when that further discussion comes up I can assure him he will have details to his heart's content, and that the public will be able to realise how utterly unworthy have been the charges made against this Government, and how wanting in truth have been the statements made outside the House in relation to the timber limit policy of the Government.

Mr. MILLS. It would have been advantageous if the Minister had allowed the House to decide whether the acts of the Government have been properly characterised by the observations which he has now addressed to it, after all the information which he says will be brought before the House, is actually before it. The hon. Minister of the Interior says that the recent Administration, when they were in office, carried out the principle of competition, and that the policy which the Opposition now so much complain of was a policy which was introduced, not by the present Administration, but by the Reform Administration of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie). The hon. gentleman has not quite fairly stated the facts to the House. The hon. gentleman knows that the present Prime Minister, when in office before, claimed that his Government acted under the law, while as a matter of fact they did not do so. They did not advertise or seek for competition; in fact, the law was wholly disregarded. When the hon. member for East York came into office, and parties made application for timber limits, and the law was complied with, by advertising and by offering the limits to public competition, it was found that there was practically no competition; there were but a few parties who desired timber limits, those who had mills in the particular district, so that the law was practically inoperative. What the Government did then was not what had been done by the previous Government; they did not disregard the law, but they repealed it and put on the Statute-book a law with which it was possible to comply. They fixed a valuation on the limits, and they sold timber limits to all parties who had mills, on precisely the same terms; so that the law was strictly complied with. Now, when the hon. gentleman says that parties are obliged to survey their land, to mark out the limits and to furnish plans to the Government before the Orders in Council are passed, I can only say that was not the rule under which his predecessors in the present Government acted, and that was not the rule followed by the Government of Sir John Macdonald before 1873. I know myself that those hon. gentlemen granted limits to Mr. McAuley, a portion of which was not selected in 1876. The hon. gentleman knows that his statement is not accurate in that particular. He knows that the Orders in Council were passed and a certain number of miles were granted before the land was selected, and before those parties were able to tell the Government where they desired to obtain their limits. The hon. gentleman has referred to Messrs. Cook & Sutherland's case. They were dealt with exactly in the same way as twenty others; the same rule was applied, whether the applicant was a Conservative or a Reformer; if he owned a mill in the particular district or agreed to erect one within a certain time, the limit was granted to him on certain conditions. The limit granted to Messrs. Cook & Sutherland, looking at the character of the mill they proposed to erect, was not an unreasonable extent of territory. I saw in a return brought down to the House, a letter from the hon. gentleman himself with reference to a limit granted to a certain mill owner in one of the districts of the North-West. The hon. gentleman in that letter says that part of the limit is already exhausted of timber, that his mill is standing idle, and that he requires a larger limit. Would it be an unreasonable thing for the Government to furnish him with a larger limit, which would supply his mill as long as it would last? That was the very thing we did with regard to Messrs. Cook & Sutherland, and the same course was pursued with regard to McAuley & Fuller, who were not supporters of the Administration. The hon. gentleman said that we provided in that Order in Council that no part of the limit was to be less than twenty miles in extent, I do not remember whether it was twenty miles or ten miles; but I remember that we did fix a limit, because we said to Messrs. Cook & Sutherland that if there were small tracts of timber, as there are, on many flats of the river, two or three miles in extent, they could not pick them up unless they agreed to pay a license on a limit of 20 miles, and that they could not go and select small patches of timber in the Saskatchewan valley, which might be necessary for the settlers in that district. In that provision we protected the interests of the settlers. When the hon. gentlemen opposite came in, they adopted a different rule. They gave timber limits for one-fourth of the charge we made to Messrs. Cook & Sutherland, and they gave limits, not of 20 square miles, but as low as 2 square miles. They took no steps to see that the lumbermen did not deprive the settler of his timber; they wholly disregarded the interests of the settler. We provided that no timber limits should be sold to parties who were not prepared to erect mills. Can the hon. gentleman say the same thing of the Government of which he is a member? Was the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) the owner of a mill when he obtained a limit for $5 a square mile, and sold it for $2,000 a square mile. The hon. gentleman speaks of the case of Messrs. Cook & Sutherland because they were opponents of the Government, although they had spent thousands of dollars to erect a mill, and they cancelled the Order, although by doing so they left the people of the district without competition. At the time the Order was passed, providing for granting a limit to Messrs. Cook & Sutherland, there was but one mill in the valley of the Saskatchewan, that belonging to Mr. Moore. The people were paying $100 a thousand for their lumber, and it was with the view of promoting the people's interest and well-being, by furnishing competition, that that Order in Council was adopted. I need not say more about this subject at present. The hon. gentleman says that this matter is to come up for discussion. Whenever it does come up, the more it is discussed the more perfectly fair and in the public interest that matter will be seen to have been. I do not say that the rule of granting timber limits without competition and at a fixed limit should continue for all time. It was necessary in the conditions of the country at that time, when there were so few settlers. We recognised the necessity, but recognised it only as a temporary one, intending to return to the principle of healthy competition whenever the circumstances of the country would justify us in adopting such a rule.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. the Minister of the Interior has stated that the policy of the present Government has always been to grant limits to parties who would operate them within a certain period, and to give the settlers lumber at the lowest possible rate. Now this has not been the case. The Government did not pursue that policy in connection with the North-West, especially Manitoba, where they granted limits to favorites who did not work them in the interests of the settlers. These limits were granted, not only to supporters of the Government, but even to officials. Of those gentlemen I gave the names some three years ago, when I was not contradicted, and if necessary I can give them again. There was not a limit granted in the Shell River District to men who were prepared to operate them on the spot, but they were given to men like Mr. James Anderson, Dominion Crown Lands Inspector, and Mr. Laycock, his assistant. There was not a limit granted in which these men had not an interest; nor were those worked, operated in the interests of the settler, for the logs were floated down the Assiniboine to Brandon, a station on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and there sawn, so that when a settler wanted a thousand feet of lumber he had to drive seventy-five miles to get it, although the logs were driven down right past his homestead. Gentlemen like Mr. Cook and Mr. Sutherland, who were prepared to operate those limits on the ground itself, had not the same advantage as partisan friends of the Government and therefore could not get them. I know the instance of one gentleman, who had built a saw-mill at Lake Manitoba and was running a steam tug on the lake, who could not get a license or other lease for limits, after he had cut all the timber in his own, although there were limits available held by parties who had not worked them and had not even, I believe, paid the ground rent. The Government will not sell the limits or grant licenses to parties willing to work them, so that the settlers have no opportunity of purchasing lumber as they would have were the limits properly worked. For some time past the Government have been pursuing this policy. Mr. Pratt, who has a steam tug and saw-mill and is ready to operate on Lake Manitoba, has not been able to obtain limits or license, although the limits have been lying idle for five years beyond the time when the grants should have been cancelled, the parties in whose name they stand not having complied with the requirements of the law. I hope the hon. the Minister of the Interior will see that those limits are operated: if not I hope he will see that the leases are cancelled, if the limits are not operated by those who hold them, and that the limits will be disposed of to those who are prepared to work them.

Mr. BLAKE. I cannot say I am surprised that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Valin) has given this notice, but I was surprised that the hon. member for Kent should move it in his place. The motion is based on a very great misconception as to what is the relation of hon. gentlemen who move motions with the consequences of those motions. This motion, as I believe, unprecedented, but I presume the Government intend to accede to it and I have no personal objection to it. I must say, for my part, I declaim any personal or individual responsibility, such as seems to be imputed by the mover and supporters of the motion, for the accession of the House to the various motions I have made. The member who moves for papers here does not by that motion procure the papers; it is the House which orders their production. Not one of the motions which I have moved met with any resistance on the part of the House. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry), for example, did not resist any one of them; he thought it was right they should all pass; he wanted to have the papers, and agreed to the Order that they should be produced. Now he thinks it important to see the cost of the acts he and I supported. So with reference to the printing. That is in the hands of the House committee appointed by the Government in which the Government have a majority, and in respect to which the mover of the motion for papers has nothing whatever to do. The Printing Committee suggests to the House what papers of all those brought down, it thinks important enough to be printed and in what way. I am not aware, though I believe there are many cases in which the decisions of the committee have been questioned, but there are certain occasions in which documents which should have been printed have not been printed, or were printed in such a way as to give them a narrow circulation. The committee decides what amount of expense may be incurred in the way of printing, and, as an example of economy, I may instance a certain number of important papers in connection with the North-West troubles, which were brought down after a great deal of difficulty, and which that committee recommended should be printed for Sessional Papers only, so that the public have not had the opportunity of getting copies of those papers in the usual way as parliamentary documents. Such a sage economy with reference to public money animated the committee that they thought it unfitting to incur the extra expense of a larger edition, which would have a wider circulation, than the existing documents. If it is proposed by this motion to prevent members of the Opposition from moving motions for papers when they think public interest requires it, it will be ineffectual. Motions will be made whenever we think, in the public interests, papers should be brought down, and we will put the responsibility on the Government and other members of saying whether they think it fitting these documents should be concealed or brought down. If they assent unanimously, or by a majority, to their production, the responsibility involved in the expense incurred will be shared by those who agreed that the expense should be incurred. That is all with reference to the main subject of the motions. As to the observation of the hon. Minister of the Interior, I have only to say, with reference to myself and the letter I wrote, his recollection failed him when he came to describe that letter.

Motion agreed to.

MARINE AND FISHERIES—REPORT TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for:

Copy of Report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the Privy Council under the date of 15th December, 1869.

He said: If the House grant the order to send this down, I hope they will not treat it as they did the one of last year containing valuable information, but will order it to be printed, as it will form part of the future history of Canada with reference to our fisheries and trade relations.

Mr. FOSTER. The return asked for will be brought down, and I promise my hon. friend it will be printed as well. I hold that the able and strong documents drawn up by my hon. friend deserves to be handed down to posterity.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman for the compliment he has paid me. Last year, when one of those documents came down, I felt it my duty to ask that it also should be printed, and, if it be in the province of the Committee, I hope they will look over the document and see whether they cannot have it printed as well as the one about to come down. Those who write the history of our country will take a good deal of interest in both documents.

Motion agreed to.

SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for:

Return showing:—1. The total amount of money paid by virtue of requirements, 47 Victoria, chapter 8, intitled: "An Act to authorise certain subsidies and grants for aid in respect of the construction of the lines of Railway therein mentioned, and the separate amounts paid up to 1st March, 1866, by virtue of the requirements of the said Act, to each Province, railway company, corporation, &c., mentioned in the same? 2. The total amount of money remaining to be paid by virtue of the requirements of the said Act, and the separate amounts payable to each Province, Railway Company, Corporation, &c., mentioned in the same.

Mr. POPE. There is no objection to the motion. I do not know that I quite understand it, however, when the hon. gentleman speaks of the total amount of money paid to each Province. I know of none that has been paid to the Provinces. Does he mean the amount paid in each Province?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes.

Mr. POPE. I have no objection to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—GRAVENHURST TO CALLANDER.

Mr. EDGAR moved for:

Copies of any agreement or contracts entered into between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Northern Railway Company of Canada, and the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company as lessees of the Northern and Pacific Junction line from Gravenhurst to Callander, providing for through rates and fares and proper traffic arrangements for freight and passengers over the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway as stipulated in the agreement of 12th April, 1884, under which the Government granted the subsidy of $12,000 per mile for the construction of the railway from Gravenhurst to Callander.

He said: This motion refers to the very important line connecting the railway system of Ontario with the Canadian Pacific Railway at Callander. It will be remembered that that connection was made by the assistance rendered to the extent of $12,000 a mile by this Government to a company who leased the line to the Northern Railway. I believe the railway has been now built, and I am not going to discuss the question whether the Government could have procured it to have been built for a smaller sum than $12,000 a mile or not. We have the fact that the road has been built, and, I believe, very well built. But it is of vast importance to the Province of Ontario, through which the connecting lines run, that every possible facility should be given for the traffic of the Province of Ontario to and from the North-West over the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that every possible arrangement should be made to facilitate the running of trains, and to have fair rates for that Ontario traffic. The agreement under which the $12,000 a mile was given for the construction of this railroad was brought down last Session, and it provides; that within six months after its date—it is dated the 12th April, 1884, and six months after its date would be the 12th October, 1884—an agreement shall be entered into between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Northern Railway, as to the rates and fares and traffic arrangements between the two roads. The conditions provided in the agreement, as to the grant of the $12,000, are that the through rates and fares from all points west on the Canadian Pacific Railway, to and from all points on the railways of the lessees, should be settled on a mileage, or other fair basis, and in case of dispute, should be settled by arbitration. Now, it is quite clear that, unless some agreement of that kind be entered into by the Canadian Pacific Railway, that company might put on such rates as would be prohibitory to the traffic going off at Callander for the Ontario system, and they might very easily, if it be left in their hands to do so, force the traffic going eastward over their own line, from Callander all the way down to Montreal or to the seaboard, instead of allowing it to leave their line at Callander and go to the seaboard that way or to Ontario. It is very much to their interest, therefore, clearly, to make arrangements which would suit themselves and their own line east of Callander, instead of making arrangements which would suit the line of this connecting railway; and we can therefore see how important and essential it is that some such agreement as the one proposed should be entered into and should clearly settle those points. Then it was also arranged that an agreement should go farther than that, and make provision for through freight cars, through sleeping cars, and connecting trains. That is also very essential, as anyone can well see, in order to give fair competition with the east. Of course, Montreal has natural advantages that Toronto and the towns and cities of Ontario have not, in competing for the trade of the North-West. But Montreal, no doubt, will be able to take care of herself, and it is very undesirable to give any adventitious or artificial advantages in the way of freights to Montreal by reason of the advantages which the Canadian Pacific Railway would have by diverting traffic from its connecting line at Callander. Now this agreement, I am afraid, has not been carried out—at any rate I am satisfied that it has not been carried out within the six months provided for under the agreement by which the Government gave the subsidy. One would think that when an arrangement, giving $12,000 a mile, was made and when a stipulation was inserted that within six months such an important arrangement should be made by the Canadian Pacific Railway, the terms would have been stringent, so that either the grant would not have been paid over, that it would have been held back, or that there would have been some penalty of forfeiture unless the Canadian Pacific Railway gave this agreement. But the language of that clause is most extraordinary. It does not provide that in default of the making of this agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway the money shall be held back, or that any money shall be held back, or that any penalty shall be enforced. It merely provides that this clause shall have no effect unless the Canadian Pacific Railway shall, within six months from this date, enter into a contract with the lessees, agreeing on its part to the terms of this clause. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it is left absolutely to the discretion of the Canadian Pacific Railway whether it will do this or will not do it, and if they did not do it neither they suffer nor the railways that are to be built suffer, and nobody but the public would suffer, because there is no penalty or condition attached to it whatever, except that the clause which says it shall be done shall have no effect. Now, on the 9th of February last I put a question in this House to the Government asking them whether the Canadian Pacific Railway did, within the six months required by that agreement, that is by the 12th October, 1884, enter into such an agreement as was required, and the hon. Minister of Public Works replied then that "the Government is not aware that the Canadian Pacific Railway has done so." Well, they clearly did not do it within the six months required, nor for about six months after that. Now, I believe since then the railway has been finished, and the whole subsidy has been paid over, and I have no doubt that the Government used the great influence which they possessed and still possess with the Canadian Pacific Railway, to induce them to make that binding agreement for the benefit of this other railway, although they had not done it within the time required, and although, according to the letter of the law, they were not bound to do it. I am sure this motion will give the Government an opportunity of telling the House that they have seen to this, and that the agreement has been entered into by the Canadian Pacific Railway, because if it has not, I do not think the subsidy which has been given will make that road of any practical use to Ontario for the purpose of connecting with the Canadian Pacific Railway. It will be a very good local road, running through the districts of Muskoka and Parry Sound. But if this has not been done, and if the papers which I ask for here cannot be produced because they do not exist, I am sure that the people of Ontario will be very much grieved, and the business men of that Province, who thought they were getting a grant of $12,000 a mile to assist this road as a direct connection with the North-West, will be very much disappointed.

Motion agreed to.

THE FISHERIES.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for :

Copies of reports of communications between the Canadian and American Governments through the late Governor General of Canada, Lord Lorne, on the subject of a Joint Commission respecting the Fisheries, and of any memorandum by Lord Lorne or any suggestion emanating from the United States authorities naming suitable individuals to form such Commission as referred to by the late Minister of Fisheries, in a debate in the House of Commons on the 13th of July, 1885.

Mr. FOSTER. I may inform my hon. friend that there are no memoranda or copies of reports. Nothing passed except verbal communications.

Mr. MITCHELL. Under those circumstances I withdraw the motion. I suppose the hon. gentleman will not object to tell us at a later period what those verbal communications were.

Motion withdrawn.

APPOINTMENT OF QUEEN'S COUNSEL.

Mr. MILLS moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Imperial Government, and between the Government of Canada and the Government of any Province of the Dominion, in reference to the appointment of Queen's counsel.

He said: I hope the Minister of Justice will be able to lay the papers before the House at an early day, and I will refrain from discussing the matter until we have the papers before us; otherwise I should feel inclined to enter into a discussion of the subject.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish.) The motion has a very wide range in the way in which it is presented to the
Mr. EDGAR.

House. I understand, however, that all correspondence on this subject has been already submitted to the House or has been made public through various channels, except the correspondence which has been commenced during the present year with the Government of Ontario. I cannot promise to bring it down very shortly because it is not yet concluded. I acquiesce in the motion, but I cannot promise to bring the correspondence, if that is the correspondence to which the hon. gentleman refers, down at an early day.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return showing all sums of money paid to any member or members of this House or the Senate, on account of services rendered in connection with the North-West rebellion, giving the names, the services performed, and the respective sums paid each, the date at which the services commenced and terminated; also all sums paid on account of travelling expenses, outfit or otherwise, giving each name, amount paid, what for, and date of payment, separately.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Copies of all evidence, together with the judge's charge and all other papers relating to the trial of Loison Mongrain, for the murder of David L. Cowan, a policeman, late of the county of Carleton. Also all petitions, correspondence and Orders in Council relating to the commutation of the death sentence of Loison Mongrain.—(Mr. Landarkin.)

Return of the amount paid for damages to land taken for the Indian-town Branch of the Intercolonial Railway, in the county of Northumberland, N.B.; the names of the parties to whom the same was paid, and the amount paid each one; the names of the valuers appointed to assess the damages, and the amount paid for their services; the legal gentlemen employed in connection therewith, and the several amounts paid for their services.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Return of the earnings and working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for each month from 1st July, 1885, to 1st February, 1886, specifying the different sources of earnings and the amount (if any) in each month, credited from mechanical stores account to earnings.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Return showing: 1. The total number of acres of grazing land placed under lease up to 1st March, 1886. 2. The names of grazing land lessees who have cattle upon their leaseholds, the number of acres in each leasehold, the date of the lease, the location of the land covered by the same, the number of lease, the number of cattle reported on each leasehold, the date when the leasehold was first stocked with cattle, and the aggregate area covered by such leases. 3. The names of grazing lands lessees who have not placed cattle upon their leaseholds, the number of acres in each leasehold, the location of the land covered by the same, the number of the lease, and the aggregate area covered by such leases. 4. The total revenue derived from pasture land leases. All returns asked for to be brought down to 1st March, 1886.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Return of particulars of any claim made by John Heney, of Ottawa, for a refund of tolls paid by him upon vessels or wood passing through the Government canals, together with copies of all Orders in Council passed by the Government in relation to such claim, and copies of all correspondence between the Government and the said John Heney or any other person, respecting such claims for refund.—(Mr. Landarkin.)

Return showing seizures made at the port of Winnipeg, by the Customs officers or officials, between 1st January, 1885, and the 11th of March, 1886, in which fines were imposed, deposits forfeited or goods sold after seizure; giving the names of the persons upon whom fines were imposed, who forfeited deposits or whose goods were sold after seizure; giving the amount of each fine imposed, of each forfeit deposited and of the amount obtained in each case in which goods were sold; and stating in detail the name, official position and salary of each officer to whom any part of the money so realised was paid, and the amount in each case thus paid to the said officer.—(Mr. Paterson, Brant.)

Return of the numbers and names of the United States fishing vessels frequenting the inshores of Canada for fishing and kindred purposes, during each of the several years that the Treaty of Washington has been in operation; also the kinds and estimated quantities of fish taken yearly by each American vessel, and the probable period of each fishing voyage or voyages.—(Mr. Mitchell.)

Copies of documents, correspondence, reports and Orders in Council respecting alleged interference with United States fishermen on the coasts of Nova Scotia in the years 1880, 1881 and 1882, together with copies of the Fishery regulation or regulations said to have been violated by Americans, and for the enforcement of which, by Canadian officers, indemnity was claimed; as also a statement of amounts claimed, and of sums (if any) paid therefor.—(Mr. Mitchell.)

A statement of sums deposited in the Post Office Savings Bank and Government Saving Banks on the 1st January, 1886, showing: Number of depositors holding amounts over $1,000; over $500 and under $1,000; over $300 and under $500; below $300; with total held by each class respectively.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Return showing the amount paid to P. R. Jarvis, Esq., of the city of Stratford, county of Perth, returning officer under the Temperance Act for the county of Perth, Ontario, for the vote taken under the provisions of the Act on the 18th day of June, 1885; a detailed statement of all moneys paid to such returning officer, for what purpose, and to whom paid by him.—(Mr. Trow.)

Return showing the number of homestead entries of Dominion lands cancelled in each of the years 1880-81-82-83-84 and 1885; also, number of pre-emption entries cancelled in each of the above years.—(Mr. Glen.)

Copy of a report made by F. N. Gisborne, in February, 1885, on the application of the inhabitants of Brier and Long Islands, Digby County, for telegraphic communication with the mainland.—(Mr. Vail.)

Return of the total amount paid by the Railway Department for applying the Westinghouse brakes on the Intercolonial Railway, to 31st December, 1885; the number of locomotives and number of cars to which the brake has been applied, and the cost for each locomotive and each car, separately.—(Mr. Vail.)

Return showing the amount owing and unpaid on the 1st day of January, 1886, on pre-emption entries of Dominion lands in Manitoba and the North-West Territories; also, amount owing and unpaid on time sales of Dominion lands, 1st January, 1886, for Manitoba and North-West Territories.—(Mr. Glen.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 10:40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 30th March, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. DAWSON moved:

That the time for presenting Private Bills be extended to Monday, the 12th day of April next, in pursuance of the recommendation of the Select Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 65) respecting the Northern and North-Western Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 67) respecting the Central Ontario Railway Company.—(Mr. White, Hastings.)

Bill (No. 68) to incorporate the Brockville and New York Bridge Company.—(Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

Bill (No. 69) respecting the Bank of Yarmouth.—(Mr. Kinney.)

Bill (No. 70) respecting the Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Ross.)

Bill (No. 71) for the discharge of Insolvent Debtors whose estates have been distributed rateably among their Creditors.—(Mr. Edgar.)

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Before we proceed to the Orders of the Day, I must bring before the House a statement made in a newspaper, which statement has been repeated and my attention called to it. I do not intend to complain of the appreciations of newspapers on my own merits or utterances in this House, however unjust or ill-mannered even they might be; but what I have the right to complain of is that statements purporting to be statements made by me as a member of the House, should be incorrect or untrue. I read in the London Advertiser, which, I think, has a representative in the Capital, of Monday, 29th March, an article headed: "Chapleau's Effort." In that article, it is stated that a letter was read by me dated the 19th instant, which letter:

"Declared that Riel was confined in the Longue Pointe Asylum when his insanity was only simulated. . . . Mr. Chapleau said that he was the Secretary of State in the Government at that time; that it came within his duties to commit lunatics; that he knew Mr. Riel was not a lunatic; that he thought Mr. Riel was in danger of being punished for the murder of Scott, and that he (Mr. Chapleau) had sent him to the Longue Pointe Asylum under an assumed name as a safe refuge from the vengeance of Mr. Scott's friends."

What I said is not that, and the statement I have quoted is wilfully untrue. I stated, and I have read it in every newspaper which took my words:

"I knew it, I must say, even before this House sat. I knew it even, but not in a satisfactory manner, during the time the so-called insane man was in the asylum. I knew it from some of the guards, but I would not have taken their authority."

If, as I stated, I knew it from one of the guards, Riel must have been then in custody. I stated that when the unfortunate man was sent to the asylum, I had—and it is in my speech—evidence before me to which, as a member of the Government, I had to submit; that is to say, the necessary papers with affidavits. Those affidavits were given by hon. friends on the other side, whose honesty and integrity I do not doubt, and it was on those papers that Riel was put in an insane asylum. The appreciations of newspapers are free, in the discretion of the papers themselves, but the questions to the truth of statements attributed to members of this House belong to this House, and if the privilege is given to the press to make reports, the press should not be allowed to make untrue statements.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. McLELAN. Mr. Speaker: In moving that the House resolve itself into a Committee of Ways and Means, I desire, as has been customary, to make some statements respecting the position of our accounts. This duty has for a number of years been discharged by one who has made fiscal matters a life study, and whose clear and able statements commanded the admiration of the House and the confidence of the country. I am sure that all in this House will join with me in expressing deep regret that the condition of Sir Leonard Tilley's health has compelled his withdrawal, at least for a time, from the more active duties of public life, and I am sure also that I but give expression to the feelings of those around me when I utter the wish that he may be restored to health and may have many happy years of useful and honorable life. In attempting this task, without having had perhaps sufficient time to become familiar with all the details of my Department, I should crave the indulgence of the House, more especially when I look back to 1867, and I see that this position has been from that time to the present always occupied by distinguished and able men; Sir, in looking back to that period over the administration of those eminent men—an unbroken line of gallant knights—I am deeply impressed with the changes that have taken place in the country since that period, with the contrast which the Dominion of Canada presents to-day to the Dominion of 1867. Eighteen years in the history of any country mark it with changes of progress and development, or, perchance, of decay, but I venture to say that in no country in the world are the evidences more strong and marked of progressive development than in the Dominion of Canada. In 1867, we were four Provinces, and we spoke of the country as a great country, one of magnificent distances. We had then Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, covering an area of 338,000 square miles, with a population of 3,331,000. On the east we have added that most fertile of all fertile islands, the Island of Prince Edward, and we have taken our boundaries westward and laid them beside the waters of the Pacific Ocean. In area, we now embrace 3,438,000 square miles. In territory we have increased more than tenfold, and our population more than 50 per cent. But it is not in increased area, it is not in added numbers that the change is most marked. It is in the condition of the great body of the people. They have learned more of each other in those eighteen years, and have strengthened their political, their social, their commercial and their industrial ties. In 1867, the two Provinces in the east were separated from the two in the west by an impassable barrier. In winter, and for six months in the year, we were dependent upon the United States for all intercourse and communication between the two upper and the two lower Provinces. In the west, on the admission of British Columbia and the Territories, the obstacles to intercourse were greater even than the increased distances, and for all communication and intercourse we were dependent upon foreign railways, foreign hotels, and foreign conveyances. For fifteen or sixteen years we have been paying tribute to a foreign but a friendly power for all intercourse westward. To-day the iron rail, leaving the waters of the Atlantic, goes westward and westward until it touches the waters of the Pacific Ocean, and gives us an unbroken highway from the extreme east to the extreme west; so that we shall from this time be able to pass to and fro from the extreme of east to the extreme of west without being reminded, as hitherto, by a foreign flag and a foreign Custom house that we were dependent upon a foreign people for our intercourse. The year 1886 will be in all future Canadian history a red-letter year, as being the year in which we obtained our national, our geographical independence; the year in which a highway to pass for pleasure or profit, in peace or in trouble, was opened to us throughout our whole territory. Something more than thirty years ago, the public men of Nova Scotia were busy discussing the propriety of commencing the construction of what is now a portion of the Intercolonial Railway, and a link in this great highway, and the men who were then discussing it, the men who were most earnest in the matter said to us that the importance and value of this road would grow in the public estimation of the people of Nova Scotia, and in the estimation of the people of all the Provinces, that it would be commenced and would go westward until it would eventually reach the waters of the Pacific Ocean; and we were told that many of those who were taking part in the discussion would live to hear the scream of the locomotive in the Rocky Mountains. Sir, that prediction has been realised, and, if all, or if even in part the other predictions respecting the great value and importance of this work, in binding together the several Provinces, in strengthening and maintaining British interests upon this continent and developing the great resources of this country, and drawing to us a share of the trade of the millions of people who swarm the islands and the countries lying beyond our western terminus, are realised, then the men who grappled with and carried out this mighty undertaking will be regarded as benefactors of this country and will receive the respect and gratitude of all true Canadians. And, Mr. Speaker, I may add that our right hon. leader, who has labored so diligently and so successfully in carrying forward this work, who, while not unmindful of the interests of the older Provinces, never lost sight of this undertaking, although often assailed by the opposition of gentlemen opposite, and sometimes met by the fears and doubts of his friends, yet never lost sight of this work, but labored faithfully, zealously and intelligently to complete it, and bind together and make one people all who dwell beneath the British flag on this continent, and strengthen and maintain British institutions—if those predictions shall be in any part realised, he will have the highest reward that can come to the greatest statesman, the satisfaction of knowing, of believing, of seeing, that he has wrought a great advantage for his country. Sir, I believe that those predictions will be largely realised, and that a great future lies before us. But I must not detain the House to speak of that future. I was contrasting for a moment, in passing, the past with the present, the condition of things in 1867 with the condition in 1886. And, Sir, it is not alone in the increased area, nor in the improved means of inter-communication which we now have, but the change is most marked in the great improvement in the condition of the vast body of the people. Measured by every standard that tests the progress of the people, we see that they have made great progress, by the accumulations in our savings and our commercial banks, by the traffic upon our railways and upon our waters, by the growth of our towns and cities, by the private and public buildings which adorn them, by the comfortable homes of our rural population, by the churches and schools, and all the varied avocations in which men are engaged, and which mark the growth, the progress, the wealth and happiness of the people. Sir, in speaking thus, and expressing gratification at the growth of the Dominion, I do not forget my experience in the past with some minds narrow by nature or by prejudice, who will say that it is, perhaps, not in good taste in a Nova Scotian, not in good taste in me, particularly, to express this gratification. Sir, I desire a word of personal explanation, and I am moved the more thereto by the fact that the leader of the Opposition, when nothing else could be found to occupy his great mind at the opening of this Session, directed my attention, when I should occupy this place to-day, to the position I occupied in 1867. It is true that Nova Scotia was opposed to Confederation, but mainly owing to the financial terms then proposed; it is true that I joined in that opposition, but when the act was passed I took the earliest opportunity to define my position as a candidate for this House. Addressing a large public meeting of my constituents, I said—and, if I remember rightly, my remarks were reported by the gentleman who occupies the chief place at the Table of this House—I said: The Act of Confederation has become law, it is the Act of the British Empire, and no power that we possess can avoid it. We shall live under it, we shall test its working, and if I am elected as your representative in the House of Commons, believing that the terms on which we are admitted are unfair to Nova Scotia and may be amended, I shall labor to have them amended, and I shall join those who will endeavor to promote the best interests of the whole country at large. In substance, that was my pledge to the people of my county; and when I came here my utterances were in that direction, to have a modification of the terms on which Nova Scotia was admitted. And, Sir, to-day I stand with that pledge redeemed, and with having aided to secure better terms for my little Province down by the sea, and in having joined with those who were giving, and have given their best energies to the development and progress of the whole country. With that pledge redeemed I feel as free to stand here and express proud satisfaction at the progress of our common country, as could the most ardent Confederate of 1867. Now, Mr. Speaker, having detained the House with this introduction, I desire to invite attention to the Public Accounts which were submitted to the House some days ago, and which, I have no doubt, have been examined by hon. gentlemen present. Permit me, Sir, to direct attention to several points which seem to call for consideration. And first, dealing with the receipts of 1885, it will be noted that the late Finance Minister, in his Budget speech, placed the revenue likely to be received at $33,000,000, including in that amount the sum of $500,000 estimated receipts from the sale of Dominion lands. The actual amount received from the several sources came to $33,190,618, of which the amount from Dominion lands was $393,618, the excess over the estimate being $190,619. Many of the items in the receipts and in the estimates approach each other very closely. For instance, the Post Office revenue was estimated to produce $1,900,000; it did produce $1,841,372. The revenue from Public Works, including Railways and Canals, was estimated at $3,000,000; it did produce $3,065,000. The interest on investments was estimated to produce $1,900,000; it produced $1,997,000. Miscellaneous revenues brought in altogether $605,838, against an estimated amount of $800,000. Dominion lands produced but $393,618. The interruption of the receipts from that source was caused by the troubles in the North-West, on account of which the receipts from that source almost ceased, and reduced the amount below the estimated receipts of $500,000. Then there are the receipts from Customs and Excise. When Sir Leonard Tilley made his Budget speech about this time last year, he estimated the Customs to produce $19,000,000; they did produce $18,935,426, being $64,574 short of the estimate. If hon. gentlemen have referred to the Trade and Navigation Returns they will have seen that the greater portions of the goods entered for duty in the Dominion during the past year were fully up to the estimates. The main falling off was in articles that are being manufactured in the country, manufactures of cotton and woollen goods, of iron and steel and the products thereof. The duties upon those articles was $2,167,229.34 in 1884, and the amount realised in 1885, $1,606,510. As hon. gentlemen will see, there was a large falling off in the receipts from those sources in consequence of our manufactories being able to furnish a larger portion of the goods required for the wants of the people. The receipts from Customs will, no doubt, constitute the items which will receive most attention from hon. gentlemen opposite and all who are opposed to the National Policy, and who desire to preach and put in practice the doctrine of Free Trade so far as is possible in this country. I may, therefore, be permitted to make a few observations on this subject before passing to other matters. The sum of $18,935,426 from Customs last year was collected on a gross importation for home consumption of $102,710,109, being 18.43 per cent. under the National Policy tariff. Comparison has been made on many occasions between the taxation of the Dominion and the taxation of the United States, and the results of the tariff in the Dominion and the results in the United States. It is, however, shown from the returns of 1885 in the United States that the percentage of taxation upon imports into that country was 31.45, or over 13 per cent. more than the charge under our National Policy. It is not so much with the United States tariff, but with the tariff of 1878 that we shall be criticised. The tariff of 1878 is entered in our books as showing a taxation of 14.03 per cent. upon a total importation of $91,199,517, and that shows a difference of over 4 per cent. in the result of the working of the tariff as at present arranged and the tariff which hon. gentlemen applied in 1878. Now, even 4 per cent. of a difference of taxation is, perhaps, a considerable one; but it does not warrant all that has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite as to the grinding nature of our tariff. If it be really 4 per cent. more than the tariff of 1878, I do not think it deserves all the condemnation which hon. gentlemen have been pleased to shower upon it, but it is not. The Customs receipts for 1878 were $12,795,693, being, as I have said, 14.03 upon an importation of $91,199,577. The larger you have the importations for a given sum received the smaller is the percentage, and you have to look at the imports and compare the imports of 1878 with those of 1885, to reach a fair comparison of the amount of taxation imposed by those tariffs respectively. In 1878, it will be remembered, breadstuffs were imported free into the Dominion, and all that passed through any part of the Dominion, by Grand Trunk Railway or otherwise, to the seaboard, for shipment abroad, was called an importation for home consumption. In that year the amount of imports of breadstuffs was $13,452,460—in other words, 14½ per cent. of the whole imports of that year was in breadstuffs, not in necessary imports, not in compulsory importations for the consumption of the people, but a large portion on the way to the seaboard for shipment to other countries; and yet, being free, they were called importations for home consumption, although they only passed through the country. The amount added to the necessary importations we were compelled to make, increased the amount given as importations; and when the duty in that year is taken over the whole amount thus increased, it shows to the advantage of the tariff of 1878. Take out that amount of thirteen millions on breadstuffs, free, and you have $77,747,117 left as the necessary importations of that year, upon which $12,795,693 was collected, which brings the percentage up to 16.45 per cent., less than 2 per cent. of the taxation of 1885. If you look at the imports of 1885 and the collections thereon you will find that the increase of taxation is not on the necessaries of life, not on what is consumed by the poor man, and not what will justify hon. gentlemen opposite in saying that the National Policy tariff is grinding on the poor man, and drives him out of the country. It is not necessary, Mr. Speaker, that I should detain the House with a very close analysis of the importations of 1885; but I may take up two or three special lines, and show that the increase of revenue and increase of taxation does not result largely from impositions on the laboring classes or upon the poor man. In 1885 we collected on silks and velvets, $1,029,657. In 1878 we only collected $539,981, an increase of $480,676; and that leaves as much silk and velvet for the poor man in 1885 as was imported in 1878. On spirits and wines we had an increase of $642,100; on jewellery, gold and silverware, $156,728. Now, here are three classes of goods which are considered as luxuries, on which we collected an excess over the amount collected for 1878, of $1,279,504. Now, if you take this from the gross revenue received from Customs, it leaves $17,655,924, which would make a fair comparison with the receipts from the importations of 1878; and when you do that, Sir, you bring the taxation down to less than three-quarters of 1 per cent. over the taxation of 1878. And I am sure, Sir, that if the investigation were pursued further, we should be able to show, having no duties on tea and coffee, and many other things which are largely consumed by the poor man, that the tariff under which we are operating and under which we have collected this revenue, bears much more lightly upon the working classes and upon the middle classes than did the tariff of 1878. Hon. gentlemen have been wont to exclaim against the tariff under which we are operating at present, because it is called a protective tariff. But, if we take the free trade tariff of England, we find that it is more grinding and bears more hardly upon the poor man and the laboring classes than it does upon the rich. Of the $98,000,000 that are collected for Customs duties in England, a celebrated statistician, Mulhall, places the proportion paid by the laboring classes at $56,000,000; the rich, $6,000,000; and the middle classes, $34,000,000; or, in other words, there is paid by the laboring classes more than 56 per cent. of the whole collection of Customs revenue in that free trade country of England. So we see that a free trade tariff is not necessarily light upon the laboring classes, or upon the middle classes nor the poor man. And, Sir, I say that if I were to pursue the analysis of our importations, I would be able to show that our tariff is especially framed to bear lightly in its taxation upon the poorer classes; and, moreover, Sir, we know that the result of the working of that tariff has been to give the poor man and the laboring man employment. It has given him that employment which keeps poverty almost out of the country, and that is the object that any tariff—that any Government framing a tariff should have in view—to give employment to the people at large, and to bear lightly upon the laboring classes of the community. And the result of this tariff has been, Sir, that we have been giving employment to the masses of the people, to the laboring classes, and we are able, from the condition of our manufactures, to feed and clothe the workingman for work-day and holiday; and are able to put in his hands the implements by which he earns his living at lower prices than they were imported into the country under the tariff of 1878. The receipts from Excise have been $6,419,101 as against an estimate of $5,500,000. The large increase in the Excise is to be accounted for by the fact that distillers and others forestalled the changes that were made in the revenue and entered large quantities of their goods. The receipts from Post Office, Railways and Canals, interest on assets, and miscellaneous sources, including Dominion lands, amounted to $7,806,089, showing a marked and gratifying increase since 1879 amounting to 88·3 per cent., or $3,565,321. It will be noticed that I have included in that amount the receipts from Dominion lands. During the five years that hon. gentlemen opposite held the Government, all the receipts from Dominion lands were taken and counted as part of the revenue, and my hon. friend and predecessor, Sir Leonard Tilley, followed the same course up to 1881, placing these as part of the receipts from consolidated revenue account. From 1881 to 1885, Sir Leonard seems to have placed them to capital account. I suppose the reason will be found in the fact that he had a large surplus each year during that period, and it was immaterial whether they should be placed to capital or to revenue account. But, Sir, I think the House will agree with me that as we have made large expenditures in the North-West in opening up the country by railway, and incurred a large debt for that purpose, as we have made large expenditures in surveys in the North-West, for Mounted Police, and in Indian treaties, incurring large liabilities, it is but right that whatever revenue or return we should have from the lands in the North-West, should be placed to revenue account to meet the interest that we are paying on the expenditures, and the sinking fund that we are providing in order to pay off that indebtedness. I think the House will agree with me that we should do that instead of increasing the taxation of the country. Should we receive from the lands in the North-West a larger sum in any one year than would meet the sinking fund we have to provide towards the payment of our indebtedness there, and the interest upon our indebtedness for that expenditure, then it might very well be placed to capital account, but until that point is reached, I think we are justified in placing it, as hon. gentlemen opposite did, and as Sir Leonard Tilley did till 1881, to revenue account, and I have therefore proposed for the present and future to deal with it in that manner, calling it and using it as so much revenue, instead of increasing the taxation in order to meet our wants. The amount received from Dominion lands, as I have already stated, during the year 1885, was $393,618, making the total receipts for the year on consolidated revenue account, $33,190,619, against which there is the year's expenditure. This is of two classes—the ordinary expenditure, contemplated by Sir Leonard Tilley when he made his estimates, and the exceptional expenditure, caused by the unfortunate outbreak in the North-West. We may, I think, consider them separately. Dealing first with the expenditure in the North-West, caused by the outbreak, I find that there was paid through the Department of Militia and Defence the sum of $1,697,881, and by the Comptroller of

Mounted Police, $93,950. There has also been an increase in the Indian expenditure, resulting from the outbreak, of $82,375. The two first items together amount to $1,791,831. This sum, deducted from the gross expenditure, as given in the Public Accounts, of $35,037,060, leaves the sum of $33,345,229, as against the receipts of $33,190,619, showing, by taking out only the expenditure on the Mounted Police and on Militia and Defence, a deficit of $54,634; but if you take out the additional Indian expenditure of $82,375, you have a small surplus of $27,741. I may say here that the additional receipts from Excise have reduced the amount of the deficiency for the year 1885, and have increased the deficit which we anticipate for 1886. Taking the receipts, and crediting them all to the year 1885, it will be seen that on the ordinary expenditure, exclusive of the expenditure caused by the trouble in the North-West, the accounts about balance each other; but as it will be seen later, that we anticipate a deficit, exclusive of the expenditure in the North-West, for the year 1886, I think it would be but fair that the over-expenditure for 1886 should be divided between the two years, 1885 and 1886, because a portion of the Excise revenue due in 1886 was anticipated and paid in 1885. The expenditure, it will be seen by the accounts submitted, differs in some respects from the estimates Sir Leonard Tilley made. The charges of management were increased $63,518; the sinking fund, $365,416; the premium on discount and exchange, $108,988; public works, $77,848; and miscellaneous, $76,109. On other items there has been a decrease—On civil government, $37,186; on legislation, $33,845; on census, $24,941; on railways and canals, $18,073; on mail subsidies, $125,194; and on Liquor License Act, $57,770. The first item of over-expenditure I may refer to is the charges of management, of which the chief part arises from the commutation of the stamp duty on the 3½ per cent. loan of 1884. The difference in the sinking fund is made up of two items—a half year's sinking fund investment in the Consolidated Canadian 5 per cent. loan, which was not estimated for on account of its falling due on the 1st of January, 1885, and a half year's sinking fund investment on the Dominion of 1884, which loan was not floated when the estimates were made up. I supposed Sir Leonard Tilley intended to take up the 5 per cent. loan altogether, and re-issue without a sinking fund. As the House is aware, he converted that into a 4 per cent. loan, leaving the sinking fund. The premium on discount and exchange arises almost entirely from the discount on the gold we brought to the country in connection with the loan contracted in 1885. On ocean and river service there is an increase of $49,276, caused by over-expenditure on the maintenance and repairs of steamers, and the outfit of a new steamer. On Indians the increased expenditure of $82,375 was caused by the North-West troubles. On public works there is an increase of $77,845, which was expended on works included in supplementary votes. The under-expenditures were as I have named. It may be, Mr. Speaker, and I have no doubt it is, to some hon. members on this side of the House, a disappointment that the Public Accounts for the year have not, as in past years, shown that large surplus which Sir Leonard Tilley was able, on a number of successive occasions, to announce to the House. It should be borne in mind that when the tariff was framed hon. gentlemen opposite said to us: "You will not get any revenue; you are expecting to manufacture in the country under your protective tariff the goods you now import." That was our expectation; but we knew at the same time that the increased activity given to trade would for many years necessitate our importing more largely than our manufactures would be able to supply, that our dependence for revenue would eventually have to be placed on articles of luxury, or on articles that were not grown or produced in the country, and would not be manufactured for a number of years, and that these would have to be held in reserve for revenue. Our manufactures, however, increased more rapidly than we anticipated; the employment of our people in factories has been larger than we anticipated at the outset, and this is, perhaps, in some measure due to hon. gentlemen opposite. They, on every occasion, put before the country statements of the enormous receipts, dividends and profits manufacturers were receiving, and thereby induced, perhaps, a larger number to enter manufacturing than the circumstances of the country demanded for the time; and, therefore, Sir, from the more rapid increase of manufactures than Sir Leonard Tilley counted upon, the revenue has not come up quite to his anticipations. I admit, Sir, that under ordinary circumstances it is desirable that the receipts and expenditure should be equalized, but in adopting a new policy, there is so much difficulty in so regulating it and so estimating for the increase of home production, that it is difficult to make that harmony between receipts and expenditure which is always desirable. In the condition of our country, when we were requiring large expenditures on public works, there was no great loss in having a pretty large surplus and devoting it to the completion of public works and the improvement of the country, as was done during the time we had these large surpluses. They prevented the increase of our indebtedness by just so much, and they tended to improve the credit of the country abroad, enabling us to receive money on better terms than if we had not been in the receipt of surpluses. The fact that we have been increasing largely our manufactures is shown in the decline of the articles, in the manufacture of which we are mainly engaged. The importation of cotton and woollen goods, and of the manufactures of iron and steel, in 1878, amounted to $22,367,000. When we started the National Policy and by protection gave employment to our own people in larger numbers, and when we were not in a position to produce sufficient goods, the demand called for, in 1882, $33,588,158. In 1884, when our manufactures had increased, the importations fell to $26,250,955, and in 1885 they dropped to $22,369,720, or reached the point at which they stood in 1878. There is, perhaps, not a gentleman on either side of the House who will contend that the people have not been able to purchase more since then than they could in 1878; there is not one who will contend that more goods have not been consumed in the country than in 1878. The cause of the decline is wholly due to the increased output of our manufactures. This is evident in the importations of raw material. The importation of raw cotton from 1874 to 1878, five years, aggregated 25,641,000 lbs. From 1881 to 1885 it ran up to 104,528,000 lbs., or more than quadruple that of the first period. In the same period the importation of wool increased by 15,439,124 lbs., and the exports decreased 6,627,563 lbs., or a difference, comparing the two periods, of 22,066,783 lbs. for manufacturing. In 1885, the last year, the whole export of wool was only $196,178, showing that we are manufacturing almost all the wool production of the country, and are importing very much more of some particular grades that are required. So with respect to every article, the employment of raw material has largely increased. Take the article of pig iron; its importation has more than doubled, in addition to the large quantity being manufactured in the country. Having referred to some of those minor items, I may be permitted to deal with some of the larger items of the Accounts of 1885. Hon. gentlemen have noticed that the largest item in the Accounts is that for interest. The charge for interest and management, unfortunately, foots up $9,652,123, and deducting from this the interest we have received upon our assets of $1,997,034, there is a net charge for interest of $7,655,089. Now this is a pretty large amount, and it requires us to go back and see what increase we have made to this since 1867. In 1867, the charge for interest and management was $4,787,080, and the receipts from assets were $126,419, leaving a net charge for interest in 1867 of $4,660,661. The net figures from 1867 to 1885 are $2,944,428. Now, it may be said, looking at all we have undertaken and accomplished, and all that was required to support our undertakings, we have only increased our expenditure under this head by $2,294,428 over the charge for 1867, and it will be remembered that we had to bear the charge in 1867 when we were only four Provinces with a population of 3,331,000. Now, when we embrace the whole Dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and have made large expenditures to develop this country, it is easily seen that, without this, we could not have accomplished what we did. It required labor and money to dig canals and improve the navigation of rivers and lakes; it required large expenditure of money to build wharves and piers, to erect harbors of refuge along our coasts, and to dot our coasts and lakes with lighthouses to facilitate navigation and connect it with the commerce of the world. It required money to construct railways. Without it we could not have done all these things. We could not have cut down hills, filled up the valleys, and spanned the rivers; we could not have laid the iron rail from city to city, from town to town, as we have done all over the Dominion. We could not have sent the iron horse over the broad prairie or cut a pathway through the Rockies, that we might take the traveller down through the pleasant valleys and into the beautiful clime of British Columbia, if the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) will allow me to apply the term beautiful to that Province. We have done all this; but to do it all, it was necessary there should be large expenditure and that our indebtedness should be largely increased, and the result is that we paid, to the 30th June, 1885, $2,994,428 more than we paid in 1867. But I want the House to bear in mind that the population in 1867 was 3,331,000, that the total interest paid in 1867 was $4,660,661, after deducting the interest received on assets. That makes a per capita charge on the population of $1.39¹/₂ per head. In 1885, we paid $7,665,089 on a population which I should be disposed to estimate at 4,800,000, but I presume the hon. gentleman will question that, and I shall take off 100,000 to meet his views, in order that there may be no discussion upon this point; and on a population of 4,700,000 we paid $1.63 in 1885, making a difference in interest paid in 1885 and that paid in 1867 of only 23 and one-tenth cents per head of the population; and I am sure, when we look at all that has been undertaken and accomplished, and when we look at the condition of the people, those of us who remember 1867 and those who know anything of the condition of the people at present will say that they are better able to pay a taxation for interest of $1.63 per head now than they were to pay $1.39 in 1867. I am disposed to pursue this a little further. A speech was delivered by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, a celebrated speech, a speech which attracted the attention of the whole Dominion, and indeed, the attention of other countries; a speech which may be called an important speech, so important that the greatest care should have been taken in the utterances made in it. The hon. gentleman on that occasion stated that we had increased the burden of interest and of indebtedness beyond the wildest conjecture of 1867 or 1878 or 1882. I think it necessary to pursue this matter a little further, and see whether we are amenable to the charge of having increased the burden of interest very largely since 1878. When the hon. gentleman assumed office in 1873, the charge for interest in the financial year 1873-74 was $5,161,577. When they left office, five years after, the charge for interest in the year 1878-79 was $6,687,794, an increase of $1,526,217; or an average increase per year of $305,244. In the financial year ending June 30th, 1885, the net charge for interest was $7,655,089. Take from this the interest upon the public debt in the year when they left office, $6,687,794, and we have $967,295 as the net increase in seven years, or an average increase of $127,182 a year as against $305,244 during the period that those hon. gentlemen held office. I do not think that, if the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) had looked at the figures and had seen that when his friends were in office and he himself was aiding them, the rate of increase had been 200 per cent. faster than it was from 1878 to 1885, he would have, upon so important an occasion, announced to the world that we were increasing the burdens of interest beyond the wildest imagination of 1878. But let me treat this in another way. In 1878-79 the interest per head of the population, taking it at 4,125,366, was $1.66½; in 1885, on a population of 4,700,000, it is $1.63 per head of the population, or actually 3½ cents per head less in 1885 than it was in 1878, when those hon. gentlemen left office. And yet the leader of the Opposition announces that we are increasing the burdens of the population beyond the wildest imagination of any man in 1878. I do not say the amount of our indebtedness is less than it was in 1878-79. Oh, no. But I say that the credit of the country has been so improved by wise legislation, by wise administration and by the systematic and proper expenditure of the money that has been borrowed, that we have reduced the rates at which capital has been procured. Capital demands from the borrower that the security shall be good, capital demands that the purposes to which the money is applied shall tend to the improvement of the security, and capital demands that the person seeking the loan shall have, under ordinary circumstances, the wisdom properly to apply that money to improve the security. When a country goes to borrow, capital exacts the same conditions as from a private borrower. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) seemed to be fully impressed with this on the first occasion on which he went to England to borrow money. On that occasion he issued a prospectus, which has become, I may say, famous in Canadian history. He described the condition of the country as he received it from the hands of his predecessors. He enumerated in that prospectus the successive, the continuous surpluses that had been given each year from 1867 downwards. He enumerated the various public works which had been undertaken, which had been carried forward, and which would yield a large revenue to the country, and would enable the country to pay the money that might be borrowed for the completion of those works. The hon. gentleman knew the value of having the country well represented, and he knew that it was well to make a favorable impression upon the minds of capitalists, and to prepare them for accepting the lowest possible rates for their money. But the hon. gentleman, Sir, contrary to the usual practice, contrary to what I would have expected on that occasion, did not test the market properly, he did not try how far the advantages that he set forth in his prospectus would affect the money market, and would improve the rate at which he might receive it. He praised the country, spoke of the condition of the country as being prosperous, and of the purposes for which the money would be applied as tending to increase the revenue and make the country better able to pay the indebtedness upon maturity. But, as I said, he did not test the effect that might have had upon the public mind, but named himself the price at which he would be willing to dispose of the bonds, fixing the price at the very lowest possible rate at that time. But, Mr. Speaker, what I meant to say was that we have been able so to improve the condition of the country and our credit abroad, that we have exchanged bonds bearing a high rate of interest for bonds bearing lower rates of interest, and thus reduced the taxation necessary to be placed upon the country in order to meet our indebtedness. It is not that our indebtedness, on the whole, has diminished; it is because we have been able, from the improved credit of the country, to make this exchange, and, notwithstanding that, we have assumed all the debts of the various Provinces that have been admitted between 1873 and 1884, amounting to $27,630,058. Add to this the expenditure for the Intercolonial and canals and other necessary public works. After all, the taxation on the people of the country, in 1885, is 3½ cts. less per head than it was in 1878. The hon. gentleman will, perhaps, claim that it was from the changed condition of the money market that this was largely due. I find, from a statement published by Mr. Giffen, statistician to the English Board of Trade, the rates of interest and the average rates of discount charged by the Bank of England, in quinquennial periods, from 1875 to 1879, the lowest rate of discount was 2 per cent. and the highest 5½. The average between those two years was 3¼; the average between 1880 and 1884 was 3¼, and the lowest was about 2 per cent. The highest in the five years was 5¼. In January, 1885, it was 4 per cent.; in March, 3½; in May, 3; on May 14th, 2½; June, 2; November 12th, 3 per cent. The hon. gentleman will see by this that from 1875 upwards the rates of discount in the Bank of England ranged from 2 to 5 per cent., and is very little less now. I have here a statement prepared by the Financial Agents at the time that Sir Leonard negotiated his loan, showing that the Canadian loan was more approved, that it commanded a higher rate upon the English market, than those of Victoria, Queensland, New Zealand and South Australia. The importance of standing well with the money markets of England cannot be over-estimated. It can only be seen when we look at the results. If we are able to go to the money market of England and place a loan at par, if we can sell a hundred dollar bond for $100 in cash, it is a great deal better for us than if we could only be able to bring back $88, or something thereabouts, as the hon. gentleman opposite did in 1874. Now, to illustrate the importance of this matter, I desire to call attention to the results. Take the unguaranteed loan of 1874, which was placed upon the market by the hon. gentleman opposite, and the unguaranteed loan of 1876. These two loans amounted to $31,633,333, and the money that he netted for them and brought back to Canada was only $23,064,770, showing a loss of $3,568,563, or about 11.28 per cent. The loan of 1885 was for $31,356,595, a sum just about equal to the two sums the hon. gentleman placed upon the English market in 1874 and 1876. This sum netted $30,930,651, showing a loss of only $425,944, or about 1.36 as against 11.28 on the hon. gentleman's two loans. The loans of 1874 and the loan of 1885 that Sir Leonard Tilley placed last summer were for the same amount, $19,466,666. The loss on the former was $2,208,329, or 11.34 per cent.; on the latter, $140,443, or about 1/7 of 1 per cent. So the House will be able to see that a great deal depends upon keeping the credit of the country in the money market well established, and it is a great advantage that our credit should stand high when we have occasion to borrow money—but I hope that our days of borrowing are pretty well over. Now, I suppose reference will be made by hon. gentlemen opposite to the condition of the United States. In undertaking public works we have to consider the amount of interest, the present burden that they impose upon us for interest, and we have to look at the result of that work, and see what it will yield to the country, how it will effect the future, and whether the expenditure will enable posterity to meet the burden of payment. We have improved the condition of the country; we have improved the credit of the country, and the rate of interest has not been unduly burdensome. We believe that the return from the public works we have undertaken to carry to completion will enable our posterity to pay the indebtedness without its being unduly felt by them, just as they have in the United States. The United States in 1865 emerged from the greatest civil war of history and with an enormous amount of indebtedness. Many a time during that struggle, men were heard to say that the country would be ruined, and they were advised to stop in their expenditure and in their efforts to maintain the Union. But they went on, they succeeded, and when they emerged from that war they had a debt of $2,773,000,000, all at high rates of interest. They had a depreciated currency and their bills were selling that year at not more than 40 or 50 cents on the dollar. But they had preserved the Union; they had a large quantity of fertile prairie in the newer territories; they had a policy of protection for home industries which gave employment at wages which drew from all parts of the world population to them. In fourteen years after they emerged from that struggle their paper money was at par; they had resumed specie payments, and they have gone on reducing their indebtedness, and the burden of that indebtedness and the burden of reducing it is not felt by the people of the United States. And so it is with us. We are just emerging from a great war against the obstacles of nature, a successful, a triumphant war, and we have removed all those obstacles and made our country one; and the same result will follow. We have created public works which will be more important factors in enabling us to redeem our indebtedness than were to the United States the honored graves of the men who fell on their battle-fields. We have for our indebtedness visible public property to represent it. When we went into Confederation in 1867 our indebtedness was $75,728,641. On the admission of Prince Edward Island and British Columbia it was increased by the debts of those Provinces and by the allowance to Manitoba, and in 1874 and 1884 additional allowances were made to all the Provinces by the assumption of the debt that was left with Ontario and Quebec. The whole of these increases amount to $27,630,058, making a total indebtedness for that of 1867 and the additions to the Provinces, $103,358,699. On 30th June the net indebtedness reached $196,407,692, or a nett increase on public works and expenditures of $93,048,993. This is a pretty large sum and it involves the payment of a pretty large amount for interest; but, as I have shown, and as I believe, it is not unduly burdensome, considering the condition of the people and the purposes to which it was expended. But, Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that the ex-Finance Minister will not very much complain of this increase of indebtedness; that he will not very much complain, at all events, of the amount that has been expended on public works. It will be in the recollection of the House that in 1874, on the delivery of his first Budget speech, he contemplated large undertakings, and proposed to increase the public indebtedness by the sum of $11,000,000. It will also be in the recollection of the House that he asked Parliament to increase the taxation of the country to the extent of $3,000,000 to meet payments for interest on the accumulated indebtedness which he had in view. That sum of $3,000,000 would have permitted him to have borrowed something like $75,000,000 at 4 per cent. without any sinking fund. And it will also be in the remembrance of the House that up to the day the hon. gentleman took office we had had very considerable surpluses, and the addition to the revenue and the surplus that existed at the time of this taking office would have paid interest on a very large expenditure for public works. At the close of the financial year 1873-74, on which he assumed office, the nett debt amounted to $108,324,965. On 30th June, 1878, it amounted to $142,990,187, showing a nett increase of $34,665,222. But the House will understand that the indebtedness incurred by hon. gentlemen opposite was more than the amount I have just named by the amount of the fishery award which was paid in the financial year in which they left office, but after they went out of office, and this reduced the amount by $4,480,882, so that the increase of indebtedness for the five years in which they were in office and for which they were responsible was $39,156,104, or a yearly average increase of $7,831,220. In order to make a comparison of the debt-creating proclivities of the two parties represented by the present Government and hon. gentlemen opposite, I may be permitted to look at the figures for which they were responsible.

Mr. CHARLTON. You are responsible for all.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman says we are responsible for all. That is a matter which we are willing to discuss on any proper occasion. I may say that the ex-Finance Minister in his first year did not evince any hesitation in increasing the indebtedness. I have shown he came down to the House and asked to be allowed to increase the indebtedness in one year by $11,000,000, more than, I think, had been attempted up to that period. The increase of indebtedness from 1867 to 1885, exclusive of the allowances to Provinces, was $93,048,483; and then hon. gentlemen opposite are accountable for $39,156,104, leaving $53,892,389 as the net increase chargeable to our right hon. leader for the thirteen years of his administration, showing an average increase of $4,145,156 against an average increase of $7,831,220 by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says we are responsible for it all, but he will find that by a comparison of the figures that when he and his friends were in power they increased the debt by $7,831,220 a year, while we on this side have, in the thirteen years, only increased it $4,145,156. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will say that I should not have deducted from this amount the $27,630,000 allowed to the old and to the new Provinces. But I take that out because the Provinces of Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, when they came in, had debts upon them, and it was merely a transfer of indebtedness to the Dominion. The Provinces of Ontario and Quebec having been relieved of that indebtedness, all the other Provinces received a proportionate amount in order to enable them to meet their local requirements. But while I do not say that we should be charged for that $27,630,000 which came from the Provinces, I do not pretend to charge it to hon. gentlemen opposite. They are, Sir, not guilty of incurring any public indebtedness for any of the Provinces. They never gave a dollar to one of the Provinces to increase their funds for local requirements. They never added a Province to the Dominion; every acre of territory that has been added to the Dominion at large, and every dollar that has been provided for the local funds of the Provinces, has been paid by our right hon. leader and his party from 1867 down to the present time. Now, Sir, I have stated that, apart from the original indebtedness of the Provinces in 1867, and apart from what we have added for the Provinces admitted, and we have assumed from the older Provinces, that increase of indebtedness to 1885 has been $93,048,000. This is represented by railways, by canals, and by public buildings, in all amounting to $142,550,875. So that taking the purposes outside and apart from the admission of the new Provinces, and the additions that we have made to the revenues of the older Provinces, we have increased the public debt $93,048,000, and have expended on public works $142,550,875. So, in addition to the increase of debt, we have expended $49,501,882 paid from annual revenue, showing a large margin of property which is held by the Dominion over and above its indebtedness to the public. The next item, Sir, in the Public Accounts of any magnitude, is sinking fund, which has now reached a very large sum, which was last year $1,482,051, the accumulations amounting to $15,885,000 as available for the redemption of the public indebtedness. I come now to another large item in the Public Accounts, and I am disposed to ask the House to bear with me a little, because I find in respect to this item that there has been a great change, or there has been a new manifestation of opinion—I do not say of public opinion, but of party opinion—in respect to that item. We saw it announced last autumn that a convention of the Liberal party was to be held in the city of Toronto. That convention was held, and it was spoken of by the organ of the party as being a large and representative convention. I turn to the Globe of the 16th of September, and I find an editorial headed as follows:—

“Young Liberals—Getting fairly down to work—The work of the day—Resolutions adopted by the convention—Hon. E. Blake elected Hon. President.”

That article said:

“The most sanguine hopes of the young men who originated the idea of a Convention of Young Liberals from all parts of the Province, and who have for the past few months been working to promote the movement throughout the country, were far exceeded yesterday morning as groups after groups of members presented themselves at the doors of Shaftesbury Hall to attend the convention. The observer could not fail to notice the alert, active bearing of the delegates, and their general look of keen intelligence. It may be said without offensiveness toward any other gathering that there never before has been in Toronto or probably in the Dominion an assemblage pervaded by a more thoroughly Canadian air. While there was plenty of life, there was little boisterousness, and while the utmost good humour and courtesy prevailed, there was manifested a most business-like intolerance of anything that seemed to tend toward sectionalism, hobby-riding, or the indulgence in fads of any kind. All appeared to fully realise that they were not here for mere amusement or child's play, but to discuss soberly and conscientiously the political situation of the country.”

Now, with such an announcement as this, and with the description of such an assemblage as this, I think it but right that the doings of that assembly should receive some consideration at the hands of the country and of myself on this occasion. On the following day the same paper said:

“The young Liberal Convention resumed session at 9 o'clock this morning, the newly elected president, Mr. A. F. McIntyre, in the chair. The delegates were punctual and the attendance larger than the previous day.”

In the Globe of the preceding day, the names of a large number of gentlemen are given. I do not know many of them, but I happen to know the president, Mr. McIntyre, and I am sure he is not engaged in anything like hobby-riding or fads of any kind, and I take it this means serious business. I find the Globe of the following day announcing as follows:—

“The Liberal Convention, which closed its meetings on Wednesday, was all which its most sanguine friends could have wished it to be. The attendance was large and thoroughly representative; the speaking exceptionally good; the orderliness and business tact displayed such as the most fastidious could not object to; while the most absolute freedom of discussion was maintained throughout. Motions were only voted down after those in their favor had been fully heard. However much any of the speakers might be out of accord with the general sentiment and feeling of the meeting, they still received patient and courteous attention to the close, and while their arguments and utterances were treated with perfect frankness, there was no attempt made either unduly to weaken the force of these or to belittle their importance.

“Nothing was more conspicuous throughout than the uniform good temper displayed, as well as the readiness with which the points were taken, and the frank cordiality with which, as far as possible, concessions were acquiesced in, and a full yet moderate and soundly Liberal programme agreed upon. There was little or no crankiness; no settled determination to ride hobbies;”—

You see that on the first day it was announced that no hobbies were to be ridden, and that at the close it was stated that no hobbies had been ridden.

“no persistent effort to carry at all hazards any particular or personal fad; no resolution to lead; no apparent desire, even, to shine. It was a business meeting, and was accordingly conducted in a practical, business-like style.

“To say that it was ‘captured’ by any clique or coterie whatever would be absurdly out of accordance with facts. The convention would neither stultify nor compromise itself by going further than the majority of its members approved of, or by stopping short of what that majority believed to be indisputable. If once or twice the tail sought to shake the dog, the dog simply refused to be shaken, and the tail then accepted the situation and subsided, if it did not perhaps altogether acquiesce.”

Mr. McLELAN.

Now, I find that the sentiments of that convention were participated in by the Club Nationale of Montreal, which sent this:

“The Club Nationale, Montreal, sends greetings, and wishes success to your movement. Let your platform be a broad one. Our aspirations are alike. They may to-day alarm many because of their boldness, but ideas ripen as quick as men, and with pluck and energy we may live to harvest what we sow in the political field.—R. DANDURAND, President.”

To this the president of the convention replied:

“The Young Men's Liberal Association of Ontario in convention assembled heartily accepts the fraternal greeting, good wishes and counsels of the Club Nationale as conveyed by your telegram and Mayor Beaugrand. We are trying to arrange for a Dominion Convention at Montreal, with a view to further the cause which you and we have so earnestly at heart. The platform we have adopted is practical and progressive, and our sentiments are largely in consonance with yours.—A. F. MCINTYRE, President.”

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have read one of these headings in which it was declared that the Hon. E. Blake, the leader of his party, was elected honorary president of that organisation. I find that the hon. gentleman accepted the honor, and accepted the platform that was laid down there, and he took occasion to announce that in his celebrated speech at London. On that occasion Mr. Blake said:

“I thank you, from the bottom of my heart I thank you, for the warmth and cordiality of your reception. I know it to be far beyond any poor deserts of mine, but it is another and most marked expression of that continuous, abiding and unbounded kindness and confidence which has been showered on me by the Liberal party for these many years, and especially during those dark and trying times which have passed since I took the lead. Will you allow me to use this my earliest opportunity to congratulate the Liberals of Ontario on the activity they are now displaying, and particularly to express my joy at the energetic conduct and successful organisation of the young Liberals—(cheers)—and my grateful thanks for the honor done me by my election to the honorary presidency of their great convention, a gathering from which I anticipate the best results.”

The hon. leader of the Opposition there accepts the presidency of the organisation formed at that convention, and accepts the platform which was adopted there. I was under the impression, Sir, that there was but one opinion upon the matter to which I have referred among the whole people of this Dominion. I find that one of the resolutions—and I only deal with the one bearing on the matter I have now in hand—reads thus:

“Resolved, That this convention disapproves of the payment of subsidies out of the Dominion Treasury to the Provincial Legislatures, believing that the system of subsidies leads to extravagance on the part of the Provincial Legislatures, because they have the power of expending money without the responsibility of imposing taxes; also, the subsidy system as carried out in Canada causes the bulk of the revenues to be collected by indirect taxation, whereas direct taxation is more just and more economical. Therefore, resolved that this convention approves of such a change in the British North America Act as shall provide that each Province of the Confederation shall collect as well as expend its own revenues.”

Now, this is so important a proposition that I thought it desirable to call the attention of the House to the matter at this stage of my review of the accounts. We are now paying out to the several Provinces about $4,000,000. The platform adopted by the Opposition gentlemen, and accepted by the leader of the Opposition, declares that it is unwise and unjust that we should continue the payment of these subsidies, and that the Provincial Legislatures should be taught to resort to direct taxation in order to raise the revenues they require, so that they may be taught economy in their expenditure. Now, I have no doubt this will greatly relieve hon. gentlemen opposite, should they ever come to power. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) would find it a considerable relief to his estimates if he could have that plank of the Opposition platform adopted by the country, and could strike out of his estimates the $4,000,000 that we now provide for subsidies. But until that time comes, and until the hon. gentleman can persuade the country to accept that doctrine and resort to direct taxation for local purposes, we shall have to provide in our Estimates for Provincial subsidies under the British North America Act, and, I think, for some considerable time we shall be called upon to do so. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have not been influenced in this matter, because I have provided in the Estimates for 1886-87 for the payments of the subsidies to the Local Legislatures. Coming then to the expenditures for public works charged to revenue, they amount to $2,302,362, for which, as I am sure hon. gentlemen who have seen the works constructed by that department know, we have value, and they were called for by the wants of the country. The post office has been for some years increasing the charges upon our revenue. In the opening up of the North-West, it was necessary that we should give postal accommodation to large districts in which there was very little return; but, notwithstanding we were called upon to make extraordinary expenses in furnishing additional accommodation, the receipts from the Post Office Department compare most favorably with those of preceding years. In 1884, there was a falling off of the revenue which has been made up by the returns of 1885; and so far in the present year, there seems to be a similar increase. I may be permitted, in this connection, to give a few statistics by way of comparison:—In 1878, we had 5,378 post offices; in 1885 we had 7,084, an increase of 1,706. The miles of post route in 1878 were 38,730, and, in 1885, 50,461; or an increase of 11,731. The letters sent in 1878 amounted to 44,000,000, and in 1885, 63,400,000, showing an increase of 24,400,000. The money order post offices in 1878 numbered 769, and in 1885, 885, an increase of 116. The amount of money orders issued in 1878 was $7,130,895, and in 1885, $10,384,210, an increase of $3,253,315. There has been an increase in the letters sent of 24,400,000, or 55.45 per cent. between 1878 and 1885; and I find, on comparing our returns with the postal returns of older countries—with those of Great Britain, for instance—that our percentage of increase has been very much larger than the percentage in that older established country; as in 1878, the letters despatched in Great Britain were 1,058,000,000, and in 1885, 1,360,000,000, showing an increase of 302,000,000, or 28.54 per cent. against our increase of 55.45 per cent.; so that we have an increase nearly double that of Great Britain. The increase of the receipts and expenditures may be compared also. Our receipts in 1878 amounted to $1,207,790, and in 1885 to $1,841,372, an increase of $633,582, or 52.46 per cent. Our expenditure in 1878 amounted to $1,724,933, and in 1885 to $2,488,315, an increase of $763,377, or 44.25 per cent. Thus our receipts from the Post Office since 1878 increased 52 per cent., while our expenditure increased only 44.25 per cent. Between 1874 and 1878 a similar comparison might be made. The receipts from 1874 to 1878 increased but 5.94 per cent., while the expenses increased 24.34 per cent., so that, although between 1874 and 1878 the expenditure showed a much greater percentage of increase than the receipts, the increase of receipts between 1878 and 1885 more than counterbalanced the increase of expenditure. The increase of traffic on our railways and canals has also called for a very large expenditure, which tends to swell the volume of the estimates, without at all affecting the taxation of the country. I may be permitted to refer to the increase in the traffic at another time, but I say the large expenditure which we are called upon to make in the working of the Intercolonial Railway and of our canals, has tended to increase the volume of expenditure shown in the Public Accounts, without at all increasing the taxation of the country. Yet it has been attempted to convey the impression that all this increase of volume in the accounts is an increase in taxation. I have shown that the receipts from sources which are not taxation, have, since 1878, very largely increased, running from $4,000,000 up to between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000. If we were to-morrow to take possession of all the telegraph lines in the country, and were to send messages at less rates than are now charged, the volume of our accounts would be largely increased, while there would, perhaps, be a gain to the people and consequently less taxation, owing to the reduced rates which we might charge for the messages. In this case as in the others, the volume of public expenditure might be largely increased, and it might with the same propriety be misrepresented to show there was a large increase in the taxation of the country, although in reality there was a decrease. A great deal has been said on the hustings with reference to our position in 1867, and I have been reminded of the charge which has been so persistently and continuously made against us in connection with the increase of our expenditure from 1867 to 1885. It may not be unprofitable, then, to go back to 1867 and make some comparisons between the expenditure in that year of some $13,000,000 and the expenditure of 1885; so that we may see wherein there has been a great increase, and in what way, if any, we are amenable to the charge of having unduly increased the expenditure. I have pointed out that the receipts from Railways, public works and post offices, and other sources, none of which are taxation any more than would be the expenditure on telegraph lines, have nearly doubled since 1878, whilst from 1867 they have very nearly quadrupled. In 1867, the receipts were $1,987,240, and in 1885 they were $7,869,809, showing an increase in receipts of $5,818,842, and the expenses have correspondingly increased. Now, the increases for working these services, I think, should be fairly taken out of the accounts before we institute the comparison. I have shown that the hon. gentlemen opposite are as chargeable with having increased the public indebtedness of the country as gentlemen on this side, and, at all events, if they are not, I have shown that we have good property and good value for the expenditure that we have made, and that therefore the charge for interest might also be eliminated from the accounts before we go to work on the comparison. Then there is the increase of subsidies to the Local Governments. We have brought in new Provinces, we have increased the subsidies that we have paid, and I do not think that that increase, at least, should be chargeable against us. We have added new territory, and we have been compelled to incur new expenses which were not in the accounts of 1867—I mean expenses in the North-West. Now, if we take from the accounts all such expenses as I have referred to, we come down to the increases in the ordinary workings of Government, of which the hon. gentlemen have a right to complain if we have unduly increased them since 1867. First, dealing with the interest in its gross charge, and excluding the receipts, there is an increase in 1885 over 1867-8, without management, of $4,917,914. On construction and repairs of public works there is an increase of $2,423,300, and, as I have said, we have visible property for this, so that this may come out. The increase on the working expenses of railways and canals, which is not a charge to taxation, is $2,840,745. The increase for the post office is $1,871,513; subsidies to the new Provinces, $1,205,360; the increase in the sinking fund, and discounts and exchange, is $1,207,963; on immigration and quarantine, and on services in connection with the North-West Territory, $717,836. The protection and the cultivation of fisheries and the payment of the fishing bounty is a new service, which, I assume, will be approved very generally by the House, and in that the increase is $250,000. Then there are those services which are entirely new, the mounted police, Dominion lands, Indians in the North-West and in British Columbia, and the Government of the North-West, amounting to $2,331,929. Then there is a charge of $1,791,851 for the trouble in the North-West, in the accounts of 1885. Taking out these special items, these special increases, from the accounts of 1885, we have left civil government, legislation, administration of justice, the maintenance of the penitentiaries, the collection of

Customs all the way from Halifax to Victoria, the collection of Excise, the militia and defence of the country, the maintenance of lights, buoys and fog alarms, marine hospitals, distressed seamen, steamboat and insurance inspection, pensions, management of the public debt, and miscellaneous services in regard to all of which we might make a comparison with 1867; and in making this comparison it must be borne in mind that we are governing, we are legislating for, and administering justice to a country ten times larger than it was in 1867, that we are collecting twenty millions of revenue from Customs instead of eight, and six millions from Excise instead of three, and that all the other services are proportionately increased; and yet the figures show only an increase in the expenditure of a little over two millions of dollars in eighteen years. If you take the total expenditure of 1884-85, $35,037,060, and deduct the increase upon the special services which I have named as proper to be taken out, $19,469,658, you have left $15,567,402; from which take the expenditure of 1867-68, $13,486,092, and you have for eighteen years an increase upon all the services I have named of only $2,081,310. I say that, looking at the changes in the country, looking at the increased area and the increased business we have been doing, there is not a country in the world that has shown so little increase in all these matters connected with the civil government of the country as the Dominion of Canada has during that period. If we go to the United States we find that the expenditure in 1867 was $51,110,224—that is exclusive of army, navy, pensions, war, Indians and the interest. In 1885 it had risen to $37,494,000, an increase of $36,000,000, without any increase of area at all such as we have. So, as I said, there is not, perhaps, in the history of the world, an instance in which a country has extended her operations so largely, has increased the responsibilities and duties of government so much, and has not increased her expenses more than the Dominion of Canada. I might take up any one of the services to which I have referred, and show what an enormous increase there has been in all the departments. I might be permitted, perhaps, to detain the House for a few moments, in order to refer to the lighthouse and coast service, and to show what an enormous increase there has been in that service, as an illustration of the increase there has been in every department of the public service. In 1867 the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) took charge of the lighthouse and buoy service of the Dominion, and of the lights existing at Confederation. The number then was 227 lighthouses, and two fog alarms, and the expenditure was $174,982. The hon. gentleman saw the importance of that service, and with that vigor of intellect and that energy for which he is so distinguished in this House or out of it, gave that energy and that vigor of intellect to the improvement of that service, and I am sure it could not have been better employed than in improving and facilitating the navigation of the country and in providing means to render life and property more secure than it was in 1867, when he took charge of it. When he went out in 1873-74, he had increased the lights to 384, and the fog alarms to eighteen—an increase of 157 lights in the comparatively short time during which he administered the department. The hon. gentleman had successors in Sir Albert Smith and the Hon. Mr. Pope, and, when they left office, the number of lights had increased to 553. When I took charge of the department, I supposed, looking at the large increase, that there would be no additions required, but the new services, the opening up of the country, and the increased shipping to all parts of the country, called for additions even to the large number that had been already made. When I left that department, a few months ago, I left it with the number increased to 617, and with an expenditure of $530,446. That expenditure, Sir, covered the construction of the lighthouses of the year, it covered the maintenance of the 617 lighthouses that were then in operation, all the buoy service, with the addition of the coast service, and the maintenance of the different fog alarms that had largely been increased throughout the country. I only refer to this to illustrate the extent of the service that we are called upon to deal with in the government of the country. Notwithstanding that the work has so largely increased, I have shown to the House that in the eighteen years, comparing 1867 with 1885, there has been an increase of slightly over two million dollars, which is unequalled, I say, in the history of any other country in the world; and I anticipate that in the eighteen years to come we shall not be called upon to make even so large an increase as this to the ordinary expenditure of government, because we shall not be increasing our area and adding new Provinces so largely as we have done.

After Recess.

Mr. McLELAN. When the House rose at six o'clock, I was speaking of the expenditure as shown in the accounts of 1885. Without going back to that subject let me dwell for a moment upon the accounts of the current year 1885-86. The current year has been so far characterised by several disturbing elements to trade and revenue. We had in the early part of the year the North-West trouble, we had the effects of the anticipation of the revenue that had been made through Excise, we had the disturbance of trade which occurred in the city of Montreal, owing to the small pox epidemic which disturbed, to a large extent, and for a considerable time, the trade of that great commercial metropolis. All these things have had their effect on the trade of the country, and upon the revenues that were derived. At the present time, Sir, we stand fairly well. Taking out North-West expenditure and putting that aside, we had up to the 20th March, when the return was made, a total expenditure of $25,958,481. Of this there has been charged to the war expenses $2,502,936, leaving as the ordinary expenditure $23,455,545. The receipts from all sources up to the same date have been $24,030,060, or a surplus at the present time, or up to the 20th of March, of $574,515. That is very well as far as it goes, but we have very considerable expenditure to meet during the year in the shape of interest and other items, which I fear will not leave the balance at the end of the year at all so favorable. Looking at the expenditure of 1885-86, it will be seen that the detailed amounts of supply during the last Session on account of the consolidated fund, amount to $35,275,000. Taking out of this sum $2,300,000 estimated as the expenditure in connection with the North-West rebellion, the ordinary expenditure as estimated was $32,975,000. This will have to be supplemented by an addition for the interest on the public debt of $730,000. The amount included in the estimate of 1885-86 for new loans and other indebtedness was $2,250,000, of which the amount for new loans was placed at $1,180,000, representing a capital of $47,000,000, from which deduct the amount of the 5 per cent. consolidated loan of $31,371,000. This leaves an amount of $15,627,000 for new loans. After the 5 per cent. loan was converted into a 4 per cent. there was borrowed $19,446,666, and there was a temporary loan of $5,835,000, and an increase in the deposits in the savings bank of $4,442,203. It will be seen that there was thus borrowed the sum of $14,125,000 more than we covered by the estimate. The interest on this amount will be $565,000, and is required in order to cover the subsidies given to the Province of Quebec of $119,000, which was not estimated for, and $471,000 the interest on the 5 per cent. stock which was converted into 4 per cent., for which only one-half the interest was calculated by Sir Leonard when he made his estimates. There was also a further increase in the sinking fund which was not estimated for, being a year's payment on the reduced loan. Those who have studied carefully the Public Accounts of that year will find that Sir Leonard Tilley did not take an estimate for sinking fund for the loan which he converted from 5 per cent. into 4 per cent., I suppose his intention being to issue a new loan and issue it without a sinking fund. It was converted on the same conditions as regards sinking fund, and we shall have to provide for that $470,000. The other ordinary expenditures on account of public works, post office, lighthouse, coast, militia, Franchise Act, and other services charged to the consolidated fund, will amount to $1,500,000, giving a total to be added to the ordinary expenditure of about $2,700,000.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What amount will be required for the Franchise Act?

Mr. McLELAN. That amount we shall be able to estimate more closely later on. These sums show an estimated payment to be made during the year somewhere in the neighborhood of \$38,500,000, from which if we deduct what we expect to be required and what we have in this estimate, including an amount for expenses in the North-West, \$3,500,000, there will remain \$35,000,000 as the ordinary expenditure to be provided for. It is estimated from what we have received up to the present time, that the receipts under the respective heads will be as follows: We had received up to yesterday from Customs \$14,499,664. We estimate to receive sufficient to make the sum amount to \$19,500,000. From Excise we have received \$5,171,000, and we expect to receive \$6,250,000. From the other sources, post office, railways, &c., we expect to obtain for the year \$7,800,000. All these sums, deducted from what we estimated to be the expenditure, will leave, on the year's business a deficit of \$1,450,000. This, as I said at the outset, should be divided between the two years of 1885 and 1886, inasmuch as a part of the revenue due to the present year has been anticipated and gone to the credit of 1885. Coming to the Estimates submitted to the House for 1886-87 I desire to say that, so far as I have found it possible, I have estimated in full for every service we are called upon to meet, except, perhaps, public works, and there are so many claims, so many demands, and apparently with good reason, made upon that department, that, until the House rises, it is almost impossible to say how much will be required for that service. My hon. colleague, the Minister of Public Works, is so anxious to meet the wishes of all the representatives of the people that it is difficult to say when his demands upon the Treasury will be all in. Taking the several items in detail I have a few observations to offer. The main increase arises in the public debt service. The increase in the interest on the public debt is estimated at \$118,636, this arising mainly from the increased deposits in the savings banks. There has been during the past year considerable discussion in the public press respecting the rate of interest which the Government should pay to savings bank depositors, and it seems to be a question which is growing in importance, and one upon which I think the hon. gentleman opposite has taken the view that we should reduce the interest upon deposits in the savings banks. The Government, having considered this question, does not come to that conclusion. We believe it is in the interest of the country at large that every encouragement should be given to the middle class, to the laboring class, to practice habits of economy and save their earnings as much as possible; and for this reason we are reluctant to reduce the rate and we think it would be an injustice to them to reduce the rate of interest we are at present paying to such depositors in the savings banks. We have examined into the practice in other countries. We find that in England a higher rate of interest is paid by the Government than is paid in the commercial banks of the country. We find that in several of the States—the States of New York, Maine and Massachusetts—5 per cent. is allowed to be paid; and taking all these matters into consideration, and considering mainly the fact that it is desirable to encourage the working classes to be economical, saving and thrifty in their habits, we have refused to come down to Parliament with a proposition to reduce the rate of interest in the savings banks. More especially is this the case when we are paying for the money we have borrowed abroad, for a large portion of the public debt of the country, a higher rate than we are paying to depositors in the savings banks. I have had a statement prepared showing the rates of interest we are paying upon the loans we have effected since 1874, and although the nominal rate is 4 per cent., yet when we take into account the charges made by the agents in London, also the discount made upon those loans, it appears we are actually paying for the money we have obtained in England and abroad, a higher rate of interest than we are paying to our own depositors in the savings banks. Taking the several loans, from 1874 to 1885, I find we have borrowed \$124,796,598. Upon that sum there was a discount, to which I referred in the early part of my observations to the House, of \$5,965,040. So while we have borrowed \$124,000,000 odd, and we owe for that and are paying interest upon it, and some time we shall have to pay the capital; but we did not receive that much money, nearly \$6,000,000 less, so that the annual interest on the gross amount of those loans is \$4,991,863. Then take one-half of 1 per cent. added as commission for paying interest, and it makes the total amount per annum to interest, \$5,016,823, and an actuarial calculation shows that including charges the rate which the Government pays on these loans is nearly $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Now, the returns of the working of the post office savings banks show that the cost, including interest and expenses, is $4\frac{1}{6}$ per cent., and a statement has been prepared of the amount in the savings banks under the control of the Finance Department, which shows that the expenses and interest amount to 4.22 per cent.; the average of both is 4.16, or $\frac{1}{6}$ of 1 per cent. less than is paid to the foreign lender. The Government thinks that it is unfair, while we are paying that rate of interest abroad, that we should not pay the same rate of interest to the working classes of our own country, and encourage them, as I said before, to habits of thrift and economy, and to lay by something for a rainy day. It is a question which has been raised as to whether the amount received from any one depositor may not be decreased—and some changes are likely to be proposed—but otherwise we propose to let the matter remain as it is. Sinking fund shows an addition of \$504,407, chiefly made up by the restoration of the sinking fund for the 4 per cent. reduced loan which was emitted last year. I need not weary the House by going over all the particulars respecting the small increases which have been made in the public service or that are proposed to be made in the various branches. Every care and economy has been exercised in order to reduce them as low as possible. I said in the outset that we had estimated largely for those services which usually come down to the House as Supplementary Estimates, and which include larger amounts than appear in the original Estimates. The Indian vote is increased to \$170,539, and I expect that will fully cover all the wants of that service. The mounted police vote has also been increased. There is no large increase in the collection of revenue service. It will be noticed that there is a reduction in the superannuation service of \$10,000. This arises from the fact that the superannuation service was rather over-estimated last year. This is an item which I think deserves some explanation to the House and to the country, because I find that the working of the Superannuation Act has been largely misrepresented—I do not mean to say intentionally misrepresented, but misunderstood. Hon.

gentlemen looking at the Public Accounts, see as the rates from the superannuation fund perhaps $50,000; they see that the charge is made out, say, $200,000, and they suppose, as a matter of course, that the superannuation is a tax upon the country of $150,000 a year. I submitted to the House, on the opening of Parliament, a statement of the operation of the Act during the past year, showing that taking the superannuations made for the year 1835, there has been a saving of $5,691; that is, that the superannuation allowance amounted to $18,360, the gratuities to different persons $2,568, and the new annual appointments $15,763, making a total of $36,692, whilst the salaries previously received by the persons superannuated amounted to $42,384, showing a saving by the operation of the Act of $5,691. But next year and in the other accounts, the particulars of this statement will drop out, and, as I said, all a person will see in examining the operations of the Act will be that we receive from the civil service $50,000, say, and we pay out $200,000, or that there has been a loss in the operation of $150,000. Now, this has not been the case from the passing of the Act up to the present time. If you examine all the appointments that have been made at lower salaries and if you ascertain all the vacancies by persons who have been superannuated and their offices not filled, you will find that there has been a large saving to the country through the operation of that Act. In 1880 the Finance Department went through the whole service and made a calculation showing the branches in which there had been a saving and those in which there had been a loss to the country from the operations of the Act. The Department of Finance showed a saving of $48,548.73; the Department of Agriculture, $18,000; the Inland Revenue Department, $42,570; the Department of Public Works, $21,000; the Department of Marine and Fisheries, $30,000; Secretary of State, $5,482; Department of the Interior, $6,893; Customs, $177,398. In the Department of Railways and Canals there had been a loss up to that time of $23,025; Militia and Defence, $3,725; Post Office, $6,000, or a gross saving of $350,183, from which deduct the loss in the three departments, and you have still a saving of $317,325, through the operation of the Superannuation Act up to that time. I have had in my own department the work continued down to the present date, and I find that for the inside service only the operations show a still favorable result to the country in a saving of over $40,000, and that through the continuous operation of that Act a large saving will be effected to the country in general. Then, Sir, I come to other savings which I propose to effect this year, but I need not weary the House by going through them all. The total result of my estimates is before the House, showing them to be $33,124,550. Now, I come to the other side of the account—the estimated receipts for the years 1886-87. I do not propose—I do not think it necessary—to make any very great change in the tariff in order to make up that sum, and in order to set something aside to meet the deficit which has arisen from the disturbance of trade and from the troubles we have experienced in the North-West during the past year. My chief alterations will be changes from ad valorem to specific duties where I find it practicable or advisable to do so. There has been during the past two years a large decline in the price of foreign goods as well as in the price of home productions; but in consequence of depression in other countries—greater depression, I must say, than exists in our own country—there has been a considerable slaughter of goods in other countries, and a great many difficulties have arisen in the Custom house in arriving at the proper values for entry. With specific duties that difficulty would be largely obviated; and I have in several cases to propose to the House changes in that direction, in order to overcome that difficulty and to lessen the inducement to parties abroad to send in goods with false invoices. Such change as I propose to make other than this will be upon articles which I think may fairly be considered as luxuries for the middle ranks of life, but they will not affect the workmen, and, therefore, will not give hon. gentlemen opposite any great inducement to increase their cry that we are grinding the poor man down by the burdens of our taxation. I may then, Sir, read to the House the changes that I propose to ask the House to make; and when we are in committee, that will, perhaps, be the better time to give the detailed information respecting the different items:

Almonds, shelled, a specific duty of 5 cents per lb.

Almonds, not shelled, and nuts of all kinds not elsewhere specified, a specific duty of 3 cents per lb.

Baking powder, a specific duty of 6 cents per lb.

Boxes, cases and writing desks, fancy and ornamental, and fancy manufactures of bone, shell, horn and ivory, also dolls and toys of all kinds and materials; ornaments of alabaster, spar, terra cotta or composition, statuettes, beads and bead ornaments, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

These articles which I have enumerated may be called luxuries, and yet they stood on our tariff at a lower percentage than many other articles that entered into more general use, and I ask the House to increase the duty on this description of goods.

Bolts, nuts, washers and rivets of iron or steel, a specific duty of 1 cent per lb. and 15 per cent. ad valorem.

Blueing—Laundry blueing of all kinds, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Cider, a specific duty of 10 cents per Imperial gallon.

This was rated formerly at 20 per cent., which amounted to about 3 cents per gallon.

Cordage—Manilla and sisal cordage of all kinds, a specific duty of 1½ cents per lb. and 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Dessicated cocoanut, sweetened or not, a specific duty of 6 cents per lb.

Feathers, ostrich and vulture, undressed, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Feathers, ostrich and vulture, dressed, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Fruit, dried, viz.: Raisins, a specific duty of 1 cent per lb., and 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Fruit, dried, viz.: Currants, dates, figs, prunes, and all other dried fruits not elsewhere specified, a specific duty of 1 cent per lb.

Fruit, green, viz.: Blackberries, gooseberries, raspberries, and strawberries, a specific duty of 4 cents per lb., the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty.

Peaches, a specific duty of 1 cent per lb., the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty.

Gimps, cords, braids, ribbons and bindings, when imported by hat manufacturers for use in their factories, 15 per cent. ad valorem.

Gas, water and soil pipes of cast iron, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Gloves and mitts of all kinds, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Hair cloth of all kinds, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Harness and saddlery of every description and parts of the same, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Laces, braids, fringes, embroideries, cords, tassels and bracelets, also braids, chains or cords of hair, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Lead pipe and lead shot, a specific duty of 1½ cents per lb.

Oleomargarine, butterine or other substitute for butter, a specific duty of 10 cents per lb.

We propose also to put an Excise duty of 8 cents per lb. upon that article manufactured in Canada.

Printed or dyed cotton fabrics not elsewhere specified, 27½ per cent. ad valorem.

Spirits and strong waters, not having been sweetened or mixed with any article so that the degree of strength thereof cannot be ascertained by Syke's hydrometer, for every Imperial gallon of the strength of proof and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof, and for every greater or less quantity than a gallon, viz.: Geneva gin, rum, whiskey, alcohol or spirits of wine and unenumerated, unmixed and not sweetened spirits by whatever name called, a specific duty of $1.75 per Imperial gallon.

Spirits and strong waters, mixed with any ingredients, and although thereby coming under the denomination of proprietary medicines, tinctures, essences, extracts or any other denomination, including medicinal elixirs and fluid extracts, whether in bulk or bottle, not elsewhere specified, shall be nevertheless deemed to be spirits or strong waters, and subject to duty as such, a specific duty of $2 per Imperial gallon and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

So far as liquors are concerned the increase has been upon Old Tom, otherwise explanatory of the resolutions of last year and the year before.

Cologne water and perfumed spirits in bottles or flasks, not weighing more than 4 ounces each, 50 per cent. ad valorem.

Cologne water and perfumed spirits, in bottles, flasks or other packages, weighing more than 4 ounces each, a specific duty of $2 per Imperial gallon, and 40 per cent. ad valorem.

Tubing, wrought iron, plain, 2 inches in diameter or under, coupled and threaded or not, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Wire, iron or steel, galvanized or not, 15 gauge and coarser, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Whips of all kinds, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Wire fencing, buckthorn, strip and other similar fencing of iron or steel, a specific duty of 1½ cents per lb.

Yeast cakes and compressed yeast, in packages or bulk of 1 lb. and over, a specific duty of 6 cents per lb.

Yeast cakes, in packages of less than 1 lb., a specific duty of 8 cents per lb.

Portland and Roman cements to be classed with all other cement, at specific rates as now provided.

Now, I come to the question of sugar. Those who have studied the returns of past years will see that the revenue from sugar has been gradually declining. We did not impose so large a duty as was imposed in 1877-78. The revenue derived from sugar, under the tariff of 1877-78, was $2.39 per 100 lbs. Under the new tariff the revenue, in 1881, was $1.80. In 1882, the value of sugar had slightly declined, and the ad valorem duty gave a less return, namely, $1.69; in 1883, it was $1.61; in 1884, $1.50; and in 1885, $1.87 per 100 lbs. We propose to ask the House first to change the mode of testing the value of sugar. There has been a good deal of discussion upon this question with refiners of the different Provinces, some of whom have made complaints that favor has been shown to refiners in other Provinces which were not shown to themselves. I do not find that there has been any great ground for this complaint. I think that the officers of Customs have discharged their duty very faithfully, and when a comparison of the returns is made, it is seen that there is very little difference, an almost imperceptible difference, in the returns from the various refineries throughout the country. But I find that in the United States, all sugars are sold by the polariscope test, that the refiners of this country test their sugars, price them, and sell them by the polariscope test; and I think, from the satisfaction this has given abroad and from the contentions that arise under the old test, the color test, it is advisable to ask the House to adopt the polariscope test, and to name a specific duty for all refining sugars, which will be an average of the rates received between 1875 and 1881. What, then, I propose, is to ask the House to impose these duties:

On sugar, melado, concentrated melado, concentrated cane juice, concentrated molasses, concentrated beet-root juice and concrete, when imported direct from the country of growth and production, for refining purposes only, not over No. 13 Dutch standard in color, and not testing over seventy degrees by the polariscope, a specific duty of 1 cent per lb., and for every additional degree or fraction of a degree shown by polariscope test ¾ cents per 100 lbs. additional.

I may explain that the American tariff imposes a duty of $1.40 per 100 lbs. for the test of seventy-five degrees, and charges 4 cents for every degree above seventy-five. What we have taken is a little over three-fourths of the American tariff, reducing everything about the same proportion, so as to charge a trifle over three-fourths of the American duty.

On sugar not for refining purposes, not over No. 13 Dutch standard in color, when imported direct from the country of growth and production, a specific duty of 1 cent per lb. and 30 per cent. ad valorem on the value thereof free-on-board at the last port of shipment.

On all sugars above No. 13 Dutch standard in color, and on refined sugar of all kinds, grades or standards, 1½ cents per lb., and 35 per cent. ad valorem on the value thereof free-on-board at the last port of shipment.

On all sugars, not imported direct, without transshipment from country of growth and production, there shall be levied and collected an additional duty of 7½ per cent. of the whole duty so otherwise payable thereon.

That is, in the case of indirect shipments, the duty shall first be ascertained under the rates named, and then 7½ per cent. of the duty shall be added for that. We have always had in our tariff that distinction between direct and indirect shipments.

Provided that when any cargo of sugar for refining purposes is found to grade, to the extent of not over 15 per cent. of the whole, above No. 13, Dutch standard in color, the whole of said cargo may be admitted to entry by polariscope test, as above provided for refining purposes only.

Syrups, cane juice, refined syrup, sugar house syrup or sugar house molasses, syrup of sugar, syrup of molasses or sorghum, whether imported direct or not, a specific duty of 1 cent per lb. and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Molasses, other, when imported direct, without transshipment, and from the country of growth and production, 15 per cent. ad valorem.

Molasses, when not so imported, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

The value upon which the ad valorem duty shall be levied and collected upon all the above named syrups and molasses shall be the value thereof free-on-board at the last port of shipment.

Provided that molasses, when imported for or received into any refinery or sugar factory, or to be used for any other purpose than actual consumption, shall be subject to, and there shall be levied and collected thereon, an additional duty of 5 cents per Imperial gallon.

Provided that the change in the rates of duty on sugars and molasses shall apply only to importations arriving in Canada on and after the 31st day of March, instant, and not to such articles warehoused prior to that date.

Sugar candy, brown or white, and confectionery, a specific duty of 1½ cents per pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Then, I propose to amend schedule "B," the list of goods which are entitled to be entered free of duty, by substituting the following provisions for the following items:—

Articles for the personal use of consuls general who are natives or citizens of the country they represent and who are not engaged in any other business or profession.

It has been found that a great many consuls have been appointed, and that several of them are engaged in other business and claim to have articles for their use entered free of duty. This is to explain the provision, and to confine it to consuls general, who are natives or citizens of the country they represent, and not engaged in any business.

Borax, in lump; grease, the refuse of animal fat; iron and steel, old and scrap, but nothing shall be deemed scrap iron or steel, except waste or refuse iron or steel that has been in actual use, and fit only to be re-manufactured; sumac, crude.

Then we strike out from the free list, iron sand or globules and dry putty for polishing granite. These are articles that are being manufactured now in our own country.

Philosophical instruments and apparatus, including globes, &c.

These have been on the free list for a great many years, and all the schools have been compelled to go abroad for such articles, and it has been found that many of the globes and maps imported have been specially designed for the country in which they are manufactured, and that special prominence is given to that country upon them. For a year or two, in Toronto, and I think in Montreal also, there have been gentlemen engaged in the manufacture of globes and philosophical instruments for schools, and, with the sanction of the superintendents of schools in Ontario—at least some of them from whom I have heard—it is proposed to encourage the manufacture, so that there may be a supply of those instruments within reasonable reach, instead of the trouble of sending abroad for them being necessary. Then, it is proposed to amend schedule "D" relating to prohibited articles, by striking out the item relating to copy-right works, and substituting the following in lieu thereof, namely:—

Reprints of Canadian copyright works, and reprints of British copyright works which have been also copyrighted in Canada.

There is another resolution declaring that it is expedient to provide for an Excise duty of eight cents a pound on oleomargarine, butterine, or other substitute for butter, manufactured in Canada. These, so far, are the propositions which we have to-night to submit to the House. Now, assuming that these are assented to by the House, I think that we may reasonably expect that the revenue during the year 1886-87 will be as follows: I may say, first, that I am not counting upon the full benefit of any changes that I have proposed here, that I am not counting upon any very large increase to the Customs revenue of the country during 1886-87. We have had, or we are to have, the Canadian Pacific Railway opened through to British Columbia. Hon. gentlemen know by the returns that the amount of duties collected in British Columbia and Manitoba has been out of proportion to the ordinary collections in other parts of the country of similar population, because they have been shut out from connection with the manufacturers of the country, and I believe that, with the opening of the road, a great deal of the trade which hitherto went from British Columbia to the United States and from Manitoba also to the United States will be given to our own manufacturers in the Dominion. Therefore, I do not anticipate so large a revenue from those two Provinces as we have had in the past. My estimate then for the year 1886-87 will be:—From Customs, $20,200,000; from Excise, $7,000,000; from post office, railways, interest and miscellaneous services, $7,300,000; making a total of $34,500,000; against which I have shown an estimated expenditure of $33,124,550, leaving, as the estimates now stand, a surplus of $1,375,450. This, of course, when my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has had his say, so far as he can have it, will probably be reduced, still I hope that the public service will not call for a very large additional expenditure this year, and that the amount of the anticipated surplus for 1886-87 will not be very largely reduced by Supplementary Estimates. It may be that the hon. gentleman who will follow me will think I have over-estimated this matter, and that I am over-sanguine as to the result that I shall receive during the coming year of 1886-87. I suppose that, if he speaks by the experience of the past, he will say I am over-sanguine. He might tell us that he entered upon his administration full of hope, as I am; that he had great expectations of revenue, and that, when he proposed to increase the duties by three millions of dollars, there was no doubt in his mind that he would receive that addition to his revenue; but we know the result; we know that time, and the policy that he was pursuing, frustrated his hopes and wrought his political ruin for that period. I know that this may, perhaps, be the impression on his mind now, and he may, perhaps, bring us the proof from the records that all this occurred, but I believe that the policy this Government is pursuing will lead to better results than the policy which the hon. gentleman and his party pursued from 1874 to 1878. It is true that we have not had in the past year or two that commercial activity that we had in 1881 and 1882, but there has been great caution on the part of our merchants, in view of the great reduction which has been going on in the prices of various goods throughout the world; and there has been a very large reduction, more especially in free trade countries, where the depression was most strong. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that if we compare the position of the Dominion of Canada in its trade with the condition of any other country, more particularly free trade countries, we will find that the depression has not affected us so seriously as it has some of those other countries. We have every indication from the country at large that there is sound commercial life, and that there is ability to enlarge commercial operations in the country, and I rely upon that largely. The revenue to be derived from a people, depends a good deal upon the ability of the people to purchase goods, and upon their inclination to do so. I know, Mr. Speaker, that the inclination generally exists, and the ability to do so we may enquire into. Commencing with the agricultural class, I think we have every reason to believe that the farmers of this country are in a better position to-day than they have been for years—at all events, in a very much better condition than they were during the period from 1874 to 1878. We live beside the greatest agricultural people in the world, perhaps, and they are a people who, notwithstanding that they have a large surplus to export, will permit no article of agricultural produce to enter their country free. That was the condition of things from 1874 to 1878, and yet while that condition of things existed, the policy that was pursued by the Government of this country was to admit all agricultural produce free. Mr. Speaker, I do not wonder that this had a depressing effect upon the farmers of this country, and I think, Sir, that effect upon the agricultural community was evinced in the fact that so large a quantity of American farm produce came into this country free, and was consumed by our people, instead of being supplied by our own farmers. Sir, we have changed that policy. We have said to Canadian farmers, that just such a measure as the American Government has been meting out and does mete out to you, we will mete out to the American farmer. We will endeavor to shut out the large importation that has been going on of American farm produce to feed the people of this Dominion, who have so much fertile soil and so many willing hands to cultivate that soil and to produce all that is required for the sustenance of our own people. But we said more. We said to the Canadian farmer, we will inaugurate such a trade policy as will give employment to a large number of consumers whom you will have to feed and support from your farms, and we will increase your markets not only by stopping foreign produce, but by multiplying the number of consumers of your own farm produce. Under this changed policy the condition of the farmer seems to have rapidly improved. The importation of American agricultural farm produce has diminished, although our home consumption has increased largely. This matter has been discussed by the organ of the third party, in this house, and an attempt has been made to show that the National Policy has been a failure, because there is still a considerable importation of breadstuffs into the country. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is true there has been some considerable importation, but my position is this: that under our National Policy we have largely reduced the importation of American breadstuffs, and we have also stimulated the Canadian farmer to greater activity, that he has supplied what has fallen short in importation, and he has largely increased his exports abroad. The increased activity which has been given to all branches of industry seems to have affected as well the farming population, and they are able to supply the three or four million dollars worth of American farm produce that used to come in, and we have largely increased our exports abroad. Now, Mr. Speaker, in 1875 there was entered $12,389,900 worth of American breadstuffs; in 1876 there was imported $11,114,000 worth; in 1877, $13,858,000 worth; in 1878, $13,452,000 worth, a total in those four years of $50,811,914 worth. We exported $24,000,000 odd, leaving, as consumed by the people of this country, $26,707,126 worth, or $6,676,000 worth per year. Now, Sir, under the present policy, without giving the sum for each year, the total imports for six years, beginning with 1880, has been $18,784,000, or $3,130,811 a year, as against $6,676,000 before the National Policy was inaugurated. That is, we have imported per year less than one-half as much as was imported, per year before the adoption of the National Policy. I may state that the article of Indian corn was mentioned in the organ of the party, and it was shown that it has been taxed to the large amount of 7½ cents per bushel. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is true that under this policy we did tax Indian corn 7½ cents a bushel; but a large portion of the imports of Indian corn was for the purpose of being distilled into whiskey. In 1880 there were 739,000 bushels imported; 1881, 754,000 bushels and so on; in the six years there were 5,368,123 bushels imported, paying 7½ cents per bushel duty, all for the purpose of being distilled into whiskey and not for the purpose of being consumed as breadstuffs. But I have shown by statistics that we have shut out by our policy more than $3,000,000 worth a year of breadstuffs coming in from the United States, and I will make a comparison showing the exports of farm produce. In 1875 we shipped agricultural exports, including breadstuffs and products of animals, to the value of $29,958,000; 1876, $40,000,000; 1877, $28,000,000; 1878, $32,000,000; 1879, $33,000,000; or a total of $165,580,000 in those years. Since the introduction of the National Policy the exports have been as follows:—1881, $42,000,000; 1882, $51,000,000; 1883, $43,000,000; 1884, $35,000,000; 1885, $39,000,000—$212,000,000 in all. From this sum deduct $165,000,000 exports in the same number of years without the National Policy, and you have left an increased export of $46,858,833 or $9,371,756 a year. Our farmers have exported annually, on an average upwards of $9,000,000 in excess of what they did before, and they have supplied the home market to the value of $3,500,000 of American produce shut out, making over $13,000,000 more than was exported under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CHARLTON. Where is the home market?

Mr. McLELAN. Why, I have just explained to the hon. gentleman, as well as I could, that we have given the home market to Canadian farmers to the extent of $3,545,000 a year; and that is supposing there had been no increase of population during that period. But it will not be pretended that there has not been more supplied with the increase of population in the manufacturing districts since 1881, and that the home market has not been larger than it was before, the $3,545,000 in addition. A word more in regard to the home market. In the first six months of this year, the importation of farm produce and provisions for the use of the people has declined over $2,000,000 as compared with the first six months of last year. So the House will see that year by year our farmers have steadily taken possession of the home market as well as increasing their exports abroad, and the encouragement afforded them has given them greater activity and life, and they do not now leave the oxen idle in the stall and the plowshare rusting in the field. The hon. gentleman opposite does not seem to be quite satisfied that our farmers have been benefited by the operation of this Act; and when an hon. gentleman, who was elected for his intelligence as a representative of the people, claims not to see in what way the farmers have been benefited, I think there may possibly be farmers who have not yet seen clearly in what way they have been benefited.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McLELAN. Some hon. members say "hear, hear." I suppose you could put it more clearly to the farmers. The hon. gentleman knows Toronto, a city with a population of 100,000. Suppose you could draw a cordon of American Custom house officers round the city and say to the farmers of Ontario: You shall not take in a pound of butter or any agricultural produce to feed that population of 100,000, but they shall be fed entirely by American farmers. If you could do that in practice it would bring the matter home to Ontario farmers, and I think the hon. gentleman himself would not ask how they were at present benefited, and the farmers would see how they had lost by such a transaction by being shut out from supplying the city. Suppose hon. gentlemen opposite should come into power and should bring their policy into operation, and all the men who are now employed in manufactures, and who were not employed in 1873 under their policy by which great importations of slaughtered goods were sent in from the United States, had to shut up and go to the United States. My predecessor brought down last year a statement showing that by statistics there had been established, under the National Policy, factories giving employment to 34,000 hands. The probabilities are that under such a change of policy as I have indicated almost the whole of those people would be driven out of the country into the United States to manufacture the goods that might be wanted by the people who would be left behind.

Mr. LANDERKIN. More than that number has been driven out.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman says that more than that number has been driven out. But he would not object to driving out 34,000 more,—

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would.

Mr. McLELAN—and all the people connected with them. Let me carry the supposition further. Suppose that after those people have been in the United States for a time manufacturing for the Canadian people, being fed by American farmers and paying tribute to the American Government, they should say: The products of our toil go over to Canada; we are scattered in different towns; suppose we unite, cross the line and establish ourselves at one central point, and take over the men who build our houses, and our lawyers, doctors, clergy, wives and children and servants connected with them; and make a population of over 100,000 and locate at some place where not a pound of butter or an article from a Canadian farmer would come, but American farmers would have free entry by market waggon and railway to come and go and supply us with everything we need, and the Canadian farmer shall have no intercourse with us. Then the hon. gentleman himself and all the Canadian farmers would see the effect of that operation in practice, and I think they would say: It is better we should have a policy that will keep those mechanics and their families here and enable our own farmers to supply them with their farm products, and thus find a market for them at home. Mr. Speaker, I have referred, in reply to the hon. gentleman, to the increase in the number of wage-earners and to the fact that Sir Leonard Tilley had statistics prepared showing the increase in the number of artisans employed in the various factories of this country from 1878 up to the commencement of 1884. I have not had the opportunity of continuing that operation, but in our trade returns there is sufficient evidence to show that the increase in the number of wage-earners and artisans employed has been enormous from 1878 up to the present time. We have imported more than $10,000,000 worth of machinery since 1878. That machinery was not imported to stand idle. That machinery is now giving employment to large numbers of people in various portions of the country. We have imported largely on the raw materials, which I have already referred to—of cotton, wool, hides, pig-iron, and everything that enters in the manufacture of goods, and all these things prove conclusively to me that there is an increased number of people employed, an increased number of wage-earners who are receiving good wages, and who will be able to purchase goods and contribute to the revenues of the country during the year. In everything there is evidence of increased activity. I read to the House to-night, the increase in the post office service. Hon. gentlemen opposite claimed that we would kill out the shipping trade of the country, but there has been a steady increase in the coasting and foreign trade of this country ever since this policy was introduced, all tending to show that the country is progressing favorably.

Mr. MITCHELL. Sailing vessels?

Mr. McLELAN. I will read the figures to the hon. gentleman. The coasting trade in 1884-85 was 15,944,422 tons; the foreign trade in ships was 7,644,615 tons.

Mr. MITCHELL. Sailing vessels?

Mr. McLELAN. Sailing vessels and steamers.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am asking about sailing vessels.

Mr. McLELAN. I have not separated them. I have not learned yet that a steamer cannot carry goods and passengers. I think that the steamers carry just as many goods in proportion to their spare tonnage as sailing vessels and deliver them quicker, and I was taking them both together. The foreign tonnage was 7,644,615.

Mr. MITCHELL. Foreign tonnage?

Mr. McLELAN. The coasting and foreign trade together was 23,582,000 tons. In 1878-79 the coasting trade was 12,066,683 tons; the foreign trade 6,000,000 tons, or a total of over 18,000,000 tons. There is an increase in the six years of 5,433,804 tons or an average of 905,634 tons a year.

Mr. MITCHELL. Foreign tonnage, but not Canadian; that is the point.

Mr. McLELAN. I am not speaking of whether we owned more or less tonnage—

Mr. MITCHELL. Ah! That is what I want to know.

Mr. McLELAN. I am speaking of this point: that the people of this country, the trade of this country and the wants of this country, employed a larger tonnage by 5,433,804 tons than they did in 1878.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, but owned by foreigners; there is the point.

An hon. MEMBER. It makes no difference.

Mr. MITCHELL. It makes a great deal of difference.

Mr. McLELAN. I am not aware that foreigners own a very large proportion of the shipping that is engaged in the coasting trade of this country. I am not aware of it, and if the hon. gentleman will show it to me, I will accept the figures he will give, but it does not alter the position I have taken, that the trade of the country requires 5,433,804 tons, and employs that tonnage more than it did in 1878-79. Then if we come down to railways we find that in 1878-79 we had 6,664 miles of railways in operation; their train mileage was 19,000,000; the total passengers carried, 6,444,000; the number of tons of freight carried, 7,833,000. Now, Sir, in 1885, we have 10,149 miles of railway in operation; we have a total train mileage of 30,623,000; the total number of passengers carried, 9,672,599, and the total number of tons of freight carried, 14,679,949; or an increase in all these items of over 50 per cent., all tending to show that there is an increased trade, an increased activity in business throughout the country. Therefore, Sir, I think that I am right in the position I take, that the business of the country is more active and better. Then we have the fact as shown by our bank returns that we have $16,000,000 more of bank and Dominion notes in circulation than there were in 1878; that the deposits in the chartered banks in 1885 were $106,000,000; in 1878, $72,000,000; or an increase of $34,000,000. We have the fact that the savings banks deposits have increased from $8,497,000 to $35,280,000 up to last night, an increase in deposits of $26,783,079. But, Mr. Speaker, we have an increased number of men engaged in business, and we have also an increased number engaged in business without failing as they did in 1878. The number of traders, in 1885, was 70,043, with failures amounting to $8,743,000. In 1878 we had 56,347 traders, with failures amounting to $26,875,000. There is an increase of 13,698 in the number of people engaged in trade throughout the country, and there is a decrease of $18,132,060 in the amount of the failures, and I take these facts as the best indication of the condition of the country, that larger numbers are engaged in trade, and engaged without loss to themselves and to the country at large. The returns for the first period of this year show still more favorably in respect to the failures. The return, as given for the first six weeks of 1886, was 192 failures, as against 235 in the same period of 1885, and 287 in 1884; so that, comparing with 1878, the decrease is very great in the number, and the decrease in the amount of liabilities is something enormous. I was very deeply impressed with the explanation which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) gave a year or two ago, of the causes of failures from 1874 to 1878. He put the whole case in a nutshell. He said that "the merchants failed for want of customers;" and I suppose there were no customers because there was no employment for the people, and no money among the people to enable them to purchase the merchant's goods. Therefore the merchant stood idle at his counter, waiting in vain for customers that did not come—that could not come—because they had no money and no employment; and therefore ruin and bankruptcy fell upon the merchant, and the official assignee walked the land like a pestilence at noonday. Sir, I start from one point—idleness of the people, want of employment, no factories in operation, and you have no customers for the merchant—and there follows a bankrupt merchant and an empty treasury. I start from the other point—employment for the people, money for the people, money taken by the people to the merchant, the merchant busy, and a full treasury. You start from one point, and you reach the conclusion absolutely; you start from the other point, and you reach the other conclusion just as certainly. When you have employment for the people, you have not only a busy merchant and a full treasury, but you have above all a contented and happy people. Daniel Webster, the great American statesman, who has gone, speaking upon this point, after he had been converted to protective views, said:

"The interests of every laboring community requires diversity of occupation, pursuits and objects of industry. The more that diversity is multiplied or extended, the better. To diversify employment is to enhance wages. And, Sir, take this great truth, place it on the title page of every book of political economy intended for use, put it on every farmer's almanac; let it be the heading of every column in every mechanic's magazine. Proclaim it everywhere, and make it a proverb, that where there is work for the hands of men, there will be work for their teeth. Where there is employment there will be bread. It is a great blessing to the poor to have cheap food; but greater than that, prior to that, and of still higher value, is the blessing of being able to buy food by honest and respectable employment. Employment feeds, clothes and instructs; employment gives strength, sobriety and morals. Constant employment and well paid labor produce, in a country like ours, general prosperity, content and cheerfulness. Thus happy have we seen the country, thus happy may we long continue to see it."

The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), some time during this Session, told us that the National Policy had been a failure, because there had been large importations in excess of the exports; and he gave figures by which he made it appear that there had been an excess of $101,762,000 worth of imports over exports. Now, Sir, let me refer to this for a moment. We were in very peculiar circumstances. Manitoba, the North-West and British Columbia imported largely of foreign goods, having no facilities for procuring goods of domestic manufacture. If the hon. gentleman will compare the imports into Manitoba, the North-West and British Columbia from 1874 to 1879 with the imports from 1880 to 1885, he will find that they imported in the latter period $45,603,000 worth of foreign goods. If he will take that from our excess of imports over exports for the same period, he will find that it leaves but $56,159,000, or $9,259,833 a year. He will also find that the imports into those districts from 1874 to 1879 were only $18,000,000, which deducted from the excess of imports over exports, will leave $86,000,000; or in that period there was an excess of imports over exports, exclusive of Manitoba, the North-West and British Columbia of $17,242,000 a year, while from 1880 to 1885 there was only an excess of $9,359,000 a year. But the hon. gentleman will also find, on examination of the trade and revenue returns, that a large proportion of the excess of imports over exports in the older Provinces was raw material for manufacture, or articles that should come in free. For instance, there was an increase in 1885 over 1878 in hides and horns of $563,000, in cotton and wool of $1,500,000, in settlers' effects of $746,000, in coin and bullion of $2,250,000, and so on, making an excess of imports over exports in those articles, which are free, of $8,630,000; so that the whole excess of imports over exports in the older Provinces is disposed of in that way. Mr. Speaker, I have detained the House at greater length than I intended, or should have done, and I must apologise to it. But an hon. gentleman opposite has said that we have driven more than 40,000 people out of the country; and I suppose we shall hear the same thing from the hon. gentleman who is about to address the House on the opposite side. It is true, Sir, we have not had in the past that great increase of numbers that they have had in the United States. In the United States, long previous to the taking of the last census, they had a policy of protection to home industry. They had a policy of giving their people employment and high wages, a policy which drew immigrants to the United States from all parts of the world. They had also opened for settlement large tracts of prairie country, and the two policies combined largely helped to increase the population of the United States at a greater rate than the increase in the Dominion. But, Sir, if we take the American census of 1880 and the Canadian census of 1881, and if we select a number of the older States, which offer a fair ground for comparison with the Dominion of Canada, we will find we have held our own very well. Take the State of Connecticut. Of course, if you go into the newer States, with attractions of new territory and prairie soil, you will find a much larger percentage of increase; but what I want is to make a comparison with the older States. Connecticut, which had 537,000 inhabitants in 1871, had 622,683 in 1881. Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Dakota—I put in Dakota as a set-off to Manitoba—comparing those States with Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and British Columbia, I find that the American States increased 16·06 and the Dominion of Canada increased 17·03 per cent. in population, according to the last census; so that when we make a proper comparison between the Dominion and the older and more settled portions of the United States we find we have more than held our own. Now, the complaint has been made that the National Policy has not done its duty, because times have not been so brisk as they were in 1882-83. But, as I said before, if we compare the position of trade in Canada with the position of other countries—in the United States, and Great Britain, for instance—we will find that our position is better than theirs, and we can gather from this that, but for the National Policy, ruin and bankruptcy would have been upon us. It is in times when there is depression abroad, when there is great depression in surrounding countries, when there is over-production and slaughter in prices of goods in those countries, that we find the protective policy is desirable and advantageous, and it has proved itself here highly beneficial in protecting us from the onslaughts which would have been made upon us by foreign manufacturers. I proposed to deal with this question more fully, but I have occupied so large a share of the public time that I cannot go into it as fully as I would wish. I want, however, to give one instance to show how the National Policy is affecting the wage-earner in this country at present. All that is required for the production of cheap goods in this country, is that there shall be a market for those goods, and the larger the market the cheaper they will be. Our people are as active and as intelligent as any others, and when they are forced abroad, as they have been, they make as good artisans, with a little experience and training, as are to be found in the world. All that they require to be fit to manufacture everything required in this country, and to manufacture them as cheaply as they are manufactured in the United States or elsewhere, is that they shall have some training, and this they will obtain by our furnishing them with a market for their goods. Now, the manufacturer and the capitalist seeks a fair return for his investment; he looks into the chances existing for placing the products of his investment; and the smaller the output he has, the larger percentage he must put upon that output in order to meet the interest upon his capital and the depreciation of his plant. There is a very familiar illustration of this. You take a blast furnace which requires $30,000 to meet the interest upon the capital invested in it and the depreciation of the plant. If the output of that furnace be 15,000 tons of pig-iron, of course there must be $2 a ton put upon the iron, in order to pay the interest and the depreciation of the plant. If you increase the output to 20,000 tons, then it only requires $1.50 per ton to pay these charges; if you increase it to 30,000 tons, you only want $1 a ton upon it, to pay a dividend and you can sell the pig-iron $1 a ton cheaper. If you run the output up to 60,000 tons, all you want is 50 cents a ton, and you have $30,000 raised, and the pig-iron is $1.50 cheaper than it would be with only 15,000 tons of output. The same principle holds good in all the manufactures in which we are engaged. The percentage which must be put upon every yard of cloth which comes from the loom depends upon the output, in order to meet the interest upon the capital and the depreciation of the plant. You must have one of two things. You must either have a large market and a large output or you must have a low rate of wages, and that means a low scale of living and a small expenditure for the benefit of the farmer. And more, you cannot continue, you cannot have for any considerable length of time men employed at a low rate of wages, while across the border, in the United States, there are larger wages paid and attractions offered to draw them away into that country. The intention of the National Policy is that we shall give a large market to our own manufacturers. We have not so large a market of course as they have in the United States, but we can give a proportionate market, one-tenth or one-twelfth in proportion to the population of the other side. David Wells, the American apostle of free trade, has been often quoted in this House, and he says:

“Wages are labor's share of product, and in every healthy business are ultimately paid out of product. No employer of labor can continue for any great length of time to pay high wages unless his product is large. If it is not, and he attempts, it is only a question of time when his affairs will be wound up by the sheriff. On the other hand if a high rate of wages is permanently paid in any industry and in any country it is in itself proof positive that the product of labor is large, that the laborer is entitled to a generous share of it, and that the employer can afford to give it him.”

That is what we have been striving to do in this country, and it is what we are accomplishing, when we are giving a larger market to our own manufacturers, and we have the result that a larger, a more generous wage is being paid to the employees than previous to the introduction of this policy. I have not gathered any statistics, except from one company, the Canada Cotton Manufacturing Company, of Cornwall, and I have a comparison in regard to that company between 1878 and 1885, with which I wish to trouble the House in order to show the result of the National Policy in increasing the rate of wages, the number of hands, and not the price of goods.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a 35 per cent. duty though.

Mr. McLELAN. In 1878, in the six months from July to December, there were 407 hands employed in that factory, who received \$47,557 in wages; the daily amount paid being \$305, and the average paid to each hand per day 75 cents. Times seemed to grow worse, and in the three months from October to December the amount paid to each hand ran down to 72 cents; and in the month of December it ran down to 69 cents. Now I come to 1885, under the operation of the National Policy, and I find that, for the six months ending December, there were 640 hands employed, receiving \$91,144 in wages; the daily amount paid being \$584, or an average per day of 91 cents to each hand, against 75 cents in 1878. For the three months from October to December, there were 670 hands employed—the number increases as we go on—and the average amount paid was 92 cents. In the last month of the year, 672 hands were employed, and the average amount paid to each was 90 cents. For the six months, the percentage of hands between 1878 and 1885 shows an increase of $57\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., the wages paid an increase of $91\frac{5}{8}$ per cent., and the amount of daily wages to each hand an increase of 21 per cent. In the three months there was an increase of $56\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in the number of hands employed, of $98\frac{7}{10}$ per cent. in the amount of wages paid, and of 28 per cent. in the amount paid to each hand. In the last month of the year, the increase in average wages was 30 per cent. over that paid in 1878. So you will see from the figures given that the people employed by this company are receiving a greater wage per day than they were in 1878. But the hon. gentleman says we have a duty of 30 per cent.

Mr. MITCHELL. I said 35 per cent.

Mr. McLELAN. Well, 35 per cent. In 1878, the price of standard sheeting, weighing 2·85 lbs. per yard cost 10 cents, less $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. discount, or 26·36 cents per lb., with the average price of cotton $10\frac{7}{8}$ cents. In 1886, that same sheeting, weighing 2·85 lbs. per yard, cost $6\frac{1}{2}$ cents per yard net, or 18·52 cents per lb., against 26·36 cts. per lb. in 1878.

Mr. MITCHELL. What did the raw cotton cost?

Mr. McLELAN. It cost $10\frac{7}{8}$ cents in 1878, and in 1886 it cost 10·56 cents per lb. This shows that, though the hon. gentleman says there is a duty of 35 per cent. consumers are getting their sheetings now for $42\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. less than they paid in 1878, while the raw cotton is not quite 3 per cent. cheaper. That is the result of the operations in that factory, and I am satisfied that it will be shown to be the result all over this country, that men are being employed, that they are receiving greater wages, and that the output of the factories is given at less cost than it was in 1878, when people had a narrow market and could not produce as cheaply as now when they have a larger market. This is what we are doing with the National Policy and that is what we intended; we are giving employment to the people and at better wages, by our protection. It is not the cotton in its raw state that we want to protect, it is not the ore in the mountain, is it not the coal in the mine, it is not the clay in the potter's hands that we want to protect; it is the hands that are forming and fashioning the clay, it is the men who dig the ore from the mine, the men who take the ore and smelt it in the furnace and the factory, and form and fashion it into the shape we require to use; it is the men and women who are manipulating the warp and the woof in the cotton factories,—it is these whom we want to protect, and it is these whom we have protected, as I have shown, and whom we have secured a higher rate of wages. Therefore, the National Policy is no failure, from any point of view you look at it. I have detained the House too long—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. McLELAN. No, I must close, in justice to my hon. friend opposite. I have gone over the Public Accounts, and I have shown the position of affairs in 1885. I have shown that, taking the year by itself and apart from the troubles in the North-West, we stand very well. I think hon. gentlemen will admit that we stand very well, for they never liked the idea of having a large surplus. I have shown that in 1886 we shall not be so very bad, and that there is a justification for us for putting that extraordinary expenditure which we have had in connection with the North-West to capital account, because during the years that we have administered the Government of the country, we have paid from revenue a large amount into capital account. It is not the custom with other countries in the world, which have been engaged in wars, to place all the expenditure of those wars on revenue immediately. The United States did not, they could not, they left it to capital account, and it was years before they commenced the reduction of their indebtedness. It was fourteen years before they returned to specie payments. I have shown, I think, conclusively, that there is no great cause for alarm in the amount of burden that is imposed upon this country for interest at present. I have shown that there was, up to 1885, a less rate of interest per capita upon this country than existed in 1878, and only 23 cents at the most more than there was in 1867, when the people were poorer and had not the ability to pay. I have shown that, taking out the extraordinary expenditures and those that are not taxation, the increased expenditure from 1867 to 1885 has been comparatively trifling, a little over $2,000,000. So, Sir, I do not anticipate that we shall hear very much more of the increased taxation from $13,000,000 up to $34,000,000 or $35,000,000 in eighteen years. Sir, they have first to convince the man who has engaged in the business and the duties in life, and who is expending $35 for an outfit and a suit that he is doing wrong, and ought to go back to the $13 suit, that he had eighteen years ago, when he was a boy. They will have to convince the merchant who is doing a business of $1,000,000, that he is in danger of bankruptcy and ruin because his expenses are larger, his staff of clerks is larger than they were when he had a little corner shop, and as Carlyle said: "The red herrings and the pipes painfully crossed in the window." Sir, before they can convince the people of this country that we are doing wrong in our expenditure, they will have to persuade the stockholders of the Bank of Montreal to sell out if they wish to avoid bankruptcy and ruin, because the Bank of Montreal, when it started, only expended £400 or £500 a year, whereas they now have established agencies all over the Dominion, and in New York and London, and are expending an enormous sum yearly in keeping up those agencies. They will have to persuade the stockholders of the Bank of Montreal that they are in danger of ruin and loss before they can persuade the people of this country that they are in danger of ruin and loss because there has been necessarily an increased expenditure owing to the increased area of this country. Sir, there have been necessary expenditures, because we have had large undertakings which were necessary to our very existence, and we have had a great struggle to accomplish this purpose; but, Sir, we have succeeded, and the liabilities arising out of that have been placed upon us earlier than we anticipated. We entered into an engagement to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, and have it completed in 1891; but circumstances made it desirable, in the interest of the country, for this House to hasten the completion of that great work. Well, they have it almost completed, and, as I have shown the House, the burdens for interest are not unduly pressing upon this country. We have come out of our operations with far less burden per head than pressed upon the United States when they came out of their struggle. They are now reducing their indebtedness. We also have accomplished our purpose, and will take the opportunity of retrieving and improving our position. And, Sir, we shall do that; we shall rest from our labors, and we shall give our attention to reducing the indebtedness of our country, and reducing it a great deal without unduly taxing the people. Sir, I spoke of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They have accomplished a great work, and we have assisted them.

Mr. McLELAN.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. McLELAN. Mr. Speaker, I remember the discussion in this House, when it was said that we were giving them everything, and I think the echoes of some of those speakers still linger in the corners of the ceiling, when it was declared that all we were doing for them was a gift, and that the loan of $35,000,000 which we made to them would never be repaid to the country. It was only last year when they came here and asked that we should allow them to issue bonds to the amount of $35,000,000 and take $20,000,000 of this as security for $20,000,000 of our indebtedness, and put the other $10,000,000 upon lands in the North-West, looking to them only for it, and that we should loan them $5,000,000 more. At that time the gentleman who says "no," perhaps, or some one beside him, said it was only another gift of $5,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that it would never be returned. Sir, we did, in the interest of the country, adopt that proposition, and $10,000,000 was left upon lands, and they sold their bonds and paid us the $5,000,000. They have gone on and nearly brought to completion that great work. But, Sir, we know that there are a great many things to be done in order to make that work a complete success. The termini of that road have been spoken of as being at Liverpool and Hong Kong, and it is desirable, in the interest of this country, that they should be enabled to make that communication between Liverpool and the eastern countries. They say to us: It is difficult for us to do it because nearly all the money we have raised from that $15,000,000 is exhausted in our undertaking; you now hold a mortgage upon all our lands, and we are unable to raise any money upon them. It will be known to hon. gentlemen that last year great pressure was brought to bear upon members of the House that we should give up that lien upon the whole of the lands and take a certain portion of the lands, leaving the rest free for the company to raise money upon. They come again and ask us to do the same thing. They represent that a great expenditure is necessary to make the proper connections east and west and efficiently equip the road, and they ask us to take a certain portion of that land as payment for the lien we hold upon the land, and upon the land only, and leave them to deal with the rest for their own benefit. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have considered that matter. We have considered it carefully, and we have thought that—having aided and assisted the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to accomplish so much, to obtain a standing and footing in the money markets of the world, and to be recognised as a great and powerful company, that has accomplished a work of Imperial importance—that company can well stand alone, can well work out its own destiny and accomplish its own purposes. And we have thought it to be in the interests of that company and in the interests of the country at large if we were to remove the lien that extends over the whole of the Canadian Pacific Railway lands and take a certain portion which we consider of the value of $9,000,000. We have said to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company: Gentlemen, this is the position of things. Now that you are a strong and powerful company able to walk alone, now that you have shown the world the importance of this great undertaking, let us close all accounts, let us make a full and complete settlement. You take your lands and raise what money you require to meet your purposes and we will take a portion of those lands and hold them and dispose of them for the purpose of meeting the loan and paying the $20,000,000 in cash which we have advanced to you. And, Mr. Speaker, I am able to announce to the House that arrangements have been made by which the company agree to accomplish that purpose and to pay us $20,000,000 in cash, one-half in May and one-half on or before 1st July, and we have made an arrangement to close all accounts with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and receive our $20,000,000 that we may provide for our floating indebtedness and have spare cash in the Treasury and not be under the necessity of increasing our indebtedness. We were told time and again that the money and aid we were giving to that company was a gift, and would prove an entire loss to the country. But we believed otherwise, and the result has proved we were right in placing faith in that work and in those who managed it. When we receive that money we shall be able to pay off all that sum of $14,000,000 of floating debt, and be able to turn our attention to the older Provinces. The House and the country know that a large portion of the time and attention of the Government has been given to the North-West and the Canadian Pacific Railway, perhaps to the neglect of some of the older Provinces, and we think it is desirable in the interests of the older Provinces that the attention of the Government should be given to them, and that the Canadian Pacific Railway now being on its feet should work out its own destiny. We have advanced so far, and at the earliest possible day I shall submit to the approval of the House a proposition to carry out this undertaking and enable us to settle all accounts with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and to receive the money that is represented by the $20,000,000 of bonds which the Government hold. I think taking the whole position we have cause for congratulation. We have cause for congratulation that we have done so much and not imposed more burdens upon this country, and that we have gone through with our part of the undertaking and not suffered more inconvenience than we have done. Sir, we all deeply regret the condition of affairs during the past season; we all regret deeply the outbreak in the North-West; we all regret the loss of life that was occasioned by it; but if we are to believe the words of hon. gentlemen opposite even that has done us good. The House will remember, and will remember with admiration, the speech which the hon. gentleman opposite made in the absence of his leader, the speech which he made when he came out of the shadow of partyism and spoke as a man and a Canadian. He said:

"Sir, people respect those whom they find to be able to fight for their own land and to defend their own country. Our conduct has been watched and scrutinised on both sides of the Atlantic, and there is no doubt whatever in my mind—I say it frankly—that we stand before the nations of the world in a better position to-day than we did three or four months ago on that single score."

Even that occurrence, the hon. gentleman says, has done us good. We came back from that fight lamenting the death of those who fell in the defence of their country; but we came back without a permanent wound or disfigurement, we came back without being dismembered, we came back wearing no empty sleeve, but with both our good arms tried and strengthened and skilled to carry forward the banner of our country and to work out a grand destiny for ourselves among the nations of the earth. Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means on the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the following rates of duty shall be assessed and collected on each of the articles hereinafter named, and to repeal all Acts or parts of Acts now in force, in so far as they provide for assessing and collecting any different rates of duty than the rates hereby provided, or which are inconsistent therewith:—

1. Almonds, shelled, a specific duty of 5 cents per lb.
2. Almonds, not shelled, and nuts of all kinds not elsewhere specified, a specific duty of 3 cents per lb.

22. Lead pipe and lead shot, a specific duty of 1½ cents per lb.
23. Oleomargarine, butterine or other substitute for butter, a specific duty of 10 cents per lb.
24. Printed or dyed cotton fabrics, not elsewhere specified, 27½ per cent. ad valorem.
25. Spirits and strong waters, not having been sweetened or mixed with any article so that the degree of strength thereof cannot be ascertained by Sykes' hydrometer, for every Imperial gallon of the strength of proof of such hydrometer, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof, and for every greater or less quantity than a gallon, viz.: Geneva gin, rum, whisky, alcohol or spirits of wine, and unenumerated, unmixed and not sweetened spirits, by whatever name called, a specific duty of $1.75 per Imperial gallon.
26. Old Tcm gin, a specific duty of $1.90 per Imperial gallon.
27. Spirits and strong waters, mixed with any ingredient or ingredients, and although thereby coming under the denomination of proprietary medicines, tinctures, essences, extracts or any other denomination, including medicinal elixirs and fluid extracts, whether in bulk or bottle, not elsewhere specified, shall be nevertheless deemed to be spirits or strong waters, and subject to duty as such, a specific duty of $2 per Imperial gallon and 30 per cent. ad valorem.
28. Cologne water and perfumed spirits in bottles or flasks, not weighing more than 4 ounces each, 50 per cent. ad valorem.
29. Cologne water and perfumed spirits in bottles, flasks or other packages, weighing more than 4 ounces each, a specific duty of $2 per Imperial gallon, and 40 per cent. ad valorem.
30. Tubing, wrought iron, plain, 2 inches in diameter or under, coupled and threaded, or not, 30 per cent. ad valorem.
31. Whips of all kinds, 30 per cent. ad valorem.
32. Wire, iron or steel, galvanised or not, 15 gauge and coarser, 20 per cent. ad valorem.
33. Wire-fencing, buckthorn, strip and other similar fencing wire of iron or steel, a specific duty of 1½ cents per lb.
34. Yeast cakes and compressed yeast in packages or bulk, of 1 lb. and over, a specific duty of 6 cents per lb.
35. Yeast cakes in packages of less than 1 lb., a specific duty of 8 cents per lb.
36. Portland and Roman cement to be classed with all other cement at specific rates as now provided.
37. On sugar, melado, concentrated melado, concentrated canejuice, concentrated molasses, concentrated beet root juice and concrete, when imported direct from the country of growth and production, for refining purposes only, not over No. 13 Dutch standard in color, and not testing over 70 degrees by the polariscope test, a specific duty of 1 cent per lb., and for every additional degree, or fraction of a degree shown by polariscope test, ¾ cents per 100 lbs. additional.
38. On sugar not for refining purposes, not over No. 13 Dutch standard in color, when imported direct from the country of growth and production, a specific duty of 1 cent per lb., and 30 per cent. ad valorem on the value thereof free on board at the last port of shipment.
39. On all sugars above No. 13 Dutch standard in color, and on refined sugar of all kinds, grades or standards, 1½ cents per lb., and 35 per cent. ad valorem on the value thereof free on board at the last port of shipment.
40. On all sugars not imported direct without transshipment from the country of growth and production, there shall be levied and collected an additional duty of 7½ per cent. of the whole duty so otherwise payable thereon.
- Provided that when any cargo of sugar for refining purposes is found to grade, to the extent of not over 15 per cent. of the whole, above No. 13 Dutch Standard in color, the whole of said cargo may be admitted to enter by polariscope test as above provided for refining purposes only.
41. Syrups, cane juice, refined syrup, sugar house syrup of sugar house molasses, syrup of sugar, syrup of molasses or sorghum, whether imported direct or not—a specific duty of 1 cent per lb. and 30 per cent. ad valorem.
42. Molasses, other, when imported direct without transshipment and from the country of growth and production—15 per cent. ad valorem.
43. Molasses when not so imported—20 per cent. ad valorem.
The value upon which the ad valorem duty shall be levied and collected upon all the above-named syrups and molasses shall be the value thereof free on board at the last port of shipment.
44. Provided that molasses, when imported for or received into any refinery or sugar factory, or to be used for any other purpose than actual consumption, shall be subject to, and there shall be levied and collected thereon, an additional duty of 5 cents per Imperial gallon.
Provided that the change in the rates of duty on sugars and molasses shall apply only to importations arriving in Canada on and after the 31st day of March instant, and not to such articles warehoused prior to that date.
45. Sugar candy, brown or white, and confectionery, a specific duty of 1½ cents per lb. and 35 per cent. ad valorem.
2. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend Schedule "B," being the list of goods which are entitled to entry free of duty when imported to Canada, by substituting the following provisions for the corresponding items now contained therein:—
1. Articles for the personal use of Consuls General who are natives or citizens of the country they represent and who are not engaged in any other business or profession.
 2. Borax, in lump.
 3. Grease, the refuse of animal fat.
 4. Iron and steel, old and scrap, but nothing shall be deemed scrap iron or steel except waste or refuse iron or steel that has been in actual use and fit only to be remanufactured.
 5. Sumac, crude.
3. Resolved, That it is expedient to strike out the following articles from the list of goods which may be entered free of duty when imported into Canada, viz.:—
1. "Iron sand or globules, and dry putty for polishing granite."
 2. "Ottar of roses."
 3. "Philosophical instruments and apparatus, including globes and,"
 4. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend Schedule "D," relating to prohibited articles, by striking out the item relating to copyright works, and substituting the following in lieu thereof, viz.:—
Reprints of Canadian copyright works, and reprints of British copyright works which have been also copyrighted in Canada.
 5. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that an Excise duty of 8 cents per lb. be levied and collected on all oleomargarine, butterine or other substitute for butter manufactured in Canada.
 6. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the foregoing resolutions, and the alterations made in the duties of Customs and Excise on the articles therein mentioned, shall take effect upon and after the 31st of March instant.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, I desire to say a word or two as to the present position of this country. I rise, on this occasion, with feelings of considerable regret. I regret, in the first place, the absence of the First Minister, and I regret its cause. I regret exceedingly—and I say so without in the slightest degree desiring to disparage the merits of the hon. gentleman who now fills that office—I regret exceedingly, for certain reasons of my own, the absence of the late Minister of Finance; and I still more regret that it is utterly impossible for me, however much I might desire to do so, to concur with the Finance Minister in thinking that the present position of Canada is by any means that which a true Canadian would desire to see it. Mr. Speaker, I was always myself a strong supporter of the movement which resulted in Confederation, and I must say that when I recall the high hopes and the very reasonable expectations which were entertained at the time when that measure was under discussion, when I recollect what has transpired in the twenty-two or twenty-three years since Confederation was first proposed to the people of Canada, I do not see how it is possible that any man who has paid a careful attention to the affairs of Canada during that period, can feel otherwise than I do at this present moment, and that is, filled with profound regret that such great opportunities have been so exceedingly badly taken advantage of. Sir, had any gentleman told me nineteen years ago, much more, two or three and twenty years ago, when we were first discussing this project, that in the nineteenth year of our Confederation the debt of Canada would be very nearly three times as much per head as the debt of the people of the United States is to-day; had anybody told me that the necessary taxation of Canada would be 50 per cent. greater than the necessary taxation of United States; that in 1886, in the nineteenth year of our Confederation, our total volume of trade would be $24,000,000 less than it was thirteen years ago, in 1873; that after having had possession of the North-West for fifteen years, after having expended $100,000,000, or thereabouts, of the public funds, and a very large amount—how much I am unable to state—but probably $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 of the private means of the people of Canada, in endeavoring to develop and settle that country, we should to-day have, on the evidence of the census returns placed in our hands by hon. gentleman opposite, after that huge expenditure and after the lapse of fifteen years, we should scarce boast, from the Pacific Ocean to the confines of Ontario, of a poor 200,000 settlers there; had anybody told me that starting with the advantages we had, after nineteen years and after importing, at great cost to the people of this country, some 900,000 immigrants, as our records allege—whether truly or falsely—the total white population of Canada should, at the expiration of those nineteen years, be scarcely 1,000,000 more than it was in 1867, I must confess I should have felt tempted to treat that person very harshly—almost as harshly as some hon. gentlemen have occasionally felt disposed to treat me, not for venturing on predictions, but for calling attention to certain facts as they actually existed. Sir, had anybody made such a statement then, I would have pointed to the increase of Canada in the twenty years which elapsed before Confederation. I would have pointed to the increase of the United States in the first twenty years of their existence, from 1790 to 1810, when they, certainly under greater difficulties than we have had to contend with, made far greater progress than has unfortunately fallen to our lot. I would have pointed to the progress of our sister colonies in other parts of Her Majesty's dominions, and I should have asked what reason there was to suppose that Canadians would have fled from their country as if it were stricken with a pestilence, or to suppose that our people would have displayed so little prudence and so little energy as to permit such a state of affairs to exist. But, Sir, to-night, after listening to the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance, after examining the Public Accounts and the Trade and Navigation Returns, after consulting the statistics of our census and the information afforded to us by the Government of Ontario. I am compelled, though reluctantly, to admit that the facts are so. Sir, I say that those are facts, which rightly understood and properly studied, ought to fill any man, who cares for the welfare of his country, with feelings of profound regret, and to that regret may well be added some astonishment—I will not say indignation—at finding that Her Majesty's Ministers have put into the mouth of His Excellency, when addressing the people of Canada, the declaration that we have cause to be satisfied with the material progress and advancement of this country. Now, Sir, I do not consider that the present is an occasion on which it is desirable to review in very minute detail the small items of our expenditure, the occasion for that will come better at a later time when we will be called upon to review the several items in going through the Estimates. It is quite true that there is abundant food for reflection in many of those estimates which have been submitted, that when you come to examine the estimates for civil government, for superannuation, for Indian grants, for public works—at any rate as shown in the last Public Accounts—for expenditure on railways, for the immigration department above all, and for sundry other things which I will not pause now to enumerate, you will find only too good reason to think that in a great deal of this expenditure there has been much waste, much extravagance, and I fear in some cases down-right positive corruption of a very grave character. But we have passed beyond those small details. What we have to consider to-night are really the consequences, not so much of these petty misdoings as of certain grave and long continued errors of policy. These errors have been of various kinds. We have had errors in our fiscal policy, errors political and errors administrative; but although they have been of various sorts they all, I think, may be fairly traced to one source, and that is the determination on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite, at any cost, and at all hazards, without the slightest reference to the effects of their conduct on the future of this country, to maintain themselves and their friends in place and power. Now, Sir, beyond all doubt, the man who is chiefly responsible is the Prime Minister, and chiefly responsible on this ground: That, perhaps, alone of all his present Cabinet he sees clearly and understands what are likely to be the consequences of the policy he has adopted. As for his colleagues, or, perhaps, I should more fitly call them his subordinates, for colleagues, in the proper sense, that hon. gentleman for a long time has had none—as for the hon. gentleman's colleagues—for I will not quarrel about a word to-night—as for those gentlemen, Sir, I think some leniency might be shown. Reviewing their conduct, I have come to the conclusion that a considerable proportion of them, at any rate, might be fairly described as having become morally and politically color blind. Now, Sir, it is well known that in the natural kingdom whenever any animal ceases to make use of certain organs, nature punishes it in an appropriate way by depriving it hereafter of the use of these organs; and I apprehend, to a certain extent, a similar fate has befallen some of those hon. gentlemen. Not having been in the habit, since they became colleagues of the First Minister, of acting on their independent judgment, or their independent conscience, nature has caused those organs to become atrophied—they have no longer any use for them. It was shown to us very learnedly the other day by the Minister of Justice that men, even when they are morally irresponsible, particularly if that moral irresponsibility has resulted from faults of their own, should not, therefore, be always exempt from punishment; but although I admit that the fact of their moral irresponsibility need not exempt them from punishment, I think the House ought to allow reasonable indulgence to those hon. gentlemen on the ground I have stated, that they are not really and truly in a full degree responsible for the policy to which they have unfortunately committed themselves. Sir, last year the hon. gentlemen were thrice warned. The Session was of unusual length; it became perfectly clear what the issue of the affairs in which they were engaged last year would be; and I myself took the opportunity thrice over of calling the attention of the Government to the very serious position into which our finances were drifting. Well, Sir, the Government and the majority of their supporters chose deliberately to shut their eyes on that occasion. They preferred to prattle to us about the state of affairs at the antipodes or about the orange blossoms that decked the brows of Canadian maidens; but no power of ours could induce them to take into serious consideration the probable large approaching deficit, or to take such precautions as they might fairly be expected to take at that time to prevent the state of things arising which we see now exists. Now, Sir, concealment of our actual position has become impossible, and we must consider what the facts are as revealed to us in the Public Accounts and by the statement the hon. gentleman has just made. It is impossible, even for the Ministry or their supporters to deny that last year they had a deficit of at least $2,240,000. As the Minister candidly admitted about $1,000,000 further was borrowed from 1886, making the total deficit last year in reality $3,240,000. But what he did not tell us was that in the capital account on the Intercolonial Railway at least $187,000 were charged for items which I contend have no business or place in capital account, inasmuch as they consist of running stock, perishable articles, which never ought to have been charged to the capital account of any railway under Government management long after that railway was fairly completed. I might add that the $403,000 granted for railway subsidies is not, in my opinion, a proper charge to capital account; while if he chose to take to his credit $393,000 on account of Dominion lands, he should in all fairness have added $303,000 which you will find charged to capital account for expenditure on those identical Dominion lands. Now, Sir, in point of fact, but for the expedient of borrowing, and borrowing at enormous cost, from the revenue of the present year, the actual deficit for last year would have amounted to no less than $3,900,000; and even giving him credit for the $1,700,000 which was expended in the North-West, there would still remain a deficit of $2,200,000 to be charged against last year. With respect to the deficit for the present year, on the 1st March, we had a deficit of $4,716,000. The hon. gentleman tells us that since that time a very large amount of money, some $3,800,000, as I understood him, has been paid by anticipation of the revenue. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman and the House know quite well that if you choose to anticipate by many millions the revenues which are likely to accrue in the succeeding three or four months, the result will not in any degree be to permanently help the revenue of this year, unless, indeed, we perform—by way, I suppose, of paying 1886 for what was lost for the benefit of 1885—the still further act of robbing the revenue of 1887 for the benefit of the revenue of 1886. I am not disposed, however, to quarrel much with the estimate the hon. gentleman has made of the expenditure for 1886, and which he put in all, if I took it down correctly, at $38,500,000. But, Sir, I am disposed to enter a very strong protest, indeed, against the absurd and unbusinesslike idea of charging $3,500,000 of that expenditure to capital account. What does that $3,500,000 represent? I had always supposed that every item in capital account was supposed to represent some actual value—that at least we had a canal, or a railway, or something of that kind to show for it. Where have these $3,500,000 gone? Sir, they have all been blown into gunpowder smoke, rendered necessary by the extreme mismanagement of hon. gentlemen opposite in dealing with the affairs of the North-West; and it is utterly improper and absurd to put such an item, as the cost of suppressing the rebellion, into the capital account of the Dominion of Canada. So, Sir, instead of admitting, as the hon. gentleman would desire us, that he is justified in saying that he will close this year's account with a deficit of $1,400,000, even supposing all his expectations are realised—that he will get all he expects, and that we shall not be called on for larger Supplementary Estimates—we find that we shall close the year 1886 with a true, genuine deficit of $4,900,000, if not more, according to the statement of the hon. Minister himself. Sir, the hon. gentleman enumerated—I dare say correctly enough—sundry expenses which 1886 would have to bear over and above 1885. He would not, indeed, tell us what he expected the Franchise Act would cost; nor did I observe that he told us what would be the expense inflicted on this Dominion as the fruit of that great constitutional measure known—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon for naming him—as the McCarthy Act, as to which I fear, unless the information which has reached me is entirely erroneous, a sum of $200,000 or thereabouts will represent what the country will have to pay for the constitutional opinion of the First Minister endorsed by that of the hon. member for Simcoe. Sir, the hon. gentleman said nothing to us—perhaps he thought that was not a thing on which it was desirable to dwell—of the enormous shrinkage, which the combined exports and imports—imports for consumption and exports of Canadian products—for 1885, exhibit. But we find that in 1885, our total exports of Canadian produce were about $81,158,000, while we imported for consumption, $102,700,000; making in all $183,858,000. It is a very serious thing to consider that thirteen years ago, in 1873, our total imports and exports of a like sort amounted to $207,000,000; so that in these thirteen years, although there has been a very considerable growth in the country, although there has been, whether you take my estimate or that of the Minister of Finance, a large addition to the population of the country, nevertheless the total volume of the trade of Canada has shrunk a matter of $24,000,000. And I am sorry to observe that, on reference to the returns brought down by the Minister of Customs, the shrinkage is continuing. The exports of Canadian produce to the 1st February amounted to some $51,000,000, and our imports for consumption to $56,733,000, or a total of $107,750,000; while on the 1st of February, 1885, we had an exportation of $53,368,000 and an import of $61,178,000, or a total of $114,546,000. So that it follows that in those seven months there has been a shrinkage in our exports and in our imports amounting to $7,000,000. Sir, when you add to this the confession made by the hon. gentleman, that the gross amount of Canadian indebtedness reaches $281,000,000, that there was in addition a number of million dollars of liabilities under the guise of railway subsidies and other claims incurred but not accrued, I think the House will see that there is a great deal in our present condition which calls for our most serious consideration. With what, as the hon. Minister of Finance justly said, is more important still, that is the incidence of this taxation on our people, I shall deal later on; but I desire, before quitting this subject, to call the attention of the House to the enormous proportion which the fixed charges, that we cannot possibly reduce now, bear to the total income of Canada. Why, take these Estimates, and we find, that for interest and subsidies alone, we are called upon to pay $15,400,000 a year; we find that the charges on Customs and Excise, which are necessary to be paid as a matter of course, before we can collect revenue amount to $1,125,000; we find that our average payments for Indian grants reach no less a sum than $1,100,000—that is to say, that is the sum which we have been obliged to pay for the last three or four years, and as those grants are largely in the nature of treaties, they must be added, I think, for the purpose of this argument, to show the regular fixed charges. Then the Minister did not deny that the expenditure on post office account now involved an annual deficit of $1,000,000. The expenditure demanded is $2,840,000, with the prospect of a considerable addition in the Supplemental Estimates, and our total receipts from that source are not computed to exceed $1,850,000; while as to our railways and other public works, if those accounts are made out fairly, if what ought to be charged to capital account will only be placed there, and what ought to be charged to ordinary expenditure be placed under that heading, I am sure I would be rather under than over the mark in stating that the annual deficit in working all our railways is likely to amount to $500,000, particularly when the Short Line, which we are about to subsidise at the cost of the people, to cut the throat of the Intercolonial Railway, shall be completed and in working order. So that you get this result, that out of an estimated revenue of some $27,500,000, probably $19,000,000 will have to be expended on charges like these before we will receive any money for the ordinary use and expenses of this country. Now, I say those facts taken collectively are a most scandalous exhibit. I say there is no justification whatever for a country in our position and our circumstances having allowed such a state of things to exist; and those hon. gentlemen who recollect as well as I do the boastful promises with which this National Policy was ushered in, those who recollect the still more absurd predictions which were indulged in as to what it would accomplish, will know how little dependence is to be placed on any of the calculations which these hon. gentlemen submit to the House on these occasions. Whether we remember the declaration that we might expect, before the next four or five years, the sum of $58,000,000 from the sales of lands in the North-West, or whether we recollect the declaration with which every hustings re-echoed in 1882, that when the people of Canada once confirmed the National Policy, hundreds of millions of foreign capital would rush in for the erection of manufactories throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, whether we recollect the statement given on the highest authority that the Crooks Act was not worth the paper it was written on, whether we remember the declaration of the Minister of Public Works, that he and his colleagues had traversed the North-West from end to end six months before the rebellion, without being able to discover one single person with a grievance, or whether we remember the statement of the late Minister of Finance that ten years of assured and certain prosperity awaited this happy people—I think we may say there is some ground for hesitating to put implicit credence in any of the calculations that may be submitted to us to-night. But three years have elapsed since the then Minister of Finance (Sir Leonard Tilley) standing here, exulted, and exulted with some apparent reason, in the fact that Canada was possessed of a surplus of $7,000,000. To-day the Finance Minister (Mr. McLelan), if he chooses to state the question fairly and honestly, is obliged to admit, on his own showing, a deficit of nearly $5,000,000. Now, the fact that there were great surpluses three years ago, so far from excusing or palliating the deficit of to-day, in reality greatly aggravates it. It shows the worst possible financial management that we should have these great surpluses within these few years, and that they should be followed by equally great deficits. I say more, that there was everything in the circumstances which preceded and attended the great increases of revenue in 1882 and 1883 to give warning to hon. gentlemen opposite. It was quite clear those great increases were, in the nature of the case, unhealthy increases. There was no corresponding growth throughout the country; there was no corresponding increase of people; there was no corresponding or adequate increase in the exports. There was a great capital expenditure, it was true, going on, largely provided by the people of this country at their own expense by borrowing money abroad. It was clear that must stop, and that when it did our imports would cease to a very large extent, and our revenue would consequently fall. And I say that this enormous surplus was a proof that the taxation levied on the people was most excessive; and it was doubly mischievous in this respect, that it tended largely to cripple their resources and had a very great tendency to encourage the Government in the most extravagant possible expenditure. The hon. gentleman, who was most particularly responsible for that state of things, has disappeared for the second time. I am sorry, Sir, he did so, but, like other prudent commanders, when stormy winds do blow he has found it convenient to seek the seclusion which his cabin grants. I may say I most sincerely regret his disappearance from the scene; I would have been very glad had he been present to-night; I would have freely forfeited the difference between the salary which he now receives and the salary he then received had he not resigned, no doubt, because he was convinced conscientiously he was no longer capable of fulfilling duties. But, Mr. Speaker, as to the hon. gentleman who succeeds him, I have no doubt that his case calls for considerable commiseration at our hands. I have no doubt whatever that the hon. gentleman has been somewhat hardly treated in having been called upon at such a time to assume the duties of his present post. It is well known to those of us who have had the opportunity of watching the ways and works of the First Minister, that that hon. gentleman has usually had his reasons for anything that he has done. Now, Sir, that hon. gentleman has always been conspicuous—at least, his friends and admirers have always claimed credit for him, and I think he has taken great credit to himself—for two things: for his extreme knowledge of constitutional law, of which the proofs can be found in the recent decisions of the Privy Council passim; and for the skill which he has displayed in selecting the proper parties to fill the proper places, and I am not at all disposed to say that the hon. gentleman has not justified his high reputation in the present instance. I am aware that many persons are under the impression that it is necessary that Ministers of Finance should know finance, but I venture to say that is a vulgar superstition. Cela dépend, as my French friends would say. It depends almost entirely upon what duties are required from the Minister of Finance for the time being. If it be his duty to curb, or if it be desirable that he should endeavor to curb, the extravagance that some departments may naturally feel disposed to engage in, or if he is to form an accurate estimate of the resources of the country so as to prevent us from being committed rashly to undertakings far beyond our real resources, or if it is expected that he will be willing to undergo a certain temporary unpopularity rather than engage in a policy which may bring ultimate disaster and injury to the country, then, no doubt, it is desirable in such cases that the Minister of Finance should be well acquainted with the principles of finance. But it is sometimes possible that a Minister of Finance may be desired for other qualities than these. It is possible—and of course the House will understand that I only speak by way of hypothesis and illustration—it is possible, for instance, that a Minister of Finance may be required for the purpose of bringing up the average respectability of the Cabinet to the proper standard, and of giving certain influential parties an excuse for voting for the Prime Minister of the day; and in those cases it is very likely that a knowledge of finance may not be necessary or perhaps desirable in the Minister who is to fill that post; or under certain contingencies it may be possible that a Minister of Finance is wanted for other purposes than these. A Minister of Finance may be required occasionally to discharge the functions—I speak it with all respect—of a buffer. It may be that a Minister of Finance may be required to act as “feather bed ’tween castle wall and heavy brunt of cannon ball,” and in certain cases he shows the merits of a good general, if he has to hold an indefensible position that cannot be defended except at great loss, to garrison that post not with his best troops, but with the troops he can best spare. I would be very sorry to impute such things to the hon. the First Minister, but I may say that it would be excellent strategy, though somewhat hard on the poor troops that might be sacrificed. I think it due to the Premier in his absence to say that I, for one, feel convinced that he will be found to have had his reasons—and I dare say very excellent reasons—for everything he has chosen to do, whether it be his choice of a Minister of Finance or his conduct in drawing up a motion of want of confidence to be moved by a staunch supporter against his own Administration.

Mr. BOWELL. And against which you voted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That shows the tact of the hon. gentleman. As to the Estimates, as I have said, I cannot agree with the idea that you should charge to capital account the cost of suppressing the recent rebellion, and as to the rest I fear the hon. gentleman will prove to have been in error in considerably more than one respect. The hon. gentleman admitted that he had not included in his expenditure for the future year the expenses of the Franchise Act, and, whether they be as large as in the present year or be considerably diminished, they must of necessity form a considerable item. I am very much afraid, from our experience in the past, that the sum which he demands for Indian grants will prove inadequate. Over and over again we have seen similar attempts to cut down those grants, and over and over again it has been found absolutely necessary to add two, or three, or four hundred thousand dollars by Governor General's warrants to the sum at first demanded. I fear very much that at least $150,000, if not $200,000, will be required for that service before the Supplementary Estimates for 1887 are done. In the case of the mounted police, if I can form any conjectures from the expenditure which has been incurred for the 500 men who formerly composed that force, I fear that a very considerable amount will have to be added to the sum demanded. As to public works, the hon. gentleman admitted frankly and candidly that there was no doubt a considerable further sum would be wanted. Now, Sir, the original estimates for 1884-85 amounted to $29,811,000, the sum actually expended was $35,000,000; and deducting from that $1,700,000, which was the cost of putting down the rebellion in the North-West charged to that year, you find that the original estimates for 1885 were exceeded by the sum of $3,500,000. I very much fear, however earnestly the Minister of Finance may desire to control these estimates, that he will find very soon that instead of the sum of $33,124,000, he will require at least $35,000,000 for the service of 1886-87. As to his calculation for receipts, it is almost impossible, eighteen months ahead, to form any accurate forecast. If we are careful, if we avoid any more disturbances, if we have good harvests, if there is no great trade convulsions, then, possibly enough, the hon. gentleman's estimates may be realised. But I point out to him that if my calculations be correct, and if he requires to raise, as I fear he will, a sum of $35,000,000 for the service of 1886-87, there will still be a very considerable deficit to be supplied for which his additional taxes will hardly make provision. The hon. gentleman has not taken into account, at least so far as I heard him, the important fact that there is now a very great cessation of capital expenditure, and consequently a great cessation of imports, and the revenue derived therefrom. Neither has he taken into account the important matter that there is now an era of low prices, particularly as regards the price of agricultural products, all over the world, and that there are very few signs of any improvement in that direction for some time to come. As to his proposed taxes, Sir, I doubt very much if the Minister of Finance, or, indeed any of his advisers, are able, at present, to form any accurate idea of how those taxes will really result. That substitution which he proposes to make of specific for ad valorem duties, although from a revenue point of view something may be said for it, is, nevertheless, one which tends, and always will tend, to add very considerably to the weight of taxation which falls on the poorer class of the community. Of necessity every specific tax must always press more heavily on the class of goods consumed by the poor than on goods consumed by those in comfortable circumstances; and although it may possibly be the case that some considerable accession of revenue may accrue from two or three of these alterations, still the hon. gentleman is perfectly aware that if there be any additional manufacture of any importance created by reason of this change, that will entirely do away with the effects of the increased revenue he may otherwise count upon. As to the tax he proposes to levy upon the articles of sugar, I cannot, without detaining the House for a length of time, which I would not feel justified in doing now, venture to form any accurate idea of the amount of revenue which he expects. I do not remember that he stated himself, but I should suppose from the general tenor of his remarks, that he counts on receiving something like $500,000 from that source. If he counts on more, perhaps the hon. gentleman will state so.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But I observe that apparently, a tax of about 2½ cents per pound, or thereabouts, was to be levied in future on all sugar above No. 13 Dutch standard. Now, Sir, as we imported about 200,000,000 lbs. of sugar in the year 1885, even after making a considerable allowance for the waste and loss in the process of manufacture, it appears to me that one result of these proposed taxes will be to add very materially to the cost of sugar to the people of this country, without bringing an adequate return to the revenue. If 2½ per cent. be the tax proposed to be levied on sugar above No. 13, that would, converting the 200,000,000 lbs. into the quantity of sugar which we may fairly suppose would be manufactured from that amount, involve a total tax in reality on the people of something like $4,750,000—I speak roughly—but I think that it will be found to amount very nearly to that sum; whereas, so far as I can understand the hon. gentleman, the total revenue he expects to receive would hardly amount to more than $3,000,000 at the outside. What the effect of the addition of his tax on cottons, which I understand he proposes to raise from 20 to 27½ per cent., may be, I have not at present the means of ascertaining, and I will follow the example of the hon. gentleman in that respect and defer further criticism on that head until we receive his explanation in detail. But I may say, in general, that I am very much afraid it will be found that the practical result of all these taxes will be to add very much more considerably to the burdens of the people than is represented by any revenue we are likely to gain for the Treasury. Now, Sir, it is worth our while, under the circumstances, to make a brief analysis of the free list as it is left by the hon. gentleman. When I come to examine the free list, and when we deduct the articles imported free for the use of the Canadian Pacific Railway, settlers' goods and articles for public use, tobacco for Excise purposes, wool, cotton and hides for manufacturing uses, we may ask what article of general consumption, with the solitary exception of tea, the hon. gentleman proposes to leave untaxed in our present tariff? Sir, deducting those articles, none of which, as I have said, with the exception of tea, can be considered as articles of general consumption, it is really worth the attention of this House to see what necessities of life a paternal Government has seen fit to exempt from taxation. Deducting those, Sir, I find that the chief articles which the people of this country are to be allowed to import free of duty are copies of old masters, diamonds in the rough, fossils, ambergris, musk, leeches, cabinets of coin, and sawdust; while, Sir, luxuries, such as the food of the people, the fuel of the people, the tools of the people, books, clothes and medicine, are one and all visited by a remorseless taxation. Sir, the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have practically neutralised the benefit of every invention which has been made for the last half dozen years, at least, and they have the proud distinction, as far as I know, of having devised a tariff which admits fewer articles of general consumption used by the bulk of the people free, than any other tariff I have ever had the opportunity of perusing. Last year when I took occasion to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to some of these matters, in the course of his speech made in the latter part of that Session, I remember that the hon. gentleman told us the Government were not afraid to spend money. That, Sir, was a remarkable boast, and also a truthful one, for I am bound to admit that neither the hon. gentleman nor his colleagues are in the slightest degree afraid of spending other people's money. The hon. gentleman laid great stress on one matter which he appeared to think was a sufficient answer to all that has been advanced on this side of the House, as to the pressure of taxation on the people of Canada. He pointed to the increase of the savings banks deposits, and said that was a proof of great prosperity. Sir, I say that is not a proof of great prosperity, but it proves that the people are afraid to invest; it is a proof that the people are afraid to buy, are afraid to build, are afraid to engage in new undertakings. Now, Sir, I was sorry to hear the hon. gentleman, in speaking of that question, avow the determination of the Government to adhere to the policy they have heretofore pursued in the matter of savings banks, and as he appeared to me to have considerably misrepresented the attitude of gentlemen on this side on that question, I desire to call his attention, for a few moments, to what we did really contend. Now, Sir, I say that in respect of this matter of savings banks, the Ministers, or some of them, were really very ignorant of what our contention was, or else they were wilfully misleading the people. Our allegation was this: That it is impolitic and imprudent to pay on large sums of money 33 per cent. more than the current market rate, especially when the returns show clearly and conclusively that that money is paid not for the purpose of encouraging the poor to save, not for the purpose of encouraging thrift among the poorer classes of the community, but is simply and solely taxing the rest of the public for the benefit of a very large number of persons who can by no stretch of language be considered as specially entitled to the protection of the Government. Sir, I find from the returns recently laid on the Table of this House that in the case of the post office savings banks alone there were in June, 1884, $13,179,000 on deposit. Now, it is quite true there were a very large number of depositors, numbering some 66,000, and as the hon. gentleman contended, if you divide $13,000,000 by 66,000, the average is a very small one. But that conceals a very transparent fallacy. When you come to analyse those returns you find that $2,789,000 of that amount was held by 2,476 persons who had an average of $1,112 apiece; that $3,119,000 was held by 5,000 persons, with an average of $700 apiece, and that $3,200,000 was held by persons with an average of $400 and upwards apiece: so that of those $13,000,000, $9,300,000, in average amounts of $650 was held by one-fourth, or rather less, of the whole depositors. And in the same way in the Government savings banks; out of $16,000,000, $9,000,000 were held by 4,000 people, in sums of $2,100 and upwards, and $2,900,000 in sums of $700, and $1,600,000 in sums of $400 and upwards. The result of all that is plain and clear. The Government of Canada has been paying 30 per cent. more than the current rates, for the benefit of persons who have no claim in any shape or way to have the rest of the community taxed for their exclusive benefit. I am willing enough to concede to the Ministers the propriety, if they like, of granting to those who hold small sums of money, let us say below $300, the privilege of depositing in the Government savings bank and receiving interest at 4 per cent. But of this gross amount of $35,000,000 it is quite clear that not 20 per cent. is held by such persons. The vast bulk is held in sums largely in excess of $400 apiece by a class of the community not in any shape or way entitled to expect that the rest of the country should be taxed to enable them to obtain a high rate of interest. Sir, let us look at the absurdity of the whole proceeding. Every one who is conversant with these matters is aware that the rate of interest has fallen from 30 to 40 per cent. within the last six or seven years. It is quite true when I was Minister of Finance, we were in the habit of giving 4 per cent. on average balances in the savings bank, because 4, 4½ and 5 per cent. could be obtained in banks of very good standing, for the same kind of deposits. So that it cannot be said that the Government of Canada at that time were interfering with the market or were paying one farthing more than the money was really worth. Now, what is the fact? The hon. gentleman cannot name any bank in high standing which pays 3 per cent., and it is known to him, I have no doubt, as it is known to many hon. members here, that 2 per cent. is all that is given for deposits in more than one of the chief banks of this Dominion. So that we have Ministers paying an excessive rate of interest for money, making misleading statements and generally injuring and interfering with business, because the Minister of Finance must be aware of this fact, that if the Government choose to pay more interest than money is worth, they will greatly interfere with the legitimate trade and business of the country, and will, to a very considerable extent, prevent men from investing in new enterprises, which they would undoubtedly do if they could obtain money at fair and reasonable rates, and thereby give employment to many persons whom the hon. gentleman says he desires to assist. The hon. gentleman stated that the National Policy has been eminently successful. Well, Sir, thanks to the National Policy, or at all events under the National Policy, we have had far larger deficits than we ever had since Confederation commenced. The National Policy has led to far greater expenditure, far heavier taxation, greater debt, and very serious dissatisfaction among the very persons who are specially designed to be protected. It may suit the hon. gentleman and it may suit his friends to assure the House that the manufactures of Canada are to-day thoroughly well satisfied with their position. But those who will take the trouble to acquaint themselves with the temper and feelings of the manufacturers know that I state the simple truth when I say that wherever you go and wherever you mix largely with manufacturers you will find there is a very strong undercurrent among them of desire for a commercial union. I have always pointed out, and I repeat now, that that is the logical and natural outcome of a protective policy as applied in a country like this, and I am bound to say that it is utterly impossible when applying a protective system to so small a country as this to prevent people from perceiving that if you are going to persevere in such a policy, it is far better to have free trade, with 60,000,000 of people, than to persevere in our present state of barbarous isolation. There is a political and a very serious side to this question, on which I do not desire to dwell now; but I have no doubt whatever in my mind, as there was no doubt when this policy was proposed, that our stupid and foolish imitation of the American protective system would inevitably result, as it is resulting to-day, in causing a very large number of manufacturers of Canada to desire, at any cost and in any shape or fashion, to extend our markets and obtain a commercial, if not a political incorporation with the United States. The Minister of Finance was good enough to allude to the position which hon. members, on this side of the House occupied seven years ago. I shall not shrink, for my part, from accepting his challenge. What was the attitude of the present Opposition in 1879. We were called upon to consider the probable consequences of the great fiscal revolution that was impending. What was the line we took? We showed then, as I can show to-night, that from a revenue point of view, it was a very foolish proceeding. We showed then that the tariff was so framed that with the solitary exception of the barbarous taxes on flour and on coal, no additional revenue could possibly be obtained from it until general business improved, and that the moment general business improved, then that tariff would produce a great deal more than the necessities of the country required, and this excessive taxation would tend to scandalous corruption and scandalous extravagance. We showed in the next place that for a protective system the Canadian market was far too small. I said then and I say now that the manufacturers if they had known their own interest would have been infinitely better off in the long run under the tariff of 1878. I said then and I say now that the result of that tariff has been largely to increase the cost of manufacturing, that it has diminished the number of the manufacturers customers, and it has diminished their power of purchasing manufactures, that it has led to an enormous waste of capital, and so far as manufacturers are concerned the domestic competition to which they have been exposed has been very much keener and more injurious to them than the foreign competition they were so desirous to escape.

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I say yes, and I am speaking, in making that statement, according to the information given to me by manufacturers of every class and grade, including a great many who were formerly as loud clamorers for the National Policy as even my hon. friend opposite. The more you protect those gentlemen, the more of necessity they want protection, and not altogether of their own fault. The hon. gentleman's policy, as I said before, has greatly increased in many articles the cost of production, and having greatly increased the cost of production, these gentlemen find now, that in order to keep out the competing goods which they dread, they are obliged to come constantly to the Minister of Finance, and in some shape or form, either by a direct addition to the taxation, or by the substitution of a specific for an ad valorem duty—which is a neat and easy way of covering a large addition—they demand further protection at his hands. As regards the great bulk of the people, every day's experience has demonstrated its worthlessness. We said it was sure to injure the farmers. These gentlemen said: Give us our National Policy, and you shall have such prices for all your products as you never saw before, and in truth they have such prices as they never saw before. In my own county, where I was defeated largely because I declined to impose a tax of fifteen cents a bushel on barley, I recollect that on the 17th of September, 1878, barley touched $1.15 per bushel, and to-day—I am sorry for it—the price is only 45 cents per bushel. These hon. gentlemen's organs are constantly instructing the farmers to-day that it is absurd, unjust, and irrational to expect that the Government should fix the price of grain, that the price of grain is fixed by the London and Liverpool market, and that it is unjust to hold the Government responsible for the fall in the price of grain and agricultural products of all kinds. And, Sir, there may be some truth in that, but those hon. gentlemen are not entitled to plead that in mitigation, seeing that they won their present places by most solemn promises to their unfortunate dupes that they would succeed in obtaining the highest possible prices for all articles they had to sell. We pointed out that the imposition of this heavy tariff would be sure to stop settlement in the North-West, that it was a cruel as well as an impolitic thing to so add to the taxes of these pioneers as practically to take a large percentage off the small capital they needed to establish themselves in that country; and we pointed out further what events have shown, that diminishing the profits of the farmers and those dependent on them, was a sure way to increase and not to stop the exodus of the people from this country. Lastly we pointed out then, and I repeat it now, that no more stupid act of folly was ever committed than in insisting on imitating the protective policy of the United States. I say there are no two countries which afford less precedent, one for the other, than the United States does to Canada in that respect. I do not believe that the Americans have profited by their protective policy. I hold, as Mr. Chamberlain, and as many of the best informed Americans hold to-day, that they would be infinitely more formidable competitors with England in the markets of the world if they adopted a more rational fiscal policy. But I have always admitted this, that the circumstances of the United States are such that there is probably no country on the face of the earth where the experiment could be tried with less risk of permanent injury than the United States, as also we contend that there never was a country less suited for that experiment than this Dominion of Canada. Why, Sir, the United States extend from the tropics to the arctic zone. They have an enormous inter-provincial trade, if you so choose to call it; they have a large natural market; they had attained a very great degree of manufacturing prosperity under their old system before introducing a protective tariff. During the best portion of American history, from 1845 to 1860, they had a tariff almost precisely similar to that which existed here from 1874 to 1878, and it was only when they fell into the misfortune of their civil war, and when it became possible for greedy adventurers to turn the needs of the nation to their selfish purposes, that they adopted their present fiscal system. Now, Sir, in Canada, in every possible shape and way we are at a disadvantage in adopting a protective system. Our several Provinces, be it Manitoba, or Quebec, or Ontario, or Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, or Prince Edward Island—all substantially produce the same articles; they are all rather competitors than customers to each other; their markets are largely outside of Canada, and from the stress of natural circumstances their markets will continue to be outside of Canada. That may be our misfortune, but it is none the less the fact. Now, Sir, I say that there have been two very potent causes of mischief in bringing about the present state of affairs here. One of those I believe to have been the protective system and not so much in its direct as in its indirect results. Sir, the moment you succeed in convincing a large portion of the people of a country that by some financial legerdemain, you have devised a means by which great taxes may be imposed on the people without impoverishing them, you destroy of necessity almost the only wholesome safeguard you possess to enable you to restrain the extravagance in which otherwise Governments would indulge; and it has been to a considerable degree because hon. gentlemen opposite have succeeded in confusing the people's mind to that extent, that they have been allowed to go as far as they have gone in their career of wholesale extravagance. As to the direct effects they are almost equally pernicious. They tend to create a permanent and most corrupt lobby and to foster a great many sinister influences; they tend directly to make manufacturers careless of their own business, and much more disposed to rely on the political influence they can bring to bear on the Ministers of the day, than in the exercise of their own brains and their own energy in advancing their manufactures. That is one cause, but it is only one cause of the present state of things. There is another which is equally potent, and that cause I am sorry to say is the corruption of our present system of Government. To a very great extent it is painfully true that the policy of the present Government has been to debauch, not merely the members, but the constituencies and the Provinces of this country. I say, Sir, that these hon. gentlemen would appear almost of set purpose to have devoted themselves to the task of setting aside the Act of Confederation; and, Sir, although we knew very well what were the private inclinations of hon. gentlemen opposite, it remained for certain revelations the other day to show us that even in 1867 nothing but the resolution of the late Sir George Cartier prevented the will of the people from being practically set aside and a legislative union substituted for Confederation in the conference at London. Sir, I charge these gentlemen with having deliberately violated the whole spirit of our federal compact. I say this federal compact of ours is essentially a limited partnership. We had tried, at least in old Canada, a closer form of union. We found it would not work, and we dissolved it; and now, being thus federated, having entered into this limited partnership, I say—and I am sorry if the sentiment is not approved of by the general good sense of this House—it is practically a fraud for any one partner to take the general property and appropriate it to his private uses. If there be one thing more than another which deserves to be denounced on the floor of this House, and before the people, it has been the use, or the abuse, which has been made of a certain doubtful clause in the Confederation Act to enable the present Government to obtain possession of the whole system of railways of Canada, and to make use of it as a vehicle for almost unlimited corruption. As for the North-West, although I should be very glad indeed to hear that the hon. gentleman had succeeded in devising any way in which they could relieve us from the burden of the enormous advances made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, I must say I would welcome still more the tidings that the most unwholesome monopoly which has been created in favor of that corporation were at once and forever abolished. The result of creating that monopoly has been to make all the sacrifices that Canada has incurred up to this time all but worthless. As matters stand, even according to the statements made by the hon. gentleman, what is our position? We have practically nearly doubled our debt; we have practically—if you regard the amount taken out of the pockets of the people, not simply the amount put into the Treasury—trebled our taxation; we have had rebellions on the right and deficits on the left. We have, moreover—and this is a point hon. gentlemen will have to consider—all sorts of claims impending by reason of their unwise legislation, particularly in this matter of donations to local railways. Hon. gentlemen may not be aware that in very many sections of Ontario there is a very strong feeling, with which they will have to reckon one of these days; that the many millions of dollars which have been advanced by the people of Ontario out of their own pockets, through grants from the Local Legislature or by municipal bonuses, to the various railways in Ontario, must be compensated for if the Government of Canada are undertaking to provide railways for the convenience of the inhabitants of every other section of the Dominion. What we may have to pay to Ontario for the permits which were freely granted a short time ago to plunder her territory in dispute, I am not in a position to say, although I have no doubt hon. gentlemen opposite will soon hear on that subject, if they have not heard already, from the Ontario Government. Sir, the hon. gentleman congratulates us that Confederation is now at last held together by means of the magnificent railway which has lately been constructed. Well, Sir, that would be more to the purpose if we, the people of Canada, who have been obliged up to the present moment to find every penny which went to build that railway, were the possessors of our own property; but as we do not even own or control it—as for aught we know, the whole control of that railway, with the vast privileges and territories appertaining to it, may be to-day in the hands of some French or American or German capitalists, I do not know that we can regard that as any very great pledge of the permanent continuance of Confederation. I must say, Sir, reviewing the whole situation, and going back not merely to the time of Confederation, but going back for a period of twenty-seven or twenty-eight years, the situation is not one which any man can regard with pleasure. I do not intend to inflict on the House a detailed statement of Canadian finances for the last twenty-eight years; but I may as well call the attention of the House to these facts, that in 1858 we had a deficit of $3,375,000; that a period of eight years elapsed before we had produced an equilibrium in our finances; that after entering Confederation we had, it is true, in the first year an apparent equilibrium, but in the second a real deficit; that after that, it is true, we had several surpluses, followed by five successive deficits; that then we had three surpluses more; that then, in the year before the last, if you state the accounts fairly, and give credit for sums that ought to have been placed to ordinary expenditure account, you will find we barely made both ends meet; that in 1885 we have a deficit of $2,250,000; and that for 1886, even according to the statement of the hon. Finance Minister, we shall have a deficit of $5,000,000, unless we permit him to charge the $3,500,000 which he expects to spend on North-West account, to capital account. Now, Sir, to put the matter briefly, in the last twenty-eight years, taking into account the history of old Canada, we have had some fifteen deficits, three years in which we barely equalised our expenditure and our revenue, and ten surpluses. Sir, there is a lesson to be learned from all that. Three times over we have had the opportunity of recovering our position, and three times over we have chosen to take advantage of that opportunity for the purpose of incurring many further and unnecessary expenses; and in some respects, it must be borne in mind, our present situation is worse than any situation we have been in before. Prior to 1880 there is no doubt there was a very large margin available for taxation. Prior to that date there was a large steady annual growth. I am not in a position to say exactly what was done in the Maritime Provinces; but I believe that in Quebec and Ontario during those years 300,000 or 400,000 acres of moderately good new land were regularly brought into cultivation. Of late this has been entirely changed. Putting Manitoba aside for the moment, we find that very little new land is being brought into cultivation in the various Provinces; and we find, what is worse, that the increase of our population is very slow. The hon. gentleman puts it at 4,800,000. I would be very glad for my part to believe that that was the case; but I am sorry to say that the investigation which I have been able to give to that subject strongly tends to convince me that the total white population of Canada at this moment does not exceed 4,500,000. That, it is true, does not differ materially from the calculations of the hon. gentleman, if he assumed 4,700,000 as his basis, and added 100,000 for the Indian population. But, since 1881 we have had before us the statistics of Quebec and the statistics of Ontario; and we have also very serious evidence, in the returns recently laid before us, of the population of the North-West, of the extremely small number of immigrants we have been able to settle in that region. I may add that a very curious piece of evidence will be found in the American census, showing that, while in 1880 there were 717,000 native Canadians in the United States, there were in the same year 939,000 children of Canadian fathers and mothers born in the United States—a fact which shows extremely clearly, first of all, that the number is not at all likely to have been exaggerated, and next that those who left our country were persons in the prime and vigor of manhood or womanhood, as the case might be.

An hon. MEMBER. Who are responsible for that?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The men who raised the expenditure of Canada from $13,000,000 to $35,000,000; who doubled and trebled our debt, doubled and trebled our taxation; who created land monopolies and the most scandalous railway monopoly the world has known, at the cost of the unfortunate people who are condemned to pay the expense. Those are the men who are responsible for the loss of 2,000,000 Canadians, who are responsible for the loss of 717,000 Canadians in the United States in 1880 and for the loss of the children born of Canadian people in the last twenty years—those and none other. Doubtless, during the last six or seven years, we had a very great opportunity presented to us, which, if wisely used by the present Government, might have atoned for all their errors, fiscal and otherwise, and might have resulted in the formation of a magnificent Province of which we might all be proud. Look at what has occurred in the North-West, and what has occurred in the adjacent States. I am not disposed myself to say that the very large expectations which were held out to us by the Government, seven or eight years ago were at all too highly colored, if the Government had only used common prudence, common energy, and common honesty in endeavoring to fulfil them. Had the Government in 1880 simply stood aside and allowed the people to use that magnificent country and make the best of it, had they not interfered, had they not, by the creation of their railway monopoly and by their most injudicious and ill-advised management of our lands, driven hundreds of thousands of our people away from Canada to seek homes in the United States; all that was expected by those hon. gentlemen from the growth and progress of the North-West might have been very easily secured. But as it is, we have spent, as I said, $100,000,000 of the people's money; of the property of private persons, many millions have also been sunk in the North-West, and whereas we might easily have had three-quarters of a million, if not a million, of people settled there now, we find there is scarcely 200,000 of white population. We find, looking at the very last returns those hon. gentlemen have sent us, of the population of the three immense Provinces, Assiniboia, Saskatchewan and Alberta, that the population in each is as follows:—

Alberta	4,800

Between the second and third meridian, a distance of 200 miles long by fifty broad, along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, there are forty homesteads; between the third and fourth meridian, another distance of 200 miles, there are ninety-eight homesteads. I wonder do hon. gentlemen opposite understand in the least what those territories comprise or what those statements mean? Those three Provinces cover an extent of 280,000 square miles, 400 miles in width by 700 miles in length, and have the Canadian Pacific Railway line running through them for 800 miles; and all the result of this huge expenditure, all the result of this enormous sacrifice made by the people has been to add but 3,000 families to the population which was already there in 1881. Now, the hon. gentleman accused us of being altogether too narrow-minded in hesitating at the expenditure of public money. I beg to say that, for my own part and on the part of my hon. friends beside me, we have not the smallest hesitation about expending public money, if only we could obtain adequate results. Let those hon. gentlemen show us a million or even three quarters of a million of settlers; let them show us public works that yield anything like a fair and honest interest on the money expended, and I will not complain of them for having added $100,000,000 or even $150,000,000 to the public debt, or for having enormously increased taxation. What I complain of is that those gentlemen have muddled away our millions and given us nothing to show for them. Contrast their conduct with the conduct of the United States or Australia, as they seem to be desirous of drawing a comparison between our position and theirs. I turn to the United States, and I find that whereas in 1790 the United States started on their national career with a population of 3,900,000 and a debt of $75,000,000, without any immigration whatever, without any assistance from foreign states, in twenty years, one year more than Canada has at present completed, the population of the United States stood at 7,215,000 and their debt had sunk from $75,000,000 to $53,000,000. I shall not pursue the painful record further than this, that in 1850, before their great civil war, the population of the United States was 23,000,000, and their debt $63,400,000. Or, take the case of the Australian colonies; take the case of New South Wales. There you will find a great outlay but also a great return. A small colony, with a population under 900,000 souls, ventured to borrow $100,000,000, an enormous percentage no doubt, in proportion to the population; but you will also find that this $100,000,000 was so wisely expended that, over and above the working expenses of their railways, a net return of something over 4 per cent. is now paid on the public works of that colony. These are two examples, if the hon. gentleman wants them. The one is the case of a Federal State which has wisely kept out of debt; the other is the case of a State having a legislative form of Government, where good value has been got for all the money spent. But what have we got for our $200,000,000 added to our debt within the last 19 years? We have: Item, one Canadian Pacific Railway scandal; item, two rebellions; item, seven deficits; item, one outrageous railway monopoly. We do not even own the road we ourselves built and paid for. Here lies our reproach; we have neither known how to spend nor how to save. I believe myself that of the $200,000,000 which have been added in nineteen years to our national debt, a prudent and wise expenditure of $50,000,000 would have given us far better results. We have had very great advantages. Some that came to us by pure accident and good fortune, and I am sorry to say we must be considered by all impartial observers to have attained, in the use of those advantages, a most signal failure. Those very returns just brought down show that we brought, since 1867, 900,000, within the merest fraction, immigrants to this country, and everybody knows, not only how we utterly failed to keep them here, but, what was much more important, we have failed to keep our own people in the country; and the failure has been much more pronounced since the introduction of the National Policy than ever before. There was another point touched on by the Minister of Finance to which I shall call attention. He insisted on the incidence of taxation. He gave us to understand the policy of the Government was, as far as they could, to free the poor man from an undue pressure of taxation. If that be the case, I for one will be disposed, to a very great extent, to excuse all the faults and follies of the National Policy. But not only have they done that, but they have worked the direct opposite. I believe that I shall presently be able to show the House that there is scarcely any English speaking country where the frugal, abstemious, temperate, honest workman has to pay so heavy a portion of the public burdens as he has in this country of Canada. Now, it will not do, in measuring the incidence of taxation, to look simply to the gross amount of the taxes, or to look to the mere number of the people. You have to see how the taxation is put on, and you have to see, into the bargain, what is the proportion it bears to the wealth of the people. I will take three cases, and, in the first place, I will take the case of England. There, no doubt, there is a large total taxation. Their population is put in their last return at 36,000,000. Their taxation amounts, in the whole, to £72,000,000 sterling, but £26,000,000 of that is levied by way of income tax and stamp taxes, which no one can pretend in any way effect an ordinary poor man. Then their Customs tax amounts to £19,700,000, and their Excise to £27,000,000 that class of taxation amounting in all to about £46,600,000 which is the taxation which the poor man may be said to bear. If hon. gentlemen will divide that by 36,000,000, they will see that the total Customs and Excise of England amounts to exactly $6 24 per head while the total Customs and Excise of Canada, computing the population at 4,500,000 white people, will amount, according to the Minister's statement, to $27,500,000, giving a result of $6.10; so that the total per capita taxation which can with any propriety be said to be paid by an ordinary wage-earner in Canada is almost precisely equal to that which is paid in England. But, when you recollect how this taxation bears upon the frugal, abstemious, temperate laborer, you will see how greatly English taxation is in favor of such a man and how greatly Canadian taxation is against him. It must be recollected that the entire Excise taxation is purely voluntary. Any man who chooses, for his own sake or for the sake of his family, to deny himself the use of liquors and tobacco, escapes the whole of that taxation either here or in England, but, when you come to consider the Customs taxation, then the enormous superiority of the English method so far as the poor man is concerned, becomes exceedingly marked. Of the nineteen millions and a-half of English Customs, about fourteen millions and a-half are levied on wine and spirits and tobacco, leaving barely five millions, chiefly in the duties on tea and coffee, which is necessarily borne by the English poor man who chooses to be frugal and abstemious and to deny himself the ordinary luxuries of his class. So it follows that an average tax of 66 cents per head is all the English laborer need pay, under the existing English tariff, to the English revenue. How stands it in Canada? Strike out, if you like, the entire Excise duty; strike out, if you like, the entire duties on wine and spirits and tobacco which are levied by our Customs tariff; and you will find that in Canada, no matter how frugal, how abstemious, how temperate a man may be, he must necessarily pay at the rate of at least $4 per head for every member of his family and for himself, as against 66 cts. per head which is all that his brother mechanic need pay in England. And, if you choose to refer to the condition of things in the Australian colonies, you will find that, in place of the enormous taxation which I saw with some surprise hon. gentlemen asserted was paid in Australia, and which I think was rated as high as $35 or $40 per head—although a very little consideration might have shown those gentlemen that such enormous taxes were never likely to be paid in any community—if you refer to the recent statistics published by those colonies, you will find that, so far from that being the case, in New South Wales, with a population of 869,000, the total taxation was £1,891,000, being at the rate of a little over $10 per head from all sources. It is true that that is apparently a much larger taxation than the taxation in Canada; but ours is a federal system, these persons are living under a legislative union, and, on looking at the expenditure side of the account, I find that almost one-half of the total amount is devoted to schools; I find that £870,000, out of a total of £1,891,000 is paid for schools; and, of their total Customs taxation of £1,500,000, the sum levied on liquors and cigars is no less than £954,000. So that, again as before, in New South Wales as in England, the frugal, temperate wage-earner is practically almost exempt from taxation. I need not say to those persons who have taken the trouble to acquaint themselves with the statistics of Australia that the wealth of the Australian colonies is much greater than ours. It is absolutely true that in New South Wales, with a population of 869,000, the exports in 1883 amounted to $99,000,000, or nearly $20,000,000 more than we, with our 4,500,000 of people or 4,700,000, if the hon. gentleman likes, were able to export in the preceding year. If I were to pursue the examination, if I were to compare the quantity of stock possessed by these colonies with ours, the disparity in agricultural wealth between those colonies and Canada would appear in very startling colors indeed. Then we will take the case of the United States, to which also the Minister of Finance referred. Now here alone in one respect is the burden equal, because, as he fairly enough showed, the protective system of the United States is even heavier than ours; but, in the United States, at this present moment, all the people of that country require to raise by taxation is barely $230,000,000. Their total expenditure, apart from the sum they applied to the reduction of debt, was $200,000,000, of which about $30,000,000 was received from miscellaneous sources, similar to those which figure in the same manner in our accounts; so that all they require to raise is $230,000,000, to be collected from a population 57,000,000 odd. The result of that is, that whereas we require in Canada to raise by taxes $27,500,000, being at the rate of a little over $6 for every man, woman and child in Canada, all the people in the United States require to raise is $4 per head; so that the statement which I made a while ago that the necessary taxation of Canada is 50 per cent. more than that of the United States is simply and literally accurate; and I might add that a very much larger percentage of the taxation of the United States is raised by internal taxes of the nature of Excise on spirits and tobacco than with us; so that all the Americans require to raise by Customs duties is barely $118,000,000, being at the rate of a very little more than $2 per head, as against $4.50 at least which we require to raise under our present system. Now, Sir, that simple fact involves some serious considerations. If it pleases the people of the United States at any time to adopt a wiser and more wholesome system than their present protective system, they can, by a mere stroke of their pen, almost entirely annihilate their present tariff without any inconvenience to their treasury. A tax on tea or sugar, and a very moderate income tax, or land tax, if they prefer that, would enable them in point of fact to dispense with all their Customs. A tax on tea and sugar, and a very low ad valorem tax, would enable them to dispense with all other Customs revenue. I need not say that our case is very different, and that for a long period to come a heavy Customs duty is almost inevitable here. Now, Sir, as to Australia, the conditions on which the comparison would be fair would be, in the first place, to add to all our expenditure on federal account the expenditure they incur for purposes which are defrayed here by our municipalities or legislatures, as in the case of schools; and I promise the hon. gentleman that whenever our debt is represented by productive property paying a fair interest over and above its working expenses, I shall cease to complain of the debt; and when our exports are $400,000,000 a year on a population of 4,500,000, which would be a fair proportion as compared with the population of New South Wales, then I will not complain if they should find it necessary to raise our taxation to a similar standard. Now, Sir, putting the matter briefly, the comparison of the incidence of taxation between ourselves and those countries is this: That our necessary taxes are quite 50 per cent. of those of the United States, and our necessary Customs tax is very nearly 150 per cent. of theirs; that in the case of Australia, our wealth is far less than theirs, and the distribution of their taxes is infinitely less oppressive; that our Customs and Excise per head fully equal the Customs and Excise of England, and the unavoidable taxes which any man, no matter how abstemious, no matter how temperate, no matter how frugal, must pay, are vastly heavier in Canada than they have been of recent years in England. If the statistics given to us by the labor bureau can be at all relied upon, the average income of the laborer or mechanic in Ontario at this moment does not exceed $300 a year; and, therefore, it follows that the nominal tax, which we inflict upon these people, would fully equal something like two shillings sterling on the pound, and if, instead of the nominal, you are to take the actual tax, and you are to include the real sum which is paid by them, although it does not go into the Treasury, I say that to-day the rate of taxation on the income of the ordinary laborer, artisan, mechanic, or wage-earner in Ontario, and probably in the other Provinces, would fully equal three shillings sterling in the pound. I say this is as unjust a system of taxation as well can be, and that it is especially unjust when it occurs in a country like ours, where, as everybody knows who compares our climate and our position with those of the greater part of the United States, of England and Australia, a man's needs are greater, where he requires more and better food, where he requires more costly clothing, where he requires more fuel and better lodging, in order to keep him in a condition of equal efficiency or comfort with his competitors in these countries. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman asks what we infer from all this: Whether we were disposed to maintain that the case was desperate; that Confederation was a practical failure; that we must give up the idea of becoming a nation. Sir, I do not say that. I refuse to believe that. I have too great confidence in the energy, the integrity, the ability of our people, to believe that that is the destiny which awaits us. Yet the hon. gentleman must know that men are discussing and discussing very seriously, in many quarters, what is going to be the result of all this measureless extravagance, of all this intolerable corruption. Our own returns, the American returns, our own recent census in the North-West, all clearly show that the case is as I have said: that of native born Canadians in North America, you will find one man in four in the United States, and that of imported immigrants brought to this country, at our cost, nine out of ten, if not nineteen out of twenty, also find their way to the great adjacent republic. Sir, we must admit that our growth for many years has scarcely equalled that of many countries in Europe and that our taxes have been growing in much greater proportion than theirs. Worse still. We must believe, and there are too many indications of it in the concluding remarks of the Minister of Finance, that this vicious system is going to prevail, and going to be increased. We must admit that so far our system has been a failure in this, that we have been entirely unable to educate the several Provinces to depend on themselves. For nineteen years, we have been practically tying millstones around our neck by making perpetual concessions to several Local Governments, and this can have but the result of utterly embarrassing us and utterly destroying all chance of bringing Confederation to a healthy state. Now, Sir, I have to say this, that our first duty, under the circumstances, is to do what we can to educate the people of Canada to a clear comprehension of the situation. I look for no good result to Confederation, Sir, I must say, until our people realise a good deal better than they have done the nature of the federal system, and until they understand that no single partner has a right to appropriate the public funds to his own special use. Nor do I expect, Sir, any very great improvement until the members of the Cabinet, and the members of this House, are also taught to understand that they are trustees of the people, and not entitled to make profits out of the property of their wards. Moreover, we have got to realise the insane folly we have been committing in piling up this mountainous debt without having anything whatever to show for the expenditure, except perfectly unproductive property, or worse than unproductive property, as appears to be the case in some of those enterprises in which we have invested a great many millions of dollars. Now, the hon. Minister intimated to us that they were not going to do this thing any more. He talked of retrenchment; he talked of paying off our debt; he talked of our having engaged in a triumphant war against nature—and he might have added against common sense; and he talked of our not emerging in any worse condition than the Americans emerged from their great civil war. Sir, I say that those hon. gentlemen cannot do it. Those hon. gentlemen are caught in their own precedents. Every unwise grant, every unwise piece of legislation, that has been conceded, is of necessity the parent of many more. You cannot escape the result of your own acts. Even if a moral miracle were to be wrought in our behalf, even if the members of this Cabinet were to cease to hunger for timber limits, or railway subsidies for the benefit of railways in which they are large proprietors, and if their supporters were to cease to be applicants for timber limits, coal areas, ranches, shares in colonisation companies and railway subsidies for the benefit of themselves or their constituents—if all these wonderful things were to occur, Sir, still remember that those sections of the country which have been taxed for the benefit of others have got their rights. What has been the action of the past three years? In 1883 we granted subsidies to eleven different railways, involving appropriations of $2,250,000. In 1884, for certain good reasons which "No. 8" could tell, we granted subsidies to twenty-six different railways, involving appropriations to the extent of $8,000,000. In 1885 we granted subsidies to nineteen other railways, involving appropriations of $3,000,000; and I should not be surprised, in spite of all the protestations of the Minister of Finance, to find that before this House rises this Session many other railway grants will have to be conceded to hungry supporters. Now, I say all this involves a complete and utter violation of the Confederation Act. I say those hon. gentlemen have established every kind of bad precedent. I say that there is no scheme or project however wild that will not find good grounds for making demands or raids on the Treasury in view of the grants which hon. gentlemen have already conceded. Sir, I say that this absorption of the railway system of this country was the corruptest of all the corrupt acts this Ministry has ever attempted. At one master stroke by seizing on the railways of the country and by introducing this detestable system of granting subsidies in aid of private men and private roads, they have succeeded, I am sorry to say, to a very great extent, in corrupting not only the members of this House, but in too many cases the constituencies they represent, and sometimes even the Province from which they come. One case alone I can admit exists where it may be allowable for the Dominion Government to do this thing, and that is the case where the Dominion is the sole proprietor of the land or where it has appropriated the land of a Province for its own use. There I can understand this being done. Look at the example of the United States, on the whole the most successful example of the working of the federal system we have ever seen. What has been the saving clause with the people of the United States? Why, it has been this: that from first to last the people of the United States have had the good sense to recognise the federal compact for what it was, and with a few trifling exceptions they have steadily persevered in refraining from devoting the general funds of the whole commonwealth to the advantage of any particular locality or any particular section. And if we wish to make our federation a success, I believe we shall have to retrace our steps; we may have to revise the constitution on this head, and at any rate we shall have to put an end to the system we have unfortunately adopted. There is one factor which the Minister talked of, but did not consider enough. He has overlooked in his estimates for the future this important consideration, the fact that the income of a very large portion of our people, I mean of the agricultural portion of the people, has of late years been very seriously diminished. We have not got absolutely perfect statistics, but I think I am correct in saying that, apart from what they raise for their own use, our farmers throughout the Dominion probably sell about $100,000,000 of produce, part for export and part for consumption by the remainder of the population. Now, I am in the judgment of the House whether I am not correct in saying that there has been a reduction of probably 20 per cent. at least on the average value of those farm products, and while the hon. gentleman and his friends have been adding many millions to the taxation of those farmers, the reduction of prices to which I have alluded has reduced the selling value of those persons' produce by probably at least $20,000,000 a year. Sir, the hon. gentleman thinks that we may rely on a rapid increase of prosperity. It is my opinion that the resources of the country are such that it is probable enough we shall continue for a considerable time to come to increase at all events in material wealth, if not so rapidly as I could desire in general prosperity. But as regards the effect on the revenue I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that in old Canada we had an almost similar experience to that we are now undergoing. If there be a parallel to our position it is to be found in the position of old Canada in 1858. Then the two great railways, the Grand Trunk and the Great Western, had just been completed. An enormous amount of English money had been expended in the country. We had our "boom," and in that "boom," as I can well remember, the follies enacted fell very little short of those that occurred recently in the North-West. We had formed very great expectations, not altogether without reason. The financial results for the eight or nine years succeeding 1858 were briefly these: That on a revenue of about $5,000,000 in 1858 we had a deficit of $3,375,000; in 1859 it was $1,500,000; 1860, $2,000,000; 1862, $2,000,000; 1863, $870,000; 1865, when we changed the financial year, $380,000, and not till 1867 did we succeed in arriving at a financial equilibrium. I do not anticipate, I should be very sorry to anticipate, any such results in this case; but I must say that, if such results did accrue, the Government of this country have done their very utmost to produce them. Then there is another thing to which the hon. gentleman made no direct allusion, although it has probably been present to his mind. In considering the financial position of this country we must not overlook the present state of the Provinces. We know perfectly well, and none probably knows better than the Finance Minister, that about two weeks ago delegates from his own Province were here to represent to him that Nova Scotia required better terms. They were here to point out that although it might be possible to raise money by direct taxation, yet that Nova Scotia in common with the other Maritime Provinces had been so impoverished by the results of the heavy taxation laid upon them in defiance of the pledges on the faith of which they were invited to enter Confederation, it was very dangerous in a political sense to strain the patience of the people. We know perfectly well that in the Province of Quebec those who have charge of her finances consider there will be a very heavy deficit during the current year.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have not myself the means of ascertaining, but I was informed by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier) that there is expected to be a deficit of between $400,000 and $500,000.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There is no deficit this year in the Province of Quebec, but on the contrary a surplus.

Mr. LANGELIER. They say so every year.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It was not so when you were there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have heard this before, and the treasurer ultimately announces a deficit. Even in the case of Ontario, which has a large sum to its credit and is on the whole in a good financial condition, there can be no doubt whatever that there must be thrown on the municipalities a considerable portion of the present expenditure, or after a certain number of years they will also have to have recourse to direct taxation. I believe our Local Governments, if they care to avail themselves of the possibilities which exist in the better management of the Crown domain, might obtain largely increased revenues in the space of a very few years which would entirely relieve them from the necessity of any application here; and it is possible that out of our present position good may come, and those communities may be obliged at last to look the situation in the face and to learn to rely on themselves, and not, as now, on making periodical raids on the Dominion Treasury. The Finance Minister took occasion to charge the leader of the Opposition with having given in his adhesion to a certain plank in the platform of the Young Liberals' convention which met at Toronto. As I understand the matter, all those gentlemen meant was to call attention to some of those things to which I have been calling attention to-night, and to place on record their opinion, in which I entirely concur, that if it was possible to dispense with the system of subsidies, as has been done in the United States, it would be greatly to the advantage of the people of Canada. I do not know that I would dispute with the Minister of Finance as to whether it is possible. I believe it was an unfortunate necessity that we were obliged to subsidise the various Provinces at their entrance into Confederation. I think it would have been wiser and better had it been possible to have given them revenues to raise, and as that resolution states, to have compelled them, if they wanted more money, to take the responsibility of raising it themselves. I believe our present system is unfortunate, but I am not any more than the hon. Minister prepared to say that having adopted it, it is now possible for us to abandon it without such a total revolution of the British North America Act as I can hardly venture to expect. But to come to another plea of the hon. gentleman, he would have us believe that although it be true that the debt and the taxation of Canada have been enormously increased, yet that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway is ample atonement for all. Now, I am not disposed to say that the Canadian Pacific Railway is not a very considerable enterprise: viewed in certain aspects it might fairly be considered a great enterprise, and it undoubtedly has been pushed with very great energy, and I am quite willing to admit that it is likely, under certain conditions, to be of great service to Imperial interests. I well recollect some eleven or twelve years ago, being myself then on a mission to London, calling the attention of Lord Salisbury, who was at that time Indian Secretary in Lord Beaconsfield's Administration, to the value the Canadian Pacific Railway might be to Great Britain, and I recollect well, when I said to him that he should assist, or endeavor to induce his Government to assist, the then Canadian Government in constructing the railway—because as I pointed out, and as he admitted, it would be of benefit to Imperial interests—although he received me most courteously, he also admitted to me that however feasible such a plan might have been, had the Canadian Government in 1870 or 1871, when the project was first under consideration, approached the British Government—yet at that date, after we had annexed British Columbia, after we had bound ourselves to complete this railway, he feared it would be a matter of extreme difficulty to induce the British House of Commons to come to our assistance. And having myself taken that stand, I am not in the slightest degree inclined to dispute the assertions of these hon. gentlemen that this road may be, under certain conditions, of very considerable value to British interests. But I say that that road has been constructed at an excessive cost. I say it has entirely passed out of our control. I say that that road in one aspect at any rate can only be regarded as a most outrageous monopoly, and the creation of that monopoly has tended in the highest possible degree to mar the settlement and development of the North-West. The minor object may have been partially attained, but the sole, real justification which warranted the imposition of this heavy debt and these heavy taxes on the people of older Canada, has been missed altogether. Sir, these hon. gentlemen have absolutely driven the people away. We have had that country under our control for fifteen years. It was partially settled then. Now, had we got any adequate results for our huge expenditure, I would have been perfectly content. Let us contrast Dakota, which the hon. gentleman proposed to contrast, but did not, so far as I could hear, carry out his pledge. In 1870 at precisely the same time that we got possession of Manitoba, the population of Dakota was 12,887, and the population of Manitoba and the North-West, I believe, 12,400. By the last census of Dakota, made in 1885, the population of Dakota is 415,263, of whom I regret to say a very large and valuable portion are Canadian born. Now, we have territory almost enough for half a dozen Dakotas. We have a territory at any rate quite equal to the area of Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Indiana, Iowa, and I believe Illinois to boot, and all we have been able to do, according to the last reports afforded us, is to settle a paltry 3,000 families, or thereabout, in the three great Provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Assiniboia, while in old Manitoba, according to a recent statement of Mr. Brydges, who has great means of information, and who is not in the slightest degree likely to underrate the present population of Manitoba, it is very doubtful whether we have all told, 110,000—and certainly not more than 120,000 white inhabitants. I repeat that I would admit the Minister's plea were he able to show us a road owned and controlled by ourselves, able to point to a strong central Province inhabited by three-quarters of a million of prosperous settlers. Nevertheless, I admit frankly that our only real chance of extricating ourselves from the unfortunate position in which, as I contend we stand, lies in one way or other in promoting the settlement and development of the North-West and in some respects a good deal of encouragement may be drawn from the examples both of Dakota and Australia. If there is one thing clearer than another it is this: that under certain favorable conditions a comparatively small number of people may in the North-West, as in Australia, create a very large amount of traffic and bring a great amount of revenue into our exchequer. I see no reason, in spite of the misfortunes which have unhappily attended the development of the North-West so far, if we were able to transport some 20,000 or 40,000 Canadian families to that region, why we should not very easily equal all that has been done in Dakota, and that in a very few years. And as I see the last returns from that State show that they succeeded in raising 30,000,000 bushels of wheat in the year before last. I must say this, that if it were possible to induce our people to occupy that territory, if it were possible to bring back the wave of emigration which has been setting steadily for so long a time to the American North-West, we might reasonably hope to attain important results in a very short time. But again I ask, Sir, is it possible for the present Government to do this? Here, as elsewhere, they are fettered by their former acts. How can they be expected to apply themselves in earnest to relieve these people from the effects of this railway monopoly which they have apparently taken pride in creating? How can they be expected to modify for the benefit of the settlers of the North-West, this outrageous and oppressive tariff of theirs which they claim, though falsely, is the basis of sound national prosperity? How are they going to get rid of colonisation companies? How are they going to get rid of the division of that great territory amongst the camp followers of the present Government? How can they turn back the stream of emigration? The task is a hard one at the best and it is impossible for them. Imagine if we can the hon. the Minister of the Interior convincing his hungry supporters and pointing out to them how wrong it was either for individuals, singly or under cover of a company constituted for the purpose, to obtain undue favors from the Government. Imagine the other Ministers pointing out to their supporters, that the time had passed away when great railway subsidies should be granted for the benefit of private persons, or for the benefit of roads in which they had a personal interest. Sir, as to the security of the debt which the hon. gentleman spoke of, I would be glad to hear that $20,000,000 were, from any source whatever, about to be refunded to the people of Canada, although I may call his attention to this—that whereas we were told there would not be the slightest difficulty in our receiving back every penny of our $30,000,000, it now appears that we are to be content with a dividend of 60 cents in the dollar, which is all he apparently expects to receive. And as for graciously giving us back a certain portion of our own lands in exchange for the other $10,000,000, I do not feel, for one, any great obligation to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or their friends for any such suggestion as that. I would be very glad indeed to believe that the Canadian Pacific Railway was about to be a great financial success. At best, I am inclined to think the problem is going to be a tolerable hard one. If we are to form any judgment from the returns laid on the Table of this House, they will find it, at any rate as regards their main line, a somewhat difficult problem to make it pay on the basis of a fertile territory of 400 miles or thereabouts, which will be obliged to defray all the expenses of working a railway something like 2,400 miles in length, at least one-half of which passes through territory in which up to the present time no very productive means of traffic have ever been discovered. I am afraid, so far as this country is concerned, that it will prove that the undue haste of construction has been a grave economical blunder; it has, at any rate, entirely destroyed the utility of that road as a means of settlement. It has helped to create a boom; it has helped to give us, for a time, a fictitious revenue; it has helped to create trade disturbance; and I doubt exceedingly whether it is going to prove a good asset to anybody until both the policy of the company and the policy of the Government are entirely reversed, and until at least 750,000 people are settled in that country. Now, Sir, I think we have had enough, perhaps too much, for a great many years of this leap before-you-look policy. Let us review very briefly what has been ascertained as the result of our policy in the last twenty-three or twenty-four years. Now, Sir, I say no man can consider it anything but unsatisfactory; and the mischief is tending to become chronic. So soon as we succeeded in any shape or way in extricating ourselves from the difficulties in which we have been involved, we appear to have made any success that the industry and energy of our people may have secured us, a simple pretext for rushing into further extravagant and foolish undertakings. Now, that has not been, and never was due to any natural causes existing in Canada. We have very considerable resources, and many opportunities have been granted to us; but we have been guilty perpetually of discounting our future; and we have adopted a most vicious system, particularly since Confederation, which, unless checked, can only result in the speedy disruption of our Confederation. I believe that has been due in part to the inconsiderate adoption of a protective system; but I believe it has been due a great deal more to what I must describe as a deliberate violation of the federal compact. Now, to a certain extent, I fear we must make up our minds that a period of stagnation has arrived. It is quite clear that our farmers, in particular, are going to be exposed to an era of low prices, and are going to have to contend with a much more formidable competition than they had to reckon on a few years ago. In the older Provinces our population is almost absolutely stationary in a great number of the constituencies and in many of the towns. With the exception of two or three great cities, I doubt that there is any portion of Canada to-day in which we maintain even our ordinary natural increase, whilst in the newer Provinces it is only too clear that we are failing to advance in the same proportions as our neighbors. It is not to be wondered at if under such circumstances there is much alarm and discontent among a considerable number of our people. They see that we are going behind; they see that we fail to attract desirable immigration; they see we fail, what is worse, to retain our own people here. What are the obstacles, I should like to know, that stand in the way of our progress? I believe they consist mainly in these four: First of all, that we have adopted a very oppressive and unjust system of taxation; in the next place, that we have been foolish enough to create railway and land monopolies, which must be removed before any considerable progress can be made in the development of the larger portion of our country; third, the unfortunate system of making perpetual concessions to the various Provinces of this Dominion, whenever from any cause they get into financial difficulty, which I regret to see the present Finance Minister is much more disposed to encourage than to prevent; and lastly, a very vicious and corrupt system of administration. Sir, I am sorry to have to say it, but I believe many of our people have forgotten the very A B C of government; they have been given over to a strong delusion, to believe a lie; they have come to think that it is a very excellent and fine thing to pile up a huge debt; they have come to believe that the best way to enrich a country is to heap up taxes; they have come to suppose that truth, honor—common decency I was going to say—are superfluous in the administration of our public affairs; they have come to suppose that plunging into huge enterprises without counting the cost, or considering how they will affect the future of the country, is the best test and proof of high statesmanship. It has come to pass that to-day, however much we regret it, we are obliged to admit that every second member of the Cabinet has been either the recipient of a testimonial largely subscribed for by public contractors and public employees, or that Ministers have received subsidies granted for the purpose of assisting railway lines in which they are large shareholders; or that they have been participants, by means of the cloak of a special company created for that special end, in printing contracts and other jobs which they could not have undertaken in their own proper persons without putting their seats in peril; or that they have been recipients of timber limits; and I am sorry to say, as the Cabinet are, so are the majority of their supporters, and so are the majority of the press that support them both. Now, there is some excuse perhaps to be made for ordinary members of this House. I believe a great many of them never considered the effect of what they were doing when they became applicants to the Government for those various favors. I am aware that some of them made no profit, though that cannot be said of all. I believe many of them were carried away by the great speculative whirlwind that swept this country a few years ago; and on the whole, I am not disposed to deal so severely with the conduct of members as with the conduct of the Ministers who fostered this thing, and put temptation in the way of their supporters. But be that as it may, the results are substantially as I state them. I say, the positions are thoroughly irreconcilable; I say that no man being a trustee, whether he be a privy councillor or a member of the House, has a right to speculate in the property of his own wards, which the public are; I say that no man, being another's attorney, is able or can be able honestly or fairly to deal with the man for whom he is acting. Now, Sir, all these things, —

An hon. MEMBER. Are you in earnest?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am very much in earnest, and I have to say this to the hon. gentleman, that it is one of the worst proofs of the political degeneracy to which Canada has come, that I can state such things of one-half the Cabinet and one-half of their supporters, and that the accusation is received with a laugh. All this has occurred in a loosely cemented country, side by side with a very great State; all this has occurred in defiance of warning and after the amplest experience of the mischief of this kind of thing; all this has occurred after we have been rescued again and again from difficult positions. I say to the hon. gentlemen opposite that it is a record to cause every true Canadian to blush, and I say more, that it would be idle and criminal on our part to conceal our opinion of these things. If they go on, a few years or a few months may bring our whole Confederation to a very abrupt termination. Hon. gentlemen or, at any rate, the country will have to learn that government by bribery is the most costly and the most dangerous system of administering the affairs of a country. Our duty is to oppose and fight these evils; a short time will tell whether Canada is to shake off the incubus that now presses on her, or whether our Confederation is to rot to pieces by its own corruption before it is well able to stand alone. I am grieved, Sir, to have to make these statements, but I have not been twenty-two or twenty-three years a member of the Canadian House of Parliament, and five years a Minister of the Crown, without knowing what the results of this kind of conduct are likely to be. The proofs are superabundant; no man can or dare deny the substantial accuracy, at any rate, of the statements I have made, whether as affecting certain members of the Cabinet or many of the members who support them. No doubt, there are many causes which have combined to produce this state of things. We have had a bad fiscal system; we have had in addition a temporary inflation which has had the result of turning a large part of this country into something little better than a great gambling table; we have embarked foolishly in huge premature public works; but the first and worse and chiefest of all the causes, has been the shameful corruption of a certain portion of the Cabinet and a certain portion of their supporters. If hon. gentlemen dispute the statement as made by me, I will give a few words of an independent authority, which, on certain occasions when it suits their turn, they quote with great respect:

"Most of us have learned pretty well to acquiesce in the fact that the Dominion Government is a government of corruption. Men, places, Provinces, interests, churches, organisations of every kind, are bought in different ways, some more coarsely, some more subtle, in order to form the basis of a system which is administered, after its kind, with great ability, and is closely bound up with personal ambition of its veteran chief. Corruption is not wholesome; it does not become more wholesome as it becomes more inveterate; to say nothing of the debt which it is rolling up, it must deprave the political character of the people, as, in fact, it is visibly doing, and in the end prove fatal to the spirit, if not to the form, of representative institutions. Nor can the architect and manager of a corrupt system be himself a Chatham, though power, not lucre, may be his personal object, and he may be in a certain sense patriotic. That he should have around him a swarm of low political agents is an inevitable and a very noxious incident of his position."

That is the language of a person who poses, and whom hon. gentlemen are fond of quoting, as an independent authority. The facts, I fear, are substantially true; and although I hold that the spirit of the article is dastardly and the inference detestable, inasmuch as it would lead us to acquiesce in this kind of thing instead of endeavoring to redress and reform it, I say there is no denying the serious nature of the charge, there is no denying there is too much foundation for that indictment against our present Government and our present system of Government. This is the temper of the instructors of the people, it is the existence of this temper in just such persons as the writer of this article, whoever he may be; it is the existence of this temper in the pulpit and among respectable men, which goes a very long way to make his corrupt system possible, and the presence of hon. gentlemen opposite as governors of this country possible. Under the circumstances, it is no wonder that in seven years we have added $109,000,000 to our national debt, it is no wonder we have added $12,000,000 to our annual expenditure, and nearly $20,000,000 to the real taxation of the people, though not, as I have said, to the amount which goes into the Treasury, and it is no wonder if, under these circumstances, men are beginning to look upon representative institutions as a mere costly farce, and this Parliament as little better than a place of meeting for the purpose of dividing the spoils. I speak in this matter more in sorrow than in anger; I know that many things I say are not pleasant for me to say, and cannot be pleasant for many hon. gentlemen to hear, but I say things cannot go on in this state, there must be a reformation or there is a risk of the total dissolution of our system.

I hold, and I have always held, that there are ample materials, in spite of all that has been wasted and squandered, wherewith to build up a powerful, independent nation in good time; but although I know that there is abundance of energy, enough of wealth and population, and a superabundance of territory, for all these purposes, I know also, if there be any truth in history, that none of these things will enable us to build up a nation, unless there is, behind and inspiring all these, a true, honest and intelligent public opinion. That is what we lack; that is what we require. Our laws may require amendment, and be amended; but laws without character and without conscience on the part of the people will do very little, if any, permanent, important good. What is needed is a tribunal of appeal, and that appeal can only be found when a resolute, awakened public conscience will make it thoroughly impossible either for members of the Government or members of the House so to prostitute their great trusts, as those trusts have been prostituted any time within the last seven years.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. McLELAN. I think it is the practice to go at once into Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose the hon. gentleman wishes that in order that he may put the duties in force.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee on the resolutions.

(In the Committee.)

Resolutions agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 1:15 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 31st March, 1886.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 73) to incorporate the North Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Haggart.)

Bill (No. 74) to incorporate the Ste. Ursule, Mattawan and Lake Temiscamingue Railway Company.—(Mr. Hurteau.)

Bill (No. 75) to incorporate the School Savings Bank.—(Mr. Massue.)

THE BURLINGTON CANAL.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 76) respecting the Burlington Canal. He said: It is for the purpose of abolishing the tolls.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COMPENSATION TO LAND OWNERS BY RAILWAY COMPANIES.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. LISTER) asked, Is it the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to amend the Dominion Railway Act, so as to prevent railway companies from retiring from arbitrations entered upon to fix the compensation to be paid to owners whose lands have been taken for railway purposes, and to allow compensation, not only for the land taken, but for damages done by the severance of the land?

Mr. POPE. No, it is not the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill, and it appears to me that this is provided for by the 15th, 16th and 17th sub-sections of section 11 of the Consolidated Railway Act.

RIVIERE AUX LIEVRES.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to construct immediately a lock and dam at the Little Rapids on the Rivière aux Lièvres, with a view to the improvement of the navigation of that river, so as to develop the agricultural, lumbering and phosphate interests of that portion of the county of Ottawa?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter is engaging the attention of the Government now, with a view to submitting an item to the House during this Session for that purpose.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST—TIME OF SETTLERS ON SERVICE.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) asked, Will the time served by volunteers during the rebellion (and who were settlers on homesteads in Manitoba and the North-West Territories) be allowed them as part of the time fixed by law for occupation of homesteads? Will the services of such settlers as volunteers during the whole of the rebellion be treated as one year's occupation on such homesteads?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If the hon. gentleman means residence, I can answer the question in the affirmative. Instructions to that effect were issued to the Commissioner and the Agents of Dominion lands on the 7th August last; that is to say, the service in the North-West counts for one year's residence; but, in regard to the occupation of the land, the patent does not issue until three years after entry.

RAILWAY FROM METAPEDIA TO CROSS POINT.

Mr. WELDON asked, Whether any survey has been made of the proposed line of railway from Metapedia to Cross Point, opposite Campbellton, and what is the estimated cost per mile?

Mr. POPE. Yes, there was a survey made, and the estimated by the engineer is $15,000 a mile.

RAILWAY BRIDGE ACROSS THE RESTIGOUCHE

Mr. WELDON asked, Whether any estimate has been obtained by the Government of a railway bridge across the River Restigouche from Mission Point, in the Province of Quebec, to Duncan's Point (so-called), at Campbellton; and what is the amount of such estimate?

Mr. POPE. No estimate has been made by the Government.

LACHINE CANAL CROSSING IN MONTREAL.

Mr. CURRAN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to make provision for the safety of foot passengers at the Wellington Street crossing of the Lachine Canal, in the city of Montreal? If so, is it the intention to provide an additional bridge or construct a tunnel?

Mr. POPE. It is under the consideration of the Government, and they are anxiously enquiring into the matter with a view of seeing how this should be dealt with.

EXECUTION OF LOUIS RIEL—COMMUNICATIONS FROM THE QUEBEC GOVERNMENT.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked, Whether the Local Government of Quebec forwarded to the Dominion Government any despatches or communications, before the execution of Louis Riel, asking for a commutation of the death penalty? If such despatches or communications were received, from what member of the Local Government did they emanate, and what are the dates thereof?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The Local Government of Quebec did not forward any such despatch or communication.

THE STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATE AT CALGARY

Mr. BURPEE asked, Is Jeremiah Travis, who was appointed Stipendiary Magistrate at Calgary, North-West Territory, still performing the duties as such magistrate? If not, has he been dismissed, suspended or removed to another district? Have formal complaints been made against the official conduct of Stipendiary Magistrate Travis? If so, what action has been taken by the Government as to the same?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). Mr. Travis is still performing the duties of Stipendiary Magistrate. Formal complaints have been made against the official conduct of Mr. Travis, and an investigation is now being proceeded with.

INSTRUCTIONS TO NON-COMBATANTS IN THE NORTH-WEST REBELLION.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. CASEY) moved for:

Copies of instructions to Major Bell, Major-General Laurie, S. L. Bedson, and other non-combatants employed during the North-West campaign, from the Minister of Militia, Major-General Middleton, or the Adjutant-General of Militia, and of correspondence between the last-named authorities and such non-combatants.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In this matter I beg to state that we will bring down what we have got. There were no written instructions, and the Department have nothing but telegrams addressed to Major-General Laurie referring to this matter.

Motion agreed to.

CONTRACTORS FOR TRANSPORT DURING THE REBELLION.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. CASEY) moved for:

Return showing names of all contractors from whom teams were engaged for transport, number of teams engaged from each, with rate of pay per day per team, and the total amount paid to each of such contractors.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There again I beg to state that the only parties employed by the Department as purchasers were the Hudson Bay Company. However, I will bring down all the returns.

Motion agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH JAMES ANDERSON.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. CASEY) moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between one James Anderson and the Minister of Militia, Major-General Middleton, and any member of the Government, with respect to the purchasing of supplies, cost of transport and other expenditure incurred during the North-West rebellion.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The commission have no correspondence whatever. No correspondence has been exchanged between the commission and James Anderson, or between the latter and the general commanding in the North-West. I cannot recollect any correspondence having been addressed by me to him, but if there is any I shall bring it down.

Motion agreed to.

FARM OR REAL ESTATE BANKS.

Mr. ORTON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolutions:—

1. That it is desirable, in order to obviate the impoverishing drainage of money from Canada to pay interest upon borrowed capital, that the amount of foreign capital required for the development of our agricultural, as well as other resources, be limited to as small an amount as practical.

2. That it will materially lessen the necessity to borrow foreign capital if mortgages on improved farm property be made a negotiable security by an issue by the Government of Canada of Dominion notes equal to any such mortgages on improved farm lands to the extent of one-half the actual value thereof, such notes to be redeemable in Government bonds, based upon such real estate mortgages, and bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

3. That it is expedient to grant charters to farm or real estate banks, the capital stock of which may consist, not only of specie and Dominion of Canada notes and bonds, but also of first liens upon improved farm lands equal to one-half the value thereof; and that as the main source of wealth in Canada is agricultural, it is expedient that the rate of interest charged by said farmers' banks shall be restricted to 6 per cent. per annum.

4. That in order to prevent any clashing of interests between such farmers' banks and ordinary chartered banks, as well as for the general convenience of the public, it is expedient that there be uniformity in the circulating medium, and that all banks be compelled to circulate only Dominion of Canada notes; and in order to compensate chartered banks for any profit they may derive from the issue of their own bills, there shall be an estimate made of such profit up to the expiration of the charter of all such banks by properly authorized actuaries, and the amounts so arrived at shall be paid by an increased issue to said banks of Dominion of Canada notes.

5. That in order to provide for the interest on any bonds issued by the Government of Canada to redeem notes issued to farmers' banks, there shall be a special stamp marked upon such Dominion notes characterizing the particular farmers' bank to which said notes have been issued, and such farmers' banks shall provide the interest to the Treasury Department of the Government to meet that of any bonds issued by the Government of Canada for the redemption of such notes.

He said: In order to explain thoroughly to the House the object of the resolutions I desire to move it is necessary to refer briefly to our present banking system. I first point out that our present banking system, under certain circumstances, is utterly insufficient to meet the business requirements of the people of this country, and the result is that at certain periods large failures occur, attended by disastrous consequences to our industrial prosperity. The lending capacity of our banks as at present constituted depends upon the amount of the deposits, as well as upon the financial basis of their circulation. It also depends upon the amount of exchange that is called for to meet our foreign exchanges, and it also further depends upon the amount of money that the banks have out on speculation in foreign countries. So it is very easy to see that just at the time when there is a failure of the crops, or a succession of failures of the crops of the Dominion and our exports decline, and when the people require financial accommodation, our banks fail to afford it. It becomes absolutely necessary for their own existence to withdraw the amount of accommodation, and the result is that we are obliged to borrow money to a larger extent from abroad. At this particular time the wholesale merchants are obliged to press the retail merchants, and they in turn press their customers, who are very largely of the agricultural class. Not only does that occur with respect to the merchants but also in regard to every other class of the industrial community. The banks are obliged to withdraw their accommodation not only from the merchants but from the manufacturers, and the result is that our manufacturing establishments are obliged to reduce the number of their employees and thus bring much suffering and hardship upon the working classes. What occurred in 1875 and 1876 may be stated in illustration. In 1875 the discounts of the banks in Canada were $82,000,000, and in 1876, $141,000,000. Up to January, 1876, the banks were obliged to withdraw to the enormous extent of $29,000,000, the amount of credit they afforded to the people. What was the effect of the withdrawal of that credit by the banks? A succession of failures, which led to the hard times and depression which the people so well recollect. In 1875 there were failures in Canada to the amount of $30,000,000; in 1876, $25,500,000; in 1878, $18,000,000; in 1879, $26,000,000, making a total in those four years of $125,000,000, which failures were caused to a very large extent by the withdrawal of credit by the banks.

Now, Sir, I think it is not necessary to dwell much longer upon that point. I think I have made it pretty clear to this House that under our present banking system insufficient accommodation is given at times when there is a failure of crops, or, in other words, at the very time when the people of Canada require to borrow money. And, Sir, this very time is the harvest of the money usurer. At this time, when the banks are not able to afford the accommodation which is necessary, the money usurers of the country extort from the agricultural classes enormous rates of interest. That is not the case when the banks are able to afford the necessary accommodation; then we find that the rates of interest are moderate and possibly not exorbitant, as at the present day, when we are not suffering from any very serious depression, the rates of interest are not very extortionate on first-class mortgage security. But, Sir, so soon as the time of depression comes, so soon does the rate of interest go up and mortgages are placed on the real estate of our country at very high rates of interest. I think it is not necessary to point out at any great length how important it is to give to our agricultural classes money at as low a rate as possible. It is acknowledged by all that the main source of the wealth of the people of this country, is that derived from agricultural pursuits, and that every other class lives, thrives, and as it were, has its whole being in the success of agriculture. But, Sir, when I point out the fact that we have to compete in agricultural products with other countries at a very great disadvantage; when we find that other countries are able to offer to the agriculturists money at a very low rate of interest, compared with our own; when we consider that our farmers have to compete with the farmers of the world, including those of India and Egypt, who are now becoming formidable competitors with the farmers of Canada in providing the breadstuffs of the world, I think this should be sufficient to impress the House with the very great importance of giving serious attention to this matter. We know, Sir, that under the present system, private banks as well as private individuals extort an enormous rate of interest, and by their operations they actually cause an inability to a certain extent on the part of the banks to accommodate the business public, because the mode in which they are carried on is to borrow money from the banks and then lend it out again to the farmers and others at extortionate rates of interest. Now, Sir, it is proposed on these resolutions to found a Bill for the incorporation of farmers' banks that will do away with many of these evils. This matter is not only important to the agriculturists, but it is important to every industrial class in Canada. There is not a man in Canada who lives by his own exertions who is not living by an income derived either from the interest on money or from some other settled income, and all the industrial classes of Canada dependent for their livelihood upon their own exertions will be benefitted by anything which will lessen the rate of interest. I shall draw the attention of this House to what are the rates of interest in other countries, and what has been done in this direction in other countries. Before doing so, however, I wish to allude to the serious effect of this constant draining of money from Canada to other countries to pay the interest on the money we borrow. It is a well-known fact that money borrowed at 5 per cent. interest will, in fifteen or eighteen years at the outside, pay the whole of the principal borrowed, and yet the principal remains owing, so it is very easy to see that it is not only what we borrow that causes this depletion, but it is the drainage of specie from our country to pay the interest upon our own indebtedness. Now, Sir, I shall just point out how I propose to formulate a measure to remedy these evils, and I shall trouble the House to listen while I read a few of the clauses of the Bill I have based on the resolutions now before the House. Clause 6 is as follows:—

Mr. ORTON.

The paid-up stock in such banks, in addition to gold and Dominion of Canada notes and bonds, may consist of first mortgages or liens upon improved farm lands to one-half the value thereof, verified by the certificate of the proper municipal officers of the municipality in which the said lands are situated, and also accompanied by an abstract or other certificate of title satisfactory to any law officer the Governor in Council may appoint for the purposes of this Act.

Then you will see that by this mode mortgages are made convertible into a circulating medium, and to that extent we shall, by the adoption of this principle, have money created in our own country to a very great extent, and based upon the very best of securities—just as good a security as the specie which now forms the basis of the circulation in our ordinary banks. When we look at what the amount of specie the banks of Canada hold to-day, we find that there is only some $6,772,957 of specie held by the whole of the banks of this Dominion, while they have a circulation to the amount of $29,845,735. So, Sir, it must be apparent to all that the basis of the circulation which I propose under this Bill is far more secure than the basis of the circulation of our banks as now chartered. Sir, I think I have another mode of proving that it is a sound basis, for to-day our loan societies borrow money in this very way. They issue their own bonds and sell the bonds on the basis of the mortgages they hold in the old country, and in that roundabout way obtain the money to lend to the farmers of this country, charging them therefor very large rates of interest. The object of this Bill is to create funds in our own country, and to the extent of what can be absorbed in circulation throughout the country, less the amount of interest that we pay outside capitalists. The 7th clause provides:

The Treasury Board, upon having satisfactory evidence that the required capital of any bank is subscribed for and paid up in manner aforesaid, shall issue and pay over to such bank Dominion of Canada legal tender notes to the amount of such mortgage liens, gold or Dominion bonds, which the bank may deposit in the hands of the Receiver-General, such legal tenders to be marked so as to designate the particular farmers' bank to which they have been issued.

The 8th clause provides:

Such legal tender notes shall be redeemable in bonds or debentures issued by the Government of Canada, and hereinafter called 'Dominion of Canada land bonds,' bearing interest at the rate of not more than 4 per cent. per annum, for sums of from $10 up to $500 each, and such issue of land bonds shall only be made when and as the Treasury Department is called upon to redeem notes issued to farmers' banks, and each farmers' bank shall be liable for the interest on such bonds equal to the amount of the notes circulated by said bank, which are presented to the Treasury Department for payment.

The 11th clause provides:

The banks incorporated under this Act shall not be empowered to issue or circulate their own notes, but only Dominion legal tender notes, coin, and notes of chartered banks."

The 12th clause provides:

Farmers' banks may loan money on improved farm lands only on first mortgage security thereof, up to one-half of the value, and charging therefor at a rate of interest not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly; and also may discount or grant loans upon endorsed farmers' notes at short dates, up to six months, and charging interest thereon at the rate of not more than 7 per cent. per annum, and in no case exceeding the sum of $600 to the same party or parties.

The 13th clause provides:

That a sinking fund consisting of 1 per cent. of the accrued interest on mortgage loans shall be set aside every year for the purpose of redeeming bonds chargeable against any such bank incorporated under this Act; and that a certain number of the said bonds shall be redeemed by drawing at the end of each five years, by the accumulations of such sinking fund, and the benefit thereof divided amongst a certain number of the borrowers by drawing or otherwise.

That is, the profits are distributed amongst the borrowers on the mutual plan. There is another clause to which I wish to draw the attention of the House, in reference to the settling up of our wild lands in the North-West:

In order to facilitate the settlement of Government lands, any such farmers' bank may, as a branch of its business, provide settlers on such lands with loans of money as required up to $600, such money to be spent on the improvement of such lands, or providing the support of settlers while they are making improvements, to the satisfaction of the Government Inspector of Homesteads; and any such loan shall be a first charge or claim against such lands and take precedence of any Government claim thereon, providing always that in case of such settler abandoning such lands it shall be incumbent upon the farmers' bank so aiding such settler to have such lands again occupied, or otherwise secure that the improvements made thereon are not allowed to become valueless by non-usage; and in order to provide the cost of such extra responsibility assumed by such banks, it shall be lawful to charge for any such loans, interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum.

I think this clause is a very important one. It is well known that the number of people who have sufficient capital to take them to that country, and to enable them to take up lands and to commence farming operations, is very small; and it will be a very long time before that country is settled unless some other means than at present exist are employed to bring into that country strong, able-bodied farm laborers, both from old Canada and from other countries. There are any number of people in the world of the right class to build up that country and to make it wealthy and prosperous; and I think if some such mode as that which I have suggested in my Bill were adopted, it would not be long before we had that country occupied by millions of thriving settlers. I wish to point out how important it is, too, that the settlers should be settled together as thickly as possible. I think there can be no doubt, from the experience we have had in old Canada, that the frosts which occasionally affect the crops of the North-West, as they formerly affected the crops of Ontario, would be avoided almost entirely by the settlers being closer together and a larger area of land being brought under cultivation in any particular district. The districts where frosts were formerly prevalent in Ontario were large swampy tracts, which were covered with trees, which prevented the heat of the sun being absorbed by the soil. As soon as the timber in those swamps was burned out and the swamps were cleared and dried, the frosts in those particular localities became a trouble of the past. I maintain that the same thing will occur in the North-West as soon as the settlers are closer together and a larger area of land is ploughed up, so that the the heat of the sun can be absorbed by the earth and given out again at night, so as to prevent the frost injuring the grain. Any one travelling in the North-West can verify that for himself. In any summer night, when he drives from the prairie grass on to ploughed land, he gets into a new climate, owing to the warmth. Therefore it is important that we should encourage settlers to settle more closely together in that country. Now, Sir, the principle of the Bill that I have drafted upon these resolutions is not a new principle. It is simply proposed to convert securities on land into negotiable securities. Baring conceived the idea, from the success of Government funds, of creating a similar species of land stock, or turning mortgages on land into stock transferable in every way like public funds. Associations were organised on this plan in various modes in Silesia, in 1770; in Brandenburg, in 1777; in Pomerania, in 1781; in Hamburg, in 1782; in West Prussia, in 1787; in East Prussia, in 1788; in Lunenburg, in 1791; Schleswig-Holstein, in 1811; Mecklenburg, 1812; Posen, 1822; Poland, 1825; Wurtemberg, 1827, Kalmburg, Grubenhazen and Hilchesheim, 1826; Hesse Cassel, Westphalia, Galicia, Hanover and Saxony, about 1840. Some are private associations and some are State or Provincial associations. Société de Pomerania founded in 1781 with an advance from Frederick II of 200,000 thalers. The company created negotiable bonds at 3½ per cent. and 3¼ per cent., payable half-yearly. These bonds are from 5 thalers upwards. Money is loaned at 4½; and there was in circulation no less than $55,602,844 in 1837 of these bonds which were above par. Russia: Banque de Crédit system founded in 1818 by Alexander, who also advanced some funds for its organisation. The borrower pays 4 per cent. and something for expenses and for a sinking fund, in all about 5 per cent. Bonds are received by the Government at their nominal value. Wurtemberg, founded in 1827. Loans money, as well as negotiable bonds, at 3 per cent. interest, ½ per cent. for cost of management and 1 per cent. for sinking fund, by which the loan is redeemed in forty-eight years. They lend only on first mortgages up to half the value. The borrower pays half-yearly and six weeks, before the half-year. He can pay any part of his debt at any time by paying 10 per cent. additional on what he desires to pay. In 1846 the company had bonds in circulation to the amount of 11,936,930 francs, which stood at a premium of 12 per cent. France: the marvellous effects of Crédit Foncier were long unknown in France. In 1820 the mortgage debt in France was 8,863,894,965 francs; 1840, 12,544,096,600 francs, and continued to increase up to the Revolution of 1848. Heavy rates of interest prevailed. Many estimated the usual interest on mortgages at 12 per cent. Crédit Foncier was brought before the notice of France in 1835 first, and in 1845 M. Royer received a commission to go to Germany and study their mechanism; but little was done, and the sufferings of the agriculturists were very severe. Louis Napoleon studied the Crédit Foncier, and desired to introduce it into France. He appointed a commission, and himself presided at the meetings. In 1852, a decree authorising the formation of such institutions, was published. M. Wolowski, who had long labored in the cause, formed a company, which afterwards resulted in the bank called the "Crédit Foncier de France," which received a subvention of 10,000,000 francs from the State. In 1853 the land bonds in circulation amounted to 22,099,600 francs. At the end of 1861 they were 259,148,200 francs. The dividends per share were 15 per cent. The Crédit Mobilier, a species of bank designed to promote industrial enterprises of all sorts—railways, canals, docks, mines, gas, &c.—was established in France in 1852, and subscribed largely to the Crédit Foncier. This bank assumed a bold speculative policy, and subscribed to railways not only in France but in Austria and other countries, subscribed to the loan to carry on Russian war, and to various other loans of the French Government. The extraordinary success of this bank determined the directors to issue a paper currency. This was represented by the investments they had made in stocks, shares, &c.; and I may say, in passing, that this is exactly the speculative and dangerous character of our bank paper money. It is represented not by gold in their vaults, but by the accommodation paper of their customers, and a very small comparative amount of gold, which is decreasing every day instead of increasing. This was virtually the case with the Credit Mobilier in France, and led to the wildest speculation, to immense dividends for a time, and finally to disaster. The Government finally prohibited the creation of its paper obligations. I have read this in order to show what led to disaster in France. There is no possibility of such disasters occurring under the proposal I have laid before the House, as they were in France brought about by the banks engaging in all sorts of speculative enterprises, disastrous in their nature. There may be many arguments used against this Bill, especially by loan societies. In talking about this matter outside this House, I have been told it is utterly useless to pretend to introduce such a Bill and succeed in passing it, on account of the great influence of the banks and loan societies over the members of the House. I did not believe, nor was I ever intimidated by any such statement. I believe the members are independent enough, at any rate, to do what they feel is in the interest of the people, and I trust that this House will seriously consider this important question, and, at least, provide some means by which the industrial classes shall obtain money at cheaper rates. It may be argued that it would be very unfair to the loan societies, because they have entered into obligations with foreign money lenders; but that objection is utterly without foundation, as these societies can, if they like, convert themselves into farmers' banks, and go into operation under this Act, and can gradually pay back to the foreign capitalists the money due. They will not, therefore, be put to any disadvantage, except that they may not be able to create such an enormous amount of wealth for their shareholders as they have in the past, which accumulations have been taken out of the hard earnings of the agricultural and other industrial classes. It is in order to obviate this evil that I introduce this Bill. As far as the banks are concerned, this proposal does not interfere with their business at all; they are still at liberty to carry on their own operations, except in this one particular, that I propose, under this system, to change the character of their circulation, or, at least, that there shall be power given to change its character, if difficulties arise, by the following clause:—

In order to obviate any difficulty arising from the chartered banks calling on the Government to redeem in gold or its equivalent any notes issued by the Government to farmers' banks, it shall be in the power of the Government to call for an estimate of the value to said chartered banks of the privilege of issuing their own circulation to the termination of their charters, and arrange with such banks for the surrender of the aforesaid privilege, which valuation, together with the amount of circulation they are entitled to issue, and which they thus surrender, shall be paid them in Dominion Government legal tenders.

The object of that clause is to prevent the ordinary banks from cornering, as it were, the issue of farmers' banks, and creating difficulty with the Government of the country; and it has another object, which is that we shall have one medium of circulation. It is a very inconvenient and expensive system at present. If any gentleman in Ontario happens to have in his possession the note of a bank in British Columbia, he is obliged to pay 5 per cent., no matter how good the bank is, in order to get the note cashed, and so with regard to banks in the other Provinces. That is a great inconvenience and ought to be done away with. With regard to an argument which may be used that the effect of this banking system will be to cause inflation, I think that fear is also groundless, because the very mode by which this money is circulated is actually a perfect weather-glass of the requirements of the people of this country. Farmers will not borrow money on their land unless they require it, and it is only when they have failed in their crop or desire money to carry over their crop and pay their debts that they will borrow money; and therefore, instead of causing inflation, it will only regulate the money which is in circulation for the various industrial classes of this country. I do not know that it is necessary for me to dwell at any greater length upon these resolutions, but I trust that the House will resolve itself into committee and pass these resolutions, so that the Bill can be introduced into the House and brought in the ordinary manner before the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Mr. HESSON. On a former occasion I had the pleasure of seconding a similar motion to that now before the House, and I again express my entire sympathy with the object in view. The resolutions speak, I think, very strongly to the common sense of those who profess, not only in this House but outside of this House, to sympathise with and speak for the farmers. We are very free, indeed, when we are mixing and mingling with that class of the people of Canada, to express our sympathy with them; and we are here to-day, I presume, not to allow a matter like this to pass the House without any consideration, as on a former occasion it was treated in that way. I sympathise with my friend in the herculean task he has taken upon himself, knowing how impossible it is for him or any other private member of the House to succeed unless he has not only the ear but the heart of the Ministers with him. There is very much to commend these resolutions to the good sense of the members of this House. In reference to the clause which expresses the desirability of the Government assuming the issue of all paper money in Canada, I venture to say that, if a vote was taken of the people of Canada, outside of the bank directors and stockholders, nine-tenths of the people would favor such a proposition. It bears upon its face the evidence of common sense, and I venture to say there is not an intelligent person in Canada who can hesitate to accept such a circulation. In order to pursue such a course, I presume it would be necessary to withdraw the circulation of the chartered banks, and I suppose that time would have to be given for that to be done. That, no doubt, would in itself involve a very great battle, because there are great interests involved, and they would stand up for the rights granted to them by Acts of Parliament; but this House, as I understand, has reserved to itself the right of reviewing their course from time to time, and it would be unfair, if the requirements of the public should demand that the course should be changed in the future and that the privilege should be withdrawn which has been given to the banks in the past, to refuse to take that course. I have before me an instance of this. I have here a bill issued by a bank which, I believe, has ceased to act under its charter, and which, I believe, is redeeming its paper at about 40 cents on the dollar. I speak of a Prince Edward Island bank bill, which I came into possession of innocently, and which I find is worthless to me for purposes of trade. The mover of these resolutions pointed out that the security that is proposed to be offered for such a circulation is of the very best kind. We all know that it is even superior to specie when held by private or chartered banks. No possible objection could be taken to the character of such security—first mortgages upon the best property in Canada, the real estate, the farmer's improved farm, and only to the extent of 50 per cent. of its actual or assessed value. No better security could be offered upon which a circulation could be given to the people to do the business of the country with. It is most unfortunate that we have to point to the position of the chartered banks in order to draw a contrast as to the stability of the two positions, but it is only fair, and, as they are public property in that sense, I think they ought to be able to stand the investigation which is called for in dealing with this matter. Something less than $7,000,000 are held by the chartered banks of Canada in the shape of specie, and their circulation is in the neighborhood of $30,000,000, to say nothing about the $60,000,000 held by the stockholders. Every man, I presume, having an interest in bank stocks feels that he is perfectly safe and secure. Well, I do not wish to disturb that feeling at all, but it is to be remembered that these institutions are conducted by directors who are themselves not always free from criticism as to their moral and business character and as to their integrity, and all these things have to be considered by the Government and the public. How much more secure would an issue of paper money be to the holders of that paper money. Looking at the advantage arising to the whole country, from the circulation of one single issue, it is easy to see how important it would be to all the taxpayers of Canada. The wear and tear, when distributed over thirty or forty banks, each of which has to provide its own steel plates and engravings in getting out its small circulation, gives them probably but very little advantage, but as one great circulation in the hands of the Government the advantage might be a very important consideration to the country. I believe this matter is of such importance that it is the duty of every member of this House who represents an agricultural constituency to say a word on behalf of this measure, and if it is not perfect, to assist in perfecting it. I have reason to believe that there is sufficient common sense in this House to take those resolutions, and the Bill of my hon. friend, and shape it in such a way as to meet not only all the requirements of the farmers, but of all the business and commercial interests of this country. The latter are a very large class, indeed, and I presume the Minister of Finance will look upon this matter as a very radical one on the part of an ordinary member of this House, who makes such demands upon the Government as we make in the interests of the farmers of Canada. But those who have lived amongst the farmers and who know the difficulties they have occasionally to encounter, who know how often they are compelled to go to those who have money to lend, know that they are not in a position to borrow on so advantageous terms as the commercial men, and, therefore, we ought to feel a great sympathy with the object in view in those resolutions. I will not detain the House, as I am not feeling as well as I would like to, but I must say that I trust there are gentlemen in this House who not only sympathise with farmers in this matter but will assist in preparing a measure in their interest. I know this Bill can be perfected, I know the security is good, and I am satisfied the Government are the only parties who ought to issue a circulation for the people of this country. I am satisfied, also, that the public in Canada and out of it would accept such a circulation without a single doubt as to its worth and safety. I have very much pleasure in seconding the motion of my hon. friend.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) deserves the commendation of the people of this country for his untiring efforts to devise some scheme whereby the large class known as the agriculturists of this country may get their money on better terms than they are doing to-day. It is a well-known fact that the peculiarity of their calling is such that the returns come in only once a year, and consequently they are not able to pay as high a rate of interest as those who are engaged in other lines, and who reap returns three, or four, or more times a year. It is also well known to those who have carried on farming operations, or who are at all acquainted with them, that the agriculturist who has to pay a higher rate of interest than 4 or 5 per cent. out of the proceeds of his farm must ultimately find it a failure, because the profits in that line will not warrant him in paying more. Now, this scheme seems to be surrounded by many difficulties, and a cursory examination of it would seem to indicate that it was impracticable. Still, I believe that it may be possible to devise some scheme whereby that large class would receive the benefit of getting money at a lower rate of interest, and getting it on easier terms, and thereby be enabled to carry on their farming operations better than they do to-day. Again, it is a well-known fact that monetary institutions of a somewhat similar character have been established in other countries. The hon. member for Centre Wellington has cited several cases where institutions of this nature have been established and successfully carried on. Now, what has been done in other countries can be done here, and if the system has proven a success elsewhere, why may it not be a success here? Therefore I think it is deserving of our attention, and if this scheme is a crude one, perhaps it might be well to appoint a committee of a number of members of this House to look into the question with a view of devising some means to overcome the difficulty under which the agriculturists of this country are to-day. The merchant may apply to a bank and by endorsed notes raise what money he requires, but it is not so with the farmers. Farmers, as a rule, are not like business men, and their business does not enable them always to make money, or to have at hand at all times the security they need to raise it without a great deal of trouble and annoyance, and many times when it would be advantageous to them to have a little money, they are unable to get it on account of the restrictions that are imposed by those monetary institutions to which they are now obliged to apply. As to whether farmers' banks could be established, I am not prepared to say; as to whether it would be advisable for the Dominion Government to issue all the circulation of the country, I am not prepared to say; but I do believe that some scheme may be devised whereby the agriculturists of this country should get their money at a lower rate of interest, and on terms that would be much more favorable to them and much more likely to enable them to carry on their operations with success to themselves and with profit to the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. The question that has been brought before the House by the hon. gentleman for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), is one of great importance, and I shall be glad, indeed, to give him any assistance in my power, as a humble member of this House, to secure from this Dominion money at a less rate of interest on behalf of the farmers than they are paying for it at present. I believe the farming industry of this country deserves the serious consideration of every member of this House. It is, after all, the most important industry, and if we can by any means, such as suggested by the hon. member for Centre Wellington, secure to them the means of getting money at a cheaper rate than they are now paying, I am sure it would be the duty of every member of this House to second the effort of the hon. gentleman. At the time the hon. gentleman introduced this measure last year, I was in doubt, and I was somewhat afraid, it could not be successfully carried out. I was rather inclined to think that, perhaps, the system he proposed could not be very well carried out. However, I am glad to second his efforts in any way I can, in order to bring it into operation, and if it will be the means of securing to the agriculturists of this country money at a less rate of interest than they are now paying, it will undoubtedly be a blessing to them. My belief is that the farmers should be placed in a position where they can borrow money at a much less rate than they have been paying the last number of years. I have to express the regret myself that the institutions from which the farmers have been borrowing money for years, have been placed in a position to take advantage of the farmers, who, in many cases, have been misled and deceived, and have been called upon to pay rates of interest far in excess they should have been able to borrow for. I am one of those prepared to say that we should have a usury law. I believe somewhat in a usury law. I should think that when a man gets into such a financial position that he is able to manage his own affairs and lend the balance of his means to his neighbor, it is only right that his neighbor should be protected from exorbitant rates. However, that is not altogether in accord with the line that has been struck out by the hon. member for Centre Wellington. If the banking system suggested would, when put into operation, prove advantageous to the farmers, which I hope would be the case, it would receive my cordial and hearty support. I am prepared to do everything in my power to perfect the Bill which the hon. member intends to introduce, and when it comes up I will do anything to assist to bring it to a successful issue.

Mr. McLELAN. The proposition which has been made by the hon. member (Mr. Orton) is very wide in its operation and is of very considerable importance, as affecting the whole of the circulation of the country. I regret the circumstances which caused my absence from the House during the remarks of the mover of the resolutions. The question of the change proposed requires very careful consideration. I have had conversation with a number of the principal bankers upon the matter of a Dominion issue of notes, making the circulation of notes entirely a Dominion one, and I have gathered the opinions of a number of them. The Government is not yet prepared to come to a decision upon the matter, but it is anxious to gather the opinions of the country, of the House and of the banking institutions.

I think no harm, but perhaps some good, might arise from a free discussion of the question before the Banking Committee and in the House. If the House or the Government were to be considered in any way committed to the principle of the resolution, if that course were followed, I would desire that the debate be adjourned in order that I might have before me the arguments that the mover used before considering them and replying to them. But it remains for the House to say whether the matter might not be allowed to go before the Banking Committee where it could be fully discussed, without it being considered that the House is committed to the principle of the resolution. If such were the understanding I would have no objection to the matter going before the Banking Committee where it might be fully discussed, otherwise I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the first suggestion of the Finance Minister is the more accurate one. As the hon. gentleman was unable to be present to hear the remarks of the mover I think the debate should be adjourned, and a question so vital, comprehensive and important should not be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee before there has been a full and exhaustive debate in this House.

Mr. ORTON. This subject has been brought before the House on the present occasion for the second time, and there never seems to be any intention on the part of the House to discuss it. I cannot willingly consent to the proposition to adjourn the debate. The order would, under such circumstances, not be reached before the end of the Session, and the Banking Committee would not have an opportunity to carefully consider the character of the Bill. I hope the House will allow this Bill to go before the Committee, which is the proper place for it, to be carefully considered and discussed. There can be no doubt that this is an abstract question and one that can be more properly discussed there than before the House. After it has been considered by the Committee it would come before the House and then discussed by it. I hope the Government will see the propriety of allowing the Bill to go before the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I really believe it would be better that this matter should not be deferred by moving the adjournment of the debate, but that the motion should be adopted, of course without prejudice. It will be understood that the principle of the Bill will be voted on only when the report of the Banking Committee comes back to this House. When we shall have the labors of that committee before us, their report and the evidence taken, the House will then be in a position to consider the whole matter. This is the second time the hon. gentleman has brought the matter before the House. Last year the House could not take it up as it was too late in the Session; but, as the hon. gentleman has come early in the present Session, I think it would be fair to the hon. member that the resolution should pass through the committee, that he should introduce his Bill, and on the motion for the second reading the Bill should be sent pro forma to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and then the committee would consider the matter and evidence taken upon it, and report. Afterwards we would be able to take up the matter and decide whether the Bill so reported should go through the House or be deferred another year.

Mr. VAIL. It seems to me this is a very important matter, and as the Government has had at least one year to consider it, they should be now in a position to announce what they intend to do in regard to it. They have a majority in this House and on the Banking Committee, and if they choose to take the responsibility of endorsing the Bill so far as to send it to the committee, they must take the responsibility. For my own part I quite agree with the position taken by the leader of the Opposition. The debate should be adjourned, and if the Government require further information, they should obtain it; but at all events the resolution should be fully discussed in the House before it is sent to the committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I trust the Government will tell the House and the country what they propose to do on a question of this great importance. Questions of this magnitude, involving a total change in the whole banking and financial system of the country, ought not to be decided upon or appear to be decided by this House in any particular way without prejudice. The Government of this country are called upon to instruct and lead the House in such a matter. If they approve of the principle without committing themselves to the details of the hon. gentleman's Bill, then it is perfectly right to send it to the Banking and Commerce Committee. But according to the practice and all precedent it ought not to be sent there unless the House is convinced that the principle of the hon. gentleman's resolution is a desirable one, and should be shaped into a Bill. Are we to waste the time of the Banking Committee—because there will be a very long discussion—for days and days in trying to settle the details of the measure, and then find the Government are opposed to the principle of it? I do not think it is a question that can, with any propriety, be referred to a committee comprising forty or fifty members only out of 211. It is a question of first rate magnitude, and I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen opposite can possibly absolve themselves from the grave responsibility which they will incur if they appear to sanction the principle of this measure without having given due consideration to all the important consequences involved in it.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee on resolutions.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 3,

Mr. MILLS. I should like if the promoter would explain how he expects parties to invest capital in these banks at 5 per cent. interest, when under the National Policy, which the hon. gentleman supports, they can get so much higher a rate for their money when otherwise invested.

Mr. ORTON. All I can say is, that after having given the matter very careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that there is a fair prospect for any farmers' bank established under the principles of the Bill, and that farmers who are not obliged to borrow, but have their farms clear of encumbrances, will be easily induced to become stockholders in these banks, because by putting mortgages in them they can become the possessors of legal tender notes, based on the credit of the Dominion of Canada. There would be only that amount of interest payable that results from the number of notes of that character that are presented at the Treasury Department for redemption, and only upon the amount sufficient for the redemption of those notes. For that reason I think there is every inducement not only to farmers, but to capitalists and men of means to commence operations and lend their money on proper security. I think it will have the effect of increasing the benefits which Canada has already derived from the National Policy, and that it is a fitting addition to that policy which the people of Canada have adopted.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman has not yet made clear what inducement there is to a farmer to take stock in a bank in which the rate of interest is limited to 5 per cent. rather than to invest in other institutions where a higher rate is paid. Then it is provided that the period of accommodation will be much longer than in the ordinary banks, and therefore the rate of profit will necessarily be less, and that being the case, the hon. gentleman should explain how he expects farmers to take stock in these banks rather than in other banking institutions where the rate of interest is higher and less restrictions placed upon them. Then the hon. gentleman knows that, under the arrangement he has suggested, the dividends will be very much less than in the ordinary banking institutions, even at the same rate of interest.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It appears to me that the hon. gentleman is not quite serious with regard to this Bill. He pretends to be acting in the interest of the farmers by compelling them to mortgage their farms and raise capital with which to carry on a banking business, and then he will allow them only 5 per cent. interest. He gives them the privilege of mortgaging their farms to get capital to stock these banks and then he strikes a blow at the farming interests of this country by legislating against them and providing that they shall not charge more than 5 per cent. interest. If this is legislation in the interest of the farmers, I think the farmers should know it, and wake up to their interests. Some time ago the hon. gentleman pretended to legislate in the interests of the farmers. At that time wheat was $1.50 per bushel, and under his beneficent legislation, it is now 75 cents a bushel. To-day the farmers can get 6, 7 or 8 per cent. for their money, but he wants to legislate so that they will only get 5. Why, Sir, it is a direct slap in the face to the farming community. As I represent a large farming community, everything intended to benefit them shall have my hearty and cordial support. I believe farming is the foundation of the success of the country, and every restriction should be taken away from that industry; but why the hon. member should propose to limit the farmer to charging 5 per cent. while he allows the loan companies and the banks to charge 8 or 9 per cent. and then claim to be the friend of the farmer, I cannot understand. If the farmers are going to mortgage their farms, they should be allowed to mortgage them for whatever money they can raise. I should like the hon. gentleman to be serious in this matter; it is too important to trifle with the agricultural constituencies. I stand here as the representative of a farming constituency and as the son of a farmer, and I do not like to see the farming interests treated as they are now proposed to be treated. I should like the Government to pronounce on this measure. It is said that it is going to change the whole banking system of the country. I think it is an insult to the farmers that they should be bound down to charge only 5 per cent. when you allow others to charge as high a rate of interest as the money will fetch.

Mr. ORTON. In reply to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) I would say that by this measure a farmer with an improved farm can mortgage it without paying interest by placing it in the hands of the Treasury Department, while loaning his money at 5 per cent. With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) who has attempted to cast ridicule on this attempt to benefit the farming interest of the country, I would inform him that this Bill is more in the interest of the farmers who borrow money than the usurers, and when he goes back to his constituents, I think he will find that they will not allow him to come back and cast ridicule on anything that is introduced for their benefit. If he says it is of no benefit to the farming interest to get money at 5 per cent. his head must be very thick. It must be patent to every man in this House, as well as outside of this House, that it would be an immense boon to this country to get the rate of interest reduced, it would enable all our industries to compete with the industries of the world at a greater advantage. The farmers will still have an opportunity of loaning money at higher rates if they can find customers to borrow from them at higher rates.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. gentleman cannot construe anything I said as casting ridicule on the farmer; but the manner in which he introduces this measure is, I say, a direct insult to the farmers of this country. He does not treat the matter as if he were serious. Do you suppose the farmers I represent do not understand this question better than that, or that they will misunderstand my position? If the hon. gentleman wants to do what is right, let him assail the big banking institutions, but not compel farmers to loan money at the low rate of 5 per cent. This is to ridicule the farmers. This is class legislation made in the interests of the chartered banks against the farmers. I hope the hon. gentleman will not settle this question as he did the price of wheat by bringing it down from $1.50 to 75 cents.

Mr. HESSON. I think the hon. member for South Grey does want to introduce something in the way of ridicule, because we supposed we had a question here at any rate that was not to be treated on party grounds. The hon. gentleman starts out by pointing to the efforts of the Government, on a previous occasion, to benefit the people of Canada—efforts which brought down wheat from $1 to 75 cents a bushel, which, I suppose, was the result of the National Policy. There was no necessity of dragging in such a far-fetched matter as that. The hon. gentleman lives in an agricultural community, and, I suppose, the greatest mistake they made was in sending him here. If he was as sincere as he professes to be, in his desire to help the farmers, he would be able to see the benefit of this scheme to the farmers, not only to the borrowers, but the lenders. If a farmer has his property in real estate, which lies inactive, and which represents to him say a value of $10,000, and he mortgages it to the extent of one half its value, he becomes the possessor of bank stock to the extent of $5,000, and he gets 5 per cent. interest on his asset which costs nothing. The hon. member for Bothwell asks, why not invest in the other banks that pay larger interests? I would like to ask him in what way they could get more than they have invested, whether in specie or bank notes, except by adopting the proposition of my non. friend. The farm, which is, after all, the best security—better than a bank bill or specie, because it remains after the specie is gone—is perfectly safe and is earning 3 or 4 per cent., while the farmer has a mortgage on his farm for which he does not pay one cent except the cost of the writing, and I think the Bill should reduce the cost of even that. Now, let us see what the advantage is to the unfortunate borrower. I say it is sufficient inducement for any man who owns good real estate in Canada, to invest in such a bank, because he gets interest at 4 per cent., which, on a mortgage of $5,000, represents $200 a year, over and above all he earns out of his farm, while he runs no risk. His unfortunate neighbor who has not the advantage of being free from debt, or has a mortgage on his farm at 7 or 8 per cent., can go to that institution and get relief by obtaining a loan at 5 per cent. I think the limit is properly fixed at 5 per cent.; and I do not think the hon. gentleman who gets up in this House and urges that we should raise the rate of interest, will find that to go very far with those who want to borrow. I think there is a great deal in this measure to justify this House in considering it fairly and honestly, not only in the interest of the owner of real estate who seeks to invest, but in the interest of the unfortunate man who has to borrow. I think it is worthy of more serious consideration than is given to it by the hon. gentleman who gets up here and says we are casting ridicule on the farmers of this country. But the hon. gentleman wants to drag in his paltry politics again.

Mr. LANDERKIN. No, it is your paltry politics.

Hr. HESSON. It is not worthy of any gentleman representing an agricultural constituency, to take such a position. I can hardly imagine the hon. gentleman is sincere, because he is usually very jokey; he is usually full of good amusing incidents, and I fancy he was not sincere. If he wants more information my hon. friend will give him all he wants, for his sole object is to have the intelligence of the House drawn on this question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This is a generous move in the interests of the farmer. The Bill proposes that the farmer may mortgage his farm; this mortgage may be deposited with the Government, and he take the chances of a commercial speculation. The farmer may lose his farm and be thrown out in the streets as the result of a bad speculation. A society called the Grangers has been formed by the farmers. In forming it, did they propose to increase their facilities for credit? No. Their object was, on the contrary, to bring things to a cash basis. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) pretends to speak for the farmers, I know not by what right. He cannot have studied this question or he would know that the object of the Grangers is not to extend credit, but to limit it, and to reduce the farmers operations as much as possible to a cash basis. That is what the farmers want. It is not in their interest to get up a bank which will have the effect of ruining perhaps all those who engage in it, and then compel those men to lend at 5 per cent. only, when all the other banks are allowed to charge what they can get. The thing is perfectly absurd. I can tell the hon. gentleman, that the farmers understand their own business; they have discussed this question in their Granges, and they have come to the conclusion to do away with the credit system as much as they possibly can. The amount paid by this country to keep up the credit system, is a very heavy burden on the community; through it we are obliged to keep up a whole army of officials, and to it many a farmer owes his ruin.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) has the happy faculty of turning everything to political account. The farming community, on learning the line of argument he adopts in this case, may well exclaim: "Save me from my friend!" They have, when compelled to borrow money from the banks, to pay for it from 8 to 12 per cent. The banks usually charge 8 per cent., but as no money will be advanced for a longer time than three months by the banks, the customers have to pay compound interest on the capital four times a year, and this Bill is intended to furnish the means whereby this difficulty will be met by enabling the farmers to get money at 5 per cent. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) says why not compel the banks to lend at 5 per cent.? That we have tried unsuccessfully to do, and our want of success has shown the necessity of devising some other means to meet the difficulty, such as the one now proposed. The hon. gentleman says the Grangers recognise the necessity of curtailing the credit system and are endeavoring to establish a cash basis. Does he believe that the Grangers could not carry on business more successfully if they had the means of borrowing money at cheaper rates than they can at present? But the hon. gentleman says it is an injustice to the farmer to compel him to lend at 5 per cent., when the banks can lend at what they like. There is no compulsion in the matter. This Bill simply furnishes the means by which the farmer can get money at 5 per cent., and then invest it in any way he likes. The greatest benefit must resort to the farming community in the event of this scheme being worked out successfully. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says: If the farmers can raise money, why not allow them to invest it in ordinary bank stock which realises a larger rate of interest? But the farmers cannot raise money without means being devised for raising it, and this Bill will put it in their power to raise money on latent capital, on which to-day they get no profit at all. If a farm is worth $1,000 and the farmer can raise $500 on it, for which he will get 5 per cent., that is $25 a year, he will receive that on latent capital on which to-day he realises nothing, and he may invest the money in any bank or in any other manner he chooses. This proposal simply puts in the power of the farmer the means to borrow, and I can tell the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) that in his part of the country the farmers have been obliged to borrow in days past at from 15 to 18 per cent. Would it not be much better for them if they could borrow at 5 per cent.? I can only say that, year after year, the hon. the mover of his Bill (Mr. Orton) has been struggling to obtain this boon for the farming community, and I think his efforts deserve commendation and not ridicule.

Mr. LANDERKIN. These resolutions have been before the House from year to year, for I do not know how many years. If the hon. gentleman was serious, why did he not press them before? He has generally allowed them to go to the second stage, he has allowed the hon. member for East Grey and others to say their few words, and then the Bill disappeared; it was slaughtered at the end of each Session. Its only object seemed to be to gain a little popularity for its supporters and there it ended. This farce has been carried on for years, and now the Government take the unusual course of allowing the Bill to go to the Banking and Commerce Committee without affirming the principle of the measure. If there is anything to relieve the farmer, I do not think it comes well out of the mouth of any hon. gentleman to say I will not be as active and as alive to their interests as those persons who boast they are the friends of the farmer. They have a good way of showing it. They want the farmer to mortgage his farm in order to carry on a banking business and to get 5 per cent. interest, while they allow chartered banks to manage the banking business and charge what interest they like. If these are the friends of the farmers, I think the farmers will say: "From our friends, good Lord, deliver us."

Mr. ORTON. The hon. gentleman, I see, has changed ground somewhat.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I hope you will do the same.

Mr. ORTON. His attempt to ridicule has failed, and the ridicule has been brought on his own head; and, when he returns to the county of Grey, I have no doubt the farmers there will teach him his duty to his constituents, and that, when such an important question as this comes up, he will not have again an opportunity to cast ridicule upon an honest effort for their good.

Mr. LANDERKIN. An honest effort, did you say?

Mr. ORTON. When the hon. gentleman says I was absolutely compelling the farmers to ask only 5 per cent., he is stating what is absolutely untrue.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. ORTON. I think I am perfectly in order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I rise to a point of order. Will you have the kindness, Mr. Chairman, to read the clause of the Bill where 5 per cent. is to be taken?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I wish, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ORTON. I simply stated, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Orton) has a right to explain what he said.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. ORTON. What I stated was that, if he said so, it was not a statement of fact.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is just the point.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order.

Mr. ORTON. It was not a statement of fact, because it must have been made from an entire misconception of this Bill. It is not what the Bill or the resolutions propose to do, and the hon. gentleman evidently spoke as if he were not familiar with the question under consideration, and therefore I think, perhaps, it would have been better if he had not made any remarks at all. However, he changed his ground, and attempted to show that on former occasions I had not pressed these resolutions as far as I possibly could. I maintain that I have, on every occasion on which I have brought them forward, pushed them as far as I possibly could, as far as the House would permit me to push them; and it is the leader of the hon. gentleman's own party who is now trying to hamper the progress of these resolutions.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. ORTON. He has attempted to place me in the position in which I was placed before, and it is not the first time that the leader of the Opposition has endeavored to place impediments in the way of reducing the rates of interest to the agriculturists of this country; but I am glad to find that this Session the resolutions are likely to advance a step further, and I hope they will go so far as to lead to the adoption of the Bill in some form, in order to carry out what I have in view, which is to give facilities to our farmers to carry on their business on a cash basis. Reference has been made to the Grangers. This Bill will be the means to enable the farmers to carry on their business on a cash basis instead of asking credit from their storekeepers, and being charged 8 per cent., compounded every three months, which is the course usually adopted by country merchants. This will enable them, if they have not enough money from their crop to pay their store and other bills, to borrow at a low rate money to pay cash, and the result is that they will be able to buy their goods at a cheaper rate, and will not have to pay the high rate of interest which they have had to pay in consequence of a false and injurious credit system.

Mr. MILLS. I think the hon. gentleman has not explained some very serious features which are presented by the resolutions before you. The hon. gentleman proposes, by these resolutions, that the agricultural class of the population shall have the right to mortgage their real estate to the extent of half its value, that the Government shall issue notes to the half value of the property, and that the property shall be liable to that amount. The hon. gentleman assumes, all through the observations that he has made, that in no case can the land become liable, that every borrower is perfectly good for the amount he receives. We know that frequently land changes its value. There may be a destruction of buildings, or changes in trade, or an alteration in the circumstances of the people in a particular district, which may diminish the value of the land by more than half, so that the amount for which the lands may be mortgaged may be greater than the cash value of the land at the particular time. Now, the parties who obtain money in this way may after all find that their land is not worth the amount of money they have received. What is to be the effect? Is not the land of the rest of the community, which is mortgaged for half its value, liable for any loss sustained? Is this the only banking institution in the world which is to run no risks and is never to be liable to failure under any circumstances? The hon. gentleman has proposed a scheme which resembles in some respects the national banking institutions of the United States, and yet we know that many of those institutions have failed, and that those interested in them have lost all the capital they had invested. It seems to me that, in a proposition so important and serious as this, one which the hon. gentleman says is of such vast consequence to the agricultural portion of the community—I must say I do not quite agree with him in that view, but assuming that his view is correct—is it not perfectly plain that the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches are those who ought to take charge of this measure, who ought to take it into consideration, form an opinion upon it, and guide the House in reference to it? The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Public Works have abdicated their functions in this matter, and placed the guidance of the House in reference to it in the hands of the hon. gentleman who has taken charge of this measure. I think we are entitled to know what are the opinions of the Government upon this question. The hon. gentleman has threatened my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Landerkin) on this matter. He has undertaken to speak for his constituents, and has stated that they will desert him, and will disapprove of his action on this subject, and that he will not again be returned to this House. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, cannot say as much with regard to his own constituents. He may not be able to speak with as much confidence as to their views, as he has spoken with regard to the constituents of my hon. friend from Grey; but, if it is a matter of such importance to the people of Grey—and I suppose to those in every other portion of the country—how is it that the hon. gentleman has not succeeded in the past four or five years in impressing his leaders with the importance of the measure he has in hand? The hon. gentleman who sits behind him ardently supported this measure, but not more ardently than he supports the gentlemen on the Treasury benches. He seems to think it is a matter of immense consequence to the agricultural population of this country. How is it that he has not told those gentlemen that this is a matter of such vital consequence to the agriculturists of this country, who have been fleeced on the right hand and on the left by capitalists who have wronged them by giving them the money that they want? How is it that he has not pointed out to his leaders the importance of this measure, and impressed them with their duty in this matter? Those hon. gentlemen ought to have made themselves conversant with the merits of this measure; they ought to have been able to explain their views to this House and to guide the House on this particular question; but what do we find? Why, that the Minister of Finance has yet everything to learn with regard to it. He says he does not know anything about the matter, and he could not be expected to know, because he had not read the lucid and luminous speech made by the hon. gentleman who proposes this measure. Well, had the hon. gentleman ever spoken to the Minister of Finance? Has he impressed him with the very great importance of this measure, and its utility to the agricultural population? Has he ever spoken to him upon the subject before introducing it into Parliament? Has he taken these steps to induce the Government to take up this important question, which is of such vital consequence to nine-tenths of the population of this country? Why is it that the hon. gentleman, while he has been lecturing my hon. friend with regard to the importance of this measure, has not succeeded in impressing those who guide him in this House in reference to this subject? Now, Sir, I think that before this House takes any action, before this House engages in any enterprise of this sort and supports a hare-brained scheme, such as it seems to me this one is, we ought to know the views of the Government upon this subject. The Finance Minister ought to have given his opinion upon a question of this kind, and ought to be prepared to lead the House and to direct them in the course which he thinks the public interest demands on a question of such moment, as the promoter of this measure says it is. I trust, Sir, that we will receive some light from the Government, that we may learn from them what their views are, and that the House, before it commits itself to a position of this sort, will know what are the views upon this question of those upon whom the responsibility of directing the affairs of the country rests at this moment.

Mr. ORTON. In reply to the hon. gentleman who refers to the fact that the land basis of this proposal is one that varies in value, I may say that I have confined it strictly to improved farm land as the basis of this money circulation, and I maintain that improved farm lands to-day are the only property that is not liable to any serious change in value, and the change in value usually is in the direction of an increase and not a decrease. Had I included city, or town and village property, it would have been much more of a speculative character, and much less safe than it is under the present mode that I propose. I maintain that it is a far safer basis than the banking system in operation to-day. Sir, I can quite appreciate the position of some hon. gentlemen opposite. We all know very well that several of our hon. friends have taken a great interest in loan societies; probably they desire to assist the farmers in that way by lending them money from the loan societies. I believe the leader of the Opposition is the largest stockholder, perhaps, in one of the largest loan societies in Ontario, and he may perhaps think he is doing the best he can for the farmers by loaning them money through a loan society of that character. But I think I should be allowed the privilege of differing from him in opinion, and of believing that it would be to the advantage of the farmers to have money at a much lower rate of interest. In reference to the hon. gentleman's remarks about the Government, I may say that I feel they have conceded a great deal in allowing this Bill to go a stage further in this House, with the object of getting further information. I have not the slightest doubt that when this Bill is submitted to the Banking and Commerce Committee, a sub-committee will be appointed and they will probably have power to send for skilled and scientific men who understand questions of finance, by whom a large amount of information could be gathered, and the Bill put in such a shape as to attain the object sought for. As I stated before, it is not a new principle at all. It is a principle that has succeeded in other countries, and there is no reason why it should not succeed here; there is no reason why the people of Canada should not have money at as low a rate of interest as the people of other countries.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know whether the place in which my little savings may be invested, is very material to this discussion, though I am quite willing to admit that I have a small sum of money in a loan society. But if that has anything to do with the public, it does not affect my public action. My public action is based upon the idea that the proper conduct of this business in Parliament would be attended to by the Government pursuing the course of announcing a policy on a question of such great importance. That has been the recognised view in times past; it was the view which the Finance Minister himself recognised in the course of the few observations he made. He stated that he had not been able to hear the hon. gentleman's speech; he was unfortunately out of the House, and consequently had not been able to hear those arguments by which the mover sought to support his Bill; and having, as the hon. member has, no doubt, a great and deserved confidence in the powers of the hon. gentleman, he felt that he would derive much light from hearing that speech, and perhaps be led to conclusions different from those which, very obviously, he had formed, guided by that gentleman's luminous speech. It was under these circumstances that the hon. Minister of Finance himself stated his inability to do that which he conceded it was his duty to do, namely, to give to the House some light, and leading himself upon this subject, and suggested the propriety of the adjournment of the debate. I happened to agree with the Minister of Finance, and for that the hon. gentleman has been, to use perhaps a somewhat unparliamentary term—though I hope not an offensive one—has been slanging me two or three times because I agreed with one of his leaders in the view that that gentleman ought to have an opportunity, before expressing an opinion, of listening to, or of reading—since he could not have the extreme felicity of hearing his eloquence—to have an opportunity of reading, at any rate, his views before coming to a conclusion. I had thought, that upon an occasion so important as this, when a financial measure of such vast magnitude was under the consideration of the House, that the Finance Minister would have made it his business, unless some extraordinary public emergency should prevent his attending in his place, to hear the discussion, and, enlightened by that discussion, and particularly by the speech of the mover, to state those sage conclusions which might animate us and direct us in the course of our public duties. But some overwhelming circumstance, I suppose, prevented his attendance. It could not be that he was afraid of being converted by the hon. gentleman if he listened to his speech; it could not be that he could have preferred to read the speech in the Hansard instead of hearing the hon. gentleman deliver it; so there must have been some overwhelming emergency which deprived us of the benefit of the Finance Minister's presence during that portion of the discussion which was so important. Now, the hon. gentleman says that I have thrown an impediment in the way, because I, the leader of a very small minority in this House, concurred with the Finance Minister and supported the organ of the Government in the view that he should have an opportunity of knowing what the mover had said before reaching a conclusion. Now, I will tell the hon. gentleman my opinion about this mode of conducting this business. My opinion is that the Government is desirous of strangling this measure privately in the Banking Committee, instead of publicly announcing an opinion adverse to the hon. gentleman. My opinion is that they wish to give him an opportunity of making capital in the Centre Riding of Wellington and parts adjacent, by adopting the course of abrogating their own functions and of pursuing the unparliamentary and unreasonable course with respect to the conduct of public business, of agreeing to such a measure of such great importance without announcing a policy upon it. The hon. gentleman now, not for the first time, enlightened the House with his views upon this subject. He had spoken them before. The Minister of Finance had heard them upon former occasions; he had had an opportunity of reading them. As an hon. friend of mine had said, the hon. gentleman, an ardent supporter of the Government, in close communication with them, had frequent opportunities, no doubt, of private discourse with the Minister of Finance and other members of the Government, and of bringing them to his views. He has not yet succeeded in bringing them to his views, but he has succeeded in arranging with them that he shall not be publicly executed upon the floor of the House; he has succeeded in providing for a private strangulation under which this measure will disappear after a little while, not to appear again in form or substance. That is the whole of it.

Mr. ORTON. This is not the first time we have listened to the hon. gentleman's fine spun sarcasm directed against hon. members of this House. As far as his efforts in that direction concern me, I can tell him that they pass over me perfectly harmless. Even when he introduced that very elegant phrase that I had been casting "slang" upon him, I maintain that his statement is not correct. I have not been casting slang upon the hon. gentleman. I have simply made remarks about the course he has taken, and I think there is not an hon. member in this House who does not know that had I taken the course which he advocated, this Bill would be shut off for this Session. When I explained to the Finance Minister that there would be an opportunity before the Bill came before the Banking and Commerce Committee for him to read any statements I have made and also to discuss the matter, he at once acceded in my suggestion, and the Government have shown their honest inclination to do what is right in connection with this Bill, while the hon. gentleman opposite, in a manner completely out of order, imputed other motives to the occupants of the Treasury benches. I do not know whether he measures them according to his own bushel when he was on this side of the House, whether he thought that would be the way in which he would have treated this Bill and strangled it. It may be so. But, at all events, so far as my honesty of purpose is concerned, I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that I have the greatest faith in this Bill attaining the object I desire, that is giving to the people of this country money at a cheap rate of interest so as to stimulate every enterprise and industry in the Dominion. Whether I shall succeed or not in carrying a majority of the House or of the Banking and Commerce Committee in favor of the Bill this year, I have good hope that in the end it will succeed in some way or other, through the principles incorporated into this measure, in securing the object I have in view.

Mr. HESSON. I was struck with the remarks which fell from the leader of the Opposition with respect to the hon. member introducing this Bill with the simple object of gaining popularity in Centre Wellington. If the hon. gentleman will reflect for a moment he will discover what that implies. It implies that this Bill will be popular with the farming community; and that fact should act as a stimulus to the hon. member to go on with the Bill and perfect it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If such is the case, why did not the Government take it up?

Mr. HESSON. I desire further to say that instead of it being the desire of the Government or of the House to strangle this question in a quiet way, the proposition now made was the proper one, namely, to refer it to one of the largest and most intelligent committees in connection with the House. I have yet to learn that that is strangling the Bill.

[It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 77) to amend the Post Office Act, 1875 (from the Senate).—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 5) to extend the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of Ontario.—(Mr. Allen.)

INSOLVENT BANKS, LOAN COMPANIES, &c., AND TRADING CORPORATIONS.

Mr. EDGAR moved the second reading of Bill (No. 15), further to amend the Act respecting insolvent banks, insurance companies, loan companies, building societies and trading corporations.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). There are some provisions in this Bill to which I desire to call the attention of the House, because they somewhat seriously affect the winding up provisions of the companies that are mentioned in the preamble. The purpose of the Bill is to give to clerks and other persons in the employ of the company, in or about its business or trade, a preference in regard to their claims for arrears of salary or wages due and unpaid them at the time of the making of the winding-up order, not exceeding three months of such arrears. Assuming the principle to be sound, and I do not for my part contest that point, it is worthy of consideration by the House whether the time for which preference is to be given should be as long a period as three months, as it would, of course, in the case of companies employing large numbers of hands constitute a very large preference, indeed, and one in regard to which creditors could have no information before the making of the winding up order. Then there is the provision that they shall have preference:

"And also for such salary or wages, for a period not exceeding two months of the unexpired portion of the then current year of service, during which period they shall be bound to perform, under the direction of the liquidator, any work or duty connected with the affairs of the company, which the company might have directed them to perform, under their respective engagements."

So there would be substantially, under the provisions of this Bill, not only a preference for three months' wages, but also in effect a preference for damages for the cessation of employment to the extent of two months' wages, although it is true the Bill provides that in regard to those two months' wages the employee shall be at the service of the liquidators. The second clause, however, I think is one which the hon. gentleman should withdraw from his Bill, because it involves retrospective legislation and makes a preference where none exists at present in regard to companies now being wound up. It is quite possible the observations I have made do not strictly apply to the principle of the Bill, but inasmuch as it is one of great importance, and those three features are the features which the House should observe with caution, I think it is only right to mention the matter, and especially the last clause to which I referred. I think it would be desirable that the Bill should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. EDGAR. In regard to the reference to the Banking and Commerce Committee I was going, myself, to suggest that course.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return stating name, rank and corps of all officers composing the staff of Major-General Middleton, and the capacity in which each served.—(Mr. Casey.)

Return showing names of all Militia officers and non-combatants appointed as transport and supply officers, giving rank and corps of Militia officers, with dates of appointment, rates of pay, by whom appointed, and on whose recommendation, and total payments to each to date.—(Mr. Casey.)

Return to date of all moneys paid to Bell & Lewis, Howard Wright, J. Stewart and Mr. Sinclair for transport service during the rebellion, with copies of all contracts, transfers, and correspondence, telegrams, &c., connected therewith, stating in each case the rate per ton, points between which service was performed, and distance between such points.—(Mr. Casey.)

Return of names of all persons employed, as purchasing agents, showing when, by whom, and on whose application appointed, rate of pay and length of employment.—(Mr. Casey.)

Return of names and appointments of the medical and hospital staff (other than regimental), showing whether they were in the Active Militia, and, if so, their rank and corps, with rates of pay and length of service in all cases.—(Mr. Casey.)

Return of names of the staff paymasters appointed, showing whether non-combatants or not, with rank and corps of such as were in the Active Militia; with rate of pay and length of services in all cases.—(Mr. Casey.)

Return of names of all officers, surgeons and assistant surgeons in the Active Militia, who volunteered for service in the North-West, with rank and corps.—(Mr. Casey.)

Return of names, rank and corps of the officers composing the Military Claims Commission, while at Winnipeg; stating also any subsequent changes in the personnel of the commission, with reasons for the same.—(Mr. Casey.)

Return of all horses purchased for use during the expedition, showing name and rank (if any) of persons by whom purchases were made, and number purchased by each; authority for purchase, price paid, and final disposition of the horses by sale or otherwise, when the service was over, with price received for such as were sold.—(Mr. Casey.)

Return of all horses, ponies, cattle, furs, waggons, carts and other property seized by the Mounted Police or expeditionary force, while on service in the North-West between 27th March and 1st August, with the disposition made of the same; the names of persons from whom such seizures were made, and the amounts (if any) paid, received, or now payable or receivable, on account of such property.—(Mr. Casey.)

Return showing all purchases of food, material, medical supplies and comforts, forage and equipment, by tender and otherwise, showing quantities, price and names of persons from whom purchased, for the use of the North-West expeditionary force, with schedule of quantities of each description remaining unused at the end of the campaign, and the final disposition of the same by sale or otherwise, with amounts received for such as were sold.—(Mr. Casey.)

Return showing the total amount paid to date, or now payable on any claim recognised by the Government in connection with the suppression of the North-West rebellion, under the following heads, namely:—Transport service. Pay of officers and men. Subsistence. Equipment. Arms and ammunition. Medical and hospital supplies. Horses. Forage. Commissions, if any, for payment of money or purchase of supplies; distinguishing payments made under any of these heads to the Canadian Pacific or Hudson's Bay Companies.—(Mr. Casey.)

Copy of the Order in Council appointing certain persons as Inspectors or Commissioners of Indian Affairs in the North-West, in the year 1878, together with the report, if any, of said Inspectors or Commissioners.—(Mr. Landerkin.)

Statement, in detail, of all law or other costs or expenses incurred by the Dominion since 1870, in connection with the western and northern boundary of Ontario; when and to whom paid.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

Return showing:—1. A copy of all contracts with I. G. Baker & Co. for supplies agreed to be furnished by them to the Mounted Police for the years 1884 and 1885. 2. A copy of all accounts of I. G. Baker & Co. for such supplies for said years.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

Return showing:—1. A copy of all contracts with I. G. Baker & Co., for supplies agreed to be furnished by them to the Indians for the years 1884 and 1885. 2. A copy of all accounts for such supplies for said years by said I. G. Baker & Co.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

1. An account, in detail, of all the law costs incurred by the Dominion in testing in the courts the Liquor License Acts of 1883 and 1884, and to whom paid. 2. A statement, in detail, of the costs of carrying into effect and attempting to enforce said Acts, and to whom paid. 3. A statement, in detail, of all salaries or payments or allowances made to any official or person under the said Acts; when paid, and to whom. 4. A statement, in detail, of all other expenses incurred under the said Acts.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Canadian Government, or any members, officers or employees thereof, respecting the medals to be given to the volunteers who served in the recent insurrection in the North-West.—(Mr. Amyot.)

Copy of any complaints made to the Department of the Interior against E. Brokovski, an intelligence officer in the employment of the Government; also copies of all reports of the said Brokovski to his Departmental superior during the years 1884 and 1885, or such periods of said years as he was employed by the Department of the Interior; together with all letters or communications asking that the office held by said Brokovski be abolished.—(Mr. Cameron, Middlesex.)

Copy of the appointment of Angus McDonald, of Upper Washabuck, Victoria County, N. S., as census enumerator in 1881; also all copies of all correspondence between the Government, or any member thereof, and any other person relative to the cancellation thereof.—(Mr. Kirk.)

Copies of petitions and letters from Rev. H. Leduc and Daniel Maloney, in relation to complaints of the people of Edmonton, Fort Saskatchewan and St. Albert, and all correspondence arising out of such petitions.—(Mr. Rykert.)

Return showing the amount of notes of the several banks of the Dominion in circulation on the first of March last. The amount of Dominion notes in circulation and in the hands of the banks on the same date. And the amount of gold held by the Government and the banks for the redemption of Dominion and bank notes at the same date.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Return showing the amount held by the Government through the several Savings Banks and Post Office Savings Banks throughout the Dominion, on the 30th June last, 1885, giving the location of each Savings Bank or Post Office Savings Bank and the sum held by the Government through each separately.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 8:50 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 1st April, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

SCOTT ACT ENFORCEMENT.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation during the present Session that will tend to aid in enforcing the prohibitory provisions of the Scott Act?

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I do not understand from the question precisely the kind of legislation which the hon. member desires to enquire about. It will be found, however, that some of the difficulties which have arisen in the enforcement of the Act will be removed by legislation which is now before the House, and by some which it is intended to introduce in a few days.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 11) for the more effectual prevention of cruelty to animals. He said: In taking charge of this Bill, I feel that I have assumed a responsibility of considerable magnitude. The character of Christ an civilisation is to promote kindness, forbearance and mercy, and the days of brutal instincts are fading into the past, and become less pronounced as Christian civilisation advances. We have fallen upon the better days of hospitals, of charities, of schools, and the spirit of religion reaches not only to men, but down below men to the animal creation. As Coleridge has very well said:

“He prayeth best who loveth best,
All things both great and small;
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.”

This spirit of philanthropy, Sir, has been very strongly manifested through the creation of societies in various countries for the prevention of cruelty to animals. We have in England the Royal Society, among the patrons of which are the Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and a great number of the English nobility. We have in Canada the Metropolitan Society of this city for the prevention of cruelty to animals, and it is under the auspices of this society that I have introduced this Bill. Among the documents of societies I have with me, are the reports of the New Hampshire Society, the Humane Society of New York, Henry Bergh, President; the American Humane Society, of Washington, the Woman's Branch of this society; the District of Columbia Society, the Western Pennsylvania Humane Society, and the Woman's Branch of it. I also have letters here from Mr. Bergh, and from Mr. Anderson, who introduced a Bill of similar character into the British House of Commons. The Bill has been drafted by the legal advisers of the Metropolitan Society of Canada, Messrs. Bishop, Green and Wicksteed. The Bill proposes to consolidate the Canadian law with reference to cruelty to animals, and introduces many new provisions. The 2nd clause provides a penalty for unlawfully and maliciously killing cattle; the 3rd clause, for unlawfully and maliciously attempting to kill; 4th, unlawfully killing other animals; 5th, for acts of wanton cruelty; 6th, for injury done to animals while driving, &c.; 7th, keeping places for baiting animals; 8th, for using birds and animals for live targets; 9th, promoting cruelty; 10th, neglecting impounded animals; the 11th clause refers to the keeping of animals having infectious or contagious diseases; 12th, bringing in animals infected into public places; 13th, offering for sale in markets any infected animal; 14th, cattle transported by railway, provisions for the unloading and feeding of stock; 15th, feeding cattle at the expense of the owners in transportation by railway, if the owner makes no provision for it; 16th, floors of cars to be cleaned and littered; 17th, provides a penalty; 18th, proceedings upon complaint; 19th, proceedings in case of search warrant. The Bill is a consolidation of our own law; very few of the features of the Bill are new, and some of them are copied from the Imperial Statutes. A Bill of a somewhat similar character was placed in the charge of Mr. Richey, of Halifax, and was submitted to a select committee two Sessions ago, and was reported upon by that committee. Whether the Minister of Justice will require the reference of this Bill to a select committee, or will permit it to be taken into consideration by Committee of the Whole, I will now see. If the hon. gentleman requires to have the Bill referred to a select committee, it will be unnecessary to make further explanation of the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). I think I must avail myself of the hon. gentleman's willingness to have the Bill referred to a select committee. In so far as it contains new features, I think it is well worthy of consideration, especially with reference to those clauses which provide, for instance, for the prevention of the use of birds or animals as targets, and the provision with respect to the neglect of impounded cattle. In so far as the Bill is a consolidation, I think it is objectionable, because it is proposed to consolidate into a Statute, to be called "an Act for the more effectual prevention of cruelty to animals," a number of provisions which do not properly belong to that head; it proposes to consolidate provisions belonging to enactments relating to the preservation of property, the spread of contagious diseases among animals, and proposes likewise to consolidate provisions with respect to procedure which are not applicable solely to offences against an Act like this, and are to be found in the criminal law applicable to all procedure of a like kind. For these reasons, while there may be much in the Bill that would be valuable, I think it is desirable to have those views considered, and I therefore concur with the hon. gentleman in having it referred to a select committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. CHARLTON. I move that the Bill be referred to a select committee composed of Messrs. Patterson (Essex), Cameron (Huron), Wright, Weldon, Beaty, Shakespeare and the mover, seven members. We might also name two more members from the Province of Quebec.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman to increase the number to eleven, by adding the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Militia, Mr. White (Hastings), and Mr. Mackintosh.

Mr. CHARLTON. I agree to that.

Motion agreed to, and Bill referred to Select Committee.

INTEREST ON MONEY SECURED BY MORTGAGE.

Mr. McMULLEN, moved the second reading of Bill (No. 12) to amend the Act relating to interest on mortgage secured by real estate. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill I consider it my duty to offer some explanation why I consider such a measure necessary. The system of borrowing money followed by farmers often seriously affects their position. In many cases they have undertaken to borrow money for long periods, to be repaid by annual instalments. I am glad to say that the Bill which I am now seeking to amend terminated many of the abuses which grew up under that system; but, while I did so, there still remain some provisions that require amendment. It is desirable that the farmer, after borrowing money on his farm, and after contracting to pay it off by instalments, should have the right after a lapse of time to pay off the principal. The rate of interest has fallen considerably during the last few years. I know in my section of country there are farmers who borrowed money some years ago at 8 and 9 per cent., and at the present time companies and private individuals from whom they borrowed are exacting those very excessive rates of interest. Many of our farmers, unfortunately, have got themselves into very straightened financial circumstances by being placed in positions of this kind, and it becomes the duty of Parliament, when evils of this kind are found to exist, to apply the remedy. I believe it is right that the borrower under all circumstances should at least have the advantages possessed by the lender. The lender with his capital can help himself, but the borrower is absolutely in the hands of the lender, who may exact from him interest and exactions that in the end may prove very serious, and may possibly turn him out of house and home. It is our duty to protect the poor against the encroachments of the rich. In my own section of country I have known several cases where mortgage companies, having liens upon farms, have continued to charge the high rate at which the money was loaned many years ago. These companies have maintained the rates and refuse to accept payment of principal except with the addition of a bonus. The last two years have been very trying ones for many of our farmers, and I have known several cases where they have sought to get release from the financial bondage into which they have unfortunately fallen, but the companies have refused to release them. They say: You have entered into a contract to pay a certain rate of interest, and we intend to hold you strictly to that contract. Perhaps it is the duty of Parliament to respect the rights of private individuals in matters of contract; but if there is one thing in which they should interfere, it is in order to release the poorer classes from the bondage into which they have fallen in connection with payments of instalments and interest on mortgages. It will be in the interest of the poorer classes to amend the Act placed on the Statute book in 1880. In that year the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) introduced the Act which I am now seeking to amend. It provided that a mortgagor, after a loan has been in existence for five years, after paying three months' interest in advance, should have the right to pay off the entire amount of the mortgage. I seek to amend that clause so that after a mortgage has been in existence for three years, the mortgagor, by giving three months notice, shall be entitled to pay off the mortgage. I do not think it is right that the mortgagor, in order to be able to pay off the mortgage, should be required to pay anything more than interest up to the time of payment; it is unfair to ask him to pay three months' interest in advance when the money is in the hands of the lender. By simply giving notice he should be allowed to pay off a mortgage. That is one of the provisions of my Bill. The other provision is, that where a mortgage is subject to a rate of interest in excess of 6 per cent., and has been in existence for more than a year, the mortgagor shall have the right to pay off the mortgage by giving six months' notice or six months' interest. In my own section of country very serious difficulty has arisen in regard to the disposing of farms. Many of our farmers have been under the necessity, through falling into debt or failure of crops, of disposing of their farms. I have known several cases where the mortgagee has declined to accept the money to pay off the mortgage, and in consequence some sales have been lost. I know a case in which the mortgagor had died. I happened to be one of the executors of the estate, and when we commenced to realise it we found the difficulty staring us in the face of getting rid of the mortgage. The company declined to accept the principal unless they were paid a bonus, and the result was, we were compelled to lease the farm for some two years, and hold it until the mortgage expired, and then sell it and pay off the mortgage. During that time the value of the property had declined very much, and the estate lost considerably, owing to the fact that the executors were not able to pay off the incumbrance. In order to meet such cases there should be some provision that whenever it became necessary, owing to a man being hampered financially, to realise by selling or improve his condition by borrowing, there should be some means by which he could get relief. There are farmers in my section who are paying 10, 12 and 15 per cent. on chattel mortgages, and the reason is that they are unable to raise money, on account of the companies refusing to allow them to pay off the principal on a mortgage on their land. I do not contend that all these advantages are always taken by companies, because they are taken also by private individuals; and I want the law so amended as to apply to all parties borrowing money, both companies and individuals. I know farmers who have first-class real estate on which they could borrow money easily at 6 per cent., and who yet are paying to-day 10 per cent., and the mortgagee declines to accept the principal and afford relief. Some may say that the farmers who are in this position should have taken steps to have had clauses inserted in the mortgage that would protect them. But farmers are not, as a rule, well versed in financial transactions, and in many cases they are only too willing to enter into arrangements for a number of years when borrowing money, which arrangements they find themselves unable to carry out, and in a few years they fall into the grasp of the companies and money lenders, and probably, at the end, find themselves turned out of house and home. Cases of this kind I desire to remedy by this Bill; and I say that it is right, notwithstanding the right of contract between private individuals, that in cases of this kind some relief should be afforded by law, rather than to permit those who are unfortunately involved in difficulties of this kind to be ground out of everything they are possessed of. We should give the borrower all the advantage he possibly can get, because it is generally the case that the lender can look after himself. It is well known that in Canada the rate of interest has dropped within a few years, and we should give those who are subject to the exactions of exorbitant lenders the opportunity of paying off their encumbrances and obtaining money at a cheaper rate if possible; we should relieve those who are in bondage to financial agents and money lenders, and who are to-day paying excessive rates of interest under chattel mortgages, to get money to pay the interest on their real estate mortgages; I say we should give them a chance of liberating themselves from this bondage. I know of several cases within the last year in which farmers have been compelled to borrow money under chattel mortgage on their stock at 12 and 15 per cent. to pay of real estate mortgages at 7 or 8 per cent. They offer to pay off their mortgages in full, but this offer the lenders will not accept, but, on the contrary, they say: We will renew the mortgage; and they put principal and interest together and give a longer time at the old rate. This Bill is intended for the relief of such classes by, in the first place, permitting the mortgagor, in the case of a mortgage which has been in existence three years and bears interest at 6 or a less rate of interest, to pay it off on three months' notice, and in case of a mortgage which has been in existence over a year, he may do so by giving six months' notice, and that is, I think, long enough time to give the lender a chance of finding other investments for his money. These are the principal provisions of the Bill of which I move the second reading.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The first section of the hon. gentleman's Bill contains a provision which is very unusual, and would, I think, be very unwise. It proposes to amend sections four and five of the Act of 1880, by enabling a person who has been charged and who has paid an excessive amount of interest, not only to recover that interest back again, but to recover double the amount. The second section of the Bill proposes that the Act of 1880 shall be amended in this respect: The Act of 1880 provides for the paying off of a mortgage at five years; and the hon. gentleman proposes to extend that right to mortgages drawn at three years. That clause, of course, is a matter entirely for the consideration of the House. The Act of 1880 was passed after long discussion by the very narrow majority of seven members, and it may be considered doubtful whether it is wise to go a step further in making that Act more stringent than it is. If it were not for the fact that the clause in principle already exists in the Act of 1880, I should doubt very much the power of this Parliament to enact it, because it seems to me that it is not a provision relating to interest properly, but relating to contracts for the securing of money. However, inasmuch as the Act of 1880 already contains that provision, it is merely a question of extending it further, and, therefore, I do not feel warranted in pressing on the House my own view that it is really a matter with which Parliament cannot deal at all.

Mr. McMULLEN. With regard to what has been said by the hon. Minister of Justice, I may say it is very often found that private individuals as well as societies, in calculating the arrears of interest, exact from the borrower more than is really due. Farmers, as a rule, are not capable of making exact calculations of the interest due on their mortgages, while the lenders are generally very acute and accurate calculators, and, as I say, I have known cases in which they have taken advantage of the ignorance or the inexperience of borrowers to exact more than was due. This provision is intended to deter them from such practices, and I think it is not too much to compel lenders in such cases not only to repay the interest, but to pay back double the amount, and thereby deter them from such exactions.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I do not think that the first provision of the hon. gentleman's Bill is quite fair, as it would result in people borrowing money and refusing to pay the interest. I think the law as it stands at present is sufficient to collect back the amount which is overpaid, and I think no more should be allowed. The hon. gentleman's Bill has, however, one good feature about it, and that is the provision changing the time from five years to three, for there is no doubt that there is a good deal of hardship in the five year arrangement. The present Bill was only passed after a determined effort on the part of many men in this House interested in loan societies. It is no harm for me to say that, and I do not intend anything offensive; they contended that contracts then existent should be allowed to run the full length of the contract, but the House by a narrow majority decided that the time should be reduced to five years. I contend that the money market is at present so changed that we can now afford to go a step further and make mortgages payable at the end of three years. I have no hesitation in saying that there has not been a Bill passed in Parliament for the last five years which has done so much good to the farming community as the one which this Bill proposes to amend. I know that many mortgages against farmers have been paid in full which would have been still in existence, and there are many farmers in Ontario who have to-day money deposited at 4 per cent., and who would be glad to use it to pay off their mortgages which are bearing interest at 7 per cent. If the law were changed so that they could pay off those mortgages at the end of three years, it would be a great advantage to the farmers of the country. Some people may say this is interfering with contracts. Well, the companies seem to have no trouble in lending their money. I will give an instance. A man dies, leaving a good farm, which his executors offer for sale. A gentleman with money is prepared to buy the farm and to pay cash for it in full. He goes to the company having the mortgage, and offers to pay it off, but the company refuses to take the money, and insists that the mortgage must remain for the time it has to run. The result is that the executors cannot sell the farm, because the purchaser will not buy it with a mortgage against it. Then the creditors cannot get their pay. The matter runs on, the creditors press for their money, and at last the farm has to be sacrificed to pay them, and the widow and orphans suffer. Now, it is our duty in this House to make a law that will meet cases like this. It may be said that this does not often happen. I do not know how it is in other Provinces, but in Ontario it is an every-day occurrence; and we, as honest men, should do what we can to help those who are left without the assistance of the head of the house. I know that there is a feeling in this House that this matter should not be dealt with at all; but that feeling is only in the minds of those who have money to lend, and not in the mind of the man who wants to borrow money or to sell his property and finds a mortgage staring him in the face. The Minister of Justice says this is a matter for the House, but if the hon. gentleman will agree to reduce the time for paying off the mortgage from five years to three, he will have an Act which will be to his credit and to the credit of this Dominion. Some hon. gentlemen say that the mover of this Bill lends money himself. If he does, it is all the more to his credit that he introduces a Bill into this House which is going to benefit the borrower.

Mr. ORTON. I am very glad indeed to find that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has become such an enthusiastic convert to the principle I have been advocating in this House for a number of years, and that he is now so far advanced as to introduce a Bill to improve the Act which I had the honor to bring into the House in 1880. At the time that Act was introduced it was proposed that a borrower of money should be allowed to repay his loan at any time he liked upon giving three months' notice, or upon paying three months' interest in advance. Notwithstanding all the efforts which I and those who believed in the principle I advocated could make in this House and before the Banking and Commerce Committee, it was utterly impossible to get the Bill carried through the Committee in its best form; and amongst those who strenuously opposed the three years amendment was the leader of the Opposition. There were other clauses in that Bill which I hoped would be carried through this House by this time. Under the special privileges enjoyed by the old loan societies, borrowers were subject to all sorts of fines and penalties, and if they desired to pay off their mortgage in advance of the time it was due, they were forced by the loan companies to pay often more than they originally borrowed, after paying interest and principal for perhaps ten or twelve years. The Bill I proposed had for one of its objects the relief of the farmers of Canada from the grinding tyranny of the old loan societies; but it was held by this House and strenuously urged by the leader of the Opposition, that it was an interference with contracts, and that it would be impossible to carry out such a sweeping measure. I think if some relief were given to the farmers of Canada in this direction it would be only right and just. The retroactive actions of these loan societies should not be allowed to be perpetuated in this country; they are wrong and utterly dishonest in principle. I say it is unjust that such special privileges should be perpetuated in this country in order to enrich the money lenders. If they are enabled to get back their money without suffering any possible loss, that is all the justice that should be given to them. However, I am glad to welcome this Bill as a step in the direction of the efforts I made in 1880, and I shall be very glad to see it passed; at any rate, the clause permitting the borrower to pay back his loan at the end of three years. While welcoming this, I must say that I congratulate the hon. gentleman on his conversion to the principle of the Farmers' Banking and Loan Bill, which I brought up the other day, and which is of a similar character to this. I hope he will not only succeed in this Bill, but that his advocacy of it will help to create a sentiment in favor of doing justice to the agriculturists of this country by the means I have proposed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

PROTECTION OF WOMEN AND GIRLS.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 20) to punish seduction and like offences, and to make further provisions for the protection of women and girls. He said: In again returning to the advocacy of this measure, I must confess that the task is somewhat disappointing. Five times this Bill has been presented to this House, twice it has received the approval of the House, and upon each occasion it has been rejected by the other Chamber. The only thing I have to console me in this apparently hopeless struggle is the belief that I am acting in a good cause, and that the adage:

"The fight for the right when once begun,

will hold in this case, and that ultimately this Bill, or one similar, will be placed on the Statutes of Canada. I see already indications of public opinion being aroused on this subject. During this Session I have presented petitions to the House from thousands of ladies praying for the passing of the Bill, and I believe the Christian and moral sentiment of Canada is enlisted in its favor. I may be permitted to say a few words with reference to the public opinion which calls for a measure of this kind, because reflection had been cast upon me by many who desire a more radical measure, and who say this one does not go as far as many of the social and moral reformers wish it to go. But I have been actuated, not so much by what I believe the provisions ought to embody, as by a desire to secure what I believe the House would be willing to grant. The first Bill I introduced was much more sweeping in its character than this; many of its provisions were rejected, and, learning from experience, I have omitted such provisions, retaining only those I have reason to believe will meet with approval from the House. I expect, in urging the passage of this measure, to be very much aided by recent legislation in the House of Commons, England, which received the assent of the Crown on 14th August, 1885, and which is much more radical in its character than that I now propose. Later on, I will have occasion to refer more particularly to the provisions of the Imperial Statute. The Bill, the second reading of which I now move, does not differ materially from that which has been four times acted on already by this House. In pressing it upon these various occasions, I have been subjected to many gibes and to some abuse; I have been characterised as the apostle of cant, I have been accused of legislating for the purpose of creating brazen females; but I will leave it to the House to judge what amount of importance should be attached to these charges, when we consider this fact, that there is scarcely a civilised State in Christendom that has not on its Statute book legislation more radical in its character than that which I propose.

No doubt, the usages of society and the opinions of men tend to man's impunity for a class of offences that lead to woman's outlawry and ruin. If we take the celebrated instance of Col. Baker, who was guilty of an outrageously indecent assault upon a female in a railway carriage, and whose conduct 35 members of one of the leading clubs of London declared did not detract from his character as a gentleman—if we look at that instance as indicative of the opinion and state of society in England, we have in glaring light the fact that society gives the man immunity in cases where the ruin of the woman would be the inevitable consequence. The charge has been often made that this Bill is dangerous, because it inflicts penalties upon men and not upon women. We have been told that women are guilty of enticing. It is the old excuse of several thousands years ago: "The woman that thou gavest to be with me she did take of the tree and gave me to eat." The excuse is unworthy of a man, that the woman is to blame for her fall from virtue. We ought not to exact from women a standard of morality that we are not as men prepared to conform to ourselves; we ought not to expect that the woman should be treated differently from the man; and so long as society inflicts upon woman penalties and consequences which it does not inflict upon the man, the woman is entitled to protection from the law. The degradation of woman is a crime against society. The pure Christian home is the only safe foundation for the free and enlightened State. Vice in the shape of social immorality is the greatest danger that can threaten the State; and the duty of the Legislature, the duty of the Government, is to take measures, so far as it can, to punish infractions of morality and to conserve the morality of the public. Last year, out of 18,700 summary convictions in Ireland of women, 11,463 were the convictions of prostitutes, or a proportion of 61 per cent. Surely the creation of a class so degraded and vicious ought to be guarded against by every means possible, and I think that the advocates of this Bill are justified in their demand that crimes of the nature it covers shall be placed in the same category as other crimes punishable as misdemeanors. There is in the breast of civilised man an instinctive sense of justice that would in any community, wherein our language is spoken, prevent the punishment of a woman for the murder of her seducer. There is not a jury in any English-speaking commonwealth that would find a woman who avenged her honor by the murder of her seducer guilty of a crime, and there is scarcely a jury in any English-speaking commonwealth that would punish a relative of the female who would avenge the honor of his sister or of any relative by inflicting the punishment of death on her seducer. This is an instinctive sense of justice, and a feeling of this kind warrants us in saying that a Bill of this character should be placed on our Statute book.

The Bill introduced contains a provision copied from the recent Act in England, which makes it a misdemeanor to seduce a girl under sixteen years of age. While the English Bill makes no provision as to previous character, this Bill requires that the girl should have been of previously chaste character. I appeal to any father or brother who may be present to say whether there is a man in this assembly who has a sister or a daughter who would not consider that the seduction of that sister or that daughter, when under sixteen years of age, was a misdemeanor; whether there is any man here whose instinctive sense of justice would not demand the punishment of her seducer. I do not believe there is a gentleman in this House who would not say that the seducer of a girl under sixteen years of age was a criminal, and should receive punishment such as this Bill provides. The next feature of the Bill provides for the punishment of seduction of females under twenty-one years of age under promise of marriage, as the former Bill did, and I do not believe there is a father or a brother in this House who would not consider it a crime to the sister or the daughter if she had been seduced by a designing villain under promise of marriage, who would not consider that that designing villain should be punished, and who would not take the law in his own hands, if there were none on the Statute book, and avenge the injury himself. The Bill provides that such a wretch shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable according to the provisions of the Bill. The next provision is in regard to mock marriages, and is that anyone who betrays a woman by a mock marriage shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished.

When this Bill was under discussion on former occasions, various objections were urged to it. In the other House, the then Minister of Justice, Sir Alexander Campbell, said that any woman who deserved sympathy would not enter the court. Admitting that, in the great majority of cases, that may be the case, is that a sufficient reason for denying redress to a woman deserving of sympathy who might choose to enter the court? If the sense of shame would prevent one woman from entering the court, is that any reason for not providing a remedy, is that any reason for leaving the crime unpunished? The leader of this Government, Sir John A. Macdonald, offered as a reason for refusing the passage of this Bill that in States where the law was on the Statute book it did not prevent seduction. If we were to argue that, in States where there was a law against murder, it did not prevent murder; or that where there was a law against theft it did not prevent theft; or that where there was a law against larceny, or against perjury, or against forgery, because, forsooth, those crimes were committed, the law was useless, and ought not to be on the Statute-book—would this House accept that as an argument? If not, it should not accept as an argument the statement that the passage of the law in those States where it is in force has not absolutely prevented the crime of seduction. Another argument has been used against the Bill, that it would place men at the mercy of women. If we had no experience of the matter, if the discussion was purely theoretical, this argument might be considered to have weight, but there are upon this continent at least thirty commonwealths that have had for many years Statutes of this character upon the Statute book, and the practical working of those Statutes proves that the assertion is unfounded, and that this evil which is dreaded of placing men at the mercy of designing women has not been well founded. Then it was asserted that abuses under this law would lead to its speedy repeal, that it was useless to put it on the Statute-book because the abuses would be so great that it would remain there but a short time and then would be repealed. Well, the laws which have been placed on the Statute-book, for instance, in the State of New York, where they have been for thirty-eight years, and in the Western States at the formation of their institutions, remain on the Statute-book. Not one of those laws has been repealed and there has not been one movement in favor of their removal from the Statute-book; there has not been a demand from any fraction of the population for their removal.

With reference to the criminal laws upon this subject, and, in fact, with reference to jurisprudence at large, we are without any compilation or manual which gives us the comparative jurisprudence of different countries. Such a work would be of enormous advantage. It would enable us to compare in parallel columns the condition of different countries. As it is, we have to wade through the revised Statutes of different countries and compare them, at the cost of a great deal of labor. But, when the trouble is taken to examine the laws of various countries with reference to violations of the laws of chastity, we find that, with reference to adultery, England and her colonies are almost the only civilised countries in the world, with the exception of the State of New York, that have not such laws. The first Bill which I introduced into this House made adultery a crime. That provision was expunged from the Bill because it did not meet with the approval of the House, but I find that a provision against adultery exists in almost every State of the American Union; that it exists in France, where the wife and her accomplice may be imprisoned for a period of from three months to two years, and the male offender may be fined from 100 to 2,000 francs; that in Germany the two parties may be punished by imprisonment for six months. However, perhaps that is foreign to the subject now before the House, as adultery is not made an offence by the provisions of this Bill. I referred, a few moments ago, to the fact that the late English Statute made the seduction of a female between thirteen and sixteen years a misdemeanor, without reference to her character. The law in Germany makes it a misdemeanor to seduce a female under sixteen years of age, provided she is of previously chaste character; and it seemed to me that it was only just that that provision should be inserted in this Bill. Seduction under promise of marriage is made a misdemeanor in most of the American States and in most civilised countries. Livingston, in his introductory report to the code of crimes and punishments for Louisiana, makes use of the following language:—

"Seduction is not, I believe, punishable in England, unless preceded by a conspiracy. Yet, if we consider the base profligacy of the act, by which the most implicit confidence is destroyed and the most solemn promises are deliberately broken, not only to the utter ruin of the unsuspecting victim, but to the disgrace and misery of her connections, it is one in which the immorality of the act and the misery it inflicts both require exemplary punishment."

And believing that this is the case, a provision for the punishment of seduction under promise of marriage is inserted in this Bill. Now, we have in a very old code of laws a provision with regard to seduction—we have in the Mosaic law, in the 22nd chapter of Deuteronomy, at the 28th verse, the following provision:—

"If a man find a damsel that is a virgin, which is not betrothed, and lay hold on her, and lie with her, and they be found, then the man that lay with her shall give unto the damsel's father fifty shekels of silver, and she shall be his wife; because he hath humbled her, he may not put her away all his days."

So long ago as in the days of Moses, a provision was made requiring that the seducer of a virgin should marry her and pay the penalty of his crime as well. By the law of France the seducer must either marry the victim of his wiles, or settle a dowry upon her. In Germany seduction under sixteen years of age is punishable by six months imprisonment. Even in Canada seduction on shipboard is punished, and if seduction in this country is a crime on board a ship, I am unable to see why it should not be made a crime on land. By the Roman law seduction in the case of a member of the better class was punished by the confiscation of half his estate; in the case of a member of the lower class by corporal punishment and imprisonment. If we look at the provisions of some of the American States we shall find that in the State of New York seduction is punishable by a fine of $5,000, or by five years imprisonment, or both five years imprisonment and $5,000 fine, at the discretion of the court; in New Jersey, seduction under promise of marriage by a married man, is punishable by five years imprisonment and a fine of $5,000, and by a single man the maximum degree of punishment is the same, the provision being that marriage may bar conviction; in Ohio, a male over 18 years of age seducing a female under 18, is guilty of felony; in Rhode Island, seduction under promise of marriage is punishable by five years imprisonment, or $5,000 fine; in Arkansas, seduction is punished by imprisonment, or $5,000 fine; in Nebraska, seduction, five years imprisonment, or $3,000 fine; in Michigan, seduction, imprisonment for maximum term of ten years; in Illinois, seduction, $1,000 fine, or five years imprisonment; subsequent marriage bars conviction; Minnesota, seduction, five years maximum punishment, subsequent marriage bars conviction; Kansas, seduction under promise of marriage, $3,000 fine, or two years imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the court; in South Carolina the female may take civil action in her own behalf; in Alabama, seduction under promise of marriage, or by temptation, deception, or flattery, is a felony punishable by from one to ten years imprisonment; in Wisconsin, seduction by promise of marriage is punishable by five years imprisonment as the maximum term; in Oregon, seduction under promise of marriage, three to six months in common jail, or one to five years in penitentiary, and a fine of from $500 to $1,000; Connecticut, seduction, first offence, one year and $1,000 maximum punishment, for second offence, one year and $2,000 maximum; Pennsylvania, seduction under promise of marriage of a female under twenty-one, $5,000 fine, and three years imprisonment, or both; Virginia, Georgia and North Carolina, seduction under promise of marriage is a felony. Now, here are twenty States, the penalties of which I have enumerated, and in all the States of the American Union seduction is treated as a misdemeanor or a felony. With regard to recent English legislation, the 69th cap. of 48 and 49 Vic., assented to on the 14th of August last, provides for the protection of women and girls, and punishes for procurement; for procuring the defilement of a woman or virgin, by threats, or fraud or by administering drugs; for the defilement of a girl under the age of thirteen years, which is made a felony, punishable by transportation. It also provides punishment for the defilement of a girl between thirteen and sixteen years of age, without reference to previous character, which is declared to be a misdemeanor; a householder permitting defilement of a young girl on his premises to be guilty of a misdemeanor; it makes provision with regard to the seduction of a girl under eighteen with intent to have carnal knowledge, and makes this a misdemeanor; it makes provision with regard to unlawful detention with intent to have carnal knowledge; power, on indictment for rape, to convict of certain misdemeanors; power of search, and a provision with regard to outrages on decency, and with regard to the suppression of brothels. This is a measure much more stringent, much more sweeping, and much more radical than the measure I submit to the House to-day. The first section of this Bill provides that any person who—

"Seduces and has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character, or who attempts to seduce and have illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character; being of or above the age of twelve years and under the age of sixteen years,"—

This limitation is adopted because our Statutes make the carnal knowledge of a child under 12 years of age a felony. The English Statute places the limit at 13 years. I thought it not best to change the limitation established by our own Statute, and made the period between 12 and 16, the period when the seduction of a girl of previously chaste character should be declared to be a misdemeanor. The second subsection of the first section provides for the punishment of any person who has unlawful carnal knowledge with a female idiot, or imbecile woman or girl. The second section provides that any person who, under promise of marriage, seduces and has illicit connection with any unmarried female of previously chaste character under 21 years, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; and provides also that in case of marriage this shall be a bar to conviction. The third section makes a mock marriage a misdemeanor. The fourth section makes provision with regard to inducing resort to a house for illicit carnal knowledge. In case the girl is under 12 years of age, and is enticed to a house for this purpose, it makes the crime a felony. The fifth section provides that taking a girl out of possession of her parents or lawful guardians shall be a misdemeanor. The sixth section makes provision with regard to the detention of a woman in houses of ill-fame, and is as follows:—

“ Any person who detains any woman or girl against her will,—
 “ (1) In or upon any premises with intent that she may be unlawfully or carnally known by any man, whether any particular man or generally, or,—
 “ (2) In any brothel,—
 “ Shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be punished as hereafter provided.

“ Where a woman or girl is in or upon any premises for the purpose of having any unlawful carnal connection, or is in any brothel, a person shall be deemed to detain such woman or girl in or upon such premises, or in such brothel, if, with intent to compel or induce her to remain in or upon any such premises, or in such brothel, such person withholds from such woman or girl any wearing apparel or other property belonging to her, or where wearing apparel has been lent, or otherwise supplied to such woman or girl by or by the direction of such person, such person threatens such woman or girl with legal proceedings if she takes away with her the wearing apparel so lent or supplied,—
 “ No legal proceedings, whether civil or criminal, shall be taken against any such woman or girl for taking away, or being found in possession of any such wearing apparel as was necessary to enable her to leave such premises or brothel.”

That is copied from the English Act. The following provision is also copied from the English Act:

“ No person shall be convicted of any offence under this Act upon the evidence of one witness, unless such witness be corroborated in some material particular, by evidence implicating the accused.”

The provisions of the Bill broadly stated are: That the seduction of a girl of chaste character between 12 and 16 years of age is a misdemeanor; that the seduction of a woman under 21 years under promise of marriage is a misdemeanor; that mock marriage is a misdemeanor; that carnal knowledge of an idiot or imbecile woman or girl is a misdemeanor; that a woman detained in a brothel may be allowed in escaping to make use of any means or wearing apparel without being subjected to a criminal prosecution for the same; that the charges brought under this Bill shall be corroborated by material evidence other than the evidence of the woman; that any man charged with a misdemeanor under this Bill shall be a competent witness in his own behalf; that no prosecution shall be commenced under the provisions of this Bill after the expiration of one year from the time the act was alleged to have been committed. These are the provisions of this Bill; the provisions of the Bill introduced and passed by this House, with these provisions added from the English Act, which was assented to on the 14th August, 1885. I move the second reading of the Bill.

House divided on motion of Mr. Charlton for second reading of Bill.

THE SHORT LINE RAILWAY IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. TUPPER moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of the Dominion of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia, in reference to the Short Line Railway in Nova Scotia, and legislation affecting the same.

He said: As this House is aware, in 1882 the Great American and European Short Line Railway Company began, in the Province of Nova Scotia, the construction of a work of considerable importance, as was shown by the substantial grants made at that time and subsequently by this Parliament. The road which was undertaken to be constructed by the company begins at Oxford, in Cumberland County, running thence to the town of Glasgow, in the county which I have the honor to represent, and connecting by the Eastern Extension Railway, terminated at Louisburg in the Island of Cape Breton. The construction having proceeded up to a certain point the company become embarrassed, and after having done considerable work stopped its operations in 1883, with a debt of $150,000 or thereabouts unpaid and owing the sub-contractors of the company and the different persons who had supplied materials to the road. Nothing was done by the company, or in connection with that great public work, so important to Nova Scotia and to the different Provinces of the Dominion, in connection with our railway system, and the company remained in a state of insolvency from that time down to the present day. In July, 1883, the manager of that company, who was also superintendent of the construction company operating, in a manner, with the original company, gave what purported to be a mortgage on the road-bed and all the company's property in the Province to trustees of the sub-contractors. This document, drawn up in the form of a mortgage with power to sell, was dated 31st July, 1883, and was recorded in the different counties in the Province. After that, in the year 1885, application was made by the trustees to the Provincial Parliament to ratify this document and remove all doubts as to its validity, and in fact to give it effect, since the manager, as it appeared, had not affixed the seal of the company, and it was not really, in law, effectual. Legislation was sought, as I say, by the trustees, and was finally passed on the 24th of April, 1885. The Legislature of Nova Scotia deemed it necessary to provide in the Bill legalising that assignment, the following clause:—

"This Act shall have no force or effect until published in the Royal Gazette by order of the Governor in Council. Such orders shall not be passed until arrangements satisfactory to the Governor in Council shall have been made for securing to the creditors of the contractors mentioned in the indenture set forth in the schedule to this Act, out of the moneys realised from the sale of the property and assets herein referred to, the sums due to them for labor and materials used in the construction of the railway."

In the month of July, 1885, as this House is aware, $125,000 was put in the Estimates to relieve the debtors and pay the claims in connection with the construction of this road, and steps were afterwards taken in the most satisfactory manner to carry out the wishes of Parliament as expressed in that vote, and these claims were nearly all settled and paid off. The parties interested in the different counties, however, were unable to understand—although that action was taken by this Parliament, and although the trustees mentioned in the Act approached the Local Government and the arrangement was not impugned by any one in the Government and was approved by them, I am informed, in the month of June—I say the parties interested in the different counties were unable to understand why the Local Government hesitated in the matter, and delayed the proclamation provided for by the 5th section of the Act which I have read. I understand that correspondence took place between this Government and the Government in Nova Scotia suggesting the proclamation of this Act, and it is to obtain the correspondence that I have made this motion. It is to ascertain what reasons the Local Government put forward for their delay in carrying out the wishes of the Legislature of Nova Scotia that I now move, because, as this House will see, it was not a matter of policy with the Government; it was virtually a trust reposed in the Government by the House in connection with a private Bill, that on the Council being satisfied that the interests of the parties concerned were to be guarded and protected, that Act should come into force and have effect. I am informed that though satisfactory security was offered, and though that vote was passed in June, yet that no proclamation was made until the 6th of January, 1886, to put the Act in force. The effect of that delay would be apparent to those who are interested in the undertaking. Its effect was to postpone, for some time at least, the accomplishment of the project, as capitalists would not be inclined to undertake any work of the kind with the title in the condition it was in, owing to the misfortune of this company, because the company had vested in it the necessary right of way over which the road was to be built in the different counties. I have been induced to move for this correspondence owing to the fact that one of the papers in the city of Halifax, which is supposed to reflect to some extent the views of the Local Government, gave this extraordinary reason for the virtual violation of their duty by the Local Government in neglecting to proclaim this Act as the Legislature had provided: That capitalists were endeavoring to make some arrangements for the completion of the work, and capitalists had approached the Local Government and requested them to delay proclaiming this Act so that their arrangements might be more satisfactorily carried out. Had the arrangements been satisfactorily carried out, of course no one would complain, but still the Government took upon its shoulders a very heavy responsibility when it interfered to that extent with a scheme not within the purview of the Local Legislature, a scheme in reference to which it had not accepted, and had no responsibility, and as I believe for the reasons I have given, in direct violation of their duty. They had no right to use either for good or evil, legislation of a private nature—legislation of the nature I have explained, for political purposes or any other purposes. There was a duty imposed on them, as pointed out by the fifth clause of that Act, and they should have followed that strictly. Of course it would be entirely out of place to discuss the attitude of the Local Government with reference to this work, and I am not attempting to do it. I have simply endeavored, as briefly as I could, to show why I make this motion, and I hope the correspondence when it is brought down will throw some light upon the matter.

Mr. KIRK. I am glad to see that the hon. member for Pictou has not altogether lost interest in the short line railway. I believe that line was originated in order that it might have an influence in securing for that hon. gentleman the position he now occupies in this House. When I saw last year that the Government had placed in the Estimates the sum of $250,000 to build a branch railway from Stellarton to Pictou, I thought that the short line from Oxford to New Glasgow was abandoned altogether. I am glad, however, to see that the hon. gentleman has some little interest in it still, and that he is not endeavoring to strangle his own child. A number of years have passed by since this road was projected. In 1882, when a subsidy was obtained from this Parliament for the purpose of constructing it, and a contract was awarded for its construction from Oxford to New Glasgow, the people of the county of Pictou and the other counties interested were led to believe that the road would certainly be built, and that at a very early day. I think 1884 was fixed as the latest time at which the road would be built. I remember the discussions which took place on the subject during the elections of 1882. The hon. Minister of Railways at that time, Sir Charles Tupper, was the father of the young gentleman who was running for the representation of the county of Pictou, and, no doubt, it was felt that the combined influence of the father and the son would secure the construction of the railway in a very short time; and I remember that the late Minister of Railways, in 1883, declared on the floor of this House that the existing company had all the means necessary to build the road. When he was asked about the position and financial standing of the company, he said:

"I have taken great pains to ascertain the financial standing and position of this company, and I think I am in a position to state that whatever work they will engage in they will carry through."

And he had no doubt at all as to their financial ability. He was asked whether he had any assurance that they would undertake the work in Cape Breton, and he said that he had every assurance that they would undertake the work in Cape Breton as well as from Oxford to New Glasgow, and that they would certainly carry it out. Well, Sir, the work has not been accomplished. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) has just told us that this company, who were stated to be able to carry out any work they undertook, failed in 1883 and are in a state of insolvency now. We know that the Dominion Government last year took a vote of $125,000 from this House to pay engagements which this company entered into and were not able to pay. Now, I am curious to know whether it is the intention of the Government to complete the road from Oxford to New Glasgow. It is a line in which not only the counties through which it passes are interested, but all the eastern counties, especially the counties of the Island of Cape Breton. We are told that the company intended to extend the road to Sydney or Louisburg. I have been informed that a company of French capitalists made an offer to the Dominion Government to build the road, and that the Government refused to give them the contract for the whole road from Oxford to Louisburg, but were willing to give them the contract for that portion from the Strait of Canso to Louis burg—that they would divide the contract into two parts, giving one company the road from Oxford to New Glasgow and another company the portion from Hawkesbury on the Strait of Canso to Louisburg. I cannot say whether there is any truth in this or not. If there is the Government are blameworthy for making a division of the line. If any company have offered to build the whole line, I think the offer should be accepted and the contract with the European Short Line Railway Company annulled. When the vote was taken last year to build a road from Stellarton to Pictou, I thought the Government had no intention to build the line from Oxford to New Glasgow, and I have been informed that that is the case. Well, Sir, I do not know what special claim Pictou has for so many roads, if it is the intention to build both lines. There are other counties that require railroads as much as Pictou. I cannot understand why the Government should undertake to spend so large an amount of money to build a railroad from Stellarton to Pictou, parallel to one from Truro to Pictou, which is already in operation. I suppose we must account for it by the fact that the late Minister of Railways engaged to do so before he left office, and probably by the fact that the county of Pictou has two members representing it in this House. But there are five members representing the Island of Cape Breton in this House, all of whom support the Government, and I want to know what influence those hon. gentlemen exercise over the Government they support. It seems that the whole five have not sufficient influence with the Government to obtain the construction of a single mile of railway in their island. I am inclined to think that these hon. gentlemen did not press their claims quite as strongly as they should; I am inclined to think that if these five gentlemen had pressed their claims as strongly as the members for Pictou have, and secured a seat for one of themselves in the Cabinet—the seat which went for eighteen months begging for a member—they would have succeeded, and possibly also have obtained the road from New Glasgow to Louisburg. I am sure it cannot be said that the Island of Cape Breton has not men representing her in this House who are capable of filling a position in the Cabinet; I am sure that is not the reason the seat went begging for eighteen months; but I am inclined to think that these gentlemen did not press their claim, or one of them would have got the position. Be that as it may, they neither have got the position nor a mile of railway. I hope the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) does not wish to strangle the road from Oxford to New Glasgow. I am sure that it would be of very much greater importance to the counties they represent, to Cumberland, Colchester, and Pictou also, as well as the Island of Cape Breton and other eastern counties, to have the Oxford line built than the line from Stellarton to Pictou, which would be of advantage only to the town of Pictou itself. I notice that there are several charters passed for building a line of railway to Louisburg and the Strait of Canso. I do not know why it is the Government encouraged the issue of charters for more roads than one. The effect of issuing so many charters will be to keep Cape Breton from having the road they so long desired.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness) I am glad to find that the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) is taking so much interest in the extension of the railway system in the Island of Cape Breton. Having enquired into the advisability of building a railway through the island, I deem it my duty to say a few words in connection with this matter. It is well known by all interested in the building of the short line railway from Montreal to Sydney or Louisburg, that during the last past three years I, at least, have taken an active part—not only I, but all those who represent constituencies on the line between Montreal and

Sydney or Louisburg. During the early part of this term, several meetings were held by those interested with a view of securing a short line railway from Montreal to the eastern parts. At all those meetings, as is well known to those who attended the committees, I urged strongly that the line between Montreal and Sydney or Louisburg should be kept intact, that the line should not be divided at any intermediate point for two reasons: first, because dividing the line at any intermediate point between Montreal and Sydney or Louisburg would largely increase the cost of construction; and, secondly, because I believed that if the line were to be divided at any intermediate point it would necessarily culminate in the defeat of the eastern end. In the Session of 1884, we were informed that, for reasons which I could never ascertain, it was determined to divide the line at an intermediate point, New Glasgow. When that information was conveyed to the representatives of the Island of Cape Breton, we held a consultation and arrived at the conclusion which we placed on paper. The conclusion arrived at was written in a letter to the then Minister of Railways, remonstrating against dividing the line at New Glasgow or any other intermediate point. This letter is published in the Sessional Papers of 1885, No. 137. It was addressed by all the representatives from Cape Breton to the Minister of Railways:

"OTTAWA, 5th March, 1884.

"DEAR SIR,—As it was found necessary to give the Pictou Branch, which cost over $2,400,000—$600,000 in cash and 160,000 of acres of Crown lands—in order to induce a company to construct a railway from New Glasgow to the Strait of Canso; and as the said company and the Local Government of Nova Scotia successively sold their interests in the said Pictou Branch and Eastern Extension, from New Glasgow to the Strait of Canso, for $1,200,000, which is only half the original cost of the Pictou Branch alone, we consider that a subvention, consisting of Eastern Extension alone and $3,200 per mile, is totally inadequate for the construction of a railway from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg, in view of the facts:

"(1). That the Pictou Branch pays each year about $80,000, as repeatedly estimated by both political parties in Nova Scotia, over running expenses;

"(2). That the Eastern Extension actually earned $9,000 less than running expenses last year.

"A railway from New Glasgow to Louisburg would prove a valuable feeder to the Intercolonial Railway from New Glasgow to Halifax, through which the trade of that section of the Province of Nova Scotia would naturally flow. The railway east of New Glasgow must be treated simply as a feeder to railways west of New Glasgow. That section, from New Glasgow eastwards, will never carry as much traffic eastward as it will westward. It will therefore be a valuable subvention to railways west of New Glasgow, whether run by the Government or by a company. The Short Line from Montreal to New Glasgow would not have as much interest in extension eastward of New Glasgow as the Intercolonial Railway from New Glasgow to Halifax. As soon as the Short Line from Montreal will be finished eastward to New Glasgow it will cease to have much interest in a line east of New Glasgow that will contribute its traffic principally to the Intercolonial Railway between New Glasgow and Halifax. The company constructing the Short Line from Montreal to New Glasgow will therefore naturally decline to build east of the Strait of Canso without a much larger subsidy than should suffice to enable a company to build from New Glasgow to the Strait of Canso, and will require a larger subsidy than would now suffice to induce the same company to undertake the Cape Breton section concurrently with other sections of the Short Line from Montreal to Louisburg. Any railway scheme, therefore, such as agreed upon by the maritime members supporting the Government, having in view the shortest practicable route between Montreal and St. Andrews, St. John, Halifax and Louisburg, unless it provides that the Cape Breton section of that line shall be commenced, prosecuted and finished concurrently with the other sections of the Short Line, either by the same company or by the Dominion Government, will unfairly discriminate in favor of the unconstructed sections of the line west of New Glasgow, and render it more difficult to secure extension from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg, after the Short Line will be finished to New Glasgow, than at present.

"Hon. Sir CHARLES TUPPER,
"Minister of Railways, Ottawa."

On account of this letter, I have a right to assume that the sub-division of the line at New Glasgow was not executed, but nearly as unfortunately for the interests of a further extension eastward, the line was sub-divided at Moncton, and I felt that a sub-division at Moncton would have the double effect which I originally and always contended, first, of increasing the cost of the whole line, and, secondly, of preventing the construction of the road east of Moncton. My fears, I exceedingly regret to say, have been realised. As soon as I found that the line was divided at the intermediate point, Moncton, I deemed it my duty, as a representative of the Island of Cape Breton, to place my views on record, and I did so by addressing a letter to the Minister of Railways immediately after the sub-division at Moncton became known to us, and this is the letter which I addressed to him :

"OTTAWA, 16th April, 1884.

"DEAR SIR,—In reference to the letter dated 5th March last addressed to your Department by the representatives from Cape Breton Island in the House of Commons, I beg to say that the arguments used by us against the subsidizing of the 'Short Line' from Montreal to Sydney in two sections terminating at an intermediate point, New Glasgow, N.S., is applicable with still greater force against the sub-division of said railway at Moncton, New Brunswick. My own honest conviction is that unless the company undertaking to construct and consolidate the sections between Montreal and Moncton will also construct the section now unconstructed between Oxford and Sydney for the aggregate of the subventions offered by Parliament, no company can reasonably be expected to undertake the completion of the line between Oxford and Sydney for subsidies offered for that section of the so-called 'Short Line' from Montreal to Sydney.

"I may say further that if the Canada Pacific Railway Company, or any other company, will finish the unconstructed section through the State of Maine to Mattawamkeag, I cannot conceive of any interest that would induce the same company for the same proportionate subvention per mile, to prosecute the 'Short Line' from Fredericton to Moncton. The result of dividing the 'Short Line' from Montreal to Louisburg into sections, terminating at Moncton, may not only deprive Cape Breton of the advantages of the subsidies now granted, but Halifax as well, in whose interests it appears to me the line has been sub-divided.

"Disappointments in railway matters in Cape Breton for a long time may tend to influence me to look at the dark side of the picture. But common sense seems to point out the necessity of putting the whole line from Montreal to Sydney under the same management, and to suggest the danger of giving any company the contract of the sub-division between Montreal and Moncton, until the sub-division between Oxford and Sydney will be undertaken by some company. At least, concurrent operations on the unconstructed sections should be insisted on to ensure the success of the enterprise for the subsidies now granted.

"The subventions now granted by the Dominion Parliament may be sufficient to ensure the undertaking and completion of the 'Short Line' from Montreal to Sydney, if given to one company; but I have no hope of any such result if the line will be sub-divided at any intermediate point. Personally I have no preference to any company now alleged to be negotiating to build the whole line or any section of it; my only aim is to secure the success of the project. It is possible that companies can be found who will undertake the completion of the sub-divisions of the line at Moncton, but if they will not fail to complete the line in separate sections and to operate them satisfactorily, it will only prove to my mind conclusively that the whole line under one contract should be accomplished and operated for less money. In these circumstances I hope the Government will pursue that course which will ensure the undertaking and completion of the whole line from Montreal to Sydney, with ample security that it will be satisfactorily operated.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

"H. CAMERON (Inverness).

"HON. SIR CHARLES TUPPER, Minister of Railways."

Now, I regret to say, that my predictions of two years ago have been verified. I was most anxious that the line between Montreal and Louisburg should be kept intact; that it should not be subdivided at any intermediate point. I then felt, and I am now able to prove, that it was impossible to construct the line for the subsidy then given. Since that time, the subsidy from Montreal to Moncton has been largely increased, and I am sorry to say that, up to this time, the Minister of Railways has not seen his way clear to increase the subsidy east of Moncton in the same proportion. I hope, however, that in the near future he will see his way clear to do so, and that the people of eastern Nova Scotia and of the Island of Cape Breton will, at an early day, realise that, of which in the past they have only had the opportunity of dreaming—a railway through the Island of Cape Breton.

Mr. TUPPER. I have a word or two to say in reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) who has very kindly undertaken to look after the interests of the county which I am supposed to represent in conjunction with my colleague from Pictou. I advise the hon. gentleman, in undertaking that task, in order that he may help me with more effect, to study the interests of the county and the legislation concerning railways in that county a little more accurately, and also the geography of the county. I think, if he gives his attention more to the geography of Pictou County, it will remove from his mind the idea that the Government contemplate building a parallel line in that county. I think, also, if he studies the legislation in connection with the short lines, he will find that that scheme was sanctioned in this House before I was even a candidate for political honors in the county of Pictou, and before any man in the county of Pictou had the slightest idea that I should be a candidate at the general election for this House; because, as the statutes will show him, the first subsidy was granted to this work in the year 1882, when I had not the honor of a seat in this House. In reference to his metaphors, also, I think he will do well to brush them up a bit. He said first that this railway and this legislation had given me political birth, and then he alluded to my attempting to strangle my own child. I think, if he had studied that part of his speech a little more, and had given more attention to the happy illustrations that he used, he would not have said I was attempting to strangle my own child, but the more correct figure of speech would have required him to say that I was attempting to strangle my political father. However, that is, I ask him to study the question a little more attentively before misrepresenting it on the floor of this House, because it is idle for anyone to say that when the Government took up this question and decided to build a portion of the whole scheme, it was doing anything to the detriment of the scheme as a whole. Surely when a very important portion of the scheme is almost under immediate construction, it cannot be said that the whole scheme has been endangered thereby. That portion of this railway system would have to be built some time or other, and because the Government have begun it first, is no reason why there is a danger of not going on with the rest. But my hon. friend could have ascertained that there was strong reasons which induced the Government to build this portion of the system from Stellarton to the town of Pictou, wholly irrespective of any political interest or any personal reasons. He would have discovered that the Government of this country is bound to maintain a ferry between the town of Pictou and Pictou Landing, and in order to do that, a charge is incurred of some $12,000 to $14,000 a year. He would have found that by this scheme, taking that $14,000 a year, it will provide all the money required to build the branch from Stellarton to Pictou, and finding that, he would have understood that it was a wise policy, that it was not at all an exceptional policy, for the Government, while having that money, to obtain more in order to build this portion, that it was adding to the most lucrative portion of the whole Intercolonial Railway system, that it was adding to that part of the Pictou branch which my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron), referred to as being the most valuable portion of the Intercolonial Railway system, and that there were interests wholly independent of political considerations why this portion of the work should have been taken up when it was. However, hon. gentlemen will not be surprised at the attempt which was made, as I feel, for the purpose of stirring up sectional feelings between the Island of Cape Breton and some of the counties on the mainland of Nova Scotia. I think the hon. gentleman will fail in his object. The people in the county of Cape Breton know that, standing as this scheme does as a portion of the main line, and this portion in the Island of Cape Breton, when the Government has taken hold, as they have done, of the portion on the mainland, it gives them another assurance, if another assurance is needed, that in due time the whole will be accomplished. The members from that Island know that the members from the county of Pictou have never halted in their endeavors to press on to a satisfactory and speedy conclusion a work to which, we believe, both parties in this House have from time to time committed themselves. In reference to the allusions of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Kirk) as to the seat in the Cabinet, and his insinuation that this seat went a begging, I may tell him that, whatever the custom is in the party to which he belongs in Nova Scotia, it is not the custom in the Liberal Conservative party there to go begging for seats in the Cabinet, or for seats to go begging for occupants. That is not the system in vogue in Nova Scotia, at any rate. He knows very well that the seat he alluded to has been filled, not only to the satisfaction of every Conservative member from Nova Scotia in this House, but to the holy horror of every member of the Grit party in Nova Scotia, and indeed I may say, as an hon. friend observes, in the Dominion. We know that position is filled in such a manner as to give strength to the Liberal-Conservative party, not only in that Province, but in the Dominion from one end of it to the other. They know, and we have had an experience of it during this Session, that the appointment has met with hearty approval in Nova Scotia. I have not, Mr. Speaker, in any way lost my interest, and never did lose my interest, in this Short Line scheme. I believe it is not only necessary, but that it will be beneficial to the counties concerned, and beneficial to the trade of the whole Province; and I shall not hesitate in doing all I possibly can to bring it to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion. One word with reference to the statement that representations had been made upon the floor of this House in regard to the financial standing of the company. These statements are perfectly accurate. No matter what their views are, as there is no power of controlling them, any one who will look at the names of the parties connected with the Short Line Company in New York, will know that the financial standing of those men, such as Norvin Green and Erastus Wiman, is enough to warrant the statements that were made. At the time those statements were made there was good evidence that those gentlemen intended to take this work up and push it to a conclusion. They attempted to do so, and they spent a vast amount of money in the attempt. But we do regret that for reasons of their own they abandoned the work, and left it in its present unfortunate position. But the members from Nova Scotia have reason to believe that this Parliament, having subsidised this work as a Dominion work, the Government will do all they legitimately can to complete the system from one end to the other.

Motion agreed to.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRINTING OF THE VOTERS' LIST.

Mr. CASEY moved for :

Statements from all revising officers in regard to the arrangements made by them for the printing of the voters' lists in their respective electoral divisions, showing whether tenders were called for for such printing, or written contracts entered into for its performance, with copies of such contracts; names of parties with whom agreements, (written or verbal) were made for such printing, and number of times lists are to be printed; stating rates allowed per name or otherwise, number of names on first list, whether first list is printed by polling sub-divisions or not, manner of making alterations and additions after first printing, and all other details of such arrangements, agreements and contracts for printing said lists.

He said: My reasons for asking this information were hinted at pretty strongly in a previous debate on a motion asking for copies of instructions to revising officers. It will be remembered by us all that the Act appears to provide that the voters' lists shall be printed three times—first, the preliminary list; secondly, a reprinting after the preliminary revision; and thirdly, a second reprinting after the final revision of the lists. Of course, no price was fixed in the Act. I am given to understand, however, on pretty direct authority, that the Government has made an attempt to fix the price, and has given instructions to revising officers as to the price to be allowed for printing these lists, and that price is 12½ cents per name for the whole work. Now, that is, on the face of it, of course, much more than would appear to be the fair cost of printing the lists. But it may, perhaps, be urged that they require this large price on account of having to print them three times over. But again, Sir, I am informed, and the appearance of the first lists now in our hands seems to bear out the information, that it is not the intention to have the list printed three times. The first lists which we have already received have not been printed in the form specified by the Act, giving the names alphabetically for each township or large municipality, but have been divided up into polling divisions, which the Act directed should have been done after the preliminary revision. On the face of it, that seems to be a convenience to those who have to use the lists; but I am referring to it now for the purpose of showing the economy effected to the printer. For these first lists are printed, as I said, by polling divisions, with a considerable blank left at the end of each alphabetical list of the names in that division, and at the end of each polling division, and I am told it is the intention to leave a certain number of those copies in the sheet until the number required for the preliminary revision have been issued, and the preliminary revision has been held, then to fill up those blanks by inserting in them a supplementary list of the names, added at the preliminary revision; and in the same manner after the final revision has taken place to strike out the names which have been knocked off that revision by simply drawing a pen through those names; so that, as a matter of fact, the names will only be printed once by the person who contracts for the printing of the list. That is the information I have had, and I make this motion to ascertain if it is correct. Well, Sir, as to the proper and sufficient cost of printing these lists in this manner, I have ascertained what it has cost in my own county to print the voters' lists under the system that has prevailed up to this year. The township councils have almost invariably asked for tenders for the printing of those lists, and given the contract to the lowest tenderer. The result has been that in my county the cost of printing the list has varied from 3 cents per name in the larger municipalities, where it could have been done the most cheaply, to something like 4 cents, or a fraction over, per name; in the town municipality, where the lists are smaller, the cost per name was naturally greater. Now I say that, as a matter of fact, no more printing will be required in this case, according to my information, than in the other; the names will not have to be printed over any more times, and the number of copies to be issued is not very much larger. Of course we know that a small increase in the number of copies to be printed has very little to do with the cost of printing; the cost is principally in setting up the type and striking off first copies. I contend, therefore, that the cost of printing the present lists should not be appreciably larger than the cost of printing the old lists, whereas it appears on the face of it that it is three or four times larger, in my county, at all events. In a riding of, say, 5,000 electors about the size of my own, the cost under the old plan was about 3½ cents per name, or about $170, whereas under the present system it will be something like $600, which is a very considerable difference in cost when we multiply it by the number of ridings in the Dominion, I ask what prices are to be paid by the revising officers, and particularly whether tenders have been asked. I do not believe tenders have been asked in any instance. No doubt those officers of the Government, like other officers and the Departments, have been instructed to give the patronage to papers which support the Government, and in this way all the money paid for the printing of those lists will go into the pockets of papers supporting the Government. Considering this is an expenditure incurred not for purely Governmental purposes but for the convenience of the public at large, I think it would have been only fair if the old system of letting by tender had been maintained.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN VOTERS.

Mr. CASEY moved for :

Copies of all applications to be registered as voters on the first list of voters for West Elgin, with all statutory declarations as to the qualifications of the applicants, and of all lists of Indians qualified to vote, and statements (other than statutory declarations) as to the qualifications of any Indians delivered to the revising officer for West Elgin, or his clerk, by, or on behalf of, any or all of the sixty Indians resident on a reserve, whose names are registered in said list, in polling division No. 6, of the township of Orford, or statement of the information (other than such as is above specified) on which the revising officer acted in registering such Indian voters.

He said: The object of the motion is to ascertain whether the revising officer in my riding required the same evidence in regard to Indian names which he placed upon the roll as he required in respect of white voters. The House will remember the explanations given some time ago of the extreme severity with which the revising officer of Elgin dealt with the applications of white voters. He required statutory declarations exactly in the wording of the Act, giving all the particulars as to qualification, and he threw out such as failed in the least degree to come up to technical accuracy. I am informed by a gentleman living in the township where the Indian reserve is, that the same severity was not shown towards Indian voters; that, in fact, the Indian agent at the reserve furnished the judge, who is also the returning officer, with a list of the names of the Indians who were qualified to vote, and the judge on the basis of that list inserted the names on the first roll. This motion is simply to ascertain on what evidence the judge acted in placing the names of those Indians on the list. It is deeply to be regretted, and deserving of censure on his part, if it should turn out that he has dealt more leniently with Indians than he did with whites who applied to be placed on the voters' list.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. CASEY moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, or any official of the Indian Department, or the revising officer for West Elgin, and Mr. Battie, Indian agent for the Indian reserve in the township of Orford, in regard to his duties or action in connection with the registration of Indian voters, or as to the qualification of any Indian.

He said: I wish to remind the House that the Franchise Act imposes severe penalties on any Indian agent who induces any Indian to have his name registered on the list, and I am also strongly under the impression that it is, if not illegal, extremely irregular for an Indian agent to furnish a list of qualified Indians at the request of the judge. If it is illegal for an agent to induce any Indian to have his name registered, it must be even more illegal I think for an agent to put that Indian's name on the list without consulting him, and without having the same application from the Indian as is required from a white man. My information was received from the township. I do not know whether my informant was in a position to know the absolute truth or not; I think he was. That was the impression in the neighborhood of the reserve, judging from what was passing under their eyes, that the agent furnished a list of sixty Indians to the judge, and the judge acted upon that, and it is for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of those statements that I make this motion.

Motion agreed to.

MONEY SUBSIDY TO NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. KIRK moved for :

Copies of all petitions from the Legislature of Nova Scotia and all correspondence between the Government of Nova Scotia, or any member thereof, and the Dominion Government or any member thereof; and all Orders in Council of either Government respecting the re-adjustment or increase of the money subsidy paid, or to be paid, by the Dominion Government to the Government of Nova Scotia, not already brought down.

He said: In a speech recently delivered in London, I noticed that the right hon. Premier of this Dominion is reported as having said :

"In regard to the union of those Provinces, all the Provinces came into the Union with the voluntary consent of the people."

I cannot understand how any hon. gentleman could make a statement of that kind, in face of the fact that at least one Province of the Dominion did not come into the Union with the consent of its people, but was forced in against their consent and their solemn protest. I refer to the Province of Nova Scotia. The people of Nova Scotia had no opportunity of expressing any opinion upon the question of Confederation, but were forced into it by their Legislature, without their consent, and by a Legislature which had lost the confidence of the people. In 1865, the Legislature of Nova Scotia passed a resolution providing for the appointment of delegates to meet in Charlottetown, delegates to be appointed by the Province of New Brunswick and the Province of Prince Edward Island, for the purpose of considering the question of a union of the Maritime Provinces. These delegates met in Charlottetown in the summer of 1865. They were there met by delegates from the Government of Canada, and those delegates from Nova Scotia were there and then seduced and debauched by those delegates from Canada, and they afterwards came up to Quebec and there, in secret, framed a scheme for the Confederation of the whole of the British North American Provinces. This they did without the authority or consent of the Legislature of Nova Scotia. In 1866 the scheme prepared in secret at Quebec was submitted to the Legislature of Nova Scotia, and there a resolution was passed endorsing the scheme, passed, as I said, by a Legislature that had lost the confidence of the people, passed in face of the fact that thousands, yes tens of thousands, of the people of Nova Scotia had petitioned Parliament not to pass the measure before submitting it to the people at the polls. These petitions were, however, disregarded and a resolution was passed endorsing the scheme and delegates were sent to London for the purpose of having it made into law by the Imperial Parliament. The people of Nova Scotia also sent delegates to London for the purpose of preventing the passage of the Act if possible. These delegates carried with them petitions signed by upwards of 30,000 of the people of Nova Scotia, protesting against the passage of the Act of Confederation and asking the Imperial Parliament not to pass the Act until the people had an opportunity of passing upon it at the polls. They were not successful, however, and the Act became law. I cannot point to anything more convincing as to the feelings of the people than the fact that at the first election held immediately after, 18 of the 19 members who were returned to this Parliament and 36 of the 38 returned to the Legislature of Nova Scotia were returned pledged to work for the repeal of the Union so far as it affected the Province of Nova Scotia. The Legislature of Nova Scotia, on its meeting in 1868, passed resolutions asking the British Parliament to repeal the Act so far as Nova Scotia was concerned. They sent delegates to London for the purpose of having the matter brought before the Imperial Parliament, and for the purpose of obtaining a repeal of the British North America Act in so far as it affected Nova Scotia. The delegates, however, failed to accomplish the repeal of the Act, and Confederation became a fixed fact and remains so till to-day. The Imperial Government at that time requested the Government of Canada, so far at least as it was in their power, by a despatch from that Government to the Governor General of the Dominion, Lord Monck, to modify the arrangement respecting the taxation and respecting the regulation of trade and fisheries prejudicial to the Province of Nova Scotia until a trial of the Union was had. Well, Sir, this has not been done by this Government. The arrangements which have been made with the Province of Nova Scotia since that time have not relieved that Province of the difficulty which it was feared by the people of that Province they would labor under in the working of the Confederation Act. It is found, after eighteen years working of the Act, that the system has worked, so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, much worse than the people of that Province feared it would work at the time of the Union. Confederation was objected to by the people, because the Act did not provide for sufficient revenue to maintain those local public works which were left under the control of the Local Government. It was also objected to because the power to tax by any mode or system was taken away from the Province and placed in the hands of this Parliament. By that means the Province was deprived of the larger portion of its revenue; a sufficient amount was not left for the purpose of maintaining provincial public works in a proper state of efficiency; and it is found that the longer we remain in Confederation, the greater becomes the necessities of the Province, and the less adequate becomes the revenue which is a fixed one, to the requirements of the Local Government. The fact that the taxes of the people have been enormously increased, while some of the most important works of the Local Government have of necessity to be left in a state of inefficient repair, has excited considerable discontent among our people. There are only two possible ways by which the Local Government can obtain sufficient revenue to efficiently maintain these works—by direct taxation, or by an increased subsidy from this Government. I do not know that the people of Nova Scotia will submit to direct taxation for that purpose, while this Government persist in taxing them so enormously as they are doing. I do not make these statements because the present Government of Nova Scotia have had difficulty to obtain money to support those public works. Successive Governments, supported by both parties, have found it difficult; and the Governments of both parties have applied to this Government for relief, but they have always applied in vain. Then, the only source left to them is direct taxation; but the people are looking in another direction. They are beginning to feel that those who opposed Confederation and warned them of the difficulties that Confederation would bring about, spoke the truth. It cannot be said that the lack of funds for local works is due to extravagance on the part of the Government of Nova Scotia. I do not think there is any Government of any Province of this Dominion which has been more economical since the time of Confederation than the several Governments of Nova Scotia. I am sure there is not a Province in this Dominion where the officials of the Local Government are more poorly paid, and I believe there is no other Province of this Dominion which has fewer officials than that Province. Now, these local public works cannot be allowed to go down or to suffer, the money must be obtained in some way. I have said that the feeling of discontent with Confederation is becoming more general and more deeply fixed; and I am not alone in this opinion. I would refer to a resolution which was moved in the Nova Scotia House of Assembly in 1884, moved by a private member in sympathy with the feelings of the people. I will not read the preamble on which he founded his resolution, but will simply read the resolution itself:

"Therefore resolved, that in the opinion of this branch of the Legislature of Nova Scotia it is the duty of the Government to earnestly press upon the attention of the Federal Government the necessity that exists of Nova Scotia having granted to it such increase of subsidy as shall maintain the public services of the Province in a like state of efficiency as existed previous to Confederation; and further resolved, that failing to receive that favorable answer from the Government of the Dominion to the prayer expressed in the foregoing resolution, it will then become the imperative duty of the Government of Nova Scotia to demand a repeal of the British North America Act, 1867, in so far as it relates to the Province of Nova Scotia, carrying the appeal for justice, or separation, if necessary, to the British Government for adjudication."

Now, Sir, the fact that a resolution like that was moved in the Legislature of Nova Scotia is proof that a feeling does exist in that Province against the continuance of Confederation. The Government of Nova Scotia, not willing that the question of repeal should be considered at that time, felt that it was their imperative duty first to apply to this Government for relief, induced the member who moved the above resolution to withdraw it; and in order to make a regular application, a Joint Committee of the two Houses was appointed for the purpose of preparing an address to this Government for relief from their present embarrassed and straitened circumstances; and I believe the hon. gentleman who represents Cumberland in this House (Mr. Townshend) and was formerly a member of the Local Legislature, was a member of that committee. That Joint Committee prepared an address; and in it they set forth the feeling of discontent which existed in the Province at that time, that is two years ago. The following is a paragraph of the address:—

"That after 16 years under the Union, successive Governments have found that the objections which were urged against the terms of Union at first, apply with still greater force now than in the first year of the Union. And the feeling of discontent, with regard to the financial arrangement, is now more general and more deeply fixed than ever before."

This address was passed unanimously by both branches of the Legislature, and it was submitted to this Government by the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, on the 18th of April, 1884. This Government took a long time to consider it. In fact, no answer was given to the Government of Nova Scotia when the Local Legislature met again in 1885, twelve months after it was sent to this Government. In 1885, finding the Government made no answer to the address submitted to it in 1884, the same private member moved his resolution for repeal of the Union again. The Government, not willing to allow this resolution to pass, but, I fancy, sympathising with it, until an answer was received from this Government, proposed the following amendment:—

"Whereas, previous to the union of the Provinces, the Province of Nova Scotia was in a most healthy financial condition;

"And whereas, strong objections were taken at the time of the Union to the financial terms thereof relating to the Province of Nova Scotia, as being wholly inadequate to meet the requirements of the various services left under the management of the Provincial Parliament;

"And whereas, after seventeen years under the Union, successive Governments have found that the objections which were urged against the terms of the Union at first apply with greater force now than in the first year of the Union, and the feeling of discontent with regard to the financial arrangements is now more general and more deeply fixed than ever before;

"And whereas, these facts have been brought to the notice of His Excellency the Governor General and the Federal Ministry by an address unanimously passed by the Legislative Council and the House of Assembly, and also by the representations of a delegation from the Provincial Government, without satisfactory results up to this time;

"Therefore resolved, that if the Government and Parliament of Canada fail to make provision, during the present Session of said Parliament, to place the Province of Nova Scotia in a better financial position in the Union, this House affirms that it will be necessary to consider the advisability of taking steps to secure a severance of the political connection between the Province and the Dominion of Canada."

This amendment was moved to the original motion for repeal, and it was adopted by the House. By it you will see that the Legislature of Nova Scotia has determined that, should this Government refuse to re-adjust the subsidy and place the Province in a position to carry on her local public works efficiently, she will seek repeal of the Union; and I have no doubt that the Local Legislature, now sitting, will, in view of the fact that this Government have refused to augment the subsidy, before it prorogues, pass a resolution asking the Imperial Parliament to repeal the British North America Act, so far as the Province of Nova Scotia is concerned. It is not to be wondered at that the people of Nova Scotia are dissatisfied with the present arrangement. Previous to Confederation, the tariff of that Province was scarcely $9\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. With that tariff and a light Excise duty and the revenue derived from Crown land, mines, minerals and other minor resources, the people of Nova Scotia had ample revenue for all their necessities; they had ample means to build their railways and maintain them, to erect their lighthouses and maintain them, to provide for their legislative expenses and the maintenance of justice. They also provided liberally for education and other public wants, and besides were able to give to the road and bridge service, for the support of their road and bridges, a grant of \$250,000 a year for a number of years. Now, notwithstanding the pledges that were made by the leading delegates, who were instrumental in forming Confederation, that the taxes of the people, that their tariff would not be unduly increased, the tariff has been enormously increased by more than 150 per cent., whilst at the same time our people are deficient in the revenue necessary to carry on local public works. The people of Nova Scotia do not feel like submitting to this enormous increase of their burdens whilst their public works are suffering for lack of means. They believe that if justice were done, they would have ample means for all their wants. With her Custom tariff of $9\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Nova Scotia, previous to Confederation, went on prospering and developing all her resources; with this she built her railways, educated her people, and during her whole existence accumulated a debt of but \$3,250,000. What is her debt to day? We have been eighteen years in Confederation, and during that time our proportion of the debt has accumulated, making, including the \$8,000,000, with which we entered Confederation, a total debt of \$28,000,000. What is there to show for that enormous increase of debt? Where are the public works built since Confederation? We have one solitary public work, the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. PAINT. Where is the elevator?

Mr. KIRK. That is in connection with the Intercolonial Railroad. This is the only work we have in our Province to represent this enormous increase in our proportion of debt.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you not got an elevator in Halifax?

Mr. KIRK. I have already answered that question. That elevator is in connection with the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. MILLS. What is it used for?

Mr. KIRK. It is used to look at. Besides that we have idle manufactories, depreciated values of real estate and other properties, silent shipyards, idle sailors, or, if employed, they are employed in other countries, and impoverished fishermen and farmers. We have all these to represent the enormous debt which has been piled up upon us. Is it any wonder our people are dissatisfied and are looking forward to a repeal of the Union? Is it any wonder that the feeling of discontent is becoming more deeply fixed than it was ever before? What is the Government going to do about it? Are they going to allow this feeling of discontent to continue? Do they intend to increase it and make it still more deeply fixed by increasing the taxation of the people instead of reducing it? If the earnings of the people of Nova Scotia are to be dragged from them through the Custom house and expended anywhere else than in the Province, how can it be expected otherwise than that the people will be discontented, and long for a return to a condition of things such as that which existed before Confederation? It is the most natural thing in the world. It cannot continue long. The people who once knew what it was to be free will never submit to be enslaved by any system or impoverished by any misrule. The people naturally look back to the time when their taxes were light, when they had plenty of money for their public wants, and when their taxes were expended among themselves, giving employment to their own people. The people naturally look back to the time when they had control of their own revenues and their own taxes, to the time when those revenues were ample for all their necessities. In 1856, under our old tariff of $9\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Nova Scotia had a Custom revenue of \$571,588. In 1866, ten years later, the year before Confederation, the Customs revenue had reached \$1,226,298. Supposing Nova Scotia had kept on prospering in the same ratio, and had not entered Confederation, she would have had a revenue last year of about \$2,800,000. This sum would have been sufficient to meet every obligation under which the country was placed, would have built our share of the Intercolonial Railway, would have provided for the common roads, for education, for lighthouses, legislation, and all general and local works; while to-day the services which are charged to the Local Government are, for the most part, inefficiently performed; the road and bridge service kept in an inefficient condition by borrowed money; whereas, if we had not entered Confederation, with the present Customs tariff our revenue would have been more than \$4,500,000 per annum. If the people of Nova Scotia are not paying that amount into the Treasury here to-day, they are paying the difference into the pockets of Canadian manufacturers. The consideration of these things and the lack of hope for the future lead our people to believe that the only hope of relief is in the repeal of the British North American Act, at least as far as regards Nova Scotia; and, if I understand the resolutions passed by the Nova Scotia Legislature last year, they mean that the people of that Province, at the next general election, will be asked to express upon this question of repeal, and I believe that the result will show that nine-tenths of the people of the Province of Nova Scotia are in favor of the repeal of that Union.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It is true that, in 1867, eighteen out of the nineteen members from Nova Scotia, who were then returned to this Parliament, were opposed to Confederation. As I was one of them, I think I should say a few words in reference to the motion of my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Kirk). I have, on former occasions in this House, referred more than once to the injurious effects which Confederation, from a local point of view, had on the interests of Cape Breton, one county of which I have the honor to represent. I complained that, owing to the action of the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia, in 1875, 1876 and 1877, under the guidance of the party with which my hon. friend from Guysborough was always associated, a large amount of money, which before that time lay to the credit of Nova Scotia in the Treasury of the Dominion, was withdrawn for railway purposes in Nova Scotia proper, while they failed to expend any of that money in the Island of Cape Breton. I complained, that under the promise of spending $600,000 on the island, they secured the expenditure of more than $2,000,000, which was placed to our credit in the Treasury here, for Nova Scotia proper. This was secured in view of a general election. I have not much doubt that the party with which my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Kirk) is associated will now, on the eve of a general election, which will take place next summer, for the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia, ask for subsidies for railways in Cape Breton. In fact, it has been the practice of the party with which he is associated, on the eve of every election, to ask for subsidies for railways in Cape Breton, always with a view to secure similar subsidies for other parts of Nova Scotia. But, while they always managed to expend the votes passed in favor of railways in Nova Scotia proper, they have always failed to do anything except to make promises in regard to Cape Breton. Having at sufficient length referred to these grievances on former occasions I shall now confine myself to grievances which are common to the whole of Nova Scotia, including Cape Breton. It is true that I opposed Confederation, and the ground on which I opposed it was principally the financial terms. It is true that all parties in Nova Scotia complained that the financial terms under Confederation did not place a sufficient amount of revenue at the disposal of the Local Legislature to maintain the local services as efficiently as they were maintained before Confederation. They also complained that, while Nova Scotia had not so much revenue for the maintenance of the local services after Confederation as she had previously, all the other Provinces of the Dominion had more revenue for local purposes after Confederation than they ever had before. After our return to Parliament, those who were opposed to Confederation pursued that course which they believed was the best to secure an equitable basis of financial terms. I am therefore glad that my hon. friend, the member for Guysborough (Mr. Kirk), has raised the question of the terms for Nova Scotia on this motion. I would like to remind him that on more than one occasion better terms have been conceded to Nova Scotia, but they were invariably conceded by the Liberal-Conservative party. While his political friends here from Nova Scotia ask concessions to Nova Scotia, I have no doubt that if, in the future, any proposal should be made by the Government to make further concessions, his Ontario political friends here, as on former occasions, will oppose them. I find the evidence of that fact in the speech delivered by the Finance Minister, in prospect, of the Liberal party in this House. On the 30th ult. the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), in his speech on the Budget, said:

"We know perfectly, and none probably knows better than the First Minister, that about two weeks ago delegates from his own Province were here to represent to him that Nova Scotia required better terms."

He then referred to the agitation in Quebec in favor of better terms, and proceeded to Ontario, concerning which he said:

"Even in the case of Ontario, which has a large sum to its credit, and is, on the whole, in a good financial condition, there can be no doubt whatever that there must be thrown on the municipalities a considerable portion of the present expenditure, or, after a certain number of years, they will also have to have recourse to direct taxation. I believe our Local Governments, if they care to avail themselves of the possibilities which exist in the better management of the Crown domain, might obtain largely increased revenues in the space of a very few years, which would entirely relieve them from the necessity of any application here; and it is possible that out of our present position good may come, and those communities may be obliged at last to look the situation in the face, and learn to rely on themselves, and not, as now, in making periodical raids on the Dominion Treasury."

This expression of opinion of the far distant future Finance Minister of the Liberal party, does not offer very great prospects of better terms for Nova Scotia. There is a good deal of agitation in Nova Scotia relative to this question, although the correspondence for which my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Kirk) has asked, is already in the hands of all the members for Nova Scotia. I believe there is a method in his making motions of this kind before this House. I find the Morning Chronicle, the organ of the party in Nova Scotia, on the 11th March last, concludes an article on the correspondence relative in better terms, in the following words:—

"Nova Scotia will in future know enough, we trust, to send to Ottawa representatives who will have firmness enough to persist in the demand and finally obtain from the Dominion Government, Nova Scotia's rights."

I presume that in accordance with views here expressed my hon. friend from Guysborough has made a move in this direction; a review of the history of the better terms agitation shows that there is no hope from a change of Government in connection with this question. Only eighteen representatives now in this House were present in this Parliament when Confederation began. The first question that was discussed in this House in connection with Confederation was on Friday, 7th November, 1867, when the Hon. Joseph Howe, in his debate on the address, clearly defined the position of the party who were then in Opposition in Nova Scotia. He said:

"Before proceeding to discuss the question before the Chair, he would allude to his own position in connection with the leadership of the Opposition. He declared that it would have been an act of great impudence on his part to have assumed the leadership of any body of men holding views with respect to Confederation at variance with his own. It would also have been inconsistent with his duty to his own county. No one in his county went to the hustings pledged to any side of any question in the politics of Canada. No man there concerned himself about the policy of the existing Canadian Government. He felt incapable of assuming leadership in a House where two languages were used, with one of which he was not very familiar. He therefore felt, with his peculiar views on Confederation, that it was far better for him to take a position in the body of the House. No one from Nova Scotia had any side in the party politics of Canada."

After alluding to several paragraphs in the address, Mr. Howe said in conclusion:

"The mere parchment does not make Union, the Act of Parliament does not create harmony. The Act might be acceptable to the Canadians, and why not? They obtain a vast seaboard, they extend their limits, and had they done it fairly and honorably, no man with a head on his shoulders would have complained. But the people of his own Province have been tricked into this scheme, and he very much regretted that it had not been approached in a manner which might have led to the perfecting of a measure which would have rendered unnecessary such a speech as he was compelled to make. Though he did not expect to command a great deal of support from the House, and had no desire to waste the time in needless debate, he stated that he would move one brief amendment, expressing regret that the measure had not been submitted to the people of Nova Scotia before its adoption. With respect to the measures of the Government, while holding a seat in that House, he would, if he believed them to be good, support them; or, if otherwise, oppose them, but he would seek no factious course to delay the proceedings of the House, or provoke acrimonious feelings among the members."

The anti-confederate party led by Mr. Howe, pursued the best possible course to secure better terms for Nova Scotia, although it failed to secure repeal of the Union. The agitation of 1867 and 1868 resulted in better terms being granted in 1869, which was vigorously opposed by the party with whom my hon. friend is connected in this House. That increase was discussed on Friday, 11th June, 1869, Hon. Mr. Rose, Minister of Finance, moved that the House go into Committee on the Nova Scotia resolutions, and explained the negotiations that led to the proposition to increase the subsidy to Nova Scotia:

"He showed that the debt of Nova Scotia had increased from the time of the Quebec Conference, in 1864, to the date of the Union, in 1867, by $4,440,000, and the increase of interest $323,000. Of this increase of debt $3,700,000 had been laid out in railways which were the property of the Dominion. For the three and one-half years previous to Confederation the revenue from local sources in Nova Scotia was on an average $161,000, and the gross amount of her subsidies under the Union Act was $331,000, making a total revenue of $494,000 available for local purposes. The average yearly expenditure for the period was $776,000, leaving an annual deficit of $284,000. In 1867, the total revenue, including the subsidies, was $567,000, local expenditure $868,000, leaving a deficit that year of $301,000. In 1868, the estimated revenue was $456,000, estimated expenditure, $663,000, leaving a deficit of $207,000 to be made up by direct taxation. Members said Mr. Rose would find the details of these figures in the table then laid on the Table of the House. It was evident from them that Nova Scotia would have had to resort to keep up the deficiency by direct taxation."

This was the statement made by the Finance Minister of this Dominion in 1869. And he proposed to ameliorate these terms by an increase of about $150,000 annually for ten years, still leaving a deficit of $134,000 a year, and about $70,000 only, afterwards leaving a deficit of $214,000 annually. Mr. Blake, in rising to move the amendment of which he had given notice, said :

"He regretted this question had not been brought up sooner. He admitted the great importance of the proposition of the Government. It amounted to an increased aggregate of expenditure capitalised at over two millions. His amendment he did not consider as involving the question of whether the increased subsidy should be paid to Nova Scotia. If it could be shown that the conditions of Nova Scotia under the Union were unjust he was heartily willing to modify these conditions. But the question involved in his amendment was a constitutional one, and he would not enter into the merits of the proposition of the Government. With reference to the despatch of the Colonial Secretary on the subject, he held there was nothing in it to justify this Government in making modifications in the Union Act. That despatch, he said, merely directed the attention of the Government, to the subjects of taxation, of the regulation of trade, and of the fisheries, all of which subjects were under the control of the Canadian Government."

He then went on to show how dangerous any interference with the financial terms of Union was to the smaller Provinces, and concluded by stating :

"There was no telling where this kind of work would end, if it were once admitted that this Parliament had the right to modify the Imperial Act. The monetary conditions of the Union were not only essential but vital, and should not be left to the tender mercies of this Parliament. Such, he was sure, was not anticipated by any one at the time of Confederation. He believed that if the proposition that this Parliament could modify the Act of Union, relative to its financial conditions, was carried, it would be destructive of the permanence of the constitution. He concluded by moving that all the words after 'that' be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof :—

"The British North America Act, 1867, has fixed and settled the mutual liabilities of Canada, and of each Province in respect of the public debt, and the amount payable by Canada to each Province for the support of its Government and Legislature.

"That the said Act does not empower the Parliament of Canada to change the basis of Union thereby fixed and settled.

"That the unauthorised assumption of such power by the Parliament of Canada would imperil the interests of the several Provinces, weaken the bond of Union, and shake the stability of the constitution.

"That the proposed resolutions on the subject of Nova Scotia involve the assumption of such power.

"And that therefore this House, while ready to give its best consideration to any proposals to procure in a constitutional way any needed changes in the basis of Union, deems it inexpedient to go into committee on the proposed resolutions."

No one knew better than the leader of the Opposition that the adoption of that amendment would virtually defeat the proposal to give better terms to Nova Scotia. In speaking to that amendment, Hon. Mr. Howe said :

"Nova Scotia did not care how they got the money, whether through Imperial Parliament or otherwise. He held that it was ridiculous to suppose that the Act framed by the members of the Quebec conference could never be changed by any Canadian Parliament. All he could say if such were the case, he wished the Act had never been passed. His hon. friend had agreed that that would be a dangerous principle to establish, not to Ontario and Quebec, but only to the smaller Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Well, if they, in the lower Provinces, were willing to run the risk, surely gentlemen from the other Provinces should have no objection."

Hon. Dr. Tupper, now Sir Charles Tupper, pointed out :

"It was found that the means at the disposal of the Nova Scotian Government were not sufficient to carry on efficiently the public services, and that a great part of the debt was incurred in building public works, which became the property of the Dominion. With these facts in view he thought the House should give the most generous and liberal interpretation to the Union Act in the direction of giving increased means to enable Nova Scotia to efficiently perform her local services. He would not ask for an increased subsidy to Nova Scotia on the ground of a just consideration of her claims, but on the ground of a legal consideration of the Union Act, which could do away entirely with the objection raised by the hon. member for West Durham."

He went on further discussing that proposition, and then said :

"It had never been supposed that we could suddenly pass from the condition of isolated Provinces, and arrange, at a single stroke of the pen, all the financial questions that would actually arise in the adjustment of the financial terms of the Act of Union. It was intended that subsequently a commission should issue, that the Local Governments should each appoint a commission, and one also jointly; and to these commissioners were to be entrusted the examination of the financial affairs of all the Provinces, and an adjustment of the debt on a satisfactory basis."

This statement of Hon. Dr. Tupper proves that it was the intention to have placed the cost of our railways after the adoption of the Quebec scheme, which were handed over to the Dominion, to our credit, from which Nova Scotia would receive local revenue in interest at 5 per cent., which would give $220,000 a year extra. He concluded :

"Now he had found that the power which was always behind the gentlemen opposite had assumed a position of hostility to the smaller Provinces, immediately after the re-adjustment of the scheme at Westminster Palace. The additional concessions then granted to his own Province were made the subject of the most frantic appeals to the prejudices of the west, in the organ of these gentlemen. Under these circumstances, he was in the difficult position of not being able to obtain that support in the House, which was necessary, in order to enforce his views in regard to Nova Scotia."

Notwithstanding the efforts of the hon. members of the Opposition on that day, these resolutions passed, and I find on the division against any concessions, the following: Béchard, Blake, Bourassa, Burpee, Cameron (Huron), Geoffrion, Mackenzie and Mills, the only gentlemen in the Opposition to-day who had seats in Parliament at that time. Nor was that the only stage at which opposition to better terms was made by the hon. gentlemen with whom my hon. friend is now associated. I find that on the 12th of June, 1869, Hon. Mr. Wood moved, in amendment to the second reading of the resolutions with reference to better terms for Nova Scotia, the following :

"That all the words after 'that' in the said motion be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof: 'It be resolved, that in the opinion of this House it is expedient to disturb the financial arrangements settled between the Provinces composing the Dominion of Canada as settled by the British North America Act, in favor of Nova Scotia, without at the same time making provision for increasing in due proportion and on principles alike just to the Province of Quebec and Ontario the amount of debt allowed by the British North America Act to the late Province of Canada, and the half yearly payments to the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario respectively.'

If this amendment had passed, it would also destroy the obtaining of better terms for Nova Scotia, and I find that the same gentlemen who voted in favor of the first amendment, also voted in favor of this amendment. I find also that a Bill was introduced, and that the Hon. Mr. Holton moved an amendment to the Bill at its second reading, that amendment being as follows :—

"Resolved, that in the opinion of this House any disturbance of the financial arrangements respecting the several Provinces provided for in the British North America Act, unless assented to by all the Provinces, would be subversive of the system of Government under which this Dominion was constituted, and if effected, as proposed by this Bill, in favor of one Province, without at the same time providing for a general revision and readjustment of those arrangements, would be manifestly unjust to the other Provinces."

Which was negated on a division; and there appeared on the division list the names of the same hon. gentlemen to whom I have already referred against giving better terms to Nova Scotia. This was not all. On the third reading of the Bill, an amendment was moved by the hon. gentleman now leading the Opposition in this House, and that amendment would have had the effect of destroying any prospect of better terms in future. Mr. Blake moved to add the following as section 5 :—

"The grants and provisions made by this Act and the British North America Act, 1867, shall be in full settlement of all demands on Canada by Nova Scotia."

This was adopted, and it will thus be seen the hon. leader of the Opposition, by his fifth wheel to the Nova Scotia coach, clogged any proposition which might be made in the future in favor of better terms for Nova Scotia. To this an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam), one of the parties associated with myself at that time. He moved, in amendment :

"That the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of expunging clause 5."

This was negatived, and on the list I find that the whole House, with the exception of Messrs. Anglin, Cameron (Inverness), Chipman, Forbes, Killam, Le Vesconte, Macfarlane and Power, voted against it. Therefore at this particular time we find that the whole House was committed against giving any further concessions to Nova Scotia, and that the opposition to better terms to Nova Scotia originated with the hon. leader of the Opposition in this House. Is it any wonder, then that one of the most prominent Liberal members for Nova Scotia, at a public meeting in Halifax, declared in these words how impossible it was to get any better terms for Nova Scotia even if the Opposition should attain power :

"Nor have I any hope from a change of Government at Ottawa; as the leaders of the Opposition have opposed—step by step, and inch by inch—every concession made to Nova Scotia."

This was the opinion of the late lamented P. Power, Esq., who then represented the city and county of Halifax in this House, and who was in the minority in that division. Now, Sir, after the experience of the Liberal-Conservative party in 1871 and 1872, owing to the political capital which was made on the question of better terms for Nova Scotia, particularly in Ontario, I am not at all astonished that the Liberal-Conservatives of Ontario particularly should feel an unwillingness to pass through a similar ordeal in the future. I distinctly recollect that the two main planks in the platform of the Reform party of Ontario in 1871 and 1872 against the Dominion Government and the Liberal-Conservative party of this Dominion were, first on account of granting better terms to Nova Scotia, and secondly, because Riel was not hanged for the murder of Scott. There is no doubt that the appeal to the prejudices of Ontario in reference to the better terms to Nova Scotia, consigned many a friend of the Liberal Conservative party to political death, and I have no doubt whatever that if the present Government would give additional better terms to Nova Scotia, a similar agitation would be commenced in Ontario, and would have a similar effect. The second plank in the platform was embodied in a resolution, moved in the Legislature of Ontario, by Mr. Blake, on the 3rd of February, 1871, as follows :—

"That the cold-blooded murder (for his outspoken loyalty to the Queen) of Thomas Scott, lately a resident of this Province, and an emigrant thence to the North-West, has impressed this House with a feeling of sorrow and indignation, and in the opinion of this House every effort should be made to bring to trial the perpetrators of this great crime, who as yet go unwhipt of justice."

It will thus be seen that instead of local issues in the Province of Ontario, the two distinct issues raised were directed against the conduct of the Liberal-Conservative party in the House of Commons. This, I have no hesitation in saying, I considered then, and I consider now, was a very unjustifiable course to be pursued by any politician either in the great Province of Ontario or in any other Province. I always contended, when I held a seat in the Legislature of Nova Scotia, that the members of the Local Legislature should attend to their own business, and not raise issues in which the Dominion Parliament alone had any concern. However, in face of all opposition from the party who were then in Opposition as they are still, we secured better terms to Nova Scotia to the extent of $150,000 a year for ten years, and about $70,000 a year from that time up to the present time; and I have no hesitation in admitting that I felt a deep debt of gratitude to the Liberal-Conservative party for having granted these concessions at that time, and I feel assured that the people of Nova Scotia have not felt differently, and I have reason to believe that they will not forget it in the future. I find also that on the 21st of May, 1873, resolutions were submitted to this House, the purpose of which was to readjust the indebtedness of the several Provinces in the Dominion :

"The Order of the day being read, for the third reading of the Bill to re-adjust the amounts payable to and chargeable against the several Provinces of Canada by the Dominion Government, so far as they depend on the debt with which they respectively entered the Union,

"The Hon. Mr. Tilley moved, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Tupper, and the question being proposed, that the Bill be now read the third time,

"The Hon. Mr. Cauchon moved, in amendment, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Holton, that all the words after 'now' to the end of the question be left out, and the words re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of adding the following words after the first section : 'provided always that the last amounts go towards equalising the debts and subsidies between all the Provinces according to the population, real or assumed, with which they entered the Confederation,' inserted instead thereof."

It is true, that this would not very likely change the adjustment of the indebtedness of the several Provinces; but while there was a shade in favor of Ontario and Quebec, the Liberal party in this House were determined to have even that small shade for those Provinces against the other Provinces. I find that in favor of this amendment were Bain, Béchard, Cartwright, Casey, Casgrain, Cockburn, De St. Georges, Edgar, Geoffrion, Landerkin, Mackenzie, Mills, Thompson and Trow. This re-adjustment placed to the credit of Nova Scotia the sum of $1,344,780, the interest on which was payable into the local treasury from that time up to the present; and while I admit it was not a material concession to Nova Scotia, yet opposition was offered even to that. I quite agree with the hon. member for Guysborough that the Liberal party in Nova Scotia was not the only party that asked for better terms for Nova Scotia. On the 2nd of January, 1879, the leader of the Government of that day sent a memorial to the Dominion Government, which was as follows :—

"The Government of the Province of Nova Scotia has had under consideration for some time its financial position as it stands now, and the resources it will possess for the future to meet its various obligations, and the annual recurring necessary expenses.

"The condition of the local revenue is of such a character, and so inadequate to meet our requirements, even upon the scale of the closest economy, that it has been decided by the Government that I should lay before you in as comprehensive a form as may be, an abstract of the financial history of this Province since it entered Confederation in 1867, up to the beginning of the present year, in order that the actual resources of the local revenue may be fairly and fully understood, and the necessity for some re-adjustment made more apparent than a mere superficial view of the situation is likely to convey."

After giving figures and facts to show that Nova Scotia was not in a very satisfactory financial condition, the memorial concluded as follows :—

"The question now suggests itself, how can the needed remedy be applied? The facts stated above prove, I think, very clearly, that a revision and readjustment of the present subsidy may be made in accordance with the reasonable requirements of our Province, so that it may be placed, in a revenue point of view, on an equal footing with its sister Provinces.

"The Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, in his letter of 29th January, 1877, addressed to the Hon. P. C. Hill, maintains that there is only one way in which this can be done, viz., 'allowing a pro rata payment to all the other Provinces at the same time.'

"In the face of the facts which have been adjudged in this statement of the case of Nova Scotia, the position of Mr. Mackenzie ceases to be tenable. How can it, with such a return as the following, taken from the blue books of each Province :

	Income.	Per Head Population.
Quebec.....	2,428,216	2 03
New Brunswick.....	618,113	2 16
Prince Edward Island.....	328,274	3 45
Nova Scotia—in future say.....	530,900	1 29

"But should there prove to be serious or unsurmountable difficulties in this method of adjustment, relief to our necessities may be found in another direction, and in a way which could not be justly challenged or objected to by any of the other Provinces."

Then he claims the fishery award should be sub-divided among the Maritime Provinces, and in this way the increase of subsidy so necessary, to Nova Scotia particularly, should be attained. Again I find in the very correspondence which my hon. friend asked for in this House and submitted to the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia, that a communication was recently sent by Sir Alexander Campbell, then acting Secretary of State, in which I find the following paragraph, in answer to the claims made by Nova Scotia for better returns :

"This shows that the amount of $8,000,000, which was provided by the British North America Act, as the amount to be placed to the credit of the debt account, has been augmented on several occasions, the first increase being made in consequence of the Act of 1869, when the amount was increased to the sum of $9,186,756, this increase to take effect from the date of Confederation. Taking this increase into consideration it will be found that the balance at the credit of the Nova Scotia debt account on the 30th June, 1868, was $924,455.35. In 1873, by the Act of 36 Victoria, chapter 30, $1,344,780 was added, and the amount was supplemented in the following year under the Act 37 Victoria, chapter 3, by $199,490. The Act of 37 Victoria was simply passed to remove doubts in reference to the intention of 36 Victoria on this subject. And again by the Act 47 Victoria, chapter 4, another increase of $793,368.71 was made, which should make the balance at the present time to the credit of the debt account about $3,260,000, on which the Province of Nova Scotia would be receiving interest at the rate of 5 per cent., or say, $163,000 each year, had the large withdrawals for railway extension, east and west, in Nova Scotia proper, not been made from the capital of the account. On the 1st July last, only the sum of $1,052,345 out of the $3,260,000 was left to the credit of Nova Scotia, representing an annual income of $52,615, an annual loss of over $1,10,000.

This state of affairs has been brought about by the political friends of my hon. friend from Guysboro'.

"It has been mentioned before that the amount ($3,000,000) which was paid by the 'British North America Act,' as the amount to be placed to the credit of the debt account, has been augmented on several occasions, the first increase being made in consequence of the Act of 1869, before referred to, when the amount was increased to the sum of $9,186,756, this increase to take effect from the date of Confederation. Taking this increase into consideration, it will be found that the balance at the credit of the Nova Scotia debt account, on the 30th June, 1868, was $924,455.33. In 1873, by the Act of 36 Vic. Cap. 30, $1,344,780 was added, and the amount was further supplemented in the following year under the Act 37 Vic., Cap. 3 by $199,490, and again by Act 47 Vic., Cap. 4, another increase of $793,368.71 was made, which should make the balance at the present time to the credit of the Debt Account about $3,260,000, on which the Province would be receiving interest at the rate of 5 per cent., or say, $163,000 per annum, had the large withdrawals, for railway extension before mentioned not been made from the capital of the account. In consequence of these withdrawals, however, the amount on the first day of July last, actually at the credit of the account and on which they are receiving interest is only $1,052,345, representing, say, $52,615 of income. It will, therefore, be seen that, had the capital been allowed to remain unimpaired, the Province would now have been in receipt of over $110,000 more of yearly revenue from this source."

At this point, I desire to remind my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) that the total withdrawal of its capital account in the Dominion Treasury from the credit of Nova Scotia, was owing to the actions of his political friends in Nova Scotia; and it ill-becomes them now to clamor for any further concessions to Nova Scotia, while they seemed disposed to squander in this manner the revenue which had been placed at their disposal through the generosity of the Liberal-Conservative party. In conclusion, I desire to call the attention of the House to the following facts:—First. That, before Confederation, Nova Scotia had an average of $776,000 for local works, for the maintenance of which she is held responsible by the British North America Act; Second. That all the older Provinces of the Dominion, excepting Nova Scotia, have now more revenue for the maintenance of local works than they ever had before Confederation; Third. That even if the Legislature of Nova Scotia did not withdraw any of her capital from the Dominion Treasury, that Province would now only have a local revenue of $673,000, which is $103,000 less than the average revenue for years before Confederation, and over $200,000 less than would be sufficient, in view of the increased population, to maintain her local services, as efficiently as they were maintained before Confederation. But even if the Opposition obtain power, there is not the shadow of a hope for better terms for Nova Scotia from that source, as better terms cannot be secured without the repeal of the fifth clause of the Better Terms Act of 1869. This fifth clause was added at the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition. It provides that "the grants and provisions made by this Act and the British North America Act shall be in full settlement of all demands on Canada by Nova Scotia." I deem it much more necessary that this fifth clause should be repealed than that we should have any further correspondence relative to better terms for Nova Scotia submitted to this House. I therefore deem it my duty to move in amendment to the motion of the hon. member for Guysboro' :

That all the words after "That" be omitted, and the following substituted:—

"In the opinion of this House it is expedient to repeal the fifth section, chap. 2, 32-33 Vic., of the Dominion Statutes, which provides, that the grants and provisions made by this Act and the British North America Act of 1867 shall be in full settlement of all demands on Canada by Nova Scotia."

Mr. McDOUGALL. In rising to second the amendment of my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron), I desire to say that it was not my intention to make any remarks on this subject, but, having heard this afternoon the observations of the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) with reference to the interests of Cape Breton, I desire to say a word or two. I was astonished to hear the hon. member for Guysboro' at this stage giving the attention he has given to the railway interests of Cape Breton, and I was further astonished, on hearing him speak with reference to the motion now before the House, to find him omitting any reference whatever to the interests of Cape Breton. The hon. member for Guysboro' is associated with hon. gentlemen in this House who, on previous occasions, undertook to deal with the question of the expenditure of money on railways in the Province of Nova Scotia and in the Island of Cape Breton, and who took very good care, on all those occasions to expend all those moneys, by the passing of Acts in this House and the passing of Orders in Council, in such a way as to deprive the Island of Cape Breton of a mile of railway, as it stands to-day. On the settlement of the better terms, to which my hon. friend from Inverness referred at such great length, there was placed at the credit of the Province of Nova Scotia the sum of $2,269,235. At that time the Government of Nova Scotia adopted the policy of expending this money on railways in Nova Scotia. When that policy was adopted, the hopes of the people of Cape Breton were raised; they hoped that at a very early period they would have a railway extended through that island; but that money was voted by Parliament and expended in various sections of the Province, but not a dollar of it was expended in the Island of Cape Breton; and now my hon. friend from Guysboro' advocates the granting of further concessions to the Province of Nova Scotia, without saying a word as to the obligations to the Island of Cape Breton. As to the way in which that money was expended, without considering the claims of Cape Breton, I will give the counties in which the money was expended, and the amount expended in the several lines of railway in those counties. The following were the amounts so expended: In Annapolis and Lunenburg, $140,000; in Digby and Yarmouth, $679,000; in Pictou, Antigonish and Guysboro', $643,345; in Cumberland, $144,230. This absorbed, within a fraction, the $2,000,000 which were placed to the credit of Nova Scotia by the passage of the Better Terms Act. The hon. member for Guysboro', in addressing the House this afternoon on the question of the Short Line Railway, made a reference to my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Tupper), and asked him if he had the intention of strangling the Short Line Railway, or of extending it into the Island of Cape Breton. I am not surprised at that hon. gentleman basing his argument on suspicion, from the very fact that he, to-day, supports a party who have adopted a system of strangling all means by which we could expect, in the eastern part of the Province of Nova Scotia, that which we claimed we had a right to have. I remember the time to which my hon. friend from Inverness referred, when the present leader of the Opposition brought in a clause in amendment to the Better Terms Act, which would have had the effect of preventing the Province of Nova Scotia from getting any further consideration from that date. That was a system of strangling. Subsequently to that, the Government of Nova Scotia applied to the Dominion for assistance towards the building of the railway east of the county of Pictou, or from Pictou through the Island of Cape Breton. At that time, they desired their friends in Nova Scotia to have the transfer of the Truro branch to the Government, in order to assist in the building of a line through to Louisburg or Sydney in the Island of Cape Breton; but, notwithstanding that the representatives and the people of Cape Breton urged the Government to give that road, what was done by our hon. friends on the other side of the House at that time? They passed a Minute of Council by which the transfer of the road was made to aid in the building of a road which was limited by the Strait of Canso, and which did not provide for the expenditure of a single dollar or the construction of a mile of railway in the Island of Cape Breton. That was another specimen of strangling the construction of railways in the Island of Cape Breton. In the next place, the Government of Nova Scotia in 1882 adopted and passed a measure known as the Syndicate Act, for the consolidation of the railway system of Nova Scotia. They provided, and Parliament ratified that, for the extension of the railway system of Nova Scotia into Cape Breton. What did hon. gentlemen opposite do? What did my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Vail) do? When the present Local Government came into power in Nova Scotia, he lent his services to that Government in order to strangle the operation of that Act. That was another act of strangling the building of roads in Cape Breton by hon. gentlemen opposite. The next thing was that the Government of Nova Scotia, in whose interests the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) has brought this up to-day, took over from the company, under the powers obtained by them from Parliament, the Eastern Extension Railway, and what did they do with the road and the privileges they had obtained in the direction of building a line through the Island of Cape Breton? They came to the Government of the Dominion and asked if they would not take it over for the price which they paid for it or for less, and they imposed no condition as to the extension of the road to the Island of Cape Breton. They came to this Government and handed over this road and their interest in the Pictou branch without any condition whatever, and without the slightest hope that that property would be used towards the extension of the road into the Island of Cape Breton. Now, Sir, this is the last step towards strangling the building of that road in the Island of Cape Breton, which these gentlemen engaged to do. I take it that this step now taken tends in the same direction. It will have a tendency, possibly, to lead some people to believe that this Government has not the disposition which we had a right to expect of it, to extend the railway system of the Province of Nova Scotia and of the Dominion into the Island of Cape Breton. The hon. member for Guysboro' referred to the economy which characterised the management of the Government of Nova Scotia. Why, Sir, the economy that characterises the present Government of Nova Scotia is explained by the fact that they handed over this road at about half its value without providing any consideration for that part of the Province to which they were under obligation to extend this railway system. Without detaining the House any further, I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment of the hon. gentleman for Inverness.

Main motion (Mr. Kirk) agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—PROTECTION OF THE FISHERIES.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think that considering the time that has been taken up with Government matters this Session, the least we can do is to have an opportunity to present some matters in which private individuals feel some interest. I have had a Notice of Motion on the paper for nearly a month, and I hope the Minister will allow me to present it to the House. It is a request for papers and information upon a very important subject connected with the fisheries of the country. I beg to move for Copies of all fishery regulations and of instructions to fishery officers or others commanding the alleged Marine Police Force of Canada under the Fishery Act of 1863, relative to fishing practices by United States citizens exercising privileges conceded by the Treaty of Washington, in common with Canadian fishermen.

Now, Sir, I shall take but a few minutes with this motion, it being so late, and seeing such an anxiety on the part of members to adjourn. I will state very briefly what the object of the notice is. It is very well known that an international question arose between the United States and the Government of England arising out of some American fishermen going to the Bay of Islands, under the supervision of the Newfoundland Government, for the purpose of catching bait. These American fishermen fished with illegal nets, and fished at a period which was contrary to the municipal regulation of Newfoundland. They were driven off by the people of Newfoundland. The owners of the vessels made a claim through their Government upon the British Government, and the British Government, notwithstanding that these American fishermen are alleged to have fished in defiance of the municipal regulations of that country, paid them the damages which were settled upon for having been driven off. Now, with regard to what occurred in Newfoundland it may be thought that this House has very little to do, but, Sir, the same principle that was concerned in the case of Newfoundland, and one of very great importance, affects the settlement of all questions along the whole coast of Canada. But, Sir, a case arose in our own country where some American fishermen, during the existence of the Washington treaty, came within the three mile limit in Aspy Bay, off the coast of Nova Scotia, and with illegal nets commenced taking bait, and with illegal traps and nets took bait for the purpose of deep sea fishing within the three mile district, and within the municipal jurisdiction and territory of the Dominion of Canada. We have it from the blue books published by the British Parliament that that question was taken up and dealt with at Washington by the British Minister, and was settled. The American fishermen, it was alleged, came within the three mile limit and fished with illegal nets. The fishermen along the coast of Nova Scotia, finding the Americans were fishing with illegal nets, which were prohibited by the municipal regulations, sanctioned by the fishery department and by the fishery laws passed by this Legislature, drove them out and prevented them using their nets, and the American fishermen went away. They came back the next day and bought bait from the Canadian fishermen, and went on with the fishing as they intended to do if they had caught the bait themselves. They made a claim for damages amounting to $5,000 or $6,000, through the United States Government, against the British Government, and they claimed that they had suffered those damages from the illegal act of the Canadian fishermen in driving them out for violating the municipal laws of Canada. The point I want to make is this: I believe it to be a fact that the British Government settled the damages, which were fixed at $600, and conceded the fact that American fishermen thus violating our laws and being driven from within the three mile limit were entitled to damages, because they paid $600 damages to American fishermen. Either the contention I make now, that foreign fishermen, coming within the three mile limit, are liable to the laws and regulations of this Parliament, which our fishery officers are instructed to carry out, or they are not. If they are liable, then the British Government or somebody else did wrong in establishing a principle, in recognising as correct the contention of the Americans that they are not bound by the municipal regulations of Canada, when they come within the three mile limit over which our territorial rights extend, which may prove a very serious difficulty to us in enforcing any future regulation, should a new treaty be made. Some one is to blame in regard to this matter. Either the British Government have done this, with or without the consent of the Government of Canada. My own impression is that the British Minister at Washington did it without the consent of the Canadian Government. If he did, I should like to know what correspondence took place between the Canadian Government and the British Government or the British Minister at Washington, and whether the Government of Canada protested against the recognition of that principle. If the Canadian Government have protested, if they have asserted the fact that we have a right to make our own laws and to control all the fishermen, whether American, French, English or Canadian, while fishing within the three mile limit, if they have protested against that settlement, then I have nothing further to say about the matter, and I should be very glad if it is so. If they have not done so, if the documents show they have neglected that duty, then I wish to bring the question before this Parliament and show the absolute duty there is on the part of Parliament of Canada to take such steps as will protest against the recognition of a principle which may in future seriously interfere with the carrying out of and enforcement of our laws and regulations, and the obtaining for our fishermen those equal rights which, if that principle is recognised, they cannot obtain. It is very well known that within the last few years a system sprung up on the part of the fishermen of the United States when they exercised rights under the Washington Treaty, I stated the other day when making a motion somewhat analogous to this, as I said last year when I took part in the discussion on the division of the Fishery and Marine Department, what I thought was the duty of the Government in relation to this matter. I said:

"The hon. the First Minister said that no damage was being done to our fisheries by the Americans fishing within the three mile limit. The right hon. gentleman is not well informed on that point."

The hon. gentleman had stated that he did not think any great damage was being done.

"Within the last three, four or five years a system of fishing has been established by the Americans which has been most destructive to the fisheries, and will ultimately ruin them, as the Americans have ruined their own fisheries. The Americans come in with schooners and with nets, and, with three or four or five miles of nets, scoop a whole bay, taking all kinds of fish, and for every one marketable mackerel two or three unmerchantable young mackerel are thrown overboard."

From interviews I have had with practical fishermen, I find if I had said 100 I would have been a great deal nearer the truth.

"Complaints have been made by fishermen of my own county of this practice, and they have asked whether any protection can be obtained."

At the same time I went on and stated this principle which I stated to the House to-day, and the First Minister then said: "Well taken, a good point." Mr. Speaker, it is a good point, and it is a very important point, for if we have 500 fishermen round the shores of the bay of the county which I represent restricted to certain limitations as to nets, perhaps ten, twenty or thirty fathoms, to a particular manner of disposing of the refuse from their fish, and if we find three or four American fishermen with one, two or three miles of nets, which are prohibited by our regulations, and if we have to compete with them, and the principle is recognised as settled by the Aspy Bay decision, the sooner this House knows it and takes the necessary steps to protest, the better, in order that Canadian fishermen shall not be placed at any disadvantage as compared with foreign fishermen and that a law shall not be applied to one as against the other. I am satisfied the acting leader of the House is anxious to adjourn, and I shall not take up the time of the House further, but simply move the resolution, and at the same time read the recommendation I made in the last report I signed as Minister of Marine and Fisheries, shortly after the adoption of the Washington Treaty:

"The admission of the United States citizens and American fishermen to our in-shores, in pursuance to the Washington Treaty, will necessitate the constant employment of cruisers to maintain order and regulate the fishing. It will be necessary to protect our own fishermen from injury and molestation, and to enforce the observance of our fishery laws. Also, it will be desirable to adopt some general system of regulation to prevent or correct any such abuses in the common pursuit as are calculated to inflict permanent damage to our estuary and river fisheries. A comprehensive code of rules was adopted under the fishery convention between Great Britain and France in 1839, to obviate collisions and disputes between the vessels and subjects of the respective powers. These regulations were framed by mixed commission, analogous it is presumed to that contemplated by article twenty of the present treaty. In the meantime the existing fishery laws, supplemented if necessary by regulations of the Governor General in Council, may suffice to avert any present injury from improper or unseasonable fishing; and for the present, at least, two marine police vessels should be kept on active duty."

What I advised at that time and what I contend for now is this: We should have had, and we should have now, protection for our fishermen in the exercise of those rights which the law gives them and to which they are entitled; and I make this remark more with a view to the future than to the present. It is true the fishery treaty has come to an end, but there is an anxiety in Canada, notwithstanding the course taken by the American fishermen, as there is amongst a large body of men interested in the fisheries of the United States that the renewal of that treaty, if it does occur, should occur within a reasonable time. I have brought forward the motion with a view of warning our Government that if they renew that treaty with that Newfoundland decision, and that Aspy decision standing in their face, we will find the contention of the American fishermen, as was stated during the existence of the Washington Treaty, that they were not bound by our municipal laws while within the three mile limit. I have brought this matter before the House for the purpose of endeavoring to find out how we stand in relation to it; first, if this demand has been made, next, if it has been made, by whose authority it has been made. If it has been made purely on the responsibility of the British Government, then I want to know whether our Government has protested against it so as to prevent its being acknowledged as a precedent if future arrangements are made. I bring forward the motion not with any desire to censure the Government, but to find out the facts, and then if we find ourselves in a false position, to warn the Government and to bring to the notice of the House the importance of putting ourselves right in the matter, with a view of preventing decisions which may have been made by the British Government on the responsibility of the British Minister at Washington, perhaps on the direction of the Foreign or Colonial Minister in London; being held to bind us in the future. If that has been done, I wish to ask the House to protest against the principle which is pernicious in itself and is detrimental to the future interests of our fishermen.

Motion for adjournment withdrawn.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry that my hon. friend took so unseasonable a time as this appears to be, to bring up this matter in the way in which he has brought it up. I doubt very much if the information he has asked for, judging by what he has outlined in his speech, if rigidly adhered to, will prove to be the information that he desires. However, I may say this that not only what he has asked for shall be brought down, but that all the papers in connection with the matters of which he has spoken, so far as they can be, will be brought down; and I think that the hon. gentleman will find that he has preferred charges before the information has been before the House, which, if the information had been before the House, he would not have preferred. It has always appeared to me to be rather singular that hon. gentlemen should make a motion for papers asking for information, and then should build up without that information, certain charges about the truth of which they are not fully informed, and concerning information for which they are at the moment asking. I have no doubt at all that it will be found that the United States fishermen and foreign fishermen, under this treaty, fishing in Canadian waters, were considered to be as they are considered to be, under the rules and regulations which govern our own fishermen. I have no doubt it will be found, as indeed it is, that they are subject to all reasonable municipal regulations. However, it is another matter both with our own people and with others fishing within our limits, as to how these regulations shall be enforced. I think my hon. friend said enough to lead this House to see, that in this case the regulations were not attempted to be enforced by the proper officers, but that certain persons took the law into their own hands, and probably the claim for damages arose largely on account of that circumstance. My hon. friend is very anxious for the integrity and the good name of Canada with reference to the protection of our fisheries. So, I am sure, is the Government, and so, I am sure, is every member of this House; and although he has taken the opportunity on this occasion, and a preceding occasion, to warn the Government and to say what he thinks the Government ought to do, it is probably within the memory of the House that what he warned the Government to do, and advises them to do, is in the exact line of what he already knows they have done. For instance, the other evening he warned and advised the Government that the proper kind of vessels were sailing vessels, and that steamers were a very wrong kind of vessel for the protection of the fisheries. Well, the hon. gentleman must have read before that that the Government were advertising for these same fast sailing schooners, and I think it will be in the memory of hon. gentlemen that the first fishing protection fleet which was organised by my hon. friend also contained one of these objectionable steamers. However, I shall not prolong the discussion to night. After these papers are brought down, and other papers as well, probably several hon. gentlemen will wish to speak on these different matters and we will have a more seasonable discussion and a better opportunity of giving our views and arriving at our conclusions.

Mr. VAIL. I merely wish to remark that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Foster), misunderstood the member for Northumberland. I did not understand him to make any charge against the Government, but was merely warning the Government that in case of any arrangements hereafter being made between the two Governments, they should bear in mind that certain claims were made by the American Government, and that they were acknowledged to a certain extent to have been right in consequence of the British Government having paid a sum of money in liquidation of those claims. I think the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Foster), should be obliged to the hon. member for bringing this matter before the House, and not only the Minister but the whole House. It is certainly a matter which has attracted a good deal of attention. The Minister of Marine says that the member for Northumberland has called the attention of the Government to certain things which he knows have been carried out. How was he to know that? If my memory serves me the Americans were driven off the shore of the harbor of Newfoundland for using seines or nets on a Sunday. The Americans made a demand—and it shows the value they set on our inshore fisheries—they made a demand for something like $25,000 for one day for the two or three vessels interested. The British Government took the matter into consideration, and I am inclined to think, though I do not know for certain, settled the matter by agreeing to pay the amount, without consulting the Dominion Government here. Or if they did consult them, they certainly acted without waiting for an answer or for the consent of the Dominion Government. I know it was the intention of the British Government at that time to call upon the Dominion Government to pay the amount. I do not know whether it was paid or not; but it shows plainly that the British Government felt they had a right to settle this matter without consulting the Dominion Government. Now, I think it quite proper, in any arrangement to be made hereafter in regard to the fisheries, that the Americans should be made to understand that they will be bound to respect the municipal laws as well as our own fishermen. When the Americans had a right to come into our waters, they seemed to set a considerable value on our fisheries; but after the treaty was abrogated they pretended to regard them as valueless. If they are of no value, all we ask of them is to remain outside of the three-mile limit; but if they do come within that limit they must be dealt with as the law directs. I do not believe the American Government will for one moment uphold their people in violating the laws of the Dominion or in violating a solemn treaty entered into between the two Governments, and I sincerely hope that all necessary steps will be taken to show that we are determined to protect our inshore fisheries.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not expect that I was going to get a lecture from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries when I rose to perform what is my undoubted right as a citizen of the country and a representative of the people. I brought forward a motion which is of great importance to this country. I brought no charges against the Government; I stated distinctly that I did not know who was to blame; but if the principle was recognised, that American fishermen should be paid claims for damages when fishing illegally in our waters, I thought it was wrong; and I said I did not know whether it was done by the authority of the Canadian Government or the British Government, and I wanted to know whether this Government protested against it, or whether they were particeps criminis in this matter. Now, the hon. Minister said, that I gave advice that fast sailing schooners were preferable to steamers, after I knew that the Government had advertised for schooners. I gave that advice a year ago, before the hon. gentleman dreamed of being in the position he now occupies, and a year before I thought that any steps would be taken in anticipation of the abrogation of the treaty I advised the Government to take the steps they have taken to-day, but taken too late. Therefore, I am not open to the charge of giving advice after the event. I gave it last year and the year before, as Hansard will prove. I do not care who it is that fishes illegally in our waters; the citizens of a country have a right to prevent men breaking the law, assuming that the facts stated by my hon. friend are correctly stated. But I think a number of questions arose, particularly in the Newfoundland case. The Americans were not only fishing on Sunday, and violating the municipal law against desecrating the Sabbath, but they were using nets and fishing across from bay to bay. These were the grounds on which the fishermen drove them off. In any case, the citizens of a country have a right to prevent any person fishing illegally or violating the law, and I was not wrong in my assumption. The hon. gentleman said I should wait until the papers are before the House. That is something like what was said last year when the Government was urged to take a vote of $50,000 or $100,000 in order to provide against the termination of the Washington Treaty. If that had been done, it would have given moral effect to the efforts of those in the United States Congress who are favorable to a renewal of the treaty. But what was done with the fisheries last year? They were given away; the Americans were begged to take them; and to take them for what? For nothing, although they were advised at that time to put on fast sailing schooners to protect them. The hon. gentleman was a member of Parliament at that time, and he ought to have known when he said that I spoke after the event, that he stated what was not strictly accurate.

Mr. McLELAN. If I understood the hon. gentleman last Session, he approved of the course taken by the Government in suspending the operations for protecting the fisheries pending the decision of the United States Congress as to the appointment of a commission. In last year's Estimates there was a sum of $50,000, I think, voted for the purpose of protecting the fisheries. In respect to this matter, I think the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) has taken the true view. The large claim made by the Americans was for injury done in Newfoundland waters, and the British Government notified the Newfoundland Government, which sent a representative to Washington to settle the difficulty. There was no such notice given to us; but after the matter was settled, the British Minister put in a small claim for compensation to American fishermen for injuries suffered at Aspy Bay. He applied to us to settle that; we protested strongly against it; but owing to subsequent circumstances and other reasons, which I am not prepared, in the absence of the First Minister, to say can be submitted to the House. A vote was taken in Parliament to pay that claim. The Newfoundland Government, I think, was represented at Washington by a delegate, and assented to the amount fixed for compensation for the disturbance there.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. Finance Minister has put in my mouth a conclusion I never arrived at. I did not approve of the course pursued last year, and there are gentlemen in this House who recollect the position I then took. I said that the Government should ask for a vote of $50,000 or $100,000 and provide the means then for protecting our fisheries, so as to let the Americans know that we were determined to protect the rights and privileges we possessed for the benefit of our own people; but I said that in the absence of a determination on the part of this Government to do that, they could not do anything but let the Americans come in and fish. That was what I said in relation to that point, but I never consented, I never thought it was the best course to pursue, to allow the Americans to use our fisheries the rest of the season for nothing. As to the Newfoundland case, we have nothing to do with it, except that it establishes a precedent that would cover any difficulty of the kind which might arise hereafter between the fishermen of Canada and the United States. With regard to the Aspy Bay affair, the hon. gentleman admits Canada was not consulted. If our Government permitted the British Government to deal with the case and thus establish a precedent without protesting against it, they did wrong. Some correspondence took place between this and the Imperial Government. We are told it is for the Premier to decide whether that correspondence will be brought down or not. I hold that the Government are bound to bring it down, in order that this Parliament may see whether the Government have taken the proper steps to protect our rights and interests, and prevent precedents being set up which will seriously interfere with our maintaining our rights and standing. The Minister said a few minutes ago that Canada had an undoubted right to protect her interests, and that nobody disputed her right. Well, Sir, the Americans disputed it. For the last three or four years that they have been fishing under the Washington Treaty, they have disputed our right to enforce our municipal laws within the three mile limit, and we should not allow, by any improper concession, the Imperial Government to establish a precedent which would prevent us in future from claiming and exercising that right.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish). The subject is of very little practical importance just now, considering that we are actually discussing what shall be done when the Americans are allowed within our three mile limit, at a time while we are declaring that they shall not come within the limits at all. But as hon. gentlemen, especially an hon. gentleman from my own Province, got into the prophetic mood, and the discussion appears to throw imputation on the policy of the Government and implies distrust as to what the policy of the Government will be hereafter, I will say, as my hon. colleague has said, that the Parliament of Canada have an undoubted right, not only to make, but to enforce within the three mile limit such regulations as it thinks proper to enact. It will not be claimed that we, or any Local Legislature, have the right to pass any regulations which would, in bad faith, limit unfairly the privileges given to the Americans or to others, but to the extent to which we would have the right to legislate for our own people, we have the right to legislate, as far as the three mile limit is concerned, for all who may come there. Nothing whatever has transpired to tie the hands of the Government in dealing with this question when it shall arise. The principle upon which it was thought wise to make compensation to the fishermen of the United States, in respect to the Aspy Bay affair and the Newfoundland affair, may have been this, that notwithstanding the citizens of the United States may have violated the laws of Canada or Newfoundland, that certainly did not justify the violence and destruction of property which occurred in those two places. By violating the local regulations with regard to fishing on Sundays, American fishermen incurred a penalty, but not the penalty of a mob destroying their vessels, nets or other property. If it were necessary to confer the right on Canadian people to go on American soil and carry on business there, our people would be subject to the municipal regulations of that country; but if they violated those regulations, the Government of Canada and of Great Britain, while recognising their liability to suffer penalty, would demand compensation to the fullest extent for any acts of violence and destruction of property from which they might suffer in consequence, at the hands of an American mob. There is a marked distinction between enforcing our regulations and justifying acts of violence. I do not say that the occurrences were such as to warrant the compensation paid by the British Government, and which the British Government may have forced the colonies to some extent to pay, but even if those Governments were justified in giving compensation, that does not necessarily involve the principle that we have not the right to enforce within the three mile limit the laws of Canada.

Mr. McLELAN. I do not think the hon. member for Northumberland understood me. I said this Government did protest against the payment of any amount for the Aspy Bay affair. The British Government paid the money for Newfoundland, and applied to us to recoup them for what they had paid on our account. We protested against the payment. Afterwards circumstances arose, and we came to the House with a vote, and every body knows what was said when the Estimates were passed. But what I want to say is that when the application was made, we replied protesting against any amount being paid.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 2nd April, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRINTING RETURNS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A couple of years ago an order was made by this House with respect to various items of printing. A partial return was brought down, but no returns—although the order has been in existence for a year—no returns have been made from the Department of Immigration and Agriculture. I propose, therefore, that the several items in the Public Accounts for 1879-80-81-82-83 for printing for the Immigration Department, be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. McMULLEN. I hold in my hand the return the hon. gentleman refers to, and I can verify his statement that it is incomplete. The return from the Post Office Department is also incomplete, and from the Department of Customs there is no return at all.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman to make the dates begin with 1874.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no objections. When this motion was moved the hon. gentleman made a similar addition, and the result, as I warned him it would be, was that a most interminable delay took place in producing them. But if the Minister of Agriculture, whom I see there, will undertake that these shall be forthcoming, I have not the least objection if he wants to go back to 1867.

Mr. THOMPSON (Antigonish).

Mr. McMULLEN. The return I hold in my hand was for 1874, and was made in obedience to the amendment to my motion made by the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Motion amended and agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. (78) to amend the Act incorporating the Guelph Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Innes.)

Bill No. (79) respecting the Napanee, Tamworth and Quebec Railway Company.—(Mr. White, Hastings.)

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. PAINT. I wish to refer to a matter of privilege. In the Globe of yesterday I read:

"The practice of members of Parliament obtaining charters which they hope to dispose of at a profit seems to be on the increase. To-day three members from Cape Breton—Messrs. Paint, Dodd and Cameron (Inverness)—petitioned for an Act incorporating themselves as a company to build a bridge across Lennox Passage. A Government subsidy will, no doubt, be applied for in aid of the work, and if secured, the three members will be able to sell out to advantage."

The facts of the case are these: I received a letter from the Hon. Isidore Leblanc, member of the Executive Council of Nova Scotia, and a Reformer, as follows:—

"I presented in our House of Assembly to-day the petition of the Municipal Council of the county of Richmond for the Lennox Passage bridge, and I presume that you have received one of the same, and that you will present it to your House soon."

I beg to say that we have not one dollar of interest in this Bridge Company. The time for receiving petitions for Private Bills had elapsed, and we were compelled to petition the House to be permitted to bring in the Bill. I regret that the correspondent of the Globe in this House should furnish its readers with false intelligence. As you, Mr. Speaker, control the gentlemen in the press gallery, I would suggest that you instruct that gentleman to send us an apology. This is not the first time he has offended in this manner. I consider we are entitled to this apology, as the insinuation was a base one and falsely interpreted.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I have only one word to say in regard to the libel in the Globe, and it is this: the representations made by the correspondent of the Globe are utterly false, and the writer when he penned them knew they were false, because he came to me and enquired what was the purport of the petition, and I assured him I did not know anything about it further than I signed my name to a petition which I considered was necessary to enable the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Paint) to introduce the Bill. Now it turns out it is a Bill in which a prominent Grit in Nova Scotia only is concerned, and it ill behoves the Globe correspondent to misrepresent us in connection with it.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. BOWELL moved the first reading of the resolutions.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), in the speech with which he favored the House on Tuesday last, made the rather startling announcement that the First Minister generally had a reason for everything he did. I am sorry to say, after having heard the hon. gentleman's speech and after having listened to similar speeches for the last six or seven years, that I cannot very well return the compliment. It is difficult to understand what reason an hon. gentleman who has occupied a prominent official position in the country, and who hopes, perhaps against hope, that in the remote future he may again occupy a similar position, can possibly have for making such a speech as that to which we listened the other evening. From the exordium to the peroration we had one dismal wail of the pessimist without a single coloring to gild the silver lining of the cloud, if there were such a lining. We had an attack upon the country, an attack upon the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, an attack upon the Government, and finally, after his peculiar method, his unreasonable method, as it seems to me, of dealing with public questions, an attack upon the people themselves. Now, Sir, one would imagine that an hon. gentleman who has occupied his position would be a little more careful in the statements which he makes in regard to the position of the country. In order to attack it, he went back to the year 1856—ancient history to most of us, absolutely unknown history in its details to a large number. But what perhaps may be unknown to many of the gentlemen who sit in this House, during a large part of the time from 1856 down to 1869, when the First Minister—having in that case, I presume, as in all other cases, a reason for what he did—preferred another gentleman as Finance Minister of this country to that hon. gentleman—down to that time he was a supporter of the Government, which, if Governments are responsible for the condition of the country, was responsible for the condition of the country during that long period. Why, Sir, where is the reason to be found why the hon. gentleman should thus deal with a period when he himself, as an independent member of Parliament during a large portion of it, was a supporter of the Government of the day? But I look back in vain to find that he ever made any remarkable suggestion for the improvement of the condition of things which, to day, he bewails as one of the evidences of the fact that this country has been going to the dogs ever since 1856. Then, Sir, we find that he dealt, as he sometimes does, with the matter of deficits. Now, one would imagine that was a subject which the hon. gentleman, if he has any reason for his utterances in this House, would carefully have avoided. What, Sir, are the facts with regard to deficits? Why, with the Conservatives in power from 1867 to 1873, they spent on capital account in the public works of this country some $13,000,000 in excess of the addition to the public debt. During the period since they came back to power, they have expended over $12,000,000 on public works in excess of the addition to the public debt; while during the five years that the hon. gentleman had control of the finances, he added to the public debt between two and three millions of dollars, even giving him the benefit of 1879 for which he was responsible as initiating the Estimates and the policy of that year,—I say that, giving him the benefit of that year, he added to the public debt for the ordinary expenses of the Government between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000. So that the only period, taking the time since Confederation down to the present time, during which we have been adding to the public debt for carrying on the ordinary administration of the affairs of this country, was during the time that the hon. gentleman had control of the finances of Canada, in spite of the fact that during that time, he made two additions to the taxation, one of $3,000,000 and another of $1,700,000, and yet with these large additions he failed to bring expenditure and revenue to balance in the accounts. Now, I say one would imagine, under these circumstances, that he would be the last to refer to the subject of deficits. Then, Sir, we find, as another element in his attack on the country, his statement that the gross aggregate trade of Canada has decreased enormously from 1873 down to the present time. But why did he select 1873? Why was it, when he was dealing with these matters, that he did not deal with the period for which this Government was somewhat responsible? Why did he forget to state to the House that the aggregate trade of Canada in the year when he came into office was over $217,000,000, and that the aggregate trade of Canada the year he left office was $152,000,000, or $65,500,000 of a decrease during that period? Why has the hon. gentleman selected for his point of comparison a period antecedent to that during which he controlled the affairs of the country as to its financial and fiscal policy? Sir, one would have thought, as I said, that the hon. gentleman would have avoided, if possible, challenging investigation into his own course and the course of his own Government, and the results of the policy adopted by him when he came to deal with the question of the fiscal policy of the country and its condition. Why, Sir, what was the fact? He was five years in office. During that time he saw the bank circulation decrease from $25,750,000 down to $19,000,000. He saw the value of bank stocks, so far as the five leading banks were concerned—the Montreal, Toronto, Commerce, Merchants', and Molson's—decrease from $41,250,000—I give the round figures, because they are more easily remembered—down to $31,250,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Give the date for that if you can.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The dates are 1873 and 1878.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. After the defeat of the Mackenzie Government.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No, not after the defeat of the Mackenzie Government. Then, Sir, he saw the deposits in the savings banks decrease from $3,207,000 to $2,750,000. He saw misery and destitution all over this country, bread riots in our cities, whole streets of tenanted houses in the large cities of Canada; he saw a condition of things which made every man almost hopeless for the future of the country. He saw the failures increase until they had reached the enormous number of nearly 2,000, with aggregate liabilities of over $29,000,000. He saw merchants and manufacturers, his own political friends, coming here Session after Session, month after month, to implore him to do something to mitigate, at any rate, the commercial condition of the country, and he met all their advances, all their suggestions, all their proposals, with that supercilious indifference, that almost insulting indifference which drove them from him, and which, when the time came, in 1878, converted the majority which he had at his back at that time of between 60 and 70 into a majority against him of between 70 to 80 in Parliament. Now, Sir, that was the position of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman gave us some illustrations of the fact that the country is in a deplorable condition. He stated that the trade had decreased from $207,000,000 in 1873 to $183,000,000 in 1885. But, Sir, as I have just said, he did not tell this House that the trade had increased from 1878 down to the present time by no less a sum than $31,000,000. And, Sir, I might say with regard to that, that this decrease in the volume of trade is, after all, more largely in appearance than in fact. Every one knows that there has been a serious depreciation in the value of goods since that time. We know that the same thing obtains in the United States. I find that in the annual report of the Secretary of the United States Treasury, he states that the Customs revenue for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1885, was $13,500,000 less than in 1884, and that a further decline of $6,000,000 was anticipated in the current year. In that country, as in this, the fall in values of commodities accounts largely for the apparent decrease in the trade, and a conspicuous example is given of this fact in reference to five articles which are mentioned by the Secretary of the Treasury as showing that depreciation—sugar, molasses, clothing wools, carpet wools, and glycerine. Had the prices current during 1884 been maintained during the last fiscal year, the value of the importations of these articles into the United States would have been $103,750,000, whereas it was only $77,000,000, or $26,600,000 less, the Customs revenue suffering, of course, in a corresponding degree. So that you will see that even of this depreciation in the volume of trade, a large part has been due to the depreciation in values. We have in this country during the last few years undoubtedly passed through a period of depression in common with other countries; but there is this important fact to be borne in mind, that while trade has been more dull, and profits less than they were in 1881-82, the general condition of trade, as indicated by all those ordinary tests by which one may determine the condition of the country, shows that we have suffered incomparably less than we did during the years hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, and incomparably less than the people of England or the United States have suffered during the same period. What do we find? We find, comparing 1879 with 1885, that the number of traders has increased from 56,347 to 70,045, while the number of failures has decreased from 1,902 to 1,256, and the liabilities connected with those failures have decreased from $29,500,000 to about $8,750,000. Or, comparing the period from 1874 to 1878 with the period from 1881 to 1885, I find that the number of failures during the first period was 8,281 with liabilities of $11,500,000, while in the second period the number of failures was 5,389, with liabilities of $58,250,000; a decrease in the number of failures of 2,892 and of liabilities connected with those failures of $51,150,000. Surely, Sir, that is an indication that, in spite of depression and dullness, the condition of the commercial classes of the community has been infinitely better than it was during the period when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. Then I find that the bank circulation, which is a fair indication of the activity of business, amounted on the 1st of January, 1879, to $19,186,300, and the Dominion note circulation to $2,984,464, making together $22,170,000; while, on the 1st of January last, the bank circulation had reached $28,064,393, and the Dominion note circulation $6,259,930, or in the aggregate $34,324,323, against $22,170,000, or an increase of more than $12,000,000 in the ordinary bank circulation of the country. I find further that the value of the shares of the Bank of Montreal, the Toronto Bank, the Bank of Commerce, the Merchants' Bank and Molson's Bank increased from $31,380,000 to $44,460,000; that the assessed value of real estate in three cities of Ontario, Toronto, Hamilton and London, increased from $73,250,000 to $103,500,000; that the deposits in the chartered banks of Ontario and Quebec increased from $60,000,000 to $91,500,000; that the savings in the Post Office banks increased from $2,750,000 to $15,750,000; that the savings in other banks increased from $5,750,000 to $18,750,000, and that the deposits in joint stock savings societies increased from $5,600,000 to $9,000,000; or in the aggregate, all these deposits increased from $74,140,000 to $135,050,000, an increase of $61,000,000 during that period. Is that an evidence of a depressed condition of trade?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And your three banks asking for a reduction of capital to-day.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Then I take the number and tonnage of sea-going vessels arriving at the port of Montreal, as indicating the position of our foreign trade. From 1874 to 1878 the number of vessels was 2,604, with a tonnage of 1,974,000 tons, and from 1881 to 1885 the number of vessels was 3,132, with a tonnage of 3,084,000 tons, or an increase in the second period over the first of no less than 528 vessels, and of 1,109,000 tons. Then I take the goods entered for consumption—and this analysis gives perhaps as good an illustration of the industrial prosperity of the country as can be found. In 1879, the value of goods entered for consumption was $80,341,608; and in 1885, $102,710,019. But when we come to separate the imports of raw material from the imports of ordinary goods which go into consumption, we find that, in spite of the growth of the country, in spite of the greater consuming power of the people, the quantity of goods imported from foreign markets for ordinary consumption, outside of the raw material which went into our manufactures, was about the same in the two periods. The raw material, including settlers' effects, which is not a very large item, increased from $9,029,000 in 1879, to $24,085,000 in 1883; so that if these are deducted, and if we also take into account coin, bullion and breadstuffs, it will be found that we have as the ordinary importation, which indicates the increased manufacturing and industrial prosperity of the country, $19,861,000 in the one year, as against $39,585,000 in the other; or, leaving out that class of imports to which I have just referred, we have $60,500,000 against $63,000,000, the balance being made up of raw material which went into the manufacture of goods in the country. Now, Sir I might refer to some of the imports of raw material as indicating the prosperity of Canada. I take, for instance, wool, and I find that we imported 7,750,000 lbs. in 1885, against about 5,000,000 lbs. in 1879; of hemp, we imported 89,000 cwt. in 1885, against 38,000 cwt. in 1879; of cotton wool, we imported 23,750,000 lbs. in 1885, against 9,750,000 lbs. in 1878; of gutta percha, we imported 890,000 lbs. in 1885, against 282,000 lbs. in 1879; of raw sugar going into manufacture in our refineries, we imported nearly 176,000,000 lbs. in 1885, against 21,250,000 lbs. in 1879. I find, in spite of a largely increased production of Canadian coal going into consumption in the country itself, that the coal imported—and there is perhaps no better test of the industrial prosperity of the country than is to be found in this importation—reached nearly 2,000,000 tons in 1885 against 677,000 tons in 1879. This, I think, it will be admitted, indicates that the industrial prosperity of the country has shown marked improvement during the period to which the hon. gentleman referred as indicating a terrible depression and an almost hopeless prospect. Take even last year as an indicator, and take one test of the improved condition of things during that year—take the value of bank stocks, Montreal, Ontario, People's, Molson's, Toronto, Merchants', Commerce and Federal, on the 26th March, 1885, and their value on the 26th March, 1886, and you will find that during that period they increased in value $3,500,000; that is to say, the holders of those stocks are to-day $3,500,000 richer than they were on the 26th March, 1885. Take a few particular stocks, which may be said to indicate the prosperity of the country or the confidence of the people in it—take Canadian Pacific, which has increased from 38 to 66½; North-Western Land Company, 38 to 77; Canada Cotton Company, 40 to 77; Dundas Cotton Company, 30 to 70; Montreal Cotton Company, 40 to 90; Hochelaga Cotton Company 50 to 105; all these indicate that the depression in the cotton trade, of which we heard so much last Session, and on which hon. gentlemen based so strongly their attacks upon the Government in relation to the prosperity of that industry, is rapidly disappearing, and that industry is recovering its position. That condition of things is being reached, which all who knew anything of subjects of this kind knew would be reached, as soon as the cotton manufacturers came to realise that they would have to adopt various methods of manufacture and manufacture various classes of goods, so as to supply the market to a larger extent with varied goods than they were able to do at the outset. Take an opinion as to the condition of the country, which, it seems to me, is of some value. The president of the Toronto Board of Trade, who is not a political friend of this Government, but who is known as an able man and a prominent merchant, addressing his brother merchants, at the annual meeting of the Toronto Board of Trade, with reference to the commercial condition of the country, said, under that sense of responsibility which a man in his position must feel:

"Of the trade of 1885 generally, it may be said that the close of the year found it in a sounder condition than at the beginning. The terms 'unremunerative' or 'unprofitable,' rather than 'depression,' would more accurately express the tendency of trade and its present condition. There are not wanting indications that a healthier and tolerably active business will be done in 1886, the cash returns from which are likely to be more promptly made than heretofore. Of the trade of this city, in which we are more immediately interested, nothing has occurred during the year to interrupt the steady development of substantial progress which has characterised its industries generally for many years. The Custom House returns of imports show an increase over 1884 of nearly $1,000,000, half of this being in free goods. The receipts in the Inland Revenue Department are the largest ever recorded at this point."

This is the opinion of Mr. Darling, president of the Toronto Board of Trade, a pronounced Liberal, but a merchant dealing with commercial questions as a merchant, and addressing his brother merchants, in whose judgment he relies to vouch for the correctness of the statements he was making. Now, I find in the report of the Montreal Board of Trade this language:

"While, at the close of 1885, depression in trade continues to be felt to a considerable extent on both sides of the Atlantic, the dullness does not seem to be quite so universal as in 1884. Canada, of course, shares in common with all commercial countries, yet it is gratifying to know that, so far as the foreign commerce of the Dominion may be supposed to be represented by that of Montreal, the business of last year was in general fairly prosperous."

Now, the opinion of merchants, gentlemen who have no political object to serve in the declarations they make on the subject of trade, are much more to be relied upon than the opinions of the ex-Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright), whose only object—for what reason I cannot say—appears to be to belittle the condition of the country, to explain away its condition and prosperity, in the hope, apparently, that upon its ruin, if ruin it he could, he might rise into power. Then we have the statement that the farmers are dissatisfied with this policy. I am not going—because I have two or three other matters to which I desire to refer—to detain the House with any figures on this matter; but I want to call the attention of the House to one fact, which it seems to me is of very considerable importance, as it indicates in a very marked degree the feelings of the farmers, especially those of Ontario, in relation to the National Policy. Last year, or, rather, in the fall of the year before and the early part of last year, a feeling arose among the millers of this country that the National Policy was doing them injury. They saw, largely on account of the low freight rates given to the Minneapolis millers in order to enable them to place their flour in Eastern Canada, a large importation of American flour, to the prejudice, as they thought, of the Canadian millers; and there were discussions going on which seemed to point to an attempt on the part of these gentlemen to secure a reduction in the duty on wheat to 10 cents per bushel. What was the result? The grangers, who are not a political organisation—not, certainly, a Tory political organisation, whatever else they may be—met in their several lodges throughout Ontario, and we had numerous petitions, all praying and protesting in the strongest terms against any reduction in the duty on wheat, thus indicating that their own personal experience and knowledge of their own business enabled them to see that the policy of agricultural protection was evidently in their interest. They protested against any attempt to remove, or even lessen, the duties; and I may fairly put against the statement of the hon. gentleman as to the disappointments of the farmers, this one fact, namely, the action of the grangers at the time it was suggested the duty on wheat was to be lowered, if not withdrawn altogether. The hon. gentleman then went on to deal with the question of our debt and taxation, and he followed the course which he has generally followed of comparing our position with that of the United States. He told us that the debt of Canada was three times that of the United States, and that the taxation of Canada was 50 per cent greater. Why the hon. gentleman should desire on all occasions to proclaim to the world how inferior Canada is, in its attractions, to the United States, I cannot, as I have said before, fathom. What reason he has it is difficult to see; but what are the facts? Now, as to this matter of per capita taxation, personally I have no hesitation in saying that I do not attach very much importance to it, because of the incidents connected with it which make it difficult to come down to any absolutely accurate mathematical demonstration of what that taxation is. But, Sir, what do we find? There has been an increase in the public debt of Canada undoubtedly, but that increase has been more than covered—I am speaking now of the increase since 1878-79—that increase has been more than covered by over twelve millions which are left as a balance, by three items of expenditure, the expenditure on the Pacific Railway, the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway, and the expenditure on the canals; and I think I may say that the expenditure on these three items will cover the entire increase of the public debt since Confederation. Now, the question arises: Was the expenditure on these works a wise expenditure? So far as the Intercolonial Railway is concerned, that was part of the compact with the Lower Provinces at the time of Confederation. The hon. gentleman was a friend of Confederation. He supported the scheme of Confederation. He supported it with this clause in it, which compelled the Canadas, in order to be united, to undertake the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. More than that, if I am not mistaken, and I have not verified my recollection by looking at the Journals, for the reason that I have not had time, the hon. gentleman was one of those who voted in this House for the northern route, for the Robinson route, for the Intercolonial Railway, for the route which involved the large expenditure which was made in connection with it. Therefore, so far as the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway is concerned, at least, he was as much responsible as gentlemen on this side. It was, in fact, a part of the compact upon which this Confederation was based.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Jardwell). The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) says "hear, hear." What does the hon. gentleman mean by that?

Mr. BLAKE. I meant to deride the statement that the location of the route of the Intercolonial Railway was part of the compact of Confederation.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I did not say anything of the kind. I said that, not the route, but the construction of the Intercolonial Railway formed part of the compact of Confederation. I said the hon. gentleman was responsible for the location, but that the construction was part of the compact. In reference to the Intercolonial Railway, I say that was part of the compact of Confederation. Let me recall one fact in connection with it? When the leader—if he ever was the leader—of the hon. gentleman from West Durham (Mr. Blake), the Hon. George Brown, the great leader of the Liberal party, who must be turning in his grave with disgust, if such a thing is possible, at the position of the Liberals he has left behind him in the matter of their leadership—when he came into the coalition which was formed at that time in order to bring about Confederation, and when it was charged against him in some parts of Ontario that this Intercolonial Railway was to be a serious burden, the largest portion of which the people of Ontario would have to bear, what did we find him saying? In that great speech which he delivered in the Music Hall in Toronto, referring to this matter, he declared that he would rather have Confederation, if it cost six Intercolonial Railways, than be without it and save that amount. So that it does not lie in the mouth of the hon. gentleman and his friends who supported Confederation to complain of the expenditure in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. Then we come to the canals. The construction of the canals—not the immediate construction, but the construction as soon as the finances of the Dominion would permit—was also a part of the compact of Confederation. It was, in fact, a part of what was given to the western portion of the Dominion as a compensation, to some extent, for the large expenditure of money in connection with the Intercolonial Railway in the east. The hon. gentleman cannot escape his share of responsibility for that expenditure. The Government of Canada, before 1873, had large surpluses, and were able to expend, as they did expend, $13,000,000 on public works out of the surpluses in excess of the amount which they added to the public debt. They commenced the fulfilment of this second compact by letting some contracts for the enlargement of the Lachine Canal, and they advertised for tenders for the Welland Canal just before they went out of office; but there was not a single contract let on the latter work when hon. gentlemen opposite came in, and they could have abandoned the work if they thought it was not one which Canada ought to undertake. But what they did was to cancel the tenders, and to advertise for new tenders, and the works which have gone on since have been carried on under the contracts let by hon. gentlemen opposite in large part, or in completion of the works of which those contracts formed the principal part when they were let. So I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite will say that they have any ground of complaint against this Government in reference to the canals. Then I come to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the hon. gentlemen can hardly say that they can escape their share of responsibility for that. It is quite true that the agreement with British Columbia was made in 1870 or 1871 when the Conservatives were in power, and that the Conservative Government undertook the construction of that road; but it is equally true that the first Act passed by hon. gentleman opposite, when they attained power, was an Act providing for the construction of that road, and that one of the most solemn agreements made by them—in fact, one of the most solemn agreements made by any Government in this country—was that which is commonly known as the Carnarvon terms, by which they undertook to construct that road as a public work out of the public exchequer of Canada and to complete it by the year 1890, from Port Arthur to the Pacific; agreeing, at the same time, to expend during that time $2,000,000 a year in the Province of British Columbia, as an evidence of their good faith in the completion of that road from Port Arthur westward. That was their policy. That was the policy which they deliberately adopted. They may say that they were forced to do it, that they found themselves bound by the obligation entered into by the Conservatives when they were in office. If they take that ground, how do they justify their conduct in opposing the first contract which was let for the construction of the line in British Columbia on the ground that we were not bound to build it at all, although they had bound themselves in the most solemn manner to the Imperial Government, as well as to British Columbia, to build it? Now, if the Government had undertaken to build that road as a purely Government work from Port Arthur westward, I venture to think—this is an opinion that may or may not be worth anything—that the addition to the public debt on that account would have been considerably more than it is to day by the adoption of the policy which this Government has adopted. At any rate, it would certainly have been so near it as to make no appreciable difference in the aggregate debt. There are the three great public works which alone account for all the increase to the public debt, and the expenditures upon which since 1879 account for the whole increase of the public debt during that time, with twelve millions and a half expended in addition to that increase on capital account. Then, Sir, I ask you why the hon. gentleman, dealing with a debt which has been incurred in connection with public works of that kind, for which they themselves are equally responsible with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No.

Mr. WHITE. I ask them why they should be perpetually parading before the world as a fact that our debt has been enormously increased, and that the country is laboring under a serious burden in consequence of that increase. But the hon. gentleman makes his comparison with the United States. Well, Sir, he made a statement that the debt of Canada to-day was, in its per capita relation, three times that of the debt of the United States, and that our taxation was 50 per cent higher. Sir, I have no right, perhaps, to complain that the hon. gentleman makes this comparison with the United States; I have no right to complain, perhaps, that the hon. gentleman, an ex-Finance Minister, and possibly, in the remote future, a Finance Minister again, makes speeches that may be used by American immigration agents in Europe for the purpose of showing how much better it would be for people to come to that country than to this. If that is a reasonable course, if he can show any reason for that except pure cussidness—if I may use that expression—if there is any reason or excuse for him, then I have no right to complain. But what I have a right to complain of is this, that when he makes that comparison, he does not make it in accordance with the facts as they exist, but, on the contrary, he mutilates those facts for the purpose of injuring his own country and advantaging a foreign country. Sir, the debt of Canada is undoubtedly greater than the debt of the United States. Nobody denies that. Nobody has ever said the contrary; and I see my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson), who is going to follow me, making a note of that admission as one which he is going to ring the changes upon as if it were something the people of Canada should be proud of, and that he should send it forth to the world with still greater emphasis than even the gentleman who preceded me in this debate.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Don't make my speeches as well as your own.

Mr. WHITE. What are the conditions of the two countries in that relation to-day? We came practically into existence as a Confederation, attaching those great western territories to us, as we did, at a time when the conditions of traffic, the conditions of inter-communication, the conditions of attraction of the immigration class of the Old World, were entirely different from what they were when the United States started out on its career. We have been compelled to do by public subsidies, by public aid, what the United States, because of its larger population and greater developed resources—although I believe our resources will be developed in early time so that we shall have no reason to complain of them—I say we have been compelled to do in Canada what, in the United States, has been done to a large extent, by private enterprise. But, Sir, what are the actual facts, after all? I will deal with the published returns in both cases, and I find that the debt of the United States, at the end of the last fiscal year, was $1,452,544,766; and the net debt of Canada was $196,470,692. Now, Sir, taking the population of the United States at 56,000,000, and the population of Canada at 4,700,000, I find the per capita debt of the United States is $26, and the per capita debt of Canada is $40.95, or 50 per cent. greater instead of 200 per cent. greater, as the hon. gentleman was good enough to tell this House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you mean that $49.50 is only 50 per cent. greater than $26 ?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, $40.95; I did not say $49. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to repeat the figures, as he does not seem to have caught them—the debt in Canada is $40.95; the debt in the other case is $26. I think the hon. gentleman will admit that is about 50 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a good deal more. But your population returns are entirely wrong.

Mr. WHITE. Oh, well, of course, I have no doubt the hon. gentleman will make the population returns of Canada, for the purposes of comparison, less than they are according to the last census. I prefer to take the population as I have put them; and if the hon. gentleman chooses to make a difference of one or two millions either way, or to call the population of Canada one or two hundred thousand less than it is, I still venture to say that he will have difficulty in showing that the debt of Canada is 200 per cent. greater per capita than the debt of the United States. But the hon. gentleman forgets the State debts of the United States. He forgets that altogether; he forgets, Mr. Speaker, that there are $270,000,000 of State debts in the United States, in comparison with which Canada has nothing to show, except the greatly reduced debt of the Province of Quebec. He excludes these State debts altogether in dealing with that subject. If the hon. gentleman will take the State debts in, he will find, after all, that the debt of Canada is, per capita, somewhere about 35 per cent., instead of 200 per cent., greater than the debt of the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. What are the State debts of the United States ?

Mr. WHITE. $270,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Quebec alone owes about $20,000,000.

Mr. WHITE. Oh no, not at present. The hon. gentleman, unfortunately, does not learn much. He gets hold of an old figure which seems to tell against the country, and he never loses it. He forgets that the debt has been reduced largely by the sale of the railways since that time. He forgets all that, and having once heard that the debt of the Province of Quebec was between $18,000,000 and $20,000,000, he hugs that little fact as a sweet morsel to be paraded everywhere with the view of depreciating the credit of his country. Now, Sir, as to the State debts, what are the facts. The hon. gentleman tells us that the taxation of the United States is 50 per cent. greater. Now, I take the Customs and Inland Revenues of the United States, and I find that they are $293,970,664; I take those of Canada, and I find them to be $25,384,529. I find, therefore, that the per capita taxation in the United States arising out of Customs and Inland Revenues, is $5.25, and in Canada $5.40, and if the hon. gentleman can make 50 per cent. more out of that, then he is a better arithmetician than I take him to be.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I said the necessary taxation; I did not say that the total taxation was that.

Mr. WHITE. Then, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman chooses to go to the necessary taxation, I have no doubt we can deal with him upon that subject, too.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very well, deal then.

Mr. WHITE. I take, for instance, the State taxation, which I think ought to be dealt with, the direct State taxation, in relation to which we have nothing corresponding with it in Canada, and what do we find? The State taxation last year was $65,250,000, or $1.16 per capita, making the direct taxation of the United States from Customs and Inland Revenues, as to the Federal Government, and from direct taxation on land, chiefly, as to the State Governments, $6.41 per capita, and the taxation in Canada $5.40; and yet they tell us that the taxation in Canada is 50 per cent. greater than that in the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do, most decidedly.

Mr. WHITE. I take another view of it. The hon. gentleman will at least not deny, though he may choose to ignore the State taxation, but he will at least permit us to deduct from this taxation to which he refers in Canada, the subsidies to the Provinces. That is certainly not an unfair thing to ask of him. The Federal Government in the United States does not furnish the State authorities with the means of carrying on their local government, as we do to a large extent in Canada. Now, if he will do that, he will find that the taxation of Canada is $4.57 against $5.25 in the United States, and yet he tells us that the taxation in Canada is 50 per cent. greater than that in the United States. But, Sir, I do not see why, if the hon. gentleman is anxious to deal with the question of taxation in Canada as compared with other countries, he does not take countries which stand in somewhat the same position, which started out, practically, under substantially the same conditions. Why should he take the United States as a parallel instead of selecting, for instance, the Australian colonies, to whose prosperity he bore testimony the other night? Now, one would be surprised to learn that the Australian colonies are exceedingly prosperous in spite of the facts which I am just going to state as to their debt and taxation, and that Canada because of its debt and taxation is to be denounced as an almost God-forsaken country which people who desire happiness had better avoid than come to. I take the Australian colonies, the whole Australasian group, and I find the population—according to the Statesman's Year Book, the last issue, which reached here a day or two ago—is 3,361,455. I find the aggregate debt is £121,104,583 sterling, or over $175 per capita. If I take some of the individual members of that group of colonies, the position is still more startling. I take South Australia, and if I mistake not, the hon. gentleman bore his testimony to the wonderful prosperity of South Australia, and undertook to tell us that the taxation there was very much less than it was in Canada. I find the debt of South Australia is $245 per capita; of New Zealand $290; of Queensland $260, while the debt per capita of Canada is $41. And yet the hon. gentleman, because there appears no special object in depreciating the character of the Australian colonies—he reserves all that for Canada, his own country—admits they are prosperous, in spite of the fact that in some of those colonies the taxation per capita is six times what it is in Canada. The hon. gentleman will probably answer me that a large part of that debt was put into public works; that they have the telegraph and railway systems; that they have built the railways and operate the telegraph lines, and they receive from the operation of those two great sources sufficient to pay interest on their cost, and that therefore they are not to be charged in any way with this large debt. Why, Sir, they happen, with their railways, to have complete control of the railway system of the colonies. They can make their rates to suit themselves. There is no question of competition, such as exists in Canada, and I should like the hon. gentleman to say whether the people of Canada would be any the richer if, for instance, the Grand Trunk and Inter-colonial Railways were in such a position that they could charge passenger and freight rates sufficient to enable them to pay 4 per cent. on the capital cost of those enterprises. The people would simply pay in another way, they would simply pay in their passenger travel and freight transport instead of paying as they do now as an incident of the taxation of the country through the Customs and Excise. And therefore there is nothing whatever in the argument, having regard to the burdens on the people, that the people of Australasia have invested their money in those great public enterprises and in working them have charged sufficient to enable them to pay 4 per cent. on the investments they have made. But, Sir, it is a curious fact that the only parties on whom the increase on our public debt and expenditure appears to have a depressing effect are hon. gentlemen opposite. With the great investing public outside, with the people who after all have a very strong interest in determining what the prospects and position of the country are, we find this remarkable fact: that since the hon. gentleman left office, and I do not say this because he left office, but take the period since he left office—although judging by the condition of things while he was in office, I might almost, I think, if I were disposed to deal with him as he deals with hon. gentlemen on this side, say because he left office—taking the period since that time, what do we find? The interest on the public debt to-day is $7,476,942. If the rate of interest was the same as when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, the amount would be $9,132,957; so that by the increased credit of the country, by the increased and greater confidence of investors in the present and future position of Canada, we make an annual saving, having regard to the amount of our debt, of $1,655,015 as compared with what the interest would be if our credit had remained as it was when hon. gentlemen opposite were on the Treasury benches. Under these circumstances, I think, I may very fairly say that that is a sufficient answer to the statement of the hon. gentleman, and we, on this side of the House, may at least take courage from the fact that all the wails, all the pessimistic wails of hon. gentlemen during the last six years have had so little effect that we have actually had the opportunity of expending $31,000,000 without paying one single sixpence of interest, taking the rate of interest now and what it was when the hon. member for South Huron was in office. Then the hon. gentleman repeated his old story about emigration, and told us the country was losing its population; that there were 900,000 Canadians—I think he made the number a great many more than that; if I mistake not, millions—settled in the United States, and that that was in some way due to the conduct of this Government and the policy of this Government. I notice that the hon. gentleman did not make any very special reference to the immigration statistics of the United States. I notice for the first time during a good many years that we heard nothing of Port Huron statistics, those statistics of which we used to hear, which used to be cited to us as the infallible guide by which to determine the movements of population between the two countries. The hon. gentleman had not a word to say about them. Why? The officer who had charge of our Immigration Department for the last three or four years mathematically proved that those statistics were all wrong; and now we find that the highest possible authority on the subject, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, has come to the same conclusion, and in this remarkable circular he orders that the statistics be discontinued altogether on the ground that they are utterly unreliable:

“WASHINGTON, D. C., 20th Feb., 1886.

“To Collectors and other Officers of the Customs:

“Since it appears to be impracticable to procure under the existing laws accurate statistics of the immigration arriving in the United States from the British North American Provinces and Mexico, you are hereby directed to discontinue collecting the statistics of such immigration until otherwise directed.

(Signed) “DANIEL MANNING,

“Secretary of the Treasury.”

We shall hear, I suppose, no more in relation to that matter. But the hon. gentleman did continue to deal with the question of emigration from Canada to the United States. Sir, there can be no doubt whatever that there has been Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

emigration from Canada to the United States, just as there has been immigration from the United States into Canada. In all our cities and towns, in all our manufacturing establishments, you will find Americans who come here because they think, for the time being, they can do better, and you will find Canadians in all parts of the United States. That migratory spirit which appears to prevail in such a remarkable degree in new countries, and on this continent particularly, has had its influence here undoubtedly; but when I tell the hon. gentleman—and I have given the figures on a former occasion in this House, and will not repeat them here now—that no less than five States of the Union have lost more of their native-born population than the Provinces of Canada have done, I think I may fairly say that that emigration, regrettable as it may be, much as we may regret that Canadians have gone to the United States instead of remaining in Canada, that emigration has, after all, been simply in accordance with the movement of population which has been going on in all parts of this great continent. Sir, it is only comparatively within the last few years that we have had a great west to which the people could go. The United States have had their great west for years past. That remarkable western development which has made the United States the great country that it is to-day, I believe we shall witness in Canada, and I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman, if he lives—as I sincerely trust he may—for a few years longer, will find the movement of population, now beginning from such States as Wisconsin and some of the New England States into our western territories, going on into those new territories as it has been going on from the Eastern States into their new territories for years past. Sir, we have no ground of discouragement whatever to base upon the fact that the population, in the ordinary movement of population, has found its way to the United States. We have no reason to ground upon that fact an attack upon the country such as the hon. gentleman has made. Sir, the hon. gentleman, however, told us that our policy in its relation to the North-West had been injurious to that country. He told us that the people had been driven from our great west, that the people were prevented from going there because of the National Policy and the burdens of taxation which he said were incident to the National Policy. Well, what are the facts? It is quite true that some of the people in the North-West complained of the duty on agricultural implements as being too high. But, Sir, every year since that duty was imposed the place of American implements has been taken by Canadian implements, the price has been going steadily down, so that to-day the people of the North-West can obtain implements manufactured by Canadians at as low a rate as they could get them in the United States, with the ordinary revenue duty of the hon. gentleman added, because in all such cases you must remember that the hon. gentleman does not pretend that there shall not be a revenue duty; at any rate, his was 17½ per cent., and taking that as an ordinary revenue duty they get their implements at as low a price to-day as they could get them in the United States with that duty added. But is there nothing in connection with the National Policy for which our friends in the North-West have reason to be thankful? Is there nothing in it to benefit them? What of the duty on wheat? What is going on to-day in connection with it? Every one knows that the great millers of Canada are compelled to use western wheat. The complaint they made to us last year that the duty on western wheat was higher than the corresponding duty on flour, and, therefore, they were being legislated against, was based on the fact that they must have this western wheat. Sir, they can get western wheat off our own lands in the North-West, and the 15 cents a bushel duty which is imposed by this tariff on American wheat secures to the farmer of Canada and the North-West, and will even to a greater extent in the future as the area of cultivation increases in our North-West, secure to our people there a market among Canadian millers for the sale of their wheat. I venture to say that there is not a farmer in the North-West to-day who does not realise that he has been greatly advantaged by the policy which imposed this duty on American wheat. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman tells us that they have been injured because of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that the Canadian Pacific Railway is a huge monopoly, that it is doing injury to the North-West instead of benefit. Why, Sir, every hon. gentleman must know that without the Canadian Pacific Railway settlement in the North-West would be impossible. Every hon. gentleman who cares to investigate the matter will find that, so far from their being a monopoly, the ordinary rates for wheat and agricultural produce generally on the Canadian Pacific Railway are 10 and 15 per cent. less than the rates on the Northern Pacific running through a more thickly populated country, but with conditions somewhat similar to the Canadian Pacific Railway. They will find that the price of wheat in our North West, as a consequence partly of the duty which secures to the Manitoba and North-West farmer a Canadian market for his wheat, partly and to a larger extent by the lower freight rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway, that the average price of wheat along the line of that railway has been very considerably higher than in the corresponding district through which the Northern Pacific runs, and that so far from there being any question of injury to the North-West because of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that road is developing the North West, is affording an outlet for the products of the North-West and an inlet for the settlers who are going in there, and that it is, in fact, the one thing above all others in relation to which I think this Government may fairly pride itself as having accomplished through the gentlemen who have mainly been instrumental in constructing the railway, an important work for the progress of the country. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman tells us that the census is most disappointing in relation to the North-West. The hon. gentleman ought to remember, when he compares the census of 1881 with the census now taken, that a large portion of what was then the North-West is now within the Province of Manitoba; that the North-West proper begins at a pretty considerable distance from what was formerly the western boundary of Manitoba, and that the population which is to be found now, with the exception of small groups at Prince Albert and Edmonton, and a small population in the Qu'Appelle valley—so far as the white population is concerned, indeed, I may almost say excepting the settlements at Prince Albert and Edmonton—the whole population of the North-West, whatever it is, has gone in there since the Canadian Pacific Railway made it possible for the people to go into that country. So that whether the population be large or small, whether the census be gratifying or disappointing, to the extent, at any rate, of the population of that country west of the present boundary of Manitoba, it has been brought there in consequence of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, there is no doubt whatever that there has been some disappointment in connection with the North-West. There is no doubt whatever that a good many farmers—and I speak now from practical knowledge acquired from personal communication with the farmers of the North West in all parts of it—there is no doubt whatever that many of them went in there with exceedingly false notions— notions, perhaps, justified by the general discussions which were taking place at the time, but false notions, as the result has turned out, with regard to that country. They went in with the idea that they had only to tickle the soil and immediately crops of wheat would spring up. They went in with the idea of manufacturing wheat; that was the only thought of a large number of those who went in. But better sentiment, the result of larger experience and more matured knowledge, is now springing up. We find that everywhere in the North-West to-day the best farmers who are there are realising the fact that farming in the North-West is like farming everywhere else, that the conditions are substantially the same, and that good and careful cultivation and mixed farming are the conditions of success from one end of that country to the other. This fact having come to the people, they are to-day realising it, and realising it in a sense which, I believe, is largely going to promote the prosperity of the country, as well as the individual prosperity of the settlers themselves. Under these circumstances, I have no doubt whatever that in the very early future we shall see a very largely increased immigration into that country, as well as a very largely increased prosperity to those already in it. Already this spring the immigrants are beginning to go in, some from the Old World, and some from Ontario, who, in spite of the stories of hon. gentlemen opposite, still have confidence in that country, and still feel that they can go there with the certainty of making prosperous homes for themselves in the future. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman in the course of his speech, made some general attacks upon the Government of the country. He charged the Government with general corruption, and he charged hon. members on this side of House with being influenced by bribes and favors from the Government. He spoke of colonisation companies, of railway subsidies, of timber lands, of grazing leases; and he undertook to leave the impression that corruption was rampant, and that the Government of the day was supported, not by independent supporters elected by independent constituencies in sympathy with the political views of the Government, but by a number of gentlemen who gave their support simply in consideration of favors extended to them by the Government. Well, Sir, let me refer for a moment or two to these charges. First as to colonisation companies. I have no hesitation in saying that personally I never had confidence in the financial success of colonisation companies. I believed that the policy was one wisely adapted, if the conditions could be carried out, for enlisting gentlemen of capital, as they have done in the United States, in the settlement and development of the country. But Sir, will any person pretend to say that there was any question of corruption connected with that policy? Will any person pretend to say that the political opinions were asked of any gentlemen who came and applied for lands as a colonisation company? I believe the brother of the leader of the Opposition was a director of one of these colonisation companies, and he had a right to be; and if it had succeeded, he would probably had done good for the country, and I am sure we should all have rejoiced if he had done good for himself. But there never was any question of favor in connection with colonisation companies in any form or shape. I may say that I prevented some friends in my own constituency from going into colonisation companies; if the suggestions of hon. gentlemen opposite were accepted, I should find myself branded for asking favors for friends in connection with colonisation companies, because of letters written to the Department at the very moment that I was persuading them, and successfully persuading them, to abandon the enterprise, because I thought there was no money in it. But there never was any question of corruption. No man can put his finger on a case where a number of gentlemen came to ask for the allotment of lands for colonisation purposes, and their politics was enquired into, or any of them were asked to what side of the House their sympathies belonged. Then the hon. gentleman complains that railway subsidies have been granted. All I can say is that the railway subsidies have been granted by Parliament, and if the hon. gentleman will ask those who sit about him what they think of the implied charge that the granting of those railway subsidies was an act of corruption, I venture to say that he will hear from them in a manner that will not be pleasant for him. Why, there was not a single case of a railway subsidy brought down which was not supported in large numbers by the hon. gentleman's own friends, and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in particular, in a noted instance, left the House rather than vote against the proposed subsidy. That is the position in regard to the policy of granting railway subsidies—a policy adopted wisely or unwisely we are not discussing at this moment, but adopted with a view to the development of the country, and in so far as it has been successful in securing the construction of railways, it has tended and will tend to that result. Then the hon. gentleman talks of timber limits. As we are promised a discussion on that subject, I will not at this moment anticipate that discussion; but what is the fact? That while there were from 1880 down to the present time 2,300 or 2,500 applications for timber limits, only 56 leases were granted, which shows how much the Government were influenced in that regard. Now, as I said the other night, it cannot be an act of corruption to apply for timber limits, and the fact that an application has been refused or is not considered is, I should say, rather an evidence that the Government is not corrupt than that an application shows them to be corrupt. Timber limits are granted under a public policy which anybody is at liberty to take advantage of, and until the hon. gentleman can show that any of his friends asked for a timber limit and was refused it because of his politics, he is not in a position to complain, especially as in the overwhelming majority of cases limits were not granted, and in the few cases in which they were they were granted not to gentlemen in the House, but to business men out of the House, and they have tended to produce a supply of lumber in the North-West which is greatly to the advantage of the settlers going into that country. Then there is the question of grazing leases. Well, Sir, I am glad to say that we are giving grazing leases every day. I am glad to say that the interest in the western portion of our territories on the slope of the Rocky Mountains, is becoming so great, that the ranchmen from Montana, Texas, and other western portions of the United States are coming into our territory under our policy, bringing their herds with them, expending their money in this country, and developing this enterprise which is of immense value to the whole country.

Mr. CHARLTON. Do you put up the ranches at competition, and get the highest price possible?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell.) The hon. gentleman asks if we put up the ranches at competition? I will tell the hon. gentleman what we do. We do not give the lands at all. The policy of the Department with regard to grazing leases is this: A man or a company applies for a grazing lease,—and we do not grant more than 100,000 acres; the average lease is, I suppose, 50,000 or 60,000 acres. Formerly the charge was 1 cent an acre; now it is 2 cents an acre; we have recently increased the price, because the number of applications indicated that we could do so. But we insert in every lease this clause, that no settler shall be kept off the land by the fact of its being leased, so that that whole country is to-day open for settlement; and the moment a man goes in and takes up his homestead and pre-emption, that 320 acres is excluded from the ranch-holders' lease. In the United States the plan they adopt is this, the ranchman and his men very often come in and take up homesteads. In that way they secure an area, comparatively small, but sufficient for their purposes, and their headquarters being arranged, then, without any lease or anything else, they allow their herds to scatter over the whole prairie, without saying "by your leave" to the Government in any form or shape. On the other hand, under our policy, the ranchman defines his lease and pays his annual rental, but his lease is of such a character that any settler can go in and take up land just as if there was no leaseholder on it at all; so that, while securing to the Government a large revenue from the leases, while encouraging the enormous enterprise and industry and expenditure connected with the development of cattle-raising in the North-West, we have, at the same time, left the country open for settlement, just as if there was not a ranchman there at all. Will anyone pretend to say there is anything wrong in that? Then, as to competition to lease ranches, if two persons happen to apply for the same lease, we ask them each to tender a bonus, and the highest tender gets the lease; and in a considerable number of cases bonuses have thus been obtained and paid to the Government. The policy is an open one. The hon. gentleman himself may get a rancho to-morrow if he likes to apply for one and complies with the conditions; if he thinks he can make money out of cattle-raising, let him go in, and he will find no difficulty, so far as the Department is concerned, because I can assure the hon. gentleman there is no question of favor or politics in connection with granting those leases. Hon. gentlemen have, as an evidence of corruption, been good enough to read, as the hon. gentleman did the other night, letters addressed by hon. members of this House to the Department of the Interior, in connection with timber limits or grazing leases or anything of that kind. All I can say is, that if the writing of a letter to the Department asking the Department to forward the application of any gentleman who may have applied for a lease or limit, or in connection with other matters under the control of the Department, is to be held an act of corruption, some hon. gentlemen opposite have, since I have been in the Department, written such letters. I am glad to receive their letters, and I can assure those hon. gentlemen that their letters will have just as much attention in relation to the business of the Department, as if they came from hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Every member of Parliament knows that, in the very nature of things, he is called upon to write letters of that kind. Those letters are no evidence of corruption, either on the part of the writers or the Department. They are simply the ordinary means of communication which are used perpetually between men who, being public men, are supposed, on both sides of the House, to have the ear of the Department, and who simply ask the Department to forward certain applications. The result of these letters and of the applications is to be found in the practical operations of the Department in connection with these matters. Then the hon. gentleman finally made his usual attack upon the Canadian Pacific Railway. He told us that the Canadian Pacific Railway, while apparently a prosperous concern, was actually a very doubtful concern, in so far as the character of its securities was concerned. He had just heard from the Finance Minister that the Government had arranged, so far as the Government could arrange, subject to the decision of Parliament, with the Canadian Pacific Railway for the repayment of the loan which the latter had obtained from the Government. He knew that that involved negotiations on the other side; he knew that it involved the placing of the bonds of the Canadian Pacific Railway upon the English market; and as if to prevent the success of that scheme—just as last year when the late Finance Minister had gone to England to put a loan upon the English market—he made one of his speeches here, calculated, if anything he said could produce the result, to injure the estimation in which Canadian securities are held in England. He did this, knowing that the Canadian Pacific Railway was going to the English market to negotiate their bonds with the view of completing the arrangement to pay back to the people of Canada the money they borrowed. He made a speech which—if anything he said in this House, if he spoke less extravagantly than, happily, in the interests of the country he does—would possibly prevent success in the negotiations the Canadian Pacific Railway are about to make. Was that a fair, was that a patriotic course? Was it a course calculated to benefit the country or any interest of the country? Could it possibly be to the hon. gentleman's own interest that this enterprise should fall from the high position it to-day happily holds in the minds of investors in England? But the extraordinary thing is this, that after telling us that the enterprise was of doubtful character, after doing the best he could to destroy its securities, after intimating that the cost of working this long section north of Lake Superior and the section through the Rockies was likely to make the road a loss instead of a profit to the company, he then complained that the Government do not own the road and are not bound to run it at a loss. If the Canadian Pacific Railroad is the enterprise which the hon. gentleman, in the desperation of despair which seems to get hold of him whenever he comes to deal with the public affairs of Canada, says it is; if it is in the condition he depicts, worked as it is by some of the ablest railway men on the continent, worked on commercial principles, worked as, with all deference to the ability of my colleague the Minister of Railways, I do not believe any Government could work it, what has this Government not gained to the country by securing the construction of the railway and relieving the country from the loss of working an enterprise of that kind? I can well understand the chagrin of hon. gentlemen at the announcement made by the Finance Minister, I can well understand their chagrin at the fact, that their last prediction in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway has proved to be a false one. What do we find? From the very first hon. gentlemen opposite have been prophesying evil things in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. We were told, in the first instance, that the company would be simply a construction company, who would go to work and build the railway, and having completed it, in some form or other, and gobbled up all the subsidies, they would abandon it and let the country take it. The result has shown that that statement, at any rate, is not correct. Then we were told that the company would build simply the prairie section, take the large subsidies given for that section, and, having taken them, and built that paying part of the road, and finding it impossible to go on, they would come to Parliament and beg to be relieved from the necessity of constructing the difficult portion north of Lake Superior and through the Rocky Mountains. Well, Sir, that prediction has proved to be false. We have found the Canadian Pacific Railway Company not only honestly fulfilling its obligations with respect to the construction of the railway, but doing that in advance of the contract, and we stand here to-day at the beginning of 1886, with a railway completed from one end to the other, so far as the laying of the rails is concerned, and to be absolutely completed, as to running through British Columbia from the 1st June next, a railway completed which the company were not bound to complete for four years to come. Then the hon. gentleman told us that they would build an inferior road, and we remember the description of the contract given by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, with that minuteness of detail which characterises him in addressing the House, but which, having the fear of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) before his eyes, it may be hoped he will abandon in the future, to some extent at least; we remember how he described the condition of the Union Pacific, when it was first built, how he told us that they were going to build simply a prairie railway, that they would put down their rails and their ties, and do it in the flimsiest way, that they would pocket the money and would hand over to the Government an unfinished railway. That has also proved to be a false prophecy. The railway to-day, in the estimation of the hon. gentlemen themselves, or those who have travelled over it, in the estimation of the late leader of the Government, who sent that generous telegram to Mr. Stephen, now Sir George Stephen, after he had travelled over the road, is amongst the best railways, both as to construction and equipment, on the North American continent. Then we were told, when the combination of opposition to the railway sprung up, when the first partners of that enterprise, the American partners of the company, found that the company were going honestly to fulfil their contract, when they found that they were not going to do what hon. gentlemen opposite predicted they were going to do, when they found that they were not only going to build the prairie section, but also that portion north of Lake Superior, which makes this enterprise a Canadian enterprise, a national enterprise, instead of a mere continuation of an American system, when they used their best efforts, unfortunately too successfully, to prevent the sale of the securities of the company, so that they were unable to go on, and the Government came to their assistance on their giving what the Government considered good security, by granting them a loan of $30,000,000 in one year, and $5,000,000 in the next year, that we were told that that was money thrown away, that that was practically a gift, and that the people of Canada would never see a dollar of it. And in all the speeches they have been making from one end of the country to the other, they have been assuming this $30,000,000 as a gift to the company, as part of the subsidies paid to the company; while to-day they find that the $5,000,000 which was loaned last year, although the company were not bound to pay it until the 1st of July next, was repaid to the Government within two months after the prorogation of Parliament, and that, of the $30,000,000, $20,000,000 is to be repaid in cash and $10,000,000 in lands; so that the end of all connection between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is approaching, except as to that $5,000,000 which we still retain, and will retain—although it seems unnecessary in view of the facts surrounding the road—as a security for the running of the railway. But the hon. gentleman tells us that they are giving us back our own lands. That certainly is a new doctrine. The 25,000,000 acres of land were as much part of the subsidy as the $25,000,000, and the land, having been earned by the construction of the railway, was as much their land as the homestead of any settler in the North-West, who, by fulfilling the conditions of homesteading, has got his patent from the Government, is his. They give us back the lands and the result of the whole thing is that we see this enterprise completed, within the terms originally agreed upon, four years before the company were bound to finish it, and that for a subsidy, taking the estimate of the hon. gentlemen opposite as to the value of the land subsidy, far less than they told us, at any rate, it would amount to when we were giving that $25,000,000 and those 25,000,000 acres of land for its construction. Under these circumstances, I think I may say that it is easy to see why, standing in the presence of a record of that kind, the hon. gentleman should feel so chagrined that he gives his last parting shot to the Canadian Pacific Railway in an effort to kill the securities of the company and to prevent the success of the negotiations in which the people of Canada are so much interested. Finally, the hon. gentleman made his usual attack upon the people. He attacked, as I have said, the Government; he attacked, as I have said, the country itself; he attacked the Canadian Pacific Railway, and then he wound up with his usual attack upon the people themselves, denouncing them as people lost to all sense of high honor, as people morally blind, and why? Because after an experience of five years of the hon. gentleman's administration of the affairs of this country, they declined to entrust him any further with that position; and because they did that at two general elections, and have since been expressing the same opinions at bye elections—a fact which was emphasised in the most extraordinary manner by the introduction of new members which took place at the opening of this Session. The hon. gentleman mistakes the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman forgets that the people of Canada are an intelligent people. He forgets the fact that the people of Canada are every year taking a more intense interest in the public affairs of the country. He forgets that the people of Canada are an observing people, who see what is going on about them. They had an opportunity of seeing Liberal rule for five years. They saw depreciation of every industry in the country; they saw the lessening of the value of bank stocks; they saw the lessening of the value of securities; they saw the lessening of the savings of the people; they saw all these things, and, although they made representations to the hon. gentleman, although they implored him almost upon their knees—his best political friends—to do something at any rate to mitigate, if he could not remove, the depression which existed, nothing was done. They saw all those things during those five years; and, after that experience, they said to the hon. gentleman the moment they had the opportunity: "Go, Sir, into the cold shades, and give place to men who, at least, will have some respect for the opinions of the people of the country." They have since seen industries developed, they have seen commerce both domestic and foreign improving, they have seen great public works carried to completion, they have seen the continent spanned by a railway on conditions which I venture to say will not prove onerous to the people, but will prove an important and valuable investment for the people, they have seen the savings of the people enormously increased, and they have seen all this done while taxation, as to its incidence, has not been increased, and they have seen, with all this, a party willing to listen to representations that may be made to them, willing to study where knowledge can best be obtained from those engaged in industries, from those who are familiar with those industries themselves and may therefore be assumed to know something about them. They have seen a party in power which, at least, has extended the courtesy of believing that the business men of the country know their own business, and they have made up their minds that they will continue in power, as far as one can see from the indications given up to this time, the hon. gentlemen they have placed there by so large a majority at the last election. Sir, I believe as much as I believe anything, that there never was a time in Canada when there was a more intense interest in public affairs on the part of the people of the country; I believe there never was a time when, on the part of the young men of the country especially—the young men, to whom the future is full of hope and who are not willing to have that hope blasted by the presence of pessimists upon the Treasury benches—when these young men were taking so great an interest in the progress of the country; there never was a time when the independent element, if I may so speak, who have not a strong political bias on either side, but who look to the interest of the country alone, were so numerous and so influential, not only in expression of their opinion, but in the influence which those opinions must have upon the Government and the country. For one, Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that I believe this Government depends for its success, depends for its continuance in power, upon the wise and mature judgment of those independent thinkers, and of those young men who are looking into the future with so much hope. I believe, Sir, that the Canadian sentiment—which is not in any way opposed to loyalty to the British Crown—that Canadian sentiment which is growing so strongly among the people of Canada, that Canadian sentiment which seeks the progress and prosperity of Canada, will, in the future as it has done in the past, extend to the Government that is now in power, that generous support upon which they have until now relied, and relied with so much confidence and success.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It has been very pleasant to me to listen to my hon. friend opposite, and to observe the righteous indignation which possessed him as he surveyed the late Finance Minister. He could hardly find words strong enough to describe his opinion of that hon. gentleman, or of the expressions to which he had given utterance. He seemed to labor under the impression that my hon. friend on this side had, in the remarks he had felt it his duty to make on this subject, said something that tended to belittle his country, that his object and his aim seemed to be to decry the land in which he lived. But my hon. friend has entirely mistaken the intent and meaning of the expression of the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). If he would read that speech carefully, or if he had listened to it carefully, he would find that the hon. member for South Huron spoke of our country as a good country, as a pleasant country, as a country of great possibilities, and the language of denunciation, when my hon. friend used that language, was not denunciation of the country, but it was denunciation of the men who, with such a magnificent country, with such great possibilities before it, had nevertheless so completely paralysed its energies. The hon. gentleman makes the mistake of supposing that he and his colleagues are the country. Now there never was a greater mistake than that. There was a country here before the hon. gentlemen occupied seats on the Treasury benches. I think there was a country in many respects more prosperous than it has been since they have taken their places there, and when I say that, I speak, of course, comparatively. The hon. gentlemen opposite seem content when they can point to an increase in any particular industry. If they can point to a slight increase in the volume of trade as compared with what it was five, or six, or eight years ago, when my hon. friend was Minister of Finance, they say: See where your statements are. Why, we actually have two or three millions more volume of trade now than we had seven years ago. Do they not know that we, on this side of the House, believe that we have a country that ought to be able to show the slight progress that has been made? Sir, we believe that we have a country that should have taken leaps and bounds almost infinitely greater than it has taken under them. Hon. gentlemen opposite think they have fulfilled all the duties of their position, that they deserve credit for well managing the affairs of this country, if they can prevent us going on the down grade—we, with millions and tens of millions of acres of land, inviting settlers of other countries; we, who have spent two or three millions of money in inducing immigrants from other countries to come here! After all this they point to the result of their management for a period of six or seven years, and claim that we have actually maintained our own natural increase in the country. What a great record! how the gentlemen boast! Well, they know they are not capable of much, and they are to be excused for boasting of little. Now let my hon. friend bear that in mind, and all like him on the other side, that when words are spoken here with reference to the position of the country it could not possibly be with the object of damaging the country thereby, but they are spoken with the sole purpose that this country of ours shall have an opportunity of purging itself from the incapables, as we believe them to be, who are administering the affairs of the country, and that other gentlemen should replace them who will take off the fetters that have been placed upon the country, and will give it an opportunity to go forward, not merely holding its own, but leaping forward, as it is calculated to do, this country that, in its proportions, resembles those of a young giant that needs but to be aroused from his slumbers in order to manifest his strength. That is the country we have, and when we complain that we have not increased more, and when we are forced to point out by comparisons that such is the state of the country, it is ever done in the spirit in which the member for South Huron did it, and a spirit more of sorrow than of anger that the country should be thus imposed upon. Well, now, I will not attempt to follow my hon. friend in all the statements he has made, but I will touch upon some points he has alluded to, and I think I shall be able to present another view of the question. He has touched upon public debt, has dwelt largely upon that, and has endeavored to controvert the position taken by the hon. member for South Huron. He speaks of our national debt as if it were not a matter of great consequence. He tells us that the interest upon our national debt is not a great deal more now than it was some years ago, and he claims that the reason why we are not paying much more interest now than we did a few years ago, is owing to the excellent management of affairs by the present Government. They take to themselves the whole credit of having reduced the rate of interest throughout the world. Yet, I suppose, hon. gentlemen opposite, although we might suppose from some of their utterances they feigned ignorance, would not care really to admit such ignorance as not to be cognisant of the fact that the rate of interest is low at the present time everywhere. While it must be admitted that such is the case, they have the supreme effrontery to claim it is due to the action of the Government during recent years, whereby a loan can be placed on the money market at a lower rate of interest now than was the case eight or ten years ago. I am not overstating their case. The Finance Minister, when speaking on this subject, gave us distinctly to understand that it was due to that cause, and that cause alone; that it was the management of the affairs of the country by hon. gentlemen opposite that produced that state of affairs; for he went on to argue, and he gave statistics in support of his argument, that the rate of interest in the Bank of England had not gone down, and, therefore, as the rate of interest on our loans had fallen, the result was due to them. The hon. gentleman forgot to tell the House, that the United States could borrow money at far lower rates than the Dominion, I am sorry to say, and that many other nations are able to do so; but he claimed that their management of the affairs of this country had alone brought about a lower rate of interest. Let us look at the national debt; let us examine where we are. What is the national debt of Canada to-day? We have it in figures given to us by the Finance Minister, and I invite the attention of the House to them and through the House the attention of the country. Our gross debt on 1st March, 1886, was $281,314,532. But the Finance Minister told us we had assets to the value of $72,791,837, leaving a net debt of $208,522,695. Now, I make the per capita amount $45. The hon. gentleman who preceded me said it was $40.70. We must have taken a little different basis for the calculation, I fancy. However, the net debt as given by the Finance Minister was on 1st March, taking the population at 4,700,000, on which we shall both agree, was equal to about $45 per head. But in dealing with this question members of the House—and if members of the House it must be more so with the people of the country—are lost in the contemplation of it. A statement of so much per head does not strike the people as forcibly as if we took another test, to which I now address myself. There are in many of the counties of Ontario, and I suppose in the counties of the other Provinces, municipal debts. These have been incurred for the purpose of constructing railways through the counties. Bonuses have been voted, and the interest upon the bonuses are being collected year by year, and the burden is annually felt by the people, and in many cases is thought to be very heavy. Let me state the amount of debt that this Government has placed upon the counties, and let the people realise the fact that, though they may not realise and fairly appreciate the burden on account of the manner in which the taxes are collected, yet each riding has to pay annually, as their share of the public burden, the interest on no less than $988,259. Let each riding in this country remember that this is their share of the public debt, and when I am speaking of that I am speaking of the net debt, and I am for the moment granting, which I do not grant, that the $72,000,000 are all available and interest-bearing assets, which is not the case; but to make my position perfectly impregnable, I take the net debt, giving credit for all assets available and interest-bearing, and each riding in the Dominion has a burden upon it, in addition to all other burdens imposed by the municipality itself, of $988,259. But there are some counties that have two ridings, and on each county large enough to be divided in two, the debt is $1,976,511, or nearly two millions on every county of two ridings as their share of the Dominion debt, the interest on which has to be toiled for by the people year by year and paid by them into the public Treasury. But some of our large counties are divided into three ridings, and on each of those counties—Simcoe, Huron, Bruce, York—there is a debt of $2,964,777. Let hon. gentlemen realise that fact, let them grasp in that form what the public debt of Canada means, and I think when they are next found addressing their constituents they will have to assume an air of greater seriousness in discussing the question of the public debt. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) said he did not object to expenditure if the money was well expended; and that is the position of the Opposition. If we had as a result of that debt something of value we could show, if the money had all been wisely and properly expended, then, great as the debt is, the development of the country through that means might have been such as to render the burden easy upon it. But will hon. gentlemen opposite claim that we have incurred all this debt wisely, that we have in the property available a sufficient asset to offset this amount of debt? What have we? We have the Intercolonial Railway, the last speaker told us. We have. Was all the debt incurred for that work well expended? Was there not a remark made by the late Minister of Finance himself on one occasion, that with regard to at least eight millions they might as well have been thrown into the sea, this being one of the results of the management of hon. gentlemen opposite. Has there not been extravagance in almost an endless variety of ways in the construction of that road, and will any one claim that we have sufficient value in that railway to represent all the money we expended on it. We find no fault with the road having been constructed, as it was a necessity; but we claim the road cost more than should have been required to build it, and that it does not represent in its value anything like the cost, and that the increased cost was incurred through the management of hon. gentlemen opposite, who were largely charged with that undertaking. Then we have our canals, as the hon. gentleman says. And so we have. But hon. gentlemen opposite will regret, with me, that they are not a source of very great revenue to the country; they will regret, with me, that we are not able to avail ourselves of the money invested therein to the extent we might feel justified in expecting. Then, says the hon. gentleman, we have the Canadian Pacific Railway. We have not got the Canadian Pacific Railway—there is just the mistake. The Finance Minister as well as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat dwelt with a great deal of enthusiasm upon the completion of that undertaking, and they seek to extol it and to claim that in that we have something which is very much to our benefit, something that worthily represents a large part of the public debt that was incurred in order to build it. Well, I trust that it may be a prosperous undertaking; I trust it may develop the country. We have paid enough for it; we could have had it much cheaper, and I believe we could have had all its advantages without many of the disadvantages which have accompanied its construction. But the money has been expended, and the country has been opened up to that extent by it, and we will only hope that we may reap some benefit from it in the future, that we may receive some recompense. But that does not shut our eyes to the fact that we might have accomplished that work in a much cheaper manner and under conditions which would have left the country freer to go forward in the march of progress.

An hon. MEMBER. Not with a bogus syndicate.

Mr. PATERSON. Not with a bogus syndicate an hon. gentleman tells us. He reminds me that at the very inception of this enterprise, millions of dollars of public money and millions of acres of public land were thrown away. He reminds me that if we had adopted the Government plan, prior to engaging the services of a company, if we are to take the statement of Sir Charles Tupper, who was then Minister of Railways, and the figures of the right hon. First Minister, we might have had the road built for millions and tens of millions less than we paid for it. If those statements and figures are to be relied on, we could have built the road and paid for it out of the proceeds of the lands sold up to 1890. The hon. gentleman, who has made the remark about the bogus syndicate, has simply reminded the House how exceedingly bad a bargain we made with this company, and I think, if he is candid, he will admit that we did not better ourselves much as the work progressed. We see, at any rate, that the public debt has mounted to such a figure that it behoves us to exercise the greatest caution as to how it shall be increased in the future. But let us now consider the annual expenditure. The Minister of Finance dwelt largely upon that point, but the hon. gentleman, who has followed to-day, has not devoted much attention to it, but passed it by very briefly. He seemed to be cognisant of the fact that we have arrived at a time, in the administration of our affairs, when deficits are upon us. It was not a pleasant subject to those who, in days gone by, so derided the Minister of Finance at that time, when, unfortunately, under a low rate of taxation, he was unable to make both ends meet. But what is the position of our finances, now with reference to our annual receipts and expenditures? Why, Sir, we find from the Public Accounts which are now before us, that we have for the fiscal year 1885, which is fully closed, an expenditure of over $35,000,000, with receipts of less than $33,000,000. We have the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite were unable, with all the excessive taxation they have levied on the people of this country, to make both ends meet, and they stand in their places to-day confessing to a deficit of $2,240,059. This, after all their boasts of their superior management; this, after the boasts of their surpluses; this, after their claims of being able so to regulate the affairs and finances of the country that deficits would be things which would no more be heard of in the land. And do they say that this state of things is only for one year? No, I am sorry to say if we take the financial year of 1886, which is not fully completed, the estimate of the receipts and expenditures for that year was given to us by the Finance Minister himself, and what is the tale that they tell? He says he estimates that our receipts will be $33,550,000, and that our expenditure will be $35,500,000. It is seven years since they last entered upon office, and our expenditure has run up from $24,000,000, until the Finance Minister told us that at the close of 1886 it will amount to $38,000,000. These are the gentlemen who claimed that they had the power, and who made pledges to the people of this country, that they would govern Canada with less money than was required by the late Finance Minister, and they sit in their places to-day with almost every promise they made to the people of this country, violated; with almost every pledge broken, unable to point to scarce a single thing they have done which has really been in the interests of the country or for which they can claim the slightest credit. No, there they are; the country is rushing headlong into debt and they are unable to keep their expenditure within their income, but they leave us with their anticipated deficit this year amounting to $4,950,000 as stated by the Finance Minister himself. O! but he is going to ease us in this, and how is he going to do it? Well, he is just going to take $3,500,000 of this deficit and charge it to capital account, and he is thus going to reduce the deficit to $1,450,000. Will placing it to capital account pay it? We generally suppose that what is placed to capital account is something for which we have assets to show; but what assets will we have for this $3,500,000? A partially blackened and ruined country, graves on the western prairie, the smoke of gunpowder, one or two knighthoods; and for this the people of the country are to have $3,500,000 added to their debt. There is remarkable consistency, however, in the hon. Finance Minister's treatment of this question to which I desire to call your attention. If you remember, he made rather a remarkable speech in the absence of the late Finance Minister, on the 28th of June last, in reply to a speech made on this side by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), who moved against the gross extravagance of the Government. The hon. member for South Huron pointed out thus early that at the rate the Government was proceeding a very great deficit was staring us in the face, and that it would be inevitable. The hon. Finance Minister in replying to that remark, said that the hon. member for South Huron had conjured up a deficit. He viewed it as simply an idea that was flying round in the brain of the hon. member for South Huron. But he said, even if it be true that there should be a deficit, the wedding bells are sounding, orange blossoms are being worn, and love is being made in the snows of winter and the sunshine of summer, and by-and-bye new homes will be starting up; by-and-bye new cradles will find their way to those new homes, to add to the 200,000 cradles that are now being rocked in this Dominion; and the occupants of these cradles will grow to manhood and womanhood, and they will bend their energies to the development of this country and help to pay the deficit which has been conjured up by the hon. member for South Huron. I say the Finance Minister has been consistent. I do not know whether he over-estimated the number of babies or not, but at any rate he has found out that that deficit was not conjured up in the brain of the hon. member for South Huron. He is face to face with it as an actual fact, and how is he going to proceed? Precisely as he gave us to understand in June last; $3,500,000 of it is to be charged to the occupants of the 200,000 cradles that are now being rocked throughout the Dominion. We of this generation will have to toil to pay the interest on it, and the generation, I will not say yet unborn, but the generation newly born, will rise up to bless him when they come to pay the principal. Such is the state of our finances under the management of these hon. gentlemen. I have not time to go into the details of this expenditure, as short speeches are to be the order from this time forth, and I must set an example in that respect. I have no time to show the increases for instance, in the cost of civil government, with regard to which hon. gentlemen opposite were so loud in their denunciations when they sat on this side of the House. But I will take the item of immigration, and I charge the Ministers of the day with having been utterly reckless in their expenditure of money for that purpose; I charge them with having squandered millions of the people's money without achieving any result whatever. I do it in the same spirit as the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright)—a spirit more of sorrow than of anger. I should rejoice if they could show some result from the expenditure of that money; but take the census returns prepared by hon. gentlemen opposite—not American statistics, but their own figures, and what do we find? Why, in this Canada of ours, which ought to be able to retain its own population within its borders, we find that during the last six years, when we ought to have had a natural increase of 20 per cent. on a moderate estimate, we had only an increase of 16 per cent.; and to achieve that result we spent, during those six years, $2,403,266. So that all the immigrants whom we have brought into the country have displaced native-born Canadians, or have left the country, and 4 per cent. of our natural increases have gone with them. That is the result that the hon. gentlemen opposite have been able to show from an expenditure of two millions and a half of our money. Now, I have stated what the immigration returns show we have got for this expenditure. We are in a position to speak a little more definitely this year than we have been hitherto with regard to the increase of population in the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories. Hitherto we have had to rely on estimated figures made by the Department of Agriculture which the Minister pledged to be correct. To-day we stand in the light of revealed facts ascertained by actual count in the country, and what do we find? I am sorry to say that the facts reveal a state of things which hon. gentlemen opposite in common with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House must regret. I say we have definite figures, because the Minister of Agriculture in answer to a question the other day, stated that the population of Manitoba was now 125,000. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), when he made his speech, gave an authority which he thought was a good authority, for the statement that the population of that Province was 110,000; but I take the Minister's statement of 125,000, which formed the basis for an arrangement between the Dominion and that Province, and which I therefore assume is correct. Then, we learn, by actual count, that the three districts of the North-West contain 48,363 souls; so that the total population in Manitoba and the three districts of the North-West, including Indians, is 173,363. Now, according to the census of 1881, the population in that country was 122,400. What is the result? In five years the population of our whole North-West and the Province of Manitoba has increased just 50,963 souls. That is the result of five years' labor; that is the result of the expenditure of nearly two millions and a half of dollars to promote immigration; that is the result of giving away tens of millions of dollars to aid the Canadian Pacific Railway;—a poor 50,963 extra souls above what were there in 1881 when the census was taken. Now, I want to call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to this. He should not be guilty of submitting reports to this House that are not correct; I think that is not asking too much of him; yet the various reports which he has submitted to us year by year show that the number of settlers who went into Manitoba and the North-West between 1881 and 1885 were 154,403, and there were already there at the time the census was taken 122,400. Now, if the reports submitted to the House by the head of that Department are correct, and they ought to be, we should have to-day in that country 276,803 souls; and what number have we? By actual count, by the statements of the hon. gentleman opposite, we have 173,363. No less than 103,440 souls alleged by them to have gone into the North-West cannot be found there. Where are they? Why, Sir, are we not forced to the conclusion that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, their management of North-West affairs, has driven from the sparse population of that territory over 103,000 souls within the past five years? They must take one horn or the other of the dilemma; they have either driven that number of people out of the country, or the reports they have submitted to this House have been false and misleading. The Minister of Agriculture is bound to account for these 103,440 people. But, Sir, have we any means of ascertaining what population we ought to have had in that country at this time? We have. In 1880 the First Minister gave us a calculation of the settlers we might expect to go there. He gave us a table showing that there were to be 30,000 in 1881, and 5,000 additional in each year afterwards; so that by the end of 1885 there would, according to his calculation, have gone into that country 200,000 souls. Now, those 200,000 souls—and it was a moderate estimate on his part—added to the 122,000 there, when the census was taken, would have made 322,000 souls, while we have actually only 173,363 there. The First Minister thought this estimate was under the mark, judging by the experience of the Western States, when he said that in 1885 50,000 settlers would go into that country. How many actually went in? The Minister of Agriculture gave us the figures the other day in reply to an hon. gentleman opposite him, and they were 7,240 souls. In this way have the predictions of hon. gentlemen opposite in reference to the settlement of that country been verified; and I say there is no more discouraging feature in our country to-day than to look at the expenditure of money for immigration purposes and the railway expenditure in that country, and then to find, that in that fertile, that magnificent country, that country unexcelled by the Western States, we can only see a paltry addition of 50,000 people to the population as the result of five years' work. After recess I shall be able to show, by the First Minister's own statement, the relative increases in the various Western States; and when the House witnesses the increase of population which has taken place in those States under precisely similar circumstances to those in our own country, the sorrow and regret they must feel now will be greatly enhanced when they consider the great facilities we have had for opening up that country, and how utterly we have failed, from the incapacity and the mismanagement of the gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches.

THE CONTINENTAL BANK OF CANADA.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 60) to incorporate the Colonial Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Macmillan, Middlesex.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MACMILLAN. I wish to have the name changed from the Colonial Bank of Canada to the Continental Bank of Canada for this reason. After the notice had been given, about six weeks ago, I discovered that a bank of the same name had been incorporated several years before, and had failed, and that some of its bills were still in existence. I had not sufficient time to give notice as required by the Standing Orders, and therefore continued the original notice. I now move to have the name changed from "The Colonial Bank of Canada" to "The Continental Bank of Canada."

Motion agreed to; Committee rose and reported, and Bill read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 37) to naturalise Girolamo Consentini, commonly called Baron Girolamo Consentini.—(Mr. Hall.)

Bill (No. 32) to incorporate a community of religious ladies under the name of "The Sisters, Faithful Companions of Jesus."—(Mr. Royal.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 64) to amend the Act incorporating the Pictou Coal and Iron Company.—(Mr. Stairs.)

Bill (No. 65) respecting the Northern and North-Western Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 66) to incorporate the Forbes' Trochilic Steam Engine Central Company of Canada.—(Mr. Patterson, Essex.)

Bill (No. 67) respecting the Central Ontario Railway Company.—(Mr. White, Hastings.)

Bill (No. 68) to incorporate the Brockville and New York Bridge Company.—(Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

Bill (No. 69) respecting the Bank of Yarmouth.—(Mr. Kinney.)

Bill (No. 70) respecting the Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Ross.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When the House rose at six o'clock, I was pointing out what could not fail to be a matter of regret to the House, that we have only succeeded, during the past five years, in settling some 50,000 more people in the North-West Territories and in Manitoba. I had mentioned that an estimate as to the probable immigration to that country was made by the Premier in 1880. If I refer to the growth of some of the Western States, I will not be liable to the charge of want of patriotism, or of comparing ourselves with those States with a view to disparage our own country, because I shall but give the figures that were given to the House by the First Minister himself. The figures that he gave to us at that time, when he sought to justify his anticipation that 200,000 would have entered that country by the year 1885, were based upon the fact of the increase of the population of many of the States. He gave the increase and enumerated among the States, Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, Illinois, Missouri and Kansas. Now, the area of those States combined is something like the area of Manitoba and the three north-western districts. The increase in the States that I have just mentioned was given to us by the First Minister as having taken place between the years 1850 and 1860, and was stated to be 2,555,000, that is, a territory in the United States was in ten years populated with 2,555,000, while we, with a territory as large, we, with a country as fine, we, with facilities and opportunities equal to theirs, have succeeded in five years in placing 50,000 people in the same extent of territory. It may be said, however, that the 2,555,000 represented ten years, and so it did, while I am comparing a period of five years with reference to our population. But it may be said not to be fair to take one-half of the 2,555,000 as the gain that we might reasonably expect there, inasmuch as there would be the natural increase during the past five years, and I quite recognise that fact. But I think I am wholly within the mark if I say we might fairly expect to have had within the five years placed one-quarter the amount that was placed in the same area in the United States. Had we done that, had we placed one-quarter only in that five years, we should have had 638,750 people there, instead of 50,967.

Mr. HESSON: We had not the same population to draw from.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.)

Mr. PATERSON. Why, the hon. member knows that we have been told time and again that the United States are availing themselves of our territory in the North-West, that their people are flocking into our country. He knows that our lands there are thrown open, and we invite not only the inhabitants of the United States but of every civilised country on the globe, and under these circumstances we have succeeded in putting 50,000 people into an area in which the Americans, estimating for them a period of five years also, would have put 638,750. Well, now, we were told by the hon. gentleman who preceded me that it was an unfair comparison to make, because there were greater facilities for settlement in the Western States, which offered greater advantages. I recognise that, but I direct attention to the fact that this increase in the States I have mentioned took place between the years 1850 and 1860. Going back in the history of the Western States 35 years, we may ask if there were superior facilities for settlement than there are in the North-West to day. Circumstances in that respect are equal: if not equal they ought to be in our favor. I say this matter challenges the attention of the House and the country. With a climate as good as a large portion of the United States, to which I have already alluded, as capable of being worked to profit by the husbandman, there must be some reason why we have failed to approximate what was done in the United States. Will the hon. gentleman charge that upon the Opposition, who, in their opinion, are powerful for evil but never powerful for good? Hon. gentlemen opposite claim credit for the prosperity which they profess to see in the country, and for any advantages gained; therefore we place on them the responsibility of populating the plains of the North-West, and I ask from them an explanation as to how it is that while the United States, during five years, put 600,000 people into the same extent of territory, we have only succeeded in putting 50,000 in the North-West, though we have completed a railway costing tens of millions and spent millions of dollars to promote immigration to that country. The whole figures given by the Government in regard to the estimated population of the North-West have been misleading. In the light of the public statistics, the Customs Department, as well as the Department of Agriculture, is blameworthy. Hon. members will find in the Trade and Navigation Returns evidence of an attempt by the Minister of Customs to reduce the amount of duties paid by the people of the North-West, in order that the people might not understand and know the amount of the taxation. How did he accomplish this result? The population of 173,000 which we find in Manitoba and the North-West in 1885, the Minister assumed to be 243,000 a year ago, and he based the rate of taxation by way of Customs duties on that population. The result of this calculation was to reduce the amount of Customs duties paid per head, and yet there were 22½ per cent. more paid per head under his Administration in 1885 than in 1878. As compared with 1884, there was 30 per cent., and as compared with the year previous, 50 per cent. additional duty paid by every inhabitant of the Dominion. Thus we find that when it suits the purpose of hon. gentlemen opposite, they enlarge the population of this Dominion in order to make it appear that the burden per head is much less than is really the case. I must now pass from this subject and touch for a moment upon the volume of trade in this country. The hon. member who preceded me found great fault with the member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), because he pointed out that the volume of trade in 1885, under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite, did not equal the volume of trade in 1873, and he said that was unfair and a deliberate attempt to mislead the House and the public. Why did the hon. gentleman, he said, not take 1876-77, and he would see the volume of trade had increased from that year to 1885 by some $30,000,000. True, the hon.

member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) did not take that year; true, there was some increased volume of trade between 1876-77 and 1885. But the hon. gentleman who found fault with the hon. member for South Huron knew he was taking a year which was almost a famine year in Canada, that he was taking 1876 when the wheat crop failed for once in Canadian history, and I believe only once, and we had actually to import bread to feed our own people; he had taken a year when trade was paralysed, when our lumbering interests were paralysed on account of the state of trade in the United States, which are our greatest customers, a year which was one of the dullest in trade not only in this country but almost in the world, to show that we have increased our volume of trade, imports and exports, by $30,000,000. The hon. member for South Huron did perfectly right. He was pointing out to the House this fact: That we had not reached twelve years after 1873 as large a volume of trade as we had in that year, and looking at 1876-77 does not alter the aspect of the question. It is a grave matter for the consideration of the people, no matter what intervening years there have been, that in 1885 under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite the volume of Canadian trade is nearly $20,000,000 less than it was twelve years ago. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the promising prosperity of the country. The figures are eloquent to speak for themselves; I would they were not eloquent in pointing out in a clear manner that, instead of there being prosperity, there is a condition approaching stagnation in trade. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) did not allude to a certain other matter to which I desire to refer, but it was incidentally touched upon by the Finance Minister in his speech. It is rather amusing that it did not receive attention because hon. gentlemen opposite know and you, Mr. Speaker, will remember how several years ago they were enforcing the great importance of maintaining a balance of trade in our favor and pointing out what a fearful thing it would be if the balance of trade should happen to turn against us. It did so in the days of the hon. member for South Huron and brought us nearly to the verge of ruin, as they aver. One of the principal arguments used by them was that they would prevent the imports from exceeding the exports; they said to the people: "If we are placed in office we will stop that and equalise the imports and exports." They did not do it. But under their management the hard times of 1879 struck the country, and I beg to remind the hon. gentlemen that that was the worst year in Canadian history, and public affairs were under the control of hon. gentlemen opposite and the National Policy was in force; at that time land, stocks, cotton stocks, and all investments were at the lowest point, while I say they were not able to control the balance of trade, the hard times that existed in 1879 were unparalleled in the history of the country and unequalled by the dullest times under the Mackenzie Government. It appears that one year afterwards the Government were unable to make the balance of trade agree and we imported $1,500,000 more than we exported. It will be remembered how we had the true causes of prosperity pointed out, and how that prosperity was going to be maintained. What was the result? Next year trade began to improve somewhat, and whether they had lost the secret of maintaining an equilibrium I cannot tell, but they had a balance of trade against them, that fearful thing which prevailed when the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), was in office, the amount reaching $7,000,000; in 1882 it rose to $17,000,000; 1883 it broke loose and went up to $34,000,000; in 1884 it was $25,000,000, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Government; in 1885 it was $20,000,000; and for the months which have elapsed in 1886 the balance is still against us, and so it goes. Sir Leonard Tilley declared in one of his Budget speeches that so soon as a man's expenditure increased beyond his income poverty stared him in the face. So if you had an adverse balance of trade against you, poverty will stare the nation in the face. That was the principle upon which they worked; that was the principle they laid down, and I ask them how they can, in the face of that declaration, reconcile these statements with the fact that the balances of trade against them have aggregated in the space of five years the sum of $103,000,000. With reference to the balance of trade being against us, I would point out that the average balance of trade against us for the five years of these gentlemen actually exceeds the average of the balance of trade against us ever since Confederation, taking the figures of the Minister of Customs himself. The average in all the years since Confederation has been $20,096,655, while the average annual balance against us during the past five years has been $20,600,000. I see my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Wigle) looks rather thoughtful about this, and I have no doubt he gave very learned lectures about the balance of trade, and how impossible it would be for a country to prosper with the balance of trade against us. I call his attention to the figures which I have given as showing the condition of things into which we have been brought by hon. gentlemen opposite. I now wish to draw your attention for a moment to the state of trade in the country. We have had statements made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me, as well as by the Finance Minister, with reference to the state of trade. They have been forced to admit that it is not quite as satisfactory as it should be, but still, they say it is in a better condition than it was a few years ago. Well, as I said before, we do look for some improvement; we do look for some increase in trade caused by the natural increase of our population. It is not to be thought a very wonderful thing that we can hold our own and prevent ourselves from going back in a country like this. But what I want to point out to the hon. gentleman is this fact, with reference to the manufacturers of this country, that they have heralded so loudly, have been benefited so much by the operation of their tariff—I ask them to look at the effects of that tariff on the export of manufactured goods, and to tell me and tell the country whether our export trade is in the healthy condition that we would like to see it. What is the condition of things with reference to the export of manufactured goods? Sir, it is not encouraging. I can remember that in 1878, Canada occupied rather a proud position as a manufacturing country, for so young a nation. I can remember that our exports of manufactured goods equalled some $4,000,000. I can remember that we took a position at the exhibition at Philadelphia that challenged the admiration of the world. So at the exhibitions of the Australian colonies, and I know that as a result of that enterprise, a valuable trade with these colonies sprung up in Canadian manufactured goods. Now, we have a tariff which hon. gentlemen opposite boasted was designed to have a beneficial effect upon the manufactures of the country, but where are your exports of manufactured goods to-day? Are you exporting as many to-day as you did in 1878. No. Have you exported as many since the tariff was put in operation, as you did before? No; the decrease has been great and marked. We are exporting about 25 per cent. less to-day than we did in 1878, and still they claim that they have conferred inestimable advantages upon us by their tariff. Look at some of the items. In the important item of agricultural implements, we exported $63,361 less last year than we did in 1878. Biscuits—thousands of dollars less; candles and soap—less; carriages—$40,000 less; clothing—nearly $10,000 less; glass and glassware, grindstones, pig iron—a decrease; leather, $144,000 less, and it is one of the largest exports we had. Boots and shoes were a great manufacture, but we exported $166,000 less in 1885 than we did in 1878. Oil cake—a great reduction; ships sold to other countries $971,000 less than in 1878. Why, we all remember that the late Minister of Railways, Sir Charles Tupper, when he was sitting in Opposition to the Mackenzie Administration, pointed out the declining state of the shipping trade, the deserted shipyards, and we remember how he asked that he might be restored to office that the sound of the hammer might be heard once more in these deserted shipyards. How is it now? Of ships sold to foreign countries, there were nearly $1,000,000 less last year than there were in the year when he lamented the way in which the Mackenzie Administration was treating that industry. Steel manufactures—decreasing. But I need not go over the whole list only to say that there is $1,500,000 decrease in the items I have given. It is true there are some increases—cotton goods, woollen goods, furniture, woodenware, extract of hemlock bark, &c. We have had some increases, but the sum total of our exports shows that we were only able in 1885 to export $3,181,500 worth, while in 1878 we exported $4,127,755 worth. And, Sir, with that state of thing staring us in the face, we have the Finance Minister taking four or five hours to speak about the financial condition of the country, but did he give us one practical hint how we should arrange matters so that the foreign trade of this country might be developed? We have a period of stagnation in our midst; we have factories and we have skilled artisans, but has there been any proposition on his part to open up markets for our goods elsewhere, to enable us to export our manufactured goods to other countries so that our artisans may have employment? Why, Sir, in the Estimates last year, they asked for $10,000 to establish commercial agencies. What was done with that money? They made the statement that it was intended to open up a market and help the export trade of our manufactured goods. Were there any commercial agents appointed and if so, at what points? Has any effort been made with other countries to extend our trade? What has been done? The Finance Minister is mute. He says our export trade is declining; he asks for this money to establish commercial agencies, but what have they done? He is silent on that question, and while he talked on many other things we failed to hear him say that he had any remedy. Sir, we want our export trade opened up; we want to have the markets of other nations, and we want him to take steps to secure them. If he wants the export trade developed, and if he maintains the tariff as it now exists, and if he persists in taxing the raw material, in making the manufactured products of this country higher in price, and if he will not give the drawbacks which he promised to those who are manufacturing and exporting to foreign countries, I tell him he will kill off what export trade we have. He promised these drawbacks, and yet when claims are lodged in the Department and parties ask for these drawbacks, they are met with technical objections; they are put off and their trade is dying away. In my own city, we have as enterprising a firm as there is in the Dominion. At their own expense, they exhibited at the different international exhibitions; they have sent agents to Russia, Hungary, Austria, Chili, in South America, and opened up a trade with these countries. They did it alone and unaided; Canada had no agents in these countries, and they had to seek the help of the British Ministers, and as a young man, a member of that firm, who was over there, told me, he sought the aid of the British Minister to help him in opening a market for his goods; he was met very kindly and courteously as any one is sure to be met by an English gentleman. But he was also given to understand by the British Minister that Canada had imposed a tariff, and a heavy tariff, upon goods from Britain as well as from every other country—that while he would be glad to aid a Canadian if he could without jeopardising British interests, yet he could readily see that his interest would not be to put Canadian manufactured goods into competition with British manufactured goods. Thus the exporter was left to struggle alone. Although he did open up a market in Chili, and is trying to hold it, yet whenever they present their bill of drawbacks made under the law of the land, he is met with technical objections that he does not comply with the law; and when he says it is beyond the bounds of possibility to comply with the law, then there is a hitch. Thus our export trade is dying and languishing, and there is no help for it. The manufacturers do not ask a helping hand; they only ask that the law should not fetter them, and they do not get even that. I think the figures are eloquent; and if a few of the hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken on this subject had devoted their time to the subject of how to increase the export trade of this country and thus give employment to the artisans who are manufacturing goods, it would have been time better spent; but the hon. gentleman who has preceded me, when he spoke before, pointed out that we were not exporting because our people were all manufacturing for the home market, but unfortunately that is not the case, and I will prove it by showing that the imports of those very articles which we are manufacturing for the home market have been greater in 1835 than they were in 1878, which is proof positive that the manufacturer of those goods has not the home market in 1885 to the same extent that he had in 1878. Take the article of boots and shoes. It is true, that in that item, we imported in 1878 $49,833 worth more than we did in 1885; but certainly that does not come up to the amount of the decline in the export trade. Therefore, it is not the increased home market that has prevented our being able to manufacture boots and shoes to send abroad. Of carriages, we imported $65,000 worth more in 1885 than we did in 1878; the carriage makers, therefore, have not had an increased home market. That is not the reason they have been unable to export as many carriages in 1885 as they did in 1878. Take leather, that important item, the export of which, as I have told you, has declined, and we find that the imports have increased $420,000 in 1885 over 1878. Take sewing machines, that large and prosperous industry. When two or three years ago I pointed out how that industry was suffering, I remember how the hon. gentleman who has preceded me fortified himself with a letter from a sewing machine manufacturer in London, which he read with great gusto to the House, and which stated that the policy of the Government had given great help to the trade, and that the writer was employing more hands and working over hours. What is to-day the state of the sewing machine industry, which, in days gone by, has employed thousands of hands in the country? The tale is a lamentable one. In the year 1885 we imported 7871 machines, at a value of $169,146, whereas in 1878 we imported 6,206 machines, at a value of $101,404; so that in the year 1885 we actually imported, under this tariff that was to give the home market to the manufacturer, no less than 1,663 machines more than we imported in 1878, at a value of $67,742, and many machine operatives in the country are out of work—why? Because the manufacturers have a profitable export trade? No, I am sorry to say. In the year 1878 they had, but in 1885 they have not been manufacturing, but have been idle. The figures of exports tell the tale. In 1878, whilst supplying the home market to a greater extent than we are doing now, we exported 30,429 machines at a value of $273,258, a magnificent export in that one line of manufactured goods. That was the condition that industry was in before these hon. gentlemen attained power. But since they have been in power, under their blighting influence, or from some other cause—and if they claim the credit for everything that is better, they must be debited with what is worse—instead of exporting 30,000 machines in the year 1885, we exported 9,118 machines; and instead of getting $273,000 of foreign gold brought into the country as the result of the sale, we brought in $69,235. Such is the condition of that trade under these hon. gentlemen.

Mr. HESSON. Will you say there is a less number of machines made?

Mr. PATERSON. Well, I do think this would rather indicate it.

Mr. HESSON. It indicates our people are using them in the country.

Mr. PATERSON. There is a larger import in 1875 than in 1878, and there is a smaller export. It seems to me this rather points in the direction that there is a less number made in the country. What would the hon. gentleman say about it, if he were at liberty to speak? The Finance Minister dwelt upon the benefit his tariff has been to the farmers. I will touch that later on, but in the mean time there is an industry which concerns the farmers as well as the manufacturers, to which I wish to refer. I mean the flour industry, which comes next in importance, and in the amount of capital it employs and in its output, to the saw milling industry. We used to hear moaning and wailing because American flour was consumed by Canadians, and the Government asked that a duty should be put on the American flour in order that our people should be compelled to buy Canadian flour made out of Canadian wheat. Have we accomplished that? In 1878 we imported of American flour 314,520 barrels. Then the Government have put on their tariff of 50 cents a barrel to prohibit that coming in, and the result was that in 1885 we imported 540,108 barrels of American flour, or 25,588 barrels more than in 1878. Was that to the benefit of the farmers? Did that benefit the Canadian miller? Then they were going to benefit the coal industry. What has been the result of their efforts in that direction, in which they claim a great deal of credit? Let us take, first, the importations of coal and coke, and what do we find? In 1885, we imported 1,953,948 tons; in 1875, we imported 896,446 tons, making an increased import of coal in 1885 over 1875 of 1,057,502 tons; or, in other words, we have an increased import of 118 per cent. on coal in 1885 over 1875. Yet hon. gentlemen designed their tariff to shut out this importation altogether, in order that our people would have to get their coal from the Maritime Provinces. What has been the case with reference to the export trade? The increased importation would not matter so much, if our mines in the east were enabled, in some peculiar way, through the operation of the tariff, to export their output; but, in 1885, we find that they exported 479,706 tons, and, in 1875, they exported 340,127 tons. Thus, we had an increased export of coal in 1885 over 1875 of 139,579 tons, to set off against the increased import of 1,057,502 tons. In other words, our imports increased 118 per cent., while our exports increased but 41 per cent.; and thus it is they have benefited our coal industry. Now, although this duty on flour and this duty on coal have failed to accomplish what hon. gentleman said they would, they have not failed in one respect. They have given the Government an amount of revenue, for there was paid, by way of taxes on coal, in 1885, $1,072,111, and by way of duty on flour, in 1885, $270,054; or a total duty on flour and coal amounting to $1,342,215. Now, let these gentlemen, with their $4,900,000 deficit, place the tariff as it was placed by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). If their flour and coal duties were wiped out, we would have, instead of a deficit of $5,000,000 for 1886, a deficit of $6,300,000; but even after having taxed everything they can lay their hands on, they have saddled this country with a deficit greater by far double any that was ever known in the darkest days of the administration of that hon. gentleman whom they so much revile for his departmental mismanagement, as they are pleased to term it.

Mr. HESSON. What about duty on tea and coffee?

Mr. PATERSON. My hon. friend is moaning again. To pass from this matter hastily, I come next to notice for a few moments the proposed tariff changes. There is something that cannot fail to strike one with reference to these changes. It seems to me that the Finance Minister—I wish he were present that I might get his humane ear, in order that I might plead successfully with him for the little ones that are being rocked in these 200,000 cradles—it seems to me it is rather hard that they should be held responsible for this deficit to the extent of $3,500,000, to meet which they will have to toil and weep when they grow to manhood and womanhood, without inflicting upon them a burden while yet in their cradles. How grievous must the strait be in which the Finance Minister finds himself when, in addition to compelling them to shoulder this burden when they reach mature age, he actually, while they are sleeping peacefully in their cradles, according to his graphic description of last year, increases the taxes on the toys and playthings these little ones use. Even these childish playthings are not exempt from the hand which a remorseless fate compels him to stretch out and tax everything it can grasp, in order that he may reduce somewhat his deficit. After taxing flour and coal and leaving a part of the deficit to be paid by those children when they reach maturity, he goes to work and adds to the playthings already covered with a 20 per cent. duty, 10 per cent., in order that the poor little creatures may feel the burden in their cradles. He has adjusted the sugar duty. We will discuss that matter more particularly in committee, when we will get some information from the hon. gentleman as to how he considers his new arrangement will work. I, looking at the matter, and subject to revising my judgment when we have more information from the hon. gentleman, and time to examine more closely in the committee, incline to this view, that he has materially enhanced the duty on sugar. My impression is he may secure something like $500,000 extra duty out of it, and while he has done that, he will also compel the consumer, great as was the amount of duty he paid on that article before, to pay more actually in the way of bonus to a few refiners in this country. Be that as it may, while American granulated sugar was taxed before to the extent of 96 per cent., now—if I have figured it out correctly and if he intends to exact a duty on American granulated on the long instead of the short price, which is, I suppose, his intention, and which, I suppose, if the refiners ask him to do he will do—the duty on American granulated sugar coming into this country, under this tariff as now arranged, will be more than 100 per cent.; and the people can have some idea of what they are paying towards the taxes of the country on that one article. Yet, I suppose I will find gentlemen here who will not hesitate to risk the statement that sugar is as cheap as ever.

Mr. HESSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. A gentleman opposite says "hear, hear," and he is one of the gentlemen I would expect to hear it from, and he is about the only gentleman. What has the question of whether sugar or any other article is cheaper now than it was seven or eight years ago to do with the question? Do not values rise and fall? That has nothing to do with it, but the question the people are interested in is: If that duty were wiped off, at how much less would they get sugar? If the duty were wiped off American granulated, they would get it at one half the price than they can under the tariff. Hon. gentlemen have spoken of the effect of their policy upon the working classes. They claim the working classes have been greatly benefited by the introduction of their tariff. The Finance Minister also made that claim; and in order to strengthen himself with reference to it, he was bold enough to do what no other hon. gentleman in this House has ventured to do since the Budget speech was made last year, as far as my recollection goes. We had a long Session, yet, if I remember right, the Finance Minister (Sir Leonard Tilley) last year was the only gentleman in this House that ever dared to refer to the statistics he had compiled, through the agency of two gentlemen, in order to show that our manufactures had increased. He did venture; but when once they were dissected and shown to be utterly fallacious, they were dropped by every hon. gentleman, and no one ever ventured to allude to them until the unfortunate Finance Minister of to-day (Mr. McLelan), in a moment of dire necessity, alluded to them, as might be expected. Are we to accept those statistics, prepared at the cost of thousands of dollars to the country last year, and which were conclusively proved to be utterly unreliable, wholly false and misleading? Was it not pointed out last year with reference to these statistics, that actually they gave an increased product of woollen goods amounting to several million dollars, while the import of raw material was actually less than it was in 1878. When these things were pointed out, when it was shown, by the importation of the raw material, that it was impossible to have had the extra amount of goods manufactured which they alleged to have been made in the country, that was abandoned, and it remained abandoned until the Finance Minister saw fit again to introduce it here, and he based upon it a calculation that we had so many more workers in the country because of those fallacious statements which were previously made, and of which I believe even the compilers were ashamed, that we had some 35,000 more workers in consequence of this policy. The hon. gentleman expressed regret that he had not had time to obtain further statistics. Well, it is to be regretted, no doubt, but he had statistics from one manufactory; he fortified his statements by statistics supplied by one cotton company, the Canada Cotton Company. I admire the shrewdness of some manufacturers in this country. I have known the case of a manufacturer who availed himself of the Minister of Finance, two or three years ago, to advertise his resources and to tell the country how successful his business was; and here we have the Canada Cotton Company managing to secure the assistance of the Minister of Finance to state that their output is so much greater than it was. I wonder if they have any stock to sell; I wonder if they have anything to dispose of; and whether the Finance Minister is lending his aid to this end. I might ask how it is that the hon. gentleman gave us a comparison only of the last six months of 1885 with the last six months of 1878. Why did he not give us the whole year? It may be all right, but it looks rather fishy. Surely it would have been just as easy to give us the comparison for the whole year as to give us the comparison for the six months. Can it be possible that in the first six months the mill was shut down or was running with less hands? I do not say that it was. It may be all right. They may have done the increased business all through the year, but I think it would have struck the House as more fair and reasonable if we had had the comparison for the whole year instead of for the last six months only. And these are the proofs we have given to us that the mechanics of this country have been so greatly benefited by the operation of the tariff. Further, it is denied by the Finance Minister, and it is also denied by the hon. gentleman who preceded me, that the cost of living has been in any way enhanced by the operation of this tariff. We have been told time and again by these gentlemen that things are not dearer in Canada than they are in the neighboring Republic, that they cost no more here than they do across the border. That may be true. I am not in a position to say, or rather I will not assume to say, that it is not true, but I would like to ask the Minister of Customs one question. If he takes that position, if it be true that goods are as cheap in all lines in Canada as they are in the United States, how is it that some people are so silly as to go to all the expense, and risk, fine and imprisonment in order to smuggle goods which can be obtained just as cheaply in the country itself? Do they smuggle for the mere fun of the thing? Do they risk incarceration in the gaols of the country, and the fines and imprisonment which the Minister of Customs is so frequently imposing for that? If not, what do they do it for? Is it just for the fun of being caught? It must be just because they like it. Everything is as cheap here as over there, and the men like to have the fun of the Minister catching them. That can be the only reason. Now, we come to look at the effect of the tariff upon the farmers. The Finance Minister was very strong on the subject of the benefit which the tariff had been to the farmers. He pointed out some statistics, and I could not exactly follow him in some of the figures he used, taking certain years to suit himself, but he alleged that we have been able to export on the average of certain years $9,371,756 per annum more of agricultural products than we did on an average during a certain number of years under the Mackenzie Administration. In addition to that he asserts that he has given the home market to the farmers to the extent of $3,500,000 a year; or that they were able to export, in consequence of the operation of the tariff, $13,000,000 worth more in the year 1885 than they were in the year 1878. Well, now, what are we to understand by an argument like that? If it means anything, and if it is to have any force, it must be that the tariff that they imposed for the benefit of the farmer, as they say, has enabled the farmer to raise more product than he did before, or to raise the price of his products in the foreign market; because they have $13,000,000 worth a year more of a product, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman. Does he solemnly mean to say that the operation of the tariff has enabled the farmer to grow more grain or has enabled him to raise the price of that grain in foreign countries? That must be the meaning of it, and yet it is almost impossible to believe that an intelligent man would take that position. Still, I am forced to believe that it is so, for the hon. gentleman told us that, as one of the effects of his tariff, while, in 1873, the oxen were idle in the stall, and the ploughshare was rusting in the field, when he put a duty on agricultural products, the oxen forthwith came out of the stall, and was immediately yoked to the plough again. I do not know where the hon. gentleman got his illustration from. I do not know what part of the country he had been travelling in. In the first place, in 1873, in the portion of the country in which I live, horses were more in use for ploughing purposes than oxen, and I had fancied that they were largely used for that purpose throughout the Dominion. And, more than that, if it be a fact that some of the farmers did use oxen, and were not engaged in ploughing because ploughing would not pay, that they had abandoned farming because it produced no profits, I still think that the farmers would have had sense enough not to keep an ox in the stall and feed him there, when they could turn him out to graze; because, I submit, Mr. Speaker, for your consideration, the fact that, greatly as this tariff has benefited the agriculturists, and badly off as they were before its introduction, the grass did grow, in 1878, and the ox could have grazed if they had turned him out; also, in 1878, if ploughing did not pay, the farmers had that sense of economy that they would never have left the plough in the field for the share to rust, but would have put it in the barn or the shed where it would have been exposed to no such danger, as the hon. member for Essex knows quite well. So the hon. gentleman is altogether astray in his illustration. I do not know where he has been, but he has been out of Canada, and it does not apply to our country at all. But it struck me, when he allowed his fancy to indulge in that flight, or when he was taking credit for the tariff, that he had found a patent by which idle oxen could be set to work with the plough, that he was looking in a direction the key to which he gave us in the opening portion of his speech, when he said that he had succeeded in his present position to an array of gallant knights; it struck me that the thought was in his mind: "And why cannot I, too, be Sir Gallant Knight? Is there no way by which Her Majesty's favor can be drawn to me? Is there no way by which, while I hold this position, I can attain to that dignity?" I should say that there is hope for him after the discovery of that patent for setting idle oxen to work. The hon. gentleman used another very remarkable illustration, when he said that, if you sell a $100 bond for $100 cash, it is better than if you sell it for $88. That is doubtless great wisdom, but I have an impression that the stupendous mind of Mr. Gladstone has grasped that fact, and that the Minister of Finance is not alone in that idea. And, when he told us that other remarkable thing, which may be unknown to so many, that you cannot build railways and canals without money, though that may not be known to the masses, I think there are other statesmen who have discovered that before him. You cannot look for knighthood in that way, or in consequence of those discoveries, but let Mr. Gladstone know that the hon. gentlemen has discovered that by the imposing of duties on agricultural products, of which we raise millions more than we need and have to send to foreign markets, the farming community have been enriched, the idle oxen have been set to work, and the ploughshare has been freed from rust as it passes through the ground, and there is hope that another gallant knight may yet fill that position. Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to notice the concluding remarks of the hon. gentleman who preceded me with reference to some statements that have been made by the hon. member for South Huron with reference to the corruption that prevailed amongst members of Parliament and in the country. And he attempted to defend it; nay, he attempted, so far as the members were concerned, to say that no such thing existed. Well, Sir, I hope and trust it is so, and that a future meeting of the committee may wipe out that dread doubt that has entered into some people's minds that there has been traffic on the part of certain members of Parliament to a greater extent than merely writing a letter for a friend to the Department of the Interior. But, Sir, he attempted to defend the people of the country against the charges that, he said, were levied against them by the ex-Finance Minister, that they were morally and politically blind, because they had seen fit, in 1878, to dispossess him of office and to put them back in office, and he seemed to think it was jealousy on the part of the hon. member for South Huron, and that was the reason why he condemned the people of the country as unable to understand their own best interests. He told us the people saw that. But the people saw more than that, Mr. Speaker. The people saw, in 1878, when they did dispossess that gentleman of power, they saw gentlemen claiming to be men whose words might be taken, whose promises might be relied upon, that if they were to put that gentleman and his colleagues out of position and put them in their places, they would then better the condition of every man, woman and child in this country. The people took them at their word, a portion of the people believed them, and placed them in their position. But, to-day, are those gentlemen willing to rely upon the fulfilment of their promises made to that electorate, in order to secure a return to power? Did they, in 1882, rely upon them? We know what the people of the country know, and what the people saw—that they could not trust themselves, even at that early day, upon the records they had made for themselves, and before they dared to appeal to the electorate they had to gerrymander, in the most cowardly manner, in a manner that was unworthy of men who bear the name of Britons, they had to cut and carve the constituencies of the great Province of Ontario, in order that Liberals might not be returned and that they themselves, afraid to stand upon their own records, might thus secure a majority for themselves. Not content with that, Sir, they stated to the people, already deceived by them once: "Put us back again, and there are millions and tens of millions of capital waiting to be invested in manufacturing enterprises in this country." I ask them to-day if they can point to those millions. I asked them in 1882, and three years after I ask them again where those millions are that were to be put into large iron works in this country. Where are they? Let them stand up in this House and answer. Sir, they must rise; they must point out where those millions are. It will not do to speak in general terms. We want to know where are the works; we want to know the names of the capitalists; we want to see the effect of it in giving industry and employment in our midst. Sir, I come now to notice what the gentleman who preceded me, himself a Minister of the Crown, did not attempt to answer in reference to the charge that was made by the hon. member for South Huron; and when I recall to your recollection, Mr. Speaker, the omission of that hon. gentleman, you will agree with me, I think, that it will be impossible, before this debate closes, that one of the gentlemen on the Treasury benches shall not get up and answer the charges framed specifically by the hon. member for South Huron against members of the Cabinet themselves, about which the hon. Minister did not say one word. Sir, what were those charges? He talked about what he had said to the representatives, what he had said to the people; he had read the speech and he heard it, but he did not say anything about the statement as to the members of the Cabinet, of which he himself was a member. What was said? You, Mr. Speaker, and the House, will bear in mind that this is no statement made by some irresponsible person upon a hustings or a platform. It is a statement made by a gentleman who has occupied one the highest positions in this country, as he does yet, and made in the face of the men whom he charges while he stood within twenty feet of them. These charges must be answered. The Minister of Interior cannot afford to let these charges go unanswered. The Minister of Interior ought not to have sat down, he could not afford to sit down, with these charges unanswered by him. I give him another opportunity to do it. What does the hon. member for South Huron charge:

"It has come to pass that to-day, however much we regret it, we are obliged to admit that every second member of the Cabinet has been either the recipient of a testimonial largely subscribed for by public contractors and public employés, or that Ministers have received subsidies granted for the purpose of advancing lines in which they are large shareholders; or that they have been participants, by means of the cloak of a special company created for that special end, in printing contracts and other jobs which they could not have undertaken in their own proper persons without putting their seats in peril; or that they have been recipients of timber limits; and I am sorry to say, as the Cabinet are, so are the majority of their supporters."

Sir, a Minister of the Crown heard that charge, and read that charge. It was more against members of the Cabinet than against the House, and the hon. member for South Huron said he did not blame the members of the House so much as the members of the Cabinet; and we had a Cabinet Minister rising and taking notice of the fact that has been charged against some members of the House, and ignoring, not saying one word of that fearful charge that is brought against members of the Cabinet. Again the hon. member for South Huron says:

"It is a record to cause every true Canadian to blush, and I say more, that it would be idle and criminal on our part to conceal our opinion of these things. If they go on, a few years or a few months may bring our whole Confederation to a very abrupt termination."

Again:

"Our duty is to oppose and fight these evils; a short time will tell whether Canada is to shake off the incubus that now presses on her, or whether our Confederation is to rot by its own corruption, before it is able to pause, before it is able to stand alone."

Sir, if such a state of things exists, and if such a state of things is tolerated, that men who hold the highest position in this land do not deny these charges, then there is danger ahead. We cannot have corruption in high places to that extent. Corruption if it does not exist, must be denied by the members of the Cabinet; if they have not received money subsidies to aid railways with their position, and that is charged; if they have not participated by word or act in printing contracts, if they have not been recipients of testimonials subscribed for among others by contractors with whom they have had dealings, then I hold that they cannot ignore the charge. It is made by a gentleman of too high a position, it is made in the Parliament of Canada and to the face of those hon. gentlemen. They must rise in the interests of their party and deny that those charges are true. They will have an opportunity of doing so. I hope they may be able to deny them for the sake of the country. It will be a sad thing if such charges can be sustained. We have to recognise this fact, that if there be any danger to the nation it does not come to us in the nature of extravagant expenditure, especially in a country like this. We may commit errors of administration, we may have extravagant management of our affairs; but we are a young country and we are a reliant people, and we can surmount evils that come upon us in that direction; but if we are to have what has been charged upon those gentlemen and yet not denied, corruption in the very highest places in the land, then, Sir, there is a dark outlook for this country. Everything tells us that. I need but remind you, Mr. Speaker, of a nation that was once brought out of slavery by a great deliverer, who was their great law giver and judge, and settled in a goodly land and became one of the most noted nations the world has ever seen. To that nation were given laws by the great law giver and ordinances which were to be observed, given by wisdom greater than any wisdom that dwells in man, and the principles contained in those laws have formed, I am happy to say, the basis of the laws and Governments of the British Empire, of which it is our boast to form a part. What was the instruction given to the judges and officers that were to rule over that nation by this great law-giver just before he was to lie down and die and leave other men to step into his place? His charge to those occupying in that nation at that time positions similar to the positions occupied by hon. gentlemen opposite was:

"Thou shalt judge the people with just judgment. Thou shalt not respect persons—neither take a gift, for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise and pervert the words of the righteous."

The truth of those words no man pretending to belong to the British nation will dare to deny. They were given to that nation in order that it might maintain its record as a nation, in order that it might maintain its existence as a nation. But there crept into that nation corrupt rulers, men filled with the spirit of covetousness, and the great seer of that nation, who saw into the future some few hundred years, and saw that country, that was his glory and his pride, about to be degraded and cast from its high station amongst the nations of the earth, gave utterance to this wail:

"Everyone coveteth gifts and followeth after reward; they judge not the fatherless neither doth the cause of the widow come unto them."

Yes, if you have those bearing rule in high places whose hearts are set on gifts, who followeth after reward, before such men it is vain to plead the cause of the widow and fatherless. If the nation does not give heed and by its legislation attend to and promote the interests of the poor and defenceless, then the administrators of that nation fail to perform their duty and their continuance in office will lead to the collapse of the very prosperity of the nation. We must have true men in high places; I speak not in a pharisaical spirit. This charge cannot be answered by: "You are another." I hear people often say, politicians are all alike. I challenge those who say it to prove the statement. I do not claim for each individual member of the party that there never have been mistakes made or acts done that should not have been done; but I claim that you cannot look over the record of the Reform party and find such record in this respect as you do find in the record of hon. gentlemen opposite. I want to say more, for my remarks apply in a general way to myself as they do especially to every member on this side of the House as well as every member opposite. It is the duty of the people of this country, who need not care particularly for one party or the other, it is in their hands to purge out the old leaven of political immorality so that the whole lump may not be leavened by it. If we have gone out of the true path we may thus return to the path of rectitude and purity in the administration of the affairs of the country. If the hon. gentlemen opposite are tried upon their record and found guilty, depose them; if gentlemen who succeed them do not prove true to the public interest, depose them; if the gentlemen who succeed them do no better, depose them; but let the people of the country, those who truly wish to see it maintain its character as a nation see to it that party prejudice no longer blinds their eyes, conscience and judgment, but let justice be meted out. There must be men in the country who, if accused, would rise and repel charges like those made against hon. gentlemen opposite. Let them be put in the position, and if they fall from their high estate, punish them. The evil is this: If there be corruption in high places it permeates down among the masses of the people till, unfortunately, as the hon. member for South Huron said, the public conscience is deadened till it does not give the answer it should do, till it does not resist the things it should resist as promptly as it should do, and as it would do if it were not tainted by this corruption that I fear, from the fact that it has been charged and not denied, prevails in this country. Sir, we want as the rulers of this land those who will act upon the precepts I have uttered, those who will not run after rewards and look for gifts, but who will recognise that if any special class are to be looked after and their interests promoted it is not the rich and wealthy, but it is the poor as embraced under the head of the widow and fatherless. Sir, we want men in positions who will regard the claims of labor just as readily as they will recognise the claims of capital, that the mechanic and laboring man can gain their eye and have their wishes granted as readily as capitalists and manufacturers. We want men there actuated by noble principles, so that the prayer of the petition of the poor Indian and the Metis of the far West will be as quickly heard as I receive as ready a response as the demand of the landholder who might seek to deprive him of his land and home.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Mr. Speaker, I cordially endorse the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat in his opening remarks. He referred to the fact that it was desirable that the speeches which are delivered on this subject should be short. I fully, Sir, endorse that remark, and I shall endeavor in the observations which I propose to offer to the House on this subject, to follow the hon. gentleman's precept rather than his example. The hon. gentleman, in the opening portion of his remarks, endeavored to defend the hon. member for South Huron, and the other gentlemen who compose the party to which he belongs, from the charge which has been so often made with regard to them of using language in this House which is calculated to injure the best interests of this country. And, Sir, after hearing the language which he used in the opening part of his address, I am sure it must have been a surprise to almost every gentleman in this House, that he should have occupied so much of his time since recess in pointing out almost every interest in this country at the present time was in a declining condition. And, Sir, I think, too, that when the hon. gentleman was defending the hon. member for South Huron from having uttered any sentiments or used any language tending to depreciate the interests of this country, the hon. gentleman must have forgotten many of the discussions which have taken place in this House during the past few years, and must surely have been absent from his place in this House during last Session when that hon. gentleman, in describing the condition of this country, astonished every hon. member in the House by the declaration that the position of this country at that time was worse than that of the United States at the close of the civil war. Now, Mr. Speaker, we were somewhat relieved at the opening of the hon. gentleman's address, by hearing him frankly acknowledge that the country was not in a very bad position. He was rather inclined to acknowledge, from his remarks then, that the country was in a prosperous condition, the only matter he regretted was that it was not in a more prosperous condition, that it was not advancing more rapidly than it had been, or, to use his own language, that we were not advancing by leaps and bounds. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman has, in the latter part of his address, devoted a considerable length of time to showing that the trade of this country at the present time shows that it is not in a prosperous condition. Now, it is necessary that I should, for a few moments, direct the attention of the House to the present position of our foreign trade. It is true the foreign trade of this country has declined somewhat during the last year. Hon. gentlemen point to this fact and repeat it on every occasion, and they endeavor in every instance to create the impression in this House and throughout the country that it is an indication that the important interests of this country are at the present time in a languishing condition, and that it is due to the policy of the present Administration. It is necessary, I say, to refer to some of the facts which our trade returns show in order to prevent such an impression from going abroad. Now, Sir, if we turn to the Trade and Navigation Returns for the last year, we will find, it is true, there are some decreases in both our exports and imports. Our exports in 1884 amounted to something more than $91,000,000; in 1885 they have decreased to $89,000,000, showing a decrease of some $2,000,000. Our imports in 1884 amounted to $116,000,000; in 1885 they amounted to nearly $109,000,000, or a decrease a little short of $7,500,000. But, Sir, if we examine these returns more closely we will find that this decrease can be satisfactorily accounted for, that it is accounted for and more than accounted for by the remarkable shrinkage in values that has taken place during the last year throughout the civilised world. Sir, the Trade and Navigation Returns show that while the value of our trade has decreased, the volume of trade has been fully maintained. Now, Sir, if we examine the different classes of our exports we will find that there has been a very considerable increase in all classes, except in our exports of lumber. It is true that in that particular class of products there has been a decline, but this is not to be wondered at, when we remember the fact that the price of lumber in foreign markets, during the past year, has been exceedingly low; that those low prices have had a depressing effect upon that industry, and therefore I repeat that it is not to be wondered at, under those circumstances, that the production of lumber is less, and that those engaged in that industry have not exported as much as in former years. But, Sir, taking the other classes of our exports, we find that in the products of our fisheries, we have had an increase from 127,000,000 pounds of fresh and salted fish in 1884, to 133,000,000 pounds in 1885. Our exports of salted fish have increased from 260,000 barrels in 1884, to 310,000 barrels in 1885—an increase of some 50,000 barrels. Then, Sir, if you pass to another class—animals and their products—we find that we exported, in 1884, some 90,000 cattle; in 1885, upwards of 144,000, an increase of 54,000. In 1884 we exported 304,000 sheep; in 1885, upwards of 335,000, an increase of upwards of 30,000. In 1884 we exported a little short of 76,000,000 pounds of cheese; in 1885, upwards of 86,500,000, an increase of 10,500,000 pounds. Of agricultural products, we exported, in 1884, something short of 8,000,000 bushels of barley; in 1885, 9,000,000 bushels. Of beans, 56,000 bushels in 1884, and in 1885, 193,000 bushels. Of oats, 1,400,000 bushels in 1884, and 2,400,000 in 1885; and a great many other articles which I will not detain the House by enumerating. But the argument may be used, that while the quantity of our exports has increased, the value has decreased, and this shows that our people have not received as good a price for the goods they had to sell as they did in former years, and this may be used to show that the present state of our trade is not a satisfactory one. It is true, that would not indicate a satisfactory condition of the trade of this country if there were no corresponding advantage to offset it. But, Sir, that position is shown to be untenable from the fact, that while the value of our exports has decreased, the value of the principal classes of goods which we import has decreased in a corresponding and even in a larger ratio. Now, Sir, the total value of our imports in 1884 was $116,000,000; in 1885 it has declined to a little short of $109,000,000, or a total decline of $7,500,000. But while there has been this decline in the total value of our imports, it is remarkable to note the large increase which is shown in the principal classes of goods which we have imported during the last year. Our imports of sugar, which amounted in 1884 to 173,000,000 lbs., have increased, in 1885, to upwards of 200,000,000 lbs.; our imports of tea, which, in 1884, amounted to 16,000,000 lbs., have increased, in 1885, to upwards of 18,500,000 lbs.; our imports of coffee, which amounted in 1884 to a little more than 1,600,000 lbs., in 1885, were a little less than 2,600,000 lbs.; our imports of raw cotton, which amounted, in 1884, to 20,000,000 lbs., in 1885 exceeded 23,000,000 lbs.; our imports of wool have increased from 6,000,000 in 1884 to a little less than 8,000,000 in 1885. I might enumerate other articles, but I do not wish to detain the House. But these figures show, first, that while there has been a shrinkage in the value of many classes of our exports and also in the classes of goods which have been imported, there has been an actual increase in the quantity of both our exports and our imports; showing that the volume of our trade has not only been fully maintained, but has actually been increased; and secondly, these figures show that while our people have received lower prices for some of the goods they have exported, they have paid less for the goods they have purchased in foreign markets, and their purchasing power has not been diminished by the decline in price. Now, Sir, there are several other features in our trade returns to which I might refer; but they have already been dealt with at considerable length by those who have preceded me. I will merely call attention very briefly to one or two of them. In the first place, the decreases in our imports have occurred almost entirely in those classes of goods which are manufactured in this country. I find that our imports of manufactures of iron and steel have decreased by upwards of $2,500,000, the manufactures of cotton goods by upwards of $1,250,000, and that there have also been decreases in imports of the manufactures of brass, copper, cordage and a variety of other articles. If we take the classes of goods upon which the people of this country pay duty, inclusive of those classes which are manufactured in the country, we find that there has been a decrease in the goods entered for consumption from $80,000,000 in 1884, to $73,000,000 in 1885, while in free goods there has actually been an increase from $28,000,000 in 1884 to upwards of $29,000,000 in 1885, or a total increase of a little more than $1,250,000. These figures show, first, that the importations of raw material bear relatively a much larger proportion and the importations of manufactured goods relatively a much smaller proportion to our total imports than they did in former years; and secondly, they furnish a most conclusive proof of the growth of manufacture in this country, and their increasing power to supply the wants of our people. Now, Sir, I do not intend to refer to very many matters which have been alluded to in the course of this debate. The hon. gentleman who has spoken has referred to the increase of taxation. It is not necessary that I should deal at any length with that subject; it has already been exhaustively dealt with by the hon. Minister of Finance, and the facts respecting it are in possession of the members of this House and before the country. I may simply state briefly what the facts are: Our net debt in 1878 amounted to $140,000,000; in 1885 it had increased to $196,000,000, the increase being $44,000,000. During the same period the interest on our debt increased from $6,553,000 in 1878 to $7,467,000 in 1885, an increase of something less than $1,000,000. In other words, while our debt has increased 31½ per cent., the interest we pay upon our debt has increased only 14½ per cent. This, Sir, is largely due to the favorable terms on which the late Minister of Finance during the past year negotiated his loans upon the London market, reducing the average rate of interest upon the debt of this country from 4.65 per cent., in 1878, to 3.80, in 1885. If we take into consideration the growth of the population during the time, we have this astonishing result, that the taxation necessary to pay the interest on our debts is actually at the present time 3½ cents less per head of the population than it was in 1878. The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House referred to the decline, which has taken place in the value of money throughout the world. He told us that the rates of interest had declined, and that it was not therefore due to the improved condition of this country that we were able to procure money on better terms now than we were in 1878. In answer to that statement, I have only to refer the hon. gentleman or any other member of this House to the relative value of our securities to-day in the English market as compared with those of other countries. I have not the figures here, but any hon. gentleman who will refer to the commercial reports will find that all Canadian securities to-day stand in a very much better relative position than they did in 1879, as compared with the securities of any other country in the civilised world. The hon. gentleman then referred to the other items constituting the expenditure of the country. In doing so, he complained that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who had preceded him, had not dwelt upon that subject at any length, and I noticed that the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), himself very prudently followed the example of the hon. member for Cardwell in that respect. Now, Sir, I intend to follow the example which has been set me by both hon. gentlemen. It is true, there has been a large increase in the expenditure in all the different branches of the public service—in Public Works, in the Department of Railways, in the Post Office Department, and in almost every other Department. But hon. gentlemen must bear in mind the facts so clearly stated by the Minister of Finance that this has been rendered necessary by the growth of the country and the increased demands made upon the Government to provide for these different branches of the public service, and they must also bear in mind that in very many of these branches of the public service there are corresponding receipts to offset the increased expenditure. The Minister of Finance furnished figures to show that while there has been an increase of expenditure, it has only been sufficiently large to keep pace with the growth of our population, and that there has been actually no increase on the taxation of the country. The hon. gentleman referred to at some length to the present condition of the manufactures of this country, and from the tenor of his remarks I inferred he was endeavoring to show that our manufacturing industries were not in a satisfactory condition. I was amused at one of the arguments he brought forward to support that theory. He asks why, if goods were manufactured in this country so largely at present, and if they could be produced as cheaply as in the United States, attempts were made to smuggle goods from the United States into the Dominion? I think the hon. gentleman will find that in all those attempts he speaks of, the classes of goods which were smuggled are classes which are not manufactured in the Dominion and upon which high duties are levied; but in order to show the growth of manufactures in this country, I will merely refer to a statement which was made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), in speaking on this subject on a former occasion. He was referring, I believe, to the growth of manufactures between 1874 and 1878, and he said that the importation of raw material was the true standard of the growth of manufactures in a country. Now, I am willing to accept his standard, and by that standard to measure the growth of manufactures in the Dominion between 1878 and the present time. I will not detain the House with the figures, for they have already been presented to the House by more than one speaker who preceded me, but the enormous increase in the importations of raw cotton, wool, pig iron, hides and a variety of other raw material, show how marvellous has been the growth of manufactures in this country during the past five years; what a large amount of employment they have given to the people, and how much they have contributed to advance the material prosperity of this country. Now, I shall pass over many matters which I have noted here, and come to another subject that has been dwelt upon at considerable length by all the speakers who have addressed the House, and that is the present position of the debt of this Dominion. It cannot be denied that the debt has increased very considerably during the last few years. Hon. gentlemen are constantly reminding us of this fact; hon. gentlemen constantly placing this fact before the people, and endeavoring, by merely stating the fact to persuade the people to draw the inference that the increase of debt is due to recklessness and extravagance on the part of the present Administration. But that is not a fair inference; it is not an inference which can fairly be drawn from that fact alone. If we wish to form an intelligent judgment upon the question, we must take into consideration the purposes for which that debt has been incurred. Of the debt of the Dominion, upwards of $100,000,000 represents the debts of the different Provinces assumed at the time of and since Confederation. Leaving that aside, we have expended, since Confederation, upon railways and canals alone, upwards of $120,000,000. These two items together would make a sum $30,000,000 in excess of the entire debt of the Dominion at the close of the last fiscal year. We must also bear in mind that there was a large sum expended on railways and canals prior to Confederation; we must remember that this large expenditure amounted to nearly $53,000,000, making a total expenditure upon railways and canals alone, up to the present time, of over $174,000,000, or only $22,000,000 less than the entire net debt of the Dominion. That $22,000,000 is represented by expenditure on other public works, and besides this we have the sums voted by this Parliament at different times as subsidies to railways, for the improvements of our harbors and rivers, for the construction of piers, lighthouses, telegraph lines and other works of public importance and general utility. I find that the total expenditure upon public works in this Dominion, at the close of the last fiscal year, amounted to upwards of $213,000,000, and when we take into considera-
