BLACKWOOD & CO.'S INK-BOTTLES.—This is decidedly the age of inventions. Man's genius seems ever on the stretch to fashion something new; something that will supersede and cast aside what ever our forefathers acknowledged as permanent and stable, and never dreamt of improving. Among the multiplicity of useful adjuncts to our comfort, which refinement has rendered necessary, how many trifles, insignificant in themselves, but troublesome by management, are of necessity required daily, and yet though the inconvenience experienced by the ill-fashoning of the article is loudly complained of, here set forth a rectifying principle, in attempting to set right one who would call their attention to the manufacture of an ink-bottle, yet we may venture to assert, that not one of our readers has at some time or other stained their fingers and their garments with the numberless liquid, through difficulty in pouring it forth from the awkwardly rounded spoutied jars in which this particular article has been dispensed from time immemorial. At all events, we can answer for ourselves, and many a malediction have we uttered on the glass bottles, impervious to the most searching scrutiny, of calling on the person extracting the contents an almost certain emersion is & color anything but fishable or generally regarded as impudent die for a lady's fingers. To rectify this miserable nuisance, Messrs. Blackwood & Co. have invented an ink-bottle, elegant in form, yet extremely simple in construction, which wholly obviates the annoyance complained of. This capital article can be procured at any price, and from the smallest to whatever size may be required, and as some are constructed of glass as well as others of a more durable material, the evils we have enumerated can readily be guarded against. "There is a turn for all things," we are told, and assuredly the obnoxious stone ink-bottles have had their day; and in brief time, when Messrs. Blackwood's patent becomes more generally known, the ancient receipts for the "dugy fluid" will be numbered among the inventions of a by-gone age.		MAY 24. DAVID TORRANCE.
